(33) Claudian. de Mallii Theodori Consulatu, ver. 156. Read annon, and not non without an interrogation, as in the edition of Barthius: and observe that Barthius, who is too prolix every where else, says almost nothing on this passage. Claudian, a little before, says, Quicquid Democritus risit, dixitque tacendo Pythagoras. Ibid. ver. 90.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google things: for he made them undergo a noviciate of ſilence [D], which laſted two years at leaſt; but he made it laſt five years for thoſe whom he knew to be moſt inclined to ſpeak (b). What I have ſaid in another place (c), perſuades me of the force of his cenſures. He made them live all in common (d); they renounced their property to their patrimony, and brought all they had to the feet of their maſter. An ill conſtruction was put upon their union, and it proved very fatal to them [E]. One of his greateſt cares was to correct the abuſes committed by married perſons [F]; he did not believe that

(b) Aulus Gellius, lib. i, cap. ix.

(c) Citation (27), of the article HIPPONAX.

(d) See the remark [E], at the end.

By words and ſilence Pythagoras reclaim'd,
Tarentum, which for luxury was fam'd.

[D] A noviciate of ſilence.] It was a hard diſcipline. Ἐστὶ δὲ πάντων χαλεπώτατον ἐγκρατεύματων τὸ γλώττης κρατεῖν (34), that is, the moſt difficult victory that can be gotten, is to have the maſtery of one's tongue. See among Cato's diſtichs, the encomium that is beſtowed on thoſe who know how to be ſilent when it is fit they ſhould (35). Servius mentions the noviciate of five years (36), and here is what Apuleius obſerves concerning that which was impoſed for about the ſpace of five years on ſuch diſciples as were not ſo cautious and diſcreet as others. 'Non in totum tamen '(Pythagorici) vocem deſueſcebant, nec omnes pari 'tempore elingues magiſtrum ſectabantur; ſed gravio- 'ribus viris brevi ſpatio ſatis videbatur taciturnitas mo- 'dificata. Loquaciores enim vero ferme in quinquen- 'nium, velut in exilium vocis mittebantur (37). - - - 'But the Pythagoreans were not entirely to forbear ſpeak- 'ing, nor were all to be ſilent for the ſame ſpace of time. 'A ſhort time was thought ſufficient for thoſe that were 'reſerved. But the ſpace of five years was impoſed on 'them, who were more inclined to talk.'

(34) Jamblichus, lib. i, cap. xxxi.

(35) Proximus ille Deo eſt qui ſcit ratione tacere.

(36) Servius, in illud Æneid. X, ver. 564, tacitis regnavit Amyclis.

(37) Apul. in Florid.

[E] An ill conſtruction was put upon that union, and it proved very fatal to them.] That ſociety of ſtudents was looked upon as a faction which conſpired againſt the ſtate; ſixty of them were deſtroyed, the reſt run away. 'Sed tercenti ex juvenibus cum ſodalitii juris 'ſacramento quodam nexi ſeparatam à ceteris civibus 'vitam exercerent, quaſi cœtum clandeſtinæ conjura- 'tionis haberent, civitatem in ſe converterunt, quæ 'eos, cum in unam domum convenisſent, cremare vo- 'luit. In quo tumultu ſexaginta ferme periere, ceteri 'in exilium profecti (38). - - - - - But three hundred 'young men, formed into a ſociety by a kind of oath, lived 'together by themſelves, and were looked upon as a pri- 'vate faction by the ſtate, who intended to burn them as 'they were aſſembled in one houſe. Almoſt ſixty of them 'periſhed in the tumult, and the reſt went into baniſh- 'ment.' We can neither learn from that paſſage of Juſtin, nor from what follows, whether that ſtorm was excited during the life of Pythagoras. It ſeems more reaſonable to believe, that this Philoſopher was not involved in that perſecution, than to believe he was. One would think therefore that Juſtin relates the ſame fact which Polybius ſpeaks of. Now according to Polybius, the Pythagoreans were burnt in Great Greece, ſome time before the war, which Dionyſius, tyrant of Syracuſe, made againſt the Crotoniates (39): it ſeems therefore that they were not burnt during their maſter's life; for there are one hundred and twenty years between the expulſion of Tarquinius, and that war of Dionyſius againſt Crotona (40). But Pythagoras came into Italy under the reign of Tarquinius, and died at Metapontum, after he had been twenty years in Crotona (41). Voſſius obſerves, that Juſtin, Polybius, Porphyrius, Jamblichus, mention the ſame accident (42), but the two latter obſerve that none but two men, viz. Archippus and Lyſis, eſcaped the fire: it will be ſaid therefore, that it was not a cruelty exerciſed on the ſchool of Pythagoras during his life. For Lyſis having retired to Thebes, was there preceptor to Epaminondas (43) who died one hundred and forty five years after the expulſion of Tarquinius. Theſe are doubts, I grant it, but no ſtrong proofs againſt thoſe who ſhould maintain, that the fire from which Lyſis was preſerved, happened during the life of Pythagoras. Note, that according to Plutarch the two Pythagoreans who made their eſcape, were Philolaus and Lyſis. He ſays ſo in his treatiſe concerning the genius of Socrates (44), and calls Cyclonians thoſe who ſet Pythagoras's college on fire in Metapontum. He calls them Cylonians in another place, and obſerves that they burnt Pythagoras alive. Καὶ ὁ Πυθαγόρου ζῶν]ος ἐμπρησμὸς ὑπὸ τῶν Κυλωνείων. Quod Pythagoræ vivo à Cyloneis illatum eſt incendium (45).

(38) Juſtin. lib. xx, cap. iv. See the remark [O].

(39) Polyb. lib. ii.

(40) See Calviſius, pag. m. 95, 165.

(41) Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

(42) Voſſius, de Philoſoph. Sectis, cap. vi, num. 26, pag. m. 38.

(43) Diog. Laërt. ibid. num. 7. Corn. Nepos, in Epaminonda. Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(44) Plut. in Socrat. Genio, pag. 583.

(45) Idem, de Stoicor. Repugn. pag. 1051.

If you deſire to know the name of the author, who tells us, that the diſciples of that Philoſopher deprived themſelves of the property to their eſtates, I ſhall refer you to theſe words of Aulus Gellius: 'Omnes ſimul 'qui à Pythagora in cohortem illam diſciplinarum re- 'cepti erant, quod quiſque familiæ pecuniæque habe- 'bat, in medium dabant, & coibatur ſocietas inſepa- 'rabilis, tamquam illud fuerit antiquum conſortium, 'quod re atque verbo appellabatur κοινόβιον (46). - - - - - All the diſciples of Pythagoras brought what 'money and ſubſtance they had into a common ſtock, and 'were formed into a ſociety, like that ancient community, 'which was properly called Cœnobium.'

(46) A. Gellius, lib. i, cap. ix. See alſo Laërt. lib. viii, num. 2.

[F] One of his greateſt cares was to correct the abuſes committed by married perſons.] He repreſented to them, that the thing which is to be aimed at in the joining of the ſexes, is to produce in a lawful way another perſon like one's ſelf; that one muſt endeavour to get well made, ſound, and luſty children; that they muſt be uſed to labour and ſobriety, and removed from venereal pleaſures till they come to be twenty years of age, and then they muſt be told not to enjoy them too often. 'Neceſſum eſſe ut pueri & virgines in laboribus & ex- 'ercitationibus omnibuſque tolerantiæ ac temperantiæ 'generibus congruentibus educentur; ut conveniens 'victus ipſis adhibeatur, & laborum amans, temperans '& continens eorum vita ſit: ut de uſu rei venereæ ſero 'erudiantur; ac pueros ſic inſtitui & educari oporteat, 'ut intra viceſimum ætatis annum talem congreſſum 'nullo modo quærant. Cum autem ad ætatem veneri 'maturam pervenerint, hac raro utendum eſſe; incon- 'tinentiam enim, bonamque corporis habitudinem, 'rarius conjunctas eſſe (47). - - - That it was neceſſary, 'that young men and women ſhould be enured to labour 'and exerciſe, patience and temperance, that a proper 'kind of food ſhould be given them, and that they 'ſhould lead an induſtrious and ſober life: that they 'ſhould not be early inſtructed about the uſe of venery, and 'that youth ſhould be told to abſtain from it, till they 'are at leaſt twenty years of age; and that when they 'are ripe for it, they ſhould uſe it rarely, becauſe in- 'continency and a ſound conſtitution ſeldom go together.' He altogether condemned thoſe who perform that act after they have eaten too much, but much more thoſe who perform it whilſt they are drunk (48). He would have huſbands not only to leave off concubinage, but alſo to obſerve the laws of chaſtity and modeſty towards their wives. Before that time they neither did the one nor the other: but it is ſaid that they were ſo ſenſibly moved with his remonſtrances, that they ſhewed a great zeal in reforming themſelves. Fertur & Pythagoras Crotoniatas à pellicum & illegitimarum feminarum conſuetudine abduxiſſe; maritos etiam monuiſſe, ut erga uxores ſuas caſti & pudici forent: quo factum, ut Crotoniatæ omnem incontinentiam & luxuriam, quæ tum temporis in urbe, ceu peſtis, graſſabantur, è medio tollere laborarint (49). The inhabitants of Crotona lived a very looſe and diſſolute life. They married only for form's ſake, they took a wife ad honores, they neglected and deſpiſed her, and minded only their concubines. They gave a very ill example; their conduct was contagious; they did not conſider that it was to be feared they might be imitated, and perhaps they had not much care about it. The maxim frangenti fidem frangatur eidem - - to pay one in his own coin, is but too common with reſpect to conjugal fidelity. Pythagoras undertook to correct ſuch a diſorder. If we may believe Juſtin, the force of his inſtructions proved ſufficient for it; but ſome authors intimate, that they proved not effectual enough, and that he was obliged to have recourſe to a more powerful machine. He pretended therefore that he had deſcended into hell, and had ſeen in great torments ſuch huſbands as do not pay the matrimonial duty to their wives. He became very conſiderable upon that account. Φησὶ δὲ Ἱερώνυμος καταδῦναι αὐτὸν εἰς ᾅδου τὴν μὲν Ἡσιόδου ψυχὴν ἰδεῖν πρὸς κίονι χαλκῷ δεδεμένην καὶ τρίζουσαν· τὴν

(47) Omiſſus, in Ethica Pythag. pag. 38, ex Jamblicho in Vita Pythag. lib. i, cap. xxii.

(48) Idem, pag. 39, ex eodem, ibid.

(49) Jamblich. ibid. cap. xviii, ap. Omiſſum, ibid. pag. 40.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that without this the public peace, and liberty, a good form of government, and other such things, about which he was very zealous [G], would be able to make private men happy.

δὲ Ὁμήρου, κρεμαμένην ὑπὸ δένδρου, καὶ ὄφεις περὶ αὐτὴν, ἀνθ' ὧν εἶπε περὶ θεῶν. κολαζομένους δὲ καὶ τοὺς μὴ θέλοντας συνεῖναι ταῖς αὐτῶν γυναιξί. καὶ δὴ καὶ διὰ τοῦτο τιμωθῆναι ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν Κρότωνι. Hieronymus vero ait descendisse ad inferos atque Hesiodi quidem animam columnæ æreæ vinculis adstrictam, stridentemque vidisse; Homeri autem, ex arbore pendentem, serpentesque illam circumdantes, propter ea quæ de diis finxerat. Eos item cruciari qui suis uxoribus congredi nollent: ejusque rei gratia à Crotoniatis honoratum (50). - - - - Jerom says he went down to hell, and there saw the soul of Hesiod tied to a pillar of brass, and making an hideous noise: and also the soul of Homer, hanging on a tree, and surrounded with serpents, because of his fictions about the gods. And likewise that those were tormented that would not pay matrimonial duty to their wives: and upon that account was honoured by the people of Crotona. That story is without doubt the same which Hermippus relates. He says (51), that this Philosopher being arrived in Italy, shut himself up in a subterranean place, having desired his mother to keep an account of what should happen. When he had been in that place as long as he thought fit, his mother delivered her table-book to him, as it had been agreed between them. He found in it the dates, and other circumstances of what passed: he came out of that place with a pale and lean face; he called the people together, and assured them that he came from hell, and to persuade them of the truth of it, he told them what had passed in the city. All his hearers were so moved with what he said, that the whole assembly fell a groaning and crying; and they doubted no longer but he was a divine person, and they gave him their wives to instruct them. It was without doubt on that occasion that he frighted ill husbands by telling them that those who refuse to pay the matrimonial duties to their wives, are tormented in hell with great severity. In all likelihood he spoke also of the punishments that are inflicted upon intriguing women, and we ought to believe it was one of the reasons which moved the Crotoniates to send their wives to his school. Observe the contradiction of that great master. He taught the Metempsychosis on the one hand, without confining himself to the three removings mentioned by Pindar (52): and on the other hand, he was so bold as to say, that he had seen in hell the souls of Homer, Hesiod, &c. very much tormented. The Metempsychosis destroyed hell, as he declares it in Ovid.

(50) Diog. Laërt. lib. viii, num. 21, pag. 505.

(51) Apud Diog. Laërt. ibid. num. 41, pag. 521, 522. See also the Scholiast upon Sophocles. Menagius in hunc locum Laërtii, pag. 372, 373, quotes his words.

(52) Olymp. Od. II.

O genus attonitum gelidæ formidine mortis,
Quid Styga, quid tenebras, & nomina vana timetis,
Materiem vatum, falsique pericula mundi?
Corpora sive rogus flamma, seu tabe vetustas
Abstulerit, mala posse pati non ulla putetis (53).

(53) Ovid. Met. lib. xv, ver. 153.

Why thus frighted at an empty name,
A dream of darkness, and fictitious flame?
Vain themes of wit! which but in poems pass,
And fables of the world that never was.
What feels the body when the soul expires,
By time corrupted or consum'd by fires.

DRYDEN.

But he rather chose to acquire authority, and make him self fit to extirpate debauchery by contradicting himself, than to follow a coherent method of teaching, which would not have proved so useful.

I said that he confined not himself to the three removings mentioned by Pindar, and I shall give an evident proof of it by the verses of Ovid, which I shall quote below (54). Therefore Forcatulus doth not speak the truth when he says the contrary. 'Constat, says he (55), Druidum imitatorem Pythagoram, desultoriam animarum migrationem nonnisi tertiam asseruisse. 'Nam si perenni serie animas in alia atque alia corpora transcripsisset, quis quæso locus fuisset Elysiis campis, aut cœli sedibus? quod miror satyricis scriptoribus falsis admodum insulse derelictum. Quicunque, inquit Pindarus, ter in utraque vita à vitiis alieni fuerunt, viam sibi à Jove destinatam adiere ad Saturni urbem. Ἔνθα μακάρων νᾶσον Ὠκεανίδες ἀῦραι περιπνέουσιν, ἄνθεμα δὲ χρυσῷ φλέγει, id est, Ubi beatorum insulam Oceanides auræ circumstant, & flores aurei fulgent. - - - It is certain Pythagoras imitated the Druids, in maintaining that the transmigration of souls extended only to the third remove. For if souls were for ever shifting bodies, what occasion would there be for Elysian fields, and heavenly habitations. Which I am surprised that satirical writers should foolishly suppose to be abandoned. Whoever, says Pindar, have been free from vice in transmigrations, they go to the city of Saturn, according to the decree of Jupiter, that is, where sea-breezes fan the island of the blessed, and golden flowers cast a lustre.'

(54) In the remark [M].

(55) Forcat. de Gallor. imperio & Philosophia, lib. i, pag. m. 90.

[G] About which he was very zealous.] His affection for the public good moved him to carry his instructions to the palaces of great men (56): he easily perceived that if he could work upon the minds of princes, and of the chief magistrates, other men would plentifully reap the fruits of his Philosophy. He had the happiness and the glory of teaching some disciples, who proved excellent law-givers, such as Zaleucus, Charondas, and some others (57). A law-maker ought to be looked upon as the best present that can be given a society. Those who made laws are more worthy of admiration, and of an immortal glory, than the greatest conquerors. Yet their memory is not come to us with the same noise as that of Cyrus and Alexander. The reason of it is, that our minds being not very capable of knowing true grandeur, do falsly join the idea of it with such actions as make a noise. They cannot distinguish what is great from what is shining (58); and so the life of a man who makes it his business to cure the internal distempers of a state with good laws, is an object that makes no great impression, because such a work goes on slowly. But if a man subdues cities and provinces, and destroys millions of men, and reduces ten times as many to beggary, he acquires so much glory, that the remotest posterity will speak of him with transports of admiration. However, it will be an eternal glory for Pythagoras, in the opinion of those who know how to judge of things, to have furnished the world with some good law-givers. It is a glory which redounds upon the whole Philosophy, as Seneca has well observed. 'Postquam, surrepentibus vitiis, in tyrannidem regna versa sunt, opus esse cœpit legibus, quas & ipsas inter initia tulere sapientes. Solon, ... Lycurgus . . . . . Zaleuci leges Charondæque laudantur: hi non in foro, nec in consultorum atrio, sed in Pythagoræ tacito illo sanctoque secessu didicerunt jura, quæ florenti tunc Siciliæ, & per Italiam Græciæ ponerent (59). - - - After governments, by the growth of vice, were turned into tyranny, laws became necessary, which at first were made by wise men. Solon, ... Lycurgus . . . . . The laws of Zaleucus and Charondas are esteemed: those they enacted in Sicily, then in a flourishing condition, and in Greece, they did not learn at the forum or in courts of law, but privately of Pythagoras.' Besides, he took a particular care to pacify the wars which arose in Italy, and the intestine factions of the cities (60). He used to say, that war should be made only against these five things, the diseases of the body, the ignorance of the mind, the passions of the heart, the seditions of cities, and the discord of families. They are five monsters which ought to be prosecuted to the utmost with fire and sword. 'Sustulisse penitus omnes discordias, non à notis solùm & familiaribus, eorumque posteris ad aliquot secula, sed ab omnibus omnino Italiæ atque Siciliæ civitatibus, tam intestinas quam externas, auctor est Porphyrius in ejus Vita: qui addit, hoc apophthegma crebrò ei in ore fuisse, Fugandum omni conatu, & igni atque ferro, & quibuscumque denique machinis præcidendum, à corpore quidem morbum; ab anima, ignorantiam; à ventre, luxuriam; à civitate, seditionem; à familia, discordiam (61). - - - Porphyrius in his life relates, that he not only removed all differences between friends and acquaintances, and their posterities for several ages, but likewise put an end to those wars that arose in Italy and Sicily, both intestine and foreign: he adds, that he frequently used this apophthegm, that we ought by fire and sword and all other means whatever to drive diseases from the body, ignorance from the mind, sensuality from the heart, sedition from cities, and discord from families.' It is

(56) Πυθαγόρας τοῖς πρωτεύουσιν Ἰταλιωτῶν. Ac Pythagora principes Italorum. Plutarchus, cum principibus viris Philosopho esse disputandum, pag. 777, A.

(57) Vid. Jambl. in Vit. Pythag. lib. i, cap. xxx.

(58) Vid. Plin. Epist. XVI, lib. iii, where he shews alia esse clariora, alia majora.

(59) Seneca, Epist. XC, pag. m. 369. Vid. Miscellaneæ observationes of Petrus Petitus, pag. 265.

(60) See the letter which they say he wrote to Anaximenes, apud Laërt. lib. viii, num. 49.

(61) Menag. in Laërt. lib. viii, num. 50.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

happy. I wonder that a Philoſopher, ſo learned in Aſtronomy, Geometry, and the other parts of Mathematics, ſhould take delight in delivering his fineſt precepts under the veil of enigmas. That veil was ſo thick that it has afforded the interpreters a large field of conjectures [H], and as many myſtical ſenſes as they pleaſed. Some take in a literal ſenſe the order he gave to abſtain from eating of beans [I]. Few men, in thoſe times, travelled no wonder if the inhabitants of Crotona deſired, that their ſenate ſhould be directed by the counſels of ſo excellent a man. Valerius Maximus ſays ſo, to ſhew that the authority of Pythagoras was acknowledged out of his college. ‘ Pythagoræ tanta veneratio ab ‘ auditoribus tributa eſt, ut quæ ab eo acceperant, in ‘ diſputationem deducere nefas exiſtimarent: Quin- ‘ etiam interpellati ad reddendam cauſſam, hoc ſolum ‘ reſpondebant, ipſum dixiſſe: Magnus honos, ſed ‘ ſchola tenus. Illa urbium ſuffragiis tributa eſt. E- ‘ nixo Crotoniatæ ſtudio ab eo petierunt ut ſenatum ‘ ipſorum, qui mille hominum numero conſtabat, con- ‘ ſiliis ſuis uti pateretur (62). - - - Pythagoras was held ‘ in ſuch veneration by his diſciples in his ſchool, that ‘ they thought it a crime to call in queſtion what he ‘ ſaid; and when they were deſired to give a reaſon for ‘ any thing, they only anſwered, he ſaid ſo. He was ‘ alſo greatly reſpected by the inhabitants of Crotona, ‘ who earneſtly intreated him to aſſiſt their ſenate, which ‘ conſiſted of a thouſand men, with his counſels.’ The ſame author tells us, that ſeveral cities of Italy felt the good effects of that Philoſopher's ſtudies (63).

(62) Val. Max. lib. viii, cap. vii, num. 1, in extern.

(63) Plurimis & opulentiſſimis urbibus effectus ſuorum ſtudiorum approbavit. Ibid. cap. vii, num. 2, extern.

[H] It has afforded interpreters a large field of conjectures.] See, for example, what they have ſaid upon this precept of Pythagoras, Do not ſit upon a Chœnix, Chœnici ne inſideas; ſee it, I ſay, in the learned diſſertation which I have mentioned in another place (64). Mr du Rondel is the author of it. That ſymbolical way of teaching was very much in uſe in the eaſtern countries and Egypt. Pythagoras had it, without doubt, from thence. He came from his travels loaded with the learning he had got in all the countries he went through. It is thought that he made a plentiful harveſt among the Jews, and that he learned a great many things of Ezekiel and Daniel. Nay, it is pretended that his Tetractys is the ſame thing with the name Tetragrammaton, a name not to be pronounced, and full of myſteries, as the Rabbins ſay. See the learned Huetius, Adde, ſays he (65), & veri perſimilem conjecturam Seldeni, & Wendelini, qua mirificam illam Pythagoræ τετρακτὸν ipſum eſſe ſuſpicantur Dei nomen τετραγράμμαϑον, יהוה, atque ejus notitiam à Daniele jam ſene Pythagoram, cum in Babylonia degeret, acceptiſſe. Danieli adjungi poterat & Ezekiel, ut oſtendam infra. Others ſay, That the Tetractys, that great object of veneration, and by which they uſed to ſwear, was only a myſterious way of teaching by numbers. Διὸ καὶ ἐφθέγγοντο οἱ Πυθαγορειοι, ὡς μεγίϛη ὅρκῳ ὕντ@ τῆς τετράδ@, Οὐ μὰ τὸν ἀμετέρᾳ ψυχᾷ παραδόντα τετρακτὸν. Παγὰν ἀενάου φύσεως ῥιζώματ' ἔχουσαν. Itaque ſanctiſſimum jusjurandum Pythagorei quaternario ſunt complexi, quam tetractyn vocant. Per tibi noſtræ animæ præbentem tetrada juro Naturæ fontemque & firmamenta perennis (66). Conſider theſe words of the Leipſic Journal, page 204 of the year 1685, in the abſtract of an Engliſh book of John Turner. Ex hac ipſa tamen gentilium notitia inſcite à quibuſdam colligi ait, Pythagoræorum Tetractyn, quam tam reverenter habuerunt, & per quam jurare etiam ſoliti leguntur, eſſe unum idemque cum nomine tetragrammato, quod à Judæis ipſi acceperint. . . . . Aliam proinde viam demonſtrat Autor tetractyn iſtam explicandi, deſumptam puta à methodo Pythagoræorum myſtica, qua dogmata ſua fere per numeros certos indicare & explanare fuerint ſoliti. But we muſt not forget to ſay, that Pythagoras and his ſucceſſors had two ways of teaching, the one for thoſe that were initiated, and the other for ſtrangers and profane men. The firſt was clear and perſpicuous, the ſecond was ſymbolical and enigmatical. See the XIIIth chapter of a book of John Scheffer us, Profeſſor at Upſal, intituled, De natura & conſtitutione Philoſophiæ Italicæ, printed at Upſal in the year 1664, in 8vo.

(64) In the article EPICURUS, remark [L].

(65) Dem. Evangel. Prop. IV, cap. ii, num. 8, pag. 89, Edit. Lipſ. 1694. See alſo Marſham's Chron. Can. Ægyptiac. Sæc. XI, pag. m. 277, 278.

(66) Plut. de Placit. lib. i, cap. iii, pag. 877, A.

[I] The order he gave to abſtain from eating of beans.] They who explain that prohibition in a literal ſenſe, alledge, amongſt other reaſons, that Pythagoras was inſtructed by the Egyptians, and even ſuffered himſelf to be circumciſed, that he might be admitted to their moſt ſecret myſteries. Διὶ ἓς καὶ περιετέμετο, ἵνα δὴ καὶ εἰς τὰ ἄδυτα καϑελϑὼν, τὴν μυϛικὴν παρ' Αἰγυπτίων ἐκμάϑοι φιλοσοφίαν. Propter quos (Prophetas Ægyptios) etiam fuit circumciſus, ut adyta ingrediens Ægyptiorum myſticam diſceret philoſophiam (67). Now the Egyptians abſtained from beans: they ſowed none, and if they found any that had grown up without being ſown, they would not touch them (68). Their prieſts carried the ſuperſtition farther, they durſt not ſo much as look upon them, they accounted them unclean, and had rather choſen to eat the fleſh of their fathers. Θᾶττον ἂν τὰς κεφαλὰς φαγεῖν φασι τῶν πατέρων ἢ κυάμους. Dicunt ſe parentum capita citius eſuros quam fabas (69). From whence they conclude, that Pythagoras, who had been their diſciple, forbad the eating of beans in a literal ſenſe. Several grave authors among the ancients underſtood that prohibition ſo. Some ſay he choſe rather to be killed by thoſe that purſued him, than to make his eſcape thro' a field of beans (70), ſo great was his reſpect or abhorrence for that plant! I think Ariſtoxenus is the only author who ſays, that Pythagoras would eat them often. ‘ Ariſtoxenus muſicus vir litterarum veterum di- ‘ ligentiſſimus, Ariſtotelis philoſophi auditor, in libro, ‘ quem de Pythagora reliquit, nullo ſæpius legumento ‘ Pythagoram dicit uſum quàm fabis: quoniam is ci- ‘ bus & ſubduceret ſenſim alvum & lævigaret. Verba ‘ iſta Ariſtoxeni ſubſcripſi: Πυθαγόρᾳς δὲ τῶν ὀσ- ‘ ῳίων μάλιϛα τὸν κύαμον ἐδοκίμασε λίαν κινη- ‘ τικόν τε γὰρ εἶναι, καὶ διαφορητικόν. διὸ καὶ ‘ μάλιϛα κέχρηται αὐτῷ (71). - - - The Muſician A- ‘ riſtoxenus, a great lover of ancient learning, and a diſ- ‘ ciple of Ariſtotle, ſays in a book which he left concerning ‘ Pythagoras, that Pythagoras uſed to eat beans more ‘ often than any other kind of pulſe: becauſe that ſoft ‘ gently purged and cleanſed the body. I am of the ſame ‘ opinion with Ariſtoxenus: for Pythagoras thought beans ‘ very proper to diſſolve and diſcuſs humours: and there- ‘ fore uſed them moſt.’ Our learned men do not much value the teſtimony of Ariſtoxenus; they believe he was miſtaken, and look upon that Pythagorean abſtinence as a certain matter of fact, and enquire into the reaſons of it. Ariſtotle gives four or five reaſons for it. He pretends that Pythagoras prohibited the eating of beans, either becauſe they are like certain parts, which I will not name, or becauſe they are like the gates of Hell, or becauſe they provoke luſt, or becauſe they reſemble the nature of the univerſe, or becauſe they were made uſe of in the election of magiſtrates (72). Thoſe who pretend that that prohibition was a moral precept, and that Pythagoras underſtood it only in an allegorical ſenſe, fancy that he forbad thereby his diſciples to meddle with the government. This is grounded upon the cuſtom of ſome cities, wherein every body gave his vote with beans, when they proceeded to the election of magiſtrates. Others think that he forbad the venereal pleaſure. Here is a paſſage of Aulus Gellius, taken from the chapter wherein the author alledges and approves the teſtimony of Ariſtoxenus. ‘ Videtur autem de ‘ κυάμῳ non eſitato cauſam erroris fuiſſe, quia in Em- ‘ pedocli carmine quo diſciplinas Pythagoræ ſecutus ‘ eſt, verſus hic invenitur:

(67) Clem. Alexandr. Strom. lib. i, pag. 302.

(68) Herod. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii.

(69) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhonic. Hypotypoſ. lib. iii, pag. 136. See alſo St Chryſoſt. Hom. II, in Joann.

(70) See the remark [P], citation (128).

(71) Aul. Gell. lib. xv, cap. xi, pag. m. 131.

(72) Ariſt. in Libro de Fabis, ap. Diog. Laert. in Pythagora, lib. viii, num. 34.

Δειλοὶ, πάνδειλοι, κυάμων ἀπὸ χεῖρας ἔχεσθαι.

‘ opinati enim ſunt plerique κύαμον legumentum vul- ‘ go dici. Sed qui diligentius anquiſitiuſque carmina ‘ Empedocli arbitrati ſunt, κυάμους hoc in loco teſti- ‘ culos ſignificare dicunt; eoſque more Pythagoræ o- ‘ portè atque ſymbolicè κυάμους appellatos, quia ſint ‘ εἰς τὸ κυεῖν δεινοὶ καὶ αἴτιοι τὸ κυεῖν; & geni- ‘ turæ humanæ vim præbeant, iccircoque in Empedo- ‘ li verſu iſto non à fabulo edendo, ſed à rei venereæ ‘ proluvio voluiſſe homines deducere (73). - - - The ‘ precept about not eating the κυάμῳ ſeems to have ‘ been the foundation of an error, becauſe in a verſe of ‘ Empedocles, who followed the doctrines of Pythagoras, ‘ the word κυάμοι is taken by many for beans. But ‘ thoſe, who have more carefully examined the Poem of ‘ Empedocles, ſay that it ſignifies the teſticles in that ‘ place: which after the manner of Pythagoras are ſi- ‘ guratively

(73) Aul. Gell. ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google travelled in so many places as he did (e). He is looked upon, by some, as a great Magician [K]: we shall see upon what grounds. I shall also observe that Naudæus clears (e) See Apul. in Florid.

'guratively so called, from κυειν, because they produce 'conception, and give a force in generation; and there- 'fore in that verse of Empedocles, men are not forbid 'the eating of beans, but the immoderate use of venery.' Mauro in a Poem, wherein under the name della Fava he denotes something that is lascivious (74), joins together the opinion of Aristoxenus, and that which is contrary to it. He pretends that Pythagoras prohibited the use of beans, that is to say, venereal pleasures; and nevertheless that there was no food which he used more frequently than that: he forbad others what he himself practised; and if we believe Mauro such a conduct is very common.

(74) See the article MOLZA, remark [D].

Non fè Natura mai cosa sì ghiotta,
Che senza quasi romperla co i denti
Pare, ch'ogni persona se la inghiotta.
Furon certi Filosofi prudenti,
De' quali fu Pitagora il maestro,
Che vietava la Fava a quelle genti.
Eran ribaldi, e ladri da capestro.
Che ingannavan con arte gli ignoranti.
E poi se ne mangiavano un canestro.
Così fanno hoggi certi mormoranti,
Che ogni persona sepelisson viva,
Chiamando Amore, Venere i furfanti.
Riprendono in altrui la vita attiva,
Et essi ogn'hor di vespro, e di mattino
Hanno in uso l'attiva, e la passiva.
Così Maometto già per torre il vino,
Seppe persuader provincie, e regni
Co'l suo sottile ingegno, e diavolino.
Gli parue, che i plebei non fosser degni
Di quel liquore, e così sempre al mondo
Sovra la forza son stati gl'ingegni.
Pitagora, c'havea pescato al fondo,
E de le cose la ragion sapea,
Ogni gran savio sta parer secondo.
E de le Fave nemico parea,
Ma se ne confortava il gusto, e'l tatto,
E d'altra cosa quasi non vivea (75).

(75) Mauro, Capitolo in lode della Fava, fol. 76, verso, in a collection of Rime Piacevoli, printed at Vicenza 1603.

Cicero intimates, that the prohibition of beans was grounded upon their hindering men from dreaming divinatory dreams; for they heat too much, and by that irritation of the spirits they suffer not the soul to enjoy that quietness which is necessary for the search of truth. 'Ex eadem item opinione M. Cicero in li- 'bro de divinatione primo, hæc verba posuit; Jubet 'igitur Plato sic ad somnum proficisci corporibus affectis, 'ut nihil sit quod errorem animis perturbationemque af- 'ferat. Ex quo etiam Pythagoreis interdictum putatur, 'ne faba vescerentur; quod habet inflationem magnam 'is cibus tranquillitatem mentis quærentibus contrariam (76). Hæc quidem M. Cicero (77). - - - According 'to the same opinion, Cicero in the first book of Divina- 'tion has these words:' Therefore Plato advises that 'one should go to sleep in such a disposition of body, 'that nothing may occasion error or disturbance to 'the mind. And for the same reason, it is thought 'the Pythagoreans were forbid to eat beans, because 'that sort of food is extremely apt to breed wind, 'and to discompose the spirits.' The learned Windet has inquired more learnedly than any body else into the reasons of that abstinence: he lays the greatest stress upon the gates of Hell. We have seen that one of Pythagoras's reasons was taken from the resemblance between beans and those gates. Windet does not approve the opinion of those who say, that by κύαμος, Pythagoras understood a woman's breast, or the testicles (78). He sticks to the literal sense, but he owns that beans were forbidden out of a principle of chastity. What he says is full of exquisite learning: he shews, that in the opinion of Pythagoras, to descend into Hell, signified to be begotten, and denoted only the change which a soul undergoes when it comes out of the upper regions, to be united with an organized body upon earth. Cum autem ἄδης (localiter) sit regio naturæ corruptibilis, hinc Pythagoricis animæ cæleste solum vertentes atque ἰέναι εἰς γένεσιν dicuntur etiam καταλήγειν εἰς ἅδην (79). He shews, that beans having no knots in their stalks, resemble the gates of Hell, through which the souls have always a free entrance, in order to generation. He adds, that Pythagoras considering this life as a kind of death or banishment, endeavoured to persuade men not to beget children, but to return to the heavenly places (80). Atque in eo Portæ Inferni similis est Faba, διὰ τὸ ἀγόνατον εἶναι, quod genuum expers sit, ut loquitur Aristoteles (81), vel διὰ τὸ δι ὅλου τετρῆσθαι, καὶ μὴ ἐγκόπτεσθαι, ταῖς μεταξὺ τῶν γονάτων ἐμφράξεσιν, id est, propterea quod penitus perforetur, nec articulorum sive geniculorum obicibus intercipiatur: perinde ac porta inferni nunquam oppessulata animabus εἰς γένεσιν κατίουσαις in generationem descendentibus perpetuo patet. Pythagoras ergo Fabas vetando, cavit à generatione continua ac perpetua; insinuans suis, satius fuisse pollutum corruptibilis hujusce regionis hospitium nunquam intrâsse, sed quando id integrum jam non fuerit, saltem ut admissi quàm primùm generationem sistant, atque ad superiora redire nitantur. He refutes those, who believe that the disciples of Pythagoras were forbidden to eat beans, because they are unclean food; and he says that it was for some holy and mysterious reasons, which they kept to themselves. Nimis autem populariter dictum est Ægyptios & Pheneatas ipsumque Pythagoram Fabas utpote immundas adspernatos: cùm revera non ob immunditiem sed ob sacras rationes abstinuerint (82). Some of them chose to die rather than to reveal so great a secret. A Pythagorean woman cut out her tongue, lest the severity of the torments should force her to speak (83). 'Ipsum 'autem Pythagoram ferunt se vita potiùs spoliandum 'persequentibus ultrò stitisse, quam per Fabetum fuga 'sibi consulere voluisse. Jamblichus decem, Suidas 'quinquaginta Pythagoreis itidem factum memorat. 'Millias Crotoniata mori maluit, quàm Dionysio causas 'exponere propter quas Pythagorei Fabis abstinerent. 'Peninde etiam est quod de ipso Pythagora refert Sui- 'das. Milliæ uxor Timycha, in similem quæstionem 'veniens, suam sibi linguam præmordit, ne, tormen- 'tis victa, cogeretur τῶν ἐγχειρουθμένων τι ἀνακα- 'λύψαι, arcanorum quidpiam detegere, referente Jam- 'blicho (84). - - - *They say that Pythagoras himself 'chose rather to be killed by those that pursued him, than 'to make his escape through a field of beans. Jambli- 'chus tells that ten, and Suidas that fifty Pythagoreans 'did the same thing: Millias of Crotona would rather 'die than declare to Dionysius the reasons, why the Py- 'thagoreans abstained from beans: This Suidas relates of 'Pythagoras himself. Timycha, the wife of Millias, being 'put to the same trial, bit off her tongue, lest the severe 'rity of the torments should force her to discover any se- 'cret, as Jamblichus relates it.' Menagius quotes a passage taken from the life of St Artemius, which says that Theano, a scholar and wife of Pythagoras, refusing to tell the reason why they abstained from beans, was put to death; but her tongue was cut off, before she was put to death. Θεανὼ δὲ, ἡ τότε γαμετὴ καὶ μαθήτρια, μὴ θέλουσα τὴν αἰτίαν κατειπεῖν, δι ἣν τὸν κύαμον οὐκ ἐσθίουσι, τὴν γλῶτταν ἐκτμηθεῖσα προτέρων, καὶ αὐτὴ προαπόλλυται, &c (85).

(76) There is in Tully, inflationem magnam is cibus tranquillitati mentis quærenti vera contrariam. Aul. Gellius must needs have quoted those words without book. See Philip. Caroli, Animadvers. in A. Gell. pag. m. 266, 267.

(77) Aul. Gell. ubi supra.

(78) Est qui nixus parum firmo tibicine de papillis mulierbribus intellexit; alii testes operte significari volunt, alii, alia quæ parumper attinet despicere. Ja. Windet, de Vita functorum statu, pag. 79, Edit. Lond. 1677.

(79) Ib. p. 106.

(80) Ibid. pag. 110, 111.

(81) Apud Diog. Laërt. lib. viii, num. 34. Ἤ ὅτι ἅδῃ τύλαις. ἀγονατον γὰρ μονον. Sive quod inferni januis (similes sunt fabæ) solæ enim geniculatæ non sunt.

(82) Windet, ibid. pag. 81.

(83) Compare with this what the courtezan Læna did at Athens. Plin. lib. xxxiv, cap. viii, pag. m. 122. Athen. lib. xiii. pag. 596. Pausan. lib. i, pag. 41, and Polyen. lib. viii, speak of it. See Father Bouhours, Entretien du Secret, pag. m. 197, 198.

(84) Id. Windet. ibid. pag. 84.

I shall observe by the by, that the Schola Salernitana in the edition of Renatus Moreau, forbids to eat beans; 'Manducare fabam caveas, facit illa podagram. - - - 'See that you abstain from beans: they breed the gout.' The learned and large collections which that Physician has published on that precept, deserve to be consulted. They contain a great many remarks which concern Pythagoras.

(85) Vita Sancti Artemii in codice MS Bibliothecæ Colbertinæ, num. 82, pag. 48, apud Menagium notis in Diogen. Laërt. lib. viii, num. 50, pag. 378.

[K] He is looked upon as a great Magician.] I shall quote a passage out of the apology for great men accused of Magic. He was looked upon as a sorcerer and an enchanter, because, first, he made a long stay in Egypt, and read the books of Zoroaster, wherein he learned, as one may imagine, the properties of certain herbs, which he called Coracesia, Callicia, Menais, Corinthas, and Aproxis, the two first whereof turned water into ice, when they were put into it, the two next were an excellent remedy against the biting of serpents, and the last would

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google clears him from that accuſation [L]. I might obſerve a great many other things; but I muſt *would be kindled of a ſudden at any diſtance from the fire. Likewiſe in one of his ſymbols he expreſsly forbad the uſe of beans, which according to the ſame ſuperſtition he boiled and expoſed to the moon for ſome nights, till by a great power of Magic they turned into blood; which perhaps ſerved him to do that other trick mentioned by Cœlius Rhodiginus * after Suidas and the interpreter of Ariſtophanes in the comedy of the Clouds, who ſay, that that Philoſopher uſed to write with blood upon a looking-glaſs, any thing that he had a mind to, and holding thoſe letters againſt the face of the moon when it was at full, he ſaw in that planet every thing he had written upon his looking-glaſs. To which may be added, that he appeared at the Olympic games with a golden thigh, that he was ſaluted by the river Neſſus, that he ſtopped an eagle that was flying, tamed a ſhe-bear, killed a ſerpent, and drove away an ox which ſpoiled a field of beans, only by the virtue of ſome words. Beſides, he was ſeen the very ſame day, and at the ſame hour in the cities of Crotona and Metapontum, and uſed to foretel things to come with ſo great a confidence, that many are of opinion he was named Pythagoras, becauſe the anſwers he gave were not leſs certain and true than thoſe of Apollo Pythius.* Thus far Naudæus in the xvth chap. page 215 of his apology for great men. He tells us, page 214, that what he has ſaid may be collected out of Jamblichus, Pliny, Tertullian, Origen, St Auguſtin, Ammianus Marcellinus, the Jeſuit Delrio, and Boiſſardus.

* Lib. ix, cap. xxiii.

[L] Naudeus clears him from this accuſation.] See his Apology for great Men: I ſhall only tranſcribe the following words. 'The proofs which are grounded 'upon that Philoſopher's prohibiting the uſe of beans, 'and his way of turning their juice into blood, may 'be as eaſily refuted as the foregoing, ſince Reuchlin 'deſpiſes, with great reaſon, all the fooleries which 'many crack-brained and fantaſtical men have in-'vented about that prohibition, ſuch as that of Her-'mippus in Diogenes, who believed that Pythagoras 'choſe to be killed near a field of beans, rather than 'go through it to eſcape from his enemies; and if it 'be true that he forbad them, he did it for no other 'reaſon than the firſt out of the five, which Mr Mo-'reau  gives for it in the above-mentioned place of 'his commentary on the Schola Salernitana (86). . . . 'In like manner it may be ſaid, that there was 'nothing extraordinary in his converting beans into 'blood; for Mr Moreau very clearly ſhews in 'the ſaid commentary, that, according to the prin-'ciple of Chymiſts, who reckon ſimilitude and re-'ſemblance as cauſes of actions, it is a thing that may 'be done and explained by natural principles: but 'there is no need to believe that Pythagoras made uſe 'of that elixir of beans, or human blood, to write 'upon his looking-glaſs: for beſides that, he could 'have no reaſon to uſe blood rather than any other 'liquor, Campanella † proves, with very ſolid rea-'ſons, that ſuch an operation is altogether impoſſible; 'and when Agrippa ‡ boaſted that he had that ſecret, 'and Natalis Comes ‡ wrote that in the time of 'Francis I, and Charles V, they knew at Paris, in 'the night, every thing that paſſed at Milan in the 'day; the former ſaid ſo only to commend him-'ſelf, and to be cried up, as we ſhall ſhew more 'fully in his chapter, and what the latter ſays is 'a meer fable and lie, contrived by thoſe who had a 'mind to add Magic to the arms of thoſe two great 'princes (87), as we are told that Ninus and Zoro-'aſter, Pyrrhus and Crœſus, Nectanebus and Philip 'of Macedon formerly did. From whence we may 'judge, that all that is ſaid of Pythagoras's looking-'glaſs is as falſly aſcribed to him, as the ſuperſtitious 'Arithmetic, and the wheel of Onomancy, or that 'if he practiſed it any time, it was doubtleſs ſome 'trick, preſtige, and ſubtilty; and to conclude with 'Suidas, παίγνιον διὰ κατόπτρου (88), a trick with 'a looking-glaſs. It would be needleſs to inſiſt any 'longer upon his killing, with the muttering of ſome 'words, a ſerpent which waſted the country of Italy, 'becauſe Boiſſardus, who alledges Ariſtotle for it, does 'not quote the book out of which he had it, and if 'any one will more narrowly enquire into the truth 'of that ſtory, it will be found to be altogether falſe, 'being founded only upon the ignorance of thoſe who 'change Socrates into Pythagoras, and take, as a true 'hiſtory, the fable concerning the former, which may 'be read in a book of the Cauſes and Properties of the 'Elements, which Patricius ſhews †† to have been 'falſly aſcribed to Ariſtotle. But that inadvertency of 'Boiſſardus might be eaſily excuſed, had he not com-'mitted another much worſe, and more remarkable, 'when he quotes Plutarch in the life of Numa, to 'give credit to the hiſtory of the ox, which Pythago-'ras ‡‡ drove out of a field of beans, after he had 'whiſpered ſomething in his ear. He had better have 'confeſſed that he had it from Cœlius Rhodigi-'nus, who does indeed quote Plutarch in the be-'ginning of his chapter, but upon a ſubject different 'from that ſtory, of which he never made any men-'tion (89).'

 Cap. xix.

(86) Naudæus, Apology for Great Men accuſed of Magic, pag. 225, 226.

† Lib iv, de ſenſu, cap. xvi.

‡ Lib. i, de occult. Philoſoph. cap. vi.

‡ Lib. iii, cap. xvii, Mytholog.

(87) See the article FRANCIS I, remark [K].

(88) Naud. ibid. pag. 226, 227.

†† Diſcurſus Perpat. Tom. i, lib. iii.

‡‡ Lib. xix, cap. vii.

(89) Naudæus, ibid. pag. 237.

I believe the reader will be glad to find here the Greek words of Ariſtophanes's Scholiaſt, corrected by the learned Meziriac. I ſhall conclude this diſcourſe, ſays he (90), with a pretty remark which is made by the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes's comedy of the Clouds, and by Suidas, upon theſe words, Θετταλὴ γυνὴ, concerning a Magical operation relating to the Moon. Theſe are the words of the ſcholiaſt. Ἔστι δὲ καὶ Πυθαγόρου παίγνιον διὰ τοῦ κατόπτρου ποιοῦτο. πληροσελήνῳ τῆς σελήνης ὄσης, εἴτις ἐσοπτρον ἐπιγραψειεν αἵματι ὅσα βάλεται, καὶ παρεστὼν ἑτέρῳ, σαίνῃ κατόπιν αὐτοῦ, δεικνὺς πρὸς τὴν σελήνην τὰ γράμματα, κἀκεῖνος ἀτενίσειεν ὁ πλησίον εἰς τὸν τῆς σελήνης κύκλον, ἀναγνοίη πάντα τὰ ἐν τῷ κατόπτρῳ γεγραμμένα, ὡς ἐπὶ τῆς σελήνης γεγραμμένα. There is a trick of Pythagoras's invention, which is performed with a looking-glas in this manner. The moon being at full, ſome body writes on a looking-glaſs any thing that he has a mind to with blood, and having given notice of it to another perſon, he ſtands behind him, and turns towards the moon the letters written in the looking-glaſs, and the other looking fixedly on the orb of the moon, reads in it all that is written on the looking-glaſs, as if it were written on the moon. I have corrected two faults in that paſſage, reading πληρ᾽σελήνῳ inſtead of περσελήνῳ, according to the opinion of the learned Meurſius, in his book concerning the Grecian games, who had this correction from Suidas; and reading alſo ἀτενίσειεν inſtead of ἀτενίσαι. As for Suidas, it ſeems that he only tranſcribed that paſſage word for word; but there are many faults in all the printed books of that author. You will find the correction of thoſe faults in Meziriac. Conſult the remarks on the Berger Extravagant (91). The impertinent ſtory of Natalis Comes (92) has crept into many books: ſo true it is, that any one who prints hearſays, does the public wrong. There are but too many authors who will adopt it one after another. Becauſe the fryar, St Romauld, inſerted that ſtory in his Chronological Treaſure, Father l'Enfant has inſerted it in his general hiſtory of all the centuries of the new law. The manner, ſays he (93), how to know what paſſes abroad, without magic: write thoſe things in large letters upon a looking-glaſs, and hold it againſt the moon, and the ſame things will be read in another looking-glaſs wherein the moon is to be ſeen. Thus Francis I, being at war with Charles V for the duchy of Milan, it was known the next night at Paris (94). If ſuch things were related to be laughed at, one might avoid being cenſured for it. Thus John Leo relates a fable, which was current in Egypt. Among the Ptolemies, ſays he (95), there was one formerly king of Alexandria, who, for the ſecurity of the city, and to make it impregnable, and put it in a condition of avoiding, without any danger, the aſſaults of the enemy, cauſed a column to be erected, and a ſteel looking-glaſs to be ſet on the top of it, which had ſuch a virtue, that all the ſhips of the enemies that ſailed by that column (the looking-glaſs being uncovered) were miraculouſly ſet on fire, which is the only reaſon why he cauſed it to be erected in that manner, in the mouth of the port. But it is ſaid that the Mahometans ſpoiled the looking-glaſs at their arrival, whereby it loſt that virtue, no leſs admirable than unuſual, and then they carried the column away. But this is a ridiculous ſtory, and only fit for children, and not for thoſe who have any judgment. Add to this what I have ſaid in the remark [L], of the article HERCULES, and theſe words of William Bouchet: That woman's looking-glaſs muſt needs have been enchanted, and full of diabolical magic of Toledo, ſince the inhabitants of Rhodes could ſee

FABULOUS ſtories about looking-glaſſes.

(90) Meziriac, upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 607, 608.

(91) Upon the 7th book, pag. 321.

(92) See his Mythologie, lib. iii, cap. xvii, pag. 253.

(93) David l'Enfant, a Dominican, Hiſt. Générale de tous les Siecles, on the 218 of Jeſus, pag. 347. He quotes Trefor, Chronol. pag. 519, Tom. i.

(94) See, below, remark [Q].

(95) Deſcript. of Africa, fol. 356, Antwerp 1556.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google must be short, and I avoid every thing that may be found in Moreri. Nevertheless, though he speaks of the Metempsychosis, I shall say something of it [M]. I think it was see the ships that sailed into Syria or Egypt in a looking-glass, which hung at the sun's neck upon their Colossus (96).

(96) Will. Bouchet, Serée XIX, pag. m. 171, 172.

The story of Nostradamus's looking-glasses is not better than the foregoing. It is said that he saw in some Talismanic looking-glasses, things to come, which he so happily foretold, as it is pretended. 'Fuit, qui 'narravit, speculis quibusdam Astrologicis Nostrada-'mum ad has prædictiones usum. Nam qui arcaniora 'Physica & Astrologica cognita habent, ajunt è me-'tallis, tanquam Planetis terrestribus, eâdem configu-'ratione, qua Planetæ in Thematibus Natalitiis po-'nuntur, sub certis constellationibus specula fieri posse, 'in quibus futura cernantur. Talia specula non pro 'hominibus tantum, sed & nationibus, urbibus, seculis, 'ut illi ajunt, fabricari possunt (97). ---- It was said 'that Nostradamus made use of certain Astrological look-'ing-glasses in foretelling those things. For such as un-'derstand the greatest Physical and Astrological secrets, 'say, that future things may be discerned in looking-'glasses, which may be made of metals under certain con-'stellations, like terrestrial planets, with the same con-'figuration as planets in erecting nativities. Such look-'ing-glasses, they say, may be made not only for particular 'persons, but for nations, cities, and ages' (§ α).

(97) Morhofius, Polyhist. lib. i, cap. x, pag. 96.

[(§ α) In a satire against the Jesuits, intituled, De studiis abstrusioribus Jesuitarum, it is reported, 'That 'Father Cotton shewed the king (Henry the Great) 'in an Astrological looking-glass, whatever passed in 'the courts and cabinets of all the princes of the 'world *': and the Jesuit who informs me of this, takes too much pains in refuting that story. Nicholas Pasquier relates just such another: and note, that he does not do it by way of ridicule, but tells it in the most serious manner that can be, in a letter full of prognostications, which preceded the death of Henry the Great. I shall subscribe it here so much the more willingly, as it is one of the most circumstantiated of that kind, and consequently the most proper to shew the ridiculousness of them. 'The late queen 'dowager (Catherine de Medicis) (says Pasquier) † 'desirous to know whether all her children should be 'kings, a Magician in the castle of Chaulmont, which 'is situated on the bank of the river Loire between 'Blois and Amboise, shewed her in a hall, round a 'circle which he had drawn, all that had been, or 'should be, kings of France, who took so many 'turns round the circle, according to the number of 'years they had reigned, or should reign: and as 'soon as Henry the third had walked fifteen rounds, 'the late king begins the race, brisk and nimble; he 'took twenty turns entire, and going to finish the 'twenty-first, he suddenly disappeared. After him 'came a young prince, between eight and nine years 'of age, who went thirty-seven, or thirty-eight, times 'round; and then all things became invisible, be-'cause the late queen dowager would see no more of 'it.' Observe, that his pretended enchantment grows lame as soon as it enters upon the future. He says very well, that Henry the third took fifteen turns, and that Henry the fourth took twenty, and disappeared in the twenty-first, because he wrote after the event happened ‡; but when he speaks of the reign of Lewis XIII, he loses his way. He makes him go thirty-seven or thirty-eight rounds; which should have brought him down to the year 1647, or 1648: whereas every body knows he went no farther than the year 1643. The author of a small libel, intituled, Remarks upon the Government of the kingdom during the reigns of Henry IV, Lewis XIII, and Lewis XIV, printed at Cologn, for Peter Marteau, in 1688, in 12mo, has turned that story in this manner. It is said, that Catherine de Medicis likewise made use of the enchantments of her diviners, to know the successors of her son: and that by means of a looking-glass they made those to appear to her, who were to reign after the extinction of the house of Valois. The first that appeared was Henry IV, but she conceived an implacable hatred and aversion to this prince, constantly endeavouring, after this sight, to destroy him by all the artifices imaginable. Notumque furens quid fœmina possit. It is well known what a woman's rage can do; and that there is nothing she will stick at to attain her ends. But GOD delivered this monarch from all her snares. After Henry IV, the looking-glass presented to her Lewis XIII, and Lewis XIV, with a majestic stature and gate. And then there appeared in the looking-glass a company of Jesuits, who were in their turn, to be masters of France. She refused to see any more, and was even upon the point of breaking the looking-glass: but however, it was preserved, and many affirm that it is still in the Louvre ‡. It is very evident, this account is only a copy revised and enlarged, from that of Nicolas Pasquier; but see with what impudence they have falsified it. I. Henry IV is made to appear the first, whereas Pasquier makes all his predecessors to appear before him. II. They bring down to Lewis XIV, and further, what he had carried only to Lewis XIII. III. They insinuate, that it happened at the Louvre, but he says that it was at Chaumont upon the Loire. IV. They talk of a looking-glass, and he speaks only of a circle. V. They say this looking-glass is preserved, and that it is affirmed to be still in the Louvre. VI. They pretend that Catherine de Medicis would have broke the glass; but Pasquier says, she only refused to see any thing more. I shall say nothing of that reflexion, so ingeniously placed, and which is contradicted in the same breath: nor of that fine prediction in favour of the Jesuits, the falsity of which we now see so plainly; nor of that which is so ridiculously asserted, touching the cause of the hatred of Catherine de Medicis to Henry IV: it is well known she had other reasons not to love him. It will be thought, perhaps, that I have insisted too long on such trifles: but it is not so needless as some may imagine to refute those kinds of traditions, and to shew the progress of them; since we see every day persons credulous enough to admit them, and to publish them without shame. How many people are there, for instance, who have read the last of these accounts without knowing, and without suspecting that it was only an embellishment of that of Pasquier? Such is the destiny of that sort of traditions: they increase with time: one may very well apply to them the Vires acquirit eundo. --- A tale loses nothing by the telling. REM. CRIT.]

* Reponse. Apologet. à l'Anti-Coton, pag. 141.

† Lettres de Nicolas Pasquier, pag. 10.

‡ His book was published in 1623. His letter is without date. But it appears, it was writ a few days after the death of Henry IV.

[M] I shall say something of the Metempsychosis.] They say that Pythagoras bragged of a special privilege about it; for he boasted that he could remember in what bodies he had been before he was Pythagoras. But he went no farther back than the age of the city of Troy, he had been first Æthalides, who was reputed the son of Mercury, and it being in his choice to demand of that god whatever he would, he begged of him that he might remember every thing after his death. Some time after he was Euphorbus, and was wounded by Menelaus at the siege of Troy. After the death of Euphorbus, he was Hermotimus, and then a Fisherman at Delos named Pyrrhus, and at last Pythagoras, a man who remembred all those transmigrations, and what he had suffered in Hell, and what other souls suffer there (98). Here is a litttle contradiction (99); for if the souls of men go from one body into another, they do not go to Hell. Our Philosopher, according to Ovid, goes no higher than Euphorbus:

(98) Ex Heraclide Pontico, ap. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 4, & 5.

(99) Compare this with what has been said above, towards the end of the remark [F].

Morte carent animæ, semperque priore relictâ
Sede, novis domibus vivunt, habitantque receptæ.
Ipse ego (nam memini) Trojani tempore belli
Panthoïdes Euphorbus eram: cui pectore quondam
Hæsit in adverso gravis hasta minoris Atridæ.
Cognovi clypeum lævæ gestamina nostræ
Nuper Abantæis, templo Junonis, in Argis (100).

(100) Ovid. Metam. lib. xv, ver. 158.

Nor dies the spirit, but new life repeats
In other forms and only changes seats.
In Trojan wars, (for I the fact retain),
Euphorbus, I, Panthous' son, was slain
By Menelaus . . . . at Argos I beheld
In Juno's Fane and knew my former shield.

O happy memory, says Lactantius very pleasantly. 'O miram, & singularem Pythagoræ memoriam. O 'miseram oblivionem nostrum omnium, qui nescimus, 'qui ante fuerimus; sed fortasse vel errore aliquo, 'vel gratiâ sit effectum, ut ille solus lethæum gurgi-'tem ‡ Remarques sur le Gouvernment du Roiaume, &c. pag. 15, 16.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was by reaſon of this opinion that he diſapproved the ſacrificing of beaſts, and it is obſerved that he adored an altar on which no ſacrifice had ever been offered, that he adored it, I ſay, as a place which had never been profaned or polluted [N]. I have not mentioned the native country of Pythagoras, becauſe there are ſeveral opinions about it; ſome ſay he was a Tyrrhenian, others a Syrian, others affirm that he was born in the iſle of Samos, others, in the iſle of Cephalonia (f), &c (g). The Heathen Philoſophers never ſaid any thing finer, than what he ſaid concerning God, and the end of all our actions [O]; and it is likely that he had carried his Orthodoxy much farther, had (f) At Samos a town of that iſland.

(g) Vid. Farnab. in Ovid. Met. lib. xv, ver. 60.

‘ tem non attigèrit, nec oblivionis aquam guſtaverit. ‘ Videlicet ſenex vanus (ſicut ocioſæ aniculæ ſolent) fa- ‘ bulas tanquam infantibus credulis finxit. Quòd ſi ‘ benè ſenſiſſet de iis, quibus hæc locutus eſt, ſi homi- ‘ nes eos exiſtimaſſet, nunquam ſibi tam petulanter ‘ mentiendi licentiam vendicaſſet. Sed deridenda ho- ‘ minis leviſſimi vanitas (101). - - - - O rare memory ‘ of Pythagoras. O our wretched forgetfulneſs, who ‘ know nothing of our pre-exiſtence: but perhaps it hap- ‘ pened by ſome particular miſtake, or favour, that he ‘ only never touched the river of Lethe, nor taſted the ‘ waters of oblivion. The vain old man forſooth (as ‘ idle old women uſe to do) invented thoſe ſtories as if he ‘ were talking to credulous children. Had he judged ‘ rightly of thoſe to whom he told them, had he looked ‘ upon them as men, he would never have been ſo bold ‘ as to forge ſuch lies. But his ridiculous vanity deſerves ‘ contempt.’ Lactantius ſhould have known that Pythagoras aſcribed his memory to the favour of the gods; he might have read it in Heraclides; and it will be ſaid, that without this one might eaſily fancy, that Pythagoras prevented the objection which other men would raiſe againſt him, becauſe they did not remember any pre-exiſtence. I anſwer to that objection, that in ſome reſpects it is not likely he would have been ſo bold as to boaſt of ſuch a thing: otherwiſe his contempt of other men, as Lactantius obſerves, had been very great; but if we conſider the thing another way, we ſhall find nothing in it that is againſt likelihood. He had acquired ſo great a reputation and made ſo many experiments of the blind docility and great credulity of his hearers, that he might eaſily flatter himſelf, that what he ſhould ſay concerning his memory would not be diſbelieved. If you deſire to know his ſeveral tranſmigrations ſince the death of Pythagoras, you need but read the following words, and you will ſee that he was a courtezan at the third change. ‘ Py- ‘ thagoram verò ipſum ſicuti celebre eſt Euphorbum ‘ primo ſe fuiſſe dictitaſſe; ita hæc remotiora ſunt his, ‘ quæ Clearchus & Dicæarchus memoriæ tradiderunt, ‘ fuiſſe eum poſtea Pyrandrum, deinde Callicleam, de- ‘ inde feminam pulchra facie meretricem, cui nomen ‘ fuerat Alce (102). - - - - But as it is well known that ‘ Pythagoras himſelf ſaid he was at firſt Euphorbus: ſo ‘ afterwarwards, according to Clearchus and Dicæarchus, ‘ he became Pyrander, then Callicleas, and after that a ‘ beautiful whore called Alce.’ As for the reſt, he invented not the Metempſychoſis: he learned it of the Egyptians (103), which made him ſpoil the fine doctrine he had heard of Pherecydes, about the immortality of the ſoul, wherewith he had been ſo moved, that he gave over the trade of an Athlete, or wreſtler, all of a ſudden, to ſtudy Philoſophy. ‘ Quis nunc extremus ‘ idiota, vel quæ abjecta muliercula non credit animæ ‘ immortalitatem, vitamque poſt mortem futuram? ‘ Quod apud Græcos olim primus Pherecydes Aſſyrius ‘ cum diſputaſſet, Pythagoram Samium illius diſputa- ‘ tionis novitate permotum ex athleta in Philoſophum ‘ vertit (104). - - - What man is now ſo ſtupid, or what ‘ woman ſo ſilly, as not to believe the immortality of the ‘ ſoul, and a future ſtate? When Pherecydes, the Aſſyrian, ‘ firſt diſcourſed on this ſubject among the Grecians, ‘ Pythagoras, the Samian, was ſo moved with it, that of ‘ an Athlete he turned Philoſopher.’

(101) Lactant. Div. Inſt. lib. iii, cap. xviii, pag. m. 196.

(102) Aul. Gell. lib. iv, cap. xi. See the article PERICLES, citation (186).

(103) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. cxxiii. It is true he does not mention the name of Pythagoras. But Diodorus Siculus, lib. i, ſub fin. mentions him.

(104) Auguſt. Ep. III, pag. m. 9.

[N] It is obſerved that he adored an altar . . . as a place which had never been profaned or polluted.] It was an altar conſecrated to Apollo in the iſle of Delos. Read theſe words of Macrobius (105). ‘ Conſtat, ſicut ‘ Cloatius Verus ordinatorum libro ſecundo docet, eſſe ‘ Deli aram; apud quam hoſtia non cæditur, ſed tan- ‘ tum ſolemni deum prece venerantur: verba Cloatii ‘ hæc ſunt. Deli ara eſt Apollinis Γενήτορος in qua ‘ nullum animal ſacrificatur, quam Pythagoram quaſi in- ‘ violatam adoraviſſe produnt . . . . Meminit hujus ‘ aræ & Cato de liberis educandis in hæc verba: Nu- ‘ trix hæc omnia facitbat, in verbenis & tubis ſine ‘ hoſtia, ut Deli ad Apollinis Genitivi Aram. - - - - : ‘ It is certain, according to Cloatius Verus, that there is ‘ an altar at Delos where no victim is ſlain, but the ‘ god is worſhipped only by ſolemn prayer: the words of ‘ Cloatius are theſe. At Delos is the altar of Apollo, upon which no animal is ſacrificed, which Pythagoras is ſaid to have adored as being unpolluted. . . . . ‘ Cato, in his treatiſe on education, thus ſpeaks of ‘ that altar: The nurſe did all theſe things, with ‘ vervain and pipes, without ſacrifice, as at the altar of ‘ Apollo in Delos.’

(105) Macrob. Saturn. lib. iii, cap. vi, pag. m. 316.

[O] The Heathen Philoſophers never ſaid any thing finer than what he ſaid concerning God, and the end of all our actions.] He acknowledged the unity of God; for he ſaid that unity was the principle of all things, and that out of it came the ſubject it made uſe of as it's matter, and that out of it's action upon that matter came out numbers, figures, elements, the viſible world, &c. Ἀρχὴν μὲν τῶν ἁπάντων, μονάδα· ἐκ δὲ τῆς μονάδος ἀόριστον δυάδα, ὡς ἂν ὕλην τῇ μονάδι αἰτίῳ ὄντι ὑποτῆναι, &c. (106). Omnium rerum id quod unum eſt, eſſe initium; ex eo geminum quod infinitum eſt, profectum tanquam materiem illi ipſi uni, quod cauſa eſt, ſubjectum eſſe, &c (107). He ſaid, that that unity was God, the good, the underſtanding, the mind. Τὴν μὲν μονάδα θεὸν, καὶ ταγαθὸν, ἥτις ἐστὶν ἡ τοῦ ἑνὸς φύσις, αὐτὸς ὁ νοῦς. Unitatem Deum ac bonum quæ ſit Unius natura, ipſa mens (108). Caſaubon, the ſon (109), alledges a paſſage out of Stobæus which ought to be mended. Πυθαγόρας τὼν ἀρχῶν τὴν μὲν μονάδα θεὸν καὶ τ' ἀγαθὸν. ἥτις ἐστὶν ἡ τοῦ νοὸς φύσις· ὁ αὐτὸς ὁ νοῦς. καὶ τὴν ἀόριστον δυάδα, καὶ τὸ κακὸν περὶ ἣν ἐστὶν τὸ ὑλικὸν πλῆθος. Stobæus had it from Plutarch (110), we muſt therefore read τοῦ ἑνὸς inſtead of τοῦ νοὸς. The doctrine of Pythagoras is not ſo orthodox in that paſſage, as in that of Diogenes Laërtius; for, according to Plutarch, he admitted of two independent principles, Unity and Binary, and aſcribed to the firſt the Divine Eſſence, Goodneſs, and Underſtanding; and to the ſecond, the nature of a Dæmon, evil, and matter. We ſhall judge more advantageouſly of his doctrine, if we take it out of Clemens Alexandrinus. Οὐκ ἀποκρυπτέον δὲ τὰς ἀμφὶ τὸν Πυθαγόραν, οἳ φασιν, Ὁ μὲν Θεὸς, εἷς. χ' ἕτερος δὲ ἐκ ὥς τινες ὑπονοοῦσιν, ἐκτὸς τῆς διακοσμήσεως, ἀλλ' ἐν αὐτῇ ὅλῳ, ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ κύκλῳ, ἐπίσκοπος πάσας γενέσεις, κράσεις τῶν ὅλων· ἀεὶ ὤν, καὶ ἐργάτας τῶν αὐτῷ δυναμίων καὶ ἔργων ἁπάντων, ἐν ἡγεμονῷ φωτὶ, καὶ πάντων πατὴρ, νοῦς καὶ ψύχωσις τῷ ὅλῳ κύκλῳ, πάντων κίνησις. Nec verò prætermittendi ſunt Pythagoræ ſectatores, quippe qui dicant, Deum quidem unum eſſe, non ita tamen, ut quidam opinantur, quaſi ſit extra mundi adminiſtrationem, ſed eſt totus in ipſa, in toto circulo, ſpeculator totius generationis, univerſorum temperatio, qui ſemper eſt, & ſuas facultates deducit ad opus, omnium operum in cœlo illuſtrator, pater omnium, mens & animatio totius circuli, omnium motus (111). - - - But we muſt not forget the Pythagoreans, for they maintain there is only one GOD, not ſuch an one as ſome imagine, as if he did not concern himſelf with the adminiſtration of the world, but that his providence reaches all things, that he obſerves and regulates every part of the univerſe, that he is eternal and omnipotent, the father, the mover, and ſoul, of the world. The worſt of it is, that Pythagoras, conſidering GOD as the mover of the univerſe, and the ſoul of the world, affirmed that our ſouls are portions of GOD. There is an objection againſt this doctrine of Pythagoras to be found in Tully, which cannot be anſwered. ‘ Nam Pythagoras, qui cenſuit (Deum) ‘ animum eſſe per naturam rerum omnem intentum & ‘ commeantem, ex quo noſtri animi caperentur, non ‘ vidit diſtractione humanorum animorum diſcerpi & ‘ dilacerari Deum: & cùm miſeri animi eſſent, quod ‘ pleriſque contingeret, tum Dei partem eſſe miſeram: quod

(106) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 25.

(107) So Aldobrandinus renders it in the beginning of his notes upon thoſe words of Laërtius. See alſo Meric. Caſaubon on Laërt. ibid. num. 83.

(108) Plut. de Placit. Philoſ. lib. i, cap. vii, pag. 881.

(109) Not. in Diog. Laërt. in Alcmæone, lib. viii, num. 83.

(110) The next words of Plutarch are, Τὴν δ' ἀόριστον δυάδα ἀπὸ μονάδος ἀπειρίαν τινὰ τοῦ πλείω, περὶ ἣν ἐστὶ τὸ ὑλικὸν πλῆθος· ἐξ ἧς καὶ ἀριθμὸς ὁ πολλαπλασιάσιμος. Infinitam autem binarii naturam, genium & maſſam unde eſt multitudo materiæ, & viſi expoſitus mundus.

(111) Clem. Alexandr. in Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 47, C. See alſo Juſt. Mart. Oration ad Gentes, pag. 58.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

had he had courage enough to expoſe himſelf to martyrdom. The circumſtances of his death are variouſly related [P]. I ſhall name ſome authors who have treated of his doctrine ‘ quod fieri non poteſt. Cur autem quicquam ignoraret animus hominis, ſi eſſet Deus? quomodo porrò Deus iſte, ſi nihil eſſet niſi animus, aut infixus, aut infuſus eſſet in mundo (112). - - - For Pythagoras, who thought GOD to be an active ſoul, pervading the whole univerſe, and that our minds were parts of him, did not conſider that by the diſtinction of human minds, GOD was divided and ſeparated: and that as many of them were miſerable, ſo a part of GOD was miſerable, which is impoſſible. But why ſhould the mind of man be ignorant of any thing, if it were GOD? And how could GOD, were he only a ſpirit, be fixed or infuſed in the world?’ St Epiphanius aſcribes to that Philoſopher a wild opinion, viz. that God has a corporeal and organized nature, being nothing elſe but Heaven, and making uſe of the ſun and moon as two eyes, and ſo of the other parts of the firmament (113). But here is a thought which is abſolutely true: Clemens Alexandrinus compares it with St Paul's words. None but God is wiſe, ſaid Pythagoras (114). The author of the Jewiſh antiquities ſeems to be very well ſatisfied with the doctrines of ſeveral Philoſophers, eſpecially of Pythagoras concerning the nature of God, and he doubts not but they had ſpoken more ſoundly ſtill, had they not been afraid of perſecution; for as Plato ſays, it is not ſafe to tell ignorant men the truth concerning the divine nature. Καὶ γὰρ Πυθαγόρας καὶ Ἀναξαγόρας καὶ Πλάτων, καὶ οἱ μετ' ἐκείνους ἀπὸ τῆς σοᾶς φιλόσοφοι, καὶ μικρᾷ δεῖν ἅπαντες ἄτῳ φαίνονται, περὶ τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ φύσεως πεφρονηκότες. ἀλλ' οἱ μὲν παρὸς ὀλίγον φιλοσοφοῦντες εἰς πλῆθος δόξαις περικατειλεμμένον τὴν ἀλήθειαν τοῦ δόγματος ἐξενεγκεῖν οὐκ ἐτόλμησαν. . . . . Αὐτὸς δὲ Πλάτων ὡμολόγησεν, ὅτι τὴν ἀληθῆ περὶ θεοῦ δόξαν εἰς τὴν τῶν ὄχλων ἀγνοιαν οὐκ ἦν ἀσφαλὲς ἐξενεγκεῖν. Pythagoras enim, & Anaxagoras, & Plato, & poſt illos philoſophi Stoici, & pene cuncti, videntur de divina ſapuiſſe natura. Sed hi quidem ad breve philoſophantes, populo ſuperſtitionum opinionibus jam præoccupato veritatem dogmatis proferre timuere (115). . . . . Ipſe ſiquidem Plato confeſſus eſt, quia veram de Deo opinionem propter ignorantiam plebis proferre ſecurum non eſt (116). - - Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Plato, and after them the Stoic Philoſophers, and almoſt all, ſeem to have underſtood the divine nature. But they delivered their doctrines obſcurely, and were afraid to declare openly the truth, becauſe the people were prepoſſeſſed with ſuperſtitious notions. . . . . Plato himſelf confeſſed it was not ſafe, &c. The ſame Joſephus affirms, that Pythagoras exceeded all the ancient Philoſophers in piety and wiſdom. Σοφίᾳ καὶ τῇ περὶ τὸ θεῖον εὐσεβείᾳ πάντων ὑπειλεμμένος διενεγκεῖν τῶν φιλοσοφησάντων. Sapientia & divina pietate Philoſophos omnes excellens (117). We muſt not forget an obſervation of Plutarch: when he ſhews the conformity there was between the thoughts of Numa and thoſe of Pythagoras, he ſays, that Numa would not have the Deity to be repreſented by any images, and that God, according to Pythagoras, is an impaſſible nature, which does not fall under our ſenſes, and can only be the object of the underſtanding (118). Οὔτε γὰρ ἐκεῖνος αἰσθητὸν ἢ παθητὸν, ἀόρατον δὲ καὶ ἀκήρατον καὶ νοητὸν ὑπειλάμβανεν εἶναι τὸ πρῶτον. Neque enim ille ſenſui aut ulli dolori expoſitum rerum principium eſſe, ſed inviſibile, incorruptum, ſola mente exiſtimavit apprehenſibile (119).

As for the end of our actions and ſtudies, nothing can be more admirable, nor more Chriſtian, than what Pythagoras ſaid about it; for he taught that the ſtudy of Philoſophy ſhould tend to make men like God. Πρὸς τὴν θείαν ὁμοίωσιν ἀνάγει, καὶ τῆς Πυθαγορείκης φιλοσοφίας τὸν τελειότατον σκοπὸν ἐκκαλύπτει: ad divinam ſimilitudinem ducunt, Pythagoricæque philoſophiæ finem perfectiſſimum oſtendunt (120). This is an encomium beſtowed on a piece of Poetry, which contains the doctrines of that Philoſopher. They conſiſt of two parts, which may be very well compared to the purgative and unitive ways ſo much talked of by our Myſtics. ‘ Hierocles, qui commentarios eruditiſſimos in Carmen Aureum Pythagoræ reliquit, ſtatim ab initio de Pythagorica philoſophia diſſerens, appellat eam κάθαρσιν καὶ τελειότητα, ‘ purgationem, & perfectionem. Quæ duo cum ſubindicent officium ipſius duplex ac propoſitum, ut loco alio monſtravi, duplicem videri poſſunt Pythagoras & Pythagorici habuiſſe philoſophiam, quarum illa ſit καθαρτικὴ, hæc vero τελικὴ, illa, quæ purgat à malis, ſeparat à materia & corpore, liberat à vinculis & carcere; hæc, quæ perficiat, evehat & reportet ſurſum, & εἰς τὸ εἰδῶ τῆς πρώτης ἕξεως, ut loquitur Hierocles, id eſt habitus prioris formam inducat, ſimileſque faciat Deo. . . . . Id quod ipſe indicat Hierocles in ſequentibus, quando dicit, περιέχει (carmen aureum) πάσης φιλοσοφίας πρακτικῆς καὶ θεωρητικῆς τὰ καθόλου δόγματα, δι' ὧν ἄν τις ἑαυτὸν καθαρὸν ἀπολάυοι καὶ τὴν πρὸς θεὸν ὁμοίωσιν ἐντυχήσειε. Continet philoſophiæ omnis practicæ ac theoreticæ decreta ſumma quibus quis & purgare ſe, & ſimilem Deo facere valeat (121). - - - Hierocles, who left moſt learned commentaries upon the golden verſes of Pythagoras, in the beginning of his diſcourſe concerning the Pythagorean Philoſophy, calls it purgation and perfection. Which two intimating a twofold uſe and purpoſe of it, as I have ſhewn in another place, Pythagoras and the Pythagoreans ſeem to have had two kinds of Philoſophy, the one purgative, the other perfective; the former, to cleanſe from evils, to ſeparate from matter and body, and to free from bonds and priſon: the latter to perfect, raiſe, and exalt, and as Hierocles ſpeaks, to introduce the form of the firſt ſtate, and to render one like GOD. . . . . This Hierocles himſelf declares in the following words, The golden verſes contain the chief doctrines of all ſpeculative and practical Philoſophy, whereby one may purify and make himſelf like God.’ The author whom I have quoted, alledges (122) ſeveral paſſages, whereby it appears, that according to that Philoſopher, the acquiſition of truth was the only way to attain to the likeneſs of God; but that truth cannot be known, unleſs it be enquired after with a purified ſoul, and ſuch as has overcome the paſſions of the body; from whence he concludes thus: Ex iis, quæ ſuperiori capite attulimus, manifeſtum eſt, philoſophiam Pythagoricam id habere ſibi maxime propoſitum, ut ad quandam ſimilitudinem cum Deo ſectatores ſuos ducat; id vero fieri aliter non poſſe, quam ſi veritati atque ſapientiæ pura integraque mente incumbatur (123). I add to this the teſtimony of the anonymous author, who wrote the life of Pythagoras. He ſays (124), that the followers of that Philoſopher taught, that men make themſelves perfect three ways. 1. By converſing with the gods; for during that commerce, they abſtain from every evil action, and become like the gods, as much as ſuch a thing is poſſible. 2. By doing good to others; for it is God's property, it is an imitation of God (125). 3. By going out of this life. The beſt preſents which Heaven gave to men, according to Pythagoras, are to ſpeak truth, and do good offices: thoſe two things, ſaid he, reſemble the works of God (126).

[P] The circumſtances of his death are variouſly reported.] He lived at Crotona, in Milo's houſe with his diſciples, and was burnt in it. A Man whom he refuſed to admit into his ſociety, ſet the houſe on fire (127). It is likely that he had not a good phyſiognomy; for Pythagoras received none for his diſciples, but thoſe whoſe look he liked, after he had examined it according to the rules of art. It was his firſt ſtep. ‘ Jam à principio adoleſcentes qui ſeſe ad diſcendum obtulerant, ἐφυσιογνωμόνει. Id verbum ſignificat, mores naturaſque hominum, conjectatione quadam de oris & vultus ingenio, deque totius corporis filo atque habitu, ſciſcitari. Eum, qui exploratus ab eo idoneuſque fuerat, recipi in diſciplinam ſtatim jubebat (128). - - - He firſt conſidered the phyſiognomy of young men, who offered themſelves to be his diſciples. That is, he examined their manners and diſpoſitions, by the features of their countenance, and the habit of their body. And ſuch as were tried and approved by him, were immediately admitted into the ſociety.’ Some ſay (129) that he was ſuſpected of endeavouring to uſurp the ſovereignty; and that to prevent his deſign, the Crotoniates ſet his houſe on fire. He made his eſcape through the flames, and went out of the city; but as he was going into a field of beans, he ſtopped, and choſe rather to be killed, than to open his mouth and ſpoil the beans (130). According to Dicæarchus (131) he fled to the temple of (112) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. i, cap. xi. See Minutius Felix, who ſays, pag. m. 151. Pythagoræ Deus eſt animus per univerſam rerum naturam commeans, & intentus: ex quo etiam animalium omnium vita capiatur. Lactantius ſays the ſame, lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 14.

(113) Epiph. Hær. XV, pag. 14.

(114) Apud Clem. Alexand. Strom. lib. iv, pag. 477.

(115) Joſeph. cont. Appion. lib. ii, pag. 1071.

(116) Ibid. pag. 1076.

(117) Ibid. lib. i, pag. 1046.

(118) Plut. in Numa, pag. 65.

(119) Ibid. B.

(120) Hierocles, In Præfat. ad Carmina aurea circa fin. See alſo Stobæus, Eclog. XI, cap. iii, where he ſays, Σωκράτης, Πλάτων ταῦτα τῷ Πυθαγόρᾳ, τέλος ὁμοίωσιν θεοῦ. Socrates & Plato quemadmodum Pythagoras finem dixerunt, dei ſimilitudinem.

(121) Joann. Scheffer. de natura & conſtitutione Philoſophiæ Italicæ, cap. x, pag. 78.

(122) Ibid. cap. vii.

(123) Ibid. cap. viii, pag. 56.

(124) Apud Photium, Cod. ccxlix, pag. 1313.

(125) Δεύτερον ἐν τῷ εὖ ποιεῖν· θεοῦ γὰρ τοῦτο καὶ θείας μιμήσεως. Deinde bene de aliis merendo: Dei enim hoc proprium eſt, in eoque Deum imitatur. Phot. ibid.

(126) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. xii, cap. lix.

(127) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 39.

(128) Aul. Gell. lib. i, cap. ix.

(129) Laërt. ibid.

(130) Ἄλλους μᾶλλον ἢ κατῆσαι ἀναιρεθῆναι δὲ πρῶτον ἢ λαλῆσαι. Capi præſtat quam has dare peſſum, cædique ſatius eſt quàm quicquam loqui. Ibid. Meric. Caſaubon thinks that it is better to read ἀλύσαι, vagari, to wander miſerably, inſtead of λαλῆσαι.

(131) Ibid. num. 40.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google doctrine [Q]. One may see in the History of Physic, what concerns him as a Physician (b).

I shall add to what I have said concerning the fable of his looking-glasses (i) a story, which I have just read in a news-writer [R].

(b) Printed at Geneva in the year 1696, and written by D. L. C. D. M. that is to say, David le Clerc Doctor of Physic. He is brother of Mr le Clerc professor at Amsterdam. (i) In the remark [L].

of the Muses at Metapontum, and died there with hunger, after he had fasted forty days. Others say (132), that at his return from the isle of Delos, whither he went to shut the eyes of his master Pherecydes, and to bury him, he himself put a stop to his life, by abstaining from food. According to some other writers (133), he brought all his disciples to the assistance of the Agrigentines against the Syracusans; and having been worsted, he was killed whilst he was running about a field of beans. Which does not very well agree neither with the eighty years which they say (134) he lived, nor with the ninety (135), much less still with the ninety nine (136), or one hundred and four (137) years mentioned by others. See upon this the learned collections of Menagius (138). He has not forgot to quote Arnobius, who affirms, that Pythagoras was burnt alive in a temple. 'Pythagoras Samius suspicione dominationis injusta vivus 'concrematus in fano est: numquid ea, quæ docuit 'vim propriam perdiderunt, quia non spiritum sponte, 'sed crudelitate appetitus effudit (139)? - - - Pythagoras of Samos, unjustly suspected of aspiring to sovereignty, was burnt alive in a temple. Could his doctrines 'lose their proper force, because he died, not a natural, 'but a violent death.' Justin intimates that he died without any violence at Metapontum, whither he retired after he had been twenty years at Crotona, and that he died there, being so much admired, that his house was converted into a temple, and that he was honoured as a god. Cum annos viginti Crotonæ egisset, Metapontum migravit, ibique decessit, cujus tanta admiratio fuit, ut ex domo ejus templum facerent, eumque pro Deo colerent (140). Valerius Maximus does not say so much of him; but he is none of those who say he was ill used. 'Cujus ardentem rogum plenis veneratio'nis oculis Metapontus aspexit: oppidum Pytha'goræ quam suorum cinerum nobilius clariusve mo'numento (141). - - - Whose funeral pile Metapontus 'beheld with eyes full of veneration: the city was more 'noted and famous for the ashes of Pythagoras than 'their own.'

St Epiphanius was grossly mistaken when he said that Pythagoras died in the country of the Medians (142).

[Q] I shall name some authors who have treated of his doctrine.] I shall confine myself to modern authors. William Canterus translated into Latin the fragments of Pythagoras, collected by Stobæus. Erasmus (143), Philip Beroaldus, Gyraldus, Claudius Minos, Francis Berni, Nicolas Scutelli, and some others, made notes upon the symbols of that Philosopher. See also Lipsius (144), the commentaries of Ritterhusius upon Malchus; the dissertation of Holstenius, De vita & scriptis Pythagoræ; Rodericus à Castro's Pythagoras; Paganinus Gaudentius de Pythagorea animarum transmigratione; the dialogue of Ambrosius Rhodius de transmigratione; the dissertation of Claudius Lignier de secta Pythagorica; the thesis of Marc Mappus de Ethica Pythagoræ, maintained at Strasburg under the professor Schallerus; Schilterus's dissertation de Disciplina Pythagorica; the above-mentioned book of John Schefferus; the book intituled Ethica Pythagorica (145) written by Magnus Daniel Omeis, professor at Altdorf. See also la Mothe le Vayer in his book de la Vertu des Payens. It is thought that the golden verses of Pythagoras, are the work of his disciple Lysis. An ancient Philosopher of Alexandria, named Hierocles, wrote a commentary on them, which has been illustrated with notes by Casaubon's son. We have also some commentaries made upon the same verses by Vitus Amerbachius, Theodorus Marcilius, Henry Brem, Michael Neander, John Strasselius, William Diezius, and Magnus Daniel Omeis. I had almost forgot Joachim Zehnerus's book (146).

[R] A story which I have just read in a news-writer.] 'A modern author has asserted that the late 'Marshal de Schomberg, commander of the French 'troops in Portugal, when that kingdom shook off 'the Spanish yoke, wrote whatever passed in that 'country upon a glass, and holding it against the 'moon, Cardinal Mazarin, who was at Paris, read 'in that Planet, with the help of a Telescope, what'ever the Marshal wanted to inform him of: if this 'secret were as true as it is fabulous, &c (147). Since the news-writer judges rightly of this pretended secret, I shall only observe the anachronisms of his narrative. Mr de Schomberg did not arrive in Portugal till the month of November 1661 (148). Cardinal Mazarin had been dead eight months before: and Portugal had shaken off the Spanish yoke above ten years.

(132) Ibid.

(133) Ibid.

(134) Ibid. num. 44.

(135) Ibid.

(136) Tzetzes, Chil. XI, ver. 366.

(137) Anonymus apud Photium, pag., 1313.

(138) Menag. in Diog. Laërt. pag. 371, & seq.

(139) Arnob. lib. i, pag. 23.

(140) Justin. lib. xx, cap. iv, pag. m. 396.

(141) Val. Max. lib. viii, cap. vii, num. 2, in ext.

(142) Epiph. Hær. XV, pag. 14.

(143) In the beginning of his Chiliads of Proverbs.

(144) Manuduct. ad Philosoph. Stoic. lib. i, Dissert. VI.

(145) Printed at Altdorf 1693.

(146) Pastor ac Superintendens Schleusingensis. He published at Leipsic in 1603, Vitam & Fragmenta Pythagoræ.

(147) Taken from the 65th page of a small book intituled, The Key of the Cabinet of the Princes of Europe, or, An Historical and Political Collection upon the Affairs of the Present Times, July 1704. It is believed this book was printed at Luxemburg: there is in the title, printed for James Sincere at the sign of Truth 1704.

(148) See the Memoirs of Fremont d'Ablancourt, pag. 12.

PYTHEAS, was born at Marseilles. I think that the most certain thing that can be said concerning the time wherein he lived, is, that he lived in the age of Alexander the Great [A]. He wrote some Geographical books [B], which in all likelihood were

[A] The most certain thing . . . . is that he lived in the time of Alexander the Great.] Vossius is somewhat more precise: he says that Pytheas lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus (1). Father Hardouin follows him (2). Moreri reckons it was in the 440th or 445th year of Rome; but he should have known, that the first year of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus falls, according to Calvisius, in the year of Rome 468. We have some reasons to believe that Pytheas flourished before that time. Vossius shews, that Eratosthenes wrote after Pytheas (3); but he did not make use of the clearest proof of it: he was contented to alledge this reason, that Polybius having pitched amongst other Geographers upon Dicæarchus, Eratosthenes, and Pytheas, to censure them, says (4) that Eratosthenes wrote the last of all. There is a proof more positive than that in the same page, seeing Strabo says in that place, that Polybius wondered that Eratosthenes believed what Pytheas had written. Polybius wondered so much the more at it, because he observed that Eratosthenes believed several things which Dicæarchus did not believe. It is manifest therefore that Pytheas was an author before Eratosthenes and Dicæarchus wrote their Geographical books (5). We shall hereafter draw some consequences from it. But I shall first give my opinion concerning the words wherein Strabo thinks that Polybius's way of reasoning is ridiculous. Perhaps he understood not well what Polybius meant. I am apt to think that great man argued thus: Dicæarchus is a very credulous author, and has committed abundance of mistakes; yet he would not believe several things related by Pytheas; one may therefore wonder how Eratosthenes, who lived after him, could believe those very things which he knew were rejected by Dicæarchus. But Strabo pretends that Polybius argued thus: Dicæarchus is a very judicious author, and to be looked upon as a model; it is therefore very strange that Eratosthenes believed Pytheas in several things, which Dicæarchus did not believe. Supposing that Polybius reasons after this manner, Strabo might very well laugh at him, considering the great number of faults which Polybius had criticized in Dicæarchus's writings. But once more, I would not swear that he understood well Polybius's meaning. I wish we could verify it; we might then learn many other facts, which we are ignorant of, by reason of the loss of so many books of that author. I shall observe, by the by, a fault in the Latin translation of Strabo. The whole strength of this repetition, μὴτε Δικαιάρχῳ πιστεύσαντι, is altogether enervated: to render that place well, the same repetition which is in the original, should have been made use of. The reader may judge of it, if he will give himself the trouble to examine this citation. Ἐγεγόνει δὲ τὸν μὲν

(1) Voss. de Philologia, pag. 55, in his treatise de Hist. Græc. pag. 467. He adds Vel certè proximus huic tempori fuit.

(2) In Indice Plin.

(3) Voss. de Hist. Græc. pag. 110.

(4) Ap. Strab. lib. i, pag. 71.

(5) See, below, remark [F].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

were nothing elſe but a relation of his voyages. He ſtrangely abuſed this maxim, a traveller may lie by authority; for he filled his books with all manner of fables concerning the northern countries, where he pretended to have been. He knew that few ocular witneſſes could convict him of his lies; but poſterity left not his boldneſs unpuniſhed. Polybius was very hard upon him; Strabo falls upon him on ſeveral occaſions with the greateſt ſeverity (a). Thoſe two authors could not endure that he ſhould ſay, with impunity, that in the iſle of Thule [C], ſix days journey from Great Britain towards the north, and in all thoſe parts, there was neither land, nor ſea, nor air, but a compound of thoſe three things, like the Pulmo Marinus [D], over which the ſea and land hung up, and which was a kind of a tie to all the parts of the world, and that it was impoſſible to go thither on foot, or in a ſhip. He boaſted that he had ſeen that ſubſtance which reſembled the Pulmo Marinus: as for the reſt, he confeſſed he knew nothing of it but by hear-ſay. He boaſted alſo, that he had travelled in all the countries of Europe which lie on the ocean, from Cadiz to the river Tanais; which Polybius could not believe of a private-man, and not well provided with money (b). However, it is confeſſed, he underſtood well enough the properties of the northern countries, for what concerns the aſpects of the ſun (c); and what he ſaid (d), that the Barbarians ſhewed him the place where the ſun went to ſleep, and that in ſome of thoſe countries the night laſted not above three hours, and in others not above two, does not at all look like a fable,

(a) Πυθέας ὁ σὺν ψευδίσματος ἐξήταζε. Pytheas homo mendaciſſimus inventus eſt. Strabo, lib. i, pag. 43. Vid. etiam, pag. 44, & lib. ii, pag. 71, 79; lib. iv, pag. 239.

(b) Φησὶ δ' ἦν ὁ Πολύβιος ἄπιστον καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦτο τῷ ἰδιώτῃ ἀνθρώπῳ καὶ πένητι τοσαῦτα διαστήματα πλωτὰ καὶ πορευτὰ γένοιτο. Polybius autem id quoque incredibile ait eſſe, privatum hominem, eumque pauperem tantum ſpacii mari terraque obviſſe, Strabo, lib. ii, pag. 71.

(c) Ib. lib. iv, pag. 239.

(d) Apud Geminum Iſagog. ad Phænom.

μὲν Εὐήμερον Βεργαῖον καλεῖν, Πυθέα δὲ πιστεύειν· καὶ ταῦτα δὲ μή τε Δικαιάρχῳ πιστευσάντων. Τὸ μὲν οὖν μή τε Δικαιάρχῳ πιστευσάντων, γελοῖον ὥσπερ ἐκείνῳ χρήσασθαι κανόνι προσῆκον καθ' ὃ τοιούτους ἐλέγχους αὐτὸς προφέρεται. Interim Eratoſthenem qui Euemerum Bergæum appellet, Pytheæ credere, atque hoc ne Dicæarcho quidem credente. Id quidem ridiculum eſt quod Dicæarchum profert, quaſi verò conveniat eum veluti normam ſequi quem ipſe Polybius tot reprehenſionibus inceſſit (6). However we learn from all this that Pytheas's books were written not only before thoſe of Eratoſthenes, but alſo before thoſe of Dicæarchus. We know that the laſt was diſciple of Ariſtotle, and dedicated a book to Theophraſtus, Ariſtotle's beloved diſciple. It is therefore very likely that Pytheas lived before the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, ſince his writings came out before thoſe of Dicæarchus, who muſt needs have been an old man under the reign of that prince. Indeed, the beginning of that reign falls in the laſt year of the CXXIIId Olympiad; Ariſtotle gave over teaching before the end of the CXIVth Olympiad (7), and his ſcholars were moſt of them grown men. We learn from Pliny that Pytheas publiſhed his works before Timæus publiſhed his (8); for the latter affirms, upon the other's word, what I have ſaid concerning Amber (9). But neither Timæus nor Eratoſthenes, who wrote after Pytheas, can prove any thing againſt Voſſius, becauſe they lived ſo long (10), that they might have ſeen the relations of Pytheas, though they had not been publiſhed before the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus; and it is well known that an author who relates what he has read in another, may be older than he, and even die before him; ſo that though Timæus and Eratoſthenes wrote after Pytheas, we can infer from it nothing that is certain concerning the age of Pytheas. The beſt proof we can have to place him before the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, is, becauſe he was cited by Dicæarchus. Voſſius did not remember it, when he placed Dicæarchus before Pytheas (11). If Sanſon, one of the beſt Geographers of the XVIIth century, had conſidered this little point of Chronology, he had not ſaid, that Pytheas mentioned the converſations which the father of Scipio Africanus had with the deputies of Marſeilles in the year of Rome 532 (12). One of Pytheas's lies in the opinion of Polybius (13), was, that none of the inhabitants of Marſeilles could tell Scipio any remarkable thing concerning Britain. I have obſerved in the article ABBEVILLE the other miſtakes of Sanſon about that matter. It remains to ſay, that he ſhould not have taken that Scipio for him; who landed at the mouth of the Rhone, to obſerve the motions of Hannibal, ſince it is impoſſible that Pytheas ſhould have writ any thing after that voyage of Scipio, his works having been read by Dicæarchus, Ariſtotle's diſciple; for there was an hundred years at leaſt between the time when Ariſtotle left off teaching ſchool, and the beginning of the ſecond Punic war. It would be a difficult thing to know who that Scipio was, who, as Pytheas relates it, enquired about Britain of the inhabitants of Marſeilles, Narbonne, and Corbilon; but it is certain he was not the father of that Scipio who conquered Carthage. I wonder that Father Labbe did not obſerve that miſtake of Sanſon, and I do not believe that he was willing to ſpare him. He might alſo have been cenſured for reckoning near an hundred years between Pytheas and Polybius (14). Which does not agree with his hypotheſis, viz. that Pytheas wrote his relations after the year of Rome 532, which was but ſixteen years before the birth of Polybius (15). Nay, according to that ſuppoſition, Pytheas was not returned from his travels in 532, for if he was returned then, the deputies of Marſeilles might have anſwered the queſtions of the Roman conſul.

(6) Strabo, lib. i, pag. 71.

(7) Apollod. apud Diog. Laërt. in Ariſt.

(8) Plin. lib. xxxvii, cap. ii.

(9) See the text of this article, citation (e).

(10) Eratoſthenes lived 80 years. He was born in the CXXVIth Olympiad, and died in the CXLVIth. See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 108. Lucian ſays he lived 82 years, and that Timæus lived 96 years. But Timæus wrote the war of Pyrrhus againſt the Romans, and therefore lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus.

(11) De Philolog. cap. xi, num. 7. Moreri hath quoted wrong, de Philoſ. cap. xi, n. 6.

(12) Nicol. Sanſon, An Enquiry into the Antiquities of Abbeville.

(13) Ap. Strab. lib. iv, pag. 131.

(14) Sanſon, ubi ſupra, pag. 85.

(15) He was born in the year of Rome 548. See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 122.

I ſhall here acquaint the reader that Mr Sanſon, the worthy ſon of the great Geographer, who publiſhed the Antiquities of Abbeville, has done me the favour to ſend me the copy of an anſwer to the Jeſuit Labbe, which his father deſigned to print concerning thoſe antiquities. It is a learned and ingenious piece. I hope I ſhall find an occaſion to publiſh ſome fragments thereof.

[B] He wrote ſome Geographical books.] The ſcholiaſt upon Apollonius (16) mentions a book of Pytheas, intituled γῆς περίοδος, the circuit of the earth. The abridgment of Artemidorus the Epheſian, printed with the ancient Geographers, names Pytheas among thoſe who wrote the circuit of the world, periplum Orbis (17). The deſcription of the iſle of Thule was, in all likelihood, part of that work. His book de Oceano is quoted by Geminus. Nicolas Sanſon (18) is not the only one who entered the liſts with Strabo, in favour of Pytheas. We ſhall ſee by and by that Gaſſendus undertook very zealouſly the defence of that ancient Marſeillois.

(16) In lib. iv.

(17) See Voſſius, ibid. pag. 110.

(18) Ubi ſupra.

[C] That in the iſle of Thule.] Having proved with ſolid reaſons, that Pytheas publiſhed his books about the time of Alexander, I may reject one of the arguments which Father Vavaſſeur made uſe of againſt Photius. I have refuted another in the article ANTONY (19). Photius thinks that Antonius Diogenes lived near the reign of Alexander the Great. Father Vavaſſeur anſwers to it among other things, that he does not believe that the iſle of Thule was very well known at that time (20). Antonius Diogenes was the author of a Romance, intituled, Incredibilia de Inſula Thule. It matters not whether that iſland was not known to the common people, or whether it was not very well known in general; for if a traveller, ſuch as Pytheas, publiſhed a relation of it, a romantic writer might eaſily pitch upon that iſland to make it the ſcene of his chimerical narrations. I will not examine whether Photius is in the right or not, it is enough for me to prove that he has not been well refuted.

(19) A Roman family. See the remark [B].

(20) Suſpicio quoque eſt nondum cognitam vulgo Thulen inſulam de qua illi ferunt inſcripti libri. Vavaſſor, de Lud. Dict. pag 148, 149.

[D] Like the Pulmo Marinus.] La Mothe le Vayer (21) obſerves, that it is a ſpongious zoophyte, upon which the Italians have beſtowed a very obſcene name; and

(21) Lett. lxxxix, Tom. xi, of his works in 12mo, pag. 255.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google fable, and does him a great deal more honour than another thing which Pliny relates after him, viz. that there was an iſland, a day's journey from the country of the Guttones, a people of Germany, wherein they uſed amber inſtead of wood for their fuel (e). The reader may conſult the apology which Peter Gaſſendus wrote for Pytheas [E] at the deſire of Peireſkius. Thoſe two illuſtrious men born in Provence, were very willing to raiſe the glory of their country, by defending the reputation of a writer who was born in Marſeilles. Gaſſendus, though a learned man, was miſtaken in his conjectures concerning this author [F]; nevertheleſs, the reading of his apology may be of ſome uſe. Our Pytheas ought not to be confounded with the Athenian Orator of the ſame name, who lived in the time of Demoſthenes [G].

(e) Incolas pro ligno ad ignem uti eo, proximiſque Teutonis vendere. Plin. lib. xxxvii, cap. ii.

and having ſaid that Pytheas maintained that this matter was the tie of the univerſe, and that he was ſo impudent, as to ſpeak of it as of a thing which he had ſeen, he ſpeaks of an Anachoret, who boaſted that he had been at the very end of the world, and who ſaid, that being there, he was obliged to bend his ſhoulders, becauſe the Heaven and Earth touched one another at that extremity.

[E] The apology which Peter Gaſſendus wrote for Pytheas.] This was the occaſion of it. When Peireſkius cauſed the ſolſtitial elevation of the ſun to be obſerved at Marſeilles in 1636, the proportion between the ſhadow and the ſtyle of the dial was compared with what Hipparchus ſays (22) that Pytheas found out. Gaſſendus was deſired to write about that Aſtronomical operation, and at the ſame time to juſtify Pytheas againſt Strabo's invectives. 'Voluit rurſus '(Peireſkius) ut quoniam Strabo multa congeſſit adver-'ſus Pytheam, ipſe in gratiam comprovincialis apolo-'giam conſcriberem, purgaremque virum qui primus 'Thulen inſulam demonſtravit, & quo non habet Oc-'cidens totus quem antiquiorem in doctis habeat (23). '- - - As Strabo had inveighed much againſt Pytheas, 'Peireſkius deſired me to write an apology for our coun-'tryman, and to vindicate him, who firſt diſcovered 'the iſland Thule, and who is the moſt ancient of all the 'learned men in the Weſt.' What he wrote thereupon is to be found in the fourth volume of his works (24). He did not forget that Cleomedes ſtiles Pytheas a Philoſopher; and that Hipparchus having cenſured Eudoxus, for ſaying, that there is a certain ſtar which never goes out of its place, and is the pole of the world, praiſes Pytheas for having taught that the pole is a place void of ſtars, which makes a kind of a ſquare with the three neighbouring ſtars. Hipparchus, in imitation of Eratoſthenes, improved his Geography with Pytheas's diſcoveries; and it is no wonder if the latter was miſtaken concerning the Tanais, conſidering the ignorance of thoſe times about the ſituation of the Pontus Euxinus, the Caſpian ſea, and the Palus Mœotis. When Alexander came to the banks of the Caſpian ſea, it was taken for the Pontus Euxinus. Gaſſendus adds ſeveral other remarks in Pytheas's behalf. The reader may have ſeen in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (25), that Olaus Rudbeckius took warmly the part of that traveller.

(22) Apud Strab. lib. ii, pag. 78.

(23) Gaſſendus, in Vit. Peireſk. lib. v, Oper. Tom. v, pag. 327.

(24) Pag. 524, & ſeq.

(25) February 1685, pag. 133.

[F] Gaſſendus was miſtaken in his conjectures about this author.] He believed that the Marſeillois being aſhamed becauſe they could not anſwer Scipio's queſtions about Britain, and beſides, being ſtirred up by his advices, reſolved to ſend ſome body to take a view of that country, and, in order to it, pitched upon Pytheas, who was a good Mathematician. The republic of Marſeilles was already powerful by ſea, and very much addicted to trade; they might therefore be deſirous to know whether their trade might be improved by the diſcovery of thoſe unknown countries. Polybius's objection may be ſolved thereby; it would be no wonder how Pytheas, a poor private man, could be at the charges of ſo long a journey. Beſides, it may be anſwered, that a company of merchants, or a rich citizen, might have pitched upon Pytheas to make that diſcovery, and furniſh him with all neceſſaries. If Gaſſendus had ſaid no more, I ſhould not find fault with him; but he ſays, that he who enquired about Britain of the Marſeillois, in the time of the ſecond Punic war, which began in the CXLth Olympiad, was either Scipio Africanus, or the father or uncle of that Scipio. Which cannot be true, ſince Dicæarchus had read Pytheas's voyages. Gaſſendus ſays, to elude that proof, that the words of Strabo may bear this ſenſe, viz. that Pytheas's relations might have diſpleaſed Dicæarchus. But it is certain that this is not Strabo's meaning: his participle παρεσύσας (26), and the whole force of his argument are againſt this explication. Godefridus Wendelinus, to whom Gaſſendus wrote thoſe things, anſwered his queſtion, viz. In what time Pytheas lived, thus, that it was in the time of Alexander the Great: which he proved, 1. by Dicæarchus's railing at Pytheas: 2. Becauſe Timæus, an enemy of Agathocles, was familiarly acquainted with Pytheas at Marſeilles during his exile; from whence Wendelinus concludes, that Pytheas lived before Agathocles (27). But it is a wrong conſequence; for it does not follow becauſe a traveller grows familiarly acquainted with a baniſhed perſon, that he is therefore older than he who baniſhed that perſon. Beſides, Wendelinus makes his author ſay more than he ſaid; for he refers us to Pliny (28), who only ſays that Timæus believed what Pytheas related about Amber.

(26) See the remark [A].

(27) Vid Gaſſend. Tom. vi, pag. 483.

(28) Lib. xxxvii, cap. ii.

[G] He ought not to be miſtaken for him . . . . who lived in the time of Demoſthenes.] Father Hardouin (29) applies to Pytheas of Marſeilles, what Plutarch ſays of one Pytheas in the life of Demoſthenes, p. 855; but there is no doubt that Pytheas mentioned by Plutarch in that place, is the ſame Athenian Orator whom he ſpeaks of, page 849, where he ſays, that Pytheas told Demoſthenes in jeſt, that his Orations ſmelt of oil (30). He ſpeaks of the ſame Pytheas in the life of Phocion (31), as of a talkative and inſolent Orator, whom Phocion was forced to cenſure. Suidas, who gives us the ſame notion of him, tells us, that he made his eſcape from the priſon wherein his creditors had put him, and retired into Macedonia. Plutarch ſays, that Pytheas having fled from Athens, went to Antipater, and ſerved him as much as he was able with his harangues. He had then a quarrel with Demoſthenes in Arcadia, who, though a baniſhed man, joined with the Athenian ambaſſadors, to oblige the Grecian towns to make a confederacy againſt Antipater, whoſe cauſe was defended by Pytheas (32).

(29) In Indice Plinii.

(30) See Ælian. Hiſt. div. lib. viii, cap. viii. He mentions him alſo lib. xiv, cap. xxxvi.

(31) Pag. 752.

(32) Plut. in Demoſt. pag. 858.

Plutarch relates, in his precepts concerning government, a quick repartee of Pytheas. And Pytheas the Orator, ſays he (33), when he oppoſed the honours decreed to Alexander, anſwered one who aſked him, How dareſt thou ſpeak of ſo great things, being ſo young? Alexander, whom you make a god by your decrees, is younger ſtill than I am.

(33) Plut. de Geronda Repub. pag. 804. See alſo Plut. in Apophth. pag. 187.

PYTHIAS, Ariſtotle's daughter, was married three times, firſt to Nicanor, according to her father's laſt will [A], afterwards to Proclus, who deſcended from Demaratus king of Sparta, and laſtly to Metrodorus the Phyſician, diſciple of Chryſippus a Cnidian, and maſter of Eraſiſtratus. The two ſons (a) ſhe had by her ſecond huſband, ſtudied Philoſophy under Theophraſtus. The ſon ſhe had by Metrodorus was called Ariſtotle

(a) The one was called Procles, and the other Demaratus.

[A] She was married . . . . to Nicanor, according to her father's laſt will.] We do not find that circumſtance in Sextus Empiricus; but he ſays, that Ariſtotle, after the death of his father and mother, was bred up in the houſe of Proxenus, a native of Atarna, and to requite that good ſervice, he educated Nicanor, ſon of Proxenus, and took care that he ſhould learn all manner of good things, and adopted him, and even

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Ariſtotle (b) [B]. It appears by ſome ſentences which are aſcribed to her [C], that her father beſtowed a good education upon her. Note, that her mother's name was PYTHIAS.

(b) Taken from Sextus Empiricus, Adv. Math. cap. xii, pag. 521.

even ordered by his laſt will that he ſhould marry his daughter Pythias (1).

(1) Taken from Ammonius, in Vit. Ariſtotel. init. See alſo the laſt will of Ariſtotle, in Diog. Laërt. lib. v, num. 12; and the note of Caſaubon.

[B] The ſon ſhe had by Metrodorus was named Ariſtotle.] Pliny has confounded that genealogy; for he thought that Ariſtotle's daughter had a ſon, who was Eraſiſtratus the Phyſician. 'Horum placita, ſays he '(2), Chryſippus ingenti garrulitate mutavit, pluri-'mumque & ex Chryſippo diſcipulus ejus Eraſiſtratus 'Ariſtotelis filia genitus. - - - Chryſippus by his prating, 'and after him Eraſiſtratus the ſon of Ariſtotle's daugh-'ter very much altered their decrees.' Let us conſider the Greek words of Sextus Empiricus. Τρίτῳ δὲ Μητροδώρῳ ἰατρῷ, Χρυσίππου μὲν τοῦ Κνιδίου μαθητῇ, Ἐρασιστράτου δὲ ὑφηγητῇ· ᾧ γίνεται παῖς Ἀριστοτέλης. Tertio autem Metrodoro Medico, (Pythias filia Ariſtotelis nupſit) Chryſippi quidem Cnidii diſcipulo, præceptori autem Eraſiſtrati, cui natus eſt filius Ariſtoteles (3). It is not very difficult to underſtand thoſe words; they ſignify that Ariſtotle was the ſon of Metrodorus the Phyſician, and of Pythias; but one may conjecture, that all the authors who ſpoke of the ſeveral marriages of Ariſtotle's daughter, placed not their words right, and that a reader who was not attentive enough, might think that their meaning was that Eraſiſtratus was born of the marriage of Metrodorus and Pythias. Let us ſuppoſe that thoſe authors ſaid: Τρίτῳ δὲ Μητροδώρῳ ἰατρῷ Χρυσίππου τοῦ Κνιδίου μαθητῇ, ᾧ Ἐρασιστράτου, γίνεται παῖς Ἀριστοτέλης. Tertio autem Metrodoro Medico (Pythias filia Ariſtotelis nupſit) Chryſippi Cnidii diſcipulo, cujus Eraſiſtratus diſcipulus (4), natus eſt filius Ariſtoteles. We may eaſily apprehend, that a reader might believe, for want of attention, that Eraſiſtratus was the ſon of Pythias. How do we know but that Pliny made uſe of an author, who had placed his words ſo, or in a more deceitful manner? Obſerve the Latin tranſlation of Sextus Empiricus, which I have ſet down: one would think by it that Eraſiſtratus was Ariſtotle's father. However it be, I ſhould prefer thoſe conjectures before that of Father Hardouïn (5). He believes that Eraſiſtratus had been adopted by Pythias, as the emperor Galba was adopted by his ſtep-mother. He muſt therefore ſuppoſe, that Eraſiſtratus was Metrodorus's ſon, but Sextus Empiricus ſays only that he was his diſciple.

(2) Plin. lib. xxix, cap. i, pag. m. 663.

(3) Sext. Empir. adv. Mathem. pag. 521.

(4) That word is very often underſtood when the Greeks ſpeak of the ſucceſſion of Philoſophers.

(5) Harduin. in Plin. ubi ſupra, pag. 664.

[C] By ſome ſentences which are aſcribed to her.] She ſaid, amongſt other things, that the beſt colour that can be ſeen in a man's face, is that of modeſty. 'Celebrantur quidem multa dicta Pythiados filiæ Ari-'ſtotelis graviſſima, ut appareat eandem ipſam non 'tam in gremio educatam quam in ſermone patris, 'quo nemo unquam fuit vel acumine præſtantior, vel 'feſtivitate & lepore politior, vel ſuavitate conditior. 'Ex illis autem id etiam accepimus, nullum eſſe pul-'chrius coloris genus in facie hominis ingenui quam 'id quod ob verecundiam ſuperveniret (6). - - - The 'many noted and excellent ſayings of Pythias, Ariſtotle's 'daughter, ſhew that ſhe was bred up, not ſo much in 'the lap as in the converſation of her father, who ne-'ver was ſurpaſſed by any, in ingenuity, wit, or agree-'ableneſs. Amongſt other ſayings this is one, that the 'beſt colour that can be ſeen in a man's face, is that 'which is the effect of modeſty.' See Eraſmus in the eighth book of the Apophthegms (7).

(6) Pet. Alcyonius, in Medice Legato poſteriore, fol. b 1.

(7) Pag. m. 621, 622.

PITHOM, a city of Egypt. It was one of the two towns which Pharaoh cauſed to be built by the poſterity of Jacob (a). It is the ſame with that which was called Peluſium, and with that which Manetho calls Abaris, if we believe Sir John Marſham (b). The city of Abaris was ſo called according to the ancient Theology (c). It was in the Saites Nomos, eaſtward of the river Bubaſtus (d). The beauty of its ſituation engaged Saltis, king of certain nations who ſubdued Egypt, to enlarge and fortify it. He kept in it a garriſon of 240 thouſand men. The ſame people entrenched themſelves there after they had loſt the reſt of Egypt. They defended themſelves for a long time, but at laſt they capitulated, and obtained the liberty of going whither they pleaſed. They retired into Syria, and ſettled in Judea (e). One may eaſily perceive by this diſcourſe of Manetho, that he means the Iſraelites. He adds (f) that Amenophis, who reigned over the Egyptians about five ages after, deſired to ſee the gods, and that a great prophet entertained him in the hopes of ſuch an advantage, provided Egypt were purged from all manner of people infected with leproſy, or other like infirmities. That ſort of people were gathered together, and amounted to eighty thouſand men: they were employed in drawing and cutting ſtones all along the Nile. After they had undergone that painful fatigue for ſome years, they beſought the king to aſſign a city to them for their ſecurity and quiet. He granted them Abaris, which was then deſerted, and did before belong to the ſhepherds (g), and was called the city of Typhon, according to the ancient Theology. They no ſooner came into it, but they began to think of taking advantage of that place to revolt: they took care to fortify it, and choſe for their head a prieſt of Heliopolis, who changed his name of Oſarſiphus into that of Moſes, they were aſſiſted by the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, whoſe anceſtors had been in poſſeſſion of Abaris, &c. Their victories were great and cruel, but at laſt the king of Egypt overcame them, and drove them out of the country (b). You will find in Joſephus the refutation of thoſe ſtories, and ſome learned obſervations of Sir John Marſham in my remark [A].

(a) Exod. i, 8.

(b) Marſham. Chron. Can. Ægypt. Sæc. VIII, pag. m. 107.

(c) Manetho, apud Joſeph. lib. i, cont. Appion. pag. 1040.

(d) Id. ap. eumd. ibid. pag. 1039.

(e) Ex eodem ap. eumd. pag. 1040.

(f) Id. ap. eumd. ibid. pag. 1052.

(g) That is to ſay, to the Iſraëlites, who, as Manetho ſays, had ſubdued Egypt, and whoſe king Saltis had enlarged and fortified the city of Abaris.

(b) Ex eod. ibid. pag. 1052, & ſeq.

(1) Marſh. Chron. Can. Ægypt. Sæc. VIII, pag. 107.

(2) Named Chæremon. Joſeph. lib. i, cont. Appion. pag. 1057, alledges his words.

(3) Joſeph. ibid.

(4) Ptol. Mendeſius, ap. Euſeb. Præp. Evang. lib. x, cap. xii, pag. 497, A.

(5) He calls it Ἀδαρίς.

[A] You will find . . . . ſome learned obſervations of Sir John Marſham in my remark.] He ſays (1) that the city of the ſhepherds called Abaris by Manetho, is called Peluſium by another Hiſtorian of Egypt (2). Sir John Marſham is not exact in this: that Hiſtorian ſaid only, that the maimed and ſickly people, that were turned out of Egypt, retired to Peluſium, and joined with 380 thouſand men whom Amenophis had left there. Note, that Joſephus (3) took advantage of the difference that is between Manetho and Chæremon, as to the place to which thoſe maimed and leprous people were ſent. Sir John Marſham adds, that Ptolomæus Mendeſius (4) made mention of the city of Abaris (5), and that the fables about Typhon belong to that city. The lake Serbonis, as he goes on, where Typhon hid himſelf (6), and the city of Heropolis, where he was thunder-ſtruck, were not far from thoſe parts (7). The name Ἁβαρὶς, or Πιθὼμ, given to one of the towns built by the children of Iſrael, alluded to that of Typhon. The Egyptians uſed to call Typhon by the name of Seth (8), hence it is that they called the city of Typhon, Sethron. The Septuagint throites Nomos took it's name from that city. What Joſephus ſays is not therefore true, that the city of Abaris was built in the Saites Nomos, for it was ſituated on the eaſtern banks of the river Bubaſtus, and that Nomos was ſituated in the weſtern part of the Delta. It is therefore better to follow Africanus's Manetho

(6) Herodot. lib. iii, cap. v.

(7) Steph. Byzant. in Ἡρώων πόλις.

(8) Plut. de Iſide, pag. 357, D.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Manetho (9), quoted by Syncellus; for according to that citation, that people took Memphis, and built a town in the Sethroites Nomos. Let us conclude, that the city of Abaris, that of Typhon, that of Sethron, and hat of Pithom, which is mentioned in Exodus, are the ſame with that which the Grecians call Peluſium. This is Sir John Marſham's determination.

(9) Rectius ex Manethone Africanus. Marſh. ubi ſupra, pag. 108. He quotes Syncellus, pag. 61, a.

PITISCUS (BARTHOLOMEW) preacher to the Elector Palatine, was born the twenty-fourth of Auguſt 1561, at Schlauna, a village of Sileſia near Grunberg. The poverty of his family engaged the miniſter of that place, to recommend him to the lord of that village, as a child who was fit to ſtudy, and who deſerved to be put in the way of improving himſelf. That gentleman undertook to be at the charges of it, and ſent him to the college of Grunberg. He exceeded all his ſchool-fellows in a ſhort time. He was ſent to Breſlaw, being eighteen years of age, and was there a preceptor in the houſe of a worthy man, who had a very fine library. He often ſhut up himſelf in it with Amandus Polanus, which proved very uſeful to both of them. Having loſt his Mæcenas, when it was time to go to the univerſities, he was ſo happy as to be aſſiſted by the liberality of a Proteſtant lady (a), who maintained, at her own charges, a certain number of young men, who ſtudied Divinity. He pitched upon the academy of Zerbſt, by reaſon of the great reputation of Wolfgang Amlingus, and was there all the year 1583. The next year he went into the Palatinate, and having given ſeveral proofs of his merit there, he was made (b) one of the preceptors of prince Frederic IV (c). He acquitted himſelf ſo well in his employment, that prince Caſimir, adminiſtrator of the Palatinate, appointed him the ſecond preacher to his pupil, who, when he came of age, was ſo well pleaſed with his preceptor's ſermons, that he made him his firſt preacher. Pitiſcus gorioufly exerciſed that employment till he died, which happened the ſeventeenth of July 1613 (d). I muſt not forget that he became a very great Mathematician [A], and publiſhed a book, wherein he ſhewed that it would be very neceſſary that Proteſtants ſhould leave off writing controverſial books againſt one another [B]. He publiſhed it by order. I mean there was a conſultation upon that ſubject, after which he was charged

(a) The wife of Joachim de Berge.

(b) In the year 1588. Schultetus, in Narrat. Apologet. pag. 11.

(c) He was Elector ſince.

(d) Taken from Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theolog. Germ. pag. 833, & ſeq.

[A] He became a very great Mathematician.] He publiſhed in Latin five books of Trigonometry, in 1599, which were reprinted with ſome additions in 1612. That work contains ſix books of Aſtronomical problems: a book Problematum Geodæticorum ſive de agro plane metiendo ac dividendo: Problemata Geographica: a book Problematum Gnomonicorum ac Architectonicorum, in quo ſe ait præcipua Architecturæ militaris myſteria referaſſe (1). Tycho Brahe very much eſteemed Pitiſcus's capacity in the Mathematics, and wiſhed that the number of Mathematician preachers was greater, for he believed that it would give them a more ſolid judgment, and put an end to ſeveral diſputes. Here are his words: 'Doctiſſimi illius Bartholomæi 'Pitiſci de triangulis acutum & compendioſum 'libellum lubens accepi: rogoque ut illi ex me 'gratias agas. Optarem, plures ejuſmodi concio-'natores reperiri, qui Geometrica gnaviter cal-'lerent: forte plus eſſet in iis circumſpecti & ſolidi ju-'dicii, rixarum inanium & logomachiarum minus. Si 'is mihi aliquando ſcripſerit; & de iis ſtudiis mecum 'contulerit, inveniet reſponſorem non invitum (2). - - - 'I have with pleaſure received the ingenious and compen-'dious book of the moſt learned Pitiſcus, concerning Trigo-'nometry: and I beg you would return him my thanks. 'I wiſh there were many ſuch preachers that underſtood 'Geometry: perhaps there would be more circumſpection 'and ſolid judgment, and leſs ſtrife and contention amongſt 'them. If he will pleaſe to write, and conſult with me 'about thoſe ſtudies, he ſhall find me a very ready correſ-'pondent.' That wiſh of Tycho Brahe is grounded upon a very good reaſon, but it is liable to ſome inconveniencies. A pompous and florid eloquence is neceſſary to preachers: a dry and cloſe way of reaſoning, like that of Mathematicians, is not proper for them, and would not make ſuch an impreſſion upon their hearers, as the ſtate of man requires. Note, that Pitiſcus acquired by his own ſtudy all that he knew of the Mathematics. 'Illud verò mirandum, quod homo 'Theo-'logus, in Mathematum ſtudiis, nullo niſi ſe magiſtro, 'eo uſque progreſſus eſt, ut editis ſcriptis, diſciplinæ 'illius gloriam magnis Matheſeos profeſſoribus præri-'puerit (3). - - - It is indeed very ſurpriſing, that a Di-'vine ſhould without any aſſiſtance make ſuch proficiency 'in the Mathematics, as by his writings to ſnatch the 'glory of that ſcience from the profeſſors of it.'

(1) See Voſſius, de Sefent. Math. pag. 306, & alibi.

(2) Tycho Brahe, Epiſt. ad Conradum Aſſachum, ap. Melch. Adamum, in Vit. Theolog. pag. 840.

(3) Melch Adam. ibid.

[B] That the Proteſtants ſhould leave off writing controverſial books againſt one another.] In the year 1608, the Eccleſiaſtical Senate of the Elector Palatine deliberated about the means of putting a ſtop to the fatal diſputes of the Proteſtant Divines (4). Scultetus, preacher to his electoral highneſs, and ſome others, were of opinion, that it was for the advantage of the church, that for the time to come the Reformed ſhould compoſe neither Apologies, nor Antilogies, nor any ſuch like pieces of controverſy in religious matters; that it was not poſſible to ſay or write any thing but what had been ſaid or written a great while ago; that the confeſſions of faith, with their expoſitions, were ſufficient for any one who ſincerely enquired after truth; that there was no example of ſuch obſtinate and eager diſputes among the Prophets and Apoſtles; that ſuch books increaſed differences inſtead of terminating them, and that the ſatirical ſharpneſs of the authors of thoſe books afforded diverſion to profane men, and was a matter of triumph for the Papiſts, and inſpired a great many people with irreligion. This is expreſſed more at large, and with greater energy in the Latin words. 'Nec componi, ſed multiplicari controverſias iſtis con-'tentionibus: paucos veritatis inquirendæ, gloriolæ 'vanæ aucupandæ gratiâ, multos in arenam diſputan-'di deſcendere: Diabolum hoc agere; ut totus Spiri-'tus Theologicus, & quicquid ferè DEI providentia 'donorum huic ſeculo contulit, contentionibus impen-'datur: ut Fratres ſtylo Satyrico ſe mutuò exagitent '& deforment, utque adeò per iſtiuſmodi ſcriptiones 'boni à vocationis ſuæ officiis avocentur, mali in ca-'pitali, quo ab antagoniſtis diſſident, odio firmentur; 'denique mutuis iſtis convitiis, quibus libri inter ſe li-'tigantium ſcatent, creari profanis riſum, Pontificiis 'jubilum & magnæ auditorum parti omnis religionis 'contemtum (5). - - - That by ſuch contentions, contro-'verſies were not terminated but multiplied: that few 'diſputed for the ſake of truth, but many for the ſake of 'vain glory: that it was the Devil's great deſign, that 'the whole ſpirit of Theology, and all the gifts God has 'beſtowed on this age, ſhould be laid out in debates: that 'the brethren ſhould exaſperate and diſgrace one another 'in ſatirical writings, and that thereby the good may be 'diverted from the proper functions of their calling, and 'the bad confirmed in their mortal hatred to their adver-'ſaries: and laſtly, that thoſe mutual reproaches, which 'books of controverſy abounded with, occaſioned diver-'ſion to the profane, joy to the Papiſts, and in many a 'contempt of all religion.' It was reſolved in that aſſembly, that our Pitiſcus ſhould pathetically and gravely repreſent thoſe things in a public book. He performed it very well (6), and exhorted the Proteſtants to

(4) Quenam triſtiſſimis Theologorum Evangelicorum certaminibus medicina reperiri queat. Scultet. Narrat. Apologet. p. 43.

(5) Ibid.

(6) His book was written in High Dutch.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google charged with that work. He publiſhed ſome other books [C].

to re-unite themſelves againſt the common enemy, and to lay aſide all diſputes de Perſona Chriſti & de Cœna Domini ; - - - Concerning the perſon of Chriſt, and the Lord's ſupper ; he ſhewed them that they might eaſily live in a perfect union, tho' they differed about the ſenſe of ſome paſſages of the Scripture (7). That book did more harm than good, for, as if it had been a new ſignal for war, the Divines of Saxony and Tubingen took up arms every where, and maintained with an extream eagerneſs, that the Lutherans could make no peace with thoſe that deny the Oral Manducation. ' Verax & hic fuit, quod proverbi locum obtinuit, ſa- ' pientis effatum : Sæpè optimè cogitata peſſimè cadunt. ' Vix enim lucem publicam aſpexerat pia exhortatio ' illa, cùm quaſi claſſicum cecinisſent noſtri, ad arma ' undique concurritur in Saxoniâ & Sueviâ, magnoque ' ſtudio & labore orbi Chriſtiano demonſtratur, oralis ' munducationis in Euchariſtiâ patronos non poſſe pa- ' cem colere cum Reformatis (8). - - - In this caſe was ' verified the ſaying of the wiſe man, which has paſſed ' into a proverb: that the beſt deſigns have often the ' leaſt ſucceſs. For that pious exhortation was hardly ' come out, when, as if it had been a ſignal to battle, ' the Divines of Saxony and Schwaben took up arms, &c.' Scultetus was extreamly deſirous to ſee the Lutherans and Reformed re-united. He exhorted the Divines of Wirtemberg to it viva voce, and in writing ; he repreſented to them the miſchiefs which ariſe from diſcord, the Atheiſm of Hearers, the contempt of the Miniſters, and the joy of the Papiſts (9). But it was to no purpoſe, for he was anſwered, that as for political friendſhip it was never refuſed to the Reformed, and would never be refuſed to them for the time to come, but that Theological friendſhip would never be granted them. Fruſtra omnia : Reſponſum enim : ſe in amicitiam politicam nos ſemper recepiſſe, recepturoſque deinceps ; in Theologicam, hoc eſt, fraternitatem Chriſtianam nunquam (10).

(7) Schultet. ib. pag. 46.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Expoſitis malis, quæ ex mutuis Evangelicorum diſſidiationibus orirentur, atheiſmo auditorum, contemptu miniſtrorum verbi, jubilo Papiſtarum. Ibid. pag. 72, ad ann. 1616.

(10) Ibid.

[C] He publiſhed ſome other books.] Moſt of them in High-Dutch : but the book he wrote againſt a Jeſuit of Mentz, with this title Anti-Roſarium, is in Latin. See Mr Baillet's Anti's (11).

(11) Num. 219.

PLACE (PETER DE LA) in Latin Plateanus, or à Platea, was born in the country of Angoulmois (a), was in his youth ſo well educated in learning, that he alone, of all his brothers, reſolved to follow the ſtudy of the Law, in which he made ſuch proficiency that before he was twenty two years of age, he compoſed a Paraphraſe on actions (b), and about that time began to frequent and practiſe at the bar of the parliament of Paris, where he acquired the character of a ſenſible, well ſpoken, and conſcientious man (c). For which reaſon, Francis I. choſe him for his advocate in his court of Aids at Paris. He executed that office with the greateſt integrity, and therefore Henry II choſe him himſelf (d), out of many, to be his firſt preſident in the ſame court of Aids. He inwardly embraced the faith of the reformed churches in the year 1554 [A], and profeſſed it openly after the death of Francis II : but the troubles that aroſe ſoon after obliged him to retire for the ſecurity of his perſon to his own houſe in the country of Picardy. The calm returning in the year 1562, he went to the king to clear himſelf of ſeveral malicious aſperſions, which ſome enemies had thrown upon him, and after his majeſty was ſatisfied with his defence, he paid his reſpects to the prince of Condé who immediately committed to him the charge and ſuperintendency of all his houſehold affairs, which he undertook with ſuch zeal that in all things relating to the prince, he ſpared neither his ſubſtance, nor children, nor even his own perſon, ſo much was he devoted to his ſervice. The diſturbances which broke out again five years after made him retire once more from Paris to the caſtle of Vé in Valois (e), where he ſuffered great perſecution [B]. The

(a) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç. pag. 408, ſays he was born at Angouleſme.

(b) See the laſt remark.

(c) See the Opuſcules of Loiſel, pag. 511, 525.

(d) In the year 1553. See the ſame Opuſcules, pag. 511.

(e) Belonging to his nephews on the account of Dame Ragonde Luillier, his wife. He was then their guardian. P. de Farnace, Vie de P. de la Place, pag. 15.

[A] He inwardly embraced the faith of the reformed churches in the year 1554.] We find in the account of his life, that God called him to his knowledge at that time in a very extraordinary manner. ' Being a ſcholar ' at Poictiers about twenty years before, he happened ' by the providence of God to ſee the late Mr John ' Calvin then paſſing through that place with archbi- ' ſhop du Tillet (1). He with pleaſure heard him ' talk glorioufly of the knowledge of God in general ; ' but when he came to ſpeak of the pure ſervice of God, ' he ſtarted back as being very zealous for the religion ' in which he had been carefully brought up. How- ' ever, from that time he entertained ſome ſcruple in ' his conſcience, that poſſibly he might have been de- ' ceived, which he often thought of, as he has ſince ' declared : this was a kind of preparative to nouriſh ' that ſmall ſeed, till it ſhould come to ſpring and ' ſhoot up in the ſeaſon appointed by God. One day ' as he ſtood before his houſe, a certain ſtranger, by a ' wonderful providence of God, without knowing any ' thing of him, but ſeeing him to be a perſon of di- ' ſtinction, and wanting to be relieved in his ex- ' treme poverty, humbly applied to him, and made ' a long diſcourſe in very good Latin concerning the ' cauſe of his miſery. This ſtranger ſeeming to be a ' man of parts, he made him come into his ſtudy, ' that he might be able to ſound him a little better ' at his leiſure. And then the poor man, as if he ' had been divinely ſent, began freely to diſplay all ' the abuſes of the Papal church, and to declare the ' true and only way of ſerving God. After he had ' heard all this very calmly, he beſtowed ſomething ' upon him ; but however he deſired him very ear- ' neſtly, not to return again to ſee him ; becauſe he ' was afraid of the fires, which were prepared againſt ' thoſe that were in the leaſt ſuſpected to be Prote- ' ſtants, as indeed that poor ſtranger was ſoon after ' tried in the furnace at Paris. But, from that time ' Peter de la Place never ceaſed to peruſe the Scriptures, ' and all the antient Doctors, and even the Scholaſtics, ' that he might be able to remove that ſcruple which ' tormented his mind day and night. By this means, ' in a little time, God touched his heart, and opened ' his eyes that he might behold the light of the Goſ- ' pel ; ſo that Francis the ſecond happening to die, ' he publickly profeſſed the Reformed religion (2).' The brother of Papyrius Maſſo aſſures us (3) that Peter de la Place and Bertrand de la Place, brothers, and John du Tillet, followed John Calvin to Lyons, who had infected them with his Hereſies at Angouleme. This is not probable with reſpect to him, whoſe article I am now writing : for had he followed Calvin to Lyons, the author of his Life would have known it, and would not have ſaid a thing very different from it.

(1) This du Tillet never was a biſhop, or archbiſhop, but only canon and archdeacon of Angouleme. See what the brother of Papyrius Maſſo has added to the Life of Calvin, at the end of Papirii Maſſonis Elogia varia.

(2) P. de Farnace, Brief Recueil des principaux poincts de la Vie de Meſſire Pierre de la Place, p. 11, & ſeq.

(3) See the Elogies of Papyrius Maſſo, Life of Calvin.

[B] He ſuffered great perſecution.] ' Neither the ' loſs of his office, nor the ſale of all his goods, nor ' the ſeizure of his real eſtate, gave him ſo much vexa- ' tion and uneaſineſs, as the indignities he received ' from thoſe, of whom, humanly ſpeaking, he might ' have expected relief, as they were his near relations: ' . . . . A certain counſellor at court, ... having ' profeſſed the Proteſtant religion, even after the firſt ' troubles broke out, knowing that God was going ' ſharply to try his people, immediately revolted, and ' finding himſelf in ſome danger, becauſe of the threat- ' nings that were given out againſt thoſe that had been ' Proteſtants, in order to remove all ſuſpicion of his ' being any wiſe concerned at his revolt, or having ' any deſire to return to the company of good men, ' he reſolved to commit a very ſignal act, which was ' to perſecute, by all ſorts of calumnies and injuries, ' Peter de la Place, who was guardian to his nephews, ' the children of this counſellor's wife : and who was ' likewiſe

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The reformed church having enjoyed some reſt, he returned to his own houſe, and notwithſtanding the oppoſition of a certain perſon, who during the war had been poſſeſſed of his place [C], he entered again upon his office of preſident, and exerciſed it without blemiſh, being reſpected by all honeſt men, and feared by the wicked, till the maſſacre of St Bartholomew, at which he was killed in the manner as will be ſeen below (f) [D]. He wrote ſome books,

(f) Taken from P. de Farnace, in the Brief Recueil des principaux poincts de la Vie de Meſſire Pierre de la Place, before the Traicté de l'Excellence de l'Homme Chreſtien, p. 18.

' likewiſe retired to a caſtle belonging to his nephews. ' Upon which the counſellor, by a multitude of ſlanderous ' petitions, never ceaſed to forge and vent a thouſand mali- ' cious ſtories and calumnies at court: ſo that he not only ' got the ſaid de la Place to be ignominiouſly deprived of ' his guardianſhip, tho' abſent and ignorant of thoſe things, ' but alſo obtained a commiſſion both to ſeize on the ſaid ' caſtle and on the perſon of the ſaid de la Place. And ' it would have been actually executed in ſuch a miſera- ' ble and turbulent time, conſidering the diligence which ' he made Tanchou and his archers to uſe, as if the bu- ' ſineſs had been to apprehend ſome highwayman, had ' not God raiſed up a friend, who came the night before ' and gave him notice of every thing. Whereupon, tho' ' he was ill of a violent fever, he was forced before ' day to make his eſcape to the foreſt of Rez, pretty near ' that caſtle, where afterwards he found a ſtranger that ' received him, whilſt this counſellor, on the contrary, vio- ' lating not only all the rights of affinity, but alſo of hu- ' manity, ſeized on the caſtle, drove out the children of ' the ſaid de la Place, plundered the ſubſtance he had ' left there, and moreover ſent Tanchou with his archers ' in purſuit of him. He was therefore obliged to wan- ' der up and down the foreſt for ſeveral days, till at ' laſt Mr de Bouchavane was ſo kind as to take him ' very privately to a ſmall chamber of the caſtle of ' Couſſy (4).'

(4) P. de Farnace, Vie du Préſ. de la Place, p. 15, & ſeq.

[C] The oppoſition of a certain perſon who .... had been poſſeſſed of his office.] That certain perſon is no other than Stephen de Neuilly. We find in the dialogue of the advocates of the parliament of Paris, that he was made firſt preſident of the court of Aids, when Mr de la Place was killed at the maſſacre of St Bartholomew (5). Let us ſee the marginal note that was made on that paſſage of the dialogue. ' Miraumont tit. Court ' of Aids, ſays that the Sieur de Neuilly entered up- ' on the office of firſt preſident the eleventh of Ja- ' nuary 1569, which he exerciſed afterwards during ' the abſence of Mr Peter de la Place: and yet Paſquier ' in the ſixteenth book of his letters writing to Mr Theo- ' dore Paſquier, his eldeſt ſon, pag. 245, ſays, he was ' made firſt preſident by the duke de Mayenne, that is, ' during the League.' The difficulty propoſed in this marginal note is none at all: for Paſquier (6) ſpeaks only of the office of Preſident au Mortier conferred by the duke of Mayenne on Stephen de Neuilly, who was already firſt preſident of the court of Aids. See above the article NULLY.

(5) Opuſcules de Loiſel, p. 487.

(6) Paſquier, Lettres, lib. xvi, Tom. ii, p. 245.

[D] The maſſacre of St Bartholomew, at which he was killed in the manner as will be ſeen below.] Captain Michael, arquebuſier to Charles IX, went to the houſe of Peter de la Place at ſix a-clock in the morning. He was armed with an arquebuſe on his ſhoulder, and a piſtol at his girdle, and as a ſignal that he was one of the maſſacreers wore a napkin about his left arm. The firſt words he ſpoke were, that the duke of Guiſe had killed by the king's order, the admiral and ſeveral other Huguenot lords: and as all the reſt of the Huguenots, what ever quality they were of, were deſtined to death, he was come to the houſe of the ſaid Mr de la Place to ſave him from that calamity. But that he deſired they would ſhew him the gold and ſilver that was in the houſe (7). The anſwer of Mr de la Place made the captain blaſpheme, and obliged him to tell him that he ordered him to come and ſpeak with the king. La Place then doubting there was ſome great ſedition in the city, ſlipt out at a back door of his houſe, deſigning to retire to a neighbour's houſe. In the mean while, moſt of the ſervants diſappeared, and the captain having got a thouſand crowns, as he was going away was intreated by Miſtreſs des Maretz, daughter to the ſaid la Place, to conduct her and her huſband Mr des Maretz to the houſe of ſome Catholic friend, which he agreed to, and actually did. After that, the ſaid Mr de la Place, having been refuſed acceſs at three different houſes, was forced to return to his own, where he found his wife in a very melancholy condition (8). He exhorted her to patience, ' then ordered the ſervants that remained in the houſe ' to be called, who being come into his chamber, as ' he had uſed every Sunday to make a form of exhor- ' tation to his family, he went to prayer, then began ' to read a chapter of Job, with the expoſition or ' ſermon of Mr Calvin, and diſcourſed a little upon the ' juſtice and mercy of God, who, ſaid he, like a good fa- ' ther, exerciſes his elect with divers chaſtiſements, that ' their minds may not be fixed on the things of this life. ' .. Then he went to prayer again, preparing, both him- ' ſelf and all his family, to endure all ſorts of torments, ' and even death itſelf, rather than do any thing againſt ' the honour of God. Having ended his prayer, ' they came to tell him that Mr de Seneſcay, Prevoſt ' de l'hôtel, with ſeveral of his archers, were at the ' gate, demanding, by the king's order, that the gate ' may be opened, and ſaying that he came to preſerve ' the perſon of the ſaid de la Place, and to hinder the ' houſe from being plundered by the populace: where- ' upon the ſaid Mr de la Place commanded the gate ' to be opened for him, who being entered told him ' the great ſlaughter that was made of the Huguenots ' throughout the whole city, and by the order of the ' king, adding theſe words mingled with Latin, that ' there would not be left one ſingle man, qui mingat ad parietem, ... To piſs againſt the wall. Never- ' theleſs that the king had expreſsly commanded him ' to take care, that no injury be done him, but to ' bring him to the Louvre, becauſe his majeſty want- ' ed to be informed by him, of ſeveral things relating ' to the affairs of the Proteſtants, which he had had ' the management of, and therefore that he ſhould ' prepare himſelf to go to the king. Mr de la Place ' anſwered, that he ſhould always think himſelf ex- ' tremely happy to have the opportunity, before he ' left this world, of giving an account to his majeſty ' of all his actions and behaviour. But that it was ' impoſſible for him then to go to the Louvre, conſi- ' dering the horrible maſſacre that was committed in ' the city, without running the greateſt and moſt ma- ' niſeſt hazard of his life, but that it was in his power ' to aſſure his majeſty of his perſon, by leaving in his ' houſe ſuch a number of his archers as he ſhould ' think fit, till the fury of the people was abated. Se- ' neſcay conſented to it, and left with him one of his ' lieutenants, called Toutevoye, and four of his ar- ' chers. A little while after Seneſcay was gone, the ' preſident Charon, then Prevoſt of the merchants of ' Paris, came to the houſe, where after he had talk- ' ed ſome time in ſecret, he left at his departure four ' archers of the city, with thoſe of Seneſcay (9). ' .... Seneſcay returning the next day about two a- ' clock in the afternoon, declared to him, that he had ' a very poſitive and repeated order from the king to ' bring him, and that there muſt be no further delay ' (10).' All the remonſtrances of La Place being to no purpoſe, he begged of him at laſt to accompany him in perſon, to which Seneſcay replied, that having other affairs upon his hands he could not conduct him above fifty paces (11). The wife of the ſaid de la Place, threw herſelf ' at the feet of the ſaid Seneſcay to beſeech him ' to go with her ſaid huſband. But upon that, the ' ſaid Mr de la Place, who never ſhewed the leaſt ſign ' of fear, lifted up his wife, reproving her and telling ' her it was not to the arm of fleſh, but to God only ' ſhe muſt have recourſe. Then turning about he per- ' ceived in the hat of his eldeſt ſon a paper croſs, which ' he had put there thro' infirmity, thinking to ſave ' himſelf by that means, for which he chid him ſe- ' verely, commanding him to take off from his hat ' that mark of ſedition, and evincing to him, that the ' true croſs we muſt wear, was tribulation and affliction, ' which God ſent upon us as a ſure earneſt of the fe- ' licity and life eternal that he has prepared for his ' people. After that, finding, himſelf very much ' preſſed by the ſaid Seneſcay to ſet out in order to go ' to his majeſty, being entirely reſolved upon death ' which he ſaw was prepared for him, he took his ' cloak, embraced his wife, and earneſtly recommend- ' ed to her above all things to have the honour and ' fear of God before her eyes, and ſo he went away ' very chearful. When he was come as far as Glaſs- ' houſe ſtreet, over againſt Cock-ſtreet, certain mur- ' derers,

(7) P. de Farnace, ibid. p. 19.

(8) Ib. p. 20.

(9) Ib. p. 21, & ſeq.

(10) Ib. p. 24.

(11) Ib. p. 25.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google books, which were printed [E].

' derers, who had waited for him with naked daggers ' about three hours, killed him, like an innocent lamb, ' in the midſt of ten or twelve archers of the ſaid ' Seneſcay who conducted him, and his houſe was pil- ' laged for the ſpace of five or ſix days together. The ' body of the ſaid Sieur de la Place, whoſe ſoul was ' taken up into Heaven, was carried to a ſtable by ' the town houſe, where the face was all covered with ' dung, and the next morning was thrown into the ' river (12).

(12) Ib. p. 26, & ſeq.

[E] He wrote ſome books which have been printed.] A little after the death of Francis II, he publiſhed a treatiſe on Vocation (13), which he dedicated to Charles IX, and then another treatiſe on the right uſe of Moral Philoſophy with the Chriſtian doctrine. During his firſt retreat, he applied himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of Divinity . . . He likewiſe employed ſome hours in writing down the ſtate of religion and the commonwealth, ſome ſpecimens of which, tho' without his knowledge, were printed in the year 1565 (14). Whilſt he reſided in the caſtle of Couſſy, he conſidered the excellency of a Chriſtian, and compoſed a ſmall treatiſe on that ſubject which he dedicated to the queen of Navarre (15). The Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Paris the twentieth of May 1572. The edition I make uſe of is of the year 1581, in 12mo. In La Croix we find what follows. ' He wrote a very learned and excellent trea- ' tiſe on Vocation and the manner of life, to which ' every one is called, printed at Paris for Frederic Morel, ' in the year 1561 in 4to, and contains twenty one ' leaves. This book was printed afterwards at Paris ' by Robert le Mangnier, with a different title from ' what it had before; for the laſt title runs thus. Diſ- ' cours politiques ſur la voye d'entrer deüement aux Eſtats, ' & la maniere de conſtamment s'y maintenir & gouver- ' ner, le tout reduit par chapitres. It was divided into ' chapters, which was not done in the former edition. ' Some think the ſaid Sieur de la Place was the author ' of a book intituled de l'Etat de la Religion de France, ' printed the year 1557; but I can affirm nothing a- ' bout it, ſince his name is not put to the aforeſaid book ' (16).' I believe there is a fault in the words, in the year 1557, for the firſt edition of that work of Peter de la Place is of the year 1565: the title is Commentaires de l'eſtat de la Religion & Republique ſoubs les Rois Henry & François ſeconds, & Charles neufieme. Neither the name of the Author, or the Printer, or the place of the impreſſion are ſet down. The work is divided into ſeven books and reaches from 1556 till towards the end of the year 1561: it contains 282 leaves in 8vo: We muſt not forget theſe other words of La Croix du Maine. ' He was a man very learn- ' ed in the law (as he ſhewed by his Latin writings, ' printed long ago, and which we ſhall mention elſe- ' where) and beſides that, he was very eloquent (17).' Du Verdier Vau-Privas quotes only one Latin book of that author: Petri Plateani Angoliſmæi. . . . . Paraphraſis in titulos Inſtitutionum imperialium de Actionibus, Exceptionibus, & Interdictis. Scholiis ſeorſum margini adpoſitis, Pariſiis 4 apud Galeotum à Prato 1548 (18).

(13) Ib. p. 13.

(14) Ib. p. 14.

(15) Ib. p. 18.

(16) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. p. 408.

(17) Ibid.

(18) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franç. p. 1038.

PLANTEVIT-LA-PAUSE (JOHN), in Latin Plantavitius Pauſanus, biſhop of Lodeve, was born in the caſtle of Marcaſſargues, a ſeat belonging to his mother, in the dioceſe of Nîmes. He was very learned in the Oriental languages, as it appears from the books he publiſhed [A]. He was not only born a Proteſtant, but he had been alſo miniſter of the church of Beziers (a). He turned Catholic in the year 1604, and was preſently ſent for to court, where Henry the Great careſſed him very much. He went to La Fleche, in order to paſs through a new courſe of Divinity under the Jeſuits. He left that place in 1609, to go to Rome (b). He was one of the biſhops of Languedoc, who engaged in the rebellion of the duke of Montmorency (c). Moreri has committed ſome faults [B].

(a) See the atteſtation he gave to Fitz Simon, inſerted in the Britannomachia of that Jeſuit, pag. 122, where he is miſnamed John de Plantanil.

(b) See the ſame atteſtation.

(c) See the paſſage of Rivetus, in Jeſuita vapulante, quoted by Colomeſius, Bibl. Orient. p. 182.

[A] The books he publiſhed.] Here are the titles of ſome of them. Florilegium Biblicum, Heb. Lat. at Lodeve, 1645. Florilegium Rabbinicum, Heb. Lat. cum Biliotheca Rabbinica, ibid. in the ſame year. Theſaurus Synonymicus Hebræo-Chaldæo-Rabbinicus, ibid. in the ſame year. An Hebrew Lexicon. Colomeſius ſpeaks of a book of Michael Beraud, Miniſter of Montauban, concerning Juſtification againſt that author (1).

(1) Colom. Bibl. Orient. p. 182.

[B] Moreri has committed ſome faults.] I. It does clearly appear from the atteſtation which I have quoted, that Plantavit-la-Pauſe made his abjuration at Beziers, and not at Bourges. Good Moreri miſtook, without doubt, the meaning of the Latin word Biterrenſi, and took it to be the ſame with Bituricenſi. II. I fancy that by the ſame miſtake he tells us, that that prelate retired to the caſtle of Margon, in the dioceſe of Bourges, and died there the 28*th of May*, 1651. III. It cannot be ſaid that a prelate behaved himſelf with great prudence, from the year 1625 to the year 1648, when it is certain that he declared for the rebels in the year 1632. That omiſſion is leſs excuſable than that of Plantevit's miniſtry, and of his ſtudies at la Fleche, and of ſome other facts of which there is not the leaſt hint in Moreri's Dictionary. IV. Thoſe words, he made a particular ſtudy of Divinity in the college of Foix at Toloſe, are captious and very improper; for they would make one believe, that the college of Foix is a houſe wherein ſciences are taught, which is not true (2).

(2) Compare this with the remark [B], of the article BOSQUET (FRANCIS).

PLATINA (BARTHOLOMEW) (a) author of an Hiſtory of the Popes, flouriſhed in the XVth century. He was born in the year 1421, in a village called Piadena [A], between Cremona and Mantua. His firſt profeſſion was that of a ſoldier (b); he followed it a conſiderable time, and then he applied himſelf to ſtudy, and made a conſiderable progreſs in it. He went to Rome (c) under the pontificate of Calixtus III (d), and having got cardinal Beſſarion's acquaintance, he obtained ſome ſmall benefices of Pius II, and then the place of Apoſtolic Abbreviator. Paul II, ſucceſſor of Pius II, turned all the abbreviators out of their places, without any regard to the money they had laid out to buy

(a) Not Baptiſt, as he is called by Jacobus Bergamenſis, Leander Albertus, Floridus Sabinus, &c. See the proofs of it in Voſſ. de Hiſt. Lat. p. 589. See alſo the remark [H], at the end.

(b) Volater. lib. xxi, pag. 777.

(c) Jovius, Elog. cap. xix.

(d) Not Calixtus II, as Moreri ſays.

[A] He was born in the year 1421, in a village called Piadena.] I do not find any author that mentions that year, but ſince Jacobus Bergamenſis and Maſſæus (1) place his death in the year 1481, and Raphaël Volaterranus (2), and Leander Albertus (3) affirm that he died being ſixty years old, it follows that he was born in the year 1421. Thoſe who ſay, as Moreri does, that he was born at Verona, are miſtaken (4): here is the proof of it. ' Idem fecit Theo- ' dorus Hexarchus Ravennas cui quidem in magiſtratu ' mortuo non ita multo poſt Joannes Platina ſucceſ- ' ſit. Hunc ego crediderim dedidiſſe nomen meo na- ' tali ſolo quod Platina appellatur in agro Cremo- ' nenſi poſitum. - - - - Theodorus Hexarchus of Ravenna

(1) In Chronic. They ſay that he died of the Plague.

(2) Commentar. Urban. lib. xxi, pag. 777.

(3) In Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 626.

(4) Hofman, in voce Platina, and Cave, in Cartophyl. Eccleſiaſt. Edit. Lipſ. pag. 369, are cenſured upon that account by Daniel Will. Mollerus, Diſſert. de Platina, pag. 4. Sir Thomas-Pope Blount, Cenſura Author. pag. 339, ſets down a long paſſage of Boiſſardus, in Iconib. wherein Platina is called Veronenſis.

' did

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

buy that employment, or to the remonſtrances of Platina, who humbly beſought him to order, that their cauſe ſhould be judged by the auditors of the Rota (e). The Pope was offended at the liberty he took, and returned a very haughty anſwer [B]. The poor men being deprived of their places, did for ſome days whatever they could to obtain audience of the Pope, but they were denied with the greateſt contempt. Which moved Platina to write a letter to him [C], wherein he acquainted him, that they were ready to go into foreign countries, and to exhort the princes to call a council, in order to examine whether the abbreviators had been juſtly deprived of their places. His letter was looked upon as an act of felony. He was impriſoned and kept in irons, and left in that condition four months, being expoſed to a thouſand miſeries [D]. Afterwards he was ſet at liberty, at the requeſt of cardinal Francis de Gonzaga, and was ordered not to go out of Rome. He lived quietly in it for the ſpace of three years, and then he fell again into a new and more cruel perſecution. The Pope had been made to believe that Callimachus had conſpired againſt him, and that Platina was one of his accomplices. Several perſons were impriſoned, and put to the rack upon that account. Platina was as ſeverely uſed as the reſt. That conſpiracy proved a chimæra, yet not one priſoner was ſet at liberty; for they would have been aſhamed to acknowledge, that perſons of merit had been ſo cruelly treated upon an ill-grounded ſuſpicion [E]. When it appeared that the accuſation of treaſon was too ill-grounded to inſiſt upon it, they

(e) Platina, in Paulo II, fol. m. 150, verſo.

' did the ſame, who, dying during his magiſtracy, was ' ſucceeded ſoon after by John Platina. The latter, I ' believe, gave the name to the place of my birth, which ' is called Platina, and lies in the country of Cremona.' Theſe are the very words of Platina (5). The Italians do not call that village Platina, but Piadena: as appears from the Italian tranſlation of a Journey into Italy, written in Latin by Andreas Schottus (6). I believe that Platina was ſo called from the place of his birth: the name of this family was Sacchus, or Saccus.

(5) In Vit. Cohonis, fol. m. 104. That Pope reigned in the year 686.

(6) Da Cremona à Mantoua ſi va per una ſtrada piana e diritta ove ſi trova Piadena Patria di Bartolomeo Platina. My edition of Vicenza 1622, ſays Pianeda.

[B] Returned a very haughty anſwer.] That Pope's anſwer does very much favour of Antichriſtianiſm: he plainly declared that all right, and all the laws depended upon his will. Theſe are the Latin words of Platina (7): ' Tentarunt tamen ii ad quos res ipſa ' pertinebat hominem è ſententia dimovere: atque ego ' certe qui horum de numero eram rogando etiam ut ' cauſa ipſa judicibus publicis (quos Rotæ auditores ' vocant) committeretur. Tum ille torvis oculis me ' aſpiciens, ita nos inquit ad judices revocas? ac ſi ' neſcires omnia jura in ſcrinio pectoris noſtri collocata ' eſſe? Sic ſtat ſententia, inquit: loco cedant omnes, ' eant quo volunt, nihil eos moror: pontifex ſum, ' mihique licet pro arbitrio animi aliorum acta & re' ſcindere & approbare. - - - - Thoſe, whom the affair ' concerned, tried to make him alter his reſolution. I ' too, as being one of their number, beſought him that ' our cauſe might be heard before the public judges (ſtiled ' the auditors of the Rota). Upon this, looking at me ' with a ſtern countenance, do you then, ſaid he, appeal ' to the judges? As if you were ignorant, forſooth, that ' the law is wholly centered in my breaſt. Thus have I ' decreed: go they ſhall every one of them hence; they may ' chuſe where. I am Pope, and therefore have a right ' to approve or diſanul the acts of others, as I think beſt.'

(7) In Paulo II, fol. m. 350, verſo.

[C] Which moved Platina to write a letter to him.] You will ſee the contents of it in the following words: ' Ego vero, ſays he (8), tanta ignominia excitus quod ' mihi ac ſociis meis coram non licebat, id agere per ' literas inſtitui. Scripſi itaque epiſtolam his verbis. ' Si tibi licuit indicta cauſa ſpoliare nos emptione no' ſtra juſta ac legitima, debet & nobis licere conqueri ' illatam injuriam inuſtamque ignominiam. Rejecti à ' te ac tam inſigni contumelia affecti dilabemur paſ' ſim ad reges, ad principes, eoſque adhortabimur ut ' tibi concilium indicant, in quo potiſſimum rationem ' reddere cogaris cur nos legitima poſſeſſione ſpolia' veris. - - - - - But I, being provoked at ſo great an ' indignity, reſolved to do by a letter what my colleagues ' and I were not allowed to do in his preſence. I there' fore wrote to him as follows. If you had a right to ' deprive us, without being heard, of our juſt and law' ful purchaſe, we likewiſe ſhould have a right to com' plain of the wrong which we ſuffer, and of the indignity ' that is put upon us. Since we are repulſed by you, and ' treated in ſuch a contumelious manner, we will go ' every where to the princes abroad, and exhort them to ' call a council, whoſe chief buſineſs it ſhall be to make ' you give an account of the reaſons which you had for ' depriving us of our right and property.' The character of Platina may be known from this letter: it appears by it that he was too impatient, and too much conceited, but at the ſame time, a ſincere man; for ſince he was pleaſed to acquaint the public with his conduct, tho' it was not agreeable to his duty, one may reaſonably ſuppoſe that he loved to write truth. It is certain, that a ſubject who is turned out of his place by his maſter, has no right to threaten him that he will complain of him to other princes, that he may have juſtice. The Pope is ſovereign in Rome, with reſpect to the ſuppreſſion or eſtabliſhment of certain employments, and cannot be ſubjected to a council in that reſpect. Beſides, the Pope could not but be extreamly offended at Platina's menaces about a council. It was treating him like a ſchool-boy, when he is told that his maſter ſhall know of it. Beſides, I ſhould be glad to know, whether the ſuppreſſion of a college of ſecretaries deſerves ſo great a buſtle, and is worth the calling of a council. But this is the character of ſuch men, to fancy there is nothing wherein the world is ſo much concerned, as what concerns them. Platina did not much trouble himſelf about other abuſes; he would have the council chiefly to mind the loſs which the apoſtolical abbreviators had lately ſuſtained.

(8) Ibid.

Reflexions on that letter, which ſhew the character of Platina.

[D] He was left . . . expoſed to a thouſand miſeries.] For he was in the middle of the winter, without a fire, in a tower which lay open to all ſorts of winds (9).

(9) Reclinctus compedibus & quidem gravifſimis ſtudio hiemis fine loco, celsa in turri ac ventis omnibus expoſita coerceor meritus quatuor. Platina, ubi ſupra, fol. 351.

[E] They would have been aſhamed to acknowledge, that perſons of merit had been ſo cruelly treated upon an ill-grounded ſuſpicion.] Of all the defects of men, vanity is, perhaps, the cauſe of moſt crimes committed by them. How many men are there who begin an injuſtice, being fully perſuaded that they act juſtly? They ſoon perceive they were miſtaken, but their pride not permitting them to acknowledge their fault, they go on in their injuſtice, leſt any body ſhould come to know that they began it without reaſon. Every body had rather ſave his own reputation than that of his neighbour: from whence come the numberleſs ſhifts and cavils of informers, who know they are guilty of calumny, and are afraid of being convicted of it. Here is a Pope, who, for a falſe point of honour, perſiſted to perſecute thoſe who were found innocent, notwithſtanding his former ſuſpicions. ' Chriſtophorus Ve' ronenſis Pauli Medicus ad me veniens, bono inquit ' animo te eſſe jubet Paulus: ac de ſe bene ſperare ' brevique liberum futurum: ſciſcitor quando id fore ' ſperaret. Reſpondet homo liber audientibus omni' bus qui tum aderant: non ita cito fieri poſſe ne ' levitatis & ſævitiæ argueretur pontifex, quod illos ' quos tanto tumultu concitato cæpiſſet ac torſiſſet, ' ſtatim veluti innoxios dimitteret (10). - - - Chriſopher ' of Verona, Paul's Phyſician, came to me, and ſaid; the ' Pope bids you to be of good chear, and to expect good ' uſage from him, for that you ſhall ſhortly be ſet at li' berty. I aſked him when he thought that would be. He ' anſwered, in his free way, before all that were pre' ſent, that cannot be ſo very ſoon, leſt the Pope ſhould ' be accuſed of fickleneſs and cruelty, if he ſhould inſtantly ' releaſe, as innocent, thoſe whom he had cauſed, in ſuch ' a tumultuous

(10) Ib. fol. 351.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

they came to the accusation of Heresy [F], which at last vanished away as the other. The prisoners were not set at liberty before the year's end [G]. The Pope entertained Platina with the hopes of a good settlement, and so kept him from going out of Rome. He expected in vain, for the space of two years, the effect of those promises, and then the Pope died of an Apoplexy (f). Sixtus IV, his successor, made Platina library-keeper of the Vatican (g). Platina found himself, by that means, in his element. He lived very quietly till the year 1481, in which he died of the Plague (h). He left to Pomponius Lætus the house he had built upon mount Quirinal, with the grove of laurels, out of which the Poetical crowns were taken (i). I shall give a catalogue of his writings [H]. Mr

(f) Taken from Platina, in Vita Pauli II.

(g) The library of the Vatican was set up by that Pope. Jovius, ibid.

(h) See the remark [A], citation (1).

(i) Jovius, ibid.

'a tumultuous manner, to be taken up, and put to the rack.' See the article EXPERIENS, remarks [A] and [B].

[F] They came to the accusation of Heresy.] So says Platina, Neque hoc quidem contentus Paulus quos paulo ante conjurationis & majestatis accersierat, eosdem mutata sententia ob divulgatam fabulam hæreseos accusat (11). Pomponius Lætus was apprehended at Venice, and carried to Rome. He was accused of changing the names of young men, and giving them a Heathenish name instead of a Christian. It is pretended that he did so, to inspire them with a greater desire of honour and virtue; but he was contented to answer, What is that to you, or to the Pope, if I have a mind to go by the name of Fennel, provided it be without any malice? Rogatis cur nomina adolescentibus immutaret, ut homo liber erat, quid ad vos, inquit, & Paulum, si mibi fœniculi nomen indo, modo id sine dolo ac fraude fiat. Amore namque vetustatis antiquorum præclara nomina repetebat quasi quædam calcaria quæ nostram juventutem æmulatione ad virtutem incitarent (12). Besides, those prisoners were accused of having embraced the sect of Plato, of disputing in a doubtful manner, about the Immortality of the Soul, and the Existence of GOD, and of valuing Paganism too much. Multa nobis objicit (Paulus) sed illud potissimum quod de immortalitate animorum disputaremus, teneremusque opinionem Platonis. . . . . in dubium, inquit Paulus, disputando Deum vocabatis. . . . Præterea ver Paulus crimini nobis dabat, quod nimium gentilitatis amatores essemus (13). To which they answered, 1. That if they loved Plato, they did but imitate the great St Augustin. 2. That all the Divines and Philosophers of that time disputed about the same truths, and called them in question, in order to find the certainty of them; for it is one of the laws of dispute, not to take for certain what is in question, but to suppose for a time the uncertainty of it, in order to enquire, without any prejudices, into the reasons and grounds of what is believed concerning it (14). 3. That, according to St Augustin, obstinacy in maintaining errors makes a Heretic, but as for them, they had always submitted to the discipline of the church. Platina, in particular, represented the innocency of his actions; that he had never forgot to confess, and communicate once a year, and that he never uttered a word against the Apostle's Creed, or that savoured of Heresy. Nullum mihi facinus impingi potest, non furtum, non latrocinium, non sacrilegium, non depeculatus, non parricidium, non rapina, non simonia. Vixi ut Christianum decebat: confessionem & communionem in anno semel præsertim intermisi nunquam. Nil ex ore meo excidit quod contra symbolum esset, aut hæresim saperet. He observes, that no body appeared so fond of Pagan antiquities as the Pope, who gathered together all the antient statues to adorn his palace (15), &c. Notwithstanding that apology, the Pope set a mark of ignominy upon the name Academic, and declared Heretics all those who, for the time to come, should mention the word Academy, either in jest or earnest. 'Veteres Academicos sequebamur, novos contemnentes qui in rebus ipsis nil certi ponebant. Paulus tamen hæreticos eos pronunciavit qui nomen Academiæ vel serio vel joco deinceps commemorarent. Juncta est hæc ignominia Platoni, ipse se tueatur (16). - - - - We followed the old Academics, despising the new, who allowed of no certainty in the nature of things. Nevertheless Paul declared Heretics all those who for the time to come, &c. . . . . This reflects upon Plato, let him defend himself.' I have read in more than one place, but I cannot now tell where, that this Pope was so great an enemy to learning, that he forbad to pronounce the word College or Academy. Those who said so were grossly mistaken: Paul II did not condemn those who should mention the word Academy in the sense of a college or a house wherein sciences are taught. He only condemned the Sceptical and Pyrrhonian spirit of the wits of his time, who, under pretence of philosophizing in the way of Plato, the founder of the antient academy, brought every thing in question, and grew dangerous with respect to the foundations of the Gospel.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Platin. ibid. fol. 358, verso.

(13) Ib. fol. 359.

(14) In dubium, inquit Paulus disputando Deum vocabatis. Quod quidem omnibus Philosophis & Theologis nostrorum temporum objici potest qui & animos & Deum & omnes intelligentias separatas disputandi ac veri inveniendi causa in dubium plerumque vocant. Ibid. See the article MALDONAT, remark [L].

(15) Cum nemo eo hujus rei studiosior esset, quippe qui & statuas veterum undique ex tota urbe conquisitas in suas illas ædes quas sub Capitolio extruebat congeret. Ibid.

(16) Ibid. fol. 359, verso, & fol. 360.

[G] The prisoners were not set at liberty before the year's end.] Trithemius is hereby convicted of a falsehood, for saying that Platina was set at liberty only by Sixtus IV, after the death of Paul II. Multas à Paulo Papa II calamitates sustinuit, adeo ut bonis omnibus & dignitate spoliatus post equulei suspensionem in carcerem crudelissime detrusus, usque ad mortem ipsius Pauli detentus sit, qui à Sixto mox liberatus, &c. (17). When an author writes the history of his own misfortunes, we ought to trust him, and not believe that he wants our amplifications. Trithemius should have followed that maxim, and consulted the life of Paul II, written by the same person whose elogy he made: he might have known exactly how long he was a prisoner, and many people would not be deceived by him, as they are still. 'A Paulo II in carcerem conjectus, mensesque quatuor ipsos detentus est, donec à successore Sixto IV liberatus - - - - (18). He was thrown into prison by Paul II, and kept there four months, till he was set at liberty by his successor Sixtus IV.'

(17) Trithem. de Script. Eccles. pag. 356. Bolsardus says the same thing, ap. Pope Blount, Cens. Author. pag. 339.

[H] I shall give a catalogue of his writings.] The most considerable is, the History of the Popes, from St Peter to Sixtus IV, to whom he dedicated it. It is variously spoken of: the Protestants like it well enough, and have placed that author in the catalogue of the witnesses of truth (19). See the passage of Illyricus, which I shall quote by and by. Some Roman Catholics accuse him of want of sincerity and diligence. Nevertheless, Panvinius did not scruple to publish that History, with notes of his own, and to add to it the Lives of the Popes from Sixtus IV to Pius IV. Cicarella went on, and added to it the Lives of the Popes from Pius V to Clement VIII. That book of Platina was printed first of all at Venice in the year 1479, in folio. Olearius (20) was therefore mistaken, who believed that the Nuremberg edition, 1481, is the first. You will find this remark in Mollerus's dissertation (21), with the list of several other editions. That which I make use of is not mentioned by him; it is a Lyons edition, 1512, in 8vo. These words are to be found at the end of it: Excellentissimi historici Platynæ in vitas summorum Pontificum usque ad Julium II. Ponti. Maxi: præclarum opus fœliciter explicit. Ludun. impressum à Gilberto de Villiers Borbonnio: impensis honestissimi viri domini Vincentii de Prothonariis & Constantini Fradin. Anno domini millesimo quingentesimo duodecimo. Die vero XXII mensis Februarii. A reader might be deceived by the beginning of this paragraph: one would think that Platina lived to the time of Julius II, yet it appears by some Latin verses printed the same year, and in the same Printing-house, that Platina died under Sixtus IV. Bartholomew Aristophilus, author of a Latin poem inserted in the collection of the funeral verses published to the honour of Platina, says, in his small preamble, that having succeeded, by Sixtus's choice, to the place of library-keeper, which Platina enjoyed, and finding himself lodged in the same room where Platina lived, he felt, &c. Mr Mollerus has not forgot the list of some German, Italian, and French translations of that book of Platina. He speaks of a French translation, printed at Paris in 1519, in folio, but says nothing of a later translation, made by Mr Coulon, and published at Paris, in 4to, 1651. Here is the passage of Illyricus, which I have promised: 'Etsi Platina turpiter & impudenter Papis adulatis sit: tamen nimia ipsorum turpitudine ac malitiâ coactus aliquando, etiam subindicat Babyloniæ Meretricis nefanda scelera. In Marcellino que-

(18) Bosius, de comparanda Prudentia civili, p. 377, of the second Tome of the treatise de ratione studiorum, collected and commented by the learned Crenius, at Leyden 1696.

(19) See Simon Goulart, in Catal. Testium Veritatis, col. 1904.

(20) In Abaco Patrolog. p. 68.

(21) He might have said that Labbæus de Script. Eccles. Tom. i, p. 174. has committed the same mistake with Olearius.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mr Daniel William Mollerus, professor in the university of Altdorf, has published a curious piece (k), which was very useful to me for the composition of this article. He observes, that Andrew Corthymius (l) has made three Platina's of one; for he speaks of Platina the Orator, Platina the Historian, and Platina a Father of the church. He observes also, that Barthius thinks he has found out a very criminal mystery, in Platina's not having mentioned the Resurrection of CHRIST, nor his Ascension [1]. Varillas has committed

(k) Intituled, Disputatio circularis de Platina. Altdorf. d. 17. Feb. 1694.

(l) In Florilegio Historico, fol. 204, n. 10, & fol. 206, num. 4.

‘ ritur Paparum scelera eo excreviſſe, ut vix apud ‘ Deum miſericordiæ locum reliquerint: avaritiam, ‘ ſuperbiam, neglectum Doctrinæ, & Religionis ſi- ‘ mulationem, mores etiam in prophanis deteſtan- ‘ dos, propalam eſſe, ut inde laudem quærere vid- ‘ eantur. In Pontificibus poſt milleſimum annum, ‘ ſubinde repetit, Omnem pietatem & ſanctitatem ‘ à Papis ad Cæſares migraſſe (22). - - - - - Although ‘ Platina has flattered the Popes in a ſcandalous and im- ‘ pudent manner: nevertheleſs he is ſometimes conſtrained ‘ by their extreme wickedneſs and cruelty to diſcover the ‘ abominable ſins of the Whore of Babylon. In the life ‘ of Marcellinus, he complains that the iniquities of the ‘ Popes were come to ſuch a height, that there was ſcarce ‘ any room left for the mercy of GOD: that their cove- ‘ touſneſs, pride, neglect of learning, hypocriſy, and ‘ vices, that even in profligates would be accounted exe- ‘ crable, were grown ſo public that they ſeemed to glory ‘ in them. In his lives of the Popes, after the year one ‘ thouſand, he often ſays, that all piety and holineſs ‘ was fled from the Popes to the Cæſars.’ I ſhould willingly ſubſcribe to the judgment which Robert Creyghton made upon that work of Platina. ‘ Pla- ‘ tinam, ſays he (23), auctorem ſiccum & ſtrigoſum ‘ ſæpe verba, ſæpe ſenſus, multoties rerum experientia, ‘ nonnunquam integritas deſtituunt. Et quod magis ‘ miremur nunquam lapſus eſt gravius quam in Eugenii ‘ vita, ſub cujus temporibus floruit. - - - - Platina, a ‘ dry and barren writer, often wants words, often ſenſe, ‘ very often experience, and ſometimes integrity. And ‘ which is ſtill more to be wondered at, he has no ‘ where blundered more remarkably than in the life of ‘ Eugenius, in whoſe time he flouriſhed.’ Theſe are the titles of the other books of Platina. De naturis rerum: epiſtolæ ad diverſos: de honeſta voluptate & valetudine: de falſo & vero bono: contra amores: de vera nobilitate: de optimo cive: Panegyricus in laudem Beſſarionis: Oratio ad Paulum II de pace Italiæ componenda & bello Turcico indicendo: de floſculis linguæ Latinæ. Gryphius, printed at Lyons in 1541, in 8vo, at the end of Cælii Apicii de re culinaria libri decem, this other book; ‘ P. (24) Platinæ Cremonenſis viri undecunque ‘ doctiſſimi de tuenda valetudine, natura rerum & po- ‘ pinæ ſcientia ad ampliſſium D. D. B. Roverellam ‘ S. Clementis Preſbyterum Cardinalem libri decem. ‘ Ten books of Platina, on the Preſervation of Health; ‘ the Nature of Things; the Art of Cookery, &c.’ That work was unworthy of that author, and I do not wonder that Sannazar ridiculed it by this epigram;

Ingenia & mores vitaſque obituſque notaſſe
Pontificum, argutæ lex fuit hiſtoriæ.
Tu tamen hinc lautæ tractas pulmenta culinæ;
Hoc Platina eſt ipſos paſcere pontifices (2).

Of Popes the lives and manners while you tell,
You act the part of an Hiſtorian well.
But when of kitchen-art you write a book,
You are not their Hiſtorian, but their Cook.

[§ (α) Sannazar was in the wrong to believe that Platina, after having writ the lives of the Popes, had debaſed himſelf ſo far as to write of Cookery. See the new Menagiana edition of Paris, 1715, p. 69, and 70. As for the reſt, the laſt editions of Palatina are not the moſt faithful. In the life of Pope Cletus, for example, in the thirteenth leaf of John Petit's edition, 1530, in 8vo, we find: Uxorem habuit in Bithynia; - - - he had a wife in Bithynia: and with this agrees an old Italian tranſlation that I have ſeen; whereas, the following editions, by a groſs corruption, have made it: Uxorem non habens in Bithynia; - - - having no wife in Bithynia. REM. CRIT.]

The edition of Lyons, 1541, came out after thoſe of Cologn, 1529, and 1537, in 8vo. The Italian book, which I have ſeen quoted with the title of B. Scacchi Cuoco ſecreto di Papa Paolo II, Opera, dove ſi tratta di diverſe vivande, &c. con le figure in 4to. Venet. 1570, is not a tranſlation of Platina's ten books, de tuenda valetudine & popinæ ſcientia. That Italian book is quoted otherwiſe by Lanzius: Extat, ſays he (25,) memorabilis liber artis Apicianæ de culina & architriclini officio di M. Bartholomeo Scappi cuoco ſecreto di Papa Pio V qui nunc præfectus eſt (ait * ille) noſtris intimis coquis, non ſine ejuſdem privilegio & approbatione inquiſitorum hæretice pravitatis, Venetiis editus anno M. D. LXXI, ſed & ante hunc Bartholemæum extant Platinæ, Suetonii Pontificii de Popinæ ſcientia libri x. ad Cardinalem Rovarellam. It appears that Lanzius was perſuaded that his Bartholomew Scappi, named by others Bartholomew Scacchi, is different from Platina. He is in the right, for the work of B. Scappi contains a relation of the funeral obſequies of Paul III, at which the author aſſiſted. Note, that it is a large quarto divided into ſix books, where all the ways of dreſſing fiſh and fleſh, &c. are treated of: they have not been ſparing of figures (26).

As to the Hiſtory of Mantua compoſed by Platina, Mr Morellus (27) affirms, that Lambecius publiſhed it in the year 1674. But he owns that he could never get a copy of it, whatever pains he took to find one, and that Martin Diſenbachius (28) maintains, that that work never came out in print. The original of that hiſtory of Mantua was left by the author himſelf to Gaudentius Merula, who ſent it to Oporinus, a Bookſeller of Baſil, to get it printed. Oporinus died before he could print it, and left it to the eldeſt ſon of his good friend Theodorus Zwingerus (29). It is certain that Lambecius publiſhed it with notes at Vienna in the year 1675, in 4to. The 10th, Giornale de Letterati, 1676, gives an abſtract of it, and tells us that this work is divided into ſix books, and not into ſeven, as Poſſevinus affirms (30), or into three, as Voſſius believed (31), and that Lambecius, who maintains againſt Trithemius, Angelus Rocca, Raphael Volaterranus, Boiſſardus, and Voſſius, that Platina's name was Baptiſt, and not Bartholomew, is refuted by a Pope's Brief, to be found in the Vatican library. It is the Brief wherein Platina is appointed keeper of that library. He is named Bartholomew in it. That proof was unknown to Voſſius. Mr Wharton (32) obſerves that Richard Flemyngus, who knew Platina very well, and beſtowed great encomiums upon him (33), calls him Bartholomew (β).

[(β) So does Benedictus Curtius, in his Commentary upon the Decrees of Love, Les Arrêts d'Amour, and Boiſſard in the title of an epigram which he made upon him, and which is to be ſeen in the firſt volume of the Delitiæ Poetarum Galliæ. REM. CRIT.]

[1] Barthius thinks he has found out a very criminal myſtery, in Platina's not having mentioned the Reſurrection of CHRIST, nor his Aſcenſion.] Theſe are Mollerus's words: ‘ Improbitatis alicujus Platinam accuſa- ‘ turi ad Caſp. Barth. animadverſ. in Gui. Briton. ‘ lib. vi. Philipp. p. 459. provocare ſolent, quippe ubi ‘ verba reperire liceat ſequentia Auguſti hoc dictum (nempe ‘ melius eſt Herodis porcum eſſe quam filium, de quo ‘ vid. Macrob. in jocis Auguſti lib. ii. c. 4.) illuſtra- ‘ vit renaſcentibus literis B. Platina in primo ſuorum ‘ Pontificum nempe Domino & Deo noſtro Jeſu Chriſto. ‘ Qui improbe tamen hoc & profane, quod vita ſervatoris ‘ obituque utcunque commemoratis, glorioſiſſimam reſurre- ‘ ctionem è mortuis & aſcenſionem in cœlum, ne uno qui- ‘ dem verbo attigit. Cauſſa facile à ſagacibus bomini- ‘ bus odoranda (34). - - - Thoſe who accuſe Platina of impiety generally have recourſe to Caſpar Barthius, where you find the following words immediately after this ſaying of Auguſtus, viz. It is better to be Herod's hog than his ſon: It was explained upon the revival of learning by B. Platina, in the life of his firſt pontif, viz. our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Nevertheleſs he behaved like a profane and impious writer, in that having mentioned the life and death of our Saviour in a careleſs manner, he has not ſaid one word of his glori- ‘ ous

(k) Intituled, Diſputatio circularis de Platina. Altdorf. d. 17. Feb. 1694.

(22) Illyricus, lib. xix, Catal. Teſtium Verit. ap. Pope Blount, ubi ſupra, pag. m. 339.

(23) Robert. Creyghton, Not. ad Sylveſtri Sguropuli Hiſt. Concilii Florentini, §. v, cap. ii.

(24) They have put a P. inſtead of a B. Mr Mollerus, pag. 7, obſerves, that in the catalogue of Thuanus's library, pag. 119, Part i, we read Joh. Bap. Platinæ. & p. 182, Part ii, Petri Platinæ. But it is not the fault of thoſe who made that catalogue, but of thoſe who printed Platina's works.

(25) Orat. cont. Italiam, pag. m. 845, 846.

* M. Frider. Comm. ad Cen. ſtant. Decat.

(26) This particular I had from the Mazarin library.

(27) De Platina, pag. 26.

(28) De Henrico VII Imp. p. 47.

(29) Diſenbachius, ibid. apud Molterum, pag. 27.

(30) In Apparat. Sacro.

(31) De Hiſt. Lat. pag. 589.

(32) In Append. ad Cave Hiſt. Litt. Script. Eccleſ. pag. 153.

(33) In Lib. i. Locubrationum Tiburtinarum.

(34) Moller. ubi ſupra, pag. 39.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

mitted some faults [K].

'ous resurrection from the dead, nor of his ascension in-
'to heaven. A wise man may easily guess the cause.'
Mollerus does not grant that Platina suppressed the resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ, 'Sed tamen Plati-
'nam, says he, mortis & resurrectionis Christi memi-
'nisse ex principio statim vitæ S. Petri inspecto apparebit
'ubi verba occurrunt ista: post Christi mortem & re-
'surrectionem completis jam diebus Pentecostes Spiri-
'tum S. accepere discipuli. - - - - Nevertheless it will 'appear, that Platina mentioned the death and resur-
'rection of Christ, by looking into the very begin'ning of his life of St Peter, where he has these words.
'After Christ's death and resurrection, when the days of
'Pentecost were fulfilled, the disciples received the Holy 'Ghost.' You see how he proves that Platina mentioned those two mysteries; notwithstanding, he suspects that this author had an ill design, under pretence, that the chapter which concerns the life of Christ, contains nothing touching the resurrection and ascension of the Messias. He mentions, without any refutation, the suspicion which some have had, that Platina designed thereby to increase the glory of the Popes. Certum autem est in vitæ Christi descriptione ne- que resurrectionis è mortuis neque ascensionis in cælum mentionem ullam esse injectam, non tam ob brevitatis caussam, ut aliqui suspicati sunt, quam ut nonnullorum ex opinione, insignior insequentes pontifices gloria maneret (35).
I confess, that all I can apprehend herein is, that several people make themselves ridiculous, by their affecting too great a penetration. They look for political views in the most simple and most indifferent things.
I should be glad to know how it can be any advantage to the Popes, that Platina mentioned the resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ, not in the chapter where he treats of Jesus Christ, but in the next chapter, which treats of St Peter? I believe Platina would be very much surprised, if he knew that such subtleties are ascribed to him, which are so unworthy of his country.

(35) Ibid.

[K] Varillas has committed some faults (36).] I. He says, that Platina was born at Cremona. II. It is not true that Cardinal Bessarion put Platina upon writing the lives of the Popes. III. Nor that this work was written before the time of Paul II. Those two falsehoods are clearly refuted by the epistle dedicatory, where Platina says twice, that he wrote the history of the Popes by order of Sixtus IV. Tu itaque Theologorum ac philosophorum princeps Maxime Pontifex hac hominum utilitate motus simulque dignitati ecclesiasticæ consulens, non frustra MANDASTI ut res gestas pontificum scriberem . . . . si quid emolumenti ex hac scriptione nostra perceperint, tibi soli pontifex optime gratias agant, cujus sanctissimo IMPERIO libentur OBTEMPERAVI. IV. It is not true that Paul II made him his secretary: Pius II gave him that place, and Paul II took it away from him.

(36) In the Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 171.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic Philosopher, flourished in the IIId century. His genius was very much superior to the common Philosophers, and his ideas were very singular and extraordinary. He was ashamed of being lodged in a body; and therefore took no pleasure in saying what country (a), or what family he was of. His contempt for every thing material that was in him, was the reason why he would never suffer his picture to be drawn [A]; and had it not been for a man who drew it by memory, his disciples had (a) Nevertheless we know that he was born at Lycopolis, a city of Egypt. Eunapius, in Plotino.

[A] He would never suffer his picture to be drawn.] Amelius, his disciple, desired it of him, but it was in vain: Is it not enough, answered he, to drag every where with us that image in which we have been shut up by nature: do you think that we must, also, transmit to future ages an image of that image, as an object worthy of their attention? 1. How great is that thought! None but little souls will deny it. Οὐ γὰρ ἀρκεῖ φέρειν ὃ ἡ φύσις εἰδῶλον ἡμῖν περιέθηκεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ εἰδώλῳ εἴδωλον συγχωρεῖν αὐτὸν ἀξιοῦν πολυχρονιώτερον καταλιπεῖν, ὡς δή τι τῶν ἀξιοθεάτων ἔργων. Quasi vero non satis hanc imaginem fere sit quam natura nobis ab initio circumdedit: etiam censes imaginis hujus imaginem diuturniorem insuper posteris ut opus spectaculo dignum relinquendum (1). Madam des Houlieres has made some admirable verses upon the vanity which induces men to have their pictures drawn (2). The elevation and depth of her morality is incomparable; a lady who thinks so nobly should have lived in the age of Plotinus, our's was not worthy of her: the men of this age have too mean souls, they set too great a value upon the body, and the goods of fortune. There are no Plotinus's now a-days. Madam des Houlieres herself has yielded to the temptation of having her picture drawn (3). She was pleased to see herself grown young again by the pencil of Mrs Cheron, and to think that she would not be unknown in that respect when she ceased to be. She speaks thus of Mrs Cheron, who drew her,

(1) Porphyr. in Vita Plotini, init.

(2) They are in the Mercure Galant, of Nov. 1693.

(3) She was still alive when I wrote this. She died the 17th of Feb. 1694.

Elle me rend enfin mes premieres couleurs;
Par son art la race future
Connoîtra les presens que me fit la nature:
Et je puis esperer qu'avec un tel secours,
Tandis que j'errerai sur les sombres rivages,
Je pourrai faire encor quelque honneur à nos jours.
Oui je puis m'en flater: plaire & durer toûjours
Est le destin de ses Ouvrages.

At length my first complexion she renews:
And from her art posterity shall know
What charms rich nature did on me bestow:
Perhaps my form preserv'd by such an aid,
When I am nothing but an empty shade,
Will do some honour to the present age.
This may I promise to myself with ease;
Since ev'ry piece that does her hand engage
Must last for ever, and for ever please.

Perhaps it will be said, that to grow young again in a picture and in effigy is a very small thing: and that to rejoice at this thought, that future ages will not be ignorant that one has been young and beautiful, is to content one's self with a very chimerical honour. But who knows that better than the lady whom I speak of? Is it not from thence that she takes the nicest part of her reflexion? I shall quote the last verses of her poem.

Hé, comment pourrois-je pretendre
De guerir les mortels de cette vieille erreur,
Qu'ils aiment jusqu'à la fureur,
Si moi qui la condamne ai peine à m'en defendre?
Ce portrait dont Apelle auroit été jaloux,
Me remplit malgré moi de la flateuse attente
Que je ne saurois voir dans autrui sans couroux.
Foible raison que l'homme vante!
Voilà quel est le fond qu'on peut faire sur vous:
Toûjours vains, toûjours faux, toûjours pleins d'injustices,
Nous crions dans tous nos discours
Contre les passions, les foiblesses, les vices,
Où nous succombons tous les jours.

Alas! For how should I remove
This old and darling error of mankind,
Since, hardly free from what I disapprove,
In spight of my Philosophy I find,
That this fair picture, which if he had known,
Apelles would have jealous grown,
Presents a pleasing hope unto my view,
Which I with anger in another see;
Weak reason, empty boast, adieu.
Such is the confidence repos'd in thee!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

had been without that gratification. I believe that from the ſame principle, he refuſed to make uſe of ſeveral things which were looked upon as conducive to health [B]: but it was for another reaſon that he rejected the uſe of gliſters, which he was adviſed to take as a good remedy for the cholic; he thought that it was neither becoming nor ſuitable to the gravity of an old Philoſopher to make uſe of ſuch a remedy (b). He began very early to appear very ſingular in his taſte and manners; for being eight years of age, when he went already to ſchool, he would go to his nurſe, and uncover her breaſt to ſuck, which he did very greedily. He left it off, when he had been chid for it, as a troubleſome child. Being twenty-eight years of age, he appeared extremely deſirous to ſtudy Philoſophy: he was recommended to the moſt famous profeſſors of Alexandria; but he did not like them, and uſed to come from their lectures very much diſſatisfied. One of his friends knowing the reaſon of his diſtaſte, thought that the beſt remedy for it was to carry him to the lectures of Ammonius. He gueſſed right; for as ſoon as Plotinus heard that Philoſopher, he confeſſed to his friend that he was the man he wanted. He was a eleven years under that excellent maſter, and became a great Philoſopher. But the great learning he had acquired, inſpired him with an eager deſire of encreaſing it, and of knowing what the Perſian and Indian Philoſophers ſaid. He took hold of an occaſion which offered itſelf, when the emperor Gordian went to make war againſt the Perſians (c): he followed the Roman army, and repented of it without doubt; for he had much ado to ſave himſelf by flight, when the emperor was killed. He was then thirty-nine years of age. The next year he came to Rome, and read lectures of Philoſophy there. It is true, that he taught what he had heard of his maſter Ammonius; but he imitated not Erennius and Origen his ſchool-fellows, who having promiſed, as well as he, not to impart to the public the beſt things they had learned of Ammonius, kept not their promiſe. As for him, he was ten years at Rome without compoſing any book, and when he had compoſed twenty, he communicated them only to ſuch perſons, whoſe judgment was known to him. He was in the fiftieth year of his age, when Porphyrius became his diſciple. Such a diſciple was employment enough for him. Prophyrius did not reſt ſatisfied with ſuperficial anſwers; he would have all difficulties to be throughly explained to him: Plotinus was therefore obliged to write ſome books, that he might treat his ſubjects more exactly [C]. He compoſed twenty-four books during the ſpace of ſix years that Porphyrius was with him, and thoſe twenty-four together with twenty-one which he had compoſed before the arrival of Porphyrius, and together with the nine which he writ after his diſciple had left Rome, make up in all fifty-four books. They are divided into ſix Enneades, and run upon very abſtruſe matters [D]. One may obſerve in them three different ages of the mind of their

(b) Κοιλιακῇ δὲ νόσῳ πολλάκις καταπονούμενος ὕστε κλυσῆρος ἐνίσχετο, οὐκ εἶναι πρὸς τοῦ πρεσβυτέρου λέγων ὑπομένειν τὰς τοιαύτας θεραπείας. Proinde cum ſæpe colico vexaretur morbo, ſemper clyſteres renuit, negans decere ſenem curationes ejuſmodi. Porphyr. in Vita Plotini, pag. 1, inſtead of colico, the tranſlator ſhould have ſaid cœliaco.

(c) In the year 243.

So vain, ſo falſe, and ſo unjuſt we are
That we the weakneſſes of others blame,
And nor their paſſions, nor their vices ſpare,
Though we are hourly guilty of the ſame.

This does very much ſet off the victory which Plotinus got over ſo general a weakneſs; and all true Philoſophers ought to rejoice that ſo noble a triumph was reſerved for one of their great heroes. It is true, that Plotinus's picture was drawn, but he knew nothing of it: Amelius brought an excellent Painter into the auditory. That painter looked upon Plotinus as long as he would, and drew him after the image he had drawn of him in his head: the picture was very like, Amelius took care that all the ſtrokes that wanted mending, ſhould be corrected (4). Here is another triumph of Plotinus. He would never tell the day nor the month wherein he was born (5). The reaſon of it was, that he did not deſire that the day of his birth ſhould be celebrated with feaſts and ſacrifices. He did not fail to celebrate in that manner the birth-day of Socrates, and that of Plato (6). Was not this deſpiſing immortal fame?

(4) Idem, Porphyr. ibid. pag. 2, C.

(5) See Porphyr. in the Life of Plotinus.

(6) See the ſame Life.

A SIGN of a cocquet.

Not knowing whether I ſhall find a better opportunity to make uſe of a remark which I have read in the Furetieriana, I ſhall ſet it down here. 'One 'may eaſily know women that are cocquets by their 'dreſs, the company they keep at home, their ſervants, and their way of ſpeaking; but they may be 'known alſo by the ſeveral copies of their pictures 'which they cauſe to be made. One of thoſe women, 'who had been drawn by Mrs le Hay, cauſed five 'copies of her picture to be made. Good Lord, ſaid 'a gentleman, why does that woman get ſo many 'pictures drawn? Mrs le Hay anſwered him pleaſantly, Quoniam multiplicatæ ſunt iniquitates ejus '(7), ... becauſe her ſins are multiplied.'

(7) Furetieriana, pag. 171, of the Dutch Edit.

[B] He refuſed to make uſe of ſeveral things which were looked upon as conducive to health.] He never made uſe of any preſervative, nor of the bath, and did not ſo much as eat of the fleſh of tamed beaſts. Οὔτε τὰς θηριακὰς ἀνίδοτους λαβεῖν ὑπέμεινε. μὴ δὲ τῶν ἡμέρων ζώων τὰς ἐκ τῶ σώματ῀ τροφὰς προσίεσθαι λέγων. λιβρῶ δὲ ἀπεχόμεν῀. Neque theriaca antidota unquam accepit, cum nec ex animalium quoque manſuetorum corporibus capere eſcam ſe diceret. Abſtinebat & balneis (8). He eat little, and abſtained very often from bread, which together with his ſtrong meditations kept him from ſleeping much (9).

(8) Porphyr. ibid. pag. 1.

(9) Ibid. pag. 6, ſub fin.

[C] Plotinus was obliged to write ſome books, that he might treat his ſubjects more exactly.] It is almoſt impoſſible to determine any queſtion by meer conferences or verbal diſputes. Both ſides may eaſily go off from the queſtion, and the beginning may be forgotten before one comes to the end. Therefore I do not wonder, that Prophyrius reduced his maſter to the neceſſity of explaining himſelf in writing. Plotinus owned, that it was the beſt way to inſtruct a diſciple thoroughly; but he found it alſo very neceſſary to hear objections, and exerciſe himſelf by way of conference, before he took pen in hand. This is what he anſwered to a man, who complained of Pophyrius's frequent interrogations and replies. 'Niſi dubitationes interrogante 'Porphyrio diſſolvamus, commentari oratione perpe-'tua quicquam in librum non valebimus (10). - - - - (10) Ibid.
'Without firſt reſolving the doubts which Porphyrius 'ſtarts to me, I ſhould find it impoſſible to write a con-'tinued diſſertation in the form of a book.' He diſputed three days together about the doubts which Porphyrius propoſed to him, concerning the manner how our ſouls are united to our bodies.

[D] His works are divided into ſix Enneades, and run upon very abſtruſe matters.] The order, diviſion, and titles, of Plotinus's works, are to be aſcribed to Porphyrius. They concern moſt of them the ſubtileſt notions of metaphyſics, and it ſeems that this Philoſopher differed not much from Spinoza in ſome things. There is ſcarce any age wherein the doctrine of Spinoza has not been taught. That impious man has only the unhappy advantage of being the firſt, who reduced it into a ſyſtem according to a Geometrical method. What did Plotinus mean, when he wrote two books,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

their author [E]. His way of compoſing did very much ſavour of his great ſingularity [F], and therefore a faithful friend was very neceſſary to him to reviſe his writings. He choſe Porphyrius to do it, rather than Gentilianus Amelius, who had been his diſciple twenty-four years, and whom he very much eſteemed, as we have ſeen in another place (d). The eſteem which the Romans had for Plotinus is incredible. He had ſome diſciples in the very ſenate; and ſome ſenators, not contented to go regularly to his auditory, reſigned the magiſtracy to live a Philoſophical life. He inſpired ſome perſons of the fair ſex with a ſtrong inclination for the ſtudy of Philoſophy. A lady (e) would have him to lodge in her houſe, and ſhe, as well as her daughter, took great delight in hearing him. He had the reputation of being ſo learned and virtuous a man, that ſeveral perſons of both ſexes, intruſted him, before they died, with their eſtates and children, ſons and daughters, as if he had been a kind of guardian angel (f). He never refuſed that trouble. He had often the patience to be preſent when guardians gave up their accounts. He was the arbitrator of a thouſand law-ſuits, with ſo much equity and honeſty, that he did not get himſelf one enemy for the ſpace of twenty-ſix years that he lived in Rome. Thoſe of his profeſſion proved not all ſo juſt to him; for a Philoſopher of Alexandria (g), who affected the firſt rank, did his utmoſt to expoſe him to contempt, and even made uſe of magic to deſtroy him. I ſhall mention in the remarks by what means it was pretended that the magical operations of that man were rendered ineffectual [G], and occaſionally I ſhall ſay ſomething of Plotinus's familiar ſpirit, and (d) In the article AMELIUS.

(e) She and her daughter were named Gemina.

(f) Πολλοὶ δὲ καὶ ἄνδρες καὶ γυναῖκες ἀποθνήσκειν μέλλοντες τῶν εὐγενεστάτων φέροντες τὰ ἑαυτῶν τέκνα ἀβρυνάς τε δόμοῦ καὶ θελείας, ἐκεῖνῳ παραδίδοσαν μετὰ τῆς ἄλλης οὐσίας, ὡς ἱερῷ τινι καὶ θείῳ φύλακι. Multi quinetiam viri multæ & mulieres generis nobilitate pollentes cum morti jam propinquarent, filios ſuos tum mares tum fœminas una cum omni eorum ſubſtantia Plotino tanquam ſacro cuidam divinoque cuſtodi tradebant atque commendabant. Porphyr. ibid.

(g) His name was Olympius.

books to prove, Unum & idem ubique totum ſimul adeſſe (11)? Did he not teach thereby, that the Being which is every where, is one and the ſame thing? Spinoza deſires no more. Plotinus examines in another book, whether there are ſeveral ſouls, or one only: Utrum omnes animæ una ſint. He applied himſelf very much to the ſtudy of ideas; he wrote a book to examine whether there are any ideas of ſingular things, and another, wherein he proved, that intellectual objects are not out of our underſtanding, ὅτι οὐκ ἔξω τοῦ νοῦ τὰ νοητὰ, quod intelligibilia non ſint extra intellectum.

(11) Τὸ ὂν πανταχοῦ ὅλον εἶναι ἓν καὶ ταυτόν. Porphyr. pag. 4, C.

[E] One may obſerve in them three different ages of the mind of their author.] The firſt and laſt books he wrote are much inferior to the others. One may perceive in the firſt a ſtrength that is not come yet to it's full growth, and in the laſt, a ſtrength which began to decay; but one may ſee in the middle writings, a ſtrength that was come to its higheſt degree. Thus we have here three orders of books, twenty one in the firſt, twenty four in the ſecond, and nine in the laſt. Of thoſe nine, the five firſt were leſs weak than the other four; ſo true it is, generally ſpeaking, that the mind undergoes the ſame viciſſitudes with the body: the age of an author may be almoſt as eaſily known by the ſtrokes of his pen, as by the features of his face (12). Here are Prophyrius's words according to the Latin tranſlation. Quemadmodum verò conſcripti ſunt alii quidem in ætate prima, alii verò in ipſo vigore vitæ, alii denique defeſſo jam corpore; ſic ferme libri vim ſimilem ipſi declarant. Primi namque unus atque viginti, ſi cum proximè ſequentibus conferantur, leviorem vim habere videntur, nondum ſatis conſtans robur habentem. Qui vero medio tempore compoſiti ſunt, virtutis florem præferunt ad ſummum uſque vigentem, Taleſque ſunt quatuor & viginti (exceptis quibuſdam paucis) perfectiſſimi. Ultimi denique novem remiſſiorem jam referunt facultatem; idque poſtremi quatuor magis quam antecedentes quinque declarant. This tranſlation was made by Marſilius Ficinus. That learned man had no ſooner ended the tranſlation of Plato's works, but he was told by John Picus, Earl of Mirandula, that Coſmo de Medicis deſired to have Plotinus tranſlated. Marſilius knew nothing of it, becauſe Coſmo would not ask him the verſion of thoſe two authors at one time, and thought it more reaſonable to let him know his deſire, when he had finiſhed the tranſlation of Plato. Marſilius undertook that new work, and made an end of it. He has not only tranſlated Plotinus, but he has alſo made ſummaries and analyſes upon each book (13). This is what goes by the name of Marſilius Ficinus's commentaries. That word is fallacious on this occaſion; for one would expect ſome critical notes upon the Greek text, and ſome explications of the difficult paſſages and intricate thoughts of the author: this is what is meant by a commentary. But the ſignification of that word is quite different here. I thought myſelf obliged not to leave my reader in the obſcurity of that equivocation, as Moreri has done.

(12) Mr Baillet, in the firſt Tome of the Jugemens des Sçavans, pag. 381, has many curious things about this.

(13) His Latin tranſlation, and his commentaries, were reprinted without the Greek, at Baſil 1559, fol.

[F] His way of compoſing did very much ſavour of his great ſingularity.] He never read over again what he had compoſed; he formed his letters very ill, and diſtinguiſhed not his ſyllables; his orthography was not at all exact; he was only attentive to things, and thoughts; and perſiſted as long as he lived in the ſame courſe. But here is a very admirable thing. His meditation was ſo ſtrong, that he placed in his head a whole work from the beginning to the end, and followed ſo exactly what he had meditated, that he made no manner of alteration in it in writing. One would have thought, that the inward original of his work was the rule of his pen, with the ſame punctuality as a written original is the rule of a copyiſt. He never loſt the ſight of his meditation, when he was interrupted for ſome buſineſs: he took cognizance of that affair, and examined and ended it without leaving off the ideas of his work; ſo that after the departure of thoſe who had interrupted him, he needed not read the laſt lines of his writing, to know where he was, and reſume the ſeries of his thoughts. His ideas had been all along preſent to his mind; therefore he uſed to write on without looking upon his paper for the place where he ſtopt, and made the connexions as well as if he had not ſtirred out of his place (14).

(14) See Porphyr. ubi ſupra.

[G] I ſhall mention how the magical operations of that man were rendered ineffectual.] He found by experience that his enchantments returned upon himſelf, which obliged him to confeſs to his friends, that Plotinus had a ſoul endowed with an extraordinary force, ſeeing it retorted upon it's enemies the darts which they ſhot at it. What is moſt admirable, is, that Plotinus perceived the magical devices contrived againſt him, and the effect which they produced upon the author of them. At this very moment, ſaid he to his friends, the body of Olympius is folded as a purſe, and his members bruiſe one another. Porphyrius, who relates this as a certain fact, endeavours to confirm it by this ſuppoſition: he ſays that Plotinus was under the protection of a genius ſuperior to that of other men, and that his genius was none of thoſe who are called dæmons, but of thoſe who are called gods. He tells us, that an Egyptian prieſt conjured up, in the temple of Iſis at Rome, the familiar ſpirit of Plotinus, in the very preſence of Plotinus and that he perceived that the ſpirit who preſented himſelf was a god, and not a meer dæmon; that immediately he congratulated Plotinus upon that excellent prerogative (15); that he prepared himſelf to aſk that ſpirit ſome queſtions, but he vaniſhed away preſently, becauſe a common friend of theirs, who was brought to the ſpectacle, ſtifled the birds that were given him to keep. Plotinus knowing that his familiar ſpirit was of ſo eminent an order, directed with greater application the ſight of his underſtanding towards him. He even compoſed a book concerning familiar ſpirits, in which he carefully enquired into the cauſes of their differences. I obſerve all theſe things for two reaſons: Firſt, that one may ſee here a ſmall pattern of the Platonic doctrine concerning Genius's. Secondly, that one may know that the doctrine of guardian-angels, ſo much ſpoken of in the church of Rome, and which is a practical doctrine, and attended with all the train of religious worſhip,

Of Plotinus's familiar ſpirit.

(15) Μακάριος εἶ θεὸν ἔχων τὸν δαίμονα καὶ οὐ τοῦ ὑφειμένου γένους τὸν συνόντα. Beatus es, ô Plotine, qui habeas pro Dæmone Deum, neque ex inferiori genere ſis ducem ſortitus familiarem. Porphyr. ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

and of the ſurpriſing ſagacity which is aſcribed to him [H]. The emperor Gallienus and the empreſs Salonina had a very great reſpect for him; and had it not been for the oppoſition of ſome jealous and malicious courtiers, he would have obtained what he demanded, viz. that a town of Campania (b) ſhould be rebuilt, and yielded up to him with its whole territory. He deſigned to ſettle there a colony of Philoſophers, and to put into practice the ideal laws of Plato's republic. Some envious men accuſed him of having inriched himſelf with the thoughts of Numenius: but Amelius took pen in hand to refute that accuſation. Longinus, who ſuffered himſelf to be pre-poſſeſſed againſt that great Philoſopher, did afterwards value his writings very much, though he confeſſes that he found ſome very obſcure things in them [I]. He wrote againſt his treatiſe of ideas, and againſt Porphyrius's anſwer in defence of that treatiſe. Plotinus had ſeveral illneſſes in the laſt year of his life, an inflammation in his throat, which made him ſo hoarſe, that he could hardly ſpeak, ulcers in his hands and feet, and a great weakneſs of ſight. When he found himſelf in that condition, he left Rome, and went into Campania, to one of his friends heirs, who furniſhed him with all neceſſaries; and he had the comfort to find, that Caſtricius (i), whoſe eſtate was in the neighbourhood, did let him want nothing. He died as nobly as a Heathen Philoſopher could do; for theſe were his dying words, I uſe my utmoſt endeavours to return that which is Divine in me, to that which is ſo in the univerſe (k). He died in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age, the third of the emperor Claudius II, that is in the 270th year of the Chriſtian Æra. There was very good news of the ſtate of his ſoul [K]. Amelius, who had the curioſity to conſult the oracle of Apollo, received it, and imparted it to his friends (l).

(b) It was to be called Platonopolis.

(i) He was one of his diſciples.

(k) Φήσας πειρᾶσθαι τὸ ἐν ἡμῖν θεῖον ἀνάγειν πρὸς τὸ ἐν τῷ παντὶ θεῖον . . . . ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα. Equidem jam annitor, quod in nobis divinum eſt ad divinum ipſum quod viget in univerſo redigere, ſpiritumque his verbis emiſit. Porphyr. in Vita Plot.

(l) Taken from Plotinus's Life written by Porphyrius.

is much ancienter than the Chriſtian religion. There is no ſyſtem more proper to ſet up the doctrine of the Platoniſts duly rectified, than that of occaſional cauſes. I do not know what will happen; but I am apt to think that, ſome time or other, Philoſophers will be forced to lay aſide mechanical principles, unleſs the wills of ſome intelligent beings be aſſociated with them; and truly there is no hypotheſis more capable of giving an account of events, than that which admits of ſuch an aſſociation. I mean chiefly ſuch events as go by the names of caſuality, fortune, good luck, ill luck; things, the cauſes whereof are, without doubt, regulated and determined by ſome general laws unknown to us, but which probably are only occaſional cauſes, like thoſe which cauſe our ſouls to act upon our bodies. See Mr Dodwell's learned diſſertation upon the genius, or fortune, of the emperors (16). To return to Plotinus, I ſhall obſerve, that the ſuperiority of his tutelar genius filled him with an extreme confidence. Amelius deſiring him to aſſiſt at his devotions, I mean, at the ſacrifices he offered upon a ſolemn day: Plotinus anſwered, They ought to come to me, but I ought not to go them. No body could apprehend, nor durſt aſk him the reaſon of ſo proud an anſwer. Ἐκείνης δεῖ πρὸς ἐμὲ ἔρχεσθαι ἂκ ἐμὲ πρὸς ἐκείνης. τοῦτο δὲ ἐκ ποίας διανοίας ὕστως ἐμεγαληγόρησεν ὅτ' αὐτοὶ συνεῖναι δεδυνήμεθα, ὅτ' αὐτὸν ἐρέσθαι ἐτολμήσαμεν. Illos decet ad me, non me ad illos accedere. Qua vero mente tam excelſa de ſe loqueretur neque intelligere ipſi potuimus, neque auſi ſumus interrogare (17). Did ever any body hear of ſuch a bold Theology?

(16) Prælect. II, ad Spartiani Hadrianum, pag. 374, & ſeq.

(17) Porphyr. ibid.

[H] I ſhall occaſionally ſay ſomething of the ſurprizing ſagacity which is aſcribed to Plotinus.] A very honeſt widow (18), who lived in his houſe with her children, had loſt a necklace; Plotinus called for all the ſervants, and having well conſidered them, there is he that ſtole the necklace, ſaid he, pointing at one of them. The ſervant denied the fact, notwithſtanding the laſhes that were given him; but at laſt he confeſſed it, and reſtored what he had ſtolen. Plotinus foretold the fate of his ſcholars very well; he ſaid that Polemo would be a man of an amorous temper, and would not live long. Thoſe two things happened as he foretold them. Pophyrius had reſolved to kill himſelf; Plotinus gueſſed it, and went immediately to him, and diſſuaded him from it (19). As for the reſt, tho' Plotinus had very much ſtudied Aſtrology, he minded not it's predictions (20), but perceived the vanity of them, and refuted Aſtrologers very often.

(18) Her name was Chione.

(19) Porphyr. pag. 8.

(20) Ib. p. 10.

[I] Longinus confeſſes that he found very obſcure things in them.] He was very deſirous to have all the books of Plotinus; and to have them correct, he deſired Porphyrius to ſend him his copy; but at the ſame time he wrote to him theſe following words: 'Hoc equidem tibi tum præſenti, tum procul abſenti, tum habitanti Tyrum ſemper ſignificavi, me ſcilicet non multa admodum Plotini librorum argumenta capere: ipſam vero ſcribendi formam intelligentiarumque frequentiam & queſtionum diſpoſitionem admodum philoſophicam me amare ſupra modum atque venerari (21). - - - - I have always told you, both (21) Ibid. when you were preſent, and when you were abſent, eſpecially while you lived at Tyre, that I underſtood but very few of the ſubjects which Plotinus treats of in his books: but that I greatly liked and admired his way of writing, the variety of his knowledge, and the order of his queſtions, which is entirely Philoſophical.' This paſſage alone ſufficiently ſhews the exquiſite judgment and penetration of Longinus. It cannot be denied, that moſt of the things that Philoſopher examines, are incomprehenſible; nevertheleſs we ſee in his works a ſublime, fruitful, and vaſt genius, and a cloſe method of reaſoning. If Longinus had been a falſe Critic, and a man of no great parts, he would not have ſo eaſily diſcovered Plotinus's obſcurity. This is no paradox. There are none who complain leſs of the obſcurity of a book, than thoſe whoſe thoughts are confuſed, and whoſe penetration is ſhallow.

[K] There was very good news of the ſtate of his ſoul.] Apollo was ſo warmed with a poetical rapture, when Amelius conſulted him concerning the ſtate of his dead maſter, that his anſwer contained fifty verſes. Porphyrius gives us this expoſition of it. Apollo declared that Plotinus had been peaceable, gracious, and vigilant; that he continually elevated his pure ſoul towards God; that he loved God with all his heart; that he diſengaged himſelf from this miſerable world, as much as poſſibly he could; and that lifting up his ſoul with all his might, by the ſeveral degrees mentioned by Plato, to the ſupreme Deity, who ſurpaſſes all underſtanding, he had been enlightened by him, and enjoyed the viſion of that ſupreme Being, not by the help of ideas, but as he is in himſelf, and according to that nature, which is beyond all comprehenſion. Ἐφάνη ἐκεῖνος ὁ μήτε μορφὴν μήτε τινα ἰδέαν ἔχων, ὑπερ δὲ νῦν καὶ πᾶν τὸ νοητὸν ἱδρυμένος. Ipſi Plotinus coruſcavit Deus ille nec formam nec ideam aliquam habens, ſed ſuper intellectum univerſumque intelligibile in ſe ipſo conſiſtens (22). Porphyrius ſtops (22) Ibid. here to tell us, that in his ſixty-eighth year he was once honoured with that viſion; that the end to which Plotinus directed all his thoughts, was to unite himſelf with that great God, who fills the univerſe, and that he obtained that end four times, not in power only, but by an ineffable efficacy, during the ſpace of ſix years that he (Porphyrius) had kept company with him. Τέλος γὰρ αὐτῷ καὶ σκοπὸς ἦν, τὸ ἑνωθῆναι καὶ πελάσαι τῷ ἐπὶ πᾶσι θεῷ. ἔτυχε δὲ τετράκις τε ὅτε συνήμεν αὐτῷ τῷ σκοπῷ τότε, ἐνεργείᾳ ἀῤῥήτῳ, καὶ ὐ δυνάμει. Finis namque Plotino ſignumque erat quò aciem mentis intenderet propinquare conjungique ipſi Deo omnibus ubique præſenti: quater autem dum cum ipſo verſarer hunc finem eſt aſſecutus, non potentia duntaxat, inquam, ſed actu quodam ineffabili conſecutus (23). Have we not here the unitive way ſo (23) Ibid. much ſpoken of by the Myſtics? May not one ſay, that they took it from the Platoniſts? Do not we ſee likewiſe in this place the ſeeds of Quietiſm? But to return to the Oracle: Plotinus had this advantage, that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that when he was in the wrong, the gods undeceived him and enlightened him, ſo that it might be ſaid, that he wrote his books by the rays of that celeſtial light which illuminated his mind. Thus much for what concerns this life. After his death, he went to the aſſembly of the bleſſed, where charity, joy, and the love of union with GOD reign; he was with the three judges of the other world, Minos, Rhadamanthus, Æacus, not only to give an account of his actions, but to converſe with them, and with the other gods who viſit them: in a word, he enjoyed the life of the bleſſed. I make no excuſe for the length of theſe remarks. I ſuppoſe no body will be diſpleaſed to find in this place, not only what concerns the perſon of Plotinus, but alſo what concerns his opinions, ſo far as a general notion requires it.

PLOTINA (POMPEIA) the wife of the emperor Trajan, is mightily praiſed by ſome writers. She was not handſome, and it appears by her medals, that ſhe had more gravity than charms in her face (a); but ſhe was very prudent and modeſt. Trajan married her before he was adopted by Nerva [A]. What ſhe ſaid, when ſhe firſt entered into the emperor's palace, is very remarkable: going up the ſtairs, ſhe turned to the people, and ſaid, ſhe came in, juſt ſuch, as ſhe deſired to go out (b) [B]. Her conduct was ſuch, during the time ſhe reigned, that no complaints were made of her (c). She refuſed the title of Auguſta, ſo long as her huſband refuſed that of Pater Patriæ, father of his country (d). The advices ſhe gave Trajan proved wonderfully advantageous to the provinces, ſince a great many exactions and diſorders were by that means redreſſed (e). The friendſhip between her and Marciana, Trajan's ſiſter, is no inconſiderable ſign of her wiſdom and good temper; for generally there is nothing but quarrels and factions between the wives and ſiſters of princes [C]. She was with Trajan when he died at Selinuntus in Cilicia, the 117th year of CHRIST, and ſhe carried her huſband's aſhes to Rome, being accompanied by Tatian, and Matidia Trajan's niece (f). She did many good offices to Hadrian [D], and procured him the empire. The world was always ſo full of ſlanderers, that Plotina's modeſty, and ſo many other great and good qualities which eminently appeared in her [E], could not preſerve her from ſome ill

(a) Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. Tom. 1, p. 428.

(b) Xiphilin. in Trajan.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Plin. in Panegyr.

(e) Aurel. Victor. Epit. in Juliano.

(f) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. v, pag. m. 51.

[A] Trajan married her before he was adopted by Nerva.] This appears by theſe words of Pliny's panegyric. 'Idem eſtis invicem, ſays he to Trajan, quod 'fuiſtis, probatis ex æquo, nihilque vobis felicitas 'addidit, niſi quod ſcire cœpiſtis quam bene uterque 'veſtrum felicitatem ferat. - - - - You are the ſame to 'each other that you were, alike well-ſatisfied, and proſ-'perity adds nothing to you, unleſs it be an opportunity of 'knowing how well you both bear proſperity.' And a little after, ſpeaking of Plotina and Marciana, he takes notice, that they lived in the emperor's palace with the ſame modeſty, as if they had been ſtill in a private condition. 'Neque enim unquam periclita-'buntur eſſe privatæ, quæ non deſierunt. - - - - For 'they are in no danger of being reduced to the ſtate of pri-'vate women, who have not ceaſed to behave as 'ſuch.'

[B] She came into the palace, juſt ſuch, as ſhe deſired to go out.] Moreri has ſpoiled this thought of Plotina; he ſays, that ſhe proteſted, when ſhe entered firſt into the palace, that ſhe was ready to go out of it whenever it ſhould be required. This was not her meaning: ſhe deſired that the grandeur of her fortune might not change her manners, and that when ſhe ſhould be obliged to quit her poſt, ſhe might find in herſelf the ſame diſpoſition and moderation, which ſhe had when ſhe took poſſeſſion of the imperial palace. This wiſh is worthy of a great ſoul, and reſpects an hapaineſs which ſeldom happens, Honores mutant mores. - - - - Honours change the manners.

[C] Generally there is nothing but quarrels and factions between the wives and ſiſters of princes.] Let us hear what Trajan's panegyriſt ſays about it. 'Nihil eſt tam 'pronum ad ſimultates quam æmulatio, in feminis 'preſertim: ea porro maxime naſcitur ex conjunctione, 'alitur æqualitate, exardeſcit invidia, cujus finis eſt 'odium. Quo quidem admirabilius exiſtimandum eſt 'quod mulieribus duabus in una domo, parique for-'tuna, nullum certamen, nulla contentio eſt: ſuſpici-'unt invicem, invicem cedunt, quumque te utraque 'effuſiſſimè diligat, nihil ſua putat intereſſe utram tu 'magis ames; idemque utrique propoſitum, idem te-'nor vitæ, nihilque ex quo ſentias duas eſſe. - - - - - - 'Nothing is ſo ready to beget feuds as emulation, eſpecially 'in women: Now this emulation which chiefly ariſes 'from their nearneſs to one another, is kept up by their 'equality, and gathers ſtrength from envy, which always 'terminates in hatred. For which reaſon it is the more 'admirable that there ſhould be no ſtrife nor animoſity be-'tween two women living together in the ſame houſe, and 'both of the ſame rank: they mutually eſteem and pleaſe 'one another, and while both love you to the higheſt 'degree, neither thinks herſelf concerned which of them 'has the greateſt ſhare of your affection. Their views 'and courſe of life are preciſely the ſame, and there is not 'any thing by which you can diſtinguiſh them to be two 'different women.' No better notion can be given of the merit of two princeſſes. Pliny knew admirably well how to deſcribe characters, and had reaſon to think that this concord was a happineſs, for which he ought to compliment Trajan; for princes are generally unhappy at home, however happy they may be abroad, if they have a mother, a wife, a ſiſter, a mother-in-law, a daughter, a daughter-in-law, &c. under the ſame roof: they will give them more trouble than the government of their ſtates, nay, half this number, or one third of it will do it. But when I conſider, that ſome panegyriſts, now a-days, repreſent princeſſes not as they were, but as they ſhould have been, according to the ſublime ideas of an Orator, I ſay, when I conſider this, I am apt to think that Pliny went beyond the truth.

[D] She did many good offices to Hadrian.] It was ſhe who got him married to Trajan's grand-niece (1), and procured him a government in the time of the expedition againſt the Parthians (2), afterwards the ſecond conſulſhip (3), and at laſt the empire (4).

(1) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. ii, pag. 23.

(2) Ib. cap. iv, pag. 38.

(3) Ib. p. 40.

(4) Ib. p. 46.

[E] The great and good qualities which eminently appeared in her.] Pliny oppoſes, as often as he can, the perfections of Trajan to the imperfections of other princes. He doth not forget marriage, and ſays, that many illuſtrious men have diſhonoured themſelves upon that account; but as for Trajan, it was one of the moſt glorious paſſages of his life. 'Multis illuſtribus 'dedecori fuit aut inconſultius uxor aſſumpta, aut re-'tenta patientius, ita foris claros domeſtica deſtruebat 'infamia (5), & ne maximi cives haberentur hoc effi-'ciebat quod mariti minores erant. Tibi uxor in de-'cus & gloriam cedit. Quid enim illa ſanctius? Quid 'antiquius? Nonne ſi Pontifici Maximo deligenda ſit 'conjunx, aut hanc, aut ſimilem (ubi eſt autem ſimilis) 'elegerit? Quam illa nihil ſibi ex fortuna tua niſi gau-'dium vendicat? Quam conſtanter non potentiam 'tuam, ſed ipſum te reveretur? - - - - - Eadem quam 'modicè cultu, quàm parca comitatu, quàm civilis in-'ceſſu! - - - - Many illuſtrious men have got diſhonour to 'themſelves by marrying fooliſhly, or by living too patient-'ly with a bad wife, and thus while they were high in 'reputation abroad, domeſtic ſhame ruined their characters 'at home, and their being weak huſbands hindered their 'being eſteemed very great citizens. To you, Sir, your 'wife is an honour and glory. For what can be more 'virtuous? What more nobly deſcended? Would not the 'High Prieſt, if he were to chuſe a conſort, pitch upon 'her, or one like her? (but where indeed could he find ſuch 'a one?) Is not the joy which ſhe takes in your good for-'tune all the portion that ſhe requires to herſelf? How 'ſteadily is ſhe attached to your perſon, without regard-'ing your power? . . . . At the ſame time how modeſt 'is

(5) Compare with this what Tacitus ſays, chap. xxiv, of the third book of his annals, Ut valida divo Auguſto in Remp. fortuna, ita domi improſpera fuit ob impudicitiam filiæ ac neptis quas urbe depulit. See in the article LEWIS VII, citation (5), and the article HELOISA, remark [G].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ill ſuſpicions. It was thought that ſhe was in love with Hadrian [F], and all his great preferments were aſcribed to that paſſion. Some maintain that Trajan did not adopt him [G], but that Plotina concealed his death, and made ſome body imitate a languiſhing voice, that it might be thought that Hadrian was declared ſon and ſucceſſor to that prince. It does not appear that ſhe ever had any children. When ſhe died, Hadrian, who always appeared very thankful for her favours [H], expreſſed an extraordinary grief. He put on mourning for nine days, he made ſome hymns for her, built her a temple (g), and placed her amongſt the goddeſſes (b). He had already built her a palace at Nimes (i). We know nothing of Plotina's family or birth-place; and it is very ſtrange that the Hiſtorians of thoſe times ſhould be ſo negligent, as to take no notice of them. Neither, have they mentioned the time of her death. Mr de Tillemont (k) fancies he has found ſomething in Dion, from which one may conclude, that ſhe died in the year 129; but I would adviſe no body to believe it, till he ſhews for what reaſon he pretends to draw this concluſion. Moreri cannot prove what he ſays, that Plotina died in the year 122. What he adds of Hadrian's building her a temple, a palace, and an amphitheatre at Nimes, cannot be more eaſily proved. Spartian ſpeaks only of a Baſilica (l), without taking any notice whether Plotina was then alive or no.

(g) Xiphilin. in Adriano.

(b) There are ſome inſcriptions in Gruterus's Theſaurus, where mention is made of the prieſts of the goddeſs Plotina, Sacerdos Divæ Plotinæ. See Triſtan's Comment. Tom. i, pag. 430.

(i) Spartian. in Adrian. cap. xii, pag. m. 110.

(k) Hiſt. des Empereurs, in the Life of Hadrian, pag. m. 426.

(l) Per idem tempus in honorem Plotinæ Baſilicam apud Nemauſum egere mirabili celeritate. Spart. ibid.

' is her dreſs, how ſmall her train, how courteous her ' deportment!' In one of his letters (6), he calls her a moſt holy wife. ' Injungis mihi jucundiſſimum mini- ' ſterium, ut ad Plotinam ſanctiſſimam fœminam literæ ' tuæ perferantur. - - - - You put me upon a very agree- ' able office, when you charge me with the conveyance of ' your letter to Plotina, that moſt holy woman.'

(6) The 28th of the 9th book.

[F] It was thought that ſhe was in love with Hadrian.] Dion does plainly ſay ſo. Ἐξ ἐρωτικῆς φιλίας, from the paſſion of love, ſays he in one place, and in another, ἐρασης αὐτῷ διαφερόντως, greatly in love with him. See how malicious the world is: a woman cannot ſhew her affection to a man, and endeavour to load him with honours and riches, but they conclude ſhe loves him criminally. The difference of age is ſo far from ſilencing the ſatiriſts, that it rather provokes them. They pretend, that when a woman is in her decay, a grand-mother, if you will, her eagerneſs to raiſe a young man, is a more certain ſign of a criminal commerce, than if ſhe was but twenty. She would not expreſs ſo much affection in her old days, will a ſatiriſt ſay, if ſhe did not think herſelf obliged to pay for the nights, which her galant might have ſpent more agreeably elſewhere; ſhe would not be ſo forward to ſerve and recommend a man, and lay out money for him, if ſhe did not deſire that the ſport ſhould continue. In a word, he thinks of theſe verſes of Juvenal:

Cum te ſummoveant qui teſtamenta merentur
Noctibus, in cœlum quos evehit optima ſummi
Nunc via proceſſus, vetulæ veſica beatæ (7).

When night-performance holds the place of merit,
And brawn and back the next of kin diſherit;
For ſuch good parts are in preferments way,
The rich old madam never fails to pay
Her legacies. DRYDEN.

(7) Juven. Sat. I, ver. 37.

[G] Some maintain, that Trajan did not adopt him.] Dion (8) ſays, that Apronian, his father, who was governor of Cilicia, told him, that the death of Trajan was concealed for ſome days, that the intrigue of the adoption might the better ſucceed; and that the thing was known by the letter of that prince to the ſenate, which was not ſigned by him, but by Plotina, a thing that had never happened before. See how Mr Dodwell refutes Dion in his learned lectures upon Spartian (9). As for the reſt, Dion is not the only author who ſaid this. ' Nec deſunt, ſays another, qui factione ' Plotinæ mortuo jam Trajano Adrianum in adoptio- ' nem adſcitum eſſe prodiderint, ſuppoſito qui pro Tra- ' jano feſſa voce loqueretur (10). - - - - There are not ' wanting ſome who have given out, that Hadrian was ' adopted, after Trajan's death, by the intrigues of Plo- ' tina, who ſuborned another perſon to ſpeak for Trajan, ' in a languiſhing voice.' How difficult is it to confute a probable ſlander!

(8) In Adriano, init.

(9) Pag. 538.

(10) Spartian. cap. vi, p. 431.

[H] Hadrian always appeared very thankful for her favours.] Triſtan (11) ſays, that Hadrian left great legacies to Plotina by his will, if he ſhould die firſt, which I learn, ſays he, from the law, Si Auguſtæ legaveris, ff. de legat. & fideicommiſſ. lib. 2. which thus relates this matter. ' Si Auguſtæ legaveris, & ea inter homi- ' nes eſſe deſierit? deficit quod ei relictum eſt, ſicuti ' divus Hadrianus in Plotina, & proxime imperator An- ' toninus in Fauſtinæ Auguſtæ perſona conſtituit, cum ' ea ante inter homines eſſe deſiiſſet quàm teſtator de- ' cederet. - - - - If you ſhall bequeath any legacy to Au- ' guſta, and ſhe die, that part of the will is void, as ' Hadrian ordained, with reſpect to Plotina, and in late ' times the Emperor Antoninus, with reſpect to Fauſtina ' Auguſta, ſhe having died before the teſtator.'

(11) Comment. Hiſt. Tom. i, pag. 430.

POINET (JOHN) biſhop of Rocheſter, and afterwards of Wincheſter, in the XVIth century [A], was zealouſly attached to the Reformation under the reign of Edward VI, and compoſed among other books a treatiſe on the marriage of prieſts, and an apology for that treatiſe (a). He was forced to leave his country in the reign of queen Mary, and retired to Straſbourg, where he died aged about forty years on the eleventh of April 1556 (b). He compoſed a book there, which was printed in the year 1557 with this title, Diallacticon viri boni & literati de veritate, natura, atque ſubſtantia corporis & ſanguinis Chriſti in Euchariſtia (c). He tried therein to reconcile the controverſies about the Euchariſt, and particularly thoſe of the Lutherans and Zuinglians. I ſhall ſpeak of this book in the remarks [B]. Poinet thoroughly underſtood the Greek tongue, and was tolerably

(a) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, pag. m. 487, ex Baleæo.

(b) Freher. in Theatro, pag. 169, ex Godwino de Præſ. Angl.

(c) It contains 83 leaves in 8vo.

[A] He was biſhop of Rocheſter, and afterwards of Wincheſter, in the XVIth century.] He was tranſlated to this laſt biſhopric on the twenty-ſixth of April 1551, and had a revenue of two thouſand marks per annum ſettled upon him for his ſubſiſtance (1). He ſucceeded Gardiner, who was depoſed for not ſupporting the rights of the crown (2); but he was obliged in his turn to make way for Gardiner, whom queen Mary reſtored to that biſhopric in the year 1553 (3).

(1) Burnet, Hiſt. of the Reformat. of the Church of England, Vol. ii, at the year 1551, pag. 165. See alſo M. de Larrey, Hiſt. of England, Vol. i, pag. 690, where the Printers have put Pointe inſtead of Poinet.

(2) Burnet, ibid.

(3) Ibid. at the year 1553, pag. 247.

[B] I ſhall ſpeak of this book in the remarks.] I have already mentioned the title of it, and the time when it was printed. I add, that they joined to it the famous treatiſe of Bertram de corpore & ſanguine domini ad Carolum magnum (4) Imperatorem ante D. C. C. annos editus. No mention is made where it was printed. The preface was not written by the author. He contented himſelf with giving a word of advice, wherein he gueſſes very right what would be the fate of his book,

(4) He ſhould have ſaid Caro-lum.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google tolerably maſter of the German and Italian (d). He tranſlated from the Italian ſome books of Ochin (e). He had an excellent talent at preaching, for which he was in high eſteem with Edward VI (f). I ſhall relate what has been anſwered to the charge of his book, viz. that neither of the contending parties would approve of it, and that while he endeavoured to reconcile perſons who were at war with one another, he ſhould expoſe himſelf to the indignation of both ſides. He compares himſelf to a man who receives a wound with a ſword in ſtriving to part people that are fighting. Author lectori. Pacem aliorum quærere pulchrum eſt, & habet certam promiſſionem Dei: beati pacifici. Sed vereor hoc dum cupidè fector, ne quod iis qui pugnas diruunt evenire ſolet, idem mihi quoque accidat. Illi dum aliorum ſaluti conſulunt, ipſi reportant vulnera. Et ego dum id operam do ut diſſidentes redeant in gratiam, ab iiſdem fortaſſe nullam inibo gratiam. Id ſi fit, illius exemplo me levabo qui dixit, ſi hominibus placuiſſem, Chriſti ſervus non eſſem. Vale ac ſtude Chriſto placere. We ſhould not perhaps have known the name of the perſon that wrote the preface if John Sturmius had not acknowledged it for his. Quære quæ præfatus ſum ante annos viginti in Diallacticum P. (5) Pometi Epiſcopi Wintonienſis (6). This book was inſerted in the firſt edition of the firſt volume of Theodore Beza's Opuſcula (7). He who tranſlated it into French, aſſures us, in the preface dedicated to the Vidame de Chartres, that he had communicated his deſign to ſome miniſters (8). They believed, perhaps, that ſuch a book would be proper at a time when they were endeavouring to find out a medium to re-unite the Roman Catholics and Proteſtants. Obſerve, that the tranſlator aſcribes this book to Antony Cooke, who had been Preceptor to king Edward VI (9). You will find the opinion of this biſhop explained in a book of Andrew Rivet (10). Read alſo theſe words of John Couſin, biſhop of Durham: 'Paulo ante hanc conſcriptam Apologiam (Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ à Joh. Juello Epiſcopo Sariſberienſi) 'prodierat Dialacticon celeberrimi viri Johannis Poineti 'Epiſcopi Wintonienſis de veritate, naturâ, atque ſubſtantiâ Corporis & Sanguinis Chriſti in Euchariſtiâ; quod non alio conſilio edidit, quàm ut fidem & doctrinam Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ illuſtraret. Et primò oſtendit Euchariſtiam non ſolum figuram eſſe Corporis Domini, ſed etiam ipſam Veritatem Naturam, atque Subſtantiam in ſe comprehendere; idcirco nec has voces Naturæ & Subſtantiæ fugiendas eſſe; veteres enim de hoc ſacramento differentes ita loquutos fuiſſe. Secundò quærit, an voces illæ Veritas, Natura, & Subſtantia, communi more in hoc myſterio à Veteribus intelligebantur, an peculiari & Sacramentis magis accommoda ratione? Neque enim obſervandum eſſe ſolùm, quibus verbis olim Patres uſi ſint, ſed quid iſtis ſignificare ac docere voluerint. Et licet diſcrimen ipſe cum Patribus agnoſcat, inter Corpus Chriſti formam humani corporis naturalem habens, & quod in Sacramento eſt Corpus myſticum, maluit tamen diſcrimen illud ad modum præſentiæ & exhibitionis, quàm ad ipſam rem ſubjectam, hoc eſt Corpus Chriſti verum, accommodari; quum certiſſimum ſit non aliud Corpus in Sacramento fidelibus dari, niſi quod à Chriſto pro fidelium ſalute in mortem traditum fuit. Tertiò denique, Spiritualem hic intelligentiam, juxta communem & conſentientem veterum Patrum interpretationem, requiri ſtatuit, & carnalem omnem cogitationem excludi (11). --- A little before this vindication (of the church of England, written by John Jewell biſhop of Saliſbury) came out the Dialacticon of the famous John Poinet, biſhop of Wincheſter, concerning the Reality, Nature, and Subſtance of the Body, and Blood of Chriſt in the Euchariſt; which he publiſhed with no other deſign but to ſet the faith and doctrine of the church of England in a clear light. And firſt, he ſhews that the Euchariſt is not barely the figure of our Lord's body, but that it likewiſe comprehends the reality, nature, and ſubſtance of it; for which reaſon theſe words, Nature and Sub ſtance, are not to be rejected, ſince the Fathers, in diſcourſing of this ſacrament, made uſe of them. Secondly, he enquires whether theſe words, Reality, Nature, and Subſtance, were underſtood by the Fathers in this myſtery, according to their general ſignification, or in a ſenſe that was peculiar and better adapted to the ſacraments? For that we ſhould not only obſerve what words the Fathers made uſe of, but likewiſe what meaning they put upon them. And that altho' he was ready, with the Fathers, to acknowledge a difference between the body of Chriſt, which had the natural form of a human body, and his myſtical body in the ſacrament; yet he inclined to think, that this difference ſhould be applied to the manner in which it is preſent and exhibited, rather than to the thing itſelf, viz. the true body of Chriſt; it being moſt certain, that the body which believers receive in the ſacrament, is the ſame which Chriſt offered up by his death for their ſalvation. Thirdly and laſtly, he maintains that it muſt be underſtood in a ſpiritual ſenſe, according to the general and unanimous expoſition of the antient Fathers, and that every carnal thought or imagination ſhould be excluded' Poinet lays great ſtreſs upon the authority of the Fathers, who ſpeak in ſtrong terms of the preſence of our Lord's body in the ſymbols of the Euchariſt, and he entirely rejects the opinion that was aſcribed to the Zuinglians; nevertheleſs he condemns thoſe who admit of the oral manducation of the body of JESUS CHRIST. He is willing to allow of the word Tranſubſtantiation, provided it be underſtood in a certain ſenſe, and not to include Oral Manducation. Vident ſubſtantiam quoque à nobis præſentem affirmari, & communionem noſtram cum Chriſto naturaliter, & ut ita dicam, ſubſtantialiter prædicari, ſed has voces, non ut Philoſophi, ſed ut Theologi loquuntur, intelligi opertere. Nec de Tranſubſtantiationis vocabulo, quanvis barbaro minimeque neceſſario litigaremus, ſi modò talem ſubſtantiarum tranſmutationem interpretentur, qualem veteres agnoſcebant, ſacramentalem videlicet, qualis etiam in homine fit per Baptiſmum regenerato, qui novus homo factus eſt, & nova creatura, qualis etiam fit quum nos in carnem Chriſti convertimur, quibus patres antiqui utebantur exemplis. Voces ipſas non tantopere fugimus, quamquam earum quoque ratio habenda eſt, ſed ſignificationem eam quam patres ipſi docent, atque adeò flagitant, nos quoque requirimus: & ſolam σαρκοφαγίαν, id eſt, carnis vorationem, quam nullo pacto probant, ſed ut ſtultam & impiam condemnant, rejicimus ut alienam à Scripturis, alienam à patrum interpretatione, denique cum vera fide ex diametro pugnantem, ac ſpiritualem ſenſum in hac carne edenda neceſſarium eſſe judicamus, ipſum Chriſtum authorem ſequuti, & conſenſum probatiſſimorum, qui habentur, interpretum (12). He had no reaſon to think that the Roman Catholics would be ſatisfied with his allowing of a term which he modified in that manner. But as for thoſe who deſired to have a miracle granted in the Euchariſt, he might fancy his hypotheſis would ſatisfy them, provided that they only aſked a great miracle in general; for what he teaches on this head, is one of the moſt incomprehenſible things that can be thought of. He admits a real and ſubſtantial preſence of the body of JESUS CHRIST, but which is no more than ſacramental at the ſame time; and he affirms, that by virtue of this preſence, the bread in the Euchariſt may purify our ſouls, and unite us into one body with our Redeemer. Quòd ſi nonnulli miraculum requirunt (nam patres aliquot Euchariſtiam ingens miraculum nominant) non minùs profectò mirandum eſt panem & vinum creaturas terrenas, & corpori tantum paſcendo natas, eam virtute benedictionis myſticæ vim inſitam, adeóque potentem efficacitatem poſſidere, ut & animos & corpora mundent, alant, ſanctificent, atque ad immortalitatem præparent, ut nos membra Chriſti & unum cum illo corpus conficiant. Imò plus ponderis habet hoc miraculum, plus dignitatis, majorem utilitatem, ac magis myſteriorum rationi congruentem, quàm ulla poteſt craſſa tranſubſtantiatio, aut animalis & humana complecti σαρκοφαγία (13). The Catechiſm of the Reformed churches, compoſed by Calvin, does not differ much from the opinion of this biſhop of Wincheſter. Take particular notice of theſe words: Thus I doubt not but that JESUS CHRIST, as he was ſignified, and promiſed, will make us partakers of his own ſubſtance, in order that we may be united to him in one life. M. But how can that be, ſince the body of JESUS CHRIST is in Heaven, and we are in this earthly pilgrimage? S. It is by the incomprehenſible power of his Spirit which unites things that are diſtant in place from one another (14).

(d) Freher. ubi ſupra.

(e) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, ubi ſupra.

(f) Freher. ubi ſupra.

I have ſaid elſewhere (15) that this Diallacticon was reprinted with the book of a Phyſician, who endeavoured to reconcile the controverſies about the Euchariſt,

(5) He ſhould have ſaid Joannis.

(6) Sturmius, in Parte III, Antipappi quarti, pag. 176.

(7) See Rivet, in Grotianæ Animadver. Diſcuſſ. Tom. iii, Oper. pag. 1132.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Id. ib. & in Annotat. in Conſultat. de Religione, pag. 948.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Joh. Coſinus, Epiſcopus Dunelmenſis, Hiſtoria Tranſubſtant. Papalis, cap. ii, num. 4, pag. 9, & ſeq.

(12) Diallacticon, folio m. 81.

(13) Idem, folio 82.

(14) Geneva-Catechiſm, §. 53.

(15) In the remark [C] of the article HARCHIUS, towards the end.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his having carried away another man's wife [C] notwithſtanding he had one of his own.

riſt, and whoſe notions are very particular concerning this important article.

[C] I ſhall relate what has been anſwered to the charge of his having carried away another man's wife, notwithſtanding he had one of his own.] Sanders, after having ſaid that one Poynet took poſſeſſion of the biſhopric of Wincheſter, when Stephen Gardiner was deprived, adds, 'This fine prelate accounting it a 'ſmall thing to marry one wife, now that he was a 'Biſhop, did likewiſe carry away the wife of a certain 'Butcher then living; but ſhe was taken from him by 'the parliament of that kingdom, as no ways belong-'ing to him, and reſtored to her huſband. It was 'owing to this, that when ſome time after, a man 'of quality ſaid to biſhop Gardiner, partly by way of 'joke, and partly by way of ridicule: You expect, 'perhaps, that the time will come when your bi-'ſhopric ſhall be reſtored to you; the biſhop an-'ſwered, and why ſhould not I expect to recover my 'biſhopric, as well as the Butcher has recovered his 'wife. For it was the ſame perſon who ſeized upon 'Stephen Gardiner's biſhopric, and who carried away 'the Butcher's wife (16).' This is the charge, to which Dr Burnet makes the following anſwer: 'The 'falſeneſs of this ſtory is clearly evinced by the an-'ſwer that Dr Martin gave in the beginning of queen 'Mary's reign, to a book that Poinet had writ in 'the defence of the married clergy; Martin's anſwer 'is writ with ſo much ſpite, and ſo many indecent 'reflexions, that though it is not reaſonable to believe 'all he ſays, yet it is almoſt a certain argument that 'this ſtory concerning Poinet is a forgery; ſince, if 'it was a thing ſo public as our author makes it, 'Martin muſt have heard of it, eſpecially living in 'Gardiner's houſe, and it is not to be imagined that 'if he did know it, he would have concealed it: ſo 'this, and the jeſt that hangs upon it, muſt paſs as one 'of the flouriſhes of our author's pen (17).

(16) Sanders's book of the Engliſh Schism, pag. 216.

(17) Burnet, ubi ſupra, pag. 396.

POITIERS (DIANA DE) miſtreſs to Henry II, and daughter of the Count de St Vallier [A], made an ill uſe of her favour, either to heap up riches, or to bring into places, or exclude ſuch as ſhe thought fit. Her age made it to be believed that ſhe could not thus captivate a young prince, without the help of Magic [B]. But ſome judicious perſons

[A] She was daughter of the count de St Vallier.] His name was John (1) de Poitiers, and he was deſcended from a very antient family; for one Aymar de Poitiers, 'thus 'called, whether becauſe he was deſcended from the 'counts de Poitiers, or for ſome other reaſon, married 'about the year 1184, the heireſs of the houſe of 'Valentinois, in conſideration of the aſſiſtance he had 'given to her mother, who was a widow, againſt the 'biſhop of Valence, who was her great enemy. . . . . 'The ſame Aymar had from Raymund, count of 'Toulouſe, his relation, the county of Diois, about 'the year 1190, ſo that theſe two counties remained 'united two hundred years in the houſe of Poitiers, and 'were poſſeſſed by ſeven ſucceſſive counts. Lewis II, 'the laſt of them, having no male-iſſue, nor much af-'fection for Charles de St Vallier, his uncle by his 'father's ſide, who was to ſucceed him, and being 'very much in debt, by his ill management and de-'baucheries, made over, and conveyed theſe two 'counties to Charles, dauphin of France, and his ſuc-'ceſſors, for a hundred thouſand gold crowns, on 'condition, that they ſhould remain inſeparably united 'to Dauphiné. After his death, which was in the 'year 1419, Lewis, the ſon of Charles de St Vallier, 'would take on him the titles and poſſeſſions of them; 'but the dauphin, being then king, obliged him to 'yield up all his pretenſions to him for a yearly rent 'of ſeven thouſand florins to him and his heirs for 'ever (2).' As for St Vallier, Diana's father, he was arreſted, as being concerned in the rebellion of the conſtable Charles de Bourbon, and would have been beheaded at the Greve, if his daughter, as it is ſaid, in order to ſave his life, had not granted the laſt favour to Francis I. Mezerai ſpeaks of it thus in his large hiſtory (3). St Vallier had his pardon on the ſcaffold at the Greve, by reaſon of the beauty of his only daughter Diana. And, in another place (4), ſpeaking of the ſame Diana, he ſays, The charms of her beauty were ſo powerful ſince the year 1524, that all the court interceded for her father, who was convicted of the rebellion of Charles de Bourbon, ſo that king Francis, on her account, ſent him his pardon on the ſcaffold. It cannot be concluded from theſe two paſſages, that the chaſtity of the daughter was a ſacrifice offered to Francis I, to obtain her father's pardon. But here is a third place, where the Hiſtorian ſpeaks very plain of this propitiatory victim. 'St Vallier was tried, and con-'demned to loſe his head; but as he was at the Greve, 'on the ſcaffold, he received his pardon inſtead of 'the fatal ſtroke. It was ſaid that the king ſent it 'to him. After he had got from his daughter Diana, 'who was then about fourteen years of age, the moſt 'precious thing ſhe had. A ſweet exchange to thoſe 'who prefer life to virtue, or who place their honour 'in the glory of enjoying a favour, which is more en-'vied than it is innocent (5).' The author of the Galantries of the kings of France does not ſpeak ſo roundly, but what he ſays is ſufficient to make every body underſtand what he means. I ſhall ſet down his words, becauſe they contain ſome particulars relating to the hiſtory of our Diana. 'She was, ſays he (6), 'the daughter of John de Poictiers, lord of St Vallier, 'who placed her very young near the counteſs of An-'gouleme. Afterwards ſhe went into the ſervice of 'queen Claudia, as a maid of honour. St Vallier, 'who hoped that the charms of his daughter would 'procure him ſome protection at court, was not de-'ceived in it; for it may be ſaid, that ſhe ſaved his 'life by her private contrivances. He had a hand in 'the rebellion of the conſtable de Bourbon, and was 'ſo unfortunate as to be taken. He was tried, and 'condemned to be beheaded. Diana was ſo ſtruck 'with this news, that ſhe thought nothing was to be 'omitted in order to free her father from ſuch a preſ-'ſing danger. She threw herſelf at the king's feet, 'melting in tears, and begged of him to grant life to 'the perſon to whom ſhe owed her's. She appeared 'in this condition ſo beautiful, and ſo moving to 'that prince, that ſhe obtained her requeſt, and in-'ſpired him with love under the maſk of pity. She 'preſerved that conqueſt till the fatal journey the king 'made into Italy; and that prince endeavoured to 'conceal his unfaithfulneſs from the counteſs de 'Chateau-Brian, for whom he always had a great 'regard.'

(1) And not Aymar, as Mezerai calls him, Hiſt. de Henry II, at the beginning.

(2) Mezerai, Hiſt. de Charles VI, pag. 538, of the 2*d volume, in fol. ad ann.* 1418.

(3) Tom. ii, pag. 936, ad ann. 1523.

(4) Hiſt. de Henry II, at the beginning, pag. 1058, of the 2*d volume.*

(5) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. Tom. iv, pag. m. 520, ad ann. 1523.

(6) Tom. i, par. 195. See in the remark [P] a fault that is not committed.

[B] Without the help of Magic.] Thuanus ſeems to believe it. 'Diana . . . . amiſſo viro, is fuit Lu-'dovicus Brezæus magnus Normaniæ Seneſcallus, cum 'jam inclinata eſſet ætate, philtris & magicis, ut cre-'ditur, artibus adeo ſibi animum Henrici devinxit, 'ut is nunquam alienata voluntate ad exitum uſque vitæ 'in amore illo conſtanter perſeveraverit (7). - - - - 'Diana . . . . having loſt her huſband (Lewis de Brezé, 'great ſeneſchal of Normandy) when her age was now 'upon the decline, is believed to have ſo fixed the af-'fections of Henry, by philtres and magical enchantments, 'that he perſiſted in his love to her with an undeviating 'conſtancy to the end of his life.' Mezerai gives an exact account of all the reaſons which gave occaſion to believe that this woman made uſe of enchantments, and yet does not ſeem to be perſuaded of it. 'As 'the fineſt features of her face vaniſhed away, the 'charms of her wit, and her addreſs, increaſed to 'ſuch a degree, that at thirty-five years of age, when 'ſhe ſhould have preferred virtue to beauty, ſhe ab-'ſolutely conquered the heart of king Henry; and 'becauſe people, in order to make favourites odious, 'and excuſe the baſeneſs of the princes, who become 'their ſlaves, are uſed to ſay that their affection has 'been extorted by magical charms, ſome gave out 'that ſhe had bewitched him with philtres. Indeed 'it was a ſad thing, to ſee a young prince fond of a woman,

(7) Thuan. lib. 38, ad ann. 1547.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google perſons do not give that reaſon for it, and make very good reflexions upon the power of an old courtezan [C]. They obſerve among other things the amorous temper of Diana [D]. The greateſt ſcandal proceeded from the common report, that ſhe had yielded to the deſires of Francis I, to ſave her father's life (a) [E]; ſo that people could not

(a) See the remark [A].

' woman, who had a face diſcoloured, and full of ' wrinkles, a head that grew gray-haired, languiſh- ' ing, and ſometimes blood-ſhot and running eyes, ' in a word, who was ſaid to be the infamous ' leavings of ſeveral others; and one might very well ' wonder, that neither time, nor honour, nor wiſe ' counſels, nor any other object among ſo many great ' beauties he might have pitched upon, could bring ' him off from her. But it is neither a new thing, ' nor a wonderful one, to ſee a man thus bewitched ' without any enchantments: there are many inſtances ' of it (8), and it is no difficult thing to give ſome ' reaſons for it (9).' Thoſe reaſons will be ſeen in the following remark.

(8) See the articles CALIGULA, remark [H], CYRUS, remark [F], and DELLIUS, remark [A]. See alſo the articles LAIS and LAMIA.

(9) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, at the beginning of Henry II. pag. 1018. of the 2d volume, in folio.

[C] Good reflexions upon the power of an old courtezan.] Here is the ſequel of the paſſage I have juſt now quoted out of Mezerai. ' Not to mention thoſe un- ' known qualities, like thoſe of the load-ſtone, which ' meeting in ſome perſons, do cloſely unite them by ' an equal and mutual conſent, or by ſubjecting the ' one to the other; it is obſerved, that phlegmatic ' people are conſtant in their love, tho' they are not ' ſo in their deſigns, and other paſſions.' Add to this, ' that the firſt engagements are almoſt always broke ' off. And therefore a cunning and crafty woman is no ' leſs dangerous to a young man, who begins to be ' acquainted with the world, than a rock to an igno- ' rant pilot. Beſides, the ſuſpicions he entertained of ' his wife's honeſty, made him more fond of another ' woman. Laſtly, in point of love, as well as in ' point of war, the ſtratagems of old people are not ' leſs to be feared, than the ſtrength and vigour of ' the young, and therefore it is no wonder if he fell ' into the ſnares of ſo experienced a woman.' Ovid, who was ſo great a maſter in the art of love, might have afforded Mezerai another reaſon, and perhaps that Hiſtorian would not have omitted it in a Latin hiſtory.

Nec quotus annus eat, ne quo ſit nata require
Conſule: quæ rigidus munera Cenſor habet.
Præcipuè, ſi flore caret, meliuſque peractum
Tempus, & albentes jam legit illa comas.
Utilis, O juvenes, aut hæc, aut ſerior ætas;
Iſte feret ſegetes; iſte ſerendus ager.
- - - - - - - - -
Hoc quoque militiæ eſt: hoc quoque quærit opes.
Adde, quod eſt illis operum prudentia major:
Solus & artifices qui facit, uſus adeſt.
Illæ munditiis annorum damna rependunt:
Et faciunt curâ, ne videantur anus.
Utque velis, Venerem jungunt per mille figuras.
Inveniat plures nulla tabella modos (10).

(10) Ovid. de Arte Amandi, lib. ii, ver. 663.

Nor aſk her age, conſult no regiſter,
Under whoſe reign ſhe's born, or what's the year.
If fading youth chequers her hair with white,
Experience makes her perfect in delight.
In her embrace ſublimer joys are found,
A fruitful ſoil, and cultivated ground.
- - - - - - - - -
Pleaſure and wealth reward thy pleaſing pains,
The labour's great, but greater far the gains.
Add their experience in affairs of love,
For years and practice do alike improve.
Their arts repair the injuries of time,
And ſtill preſerve them in their charming prime,
In vary'd ways they act the pleaſure o'er,
Nor pictur'd poſtures can inſtruct you more.

A woman, who is the infamous leavings of many others, has been in a good ſchool, ſhe can do her exerciſes much better, and knows how to play the game to the beſt advantage. However it be, this Hiſtorian rightly obſerves, that there are many inſtances of the great power of an old courtezan. See the marginal note (8).

[D] They obſerve amongſt other things the amorous temper of Diana.] ' The love of a young king ' for a woman of forty years of age, who had two ' or three children by her huſband, might well be cal- ' led an enchantment without magic. . . . . The king ' loved her becauſe ſhe was very ſenſible of love, and ' her temper prompted her ſometimes to look elſe- ' where for the heighth of pleaſure, as ſhe found in ' him the heighth of riches and honours.' They are Mezerai's words (11), which give me occaſion to compare, in this point, Henry II with a man, who, in all other things, was infinitely ſhort of that prince's merit. We read in Suetonius, that Caligula, in the flower of his youth, fell deſperately in love with Cæſonia, who was not young, and had had three children by her huſband; but then ſhe was a woman of a moſt laſcivious temper (12). Ovid, one of the greateſt maſters in that art, intimates plainly enough, that ſuch a temper ſerves a voluptuous man inſtead of many other things, and that as the inſenſibility of a chaſt woman is a diſagreeable inconveniency, the eagerneſs of a leud miſtreſs gives a wonderful reliſh. It is the unhappy cauſe of the unfaithfulneſs of huſbands.

(11) Abrégé Chron. Tom. iv, pag. 643, ad ann. 1547.

(12) See the article CALIGULA, citat. (28).

Odi quæ præbet, quia ſit præbere neceſſe,
Siccaque de lana cogitat ipſa ſua (13).
Quæ datur officio, non eſt mihi grata voluptas;
Officium faciat nulla puella mihi.
Me voces audire juvat ſua gaudia faſſas,
Utque morer memet ſuſtineamque roget.
Aſpiciam Dominæ victos amentis ocellos,
Langueat, & tangi ſe vetet illa diu (14).

(13) Compare Martial. Epigr. LXI, & CV, lib. xi.

(14) Ovid. ubi ſupra, ver. 692.

Give me enjoyment, when the willing dame
Glows with deſires, and burns with equal flame.
I love to hear the ſoft tranſporting joys,
The frequent ſighs and tender murm'ring voice:
To ſee her eyes with vary'd pleaſure move,
And all the nymph confeſs the pow'r of love.

What has been ſaid, ſhews that Mezerai hit right: the leud temper of Henry's miſtreſs ſupplied her want of youth.

[E] It was the common report that ſhe had yielded to the deſires of Francis I, to ſave her father's life.] Beſides what has been ſaid upon this ſubject in the firſt remark of this article, I ſhall obſerve a circumſtance mentioned by Thuanus, concerning the fright of the Count de St Vallier. That unhappy man being brought to the place of execution, was ſtruck with ſuch a conſternation, that he fell dangerouſly ill. He was let blood ſeveral times, but this, and the good news of his pardon, could not recover his ſpirits and cure him. St Vallier's fever became afterwards a proverb. Diana . . . . . patrem habuit Joannem Pictavienſem Sanvalerium, qui Caroli Borbonii conjurationis particeps, cum apud Sacerdotem ſecretò rem confeſſus eſſet, à Sacerdote delatus, & ad mortem damnatus eſt: cum ad ſupplicium duceretur, ex pavore in tam acutam febrem incidit, ut venia in gratiam filiæ, quæ pulchritudine ſua multorum procerum benevolentiam demeruerat, à Franciſco impetrata, vix ad mentem & ſanitatem ſæpius miſſo ſanguine reduci potuerit, unde Sanvaleriana febris apud nos in proverbium abiit (15). Some ſay (16), That he ſaw death ſo near him, and was ſo frighted at it, that when he was brought back to his houſe (17), a continual fever ſeized him ſo violently, that he died of it. Thuanus tells us, that St Vallier was accuſed by the prieſt, to whom he had confeſſed his conſpiracy. But moſt Hiſtorians ſay, that two gentlemen of Normandy, who were concerned in the ſame plot, diſcovered it to Francis I. Some will have it, that in this they followed the inclination, which is ſaid to be natural to their countrymen (18): others ſay, that their confeſſor made a ſtep, which obliged them to reveal

(15) Thuan. ubi ſupra.

(16) Father Anſelme, Palais de l'Honneur, pag. 555.

(17) See the remark [P].

(18) Franciſcus Lutetia profectus ad Fanum Petri Monaſterienſis . . . appulit . . . ibi duo Borbonii domeſtici natione Normani (quæ natio vulgo ut parum fida notari ſolet) Argugius ac Matigno Borbonium cum Cæſare conveniſſe atque adverſus Franciſcum multa moliri indicant. Belcarius, lib. xvii, num. 46, pag. 530.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google not ſee, without indignation, that a woman, who had been a concubine to the father and the ſon ſucceſſively, ſhould have the chief authority in the kingdom. It is a chimerical fancy to pretend that Henry the ſecond's intimacy with that woman went no farther than pure friendſhip [F]. She was known at court for a long time, by the name of Grande Senechalle, and then by that of ducheſs of Valentinois. She went by the firſt of thoſe two names, becauſe ſhe had been married to Lewis de Brezé, Great Seneſchal of Normandy, by whom ſhe had two daughters, whom ſhe married very advantageouſly [G]. As reveal that ſecret. Varillas ſticks to this laſt opinion. 'Matignon and d'Argouges, ſays he (19), having 'confeſſed at Eaſter to a curate of their country, that 'they had a hand in a conſpiracy againſt the ſtate, 'he ordered them to diſcover it to the king; and he 'himſelf ſet out immediately to acquaint Brezé, great 'Seneſchal of Normandy, with it. Matignon and 'd'Argouges, who thought they were undone, took 'poſt, and overtook the king at Saint Pierre le Mon'ſtier, where they threw themſelves at his feet, and 'obtained their pardon, by making an exact diſco'very of what they knew of the conſtable's negocia'tion with the emperor.'

(19) Varillas, Hiſt. de François I, lib. iv, pag. 269.

[F] It is a chimerical fancy to pretend that Henry the ſecond's intimacy . . . . . went no farther than pure friendſhip.] I wonder how Mr le Laboureur could ever bring himſelf to believe ſuch a chimera. I ſhall ſet down his words, which contain a curious paſſage concerning the origin of that paſſion, and it will appear that he owns at leaſt that our Diana was one of Francis the firſt's miſtreſſes. 'He was further prompted 'to go thither, ſays he (20), ſpeaking of a running at 'the ring, which Henry II took great delight in, by his 'love to his miſtreſs Diana de Poitiers, ducheſs of 'Valentinois, who had been the firſt object of his in'clinations, and had given him ſome briſkneſs. It is 'ſaid that king Francis, his father, who firſt loved 'that lady, having one day, after the death of his 'ſon the dauphin Francis, expreſſed ſome grief to her, 'for the little briſkneſs he perceived in prince Hen'ry, ſhe told him, that he wanted to be in love, and 'that ſhe would make a galant of him. The king, 'whoſe affection was divided between her and the 'ducheſs d'Etampes, gave his conſent to it; but 'though the court was then very licentious, we ought 'to believe, that nothing paſſed between them that 'might occaſion any ſlanders, and that the imprecа'tion and curſe uttered againſt Reuben (21), was 'thrown into Henry's chamber out of a calumny: 'nay (22), it is not certain that Diana de Poitiers ſuf'fered that this friendſhip ſhould go beyond a noble 'eſteem and a meer galantry. To prove this, it is to 'be obſerved, that ſhe had had ſome children by her 'huſband Lewis de Brezé, count de Maulevrier, Se'neſchal of Normandy; and Henry II left behind him 'ſome legitimate and natural ones, but it does not 'appear that he had any by her.' The proof alledged by Mr le Laboureur is of ſmall force; nay, it is inſignificant, and even makes againſt him; for at this rate he ſhould not have ſaid, that the affection of Francis I. was divided between Diana de Poitiers and the ducheſs d'Etampes. We do not find that this prince, who was the father of ſeveral children, had ever any by Diana, who was not ſo old when he loved her, as when ſhe was Henry the ſecond's miſtreſs. I do not alledge againſt this proof, the great age of Diana, according to Varillas, when the dauphin began to be in love with her; I do not think ſhe was near ſo old as that Hiſtorian will have it. But I ſhall only ſay two things; Firſt, That Diana might have grown barren before ſhe was forty years of age by exceſſive leudneſs: Secondly, That barren marriages frequently happen between widowers and widows, who had, both of them, children by their former marriages.

(20) Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. i, pag. 276.

(21) See the 49th chapter of Geneſis, ver. 4.

(22) This nay is needleſs here, ſince the author is going to ſay nothing ſtronger than what goes before.

If one had a mind to deny the inceſt, it were better to go about it as Varillas does; it were better to deny that Diana lay with the father, than to deny that ſhe did it with the ſon. However it be, let us ſee what Varillas ſays. 'I expect to be blamed for hav'ing ſaid nothing of the pretended inceſt of the ſame 'ducheſs of Valentinois, with the father and the ſon, 'that is, with king Francis I, and king Henry II. 'But to this I anſwer two things: Firſt, That of all 'the authors of thoſe times, whom I have ſeen in the 'king's library, in a collection divided into thirty-'ſeven volumes, I have not found any Catholic writer 'who mentions that inceſt, and that the Catholics 'have been as careful to ſay nothing of it, as the 'Calviniſts have appeared eager and paſſionate in giv'ing a particular account of it. Beſides, the ſame 'Calviniſts do not agree in their ſatires; for ſome 'will have it, that this ducheſs, who was then 'known only by the name of Diana de Poitiers, yield'to the deſires of king Francis I, only to ſave by the 'loſs of her virginity, the life of St Vallier, her fa'ther, who was otherwiſe in a few days to loſe it up'on a ſcaffold, for being an accomplice in the rebel'lion of the conſtable de Bourbon; and others affirm 'that ſhe proſtituted herſelf to the conſtable de Mont'morency, chief miniſter and favourite of Francis I '(23).' If he goes upon no better grounds as to this, than in what he adds concerning the reaſon why the Calviniſts hated the ducheſs de Valentinois, he has loſt his cauſe; for it is an abſurd thing to alledge the laſt-will of the ducheſs (24), as the true reaſon of their hatred, and not the cruel perſecution which they ſuffered under a reign, in which every thing was managed according to the caprices of that woman. This is certainly the ſophiſm à non cauſa ſed cauſa.

(23) Varillas, Preface to the Hiſtory of Henry II.

(24) By which ſhe diſinherited the duke of Bouillon, her ſon-in-law, in caſe he ſhould embrace the new religion.

[G] She had two daughters, whom ſhe married very advantageouſly.] Frances de Brezé, the eldeſt, was married in 1538, to Robert de la Marck, fourth of that name, duke of Bouillon, ſovereign prince of Sedan, who was made marſhal of France in the year 1547 (25). Louiſa de Brezé, the other daughter of the great Seneſchal, was married to Claudius de Lorrain, duke d'Aumale (26), brother to the duke of Guiſe, who was killed by Poltrot. Varillas is very much out here (27). He ſuppoſes, that in the beginning of Henry the ſecond's reign, the ducheſs de Valentinois and the cardinal de Lorrain, mutually endeavoured to unite their intereſts, in order to keep up and increaſe their credit, and that the cardinal, upon ſuch a proſpect, propoſed to marry the prince of Joinville his eldeſt brother, with the eldeſt daughter of the ducheſs: which not ſucceeding, the ducheſs was obliged to be contented to marry her eldeſt daughter to the duke d'Aumale, the cardinal's younger brother; after which ſhe married her ſecond daughter to the ſon of the marſhal de Fleuranges, prince of Sedan (28). Varillas confounds times and things; for the eldeſt daughter of Diana married Robert de la Marck, prince of Sedan, in the year 1538 (29). Would Henry Robert de la Marck, their ſon, have married in 1558 the daughter of the duke of Montpenſier (30), if his mother had married in the reign of Henry II? I ſay nothing of Antoinette de la Marck, ſiſter of Henry Robert, who was married to Damville, ſecond ſon to the conſtable de Montmorency, in the year 1558, according to Varillas (31); but as he obſerves that ſhe was almoſt marriageable, he might evade the force of my objection, and I do not know what age that lady was of at that time. Having deſired a friend (32) to conſult Mr d'Hozier, who has a vaſt knowledge of Hiſtory and Genealogies, I have been informed that Frances de Brezé, eldeſt daughter of Diana de Poitiers, was married in the year 1538 to Robert de la Marck, and that Louiſa de Brezé, her ſecond daughter, was married to Claudius de Lorrain, duke d'Aumale, in 1546 (33); for William de Poitiers, her uncle, mentions her, as being that prince's wife in the laſt-will he made the 12th of March 1546. Preſident de la Place obſerves, that the duke d'Aumale married in the reign of Francis I, by ſuch a token that the king would not ſuffer the bride to be dreſſed like a princeſs on her wedding-day (34). Which ſhew the miſtakes of the modern author of the life of admiral de Coligny. He ſuppoſes, that the conſtable de Montmorency having attained again to the top of favour after the death of Francis I, had a mind to marry Coligny to the heireſs of Laval. Coligny did not like the match, and put in his brother d'Andelot for it. The conſtable thinking that Coligny had refuſed it, becauſe he was in love with the lady de Brezé, deſired

(25) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Officiers de la Couronne, pag. 179.

(26) Idem, Pasquier de l'Hoſtel de Lorraine, pag. 448.

(27) Hiſt. de Henry II, lib. i, pag. 44, 49, ad ann. 1547.

(28) Ib. p. 49.

(29) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Off. &c.

(30) Ibid.

(31) Hiſt. de Henry II, ib. viii, pag. 321.

(32) Mr Jamſon, Advocate to the king's council.

(33) It is perhaps by reckoning the beginning of the year from Eaſter.

(34) Commentaires de l'etat de la Religion & Republique. An. 1559 verſo, Edit. 1565.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As for the other name, she took it, because Henry II gave her the duchy of Valentinois. I do not think that when she set up as head of a party in opposition to the duchess d'Etampes, in the reign of Francis I, she was so old as Varillas will have it [H]. We are desired that young lord to forbear visiting that lady so frequently, or to do it at least with a design only to try whether she would be of her mother's humour (35). Nevertheless, the visits continued to be as frequent as before. That author having related several intrigues, tells us, that Diana having two daughters to marry, looked out for husbands, who might help her to keep up her credit (36), and she cast her eyes upon the prince of Joinville, and spoke to the cardinal de Lorrain about it. He adds (37), that Coligny represented to that prince, that it was a dishonourable match for him, and put him out of conceit with it, and that afterwards, Diana married her daughter to the duke d'Aumale, younger brother to that prince. See the remark [Q]. I admire the many particulars mentioned by this author, and his vast commentaries upon a few words of Brantome. He is a faithful imitator of Varillas, an Historian who will spoil a great many authors, if it be not prevented. But omitting his historical mistakes, I shall only observe that Diana had no daughters to marry, when Henry II, her lover, came to the crown on the 31st of March 1547; for, as I have already said, the eldest of her two daughters was married in the year 1538, and the youngest in the year 1546.

(35) Vie de Gaspard de Coligny, book ii, pag. 87, Edit. 1686.

(36) Ibid. pag. 102.

(37) Ibid. pag. 106.

[H] I do not think . . . . that she was so old as Varillas will have it.] I shall set down his own words, but let us remember that they concern the year 1544. 'Diana de Poitiers was the dauphin's mistress, 'as the duchess (38) was loved by the king; but this 'was the only thing wherein they were alike, both 'in respect of their body and mind. The duchess 'had never been so beautiful as she was then: she had 'lost nothing of the lustre, which procured her the 'reputation of being the greatest beauty in Europe, 'in the opinion of the nicest judges, and even of the 'emperor himself: but Diana had scarce any of those 'charms, which saved her father's life one and twenty 'years before. The duchess was but one and thirty 'years of age, and it was suspected that Diana was 'near sixty years old; for the care that was taken to 'know her age, by enquiring where she was christened, proved ineffectual. . . . . The duchess . . . . . 'spoke freely of Diana, whereas Diana concealed under feigned demonstrations of respect and complaisance, her vexation for the slight that was put upon 'her. The duchess's freedom made her say upon a 'certain occasion, that she was born the same day 'that Diana was married. These words were the 'more offensive, because they might be true, and reflected upon Diana as if she had been equally incapable of inspiring or entertaining the passion of 'love, since it was known that she had been a long 'time without finding a husband (39). Nevertheless, 'she concealed her resentment as long as the king enjoy'd perfect health; but as soon as she perceived that 'his majesty began to decline, she made the duchess 'sensible, that the time was coming on when she 'would be revenged on her (40). I cannot tell from whence this author had these stories, but I very much question the truth of them. I heard one day a certain person argue against it in the following manner. In the first place, said he, if Diana de Poitiers had been forty years of age when her father was tried, it is not likely that the Historians would have represented her as a tid-bit for Francis I. A married woman or a widow will be more easily accounted handsome at forty years of age, than a maid of the same years. The latter will be sooner called an old maid, than the former will be called old women, and through an ill effect of prejudices, she is not looked upon as so good a chance. II. Mezerai says, that Diana was but fourteen years of age, when she saved her father's life (41); which is much more likely than to say that she was forty. The exchange of a criminal's life for an old maidenhead, is not so easily apprehended by the readers, as when they are told (as they are by Mezerai) that this exchange was made by one that was but fourteen years of age; and the fault of king Francis may be better excused by it. III. If Diana had been near sixty years old in 1544, she must have been seventy-five years old when Henry II died; that is, on the day of the famous tournament, wherein that prince received a wound, of which he died, he took white and black for his livery, on account of the handsome widow he served (42): Would an old woman of seventy-five years have been served as a handsome widow? Would the Protestants, to whom she was so violent an enemy, and who revenged themselves upon her by their satirical books, have forgot her great age? A young king desperately in love with an old woman of seventy years, lies so open to be ridiculed, that Henry II would have been bantered and railed at in the most insulting manner, on acount of his old mistress, if the duchess of Valentinois had been of such an age. The silence of the satirical writers, who only say, that Diana was in her autumn, that is, between forty and fifty years of age, seems to me a very strong reason against Varillas. But this is not the main part of the objection: what Brantome gives an account of in his Memoires des Dames Galantes was more insisted upon. He says (43), that two years after the death of that prince, the enemies of the duchess of Valentinois courted her friendship. She must therefore have lived at least seventy-seven years: how comes it then that, according to Brantome, she died being seventy years and a half old (44)? IV. One can hardly believe that the duchess d'Etampes was but thirty-one years of age in 1544: if this was true, she must have been but thirteen when Francis I. made a mistress of her. But not to insist upon this, I further observe, that she was maid of honour to the queen-regent, before the king fell in love with her; and I question whether at that time, when the education of children was not so forward as it is in our age, a maid of twelve years would have been qualified to be a maid of honour to the regent. V. I own that jealousy prompts the court ladies, as well as others, to use passionate expressions, and to tell strange lyes; but when a woman knows that her enemies have an eye upon her, she will take care not to say any thing that is palpably absurd, and she will forbear telling gross and notorious lies. The duchess d'Etampes took quite another course, if she said that she was born on the day that Diana de Poitiers was married. Every body knew at court, at what time, the duchess had lost her honour: the return of king Francis from Spain was too remarkable a thing to be easily forgotten. Now this was the very time when Mademoiselle de Heilli began to set up for a gallant woman. The court did not less remember the pardon that was sent to St Vallier on the scaffold; and consequently they knew when Diana lost her honour; and they were not ignorant that those two ladies began to play the same game not long one after another. Wherefore, since it was known to the whole court, that St Vallier's daughter had not been married to the great seneschal of Normandy, till Francis I. had lain with her (45), the duchess d'Etampes would have been a mad woman, if she had said what we read in Varillas, I was born on the same day that Diana was married; for it had been an easy thing to prove it an imposture and a silly jest. We shall see below (46) that all these reflexions are not well grounded.

(38) That is, the duchess d'Etampes.

(39) This is not true. See the remark [P].

(40) Varillas, Hist. de François I, book xi, pag. 97, Dutch Edit.

(41) Abrégé Chronol. Tom. iv, pag. 520. This agrees with what he says in the 2d volume of his large history, pag. 1058, that Diana got the dauphin's love at 35 years of age. La Planche, in his Hist. of Francis II, says much the same. In her younger years, says he, pag. 14, she redeemed her father's life with her maidenhead, and afterwards, to the misfortune of France, she became king Henry's mistress, being far advanced in years.

(42) Brantome, Eloge de Henri II, pag. 39, of the 2d Tome.

(43) Tom. ii, pag. 328.

(44) Ibid. pag. 228.

(45) This is not true. See the remark [P].

(46) In the remark [P].

The author of the Galantries of the kings of France has adopted all these mistakes of Varillas, and even made them worse, by referring to the year 1547 (47) what the other had referred to the year 1544; which occasions many new falsities. Mademoiselle de Heilli was but ten years old, when the king lay with her. St Vallier obtained his pardon in 1526. Epernai and Chateau-Thierry were taken, and the treatise of Crespy was made after the year 1546. Here follows another fault of that author. He says (48), that the love which king Francis conceived for Mademoiselle de Heilli, at his return from Spain, made him insensible with respect to all the other persons of the court, and that Diana, who had been married a long time to Lewis de Brezé, seneschal of Normandy, endeavoured to ease her grief for the inconstancy of that prince, by considering that the Dauphin gave her several marks of love. You must know that Henry II was but eight years of age when his father returned from Spain in 1526. You must further know, that he was not Dauphin till the year 1536, and that Diana was a widow when the Dauphin fell in love with her.

(47) Tom. i, pag. 204, edition of 1695.

(48) Pag. 187.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google are told very ſingular things about the great reſolution ſhe ſhewed after the death of Henry II [I], and about the continuance of her beauty [K]. She was a deadly enemy to the Proteſtants [L]; and doubtleſs, the religious zeal of ſuch a woman, was one of the moſt remarkable parts of the great comedy that is acted upon the ſtage of the world. If there is any thing in Brantome's memoirs, that is not only inſipid, but alſo execrable, it is the baſeneſs he is guilty of in praiſing this ducheſs, and applauding the exceſſive complaiſance of Henry II [M]. Thuanus is far from being guilty of ſuch a baſe flattery:

her. From this you may judge, whether the author of the Galantries is an exact writer.

[I] The great reſolution ſhe ſhewed after the death of Henry II.] Brantome gives this account of it. 'When Henry II was dying, the ducheſs of Valentinois was ordered to retire to her houſe at Paris, 'and to come no more into the king's chamber, leſt 'ſhe ſhould diſturb his godly thoughts, and becauſe 'ſome bore her an ill will. She retired, and then a 'meſſenger was ſent to her to demand of her ſome 'rings and jewels that belonged to the crown. She 'immediately aſked him, is the king dead? No, 'Madam, replied he, but he cannot live long. Well, 'ſaid ſhe I will have my enemies to know, that I am 'not afraid of them, and will not obey them as long 'as he is alive. I have ſtill an undaunted courage; 'but when he dies, I will not live after him, and 'tho' my life be never ſo bitter, I ſhall think it ſweet 'in compariſon of my loſs, and therefore, whether 'my king be dead or alive, I am not afraid of my 'enemies. That lady ſhewed herſelf very generous: 'but ſome will ſay that ſhe did not die, tho' ſhe ſaid 'ſhe would. It is true: however, ſhe came very 'near death; and I think it was well done of her 'not to die, in order to let her enemies know that ſhe 'did not fear them, and that if ſhe had formerly ſeen 'them tremble and humble themſelves in her preſence, 'ſhe would not do the ſame. And indeed, ſhe appeared ſo ſtout and reſolute that they could never vex 'her: nay, two years after, they courted her more 'than ever, and were friends again; as it is uſual 'with great people, whoſe friendſhip and enmity are 'of no long continuance, who quickly make up their 'differences, like thieves at a fair, and love and hate 'one another with the ſame eaſe. It is not ſo with 'us inconſiderable people; for we muſt either fight 'and die, or put an end to our quarrels by a very nice 'agreement, and after all we are never the better 'friends (49).'

(49) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. ii, pag. m. 327.

What Brantome ſays, that great people are eaſily reconciled, and that the little ones are very eager in their quarrels, puts me in mind of what was ſaid to a Pariſian, during the wars between the houſes of Orleans and Burgundy. 'While this war laſted, things 'were carried on with ſuch a heat, that after ſeveral 'ſieges, and the deſtruction of many towns, the peace 'was projected, concluded, and agreed upon at Auxerre. For, as the duke of Burgundy told a Pariſian, 'who went to meet him, WE THAT ARE DESCENDED FROM THE ROYAL BLOOD, GROW ANGRY 'ONE WITH ANOTHER, WHENEVER WE HAVE 'A MIND TO IT, AND IN LIKE MANNER, WE 'MAKE A PEACE WHENEVER WE HAVE A MIND 'TO IT. Monſtrelet further ſays, that a Burgundian was of opinion, THAT IT WAS A GREAT 'FOLLY TO KILL ONE ANOTHER FOR THE 'SAKE OF PRINCES, WHO ARE RECONCILED 'WHENEVER THEY PLEASE (50).'

(50) Roulliard, Hiſt. de Melun, pag. 515.

[K] And about the continuance of her beauty.] 'I 'ſaw, ſays Brantome, the ducheſs of Valentinois as 'beautiful, at threeſcore and ten years of age, and as 'freſh and lovely as when ſhe was but thirty; and 'therefore it is no wonder if ſhe was beloved by one 'of the greateſt and moſt valiant kings in the world. 'This I may freely ſay, without doing any prejudice to the beauty of that lady; for whenever a lady gains the love of a great king, it is a ſign that 'ſhe is a moſt accompliſhed perſon: beſides, beauty, 'which is a preſent of Heaven, ought to be enjoyed 'by the demi-gods. I ſaw that lady half a year before ſhe died: ſhe was ſtill ſo beautiful, that none 'but a hard-hearted man would have been inſenſible 'to her charms, tho' ſome time before ſhe had broke 'one of her legs in the ſtreets of Orleans. She rid 'then as dexterouſly as ever ſhe did; but her horſe 'fell. One would have thought, that the great pains 'ſhe felt, would have made ſome alteration in her 'face; but, on the contrary, her beauty, and her 'charming and majeſtical air were the ſame as before. 'She had a very white ſkin without any paint; only 'it is ſaid that ſhe drank every morning ſome 'broth, with potable gold and other drugs in it, which 'I do not underſtand, as the good Phyſicians and the 'learned Apothecaries do. I think, if that lady had 'lived an hundred years longer, ſhe had never been 'an old woman; her face was ſo well formed, and 'her body of ſuch a good temper and conſtitution. 'It is pity ſuch a fine body ſhould lie under 'ground (51).

(51) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. ii, pag. 228.

[L] She was a mortal enemy to the Proteſtants.] Beza aſcribes the cruel perſecution which the Proteſtants ſuffered under the reign of Henry II, to the counſels of three perſons, viz. the Cardinal de Lorrain, the Ducheſs of Valentinois, and the Marſhal de St André. The cardinal, ſays he (52), had the king's conſcience at his diſpoſal. The ducheſs was in poſſeſſion of his body, not without ſuſpicion of witchcraft, ſince ſhe had lived in a very bad reputation, and had nothing in her that might reaſonably (if there is any reaſon in ſuch paſſions) win or preſerve the heart of ſuch a prince. Thoſe three perſons, who continually endeavoured to make him believe theſe two things, that the Proteſtants were enemies to the kingly power, and great lovers of confuſion, and that the right way of making amends for all the vices, in which they themſelves indulged him, was to exterminate the enemies of the Romiſh religion, did ſo work upon him, that from the very beginning of his reign he made it his buſineſs to proſecute and deſtroy the churches, as his late father had done before him. Here is a paſſage out of Brantome. But above all, ſhe was a very good Catholic, and hated the Proteſtants very much. Which is the reaſon why they hated and ſlandered her (53). But Varillas's words are very remarkable (54): 'She declared in the principal 'articles of her will, which ſhe made when ſhe was 'moſt in favour, and which ſhe did not revoke when 'ſhe died ten or twelve years after, that ſhe was ſo 'zealous for the Catholic faith, that if the ducheſſes 'd'Aumale and de Bouillon, her daughters, ſhould for'ſake it upon any pretence whatſoever, and embrace 'any of the new ſects, ſhe deprived them of her eſtate, 'and gave it to the hoſpitals of the places where the ſeveral parts of it lay. If one of her daughters only 'renounced the Catholic faith, ſhe gave her ſhare to 'her ſiſter (55); and if her relations were not careful 'to execute her laſt will, ſhe applied herſelf to the 'parliament, and intreated them, by the good offices 'ſhe had formerly done them with Henry II, to ſupply the fault of her relations.' This Hiſtorian obſerves, that this article of her will was not executed; the ducheſs of Bouillon made an open profeſſion of the Reformed religion, and yet had an equal ſhare of her mother's eſtate with the ducheſs d'Aumale. Varillas takes occaſion from hence to commend the generoſity of the Guiſes. So true it is, ſays he, that the houſe of Guiſe has ſometimes performed generous actions, which are not to be found in the princes of other houſes. He quickly overthrows the foundation on which he builds this encomium (56). But we have no buſineſs with that here. I ſhall ſet down another paſſage, which clearly ſhews how much the ducheſs hated the Proteſtants. 'She 'durſt not explain her thoughts to d'Andelot; for tho' 'ſhe made no ſcruple, for the ſpace of twenty years, 'to live an unchaſt life with her king, contrary to the 'laws of the goſpel, yet ſhe had ſuch a nice conſcience, 'that ſhe would not ſo much as ſpeak to thoſe who 'were ſuſpected of Hereſy (57).' What extravagance! I deſire the readers to make their reflexions upon this odd zeal, which is ſo common.

(52) Hiſtoire Eccleſiaſtique, lib. 11, pag. 68.

(53) Brantome, Eloge de Henri II, in the 2d Tome of his Memoirs, pag. 9.

(54) Hiſtoire de Henri II, book 1, pag. 36, 37.

(55) The author expreſſes himſelf ſo ill that one muſt gueſs at his meaning.

(56) He ſays, pag. 49, that the Cardinal de Lorrain who neglected nothing, took care to prefer ſome clauſes inſerted in the contract of the Count d'Aumale, which were to that Count's advantage, and he inherited afterwards the beſt part of the confiſcation of his brother-in-law.

(57) Varillas, ibid. book 10, pag. 301, ad ann. 1558.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tery: he does not ſpare the conſtable de Montmorency [N], who, notwithſtanding all his haughtineſs, cringed to that leud woman. Mezerai did not act the part of a flatterer [O]. She has been praiſed for not revenging herſelf on the ducheſs d'Etampes as much as ſhe might have done after the death of Francis I (b). The great riches ſhe got proved very uſeful to her after the death of Henry II. She made uſe of them to pacify the queen-mother, and retired to her fine ſeat at Anet; not without receiving as it is ſaid, a ſevere reprimand from Catherine de Medicis (c). That queen was terrified, when Tavannes offered to cut off the noſe of the ducheſs of Valentinois: ſhe told him, that he would undo himſelf by it; and he anſwered, that he would willingly die to put an end to vice, and to the misfortune of the king and his kingdom (d). To conclude, I ſhall examine what ſome ſay, that her virginity ſaved her father's life, and produce dates, which will compoſe the differences of ſome Hiſtorians [P]. It is a ſhameful thing that they ſhould diſagree in matters of fact, ſo modern as theſe are.

(b) Varillas, Hiſtoire de Henry II, livr. i, pag. m. 33, 34.

(c) See the remark [O].

(d) Memoires de Tavannes, apud le Laboureur, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 573.

What

it. But it is an intolerable thing that he ſhould ſay, 'That ſhe never adviſed the king to any thing but 'what was great, noble, and generous. . . . . (58). 'That ſhe was very mild, charitable to the poor, devout and pious, for which reaſon ſhe had a tomb for 'her device. . . . . as living only in God, and that the 'French ought to wiſh, that their kings may never 'have a worſe favourite than ſhe was (59). The 'great and vaſt preſent, which the king made to the 'ſaid ducheſs of Valentinois at his coming to the crown, 'upon the confirmation of all the officers of France, 'as it is uſually practiſed in the beginning of a new 'reign, was thought a very ſtrange thing. The money, that was raiſed by it, amounted to a prodigious 'ſum, becauſe king Francis had reigned a long time. 'Such a king might very well make ſuch a preſent 'to ſuch a lady; for it was a caſual branch, which 'made no part of his revenues, demeſnes, ſubſidies, or 'taxes, and our former kings were very free of ſuch 'things, as I have it from good hands, and were 'blamed when they made any account of them, ſince 'it was out of this fund that they generally diſtributed rewards to their ſervants. They uſed to do it; 'but our late kings keep them for themſelves, and 'farm them out to ſupply their neceſſities. Beſides, 'this lady did not make an ill uſe of that money, 'for ſhe built that fine houſe at Anet, that will be 'for ever an ornament to France (60).' One cannot read this without indignation: the praiſes beſtowed upon her by Francis de Billon, on account of her being a woman of her word and beneficent, are leſs offenſive (61).

(58) Brantome, Eloge de Henry II, pag. 9, in the 2d volume of his Memoirs.

(59) Ibid. pag. 11.

(60) Ibid. pag. 10.

(61) See the book, intituled, Le fort inexpugnable de l'Honneur du ſexe feminin conſtruit par François de Billon Secretaire, printed in the year 1555, fol. 170.

[N] Thuanus . . . does not ſpare the conſtable de Montmorency.] I ſhall ſet down his own words, which are more energical than a tranſlation would be. Hæc violenta & acerba regni initia, ſub miti & moderato principe & qui alieno potius quam ſuo ingenio uteretur, facile Miniſtris tributa ſunt, ſed præcipue Dianæ Pictavienſi ſuperbi & impotentis animi feminæ, apud quam plurimum gratia valebant Lotharingi fratres & Santandreanus. . . . . Hujus feminæ arbitrio omnia regebantur, & Momorantius ipſe ut auctoritatem & potentiam quam apud regem obtinebat incolumem tueretur morem gerere & prudentiam ad turpe obſequium flectere ſatagebat, peſſimo exemplo ſummi imperii ad impotentis feminæ libidinem proſtituti, quæ poſtremo ut jam in homines ſic & in ærarium quod hominibus imperat poteſtatem arripuit, expulſo Joanne Vallo ſanctioris ærarii quæſtore, & in ejus locum ſuffecto Blondo Rupicuriano homine ſuo (62). He mentions afterwards many other extortions which that blood-ſucker made uſe of to ſatisfy her avarice (63). Mezerai obſerves, that the king changed immediately the whole face of the court to pleaſe that crafty woman (64).

(62) Thuan. Hiſtor. lib. iii, pag. 58.

(63) See Lewis de Reinier Sieur de la Planche, in his Hiſt. of Francis II, pag. 14.

(64) Hiſtoire de France, Tom. ii, pag. 1058, ad ann. 1547.

[O] Mezerai did not act the part of a flatterer.] Speaking of the poſture of affairs after the death of Henry II, he expreſſes himſelf thus. 'The ducheſs 'of Valentinois made no long ſtay at court after Bertrandi, keeper of the ſeals: ſhe was turned out when 'Oliver came in, whom ſhe had expelled, and ſhe 'was ſhamefully obliged to reſtore the keys of the 'king's cloſet, and the jewels of the royal family, 'which were given to the queen-regent. However, 'this was not done to pleaſe Oliver, but to ſatisfy the 'juſt reſentment of Catherine, who could no longer ſuffer, without diſgracing herſelf, a woman who had 'for ſo many years robbed her of the king's affection. 'We may gueſs that this princeſs did not let her go 'without reproachful and injurious words. The duke 'd'Aumale, her ſon-in-law, obtained that ſhe ſhould 'not receive a worſe uſage, and that ſhe ſhould keep 'the vaſt wealth ſhe had got by the forfeited eſtates 'of criminals, the ſale of benefices, and by other 'unlawful means, becauſe ſhe promiſed to make him 'her only heir. But ſhe was forced to give the queen-'mother her fine ſeat of Chenonceaux upon the Cher '(65).' This is a mollified extract out of La Planche (66).

(65) Ibid. Tom. iii, pag. 6.

[P] I ſhall examine what ſome ſay, that her virginity ſaved her father's life, and produce dates which will compoſe the differences of ſome Hiſtorians.] I have been informed by Mr d'Hozier, that ſhe married the great ſeneſchal of Normandy on the twenty-ninth of March 1514. And therefore Mezerai advances a great falſity, when he ſays, that the king ſent St Vallier's pardon, after he had got from his daughter Diana, who was then fourteen years of age, the moſt precious thing ſhe had (67). Doubtleſs he means, that ſhe granted her virginity to Francis I, he is therefore miſtaken in two things: he did not know that ſhe was at leaſt twenty years of age in 1523, and that ſhe had been married eight or nine years. It is plain, his words are only a paraphraſe upon thoſe of La Planche, which I have quoted (68). He gives the following judgment about that Hiſtorian. Regnier de la Planche, ſays he (69), was the ſon of the lieutenant-general of Poitiers, a cunning man, and of a quick wit, but malicious, and imbued with Calvin's opinions, and beſides, a confident of the Marſhal de Montmorency, and conſequently an enemy to the Guiſes. It is no wonder if a man ſo qualified, did not enquire whether our Diana had been married a long time, when ſhe ſaved her father's life. Thoſe, who find a myſtery in the leaſt things, fancy that it was not without reaſon that Francis I. expreſſed himſelf thus in the pardon he granted to St Vallier. Whereas our dear and truſty couſin, counſellor and chamberlain, the count de Maulevrier, great Seneſchal of Normandy, and the friends and relations of John de Poitiers, Sieur de St Vallier, have moſt humbly ſupplicated and intreated us to take pity on the ſaid de Poitiers, Sieur de St Vallier, &c. Care was taken, ſay thoſe ſpeculative men, not to mention the affinity that was between the great Seneſchal and the criminal, and not to ſay, that he interceded for his wife's father; leſt it ſhould occaſion ſome ſuſpicions and ſlanders, conſidering the youth and beauty of the lady, who begged her father's life. But laying aſide theſe vain ſubtilties, I ſhall conſider Varillas's remark. He has not found, he ſays (70), any Catholic who mentions that inceſt: the Catholics have been as careful to ſay nothing of it, as the Calviniſts have been paſſionate in their accounts of it. He only mentions the writers of that time, whoſe works make up thirty-ſeven volumes. I wiſh I had the time to examine whether there were any books great or ſmall written by the Catholics in the reign of Francis I, or in that of Henry II, which mentioned this reaſon for the pardon granted to St Vallier; and I deſire all thoſe to inquire into the matter, who are able to do it, and may be any ways concerned in it. However, Varillas cannot deny, that in the XVIIth century the Catholic writers tell us, that Francis I. was in love with Diana de Poitiers. Mr le Laboureur does not deny it (71). Mezerai ſpeaks of it more clearly than la Planche; and I have quoted a modern author, who never was a Proteſtant, and who confirms what is to be found in the books they call the Huguenot's libels. I have ſet down his words (72), but I have not obſerved that he falſely ſays, that young Diana was admitted into the ſervice of queen Claudia, as a maid

(66) Pag. 15, 16, of the book, intituled, Hiſtoire de l'eſtat de France, tant de la Republique que de la Religion, ſous le regne de François II.

(67) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. iv, pag. 520, ad ann. 1523.

(68) In the remark [H], citation (41).

(69) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. iii, pag. 26.

(70) Above, remark [F], citation (23).

(71) See the remark [F].

(72) Above, citation (6).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

What has been said in a book printed at Basil in the year 1698, that the duke of Guise intended to marry Diana de Poitiers, is not true [Q]. It is one of those mistakes so common in conversation: those who have the best memory, do sometimes mistake one time for another, the father for the son, and the daughter for the mother &c.

maid of honour. That queen was the daughter of Lewis XII, she married Francis I. on the 14th of May 1514, and was not a queen till the month of January following. But Diana married Lewis de Brezé on the 29th of March 1514, and therefore she was not maid of honour to queen Claudia. A friend of mine (73) has been pleased to acquaint me, that she lost her husband in 1531, and that she erected to him a stately monument in the Church of Nostre-Dame at Rouen; that she died in 1566, at the age of sixty-six years and twenty-seven days, and that she lies buried at Anet. Besides, Hilarion de Coste (74) observes, that she died on the 26th of April 1566. The result of all which is, that she was born on the 31st of March 1500, and that the duchess d'Etampes was ridiculous in making herself so young, in comparison of her rival. This will give me occasion to rectify the want of exactness in the passages above-mentioned, concerning the age of the duchess of Valentinois.

(73) Mr Jannicon, Advocate to the king's council at Paris.

(74) Eloges des Dames illustres, Tom. i, p. 519.

The Minime I have quoted, does plainly enough intimate the incest. I shall set down his words somewhat at large, which contain some particulars belonging to this article. 'After the death of Lewis de 'Brezé, her husband, king Henry II, who was very 'much in love with her, gave her the title of duchess 'of Valentinois, which she enjoyed till the day on 'which she died, which was the 26th of April 1566, 'and she was buried in the fine chapel that she had 'built in her castle of Anet, (which the Poets of her 'time called Dianet) after she had divided her estate 'between her second daughter Louisa, duchess d'Aumale, and the children of the eldest. She ordered 'by her last-will, that if she died at Paris, her corps 'should be carried first to the church of the Filles Penitentes, and from thence to Anet, and she shewed 'her great aversion for the pretended reformed religion. The devices of Diana, duchess of Valentinois, 'were more proper for Diana, dutchess of Angoulesme. 'The first was a dart or an arrow, (the symbol of the 'arms of chast Diana, goddess of hunting) with this 'motto upon a ribbon that went round the dart, 'CONSEQUITUR QUODCUMQUE PETIT, -- 'She obtains whatever she asks. She designed to express by this device, how much she was in favour 'with Henry II, and the great ascendant she had over 'that prince, who could not deny her any thing, 'and likewise over all the great men of this kingdom, and Francis I, having obtained from him a pardon for her father the lord de St Vallier, who, by 'that king's order, had been taken up, and condemned to be beheaded, for favouring the retreat of Charles, duke of Bourbon, out of the kingdom. The 'sentence was not executed upon him; his majesty 'having sent him his pardon at the request of that 'lady (75). . . . . Diana de Poitiers had also another 'device, viz. a tomb, out of which sprung an arrow, 'surrounded with some boughs and shoots of a green 'tree, with this motto, SOLA VIVIT IN ILLO, '--- She alone lives in it, meaning, that the only 'hope of a resurrection makes us live in the lowest 'part of our graves. This fine device, and the third, 'which was a Diana triumphing over Cupid, whom 'she had thrown down, and put under her feet, with 'this Latin inscription, * OMNIUM VICTOREM 'VICI, - - - - I have vanquished the vanquisher of 'all, were not actually practised by Diana duchess 'of Valentinois, but by Diana, duchess of Angou'lesme (76).' Note, That all the authors I have quoted, misrepresent the favour obtained for St Vallier: it was not so great as it is thought; the punishment of death was only changed into that of a perpetual and very severe imprisonment. The pardon was expressed in these words (77): We make it known that for those causes, and considering the said services, and particularly that which the said great Seneschal has done us (78); as it has been said we have with our certain knowledge, full power and royal authority, changed, and do change, the punishment of death into that hereafter mentioned. That is to say, the said de Poitiers shall be shut up for life between four stone walls, built above and underneath, having but one little window to give him meat and drink. In all other things the contents of the sentence pronounced against him shall remain in their full force, and be entirely executed. If one should infer from thence, that what is said of Diana's favours bestowed upon Francis I, is false, he might be told that the king caused a supersedeas to be immediately drawn up, wherein he ordered the parliament to keep the said St Vallier where he was (79), till he should give further orders about it. Besides, Pasquier may be quoted, who was persuaded that if death had not prevented it, St Vallier would have been restored in time to all his honours (80). If it be further said, that the crime of that prisoner was one of those, that least deserve a pardon, one may answer, that the last favour granted by his daughter, was paid for to it's full value; for her father was involved in a plot, wherein the king was personally concerned. It is what the king declares in his pardon (81).

(75) Hilarion de Coste, ibid.

* In the cabinet of medals of the library of the Minimes in the Place Royale.

(76) Hilarion de Coste, ib. p. 520.

(77) See the Recueil de divers Mémoires, printed at Paris in 1623, pag. 58.

(78) A priest having told him that two gentlemen of Normandy had confessed to him, that they were guilty of a state-crime, he gave notice of it to the court, and took the depositions of the two gentlemen.

(79) That is, in the prison of the parliament at Paris.

(80) Pasquier, Recherches de la France, book viii, cap. xxxix, pag. m. 741.

(81) The said great seneschal . . has discovered to us the plots formed against our person, our children, and our kingdom. Recueil de Mémoires, pag. 58.

[Q] What has been said . . . . that the duke of Guise designed to marry Diana de Poitiers is not true.] I find in the second volume (82) of the Melange Critique de Literature, That the duchess of Valentinois occasioned the difference between admiral de Coligny and the duke of Guise, which produced afterwards such prodigious and dismal effects. Those two lords playing one day at tennis, the admiral told the duke of Guise, that he wondered a wise man, and one of his quality should be willing to marry a whore, meaning that duchess: the duke of Guise, who loved her, was offended at his discourse, hated him, and declared himself his enemy, and endeavoured to undo him. So that the whore, as the admiral called her, or the quarrel that happened upon her account, did, perhaps, contribute more to the Paris-massacre than religion, which in all likelihood was only a pretence for it. Perhaps, this Herodias asked the admiral's head . . . . (83). I believe this quarrel did very much contribute to the massacre. What confirms me in this opinion is, that since the massacre, the duke of Guise, as several Historians agree, was often heard to say, that they had done more than he desired, and that he designed a mischief to no body but the admiral. The author of these words supposes, that the same duke of Guise, who had a mind to marry Diana de Poitiers, had frequently declared, that the Paris-massacre had been carried farther than he intended. Which is to confound the father and the son; for the duke of Guise, who is here said to have been in love with Diana, had been dead above nine years at the time of the massacre. But the greatest mistake lies in saying, that the duke of Guise, who had been the admiral's intimate friend, fell in love with the duchess of Valentinois, &c. than which nothing can be more false. Here is what has occasioned that mistake. The admiral advised against marrying the duchess's daughter; which was taken as if he designed to prevent the elevation of the Guises, and it was one of the reasons why those two friends became enemies. Here follows a passage out of an author of that time. 'The first cause of the late 'duke of Guise's enmity was this. The late duke of 'Guise, your father (84), was desirous that the duke 'd'Aumale should marry the second daughter of the 'duchess of Valentinois, to bring your house into 'credit. The duke of Guise, your brother, was against that marriage, but durst not openly oppose 'it, for fear of displeasing king Henry. Whereupon 'he applied himself to the admiral, as being his particular friend, desiring him to advise him what answer he should make when they should speak to 'him about it, adding, not without shedding many 'tears, that he would never consent to it upon any 'terms whatsoever. The admiral being willing to 'ease his grief, did his best towards it, and after 'some discourse on both sides, his conclusion was, 'that it were better to have an inch of authority with 'honour, than a fathom without honour, and then 'they parted. But the duke of Guise was so far 'from approving that advice, which at first he was 'obstinately resolved to follow, that in order to exasperate king Henry against the admiral, he told the 'marshal de Vieille-ville, who was their common 'friend, that he could never have believed that the 'admiral designed to prevent his advancement, by 'advising him against such a marriage (85).'

(82) Pag. 113.

(83) Ib. p. 114.

(84) These words are spoken to Cardinal de Lorraine.

(85) Reponse à l'Epistre de Charles de Vendemont Cardinal de Lorraine . . maintenant Duc de Guise . . ple Gentilhomme de Hainault. Printed in 1566. See also Brantome's Memoirs, Tom. ii. pag. m. 146, where he endeavours to clear the admiral de Chastillon

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It was the more neceſſary to rectify this, becauſe ſome learned perſons might have been deceived by it, and looked upon it as a curious and ſecret piece of Hiſtory, concerning the cauſes of the Paris-maſſacre. The learned Journaliſts of Leipſic (86), who have given an extract of the Mélange Critique de Literature, took what has been ſaid above concerning admiral de Coligny, and the duke of Guiſe, who was in love with our Diana, &c. as a very remarkable particular. One can never be too careful in preventing ſome readers from being impoſed upon.

(86) See the Acta Eruditorum, for June 1698, pag. m. 293, 294.

POLYDAMUS (VALENTINUS) an Italian Phyſician, in the XVIth century, publiſhed not only ſome books of Phyſic (a), but alſo an Hiſtory, of which Bembus ſpeaks with contempt (b).

(a) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 1033. (b) Petrus Bembus, Epiſt. LVI, lib. vi, dated the firſt of March 1535.

POLYÆNUS, a Greek author of a Collection of Stratagems [A], was born in Macedonia. He dedicated that work to the emperors Antoninus and Verus, when they were engaged in a war with the Parthians. He was then a very old man, and he told them, that if it had not been for his great age, he would willingly have ſerved upon ſuch an occaſion, but that inſtead of his ſervice he would preſent them with ſomething warlike, viz. the ſtratagems made uſe of by the ancients. I do not know whether Caſaubon had a better authority than this, to maintain that Polyænus was a ſoldier as well as a gown-man (a); but if he had none but this, I think he does not go upon very good grounds. What he ſays that Polyænus was an Orator and an Advocate is more certain, for Suidas calls him a Rhetorician. Suidas may be likewiſe produced, to ſhew that Polyænus was a military man; for he aſcribes to him not only a book concerning the taking of Thebes, but alſo three books of Tactics, or of the art of drawing up an army in Battalia. Yet this is no abſolute proof that a man was a ſoldier. Is it not an uſual thing for ſeveral people to write upon a ſubject, though they have only the theory of it? Suidas mentions one POLYÆNUS a ſophiſt, a native of Sardis, who lived in the time of Julius Cæſar [B], and who publiſhed ſome pleadings, and three books of the Parthian Triumph, &c. There is a third POLYÆNUS, an Athenian, quoted in Euſebius's chronicle (b). I cannot tell who he was. Scaliger himſelf knew nothing of him (c). Cicero (d) ſpeaks of one POLYÆNUS, who was accounted a great Mathematician, but having afterwards embraced the opinions of Epicurus, he maintained that all Geometry was falſe.

(a) Polyænus ſcriptor antiquus, elegans, acutus, eruditus & quod ad rem facit haud quaquam ἀτεριςάλτιγκτος, ſed qui utramque militiam (agatam inquam & togatam) ſecutus eſt. Caſaub. Epiſt. Dedicat. Polyæn.

(b) Euſeb. Chron. lib. i, apud Voſſium, de Hiſtor. Græcis, pag. 404.

(c) Notis in eum locum Euſebii apud Voſſium, ibid.

(d) Academ. Quæſt. lib. ii.

[A] Author of a Collection of Stratagems.] It is divided into eight books. Caſaubon is the firſt who publiſhed it in Greek. He publiſhed it in the year 1589 with notes, and the Latin tranſlation of Juſtus Vulteius, which had been printed in 1550. There is a better and more correct edition of it ſince the year 1690, publiſhed by Pancratius Maaſvicius, principal of a college at Delft.

(1) De Hiſtor. Græc. pag. 227. See alſo pag. 480.

[B] One Polyænus a Sophiſt . . . who lived in the time of Julius Cæſar.] Voſſius (1) makes Suidas ſay, that this Sophiſt lived under Caligula. Moreri and Konig place him under the ſame emperor; but it is certain that Suidas places him under Julius Cæſar, ἐπὶ τῶ πρώτυ Καίσαρος Ταίυ. According to Charles Stephens, he lived in Cæſar's and Mark Antony's time, and this author will have it, that the triumph mentioned by Suidas was that which Mark Antony obtained over the Parthians: but he ſhould have ſaid, that it was Ventidius's triumph (2).

(2) Plut. in Antonio, & Valerius Maximus, lib. vi, cap. x, mention Ventidius's triumph.

POLITIAN (ANGELO), in Latin Politianus, was born at Monte Pulciano (a) in Tuſcany, the fourteenth of July 1454. He was one of the moſt learned and polite writers of his age [A]. He learned the Greek tongue under Andronicus of Theſſalonica, and made a great progreſs in it (b). It is ſaid that he was bred up a ſcholar with Marſilius Ficinus, at the charges of Coſmo de Medicis [B]. The firſt work that procured him reputation, was a Poem upon the tournament of Julian de Medicis [C]. Every body owned

(a) In Latin Mons Politianus.

(b) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latin. pag. 628.

(1) Sir Thomas-Pope Blount, Cenſura Author. pag. 357.

(2) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Critiq. Gramm. num. 315. Jugemens ſur les Traduct. Lat. num. 817; and in the Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, num. 1227.

(3) Barthius, Adverſ. lib. xlvii, cap. v.

(4) Boiſſard. in Iconib. apud Blount, ubi ſupra.

(5) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, pag. 193.

(6) Bullart. Academ. des Scienc. Tom. i, p. 277.

(7) Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Italiæ, p. m. 89.

[A] He was one of the moſt learned and polite writers of his age.] The learned are a little divided in their opinions about Politian's merit, and perhaps, no author was ever more unanimouſly praiſed. The two Scaligers have beſtowed great encomiums upon him, which is no ſmall glory to him. This, and ſeveral other paſſages in his praiſe, may be ſeen in Sir Thomas-Pope Blount (1). You may alſo conſult Mr Baillet (2), and Barthius (3), and Mr Crenius in the preface which he has prefixed to the new edition of the Hellenifmus of Caninius, printed at Leyden in the year 1700.

[B] It is ſaid that he was bred up a ſcholar . . . . at the charges of Coſmo de Medicis.] I ſhall quote Boiſſard for it. Is ſumptu, ſays he (4), & promotione Coſmi Florentinorum principis, cum Marſilio Ficino bonis literis inſtitutus eſt. I do not know from whence Varillas had the following circumſtances. 'He was a 'native of Florence, and his parents were ſo poor, 'that he was obliged to wait upon Julian and Laurence de Medicis, when they went to ſchool, and 'to carry their books, that he might make uſe of 'them (5).' It is not true that Politian was a native of Florence, as Varillas and Bullart (6) affirm: he was born at Monte Pulciano (7). Obſerve, 1. That Coſmo de Medicis died in the year 1464, and therefore Politian could not have enjoyed the favours of ſuch a patron but till he was ten years of age. 2. That Marſilius Ficinus was a grown man when Coſmo died; and therefore Boiſſard expreſſes himſelf very ill. Politian ſays, in one of his books, that being very young (8) he ſtudied the Platonic Philoſophy under Marſilius Ficinus, and that of Ariſtotle under Argyropylus.

(8) Tenera adhuc ætate. Politi. in fine Miſcellan.

[C] The firſt work that procured him reputation, was a poem upon the tournament of Julian de Medicis.] Let us quote Paul Jovius: 'Politianus à prima ſtatim juventa 'admirabilis ingenii nomen adeptus eſt; quum novo, 'illuſtrique poëmate Juliani Medicis equeſtres ludos 'celebraſſet, Luca Pulcio, nobili poëta omnium conſeſſione ſuperato, qui Laurentii fratris ludicrum 'equeſtris pugnæ ſpectaculum, iiſdem modis, & numeris decantarat (9). - - - - Politian had the reputation of an admirable genius from his very youth, having writ a new and celebrated poem upon the tournament of Julian de Medicis, wherein he is confeſſed by all to have out-done the famous Poet Luke Pulci, who had compoſed a poem of the like nature on the tournament of Laurence de Medicis, Julian's brother.' Theſe words intimate, that Pulci's poem was compoſed before that of Politian; and what confirms it is, that Julian de Medicis was Laurence's younger brother. Baillet and Varillas

(9) Jovius, Elog. cap. xxxviii, pag. 88.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google owned that he had better ſucceſs than Luke Pulci, an illuſtrious Poet, who likewiſe wrote a poem on the tournament of Laurence de Medicis, Julian's brother. The Hiſtory of the conſpiracy of the Pazzi, which he wrote ſome time after, was wonderfully cried up (c); and being made profeſſor of the Greek and Latin tongues at Florence, he acquired ſo much glory by it, that the ſcholars left Demetrius Chalcondylas, who was a native of Greece [D], and a very learned man; but his lectures, if compared with thoſe of Politian, were dry and barren. Politian's reputation increaſed more and more, when he publiſhed his Latin verſion of Herodian, his Miſcellanea, and his Latin poems. Had he lived longer, he would have enriched the commonwealth of learning with ſeveral excellent compoſures (d); but he died at forty years of age in 1494 [E]. If

(c) Taken from Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. xxxviii.

(d) See the preface of his works written by Aldus Manutius. You will find ſome paſſages out of it in Geſner's Bibliotheque, fol. 45.

Varillas underſtood thoſe words in the ſame ſenſe. 'Julian de Medicis won the prize at the tournament, 'and was deſirous to get a paranymph not inferior to 'Luke Pulci, who had ſignalized himſelf upon ſuch 'an occaſion, in the praiſe of Laurence de Medicis. 'Politian undertook it, and as he perceived that Pulci's 'poem was not all of the ſame force . . . . he ſtole 'the fineſt thoughts of the ancient panegyrics . . . 'and made ſo fine a piece, that after he had read it, 'Pulci had a mind to ſuppreſs his out of ſhame and 'vexation (10).' Baillet relates the ſame thing in different terms (11). But if we may believe the ſame Jovius in a book wherein he ſpeaks more largely of thoſe two tournaments, that of Laurence was celebrated after that of Julian, and Pulci made his poem after he had ſeen that of Politian (12). 'Ejus glorioſi laboris 'præmium fuit triumphus Politiani divini poëtæ car- 'minibus celebratus. Nec MULTO POST Laurentius 'ut fraternis laudibus æquaretur, novum ſpectaculum 'periculoſiſſimæ pugnæ edidit. . . . . Hujus quoque 'ſpecioſiſſimi certaminis memoriam Pulcius (13) ipſe 'Politiani æmulus perjucundo edito poëmate ſempiter- 'nam fecit. - - - - This glorious triumph was celebrated 'by the divine Poet Politian. Not long after Laurence, 'that he might not fall ſhort of his brother's praiſe, ſet 'forth a new ſpectacle of a dangerous fight. . . . . The 'memory of this ſpecious tournament was likewiſe made 'immortal by a very pretty poem of Pulci, the rival of 'Politian.' I do not know that this author ever ſaid that Pulci was ſo aſhamed and vexed, that he had a mind to ſuppreſs his poem. It might very well be an invention of Varillas, as well as the pretended method that Politian pitched upon to out-do a work that was not yet in being.

(10) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 194.

(11) Baillet, Enfans celebres, ch. xxvii.

(12) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, lib. i, pag. m. 15.

(13) Some lines before he calls him Aloyſius Pulcius. In his Elogia he calls him Luke. There were at that time three brothers at Florence, who were good Poets, Luke, Lewis, and Bernard Pulci.

[D] The ſcholars left Demetrius Chalcondylas, who was a native of Greece.] I find this particular in Jovius: Tantos de ſe excitavit clamores favente juventute ut Demetrius Chalcondyles vir Græcus præſtantique doctrina, uti aridus atque jejunus à Diſcipulis deſereretur (14). Here is an inſtance of the exorbitant liberty that Varillas took in his paraphraſes. 'When Argyropylus, 'ſays he (15), left his Greek Profeſſorſhip at Florence, 'Politian took poſſeſſion of it. Being a man of won- 'derful parts, and leaving nothing unattempted to 'ſucceed in his deſigns, he ſo pleaſed his hearers that 'he excluded all the Greeks who contended for that 'place. Chalcondylas, notwithſtanding his great hu- 'mility, and the little care he took of his own glory, 'could not brook the affront that was put upon his 'countrymen. He uſed his intereſt with Laurence de 'Medicis, who deſigned that he ſhould teach his chil- 'dren the Greek tongue, and obtained leave to read 'lectures in competition, and at the ſame time with 'Politian, to ſhew which of the two ſhould have more 'hearers. But Chalcondylas's harſh accent, which 'he could never leave off, and his difficulty to pro- 'nounce ſome Latin words, made him contemptible 'in compariſon of Politian, whoſe agreeable tone, 'and handſome expreſſions, charmed every body. 'Laurence de Medicis, who deſired by all means that 'Chalcondylas ſhould ſtay at Florence, was obliged 'to procure him ſome ſcholars, and endeavoured to 'perſuade Politian to be more civil to him. He un- 'dertook ſeveral times to reconcile them, but he 'found by his own experience, that it was more eaſy 'to reſtore peace to Italy, than ſettle it between two 'learned men. However, he prevented an open 'rupture between them during his life.' This nar- rative is grounded upon the following words of Jovius: 'Demetrius Chalcondyles . . . . . ſcholam 'Florentiæ inſtauravit, deſertam ab Argyropylo, & 'à Politiano deficientibus Græcis occupatam; ſed 'ambitioſo, peracrique æmulo, multis bonis, maliſ- 'que artibus ſuggeſtus locum, & nomen defendenti 'Demetrius ceſſit; Latina præſertim facundia infe- 'rior, & ob id rareſcente auditorio à juventute deſti- 'tutus, quandoquidem vel apprimè doctus, facilè jeju- 'nus, & hebes, laſcivis & delicatis auribus videri po- 'terat: quibus Politiani decantantis, & varios ſpar- 'gentis flores, jucunda argutaque vox, & ſalſa comi- 'tas mira dulcedine placuiſſet. Sed manſit Demetrio 'honeſtus gratiæ locus apud Laurentium, vel infeſto, '& oblique ſemper inceſſente Politiano, qui quum 'neminem è Latinis ſibi parem pateretur, Græcis 'ipſis eruditior exiſtimari volebat. Diviſit idcirco 'munera Laurentius, ut æmulationis lites dirimeret, '& filii præceptorum contentione ad diſcendum ac- 'cenderentur (16). - - - - Demetrius Chalcondylas . . . 'at Florence, adorned the ſchools which Argyropylus had 'left, and which Politian, the Greek profeſſors failing, 'had got poſſeſſion of; but he was forced to yield to his 'active and ambitious rival, who ſupported his place 'and reputation by many good as well as by many evil 'arts, eſpecially ſince Demetrius was far ſhort of the 'other in his knowledge of the Latin-tongue, for which 'reaſon chiefly he was deſerted by his ſcholars, becauſe 'notwithſtanding his great learning he ſeemed barren and 'inſipid to wanton and delicate ears; whereas Politian 'pleaſed them beyond meaſure by the variety of his rhe- 'torical flowers, by his ſweet and ſonorous voice, and by 'his polite and engaging behaviour. Nevertheleſs, De- 'metrius ſtill preſerved the favour of Laurence de Medi- 'cis, in ſpite of the malicious and underhand attacks of 'Politian, who, as he could bear no rival among the 'Latins, ſo he wanted to be thought more learned than 'the Greeks themſelves. Laurence therefore divided their 'offices, that he might put an end to their quarrels ariſing 'from emulation, and that the earneſt pains of two con- 'tending maſters might prove a ſpur to the application of 'his children.' The reader will not find in this paſ- ſage, that Politian excluded all the Greeks who under- took to diſpute the chair, nor that Chalcondylas looked upon it as an intolerable affront, nor that Lau- rence de Medicis procured him ſome hearers. The laſt period of Jovius ſeems to be obſcure; the mean- ing of it is, that Laurence divided that employment to compoſe the differences ariſing from emulation, and to excite in his children a greater deſire of ſtudying, by the diſputes of their maſters. Methinks thoſe two motives are hardly conſiſtent. Mr Bullart ſays, that Chalcondylas was forced to reſign his place to Politian, who diſpoſſeſſed him of it by his intrigues and artifices, and that Laurence de Medicis gave them different em- ployments to . . . . remove the cauſe of ſuch a troubleſome emulation (17).

(14) Paul. Jovius, in Elog. cap. xxxviii, pag. m. 88.

(15) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 179, 180.

(16) Paul. Jovius, Elog. cap. xxix, pag. m. 69.

(17) Bullart. Academ. des Scienc. Tom. i, pag. 281.

[E] He died at forty years of age, in 1494.] It was at Florence on the 24th of September (18). Volater- ran is more exact in his computation than Jovius: the latter will have it that he had entered into his forty- fourth year (19); the other ſays, he was only forty years of age (20). Several authors are miſtaken, as to the time of his death, which they place in 1509. Eber (21) and Reuſnerus (22) do ſo, as Voſſius ob- ſerves. Nathan Chytræus mentions this epitaph of Politian, as having been tranſcribed in St Mark's church at Florence:

Politianus in hoc tumulo jacet Angelus, unum
Qui caput & linguas, res nova, tres habuit.

Obiit an. 1509, Septemb. 24.

Here lies Politian, who, things ſtrange indeed,
Had, when alive, three tongues, and but one head.

He died the 24th of September, 1509.

(18) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 629.

(19) Vix quadrageſimum quartum ætatis annum attigerat. Jovius, Elog. cap. xxxviii, pag. 89.

(20) Deceſſit quadragenarius. Volater. lib. xxi, p. 777. See a paſſage of Marſilius Ficinus, in Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

(21) In Faſtis apud Voſſium, ubi ſupra.

(22) In Dario Hiſtorico, apud eumd. ibid.

This

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

If what is reported to have occaſioned his death was true [F], one might ſay, that his morals were more anſwerable to the uglineſs of his face, than to the beauty of his wit [G]. Some of his poems were ſo much admired, that ſeveral learned men made it their buſineſs to comment upon them [H]. I muſt not forget that he was a prieſt and canon of Florence (e), and preceptor to the children of Laurence de Medicis

(e) See the remark [I].

This we find in the 110th page of the Variorum in Europa itinerum deliciæ, collected by Nathan Chytræus, in the ſecond edition of the year 1599, apud Chriſtophorum Corvinum in 8vo; but Father Mabillon affirms, that there is no epitaph on Politian's tomb (23). What he further ſays does not differ from Chytræus, and he places that tomb in St Mark's church at Florence, and Politian's death in the year 1509, as does alſo St Romauld (24). Voſſius has ſolidly confuted this date; he alledges a proof grounded upon this, viz. that John Picus Mirandula, Hermolaus Barbarus, and Politian died in the ſame year. Palmerius's Continuator affirms it; and we have a letter of Marſilius Ficinus, wherein Politian's death is lamented, as having quickly followed that of John Picus. Now every body owns that John Picus died in 1494. Theſe are Voſſius's proofs; to which I add, that Peter Crinitus, a diſciple of Politian, ſays, that the three learned men abovementioned died the ſame year that Charles VIII made an irruption into Italy (25), which plainly denotes the year 1494.

(23) Mabill. in Muſeo Ital. Tom. i, p. 178.

(24) Peter de St Romuald, Abregé Chronol. Tom. iii, p. m. 262, ad ann. 1509.

(25) Crinitus de honeſta Diſcipl. lib. xv, cap. ix.

[F] If what was ſaid to have occaſioned his death was true.] I will make uſe of Varillas's words (26): 'Death 'ſurprized him at forty-two (27) years of age. Not being 'able to ſatisfy the unchaſte love he had conceived for 'one of his ſcholars, who was a youth of quality, he fell 'into a fever, and in the violence of the fit he made 'a ſong for the beloved object, got out of his bed, 'took his lute, and fell a ſinging ſuch a moving and 'doleful tune, that he expired as he was ending the 'ſecond couplet, the ſame day (28) that Charles VIII 'croſſed the Alps in order to conquer Naples.' Thus Varillas has been pleaſed to tranſlate this paſſage of Jovius: Ferunt eum ingenui adoleſcentis inſano amore percitum, facilè in letalem morbum incidiſſe. Correpta enim cithara, quum eo incendio, & rapida febre torreretur, ſupremi furoris carmina decantavit; ita, ut mox deliran-tem, vox ipſa, & digitorum nervi, & vitalis denique ſpiritus, inverecunda urgente morte deſererent (29). Some ſay, not being able to reſiſt the violence of his love, he daſhed his head againſt a wall (30). Another author gives a different account of the death of this learned man. 'His death, ſays he, was not very edi-'fying. Mr Balzac ſpeaks of it in the following man-'ner: We are now certainly informed of the circum-'ſtances of Politian's death, which have been diſ-'guiſed by cardinal Bembo in his epitaph upon him. 'As he was ſinging upon a lute, at the top of a ſtair-'caſe, a ſong which he had formerly made for a young 'woman, with whom he was in love, when he came 'to ſome verſes that were very moving, his lute fell 'from his hands, and he himſelf fell down ſtairs and 'broke his neck. That cardinal ſaid in his epitaph, that 'he died as he was ſinging ſome mournful verſes 'upon the death of Alexander duke of Florence, who 'had been wickedly killed by his couſin (31).' There is a groſs falſity in theſe words; for this Alexander duke of Florence, was killed forty-three years after Politian's death. The epitaph (32) upon the latter, made by Peter Bembo, imports, that he died as he was ſinging ſome doleful verſes on the death of Laurence de Medicis. Bullart advances a falſity, when he makes cardinal Bembo ſay, that Politian fell down ſtairs as he was ſinging upon his lute an elegy he had made on the death of Laurence de Medicis (33). The verſes of that cardinal, mentioned by him, ſay nothing of that kind. What does an author dream of, when he alledges a paſſage that is plainly againſt him? It is to be obſerved that ſome ſay, that the ſtory mentioned by Jovius is a meer calumny. Read theſe fine words of Pierius Valerianus: 'Angelus Politianus, nullius ig-'narus eruditionis, & diſciplinæ, cùm in adverſa Me-'dicorum procerum tempora incidiſſet, inclinantibus 'jam Petri, quem ipſe literis inſtituerat, rebus, in eam 'incidit ægritudinem, ut in multis, & variis moleſtiis, 'cogitationibuſque conſolationem nullam admittere 'voluerit, atque ita demum dolore, mœſtitiaque con-'fectus expirarit. Quodque illi longè fuit infelicius 'conficta in eum turpitudinis fabula maledicentiſſimis 'obtrectationibus proſciſſus, calumniatuſque eſt, utque 'ea gens promptiſſima eſt ad inſimulandum in invi-'diam Petri ipſius ignominioſam aliam mortis volun-'tariæ cauſam univerſo terrarum orbi magna cum 'ejus infamia propalarunt (34). - - - Politian, a man 'of univerſal erudition, was ſo concerned at the troubles 'of the houſe of Medicis, eſpecially when the affairs of 'Peter, whoſe preceptor he had been, began to be in a 'declining ſtate, that he contracted a very deep melan-'choly, which preyed upon him to ſuch a degree, that 'he would admit of no comfort in his many afflictions 'and uneaſy thoughts, and ſo died at length of pure grief 'and vexation. And which was a greater misfortune 'to him ſtill, his memory was aſperſed by a cruel and 'malicious ſtory which they coined upon him; and as that 'ſet of men bore no good will to Peter, they gave out, 'that there was another infamous cauſe of Politian's vo-'luntary death, which redounded very much to his pupil's 'diſhonour.' According to this account, Politian died only of the grief he conceived for the decay of the houſe of Medicis. Philoſophers may cenſure this as a Phyſical, but not as a Moral defect.

(26) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 196.

(27) It ſhould be forty.

(28) This is not true. Charles VIII went over the Alps, before the 24th of September 1494.

(29) Jovius, Elog. cap. xxxviii, p. 89.

(30) Vulgo fertur obiiſſe Politianum fœdi amoris impatientia capite in parietem illiſo. Voſſius, ubi ſupra, p. 629.

(31) Peter de St Romuald, ubi ſupra, p. 262.

(32) It is in Jovius, ubi ſupra, p. 90, 91.

(33) Bullart, Academ. Tom. i, p. 278.

(34) Pierius Valerianus, de Litterator. Infelic. lib. ii, p. 70, 71.

[G] One might ſay that his morals were more anſwerable to the uglineſs of his face, than to the beauty of his wit.] It is likely that his great zeal for the houſe of Medicis expoſed him to horrid calumnies, whilſt the Florentines, fond of a Republican liberty, inſulted that family in their exile, and vented all ſorts of paſquinades. I will not therefore affirm, that Jovius's ſtory is well grounded; but I may boldly ſay, that Politian contracted a pride and envy, which learning is but too commonly attended with. We have ſeen (35), that in order to maintain himſelf againſt his rival, he indifferently made uſe of lawful and unlawful means. The following paſſage will diſcover to us his envy and preſumption. 'Erat diſtortis ſæpe moribus, uti facie 'nequaquam ingenua, & liberali, ab enormi præſer-'tim naſo, ſubluſcoque oculo perabſurda, ingenio au-'tem aſtuto, aculeato, occulteque livido, quum aliena 'ſemper irrideret, nec ſua, vel non iniquo judicio 'expungi pateretur (36). - - - - His manners were 'awkward, his face, ungenteel, ugly, and remarkably 'deformed by a huge noſe and a ſquinting eye. His mind 'was crafty, ſatirical, and full of inward malice; for 'his cuſtom was to laugh at the productions of other men, 'and not to allow of any criticiſm, however juſt it was, 'upon his own.' If you had rather have Varillas's paraphraſe upon theſe words, read what follows: 'He had a very ugly face, and a very large and long 'noſe; he ſquinted with his left eye, and was a pliant 'and nicely ambitious man. He uſed a great deal of 'art to diſguiſe himſelf, eſpecially with reſpect to 'thoſe whom he was moſt converſant with; he could 'not bear that any body ſhould be praiſed, and equally 'envied his friends and his enemies. He never liked 'the compoſures of other men, and hated to be ad-'viſed, tho' he was very troubleſome in adviſing 'others. It appeared ſometimes that he was ſenſible 'of his faults, and that he oppoſed truth meerly out 'of malice; and yet he never owned that he had been 'in a fault (37).'

(35) Above, citation (16).

(36) Jovius, ubi ſupra, p. 89.

(37) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 193.

[H] Several learned men made it their buſineſs to comment upon his poems.] Nicolas Beraldus wrote a commentary (38) upon Politian's Sylva, intituled, Ruſticus; and John Murmelius did the ſame. Francis Sanchez, profeſſor at Salamanca, a Grammarian, ſo much praiſed by Scioppius, publiſhed his notes in the year 1544, upon the four Sylvas of Politian. John Alexander Braſſicanus publiſhed a commentary at Nuremberg in 1538, upon that which is intituled Nutricia. Jodocus Badius added ſome notes of his own to Politian's works, which he publiſhed at Paris, in the year 1519, in folio. He likewiſe added to them the notes of Francis Sylvius upon Politian's epiſtles. Thoſe epiſtles were reprinted in quarto, for the ſame Badius, in the year 1526, with the ſame obſervations. Braſſicanus makes great complaints againſt a Plagiary. 'Meminit, ſays 'he (39), & Politianus in Nutritiis, ubi quidam nuga-'tor arrogantiſſimus noſtra ante nos dixit: Expungen-'dus jam & plane radendus è Philologiæ faſtis quo-'niam, ut Cicero dixit, maluit improbè tollere quàm 'humaniter

(38) Printed at Baſil in the year 1518. See Crenius, Animadv. Philol. Part iii, p. 55, but inſtead of Beroaldus, read there Beraldus.

(39) Jo. Alexander Braſſicanus, Schol. in Petronium.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Medicis (f). He is said to have spoken of the Bible with great contempt [I], whereupon some make it a question, whether he ought not to be reckoned an Atheist [K]; but others justify him, by denying the fact (g). I could easily believe what we are told of the judgment he made on David's Psalms, and the Odes of Pindar [L]. He (f) Volater. lib. xxi, pag. 777.

(g) See the remark [I].

'humaniter sumere & agnoscere. - - - - Politian makes 'mention, in his Nutritia, of a certain insolent scribbler 'who published the sentiments of others before they had 'done so themselves. Such a fellow's name ought to be 'blotted out of the catalogue of learned men, because, as 'Cicero said, he rather chose to take impudently than to 'borrow with a good grace, and acknowledge it.' This complaint seems to concern a man who stole manuscripts.

[I] He is said to have spoken of the Bible with great contempt.] Ludovicus Vives is, perhaps, the first who taxed him with it: Angelus Politianus, says he (40), totam sacram lectionem asternabatur. - - - - treated the whole Scripture with contempt. Melanchthon expresses the thing with greater energy; for he says, that Politian having read the Bible but once, complained, that he had never spent his time so ill. Melanchthon ait semel solum sacras literas legisse, dixisseque nullum se tempus pejus collocasse (41). Which has been repeated by a thousand writers (42). Vossius denies it as a thing little credible (43), and alledges two reasons for it: 1. That Politian was a priest and a canon of Florence. 2. That he preached a whole Lent, as appears from these words: 'Cum per hos quadrageſimæ proximos dies 'enarrandis populo sacris literis essem occupatus, per- 'legi tamen libros carminum tuorum quos mihi pro 'singulari humanitate tua mutuoque inter nos amore 'dedicaveras (44) - - - - Though I was taken up in this 'Lent in preaching, nevertheless I found time to read 'over your books of poetry, which you were so good as to 'dedicate to me, on account of our mutual friendship.' Some (45) think that the second reason alledged by Vossius, is a solid confutation of Melanchthon's passage; but others value neither of them. 'Hæc ratio 'nimis tenuis videbitur iis qui norunt quantopere 'Atheismus seu Epicureismus sive libertinismus grassetur 'inter Sacerdotes non tantum Canonicos & Mona- 'chos papales, sed etiam inter Prælatos, Cardinales, 'Pontifices (46). - - - - This argument appears weak to 'those who know how much Atheism, Epicureism, and 'Libertinism, prevail among priests, not only monks, 'and canons, but likewise bishops, cardinals, and 'Popes.' This is what Voëtius says against the first reason; and what he says against the second is contained in the following words: 'Quasi vero postillistæ 'coram populo istic concionantes ut plurimum absque 'lectione scripturæ, ex inspectis legendis, postillis, 'homiliariis, dormi secure, thesauris pauperum con- 'cionatorum & similibus myrotheciis prædicare non 'soleant. Prædicavit etiam aliquando coram populo 'Cæsar Atheorum Vaninus, quod tamen illum è nu- 'mero profanorum non eximit (47). - - - As if these 'lecturers, holding forth to the people, generally without 'reading the Bible, were not used to take their discourses 'out of the legends, postils, homilies, the dormi secure, 'the thesauri pauperum concionatorum, and the like 'collections. Vaninus himself, the prince of Atheists, 'preached sometimes before the people, which nevertheless 'did not hinder his being among the number of the 'profane.' This author observes, that we must not think that Melanchthon and Mornai cried down Politian, being acted by a factious spirit; for, adds he, Gabriel Putherbeus, a passionate author against the Protestants, taxed Politian with the same thing (48). But it is fit the reader should know this Putherbeus did but transcribe Ludovicus Vives word for word, and that du Plessis Mornai alledged the testimony of the same Vives (49), and therefore these several evidences amount only to one.

Mr Crenius has lately imparted to the public the observations which his great reading afforded him concerning this particular. He does not think the reasons alledged by Vossius to be solid, and quotes some authorities, whereby it appears, that the preachers did not much mind the Bible at that time (50). What he quotes out of Aristarchus Philosophicus (51), a book little known in this country (52), is very curious. I have read in Manlius's Common-Places, taken most of them from Melanchthon's lectures, that it was not the Bible but the Breviary, of which Politian spoke with so much contempt. Politianus Canonicus Florentinus interrogatus an legisset horas Canonicas? Dixit semel perlegi istum librum & nunquam pejus collocavi tempus (53).

(40) Ludov. Vives, de Veritate Fid. Christ. lib. ii, p. 264, Edit. Basil. 1544.

(41) Vossius, de Poët. Lat. p. 80. He quotes Tom. iii, declamationum, p. 545.

(42) Mr Teissier, among others, in his Additions to the Elogies, Tom. i, p. 11, but instead of quoting Melanchthon, he quotes Vives, who does not say what he mentions.

(43) Vossius, ubi supra.

(44) Angelus Politianus, Epist. X, lib. iv, ad Joannem Gottium Ragusinum, fol. m. 106.

(45) Boxhor. in Monument. illustr. Viror. apud Pope Blount, Censor. Auth. p. 359. Boremans. Var. Lect. p. 126.

(46) Voët. Disp. Theol. Tom. ii, p. 1273.

(47) Ibid. pag. 1274.

(48) Putherbeus, de tollendis & expurgandis malis Libris. lib. i, p. 81.

(49) Mornai, Verité de la Religion, ch. xxvi, fol. m. 336.

(50) Thomas Crenius, Animadv. Philolog. & Hist. Part iii, p. 22, & seq. Leyden 1698.

(51) Written by Henry Ernstius, counsellor to the king of Denmark, and printed at Hamburg in 1678, in 8vo.

(52) Admodum raro & inde hic paucis noto. Crenius, ibid. p. 25.

(53) Joannes Manlius, in Locor. Common. Collectan. Travlo de Satisfact. p. m. 99.

[K] Some make it a question whether he ought not to be reckoned an Atheist.] Voëtius asks whether Politian ought not to be suspected of indifference in point of religion, as Lucian was, or of Epicureism (54); and he answers that, according to Mornai, Politian complained, that he had never spent his time so ill, as when he read the Scripture (55). He adds, That he does not know how that Critic, and some others died; but that if one may guess at it from their studies, they were like the Philosopher Averrhoes, who, slighting the Christian religion, wished his soul might be among the Philosophers. Note, That Mornai does not say what Voëtius ascribes to him. Authors are full of such falsities; which proceeds from their trusting to the quotations of others, without taking the pains to verify them. I must not forget these words of Peter de St Romuald: Some writers say, that Politian professed Atheism privately with Marsilius Ficinus, and Domitius Calderinus a priest (56).

(54) Voët. Disp. Theol. Tom. i, p. 206.

(55) De Politiano refert Plessius in libro de veritate religionis Christianæ, quod dixerit numquam se bonas horas suas pejus collocasse quam in lectione scripturæ. Ibid.

(56) Peter de St Romuald, ubi supra.

[L] I could easily believe what we are told of the judgment he made of David's Psalms, and the Odes of Pindar.] He did not deny that there are many good and fine things in the Psalms; but he pretended that the same things appear in Pindar with more brightness and sweetness. One of his scholars is said to have related this. Here are Melanchthon's own words. 'Dionysius Capnio, qui adolescens audivit Angelum 'Politianum, narrabat eum interrogatum aliquando, 'quid de Psalmis Davidis sentiret, & ad quid prodesse 'eorum lectionem judicaret, respondisse, sibi vero pla- 'cere illa antiqua carmina, & continere ea partim 'honesta præcepta, partim gravissimas conciones de 'providentia & de sceleratorum pœnis: partim que- 'relas de infirmitate hominum utiles ad frenandos 'immoderatos impetus: partim historias ejus gentis. 'Sed addidit Politianus hanc collationem, res easdem 'dulcius & splendidius narrari in odis Pindaricis, ibi 'pingi Ixionem in rota clamantem, Discite justitiam moniti, & non spernere divos.

'Ibi describi Bellerophontem propter priores victorias 'factum insolentiorem, & vehi Pegaso intra cœlum 'volantem, id est, res non necessarias ambitiose mo- 'ventem, excuti à Pegaso & dejici in Ciliciam. Ibi 'celebrari Pelei castitatem, qui expetitus ab Acasti 'conjuge, & ab ea falso accusatus, & objectus Cen- 'tauris, servatur accepto gladio divinitus. Denique 'multas imagines pulcherrimas, multas historias & 'gravissima præcepta tradi. Hæc Politiani oratio & 'si speciosa est, tamen est hominis ignorantis discri- 'men inter genera doctrinarum, inter legem & Evan- 'gelium (57). - - - Dionysius Capnio, who in his youth 'was Politian's scholar, used to tell of him, that being 'one day asked what he thought of David's Psalms, and 'what advantage one could have by reading them, he 'answered, that he was truly very much pleased with 'these old Poems, for that they contained partly moral 'precepts, partly solid discourses upon providence, and the 'punishments of the wicked: partly complaints upon the 'weakness of human nature, such as were fit to bridle 'our immoderate desires; and partly historical accounts 'of that nation. But Politian added, by way of compa- 'rison, that the same things were set forth in Pindar's 'Odes with more sweetness and lustre; for that there 'was represented Ixion upon a wheel, crying out,

- - - Learn to be just, take warning here
And cease at the immortal gods to sneer.

'That there Bellerophon is described as puffed up with 'his former victories, and flying within the circumference 'of Heaven, mounted upon Pegasus, that is, ambitiously 'fond of unnecessary enterprizes. Next he is represented 'as thrown by Pegasus, and fallen into Cilicia. That 'there the chastity of Peleus is celebrated, who being 'tempted

(57) Melanchthon in Epistolis ad Adamum Crato-nem, præfixa Exegesi Nicolai Asclepii Barbati de antiquo & profundo cultu Dei.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He is also charged with being a plagiary [M]. George Merula was one of his adversaries

'tempted by the wife of Acastus, and afterwards falsely 'accused by her, and exposed to the Centaurs, was pre- 'served by having a sword miraculously put into his 'hands. In short, that they contained several beautiful 'images, many valuable passages of History, and many 'solid precepts of Morality. These words of Politian, al- 'though they have a specious appearance do nevertheless 'shew him unacquainted with the different kinds of do- 'ctrine: between the Law and the Gospel.' Manlius, in the book above quoted, does not ascribe this opinion to Politian, but to Lazarus Bonamicus. Lazarus Bonamicus vir doctus cum esset interrogatus quomodo ei placeret Psalterium respondit placere sibi, recitari enim ibi egregias sententias de providentia: sed tamen nihilo melius esse quam Pindari poëma (58). It does not appear from these Latin words, that Bonamicus preferred Pindar to David, but only that he made them equal: And yet the commentator upon Gaffarel affirms, on the credit of a German Divine, that Bonamicus set a greater value upon Pindar, than upon David's psalms: Ejusdem blasphemiæ veneno correptus fuit Lazarus Bon-Amicus Italus, qui vociferabat se Odas Pindaricas præferre hymnis Davidicis. Vid. beatus Dn. Selneccerus Explicat. in 1 Cor. viii. p. 496 (59). He had been saying that Politian uttered the same blasphemy. This shews that Melanchthon, or his transcribers, are not uniform in their accounts, which is an usual thing when people go only upon a hear-say. Peucerus has inserted in a letter (60) what I have quoted above out of Melanchthon..

(58) Manlius, ubi supra, Titulo de Veteri & Novo Testamento, p. 81.

(59) Gregorius Michael, Præpositus Regius Flensburgensis, Noris in Jacobi Gaffarelli Curiositates, p. 110.

(60) Peucer, Epist. ad Christ. Carlowitz. See Saldenus de Libris, p. 434.

[M] He was also accused of being a Plagiary.] Every body knows it has been said, that he appropriated to himself the Latin translation of Herodian made by Tiphernas, and that he did no more than alter some parts of it. Leo X said, that this calumny had been vented by those who envied Politian's glory. 'Quamquam æmuli eam translationem, uti nos à Le- 'one Pontifice accepimus, Gregorii Tiphernatis fuisse 'dicerent, quod passim inducto fuco, & falsis nævo- 'rum coloribus interlita alieni styli habitum mentire- 'tur (61). - - - Though his rivals, as I have been told 'by Pope Leo, ascribed that translation to Gregory Ti- 'phernas, and pretended that Politian had given it a 'new turn of style by introducing a multitude of flourishes 'and false colourings.' This is all that Jovius says of it: I should be glad to know in what author Varillas found the Particulars contained in the following narrative. 'He published a translation of Herodian, 'which did not procure him all the satisfaction he ex- 'pected from it; for though it was generally admired, 'a report went about, that Politian had found it a- 'mong the papers of the famous Gregorio de Citta di 'Castello, which he had bought; and this report 'was grounded upon some conjectures, that were but 'weakly confuted. Pope Leo, who was then Poli- 'tian's scholar, and heard whatever was said pro and 'con at his father's table, being desired twenty years 'after, by the academists of Rome, to tell them what 'he thought of it, left the thing doubtful, and owned 'that the stile of that translation was not at all like 'the other works of Politian, and savoured much 'more of the art and flourishes that were to be seen 'in the compositures of Gregorio de Citta di Castello. 'However, he added (as if he had been afraid of 'having said too much) that this Gregorio had done 'nothing that came up to the translation of Herodian '(62).' I am apt to believe that the author of this narrative went only upon Jovius's words, which he inlarged upon and paraphrased at pleasure, as if he had been writing a Romance. However, he did not understand them, for the art and flourishes that were observed in that version, were not ascribed to Tiphernas, but to Politian. If Leo X had spoken of it, as Varillas will have it, Jovius would not have rejected that accusation as a thing that deserved no credit (63). Note, that the best Critics reject it; they find the same spirit and the same character in every part of that translation. Tiphernas was not able to produce such a master-piece (64). It had been an easier thing for Politian to translate the whole work, than to give such a form to the translation of another.

(61) Paul. Jovius, ubi supra, p. 88.

(62) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 195.

(63) Paul. Jovius, Elog. cap. cxvii, p. 259.

(64) Henry Stephens did very much criticize it. Consult Mr Crenius, ubi supra, p. 22, &c.

It is more difficult to clear him of some other thefts with which he is charged; for what can one answer for him to these words of Budæus? 'Plutarchus 'in eo libro, quem de Homero composuit; qui liber 'nondum Latinus ex professo factus est, licet Politia- 'nus, vir ille quidem excellentis doctrinæ, sed animi 'non satis ingenui, ex eo libro rerum summas ad ver- 'bum transcribens, quasique flores præcerpens, non e- 'rubuit id opus pro suo edere, in quo nullam præter- 'quam transcribendi ac vertendi operam navaverat (65). - - - Plutarch in his book upon Homer, of which none 'has hitherto undertaken to give a Latin translation, 'though Politian, a man of greater learning than can- 'dor, transcribing the substance word for word, and, as 'it were, gathering the flowers of it, has not been 'ashamed to publish that work as his own, which cost 'him no other trouble besides that of translating and copy- 'ing.' Budæus told a story, which has been printed, and we find in it a notable trick of Politian. The thing is this. That Professor set forth with an emphasis in his auditory, many things as his own, which he had from Herodotus. John Lascaris, who was one of his hearers, took him aside and reproved him for his boldness. I could never have believed, answered Politian, that such a Grecian as you are, should have been ignorant of the artifice that is made use of in order to get the esteem of the public. You are three or four, at most, among my hearers, who have read Herodotus. What is that in comparison of that crowd of scholars, who applaud and extol me to the sky? I am apt to believe that you will not be so malicious as to undertake to prejudice them against me; and I think it would be to little purpose if you went about it. I shall set down the original words. Non possum mihi temperare, quin tibi nunc referam, quod Budæus noster de Angelo Politiano quondam nobis domi suæ narrare solebat, idque se ex Jano Lascare, qui Politiani fuerat æqualis, crebrò audivisse confirmabat. Cum enim Politianus Florentiæ Interpretationem Homericæ Iliados in magna celebritate aggrederetur; non sine ingenti ostentatione quæ de Homeri Poëmate perscripta sunt ab Herodoto, auditoribus suis è suggesto recitabat, quo tempore Herodoti liber Græcè scriptus, à nullo adhuc conversus in linguam Latinam, nec Typographorum formis excusus erat. Itaque Lascaris, qui tum bonoris causâ auditorum numerum augebat, cum paucis quibusdam aliis Græcè doctis hominibus, qui non ignorarent unde omnia, quæ pro suis recitaverat, hausisset. Is igitur paulo post ad hominem conversus, eumque seducens, Dic mihi quæso, inquit, Politiane, quo ore Herodoti Opus insigne, quod ante tot sæcula conscriptum est, in tanto cœtu ut tuum recitasti? Cui mox subridens Politianus, Nunquam, inquit, putassem, Jane, hominem Græcum adeò ejus artificii rudem & ignarum esse, quo apud multitudinem existimatio & fama comparari solet. Quasi vero, inquit, non satis intelligam tres aut ad summum quatuor fortassis vos hic adesse, quibus Herodoti libros aliquando inspicere contigerit. Sed quænam hic sit turba nobis applaudentium & in cœlum laudibus ferentium vides, apud quos si existimationem nostram (quod minimè spero) vel tantillum lædere volueritis; Oratio profectò vestra non multum fidei ponderisque habitura est (66). I must not forget what concerns his Miscellanea. He shewed them to his friends in manuscript, which was the reason why this work was very much talked of before it was printed; but a story went about, that Politian had stolen many things from a compilation, intituled, Copiæ Cornu, and made by Nicolas Perotus: It was said that the duke of Urbino had lent him the original, thinking it would be a thing acceptable to Laurence de Medicis. When Politian heard this news, he put off the publication of his work. In the mean time, the book of Nicolas Perotus came out, and put an end to the slander; for those who compared it with Politian's Miscellanea, did not find that the latter had stolen any thing from the other. Politian gives a large account of this towards the end of the book. I shall only set down some of his words. 'Fit concursus. Est in manibus '(Copiæ Cornu). Effunditur. Excutitur. Quid mul- 'ta? calumnia me liberat. Vidisses continuò non- 'nullorum vultus lugubre quiddam tacentes . . . . . '& erubescentes. . . . . Tantum constiterit in præ- 'sentiarum, non idem spectâsse me, quod ejus volu- 'minis autorem, nec par utrique destinatum præsti- 'tumque fastigium. Quod si locos eosdem pro re 'natâ forte uterque tractavimus, (id autem incidere 'alicubi fuit necesse), crassior tamen inter nos, quàm 'inter Pyramum Thysbenque paries (67). - - - Several 'of the learned met. They had the book (Copiæ Cornu) 'in their hands. It was opened, and examined. What 'occasion is there for many words. It cleared me from 'the (65) Budæus, Annot. in Pandectas, fol. m. 151 verso.

(66) Franciscus Duarenus, Operum, p. 1478, Edit. 1584, apud Colomesium, in Opuscul. cap. xxxi, p. m. 66.

(67) Politian. in fine Miscellan. apud Thomasium, de Plagio Literario, pag. 235.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

adverſaries [N]. Some ſay that he was very much abuſed by the Poet Marullus [O]. He has been juſtly placed in the catalogue of illuſtrious children; but Varillas, who

' the aſperſion. You might have ſuddenly perceived the ' countenances of ſome mournfully ſilent . . . . and bluſh- ' ing. . . . . Let this ſuffice at preſent, that the au- ' thor of that book and I had not the ſame point in ' view, and did not arrive to the ſame pitch. If per- ' adventure we have both occaſionally treated of the ſame ' matters, (which could not ſometimes be avoided) yet ' there is a thicker wall between us than that which ' divided Pyramus from Thiſbe.' Notwithſtanding this, Hereſbachius called him a great thief (68). Note, that Politian complained that ſome Plagiaries had ſtolen from him (69), and he threatned to purſue them in order to recover his own.

(68) Hereſbachius in Præfat. librorum ſuorum de re ruſtica futaciſſimum vocat Politianum, atque in Panepiſtemone aliorum non intellecta congeſſiſſe. Thomaſius, ibid. p. 235, 236.

(69) Id. Polit. ib. ap. eumd. p. 234.

[N] George Merula was one of his adverſaries.] He was Profeſſor in the college of Milan: ' He did not ' ſpare Politian, though the latter had acquired a ſuf- ' ficient reputation to ſtand upon his own bottom. ' He ſhewed him, that though nature had beſtowed ' upon him all the neceſſary qualifications to become ' a learned man, yet ſhe had not made him ſuch. ' He obſerved to him above thirty conſiderable faults, ' which had eſcaped him, and told him in a chari- ' table way (as he ſaid) that whoever pretends to ' keep the firſt rank in the commonwealth of learn- ' ing, muſt have read and ſtudied more than all the ' reſt together (70). . . . . Politian was the greateſt ' gainer by his death. He had publiſhed the firſt ' century of his Miſcellanea (§ z), and Merula being ' offended at the boldneſs of the word Century, threat- ' ened to alledge a world of paſſages and authorities, ' to juſtify the contrary to what was contained in it; ' but he had only time to draw a rough draught of ' his project (71).' The laſt part of this narrative is grounded upon Jovius's words (72); but I do not know what authority may be alledged for the foundation of the firſt. Obſerve, that Politian wrote very ſharp letters to Merula (73), and ſeemed to deſire that Ludovicus Sforza would permit his adverſary to publiſh his critical remarks.

(70) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 192.

(71) Ibid. pag. 193.

(72) Politiano obiter vehementi metu liberato, cum in miſcellaneam ejus centuriam cohortes & alas quæ impetu obruerent emiſſurus eſſe diceretur. Jovius, Elog. cap. xxxvii, p. 87.

(73) See the 11th book of Politian's letters.

[(§ α) In a letter of Peter Crinitus to Alexander Sartius, inſerted in Vol. 1. page 384 of Politian's works, publiſhed by Gryphius in the year 1550, are mentioned ſome paſſages of the ſecond part of Politian's Miſcellanies, compoſed, as Crinitus ſays, and finiſhed at the intreaty of Sartius, and out of regard to him, but pilfered from the author by ſome body, who had thereby occaſioned the public's being deprived to that time of ſuch a valuable piece. This ſecond part contained among others twenty chapters, the titles of which are mentioned in the ſame letter. Accordingly the Baſil edition of 1522 has in the title Centuria una, - - - one Century, and not as the others Centuria I. which is equivocal, and ſeems to import that there is a ſecond century of his Miſcellanies extant. In the following letter the ſame Peter Crinitus mentions the titles of other eight chapters of the ſame ſecond century ſeen, as he ſays, in manuſcript by ſeveral of the author's friends. As for the reſt, this ſecond letter of Crinitus ends with an epigram, wherein the author makes Politian ſpeak in terms which plainly aſſign the year 1494 for the year of his death. I ſhall quote the laſt verſes of this epigram.

Is ille ego Angelus Politianus ſum.
Fovit benigno me ſinu Flora, & illic
In fata ceſſi, Parthenopeos reges
Cum Gallica arma irruerent minabunda.
Tu vale, & hoc ſis meriti memor noſtri.

- - - That ſame Politian am I.
Me Florence cheriſh'd with a mother's care,
Until at laſt my days I ended there;
Juſt in the year when, like a rapid flame,
Gaul's monarch on the king of Naples came.
Reader, by this admoniſh'd, view
What merit I had once. Adieu.

REM. CRIT.]

[O] He was . . . . abuſed by the Poet Marullus.] This we read in St Romuald. Marullus, ſays he (74), uſed him very ill under the name of Mabilius: which may ſignify two things; either that Marullus took the name of Mabilius in the verſes he made againſt him, or that he gave this name to Politian. I have lately re-peruſed his poems, and found nothing in them under that name: Nor is there any thing in Politian's Poem, to make one believe that this Monk is in the right. I find among his Poems ſome cutting epigrams in Mabilium Novatum Inſubrem, in which there is nothing whereby it may appear that they are levelled at Marullus. And indeed, how can the epithet Inſuber agree with him, ſince he was a native of Conſtantinople? Though I have not read the Poems of this Mabilius, I believe Politian was very much abuſed in ſome of them; for I find that Politian reviles him at a ſtrange rate, as it will appear from the following verſes:

(74) St Romuald, ubi ſupra.

Si jam carmina noſtra te Mabili
Urgent ad laqueum miſer crucemque,
Ne quæſo propera mori, tuum ne
Fraudes carnificem ſuo lucello:
Namque eſt percupidus tui, ac libenter
Is tantum tibi dempſerit laboris.
Quid? noſtin hominem? negas: at idem eſt
Aurem qui ſecuit tibi ſiniſtram (75).

(75) Politianus, in Libro Epigrammatum.

Gall'd with my verſe if you deſire relief,
And headlong run to hang yourſelf for grief;
Let me beſeech you, ſtop a while, leſt you
Should thus deprive the hangman of his due.
He loves you ſo, that, if you were to aſk,
I'm certain he would eaſe you of the taſk.
'S life, know you not the man? it does appear
That he's the ſame who cropped your left ear.

Mabilius jeſted upon Politian, becauſe his neck was not ſtrait. The latter replied in the following manner:

Sed quid te cruciat reflexa colla
Si interdum gero? num parùm videtur
Si pronos ſtatuis tuos cinœdos,
Si pronum ſtatuent miſer Mabili
Mox te carnificis manus, velut nunc
Pronum te ſtatuunt Mutoniati.

Hard words are ſtill thicker in the following verſes:

Hæres relictus à parente ſordido
Ille impudicus, temulentus aleo,
Spurcus, lutoſus, pedecoſus, hiſpidus,
Pannoſus, unctus, horridus, caprimulgus,
Edax, ineptus, inſolens Mabilius
Uno expatravit patrimonium die,
Gula helluante, cunnilingis oſculis,
Vorace culo, & exſutata mentula.

Politian imitated the horrid licentiouſneſs of Catullus and Martial, a ſort of men, who made an ill uſe of a maxim of the Stoics, concerning the uſe of words, and

- - - - Apud quos
Nomen adeſt rebus, nominibuſque pudor (76).

(76) Ὁ σοφὸς αἰσθήσεσιν ἕπεται. Sapiens ſine circuitu omnia efferat.

- - - - With whom
Things have their names, and names have modeſty.

Politian carried this imitation too far in ſome other Poems, particularly in his invective againſt an old woman, who had loſt all the ſigns of youth, excepting leudneſs (77). This invective contains moſt of the thoughts that are to be found in two Odes of Horace (78), and thoſe thoughts are there expreſſed more at large. The laſt verſes are full of obſcenities, the more offenſive, becauſe immediately after there are two very devout hymns to the Holy Virgin. The wrong placing of thoſe hymns ought not to be imputed to the Poet; it is the fault of thoſe who publiſhed his works. But to return to Mabilius, I ſhall obſerve, that his epitaph is to be found among Politian's verſes:

(77) It begins thus, Huc huc iambi ite propere mi jam moveatur Arium hanc furentis Puellam ad Tenagæam lam. eruditorem ſpurcidam.

(78) The eighth Epode in arum lit. dinolam, and the xxiii of the ſame book ad mulierem fœtam & anum.

' Fleſte

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google who is the occaſion of it, is wrong in his Chronology [P]. I ſhall have ſomething to ſay againſt Moreri [Q]. For the reſt, thoſe who ſay, that Baſſo, or Baſſus, was the name of Politian's family, are miſtaken. Menage (b), alledges a letter of Mr Magliabechi to prove that his name was Cino, and not Baſſo. He is called Meſſer Agnolo de Montepulciano in Machiavel's Hiſtory of Florence (i); and we read in an oration of Majoragius, that he changed his name Angelus de Monte Pulciano into that of Angelus Politianus. Note that Sannazarius in two ſatirical Epigrams (k) he made againſt him, calls him Pulicianus alluding to the word Pulex, a flea.

(b) See his Origines Italicanes, at the word Politiano; and the 14th chapter of the Anti-Baillet.

(i) Towards the end of the 8th book, p. m. 349.

(k) The 66th and 67th of the firſt book.

Flecte viator iter, ſetet nam putre Mabili
Hac fovea corpus conditur atque animus.

Turn traveller aſide, and come not hither.
The ſoul and body of Mabilius lie
Within this grave, and ſilent rot together,
Whence all around the noxious vapours fly.

If this be not a good proof againſt Peter de St Romuald, it ſeems at leaſt to be a ſign that he is miſtaken; for Marullus ſurvived Politian ſome years. But I will not inſiſt upon this reaſon; for an epitaph affords an opportunity of uſing ſo many injurious words, that ſeveral Poets have falſely ſuppoſed that their adverſaries were dead, in order to make uſe of ſuch a common topic. I will not diſſemble, that a very learned man, who made ſome notes upon Sannazarius's Poems (79), is of opinion that Marullus and Mabilius mentioned by Politian, are one and the ſame perſon.

(79) See the Notes upon Sannazarius, pag. 229, Amſterd. Edit. 1689.

[P] Varillas . . . . . is wrong in his Chronology.] 'Politian was a man of ſo wonderful a genius, that 'the like had not been ſeen ever ſince Ovid. When 'he was but twelve years of age, he made ſuch fine 'verſes, that one would have thought they had been 'compoſed in Alexander's or Auguſtus's time. And 'when he had a mind to ſurpriſe the learned, and to 'give out his productions for ſome fragments of Ana'creon or Catullus, which he had lately found out in 'ſome old manuſcripts of the library of the houſe of 'Medicis, the beſt judges were impoſed upon by 'him (80).' Mr Baillet relates the ſame thing more at large in his Hiſtory of Illuſtrious Children (81), in which he places our Politian with great reaſon; for though what Varillas ſays of him were not true, we know that Politian was very young when he made his Greek verſes, which, in the judgment of the Critics, are better than the Latin Poems he compoſed long after (82). But here is a Chronological fault. 'A marriage was propoſed to Virginia de Urſini, be'tween her daughter, who was but twelve years of 'age, and Laurence de Medicis, the eldeſt ſon of Peter, 'who was not yet fifteen. . . . . The wedding was 'not celebrated with great pomp, becauſe the circum'ſtances of the time did not allow of it. However, 'there were many Epithalamiums, among which, that 'of Politian, whoſe verſes were worthy of Auguſtus's 'age, though he was not older than the bridegroom, 'was beſt approved. Some few days after, young 'Laurence, hearing of Cologne's approach, was ob'liged to leave his dear ſpouſe, and to get on horſe'back, in order to learn the art of war under the diſ'cipline of his father-in-law (83).' Laurence was born in the year 1448; and therefore Politian was four years older than he. Machiavel, who is a more credible author than Varillas, ſays, that the wedding of Laurence de Medicis, and Clarice de Urſini, was celebrated with very magnificent pomp after the peace (84), that is, when the war, which Cologne made with the Florentines, was fully ended. He does not ſet down the year of that marriage, which is a great fault in an Hiſtorian; but it may be inferred from his narrative, that it was in the year 1471. Laurence was therefore twenty-three years of age. Thus you ſee how little Varillas minded Chronology. He places all the chief exploits of Cologne's war after the death of Peter de Medicis, the father of Laurence (85). He might have ſeen in Paul Jovius that the peace was made before the death of Peter de Medicis (86).

(80) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 194.

(81) Baillet, Enfans celebres, p. 89, 90.

(82) Græcis vero quæ puerum ſe conſcripſiſſe dicit, ætatem minus prudenter appoſuit ſuam. Tam enim bona ſunt ut ne virum quidem Latina æque bene ſcripſiſſe putem. Jul. Cæſ. Scaliger, Poët. lib. vi, p. m. 740.

(83) Varillas, ibid. p. 40.

(84) Machiav. Hiſt. Florentine, lib. viii, p. m. 289.

(85) See his 2d book of the Anecdotes de Florence.

(86) Jov. in Vita Leonis X, lib. i, p. 14.

[Q] I ſhall have ſomething to ſay againſt Moreri.] I. Theſe words are not exact, Laurence de Medicis kept at Florence Angelo Politian, who was already a prieſt; for they give us to underſtand, that it was the firſt favour Politian received from the houſe of Medicis, which is not true: we have ſeen above (87) that he ſtudied at the charges of Coſmo, grandfather of Laurence. II. Moreri ſhould not have ſaid that Laurence made him tutor to the children of Coſmo de Medicis; for he put his own children under his tuition (88). If a man ſhould give a tutor to his grandfather's children, it would be a very rare thing. III. John de Medicis, who was afterwards Pope Leo X, was the ſon of this Laurence, and not of Coſmo. IV. In order to ſay that Politian wrote thoſe fine Greek and Latin Epiſtles, which are ſo much commended by the learned, the public ſhould have ſeen ſeveral Greek letters of that author; but if I am not very much miſtaken, there is but one in the collection of his letters. The following words of Volaterranus, which Moreri read in Voſſius (89), were probably the occaſion of his miſtake: 'Mihi ſolebat E'piſtolas cum Græcas tum Latinas ſcribere ſed ſermo'ne vernaculo plures quod frequenter faciebat occu'patus, ne naſus aliquis ſtilo offenſus impræmeditato, 'præjudicatæ jam de eo opinioni officeret (90). - - - - 'He uſed to write letters in Greek and Latin to me, 'but oftner in Italian, which he generally did when he 'was buſy, leſt ſome nice critic, offended at his extem'pore ſtyle, ſhould make him loſe the good opinion that 'had been conceived of him.' Whereupon, without any farther conſideration, he fancied that we have ſome Greek letters of Politian in print. Obſerve by the by, the great caution of Politian. He knew that he was famous for the politeneſs of his ſtyle, and that in order to keep up his reputation, nothing ſhould come from him but what was elaborate. But becauſe his occupations did not permit him to beſtow a great deal of time upon the compoſition of a letter, he reſolved to write often in Italian; for it is likely he dealt with his other friends as he did with Volaterranus. Such is the ſlavery of thoſe, who have the reputation of writing fine letters; they dare not write familiarly and careleſsly to their friends. They know their letters will be ſeen, and deſpiſed, unleſs they be written in a polite ſtyle. Balzac did often groan under that heavy yoak; and I have read that an ingenious man envied the happineſs of his attorney, who might without any fear begin his letters thus, I have received your's: This is to let you know (91). The Manutius's, and the Latin writers of the ſame rank, found themſelves reduced to the ſad neceſſity of beſtowing ſeveral months upon a letter (92). I am not therefore ſurprized at what we have juſt now ſeen in the words of Volaterranus. It is to be obſerved, that this ſlavery reaches ſometimes as far as converſation (93). But to return to Moreri. V. It cannot be ſaid that Politian had a ſhare in the calamity of the houſe of Medicis, in which all the men of letters that were at Florence, found themſelves involved; for he died whilſt Peter de Medicis was ſtill maſter in his country. It is true, ſome think he was vexed, when he foreſaw that this lord would not be able to maintain himſelf, conſidering what courſe things were ready to take: however Paul Jovius is of opinion, that he was a happy man becauſe he died before the fall of that family (94). VI. We are not told that he fell into deſpair, becauſe he could not win the love of a lady. He is ſaid to have had a more vicious paſſion, as we have ſeen above (95). Do not mind the paſſage of Peter de St Romuald. VII. It cannot be ſaid that Paul Jovius believes thoſe ſtories; he only mentions them, without affirming them, and makes uſe of the word ferunt. He is only to blame for not adding, that it was an uncertain report; for he knew, without doubt, that people were divided in their opinions about it; which is a ſufficient reaſon for an Hiſtorian, when he ſays, ſuch a ſlandering report went about, to add, but ſome looked upon it as a calumny. VIII. Ludovicus Vives does not ſay what Moreri fathers upon him (96).

(87) In the remark [B].

(88) See the 2d Letter of the 4th book of Politian's Letters, fol. m. 94.

(89) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 628.

(90) Volaterr. lib. xxi, p. 777.

(91) Preface to the works of Sarraſin, p. 46.

(92) See Scioppius, de Stilo Hiſtorico, p. m. 61, 62.

(93) You will find the following words in the Menagiana, p. 164, of the firſt Dutch edition, upon occaſion of a converſation of ſome learned men. Every body ſtrove . . . to ſpeak well, for, contrary to what is now practiſed, people took care to ſpeak correctly, and to avoid faults, when they met to diſcourſe together. At laſt every body being gone, Balzac and I happened to be alone. Then he took me by the hand, and told me, now that we are alone, let us ſpeak freely, and without fearing to be guilty of a ſoleciſm.

(94 Eo præpropero vitæ exitu profecto felix fuit quod imminentem convulſæ Medicæ domus ruinam effugerit. Jovius, p. 89.

(95) In the remark [F].

(96) It is the ſame thing that Voëtius aſcribes to Mornai in the remark [K].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

POLITIAN (GIOVANNI ANGELO), a native of the same town with the foregoing, taught Logic at Poitiers, about the beginning of the XVIIth century. Mr Daillé was one of his scholars (a). He wrote two controversial books against cardinal Bellarmin, his countryman [A]; which makes me think that he renounced Popery, and turned Protestant.

(a) See Mr Daillé's Life, p. 4.

[A] He wrote two controversial books against cardinal Bellarmin his countryman.] One of them is intituled Philosophia Eucharistica de potentia & voluntate Dei ex tertio libro Bellarmini de Eucharistia, exposita & refutata, Amberg 1604, in 4to. And the other, Philosophiæ seu potius Sophisticæ Eucharisticæ Bellarmini pars altera refutata, Amberg 1606, in 4to.

POLITIAN (ANTONY LAURENTIN) was professor of Logic in the university of Pisa (a). He was at Padua in the year 1604, as it appears from the epistle dedicatory of the second edition of his dialogue de Risu (b), to which he annexed his treatise de Cœlis eorumque motibus, and his book de natura Logicæ. His mother was descended from the family of St Agnes (c), a saint to whom the inhabitants of Monte Pulciano pay a great veneration (d).

(a) See the Epistle Dedicatory of his dialogue de Risu.

(d) Leand. Albert. Descript. Italiæ, p. 89.

(b) The first came out at Francfort. I make use of that of Marpurg 1606, in 8vo.

(c) Ant. Laurent. Politianus, de Risu, pag. m. 134.

POLONUS (MARTIN) a Dominican Friar and Penitentiary to Pope Nicholas III, flourished in the XIIIth century. Some say that he was archbishop of Cosenza, others that he was archbishop of Benevento; but they cannot alledge good proofs for either. It is certain that he was promoted to the archbishopric of Gnesna on the twenty-second of June 1278 (a), by Pope Nicholas III, and that he was going to take possession of it when he died at Boulogne in the same or the following year. He was buried in that city in the convent of his own order (b). He writ a chronicle of the Popes and Emperors from Jesus Christ and Augustus Cæsar to Pope John XXI, who died in the year 1277 [A]. It contains the History of the She-Pope; although some learned men do not believe that part of it to be his [B]. Some others imagine that he was the first

(a) Decimo Kalend. Julii say Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 486, & F. Labbe, de Script. Eccles. vol. ii, p. 62; but Spondanus, ad ann. 1278, n. 18, uses the phrase Decimo Kalendas Junii.

(b) See Father Labbe, ibid. & Starovolsc. in Elogiis centum Polonorum, pag. 30.

[A] He writ a chronicle . . . that reaches from Jesus Christ . . . . to Pope John XXI, who died in the year 1277.] Those who believed that it reached as far as the year 1320, did not know that he died in the Pontificate of Nicholas III, in the year 1278 or 1279. Volaterranus was as little acquainted with it, since he has represented him as flourishing under Pope John XXII (1). He was no doubt deceived by a copy which had an appendix continued to the year 1320. That appendix which was in the manuscript of the abbey of Fuld, was printed with the Chronicle of Martin Polonus, in the edition of Basil 1559. Suffridus Petri, in the edition of Antwerp 1574, has falsely ascribed it to our Martin; and it is undoubtedly by a mistake of the like nature that Coccius affirms this author to have been alive in the year 1320 (2). There are manuscripts of this chronicle which reach no farther than Clement IV, whose Pontificate begun in the year 1265, and ended in the year 1271. It is from one of these manuscripts that the edition of Cologn was printed (3). We are not to imagine however that the continuation to the year 1277 belongs to another, and not to Martin Polonus; for he says himself in the preface that he has carried his Chronicle as far as Pope John XXI inclusively. Ego Frater Martinus Polonus Papæ Pœnitentiarius & Capellanus ex diversis Chronicis & gestis summorum Pontificum & Imperatorum præsens opusculum usque ad Joannem XXI Papam deduxi inclusivè. Let us say rather that he gave more than one edition, that the first reached no farther than Clement IV, and that he continued it afterwards to the Popedom of John XXI, and that the manuscripts which end at Clement IV, were copyed from the first edition. There is a manuscript in the library of Vienna where we find these words, 'Usque ad Gregorium 'Papam X deduxi inclusivè: - - - I have carried it as 'far as Pope Gregory X inclusively.' Upon which Lambecius makes the following remark, 'Quod autem 'Chronicum Martinianum hic dicitur pertingere ad 'Papam Gregorium X inclusivè, non est intelligendum 'de anno obitus ejus, qui fuit annus Christi 1276, 'sed de initio Pontificatus, sive anno Christi 1271, 'quo is post Papam Clementem IV electus est. Hoc 'enim manifestè apparet ex ipso illo codice, utpote 'ubi de Gregorio X nihil aliud antiqua manu scrip- 'tum cernitur, quàm hoc: Gregorius natus Lambardus 'de civitate Placentia sedit. . . . . Quæ autem deinceps 'sequuntur, multò recentiori manu adjecta sunt (4). '. . . . As to what is said here, that the Martinian 'Chronicle reaches down as far as Pope Gregory X in- 'clusively it is not to be understood of the year of his death, 'which was the year of Christ 1276, but of the begin- 'ning of his pontificate, or the year of Christ 1271, 'when he succeeded Pope Clement IV. This appears plainly 'from the manuscript itself, where we find nothing writ- 'ten by the old hand concerning Gregory X except this: 'Gregory, born in Placentia a city of Lombardy, 'took his seat . . . What follows after is added by a 'much later hand.'

(1) See his words in the remark [E].

(2) Coccius in Catalogo Scriptorum quem suo Thesauro præmisit. Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. m. 485.

(3) Cura Joannis Fabricii Cæsaris, Canonici Gladbachensis. Ibid.

(4) Lambecius, lib. ii, Bibl. Vindobon. apud Sandium, Notis in Vossium, de Hist. Lat. pag. 175, 176.

From hence we learn, 1, that the edition which I call the first, reached to the beginning of Clement the fourth's pontificate, and not to the end of it in the year 1271 (5), as Vossius would have it; 2, that there was a second edition which reached to the beginning of Gregory the tenth's pontificate, and another which reached as far as Pope John XXI. But here is a difficulty: a manuscript of the library of Vienna contains these words, Usque ad Quartum Honorium Papam deduxi inclusivè, - - - I have carried it as far as Pope Honorius IV inclusively (6). Honorius IV was chosen in the year 1285, and died in the year 1287. How shall we reconcile this to what those say, who place the death of Martin Polonus in the year 1278 or 1279; might not Blondel have found there an argument to defend himself against the man (7) who censured him for making this same Martin live till about the year 1290 (8)? The learned Conringius thinks it evident that Martin Polonus carried his book as far down as the year 1285 (9).

(5) There is in Vossius 1251; either by an error of the author, or by a fault in the printing. Father Labbe, and Sandius, have not observed this mistake.

(6) Lambecius, ubi supra.

(7) Father Labbe, in Addenda ad Tom. II, de Script. Eccles. p. 759.

(8) Blondel in his Latin treatise upon the She-Pope, p. m. 6. Observe that in the French treatise, p. 17, he says that Martin Polonus died about the year 1270.

(9) Conringius, Animadv. in Bullam Innocentii X, p. m. 322.

Abbot Ughelli (10), does not indeed deny that Martin Polonus, archbishop of Gnesna, was a Dominican, but on the other had he takes his Chronicle from him and gives it to one Martin a monk of the Order of Citeaux, archbishop of Cosenza, and Penitentiary to Innocent IV; but this pretension cannot be supported, seeing there are several manuscripts of this Chronicle, which expressly contain these words, Ego Frater Martinus Ordinis Prædicatorum, - - - I Brother Martin of the Order of Preachers. They are likewise to be found in the prologue to the alphabetical table of the decree and the decretals, which table is generally called Martiniani, and of which Martin Polonus is supposed to be the author (11).

(10) In Italia Sacra in Catalogo Archiepiscoporum Conseniensium. See Sandius, in Vossium de Histor. Latin. p. 174.

(11) See Sandius, ibid.

[B] . . . . It contains the history of the She-Pope, altho' some learned men do not believe that part of it to be his.] This is a dispute which is ever and anon revived when any one writes for or against the History of the She-Pope: but there will always remain difficulties so long as the original itself of Polonus cannot be produced. The copies which mention the She-Pope, and those

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

first who wrote any thing concerning this fabulous ſtory (c). He has been cenſured as a credulous (c) See the remark [C].

thoſe which mention her not, can never decide the queſtion clearly and demonſtratively; for if one anſwers that the She-Pope has been taken out of the manuſcripts where ſhe is not, the other replies that ſhe has been added to the manuſcripts where ſhe is. Both theſe anſwers have a ſhew of probability and reaſon. The prejudices of the heart are more capable to determine a man in his opinion than the light of the underſtanding. We muſt nevertheleſs acknowledge, that there are Roman Catholics who aſcribe this paſſage to our Martin, and that there are Proteſtants who do not think it his. Dr Cave, an Engliſh Divine, maintains that the ſtory of Pope Joan has been thruſt into the Chronicle of Polonus by another hand. I ſhall quote his words; we ſhall ſee that he treats what concerns the She-Pope as a mere fable, and that ſome manuſcripts of a right ſtamp do not make the leaſt mention of her. 'Nihil illud (Chronicon Martini Poloni) magis famoſum reddidit, quàm decantatiſſima illa de Joanna Papiſſa, ſeu fabula, ſeu narratiuncula. Sane fabulam eſſe, & Martini Chronico intruſam nullus dubito, præſertim cùm in pleriſque vetuſtis Codicibus MSS. deſideretur. In IV Codicibus MSS. Bibliothecæ Cæſareæ deſiderari, in totidem etiam reperiri ingenuè fatetur Cl. Lambecius *. Deerat etiam in antiquiſſimo codice, quem Bibliothecæ Vaticanæ donavit Urbanus VIII cujus meminit Leo Allatius Conſut. fab. de Joan. Pap. num. 7. ut alios taceam; certe Martini Chronicon non unam interpolationem paſſum eſſe eruditi dudum obſervarunt. Editum eſt hoc Chronicon Baſil. 1559. deinde cum notis Petri Suffridi, Antverp. 1574. in 8vo. Denique è vetuſtiſſimo MS. & ipſi Scriptori, uti ferunt, penè coætaneo, ſumma fide & diligentia expreſſum, in lucem emiſit Joannes Fabricius Cæſar, Monachus Præmonſtratenſis, Colon. 1616, fol. in qua editione Hiſtoria de Joanna Papiſſa non comparet (12). - - - - Nothing helped more to make that Chronicle famous than the much talked of fable, or the ſhort narrative, which you pleaſe to call it, of Pope Joan. For my own part I am thoroughly convinced that it is a mere fable, and that it has been thruſt into Martin's Chronicle, eſpecially ſince it is wanting in moſt of the old manuſcripts. Lambecius frankly acknowledges, that four manuſcripts of the emperor's library have it not, and four have it. It was likewiſe wanting in that very old manuſcript which Urban VIII gave to the Vatican library, and of which Leo Allatius, not to mention others, takes notice in his confutation of this ſtory. Certain it is the learned have long ago obſerved that Martin's Chronicle has been interpolated in more than one place. Laſt of all John Fabricius Cæſar, a Monk of Præmonſtré copied it with great diligence and integrity, from a very old manuſcript that was almoſt cotemporary with the author himſelf, and publiſhed at Cologn 1616 in fol. in which edition there is no account given of Pope Joan.' Mr du Pin is one of thoſe who believe that this ſtory of Pope Joan has been added to the Chronicle of Polonus (13).

* Comment. Biblioth. Vindob. lib. ii, cap. viii, pag. 889.

(12) Cave, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. i, p. 739, 740, Edit. Londin. 1688.

(13) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. x, p. m. 82.

One thing is very certain, viz. that the Proteſtants did not inſert this addition: it is to be found in manuſcripts that were copyed before Luther was talked of; for Antoninus archbiſhop of Florence, and Platina, who lived in the XVth century, have mentioned, in quoting Martin, the ſtory of the She-Pope; and there are authors of the XIVth century, who have quoted the ſame Martin upon this ſubject (13*). It was therefore a notable piece of temerity and groſs ignorance, in Florimond de Remond to accuſe Heroldus of having added this ſtory to the edition of Polonus (14). He means the Baſil edition, publiſhed by John Heroldus in the year 1559, which comprehends the Chronicle of Marianus and that of our Martin. Theſe two Chronicles had never been printed before. Mr Maimbourg muſt have committed the ſame blunder, if Mr Jurieu is to be credited. 'It is fit to obſerve 'that Mr Maimbourg expoſes himſelf very much to 'be laughed at when he accuſes us of having invented this monſtrous fable, and of having inſerted it in the Chronicles of the Monks Marianus Scotus, Sigebert, and Martin Polonus ‡. Nothing was ever ſaid more raſhly and inconſiderately. There are copies now to be ſeen of theſe authors, printed twenty years before Luther was heard of, where this is to be found. All the old manuſcripts agree: and granting it ſhould be true what Maimbourg ſays, viz. that there are 'one or two copies which have it not, it would be 'more likely that thoſe few manuſcripts, where this 'ſtory is not to be found, had been corrected by ſuch 'perſons as were diſpleaſed at the adventure and 'thought it had an odious appearance (15).' To make a right judgment of this cenſure, we muſt know in what terms Maimbourg expreſſed himſelf. The fable of Pope Joan, ſays he (16), had never any other foundation but in the perſon of this Pope John (17). For on account of his weak conduct, and becauſe he had ſuffered himſelf to be ſhamefully impoſed upon by a half-man (18) that was more cunning than he, they called him a woman and Pope Joan, in a bitter kind of raillery, not unlike thoſe paſquils which the inſolent liberty of detraction puts out ſo frequently at Rome, againſt the Popes upon more trifling occaſions. But at laſt, ſome time after, in an age of groſs ignorance this raillery was taken for truth, and ſimple people imagined that a woman, diſguiſed in the ſhape of a man, had by ſurpriſe been advanced to the throne of St Peter. Nevertheleſs neither the time nor the circumſtances of ſuch a ſtrange and improbable adventure were ſet down, till in the latter ages ſome writers bolder than the reſt, and afterwards the Heretics, that they might have an opportunity of inſulting the church of Rome, when they had often varied upon this head, ſome fixing it to one time, ſome to another, did at length moſt of them agree to place it between Leo V, and Bennit III. Nay, it is highly probable, that they themſelves did invent this monſtrous fable, and inſert it in the chronicles of the Monks Marianus Scotus, Sigebert, and Martin Polonus. For there is nothing to be ſeen of it in the oldeſt manuſcripts and copies of theſe three authors, unleſs it be perhaps in the firſt.

(15) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformation, Tom. ii, p. 38, 39, Edit. in 4to.

(16) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Schiſme des Grecs, book ii, p. 198, of the firſt Vol. Dutch edition.

(17) That is to ſay, John VIII.

(18) That is to ſay, Photius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, who was an eunuch.

If we compare the words of this author with thoſe of Mr Jurieu, we ſhall find that the latter has not at all valued himſelf upon the two eſſential qualities of a good critic, fairneſs and accuracy; which require that no conſtruction ſhould be put upon the words that one has a mind to cenſure, beſides what neceſſarily agrees to them. Now the words of Mr Maimbourg do not neceſſarily ſignify that the Heretics invented the ſtory of the She-Pope, and inſerted it in the Chronicles of Marianus, Sigebert, and Martin Polonus. This author had been juſt ſpeaking of two ſorts of writers, the one Catholic and the other Heretics: he may therefore have poſſibly meant that the former invented and inſerted this little ſtory; why then has he been cenſured as if he had only meant the latter? But this not the only fault of Mr Jurieu: he pretends that there are copies of Marianus Scotus, Sigebert, and Martin Polonus, printed twenty years before Luther was heard of, which contain this ſtory; it is a miſtake, Marianus Scotus, and Martin Polonus were not put in the preſs till the year 1559, and there is no edition, as far as we know, of Sigebert older than that of Paris 1513. Neither is it true that all the old manuſcripts agree (19), nor that Maimbourg ſays there are one or two copies which have it not. For we have ſeen that without limiting any number he ſays in general the oldeſt manuſcripts.

(19) See the remark [B], of the article POPE (JOAN).

(20) Above, citation (12).

If Mr Jurieu had been leſs ſuperficially acquainted with the books written pro and con upon this diſpute, he would not have ventured to affirm this pretended conformity of all the old manuſcripts, than which nothing can be more falſe. Read only, with reſpect to Marianus and Sigebert, the remarks [B] and [C] of the article POPE (JOAN), and with reſpect to Polonus, what I have quoted from Dr Cave (20), and what I am now going to add: 'Joſias Simbler (21), miniſter of 'Zuric, who augmented the library of Conrad Geſner, owns that he has read four copies of this Martin, which are ſtill to be ſeen in the library of Dreſſerus (22), all different from one another, and ſome more full than the reſt. I myſelf have ſeen an old one which does not agree with that which was publiſhed in the year 1573 by Suffridus Petrus Leovadienſis (23) Friſius, who confeſſes that he had made a curious ſearch after the old copies, and picked them up here and there, in order to purge out the errors and groſs blunders which had crept into that author through the ignorance or malice of ſome perſons. I cannot enough wonder, ſays he, how ſo many things, which are not to be found in the manuſcripts, can have ſlid into the firſt edition of Polonus, without there being the leaſt appearance 'of (21) He ſhould have ſaid Simler.

(22) The words of Simler are: Ejuſdem (Martini Poloni) exemplaria quatuor copioſiora multo quam expreſſum extant in Bibliothec. Dreſſeri. - - - There are yet to be ſeen in the library of Dreſſerus four copies of the ſame author, abundantly more copious than the printed one. Florimond does not tranſlate them faithfully.

(23) He ſhould have ſaid Suffridus Petri Leovardienſis.

(13*) See Mr Spanheim, de Papa fœmina, p. 165; and Mr Des Marets, in Examine de Papa fœmina, p. 22.

(14) Florimond de Remond, the Anti-Papeſſe, ch. ii, num. 5, fol. m. 367. See alſo Father Oudin, in Supplem. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 550.

‡ Hiſtoire du Schiſme des Grecs, an. 881.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

‘ of his having ever thought of ſuch things, ſo far was ‘ he from having deſigned to leave them in writing.
‘ But if theſe had truly been of his production, he ‘ would have every where diſcovered his ſimplicity and ‘ ignorance (24).’ We find in an Engliſh writer, that was a great advocate for the hiſtory of the She-Pope, the following words: Dr Briſtow † . . . . relates that ſome years ago a certain Proteſtant (reputed to be a great Hiſtorian) ſhewed this book of Martin, writ in a very fine character, and deſired that they would point out to him that fable. And behold it was not in the text but only in the margin, and by a different hand. Upon which he ſaid: I ſee now that you want this author likewiſe (25). The Engliſh writer will not allow this teſtimony to be good, and defies any one to ſhew a book of Polonus, either in print or manuſcript, which does not contain the hiſtory of the She-Pope (26). Nevertheleſs, Dr Burnet (27) ſpeaks of it in this manner. I do not believe the hiſtory of Pope Joan, having ſeen in England with my own eyes a manuſcript of Martin Polonus, who is one of the oldeſt authors that are generally quoted upon this ſubject, and which ſeems to have been written ſoon after the author's death, where this ſtory is only in the margin and not in the text, and beſides it is written by another hand than that which writ the text (28). Who can doubt but this is the ſame manuſcript wich Dr Briſtow mentions. Mr Spanheim (29) quotes John Chiflet who alledges an old manuſcript where Martin Polonus makes no mention of the She-Pope. The manuſcripts of this author in the library of Leyden are very different from that (30): we find in them the ſame things concerning the She-Pope, that are in the printed copies (31) they were likewiſe to be found in a manuſcipt which a Monk, that turned Proteſtant ſhewed to a profeſſor of Groningen. Nec diu eſt quod meis oculis uſurpavi vetuſtiſſimum Martini codicem in charta pergamena ſcriptum, quam ſecum Colonia detulit R. V. D. Michaël Ruckertius olim Philoſophiæ Lector inter Recollectos Colonienſes, nunc Dei gratia Verbi Divini fidelis diſpenſator in Ooſtfriſia, in quo extabat hæc eadem narratio (32). It is then certain that the old manuſcripts do not agree.

(24) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, ch. ii, num. 6, fol. 367 verſo.

† In his Reply to Dr Fulke, ch. x, Queſtion LIV, p. 373.

(25) Cooke, on the She-Pope, p. 61, 62.

(26) Ib. p. 61.

(27) Biſhop of Salisbury.

(28) Burnet's Travels, p. m. 300.

(29) Spanh. de Papa fœmina, p. 60, 61.

(30) Ibid. pag. 66, 67.

(31) Ibid.

(32) Sam. Mareſius, in Exam. p. 22, Edit. Gron. 1658.

CONSIDERATION on the cauſes of the difference of manuſcripts.

Let us make a few reflexions upon this diverſity, and inquire into the cauſe of it. I begin with theſe two propoſitions: I. It is no proof that Martin Polonus mentioned Pope Joan, becauſe an account of her may be ſeen in ſome very old manuſcripts of his Chronicle. II. Neither is it a proof that he has ſaid nothing at all of her, becauſe one may produce very antient manaſcripts where this ſtory is not to be found. The truth of theſe two Propoſitions is grounded upon this, that very poſſibly ſome paſſages may have been taken from or added to the works of an author ſoon after his death. Additions and ſubſtractions are two means alike frequently made uſe of to corrupt the original ſtate of a manuſcript. One might prove this by a hundred examples. Conſequently ſo long as we ſhall not have the original of Polonus it will be impoſſible to diſcover certainly whether it is by the way of addition or ſubſtraction, that ſo great a diverſity has been introduced between the copies of his Chronicle.

The Proteſtants will anſwer, that it is not probable this ſtory of the She-Pope ſhould have been tacked to the manuſcript of Polonus, but that it is very probable it was taken from it, becauſe it is ſcandalous, and ſuch a thing as redounds to the reproach and ignominy of the Papal chair. As therefore thoſe who copyed the manuſcripts, were jealous of the honour of the Popes they muſt have reckoned themſelves obliged to ſuppreſs this narrative, and by no means to introduce it. This diſcourſe has an air of probability; but it proves too much, and makes it difficult to ſolve this queſtion, whence comes it that the ſtory of the She-Pope remained in a very great number of manuſcripts? Where was the zeal of the tranſcribers? What could the reaſon of this inconſiſtency be? There is another difficulty ſtill. You pretend that Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius, Marianus Scotus, Sigebert, Martin Polonus, &c. publiſhed this ſcandalous ſtory. They were nevertheleſs very good Papiſts, they were Prieſts or Monks devoted to the intereſt of the church of Rome. Why ſhould it be ſuppoſed that they had leſs zeal than their tranſcribers? Or how came it about that their tranſcribers were more ſcrupulous? Were not moſt of the writers who have related the adventure of the She-Pope ſtrongly attached to the Romiſh religion? Who could be more attached to it than St Antoninus, who has inſerted it in his book? Here is a further difficulty. This tradition had been ſo well eſtabliſhed that no body contradicted it. Aventinus, cotemporary with Luther, is the firſt who rejected it as a fable. The council of Conſtance did not cenſure John Huſs for having alledged this fact (33), an evident ſign that the Fathers of that council did not doubt but there had been a She-Pope. It follows from thence that the Roman Catholics had got a habit of looking upon that accident as a thing which did no ſort of prejudice to their religion. Whence therefore could thoſe ſcruples ariſe which ſhould have moved ſome tranſcribers to expunge that paſſage from the manuſcripts of Martin Polonus? If the church of Rome had been loaded with inſults and objections upon that ſcore, as it has ſince the Reformation, one could more eaſily conceive that the zealots of Popery would have laboured to ſuppreſs the writings which mentioned the She-Pope, and even in that caſe they muſt have begun by ſaying, that the fact was not true, or at leaſt that it was very doubtful. But we do not find that the ſectaries inſiſted upon this article. Ockam in the the XIVth century (34), and the Huſſites in the XVth (35) made uſe of that fact as a proof that the church can err. Æneas Sylvius anſwered that the fact of the She-Pope was not certain, and that granting it to be true, it would include no error of right. This objection made little noiſe at that time, inſomuch that no body thought it worth their while to chuſe the negative, and go back to the fountain-head in order to diſprove the hiſtory of the She-Pope. What therefore could occaſion a conſpiracy in the tranſcribers againſt the pages wherein the Chroniclers had written this hiſtory? In fine, and this is my laſt difficulty, by what ſtrange whim ſhould they have paſſed over ſo many other narratives, where the ignominy and ſcandal is greater, and diſcharged their whole zeal upon this? Have they not ſpared in theſe ſame manuſcripts and in a great many others, the memory of Popes that were accounted Intruders, Schiſmatics, Simoniſts, Adulterers, Magicians, &c. I do not give theſe for demonſtrative reaſons, neither would I poſitively affirm that no body has curtailed the manuſcripts, in order to hide the ſhameful ſtory of the She-Pope; I content myſelf with oppoſing probabilities to probabilities, and thereby giving a caution to the readers that one ought not to be too peremptory about the reaſon (36) alledged by ſo many people why the ſtory of the She-Pope is not to be found in ſeveral old manuſcripts of the Chroniclers.

But it will be ſaid, if Marianus, Sigebert, Martin Polonus, &c. had not mentioned the She-Pope, how comes it that her ſtory ſhould be found in ſeveral old manuſcripts of their Chronicles? Is it at all likely that the Monks, who in thoſe times were the chief depoſitaries of the manuſcripts, and tranſcribed the greateſt number of copies, ſhould have propagated ſuch a ſtory, by adding it to books where it was not? Had the Sectaries, the Huſſites, for example, any occaſion for inſerting it? Did they not find that tradition, ſo well eſtabliſhed that no body denied or contradicted it, and the firſt of their antagoniſts (37), who examined their objection founded upon it, durſt not poſitively ſay that the fact was not true? Wherefore if this addition could neither come from the Papiſts, nor Heretics, we muſt conclude, that the manuſcripts which mention the She-Pope do therein exactly agree with the original, and that thoſe which ſay nothing of her have been curtailed of that paſſage. This objection has a ſeducing appearance, but it contains nothing in it ſufficient to convince thoſe who require ſolid proofs. It falſly ſuppoſes, that this ſtory of the She-Pope could not have been inſerted in the manuſcripts of Sigebert, Polonus, &c. with any other view than to prejudice the church of Rome. There are ſeveral other motives which might have induced the tranſcribers to foiſt this addition into a copy.

The humour which reigns now of preferring editions that are enlarged to ſuch as are not, has prevailed at all times. We have therefore good reaſon to believe, that there have always been ſuch perſons as liked a Sigebert improved with the ſtory of the She-Pope, better than a Sigebert that wanted it: therefore the tranſcribers might very well aſſure themſelves that they could ſell to better advantage a copy where this ſtory had been inſerted, than a copy where it had not, and which, on account of that omiſſion, would have been looked upon as caſtrated. And as before the art of Printing was found out, a great deal of time was neceſſary to prepare the copies, and books were extreamly

(33) See Lenfant, Hiſt. of the Council of Conſtance, Epiſt. VIII. Part IV, p. 355.

(34) See Mareſius, in Examine, p. 22.

(35) See Lenfant, Epiſt. VIII, book IV, p. 355.

(36) That reaſon is, that this ſtory has been retrenched out of a zeal for Popery.

(37) Æneas Sylvius. See the remark [E] of the article POPE (Joan).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

extreamly dear, all poſſible care was taken to huſband the tranſcriber's time, and the buyer's purſe, and it was ſo managed for the benefit of ſeveral perſons, that one Chronicle ſupplied the place of two or three, and for that end, inſtead of copying ſeveral, they added to one every thing that was particular and moſt remarkable in the reſt, from whence it might happen that the prodigious adventure of a pretended Pope, brought to bed in the middle of a proceſſion, was added to Anaſtaſius, Marianus Scotus, and Sigebert. We may ſuppoſe beſide, that a curious man, who had bought a Sigebert, or a Martin Polonus, and did not find the ſtory of the She-Pope there, would have added it on the margin, tranſcribing it from ſome other chronicle; and that copy might ſerve as an original ſome years after to a writer, who inſerted in the text what he found upon the margin (38). Who can doubt that there were perſons at that time who might be more deſirous of having a book, than able to purchaſe it? What did they upon ſuch occaſions? They borrowed a chronicle, and copyed it themſelves; and if they did not find there certain facts mentioned by other Hiſtorians, they added them each in it's proper place, and by that contrivance they reaped the ſame advantages from one ſingle manuſcript, as they would have done from ſeveral. Such a manuſcript may have paſſed from the cloſet of a private man into the great libraries of univerſities or monaſteries, or, perhaps, it may have ſerved as an original to the tranſcribers before Printing was invented.

(38) Compare with this what I have ſaid in the remark [B] of the article POPE (JOAN).

Theſe are probable ſuppoſitions, from which we learn, that although Sigebert and Polonus had not touched upon the ſtory of Pope Joan, it might nevertheleſs be found in ſome old manuſcripts of their chronicles, without our having the leaſt ground to ſuſpect that the authors of the addition had any ill deſign againſt the holy ſee. This is a moſt natural account of the diverſity that is ſaid to be in the old copies. Some have been faithfully tranſcribed from the original, either immediately or mediately. Thoſe want the ſtory of the She-Pope; the reſt have been taken from a copy that had been adorned with this fable.

What we have mentioned (39) concerning the manuſcripts of Anaſtaſius, together with the teſtimony of Onuphrius (40), and Dr Burnet (41), leaves us no room to doubt that divers things, which the author never ſaid, have been written upon the margin of the copies.

(39) In the remark [A] of the ſaid article.

(40) Ibid.

(41) Above, citation (28).

A particular obſervation may be made on the diverſity of the manuſcripts of Martin Polonus. We have ſeen, above, that he put forth ſeveral editions of his Chronicle, and without doubt he was not ſatisfied with ſubjoining a continuation to each of them, but he likewiſe reviſed and improved his firſt performance, and made in it alterations and additions. Some manuſcripts of theſe different editions, which have been preſerved (42), muſt of neceſſity be more full and ample than the reſt, and ſome of them muſt have things here and there which the others have not. Let the tranſcribers have been never ſo faithful and exact, this difference would have neceſſarily happened in the manuſcripts. We are not therefore in general to pretend, that thoſe where we do not find every thing that is contained in the reſt have been unfaithfully copied; for beſides the reaſon I have alledged, there is a conjecture which is very probable. All thoſe who tranſcribed the Chronicle of Polonus did not do it with a deſign to ſell the copies. They might tranſcribe it for their own private uſe. For example, a man that was not rich, was rather willing to take that trouble than to lay out his money in the purchaſe of the book. There is no abſurdity in ſaying, that ſuch a man may have ſtuck cloſer to the things than to the expreſſions, and that in order to have ſooner done, he may have left out what he thought ſuperfluous, abridged ſome particular phraſes, and ſubſtituted his own words for thoſe of the original. A man writes much quicker when he furniſhes the expreſſion himſelf, than when he copies thoſe of another, for the trouble of turning every moment to look at the manuſcript occaſions a great loſs of time, and one is a conſiderable gainer by it if he does no more than copy his own thoughts. A tranſcriber who takes the ſenſe of a whole period, and expreſſes it in his own way, will finiſh in one day what would require two, if he followed the manuſcript word for word. Suppoſe ſuch a copy of Martin Polonus has ſerved for an original, we may eaſily apprehend that the copies of the Chronicle will differ from one another, though there has been no ill deſign nor fraud to cauſe that diverſity. Thoſe who make a good number of collections, and infert whole pages of a book together, will readily grant what I ſuppoſe; they will remember how that, in order to have ſooner done, they did not copy word for word, but retrenched, and altered many words. The authors themſelves, who quote long paſſages, often take this liberty, to ſhorten the tedious trouble of tranſcribing (43). There is ſometimes a little fraud in it, but not always. What ſhall I ſay of the many involuntary omiſſions of the tranſcribers, and eſpecially when two periods bordering upon one another begin with the ſame word? They read it over, it is true, with ſome ſort of attention, but they too often ſpare themſelves the trouble of comparing their copy with the original line by line; and except the omiſſions evidently and groſsly marr the ſeries of a thought, they imagine that all is very well. Now it is certain that there are periods, or half-periods, which may be taken out of a book, and ſtill leave a tolerable ſenſe behind.

(42) Since at this day ſeveral authors quote the firſt editions, without knowing that there are others corrected and enlarged, they might with more reaſon be ignorant in thoſe times that there were editions of Polonus fuller than the firſt, and conſequently the copies of that were multiplied.

(43) See in the remark [B] of the article VOLKELIUS, the obſervation that is made upon a citation from the book of Mr Stoupp.

Let us conclude, that want of ſincerity does not always occaſion the difference of manuſcripts: ſeveral innocent cauſes may contribute towards it; but I confeſs that fraud is too often concerned in the affair. I ſhall quote the obſervation which Spanheim makes upon the manuſcripts of Sigebert. Collato eo codice (Bibliothecæ Leydenſis) cum aliis, ac præcipue cum iis quibus uſus eſt Aubertus Miræus, Gemblacenſi, Lipſiano, &c. patet non pauca addita, mutata, detracta, quædam etiam paſſim in noſtro deſiderari ex eo genere quæ Romæ inviſa, & quæ Baronius exagitat in Sigeberto (44). You ſee that among the things wherein he ſays copies differ, he places additions and omiſſions, and that ſome of theſe omiſſions concern facts, not agreeable to the court of Rome, and which favour of a writer too partial to the emperors that have at any time quarrelled with the Popes. There is room for thinking that theſe particular facts have been fraudulently left out by partial tranſcribers; but as for ſuch omiſſions, additions, or alterations, as no ways relate to diſputes or ſchiſms, they are not liable to the ſame ſuſpicion. We ſhould judge of them almoſt in the ſame manner as we do of the manuſcripts of Pagan authors, which have been maimed or corrupted. There may be a manuſcript of Cicero, of Titus Livius, &c. which contains certain paſſages that are not to be found in another. No paſſion, private intereſt, nor prejudice, could be the reaſon why the tranſcriber ſuppreſſed theſe. His only fault was lazineſs, ignorance, &c.

(44) Spanhem. de Papa fœmina, P. 54, 55.

To diſtinguiſh well, whether a tranſcriber has retrenched, or added any thing from a party-view, we ſhould know what the factions of ſtate or religion were that could prepoſſeſs him, and of what conſequence theſe paſſages ſuppreſſed, or added, might be to thoſe factions. If they can neither ſerve, nor hurt any party, we are to ſuppoſe that there was not any treacherous deſign in the addition or omiſſion; but we may ſuppoſe the contrary, when they have a particular relation to ſome violent diſpute. For which reaſon the copies of Martin Polonus would be juſtly ſuſpected of being either fraudulently maimed or enlarged, if they had been formed after the Proteſtants and Roman-Catholics began to write upon the ſubject of Pope Joan with ſo much heat and animoſity; but ſince they preceded that difference, and were written at a time when the hiſtory of that woman was contradicted by none, I ſee no reaſon why falſe zeal, partiality, a ſpirit of impoſture, &c. could move the tranſcribers to ſuppreſs it. Indeed ſome one may poſſibly have left it out, becauſe he looked upon it as a ridiculous ſtory. See the margin (45).

(45) Unuſquiſque quæ ipſe digna memoria judicabat addidit: erat ſitque quæ ſibi indigna lectu videbantur. Allat. Symm. p. 417, in ſpeaking of the chronicle of Martin Polonus, apud Spanhem. de Pap. fœmina, p. 68.

The ſpirit of party is a ſtrange fury: ſome readers are ſo warm that they tear to pieces, or take out all the pages where they find certain ignominious things charged upon their ſect. You may judge from thence what they would do if ſuch or ſuch manuſcripts paſſed through their hands. It is impoſſible to deſcribe the ravages which this paſſion has committed in the antient libraries (46). And how ſhould they not have dared to falſify manuſcripts, ſince they dare now a-days falſify ſecond editions even in the author's life-time (47). I am informed that the third volume of the Revolutions of England (48), reprinted in Holland, has been corruped in ſeveral places, ſometimes by additions, and ſometimes by ſuppreſſions.

(26) See the preface of Laurence Bouchel, in Decreta Eccleſ. Gallic. Rivet quotes him in his Remarks upon the Anſwer to the Myſtery of Iniquity, p. 602, of Vol. I.

(47) See the remark [F] of the article PELLISSON; and the remark [D] of the article ANCILLON.

I muſt not forget that there are ſome who believe, that the ſtory of Pope Joan has been added to the book of (48) By Father d'Orleans, a Jeſuit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google a credulous Author, and a man of a very weak judgment [C]. There is no doubt but that of Platina. It is the opinion of Bernartius; for, says he *, I have heard Antony Hetweld, a man of good reputation, and a magistrate of Louvain, say, that one Engelbertus Boonius, a grave person, and dean of a considerable church in Germany, often told him that he had seen several antient manuscripts of Platina, in the Vatican at Rome, that he had examined them carefully, but that he had never found in them a single word concerning the She-Pope (49). Alexander Cooke makes strong objections to this. How came these old manuscripts, says he (50), to be so numerous and antient in the Vatican, seeing that Printing was then in use, and that Platina died in the year 1481? Whence comes it that neither Onuphrius, nor Bellarmin, nor Baronius, who had as free access as others to the library of the Vatican, could find these manuscripts? What can be the reason, that no body since Bernartius has dreamt of this exception against Platina? The acknowledgment which Onuphrius, Bellarmin, and Baronius make, that this story is in Platina, inclines me to believe that Bernartius scandalized the magistrate, or the magistrate the dean, or else that the dean made a bubble of the magistrate. For, without doubt, if there had been such manuscripts, some of those gentlemen would have produced them before now. Mr Spanheim (51) does not dispute the fact with Bernartius, on the contrary, he makes use of it as an example to shew that the curtailing of manuscripts was a thing which had been long practised. For my own part I will not deny that there may have been in the Vatican some faithful copy of Platina's book, which wanted the story of Pope Joan. I think it very possible that this author may have shewn his manuscript, and suffered copies thereof to be taken some years before he published it. It is probable that after he had suffered it to be copied, he revised, corrected, and enlarged it, and that the story of the She-Pope was one of the additions. Consequently it may very well be, that there were some manuscripts of Platina without that story. But because Onuphrius, Bellarmin, and Baronius, did not question the faithfulness of that edition, where it was contained, they would not quote such manuscripts. That could not have been of any service to them. It must even be allowed that the testimony of Platina is not very prejudicial to the cause which these three authors defend, for it will sooner convince one that there has been no She-Pope, than that there has. Coëffeteau did not forget this observation. ' One ' Martin Polonus is accused of having been the first ' who exposed it to the eyes of Christendom; and ' Platina, from whom du Plessis borrows the account ' of it, confesses that he had taken it from him, adding these words, which instead of confirming du ' Plessis, should have made him waver in his opinion, ' and doubt, or rather condemn his whole narrative. ' What I say of this affair † is a common report, the ' authors of which are obscure and uncertain. Nevertheless I resolved to set it down briefly and fairly, lest ' I should seem to have wilfully omitted what is in a ' manner affirmed by all, (he means later authors) for ' even wise men have their follies: let us also err with ' the people, tho' it evidently appears that the present ' story is one of those things which we can believe possible. Is not this a glorious foundation for a monstrous story? And would not one, after seeing this, give it up as incredible, granting even that he had believed it to be true before (52).'

THE reasons why some manuscripts of Platina do not contain the story of the She-Pope.

If there was any example of a writer that had brought himself into trouble, and got ill will, by relating the story of Pope Joan, one might imagine that Platina suppressed it in the copies which he shewed to the Pope and cardinals; but in those days authors suffered no inconveniency upon that score, every one was free to speak of it as he had a mind. Whence therefore could arise such a precaution in Platina, as his having two sorts of copies, the one for the court, and the other for his intimate friends? It is easy to be accounted for why Varillas did not publish all that he had written, and what a hundred persons had seen in the copies of his History (53). He was afraid of being ill used. When it shall be proved that Platina, who had courage enough to mention other things, that were much more disagreeable in his days than the present story, did not dare to publish this, it will then be time to own that his book was only printed from the copy which he had designed for his intimate friends.

[C] He has been censured as a credulous author, and a man of a very weak judgment.] I shall quote another passage of Coëffeteau (54). ' The oldest author, who ' sullied his writings with this infamous narrative, was ' one Martin Polonus (55), a Cistertian monk, who ' ends his Chronicle at Nicholas III, about the year ' 1278. Platina has borrowed it from him; and ' both the one and the other proceed upon a vulgar ' report, without having any other knowledge of ' the matter. Du Plessis, that he might add weight ' to his authority, told us, above *, That as he had been ' penitentiary to Pope Nicholas III, and afterwards ' archbishop of Cosenze ‡, he deserved more respect and ' credit from us than we seemed willing to allow: ' but as we honour his dignities, so we know very ' well that they do not always make one a compleat annalist, or a very good writer of chronicles. ' We have a clear proof of it in the writings of this ' author, since one easily discovers, by reading them, ' that he was a simple well-meaning man, who picked ' up vulgar stories, as if they had been oracles, and ' inserted them in his works without any judgment. ' And besides, as touching this fact, he himself makes ' it doubtful, by speaking of it in such a cold manner. ' This person, says he, speaking of that monster, as we ' are told, ut asseritur, was a woman, &c.' Naudé treats him still worse. Without giving ourselves the trouble, says he (56), to consider the difference of the copies, and the additions made to this Martin Polonus, we shall do better to conclude at once, that his authority cannot any ways hurt Sylvester, both on account of the foregoing reason, and because he has given us such a vast number of fabulous things in his accounts, that one must be alike credulous and weak to believe what he says of Sylvester. I call to witness the stories that he has borrowed from the book de Infantia Salvatoris, and those which he tells of Pilate, of the Greeks who intended to steal the bodies of St Peter and St Paul, of the Dragon of Sylvester, which killed six-thousand persons every day: of another so big that eight yoke of oxen could not draw him to the place where he was to be burnt; of the British Arthur, of the Prophet Merlin, of Pope Joan, of the Letters of Gold which weighed a hundred pounds each, given by Charlemaign to twenty-three monasteries erected by him, and a great many others, which are only fit to lull children to sleep in their cradles. Alexander Cooke puts the following objection in another person's mouth; ' Know (that as Bellarmin  and N. D. † observe) ' he was a very simple man; and that, in the opinion of Dr Harding ‡, his writings are trifling and ' impertinent, and have not the least appearance of ' truth. Know, besides, that he was good for nothing ' but to make stories, for this is the censure which ‖ Bernartius passes upon him (57).' In answer to which it is said that he was †† well versed in the Holy Scriptures, and not ignorant of worldly learning, and that he was a person on whom Platina laid a great deal of stress in point of History ‡‡, and held him worthy to be esteemed a man of great knowledge, and of a singular life and conversation (58). After that Cooke examines five instances which are alledged to prove the ignorance of Martin Polonus, and maintains that they do him wrong. He says that Bernartius and Florimond de Remond impute those five blunders to him. I have not Bernartius's book (59), but I know that Florimond de Remond is falsly accused, since he has not ascribed them to Martin Polonus, but to another Martin. This will evidently appear upon reading the following quotation. ' Having made as strict an enquiry as the place, where I am, could allow me, ' into every thing that can be said upon this subject, ' I lighted on an old book in manuscript, containing ' the lives of the Popes and Emperors, where I found ' an account of this mitred Joan. The author's ' name is Martinus. I do not know whether the likeness of names has given occasion for ascribing to ' Martin Polonus what this other Martin writ, who ' was never printed, as far as I know, and of whom ' I have been able to discover nothing excepting that ' he was a German. This is probable, considering ' the difference of the copies which Simbler quotes. ' There is likewise to be seen another Chronicle of one

* Impudens aliquis nebulo interpolavit scripta Platinæ. Audivit ex Antonio Heetueldio, amplissimo laudatissimoque viro, consulari Lovaniensi, dixisse sibi sæpius Engelbertus Boonius . . . vidisse se Romæ in Bibliotheca Vaticana, antiquissima Platinæ exemplaria manuscripta, sedulo examinasse, & de Joanne fœmina ne literam quidem reperisse. Bernartius, de utilitate legendæ hist. lib. ii, pag. 111.

(49) Cooke, on the She-Pope, p. 46, 47.

(50) Ib. p. 47, 48.

(51) Spanhem. ubi supra, p. 64.

† Here are Platina's words in Joanne VIII, folio m. 140. Hæc quæ dixi vulgo feruntur: incertis tamen & obscuris auctoribus: quæ ideo ponere breviter, & nude instituì: ne obstinate nimium & pertinaciter omisisse videar: quod fere omnes affirmant: erremus etiam nos hac in re cum vulgo: quamquam appareat ea quæ dixi ex his esse: quæ fieri posse creduntur.

(52) Coëffeteau, Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, p. 504, 505.

(53) The passages suppressed in his History of Francis I, and of Charles IX, are to be found in the Dutch editions.

(54) Coëffeteau, ubi supra, p. 507.

(55) Fasciculus Billon, Missi Ital. Tom. i, p. 27, says also Martinum Polonum primum esse hujus fabulæ & non auctorem, sed narratorem. Serarius is of the same opinion in book i, chap. xlii, of the History of Mentz; but see the remark [K] of the article POPE (JOAN).

* Pag. 165, near the end.

‡ That cannot be; for Nicholas III made him archbishop of Gnesna, and not of Cosenza.

(56) Naudé, Apolog. des Grands Hommes, p. m. 559, 560.

 Lib. iii, de Rom. Pont. cap. xxiv.

† 3. Cent. Part ii, cap. v, num. 29, pag. 399.

‡ Answer to the Challenge of bishop Jewell.

‖ Martinus Polonus fabulis tantum celebris, cætera obscurus homo, lib. ii, de utilitate legend. Hist. pag. 113.

(57) Cooke, on the She-Pope, p. 63.

†† Trithem. de Script. Eccles. verbo, Martin.

‡‡ Vir magnæ doctrinæ singularisque vitæ. Platina, in Vit. Victor. 3.

(58) Cooke, ubi supra, pag. 64.

(59) De Utilitate legendæ Historiæ.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that he had the ſirname of Polonus from his being a Polander, or at leaſt from his being reckoned ſo [D]. Voſſius ſhould have affirmed poſitively that the Martinus Carſulanus, of whom Volaterranus ſpeaks in the beginning of the twenty-ſecond book, is the ſame with this man [E]. You will obſerve that his chronicle is ſirnamed Martinian, and that it was printed in French at Paris with the additions of Verneron canon of Liege, and with thoſe of the chronicle-writer Caſtel, in folio by Antony Verard (d).

(d) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 897.

(60) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, ch. ii, num. 6, fol. 367 verſo.

(61) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 162.

(62) Blondel, in Examine Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, p. m. 8.

(63) Simon Starovolſcius, in Centum Polonor. Elog. p. 29.

(64) Sand. Animadv. in Voſſium, de Hiſt. Latin. p. 173.

(65) Among thoſe are Father Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. ii, p. 62; and Dr Cave, de Script. Eccleſ. p. 739.

'one Martinus, full of impertinent ſtories (60).' Remond gives as an inſtance of it, the five blunders, from which Cooke has vindicated our Polonus. You will likewiſe pleaſe to obſerve, that du Pleſſis mentions another Martin, of the order of Friars Minors, and author of a Chronicle, intituled, Flores Temporum, where he ſpeaks of the She-Pope (61). Blondel places him towards the end of the XVth century (62).

[D] He had the ſirname of Polonus from his being a Polander, or at leaſt from his being reckoned ſo.] He was of the noble family Streperi, Streporum, if Starovolſcius is to be credited, who adds, that he was both the firſt and only Polander of that time who got himſelf any reputation by his writings, and that this was the reaſon of his being ſirnamed Polonus. Quod primus tum ex Polonis, idque ſolus, ſcriptis inter extraneos inclaruerit, unde & Polonus, à gente cognominatus eſt, ac ſi Scylurus ille Scytha, quod alium è Scythia parem ſibi ingenio non habuerit (63). There is in the library of Vienna a manuſcript of this Martin, where he ſays that he was born in Oppaw a city of Bohemia. Ipſe Martinus in præfat. Coditis MSi cujuſdam Bibl. Viennenſis, ſeipſum ait de regno Bohemiæ oriundum, patria Opimenſem; vel, ut in alio MSo, ut & Codice monaſterii Gamingenſis rectius legitur, Oppavienſem, obſervante Lambecio lib. 2. Bibl. Vindob. (64). At that time Poland was better known in Italy than Bohemia was, and people gave themſelves very little trouble about Geographical niceties. Thus a man born in any country which bordered upon the kingdom of Poland eaſily paſſed for a Polander. Thoſe who ſay that Martin was a Polander, of the city Carſula or Corſula (65), examine things in a very ſuperficial manner; for if he were of that city, he would be an Italian (66). They tack together what Volaterranus relates of his being a native of Carſula, and what others affirm of his being a Polander; but Volaterranus is miſtaken.

(66) Volaterranus ſays, lib. xxi, p. m. 739, that Carſula is at this day named Caſcina; and lib. vi, p. 199, that this town is in Umbria.

[E] The Martinus Carſulanus, of whom Volaterranus ſpeaks in the beginning of the twenty-ſecond book, is the ſame with this.] Volaterranus expreſſes himſelf in this manner: 'Pontificum Romanorum ſeu temporum eorum hiſtoriam ſcripſere. . . . . Vincentius & Martinus Carſulanus ordinis ambo Prædicatorum Jo. XXII tempore (67). - - - The Hiſtory of the Popes of Rome, or of thoſe times was written by . . . . Vincentius and Martinus Carſulanus, both of the order of preachers, in the Pontificate of John XXII.' He had ſaid elſewhere (68), in giving a catalogue of the famous Dominicans, 'Martinus Pœnitentiarius urbis, patria Carſulanus quam Caſcinam vocant, chronicam ſcripſit quam Martinianam vocant, Jo. XXII tempore. - - - Martin Penitentiary of Rome, and born at Carſula, which they call Caſcina, writ the chronicle ſirnamed Martinian, in the time of John XXII.' It is evident that he means the ſame Martin in theſe two paſſages; notwithſtanding which Voſſius doubts of it (69). He commits a greater blunder ſtill, ſince he imagines that Volaterranus ſpeaks of one Vincentius Carſulanus in the beginning of the twenty-ſecond book. He confeſſes that he does not know that author (70). But how ſhould he, ſeeing it is all a chimera? Volaterranus is only ſpeaking of the ſame Vincentius Bellovacenſis whom he had mentioned in book XXI (71).

(67) Volaterran. lib. xxii, init.

(68) Ib. lib. xxi, p. 759.

(69) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. ii, cap. lx, p. 485, & cap. lxiv, p. 507.

(70) De eo nihil ultra occurrit. Ibid. p. 507.

(71) Pag. 759.

POMPONATIUS (PETER) was born at Mantua, the ſixteenth of September 1462 (a). He was a man of ſo ſmall a ſtature, that he wanted but little of being a dwarf (b); but he was endowed with excellent parts, and accounted one of the greateſt Philoſophers of his age. He taught Philoſophy at Padua with a wonderful reputation, having the famous Achillini for his antagoniſt, whoſe puzzling objections would have often confounded him, had it not been for his ſkill in ſhifting them off with a witty jeſt [A]. During the dreadful war in which the Venetians were engaged againſt the league of Cambray, he removed to Bologna, where he taught Philoſophy. Though he was married thrice, he never had but one daughter (c), to whom he gave twelve thouſand ducats for her portion (d). I know that he did not die in the year 1512 (e), as Moreri will have it; but the time of his death is unknown to me: I only know that ſome ſay he attained to a very great age (f), and others, that he died of a retention of urine in the ſixty-third year of his life (g). His dead body was removed to Mantua, where cardinal Hercules de Gonzagua cauſed it to be decently buried (b). That great Philoſopher

(a) Laurus Gauricus, in Schemat. Tract. IV, fol. 57, verſo.

(b) Erat puſillus corpore homuncio quodammodo nanus. Ibid.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ibid.

(e) See the remark [B] towards the end.

(f) Obiit ſenio confectus. Ibid.

(g) Sexageſimo tertio ætatis anno ſtranguria oborta Bononiæ fato functus eſt. Jovius, in Elog. cap. lxxi, p. m. 165.

(b) Ibid.

[A] His ſkill in ſhifting them off with a witty jeſt.] This I find in Jovius. 'In coronis, ſays he (1), conſeſſuque doctorum, quum exercitatione perutili ad prætoriam porticum diſputaretur, ita mirus evadebat, ut ſæpe ancipiti, & cornuto Achillini enthymemate circumventus, ſuperfuſo facetiarum ſale, adverſarii impetum, ex illis gyris, & mæandris explicatus eluderet. - - - In large companies, and in an aſſembly of the learned, while they were diſputing upon ſerious and uſeful points, he had ſuch a wonderful art of evading, that oftentimes being hard preſſed by a ſharp and piercing argument of Achillini, he had recourſe to a witty jeſt, and thus eluding his adverſary's attack, extricated himſelf out of the labyrinth he was in.' Nothing can be more convenient in a diſpute than this talent of Pomponatius: If you are not able to anſwer an argument, if you find it puzzling and inſoluble, you may get off with a witty jeſt; all the laughing men will be of your ſide, and your adverſary will be confounded.

(1) Paul. Jovius, in Elog. cap. lxxi, p. m. 164.

Solventur riſu tabulæ, tu miſſus abibis (2).

He laugh'd and jeer'd at, you diſcharg'd the court.

(2) Horat. Sat. I, lib. ii, ver. ult.

It is upon ſuch an occaſion that this maxim proves true,

- - - - Ridiculum acri
Fortius & melius magnas plerunque ſecat res (3).

- - - - A waggiſh ſneer
Doth hit the great ones more than a ſevere.

CREECH.

(3) Idem, Sat. X, lib. i, ver. 14.

I knew a Profeſſor of Philoſophy, who made himſelf dreaded only upon this account. He was a man of no depth, and would have been eaſily confounded in a public diſputation, had it not been for his jeſts and ſometimes even for his low puns, which ſet the aſſembly a laughing. The ſtrongeſt objections came to nothing by that means, and he was ſo fully perſuaded that it was the beſt way of anſwering a puzzling argument, that he made uſe of it, even when he might have made a ſerious and ſolid anſwer. But after all, men of ſenſe do not reſt ſatisfied with ſuch a method; they laugh as well as others, but they adjudge the victory to thoſe who deſerve the honour of it. Paul Jovius obſerves,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

losopher was brought into trouble by the Monks, on account of his book concerning the immortality of the soul [B], and was suspected of impiety. The clamours raised against him, and the books published against his tract, did not make him alter his opinion:

observes, that Achillini prevailed in a disputation by the insuperable strength of his doctrine; though Pomponatius, his antagonist, made the assembly merry with his jests, and used many sly tricks. Æmulum in corona veteratorie disputantem, & risum falsa dicacitate sæpius excitantem, ipso invicto doctrinæ robore superabat (4). I must observe, by the by, that Pomponatius made use of his talent like a cunning man, to get the scholars of Achillini, who was a plain man, and unfit for intrigues (5).

(4) Jovius, ubi supra, cap. lvii, p. 134.

(5) Ipso Pomponatio acri æmulo insidiosa ambitione scholam ejus depopulante. Erat enim à summa ingenii simplicitate ambierdi, adulandique prorsus imperitus. Ibid.

[B] He was brought into trouble by the Monks, on account of his book concerning the immortality of the soul.] These are Jovius's words: Exorto bello Veneto, post Achillini mortem Bononiæ professus est; ubi cucullatos sacerdotes contra se in caput, & nominis famam vehementissimè concitavit; edito scilicet volumine, quo animas post corporis mortem interituras, ex sententia Aristotelis probare nitebatur; secutus Aphrodisæi placita, cujus dogmate ad corrumpendam juventutem, dissolvendamque Christianæ vitæ disciplinam, nihil pestilentius induci potuit (6). Jovius acts here the part of an Historian, and of a judge: he says not only that Pomponatius endeavouring to prove, that the soul of man is not immortal, according to Aristotle's opinion, exposed himself to the persecutions of the Monks, but also, that it is the most pernicious doctrine that ever was, and the most proper to corrupt youth and Christian morality. He is certainly much more in the right, when he keeps within the bounds of an Historian, than when he sets up for a judge; for it is not at all material, whether Aristotle believed the mortality of the soul, or whether, according to the principles laid down by him, one cannot well prove that it is not mortal. And therefore if Pomponatius maintained only, that any one who sticks to Aristotle's principles, must needs own that it dies with the body, his opinion is not pernicious, provided he acknowledges the immortality of the soul: but he expressly and formally acknowledges it. He examines Aristotle's hypothesis; he declares what may be said for or against that hypothesis; he brings in the Philosophical reasons that were alledged at that time, to prove that the soul is mortal or immortal; he observes wherein the strength or the weakness of the arguments lies on both sides, and then he concludes, that there being no demonstrative reason for the mortality or immortality of the soul, that question ought to be looked upon as a problematical one. Now, says he, since it belongs to God to decide the problematical questions about which men dispute, let us enquire whether he teaches us that our souls are immortal, and let us keep to his decision, as a definitive and infallible sentence. Afterwards, he proves by the Old and New Testament, that there is a future life, and declares that his faith is grounded upon that. These are his words: (7) His itaque sic se habentibus, mihi (salva saniori sententia) in hac materia dicendum videtur, quòd quæstio de immortalitate animæ est neutrum problema, sicut etiam de mundi æternitate: mihi namque videtur quòd nullæ rationes naturales adduci possunt cogentes animam esse immortalem, minusque probantes animam esse mortalem, sicut quamplures Doctores tenentes eam immortalem declarant . . . . . quapropter dicemus sicut Plato I de Legibus certificare de aliquo cum multi ambigunt solius est Dei; cum itaque tam illustres viri inter se ambigant, non nisi per Deum hæc certificari posse existimo. . . . . (8) Quapropter dico quòd ante donum vel adventum gratiæ, multifariam per Prophetas, & bona supernaturalia hanc quæstionem Deus terminavit, ut manifestè per vetùs Testamentum est videre; novissimè autem per Filium, quem constituit hæredem universorum, per quem fecit & sæcula eam quæstionem dilucidavit, sicut scribit Apostolus Epist. ad Hebræos. . . . . (9) Quantò lux distat à lucido, & veritas à vero, & quantò causa infinita est potior effectu finito, tantò efficacius hoc demonstrat immortalitatem animæ; quare si quæ rationes probare videntur mortalitatem animæ, sunt falsæ & apparentes, cum prima lux, & prima veritas ostendant oppositum, si quæ verò videntur probare ejus immortalitatem, veræ quidem sunt & lucidæ, sed non lux & veritas: quare hæc sola via inconcussa & stabilis est, cæteræ vero sunt fluctuantes. . . . . . (10) QUARE INDUBIE (11) ipsam immortalem esse asserendum est: verùm ea non via incedendum est quâ hujus seculi sapientes incesserunt, qui cum sapientes se dixerunt stulti facti sunt, quisquis enim hac via procedet ut existimo semper incertus & vagus fluctuabit. How can such a man be accused of impiety? How can he be taxed with denying the immortality of the soul? At this rate one might affirm, that all Divines bring into question the Trinity, the Incarnation, Transubstantiation, the Resurrection, and, in general, all the doctrines which they ground only on revelation, without pretending that they are discovered to us by the light of reason. Will not the holy Scriptures, being once acknowledged to be the word of God, as effectually produce the belief of the immortality of the soul, as a Geometrical demonstration (12). Jovius gives a very wrong judgment of that work of Pomponatius. Had he said in general, that the denying of the immortality of the soul destroys morality, he would have said a thing which is looked upon as a common notion, though some are of opinion it is not so certain as it seems to be; for, say they, if we consider what sort of life the Christians live, their lewdness, slanders, cheats, and whatever they do to get money and preferments, or to supplant their competitors, we shall find that they could not be worse, though they did not believe a future state. It will be found, generally speaking, that they only forbear doing such things as are attended with infamy, or a capital punishment: two curbs, which would put a stop to the corruption of an impious man, cæteris paribus, as well as to theirs. But this is a subject that would require a particular treatise.

(6) Jovius, ubi supra, cap. lxxi, p. 164.

(7) Petrus Pomponatius, de Immortalitate Animæ, cap. xv, & ult. pag. m. 124.

(8) Ibid. pag. 125.

(9) Ibid. pag. 126.

(10) Ibid. pag. 128.

(11) Note, that his last chapter is intituled, In quo ponitur ultima conclusio in hac materia, quæ sententia mea videtur indubie sustinenda.

(12) See, above, the article PERROT (Nicolas), citations (46) and (47).

FACTS concerning the treatise of Pomponatius concerning the Immortality of the Soul.

When I consider that Pomponatius did publickly acknowledge, that we cannot be sure of the immortality of the soul by the light of reason; I do not know what to think of the distinction which he is said to have made before his judges. The thing is related by la Mothe le Vayer in the following manner, 'Such a 'dexterity proved very successful not long ago to 'Pomponatius. That Philosopher having declared 'with a peripatetical liberty and warmth, that he 'did not believe the immortality of the soul, was pro'secuted by the Inquisition; but he got off by virtue 'of this explanation, that he did not believe it, pro'perly speaking, since he knew it demonstratively, as 'he explained himself in a long discourse to some 'judges, who had been formerly his scholars, and 'whose favour he stood pretty much in need of at 'this time (13).' I should rather think that he distinguished between faith and science, than between science and opinion, that is, he confessed to them that he had no demonstration of the immortality of the soul; but that he believed it as an article of faith revealed in the Scripture, and decided by the councils (14). However it be, it is said, he was not sorry that his book should be confuted, and that he wished, the pernicious poison that was in it might be destroyed by the antidote of Javellus's answer. This the Jesuit Antony Sirmond observes against a man, who had published in France Pomponatius's tract without that answer. Quem repugnante autore nescio quis curiosus, aut impius, novis typis jusserat in lucem exire solitarium & sine responsione Javelli, quam ipse Pomponatius scripta ad eum epistola ita olim comprobarat, ut palam rogaret edici, se quoque suffragante, perspersum libro suo venenum hoc antidoto nisi diluatur, pestiferum esse, ac toti humano generi extimescendum (15). I think this Philosopher be thought himself too late of this charitable office; for he maintained his first book twice against Niphus, and once against Ambrose, archbishop of Naples. This you will find in the same Sirmond (16); but he says nothing of the book published by Contarinus, in the year 1516, against that of Pomponatius, which appeared very solid to that Philosopher. 'Edidit juvenis 'adhuc (trigesimum enim tertium ætatis annum tunc 'agebat) librum contra judicium Petri Mantuani docto'ris sui . . . . argumenta autem illa firma ad proban'dum & gravia fuisse, opusque totum valde elabora'tum perspicitur, quia acutissimus ille physicus in li'bro quo defendit opinionem illam suam acriter op'pugnatam ab eo quem instruxerat, tradit eum librum '& doctissimum omnium & uberrimum esse qui omni 'tempore materiam illam persecuti sunt: additque vi'deri prorsus eum divina opera & manu fabricatum 'fuisse

(13) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialogue de la Diversité des Religions, pag. m. 294, 295. It is the last of the five dialogues of Orasius Tubero.

(14) Animam esse immortalem est articulus fidei, ut patet per Symbolum Apostolorum & Athanasii. Pomponatius, ad finem supra, p. 122.

(15) Antequam Sirmondus de Immortalitate Animæ, pag. 1, 2. He had was printed at Paris in the year 1635, in 8vo.

(16) Ibid. in Appendice, p. 19, 20.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google opinion: he made ſeveral replies, and inſtead of giving ground, went on ſteadily, keeping to his firſt corrective [C], viz. that the divine authority of the ſcripture was to him an unſhaken foundation, on which he grounded his belief of the immortality of the

' fuiſſe (17). - - - - He publiſhed while he was ſtill a young man (for he was then in the thirty-third year of his age) a book againſt the doctrine of his maſter Pomponatius . . . . It plainly appears that his arguments were ſtrong and weighty, and that the piece in general was extremely well finiſhed, ſince that ingenious Natural Philoſopher, in a book where he defends his opinion that was ſo ſmartly attacked by his own ſcholar, declared that his performance was abundantly more learned and copious, than any thing which had been ever writ upon that ſubject, and that he truly looked upon it as a compoſition altogether divine.' Why then did he not wiſh that this anſwer of Contarinus ſhould be printed, for the time to come, with his treatiſe, as we are told that he wiſhed ſuch a thing as to Javellus's anſwer? Niphus wrote againſt Pomponatius by Leo the tenth's order. On the contrary, others ſay, that Pomponatius compoſed his tract, only to pleaſe that Pope; which is confuted by la Mothe le Vayer. I ſhall ſet down ſomewhat at large what he ſays upon this ſubject; there are ſome things in it whereby the text of this remark will be illuſtrated. ' I need not ' enlarge upon theſe conſiderations (18), ſince every body ' may ſee what thoſe two great adverſaries, Pomponatius and Niphus, wrote upon this ſubject above a ' hundred years ago. Whereupon I muſt adviſe my ' reader to place among the idle fancies of Poſtel, a ' man who is known to have had very dangerous intervals, what he aſſerts, that Pomponatius engaged ' in that diſpute only to pleaſe the ſupreme * pontif, ' of whom he ſpeaks very diſreſpectfully. For, on ' the contrary, it is certain that Niphus was pitched ' upon by Pope Leo X, to whom he dedicated his ' book, as one of the moſt learned men of his time, ' and beſt qualified to defend a cauſe as far as it can be ' defended. And indeed it muſt be confeſſed, that he ' did all that could be done for a cauſe which lay ' open to great diſadvantages, being confined, by a ' mutual agreement, within the bounds of Peripatetiſm; ' and therefore Pomponatius jeſts upon him, ſaying, that ' he imitated a Phyſician of Milan, who ordered all ' ſorts of graſs that grew in a meadow, to be put into a bath, in hopes that ſome of them would prove ' beneficial to his patient: that in like manner Niphus had made uſe of all ſorts of arguments, tho' ' never ſo weak and ſophiſtical, to try whether ' ſome of them would be ſatisfactory. The beſt of ' all is, that the queſtion was about Ariſtotle's ' opinion, which after all, cannot be more prejudicial to truth, than what he ſays of the eternity of the ' world, or the quinteſſence of the Heavens, two o' pinions that are laughed at in the ſchools (19).' Spondanus having ſaid, that all Philoſophers were forbidden by Leo X to teach, that the ſoul of man is mortal, and but one in all men (20), obſerves, that it is thought Pomponatius occaſioned that bull. ' Occaſionem autem prædictæ de philoſophis ſanctioni ' dediſſe dicitur Petrus Pomponatius Mantuanus, Jovii ' in philoſophiâ præceptor: qui enarrans Ariſtotelem ' & Averroëm Bononiæ, animas poſt corporis mortem interituras ex ſententiâ Ariſtotelis probare conatus, ' juventutem valdè corruperat; ſe eo tuens quòd philoſophicè loquereturr, ſed aliter, cùm Chriſtianus eſſet, ſentiret (21). - - - Petrus Pomponatius of Mantua, Jovius's maſter in Philoſophy, is ſaid to have given occaſion to the above mentioned bull concerning Philoſophers; becauſe while he explained Ariſtotle and Averroës at Bologna, he had very much corrupted the youth, by endeavouring to prove that according to Ariſtotle's opinion the ſoul dies with the body; making this excuſe for himſelf that he ſpoke as a Philoſopher, but that as a Chriſtian, he thought otherwiſe.' Theſe words are not exact; for Spondanus ſuppoſes that Pomponatius taught, as Averroes did, that all men have but one ſoul in ſome reſpects, than which nothing can be more falſe. If you read his book, you will find, that having laid down the opinion of Averroes in the third chapter, he declares in the very beginning of the fourth, that it is abſurd and monſtrous, and that he does not think it neceſſary to confute it; becauſe Thomas Aquinas has ſo fully ſhewn the extravagancy of that opinion that the Averroiſts are not able to make any further reply: he has ſo entirely overcome them, ſays he, that the only thing they can do is to to give him hard words. Tam luculenter tam ſubtiliter adverſus hanc opinionem invehitur, ut ſententia mea nihil intactum, nullamque reſponſionem quam quis pro Averroë adducere poteſt impugnatam relinquat; totum enim impugnat, diſſipat, & annihilat, nullumque Averroiſtis refugium relictum eſt, niſi convitia & maledicta in Divinum & Sanctiſſimum virum (22). And therefore, referring his readers to Thomas Aquinas, he only ſhews, that Averroës could not find that chimerical notion in Ariſtotle. ' Quamvis hæc opinio tempeſtate noſtra ſit mul' tùm celebrata, & fere ab omnibus pro conſtanti ha' beatur eam eſſe Ariſtotelis, mihi tamen videtur quod ' nedum in ſe ſit falſiſſima, verum inintelligibilis, & ' monſtroſa, & ab Ariſtotele prorſus aliena; imò exi' ſtimo quòd tanta fatuitas nunquam fuerit nedum ' credita, verùm excogitata: Et primò quidem de ejus ' falſitate nihil novi intendo adducere, ſed tantùm ' lectorem remittere ad ea quæ latinorum decus Divus ' Thomas Aquinas . . . . ſed quoad ſecundum hæc pau' cula quæ mihi plenam fidem faciunt adducere ſtatui, ' videlicet hoc alienum eſſe ab Ariſtotele, verùm hoc ' eſſe figmentum, & monſtrum ab Averroë confictum (23). - - - Though this opinion be very current in our days, and almoſt univerſally allowed to be Ariſtotle's, yet to me it ſeems not only extremely falſe in itſelf, but likewiſe unintelligible, monſtrous, and entirely contrary to Ariſtotle's ſentiments; nay I am truly perſuaded, that ſuch a fooliſh conceit, far from being believed, was never thought of: and firſt as to the falſeneſs of it I ſhall ſay nothing new, but only refer the reader to what Thomas Aquinas, that honour to Latin authors . . . . but in the ſecond place I ſhall mention a few things which have fully convinced me, that this opinion was entirely foreign to Ariſtotle, and is indeed the monſtrous production of Averroës.' Nevertheleſs, it may ſaid that he was one of thoſe who occaſioned the bull of Leo X, of which he made no great account. It was read and approved by the Fathers of the council of Lateran, in the eighth ſeſſion, in the month of December 1513, and he wrote his book concerning the immortality of ſoul in the year 1516 (24). From whence we may infer, by the by, that Moreri, Konig, and ſeveral others are miſtaken, who place his death in the year 1512. According to the calculation of his nativity, mentioned by Gauricus, he was born in the year 1462. But according to Jovius, he died in the ſixty-third year of his life, and therefore he muſt have died in 1525. Freherus (25) ſays, that he flouriſhed in 1530, which is a miſtake.

[C] He made ſeveral replies, and inſtead of giving ground, went on ſteadily, keeping to his firſt corrective.] Having no other book of Pomponatius but his treatiſe de immortalitate animæ, I am not able to give a Chronological Hiſtory of the diſpute that was occaſioned by it. All that I can do is to make uſe of what I find in Mr le Noble. I do not take the account he gives of it to be altogether exact, and I perceive ſeveral omiſſions in it; but I am apt to believe that the things contained in it are true, and I muſt be contented with what he ſays, ſince I can have no better information (26). ' That tract (27) made a great noiſe, and when ' it came out at Venice, Pomponatius adds, that the ' Monks, whom he denotes by the word Cucullati, ' raiſed great clamours againſt his doctrine. . . . . (28) ' Thoſe Cucullati inveighed in their ſermons againſt ' Pomponatius, as againſt a downright Heretic, cauſed ' the reading of that treatiſe to be forbidden by the ' Patriarch, whom that Philoſopher calls a man of a ' moſt holy life, but very ignorant in Philoſophy and ' Divinity; and afterwards, by a decree of the ſenate, ' the Bookſellers were forbidden to ſell it . . . . A man ' of letters . . . . wrote againſt that treatiſe with great ' moderation . . . . (29) Pomponatius compoſed an a' pology in anſwer to that author: in the two firſt ' books of that apology, he anſwered, paragraph by ' paragraph, all the arguments alledged againſt his ' doctrine, and proved again, that Ariſtotle did not be' lieve the immortality of the ſoul, and that it could ' not be proved by natural reaſons. In the third book ' he very much blames the violent anger of Brother ' Ambroſe

(17) Johan. Cafa, in Vita Gaſparis Contareni, p. m. 184.

(18) That is, whether Ariſtotle teaches the Immortality of the Soul.

* Lib. i, de orb. concord.

(19) La Mothe le Vayer, de l'Immortalitate de l'Ame, pag. 136, 137, of the 4th volume of his works in 12*mo.*

(20) You will ſee the words of that bull towards the end of the remark [L] of the article SPINOZA.

(21) Spondanus, Annal. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1513, num. 20, p. m. 308.

(22) Pomponat. ubi ſupra, pag. 8, 9.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Finis impoſitus eſt huic tractatui per me Petrum filium Joannis Nicolai Pomponatii de Mantua die 24 menſis Septembris anno Chriſti 1516 Bononiæ. Ibid.

(25) In Theatro, p. 1441.

(26) Le Noble, Tableaux des Philoſophes, Tom. ii, p. 80.

(27) That is, the tract concerning the Immortality of the Soul.

(28) Ib. p. 81.

(29) Ib. p. 82.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the soul. His tract de Incantationibus was also accounted a very dangerous book [D]. He did not want apologists (i); but the only thing that some alledge in his justification is, that he renounced his Atheism [E]. If the charge of impiety laid upon him was only

(i) See the remark [E].

' Ambrose of Naples, of the order of the hermits of ' St Augustin, who had been made bishop some few ' days before. He complains, that preaching his lent ' sermons in the cathedral church of Mantua, he ' had spoke very injuriously of him from the pulpit, ' calling him publickly an heretical and impious man, ' and falsely charging him with not believing the re- ' surrection and the immortality of the soul. He ' therefore declares, that he believes that souls are ' immortal, and that he is ready to die in defence of ' that truth; but that he is fully persuaded of it, be- ' cause God hath revealed it to men, and not because ' the light of reason teaches it, and that if Brother ' Ambrose will give him good reasons for the contra- ' ry, he is ready to hear him and change his opinion.' Afterwards he says, that the patriarch of Venice wrote to Peter Bembo, who was at Rome, to desire him to get that tract concerning the immortality of the soul, condemned by the Pope. Bembo read it, and tho' he found nothing in it contrary to truth, yet, according to the duty of his place, he communicated it to the master of the apostolical palace, who having read it, was of Bembo's opinion, that it contained nothing but what was agreeable to the doctrine of the most celebrated doctors of the Christian religion (30).

(30) Ib. p. 83.

' (31) Afterwards, as it is usual to grow hot by ' much disputing, and to carry things too far, he (32) ' maintains and endeavours to prove, that the immor- ' tality of the soul is repugnant to natural reason, and ' that nothing can be more injurious to faith, than to ' pretend to prove it by natural arguments. . . . (33). ' When Pomponatius had made this apology, a new ' book, written by Augustin Niphus, a Philosopher, ' came out against his first treatise concerning the im- ' mortality of the soul. Pomponatius answered it by ' another tract, intituled Defensorium, wherein he shews ' Niphus's ignorance, further proves what he had ad- ' vanced, and at last concludes that work with these ' words: if Christ is raised from the dead, we shall ' likewise rise, and if we rise, the soul is immortal. ' But it is certain that Christ is raised; therefore it ' is true that the soul is immortal. This is, says he, ' the only solid argument whereby the immortality of ' the soul can be proved: whoever is not contented ' with it, does not deserve the name of Christian, and ' does not know the excellency of faith, which ought ' to have the first place in all our reasonings, and is ' alone sufficient to lay down in a solid manner what ' cannot be maintained any other way.'

(31) Ib. p. 84.

(32) That is, Pomponatius in his apology.

(33) Le Noble, ubi supra, p. 85, 86.

We shall see below, that Mr le Noble censures some of these thoughts of Pomponatius.

[D] His tract de incantationibus was accounted a very dangerous book.] It appears from it, that he believed nothing of what is said about Magic and Witchcraft, and he lays great stress on I know not what virtues that some men have had, whereby they produced miraculous effects. He alledges many instances of it; but his adversaries do not allow that they are true, or free from Magic, and wonder that Zacutus should think himself obliged in conscience to believe them. Here is a passage of Theophilus Raynaud (34). ' Ex- ' empla quæ ad specialem aliquorum hominum proprie- ' tatem individualem ad miros effectus præstandos, ' præsertim sanationum, à Pomponatio addensantur; ' vel fabulosa sunt, vel Magica, ut Andreas Lauren- ' tius capite (35) illo 4. contendit. Ridiculè autem Za- ' cutus (36) dicta q. 53. inter magnos autores quibus ' fidem abrogasse piaculum propè esse dicit, numerat Pom- ' ponatium in Opere de Incantationibus, exempla illa ' recensentem. - - - The many examples which Pomponatius brings to prove, that there is a special and individual virtue in some men to perform wonderful things, particularly in the cure of diseases, are either false, or owing to Magic, as Andreas Laurentius affirms. But Zacutus ridiculously places Pomponatius, with respect to those examples in his book de Incantationibus, among the great authors whom he reckons it a sort of impiety not to believe.' He refers us to his Theologia Naturalis, wherein the following words against that book of Pomponatius are to be found (37). ' Nec minor ' Pomponatii culpa, qui (38) idem conatus in opere ' de incantationibus ad extremum tamen subjicit opus ' suum correctioni Ecclesiæ, à qua ut rectè suprà di- ' vinavit (39) Carpentarius aliud expectare non potuit, ' quàm unam lineam à principio ad finem usque du- ' ctam. Ita enim factum est, collocato ante aliquot ' annos, inter reprobata, illo opere, in quo Buccafferr. ' l. de divinat. per somnium lect. 29. ait asseri à Pom- ' ponatio, multa falsa, & multas ac magnas nugas. - - - ' Nor was Pomponatius less to blame, who having at- ' tempted the same thing in his book de Incantationibus, ' did however at last submit it to the censure of the ' church, from which, as Carpentarius rightly guessed ' above, he could expect no other thing but to have one ' line drawn quite across from the beginning to the end. ' For so it happened a few years ago, when that book ' was condemned, in which, according to Buccaffer. l. de ' divinat. &c. Pomponatius asserts many things that are ' false, and many that are exceedingly trifling.' A Fel- low-Jesuit of Theophilus Raynaud, expressed himself with greater force. ' Pomponatii de Incantationibus ' opusculum certè miratus fui tam diu tolerari ab Ec- ' clesiâ; nunc recens & meritò in Romano Indice dam- ' natur; verissimum enim quod ab Antonio Miradu- ' lano  scriptum, hoc opere Pomponatium, se nec ' philosophum bonum, nec quod fœdiùs Christianum ' bonum exhibuisse, cum effectus omnes mirificos cœ- ' lorum influctionibus adscribit; adeò ut velit & reli- ' giones & leges earumque latores ab iis dependere. ' Quod prorsus impium (40). - - - I was certainly sur- ' prized, that this treatise of Pomponatius de Incantatio- ' nibus was so long suffered by the Church. It has lately ' with very good reason been put in the catalogue of con- ' demned books; for it is most true what Antony of Mi- ' randula says, that Pomponatius, by this performance, has ' neither shewed himself to be a good Philosopher, nor, ' which is still worse, a good Christian, since he ascribes ' all wonderful effects to the influence of heavenly bodies, ' and would have religion, laws, and law-givers, to de- ' pend upon them: which is a monstrous impiety.' Pomponatius speaking of the cures that are ascribed to the virtue of relics, said a thing which at first seems to be offensive, but one might give it a very good turn according to the common hypothesis. He affirms, that the bones of a dog would as effectually produce a cure, if the sick person, who relies on the virtue of relics, formed the same imagination concerning those bones, as concerning the bones and ashes of martyrs. Pomponatius dicere non veretur in sanatione acquisita ex veneratione Ossium Divis ascriptorum, si essent ossa canis & tanta & talis de eis haberetur imaginatio non minus subsequeretur sanitas (41). The controversial writers of the Church of Rome being not able to deny, that some supposititious relics have wrought miracles, as it is pretended, say, that the good intention of those who have recourse to them, procured them such a reward from GOD.

(34) Theoph. Raynaudus, de Stigmatismo sacro & profano, §. ii, cap. iv, p. m. 321, 322.

(35) That is, of the first book de Strumis.

(36) That is, of the first book Mediocrium principum Historiæ.

(37) Id. in Theologia Naturali, Distinct. III, Quæst. II, Art. V, num. 139, p. m. 200, 201.

(38) That is, to reject what is said of the devil's operations.

 Lib. vi, de singulari certamine.

(39) That is, Dig. IV, in Alcino.

(40) Marc. Delrio, Disquisit. Magicar. lib. i, cap. iii, pag. m. 22.

(41) Jo. Wierus, de Præstigiis Dæmonum, lib. v, cap. xvii, p. m. 402. He quotes the 2d book of Pomponatius, de Incantamentis, cap. xii.

[E] The only thing that some alledge in his justification is, that he renounced his Atheism.] Helidæus, a famous Physician of Forli, said, that his master Pomponatius was an Atheist. John Wierus hopes that this Philosopher did not die in that condition. Pomponatium ante redditum spiritus extremi halitum respuisse ex singulari Dei miseratione, nec permansisse ἀθεον. Sperare volo. Talem etenim fuisse, à clarissimo medicinæ ornamento D. Helidæo Foroliviensi, ejus olim discipulo non semel auditum est (42). Voetius tells us that Gratarolus made an apology for Pomponatius, and is so equitable as not to follow the stream. He owns, that most of the Catholic writers, and some Protestant authors, call that Philosopher an Atheist (43), and lays some stress upon the remark of the apologist, that the opinion of Pomponatius about the mortality of the soul, concerned only Aristotle's hypothesis. He should have said, that this is a plain proof of that author's innocency, unless he designed to hide his pernicious doctrine under that cover. Voetius alledges that restriction. ' Guil. Gratarolus Medicus Italus (quem propria scripta ' uno volumine in 8vo Basileæ edita, & testimonium ' Bezæ in epistolis, ut & in dedicatione libelli cujusdam, ' aliorumque præterea doctorum virorum suffragia, ' quorum familiaritate Basileæ & alibi usus est, à Pie- ' tatis zelo commendant) eum contra calumniatores ' tuetur, & piè pro eo tempore vitam cum morte com- ' mutasse

(42) Wierus, lib. vi, in Epilogo Operis, p. m. 569.

(43) Voëtius, Disput. Theol. Tom. i, p. 197.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

only grounded on his book concerning the immortality of the ſoul, no accuſation was ever more impertinent [F], and a more ſignal inſtance of the unjuſt prepoſſeſſion of thoſe

'mutaſſe ſcribit: in epiſtol. dedicator. Operibus Pomponatii anno 1567. Baſil. editis præfixâ. . . . . Illud 'penitus conſiderandum, quod reſpondet: Eum ex 'mente Ariſtotelis negaſſe animæ immortalitatem: 'quod, ut illi cum aliis philoſophis ac Theologis ita 'judicantibus commune fuit (Plutarcho, Galeno, Aphrodiſæo, Juſtino Martyre, Theodoreto, Origene, Nyſſeno, Nazianzeno, Cajetano in 3. de Anima) ſic non debet 'hic fraudi eſſe: niſi probari poſſet illum ſub hoc 'ſchemate ſubdolè & tutò voluiſſe hunc Atheiſmum 'ſpargere in animos auditorum. Niſi itaque alia ex 'dictis, ſcriptis, factis ejus certior demonſtratio ſuppetat, utique in benigniorem partem, immo in optimam accipienda ſunt illa, quæ ille pro modulo & 'conditione ſua de Fato, Providentia Dei, & prædeſtinatione conſcripſit: in quibus ſi non rei dignitati, & 'ſolidis Theologis per omnia ſatisfaciat, ſaltem hoc 'præſtat, ne nigra Atheiſmi nota illi tam peremtoriè 'inuratur. Hæc ego in re dubia, poſtquam omnia 'ejus opuſcula præſertim modo nominata videre contigit: qui ante multos annos ex lectione ſolius tract. 'de Incantationibus (ubi placitis Avicennæ & Averrois 'nimis adhæreſcens, in ſupernaturalibus quibuſdam ſatis miſerè fluctuat) & ex communi aliorum judicio 'ſiniſtram magis de illo opinionem conceperam (44). '- - - William Gratarolus, an Italian Phyſician, (in high 'repute for his religious zeal, as it appears from his 'own writings printed at Baſil in one volume in 8vo, 'and from the teſtimony of Beza in his epiſtles, and in 'the dedication of a certain book, and likewiſe from 'the joint ſuffrages of other learned men, with whom 'he converſed familiarly at Baſil and elſewhere) defends 'him againſt his falſe accuſers, and in the epiſtle dedicatory, prefixed to the works of Pomponatius printed at Baſil in 1567, ſays, that he died a pious death for thoſe 'times. . . . . That part of his anſwer ſhould be thoroughly conſidered, where he ſays that Pomponatius denied the 'immortality of the ſoul according to the opinion of Ariſtotle: which, ſeeing it was common to him with other 'Philoſophers and Divines of that opinion (Plutarch, Galen, &c.) ought not to redound to his diſadvantage 'in particular, unleſs it could be proved that he made 'uſe of that ſcheme in order to inſtil Atheiſm with the 'greater cunning and ſafety into the minds of his hearers. 'Wherefore, unleſs ſome more ſolid proof can be alledged 'from his ſayings, writings, or actions, a more favourable, or rather indeed a more reaſonable, conſtruction 'ought to be put upon what things he has written, after 'his way and manner concerning Fate, Providence, and 'Predeſtination: where if he does not come up in every 'part to the dignity of his ſubject, and ſatisfy judicious 'Divines, he at leaſt deſerves not to have the brand of 'Atheiſm ſo peremptorily fixed upon him. This came to 'be my opinion in a doubtful matter, when I had peruſed all his works, particularly thoſe above-mentioned; 'whereas ſome years before, from reading only his treatiſe de Incantationibus (where by ſticking too cloſely to 'the ſentiments of Avicenna and Averroës he is abundantly at a loſs about ſome ſupernatural things) and 'from the common talk of others, I had imbibed a much 'worſe opinion of him.' I muſt not omit the epitaph which ſomebody made on this Philoſopher: 'Hic 'ſepultus jaceo. Quare? neſcio: nec ſi ſcis aut neſcis 'curo. Si vales, bene eſt: vivens valui. Fortaſſe 'nunc valeo. Si aut non, dicere nequeo (45). - - - - 'Here I lie buried. Why? I do not know: neither do 'I care whether you know or not. If you are in good 'health it is well. I was well when I was alive. 'Perhaps I am ſo now. But if I am, or am not, I 'cannot tell.'

(44) Ibid. pag. 198.

(45) Konig, Biblioth. p. 654.

[F] If the charge of impiety laid upon him was only grounded on his book concerning the immortality of the ſoul, no accuſation was ever more impertinent.] In the firſt place, to aſſert, that the principles of Ariſtotle lead us to believe that the ſoul is mortal, is at moſt, but a perſonal reflexion. Whoever ſays ſo, is, at moſt, guilty of doing injuſtice to a man, who was preceptor to the conqueror of Aſia, and the founder of a moſt flouriſhing ſect. But can this be called an impiety? In the ſecond place, ſince Ariſtotle is dead, and conſequently cannot give an account of his faith, and clear the equivocations that are in his books, any one may be allowed to declare againſt him, if he finds in his writings, as many or more plauſible reaſons, to ſhew that he taught the mortality of the ſoul, than to ſhew that he taught it's immortality; and therefore nothing can be more harmleſs, than to convert the opinion of Ariſtotle on this great point into a problem, and to maintain the affirmative or negative, according as the reaſons alledged by him for or againſt the immortality of the ſoul, make a greater impreſſion. If any one does not take his ſenſe right, he does him injuſtice; but after all, it is only a material injury, which Ariſtotle would be obliged to forgive, by imputing it to his own want of exactneſs, and to his own variations and contradictions. The moſt famous of all his interpreters (46), and many others after him, as the two Gregory's, Leſcot, Cajetan, and Simon Portius, have acknowledged, that the Mortality of the Soul was a thing altogether neceſſary, according to the doctrine of that Philoſopher (47). And therefore he muſt needs have advanced ſome maxims, which afford a fair pretence to aſcribe to him ſuch an impious doctrine. It is therefore a moſt ridiculous thing to aſſert, that none but an impious man can have ſuch thoughts of Ariſtotle's doctrine; and conſequently, the pretended impiety of Pomponatius would be grounded on a groſs illuſion. Nay, he could not be ſuſpected, with any ſhew of reaſon, of any deſign prejudicial to the memory of that great founder of the Peripatetics. In the third place I obſerve, that one may aſſert, not only that it appears from his works, that he did not believe the immortality of the ſoul, but alſo that his ſyſtem, ſuch as the ſchoolmen have been pleaſed to explain it, and and ſuch as it is explained to this day in the univerſities, cannot afford any proofs of the immortality of the ſoul, and can furniſh us with many arguments for the contrary. For, in ſhort, the principal part of that ſyſtem is, 1. That natural bodies are made up of two ſubſtances, one whereof is called matter, and the other form. 2. That the form of all natural bodies, man only excepted, is a corruptible Being, which never fails to be deſtroyed when the compound periſhes, that is, whenever a ſtone, a tree, a dog, &c. are converted into natural bodies of another kind. From whence it neceſſarily reſults, that thoſe who follow this ſyſtem, can give no proofs of the immortality of the ſoul; for in order to it, they ſhould make it appear, that it is immaterial: but how can they ſhew it, ſince they own, that the ſoul of brutes, though endowed with the faculty of feeling, diſcerning, and deſiring, is material? It is to be obſerved that in Pomponatius's time, they knew of no philoſophical ſyſtem but that of Ariſtotle, ſo that to aſſert, that the immortality of the ſoul could not be proved by the principles of that Philoſopher, and to aſſert that it could not be proved by philoſophical reaſons, was one and the ſame thing. This goes a great way towards excuſing, and even juſtifying the book of Pomponatius; the rather, becauſe the Platonic, or any other ſect, did not afford better proofs. Des Cartes is the only Philoſopher who laid down very ſolid principles concerning this ſubject. He ſays, that all thinking ſubſtances are diſtinct from matter; from whence it neceſſarily follows, that the ſoul of man is a ſpirit, or a ſimple indiviſible Being, and conſequently immortal. No Carteſian will ſcruple to ſay, that the principles of the old Philoſophy cannot afford one good proof of the immortality of the ſoul. Were it not an extravagant thing to maintain, that a Carteſian who ſays ſo is an impious and atheiſtical man? Why then was Pomponatius ſo ill uſed? It will be ſaid, that a Carteſian acknowledges that his ſyſtem affords a demonſtrative proof of the immortality of the ſoul, whereas Pomponatius acknowledged no ſyſtem that afforded ſuch an argument. Such a difference cannot be admitted, but by ſuppoſing that this Philoſopher rejected the Carteſian ſyſtem, though he knew it; but he knew nothing of it, and therefore his fault lies only in not inventing a ſyſtem, according to which whatever thinks is incorporeal and ſpiritual. This is the fault of a great many orthodox men, and conſequently a chimerical one. I further add, that though he had rejected the ſuppoſition whereby whatever thinks is diſtinct from matter, he had done nothing but what is done at this day by men of great parts, who relying intirely on the authority of the Holy Scripture, as Pomponatius did, cannot be juſtly charged with irreligion

(46) Alexander Aphrodiſæus.

(47) La Mothe le Vayer, de l'Immortalité de l'Ame, pag. 139.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

thoſe who perſecute the Philoſophers. For he did not queſtion the immortality of the ſoul; on the contrary, he maintained that it was a moſt certain doctrine, and that he was fully perſwaded of it. He only aſſerted, that the natural reaſons alledged for it, are not ſolid and ſatisfactory. Now, though a good uſe may be made of the opinion he

(48) See, above, the end of the remark [M], of the article of the firſt DICÆARCHUS; and the remark [L], of the article PERROT (NICOLAS).

(49) Hæc ſola via inconcuſſa & ſtabilis eſt, cæteræ verò ſunt fluctuantes Pomponat. de Immort. Animæ, cap. ult. p. m. 126. See, above, what Ablancourt ſaid, towards the beginning of the remark [L] of his article PERROT (NICOLAS) Sieur d'Ablancourt.

(50) Hebr. vi, 19.

(51) See the remark [G].

ligion (48). Laſtly, I obſerve, that nothing can be more unworthy of a Divine, than to cry down a Philoſopher as an impious man, becauſe he declares, that in order to free our minds from the uncertainty of human reaſon, we ought to rely on the word of GOD, as containing the true foundation and moſt certain proofs of the immortality of our ſouls (49). This is what Pomponatius did, for which he was cruelly perſecuted by the monkiſh tribe. What a ſhameful and horrid thing was this!

I go farther, and ſay, that the Carteſians themſelves, who are convinced of the immortality of the ſoul, becauſe the principles of their Philoſophy appear evident to them, act the part of wiſe men, when they adviſe their readers to have recourſe to faith, as an anchor of the ſoul, both ſure and ſtedfaſt, and which entereth into that within the veil (50); that is to ground their belief of this doctrine on the authority of GOD, which is the true remedy of our uncertainties, and ſupplies the obſcurity of our reaſon. For if they have right notions of things, they ought to believe, that what appears evident to them, does not appear ſo to many other Philoſophers, who oppugn it. I have read in a book of Mr Arnauld, that Gaſſendus's reply to Des Cartes made many diſbelieve at Naples, the immortality of the ſoul (51), becauſe Gaſſendus uſed all his ſkill to enervate the arguments of Des Cartes, concerning that doctrine; which ſhews, that the Carteſian principle is not evident to every body. Nay, it is certain that if ignorant people made uſe of common ſenſe, they could never be ſure of the immortality of their ſouls, whilſt they ſee that the greateſt Philoſophers do not agree about it. Were an ignorant man to blame if he argued in this manner? If Des Cartes's arguments were evident, Gaſſendus could not oppugn them, ſo as to ſatisfy many people; for if Gaſſendus had writ a book wherein he had uſed all his wit and ſkill to prove, that the whole is not greater than it's parts, and that if things equal be taken from things equal, the remainder will not be equal, no body would have been perſuaded of the truth of thoſe aſſertions: and therefore ſince Gaſſendus, and many other great Philoſophers, do not want followers, when they oppoſe Des Cartes's doctrine, they muſt needs oppugn a doctrine that is not evidently true; there is therefore ſome obſcurity in it, it appears true to ſome, and falſe to others: how can I then reſolve the matter, being no ſcholar, and having no ſkill in diſputes? Some of thoſe great men muſt needs be miſtaken, and therefore whatever party I ſide with, I run the hazard of being in an error. People ſhould argue thus, when they ſee that learned men are divided in their opinions. But if they ſhould do ſo, how would they get out of their uncertainties? There is an effectual way for it, as to the immortality of the ſoul, which is to have recourſe to the light of revelation. And therefore if a Carteſian ſhould imitate Pomponatius, he ought to be accounted a wiſe man, and charitable to his neighbour. It is well done of him ſteadily to maintain the truth of his principle, and to anſwer, to the utmoſt of his power, thoſe who may object, that ſubſtances diſtinct from matter are, perhaps, of ſuch a nature as to be able to preſerve their exiſtence without having any thought; and that therefore ſpirituality is not a neceſſary proof of immortality: for if the life of the ſoul conſiſts in thought, it is certain, that a total ceſſation of thought would be a true death of the ſoul; and therefore the ſoul might die without ceaſing to be a ſpiritual ſubſtance, as dogs die without ceaſing to be a corporeal ſubſtance: but after all, if he adviſes his neighbour to rely on the word of GOD, he is to be commended for it. Note, that Scaliger the Father, one of the greateſt wits of his time, and who was never accounted a libertine, acknowledged, as Pomponatius did, that it is a matter of faith to know whether there is a future life. It has been always ſuſpected or believed, ſays he, but it is ſtill a matter of diſpute to this very day (52).

I ſhall conclude with ſome paſſages of a diſpute that laſted ſome years between a Miniſter of Rotterdam and a Miniſter of Utrecht. The firſt (53) owns, That tho' he believes that matter is not capable of any ſenſation or knowledge, yet he has no diſtinct idea, and no clear perception of that truth, and cannot prove it to thoſe who deny it. What I perceive in it, ſays he, is confuſed and undiſtinct. . . . (54). Can M. Saurin, and his rational colleagues ſay in conſcience, that they have a clear perception and a diſtinct idea of the Immortality of the Soul? Are not theſe propoſitions clear in appearance, that whatever has a beginning ought to have an end; that a being, whoſe duration is divided by moments, days, and years, cannot be eternal, becauſe it would be infinite, and that infinite duration would contain an infinite number of moments, and yet there would be but an infinite number of days and years; and therefore there would be as many months and years as moments, which is a palpable abſurdity. An impious man ſays, theſe are clear perceptions, and they appear to him to be ſo. The deſign of this Miniſter is ſomewhat like that of Pomponatius: he will have us to miſtruſt our reaſon, and to depend on the authority of GOD (55). Here follows his adverſary's anſwer (56). I anſwer, that I have a clear perception and a diſtinct idea of the Immortality of the Soul. I know that the ſoul is a ſpiritual and indiviſible ſubſtance, which can only be deſtroyed by annihilation: I know that there is a providence, a ſupreme juſtice, a ſupreme felicity, a natural morality, in ſhort, a great many truths, which have a neceſſary connexion with the Immortality of the Soul, and conſequently they would be chimerical notions, if the ſoul was mortal: muſt a Chriſtian Philoſopher be leſs orthodox than Plato? Muſt he give the preference to Epicurus, when he draws up a parallel of the antient Philoſophers? . . . (57). Mr Jurieu confutes himſelf, when he ſays that thoſe preceptions are clear in appearance: for if they are only clear in appearance, nothing can be concluded from them in favour of thoſe that are really clear.

(52) Thus I render ſomewhat freely theſe words, Cæterum eſſe alterum eſſe ab hoc eſſe adeo neſcimus ut quotidianis vel ſuſpicionibus vel perſuaſionibus res etiamnum ſit controverſa, ſola fide res agatur. Scaliger adverſus Cardanum, Exercit. CCCVII, cap. xxxiii, p. m. 990. See the article PERROT (NICOLAS), ubi ſupra, citat. (48), (49), and (50).

(53) Jurieu, Religion du Latitudinaire, p. 393.

(54) Ib. p. 394.

(55) Note, that he does not require we ſhould know, by a clear and diſtinct idea, that authority; that is, that we ſhould evidently know that God has revealed ſuch and ſuch things to us.

(56) Saurin, Juſtification of his Doctrine, pag. 467.

(57) Ib. p. 468.

I ſhall make ſome ſhort obſervations upon theſe words of Mr Saurin. I. Mr Jurieu does plainly ſuppoſe, that in order to have a diſtinct idea, and a clear perception of the ſpirituality of the ſoul, we muſt clearly apprehend, that matter is not capable of any ſenſation or knowledge. How comes it then, that Mr Saurin leaves this unanſwered? Should he not have ſaid, that he has a diſtinct idea, and a clear perception, whereby he knows, that an extended ſubſtance cannot have any ſenſation. II. It is not ſufficient to know, that the ſoul cannot be deſtroyed but by annihilation; for the ſame may be ſaid of extenſion, and yet trees and beaſts are mortal. Mr Saurin ſhould therefore have expreſſed himſelf thus; I know that the ſoul cannot ſubſiſt without thought; the diſtinct idea I have of a ſpiritual and indiviſible ſubſtance teaches me, that if it were deprived of thought, it would ceaſe to exiſt. III. Plato and Epicurus are improperly alledged; for this allegation ſuppoſes that Mr Jurieu is not ſo orthodox as Plato, and that he prefers the doctrine of Epicurus to that of the other antient Philoſophers; which is falſe. He acknowledges the Immortality of the Soul, but he has not a clear idea, and a diſtinct perception of it: he means, that his idea of it is not ſo evident, as that whereby we know the properties of numbers, and the connexion of a local preſence with the extenſion of matter. Do you think that Plato's idea of the Immortality of the Soul was as clear as that? When a man declares, that he does as the generality of mankind do, that is, that his perſuaſion goes farther than his evidence, the charge of unbelief laid upon him is a falſe accuſation. He cannot be accuſed of heterodoxy, ſince he believes what ought to be believed; all that can be ſaid againſt him, is, that he does not act like a Philoſopher. IV. The diſtinction between ideas apparently and really clear, is inſignificant; for the clearneſs of ideas does neceſſarily imply a relation to our minds, and is never ſeparated from appearance; they are always ſtiled or denominated clear from appearance. This is not the caſe with truth. An object may be true, tho' it appears falſe; but an idea, which appears obſcure, is neither really nor apparently clear; and therefore, if the clear ideas of the Immortality of the Soul are inconſiſtent with ideas that are apparently clear, Mr Jurieu's objection is good,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he oppoſed, and though the Philoſophers, who make it their buſineſs to enforce the human reaſons, alledged for the immortality of the ſoul [G], ought to be commended and good, ſo far is he from confuting himſelf, as his antagoniſt would have it. V. Laſtly, Mr Saurin is very much to blame for not anſwering the objection: he might have confounded Mr Jurieu in that reſpect, who falſly ſuppoſes that thoſe who ſay, that whatever has a beginning muſt have an end, go upon this, that an infinite duration would contain as many months and years as moments. He ſuppoſes that they look upon this as a great abſurdity. But he ſhould have known that the Atheiſts aſſert, that the duration of matter had no beginning, and will never end: and therefore they do not look upon the neceſſity of admitting an infinite number of moments, and an infinite number of months, and years, and ages, &c. as a good reaſon to reject a doctrine.

[G] Though a good uſe may be made of the opinion which Pomponatius oppoſed, and though the Philoſophers who made it their buſineſs to enforce the human proofs of the Immortality of the Soul, ought to be commended.] What I have to ſay upon this, cannot be better, nor more clearly and nobly expreſſed than in the words of a Divine, who was a follower of Des Cartes, and therefore I ſhall make uſe of no other commentary upon the text of this remark (58). 'It is ſaid that 'the reading of Gaſſendus's works, led ſome perſons 'at Naples, into the error of Epicurus, concerning 'the Mortality of the Soul. It muſt be confeſſed, 'that the inſtances of that Philoſopher, againſt the 'Metaphyſical Mediations of Des Cartes, may lead 'young people, not well confirmed in the Chriſtian 'faith, into that pernicious error, becauſe he has uſed 'all his ſkill to ſhew, that reaſon affords no ſolid ar'guments to prevent our believing, that there is no 'other diſtinction between the ſoul and the body, than 'between a thin and ſubtile body and a groſs one. 'On the contrary, I know that ſome pious perſons 'are of opinion, that what Des Cartes wrote upon 'that ſubject, ought to be looked upon as an effect 'of GOD's providence, who was willing to put a 'ſtop to the propenſity, which many people of theſe 'later times ſeem to have for irreligion, and a liber'tine way of thinking, by a method ſuited to their 'diſpoſition. They are a ſort of men, who will ad'mit nothing but what may be known by the light of 'reaſon; they are altogether unwilling to begin with 'faith; they look upon moſt of thoſe, who profeſs 'themſelves pious men, as weak-minded people; and 'it is impoſſible for them to have any ſenſe of reli'gion, becauſe they are poſſeſſed with this notion '(which in moſt of them is an effect of their corrupt 'morals) that whatever is ſaid of another life, is only 'a fiction, and that the ſoul dies with the body. It 'ſeems therefore, that the moſt effectual means to re'move the greateſt obſtacle to the ſalvation of thoſe 'men, and prevent the ſpreading of that contagion, 'was to diſturb their falſe tranquillity, and make 'them ſenſible of their miſtake, in thinking that it 'is a piece of weakneſs to believe the Immortality 'of the Soul. Now have we not reaſon to believe 'that GOD, who diſpoſes of his creatures as he thinks 'fit, and makes human means ſubſervient to his pro'vidence, deſigned to reclaim thoſe unbelievers, by 'forcing them to miſtruſt the certainty of their no'tions, when he raiſed a man ſo well qualified to 'work upon them, a man who had an extraordinary 'penetration to dive into the moſt abſtracted ſciences, 'who wholly applied himſelf to Philoſophy, who 'openly profeſſed himſelf free from all vulgar preju'dices, a quality which they are ſo very fond of, and 'by that very thing found out a way to convince the 'moſt incredulous, (if they will but open their eyes 'to ſee the light) that nothing can be more contrary 'to reaſon, than to aſſert that the ſoul periſhes with 'the body. But how did he make it appear? By 'laying down from clear principles, and ſuch as are 'only grounded on natural notions, which men of 'ſenſe cannot but acknowledge, that the ſoul and the 'body, that is, what thinks, and what is extended, 'are two ſubſtances wholly diſtinct, ſo that it is im'poſſible that extenſion ſhould be a mode of a think'ing ſubſtance, and thought a mode of an extended 'one. This being well proved, (as it is in Des Cartes's 'Meditations) no libertine, if he has any juſtneſs of 'thought, can remain convinced, that the ſoul dies 'with the body. For, &c (59).'

(58) Difficultez propoſées à Mr. Steyaërt, Part ix, pag. 81, & ſeq.

This long paſſage of Mr Arnauld ſhews what advantage may accrue to religion from the hypotheſis oppoſed by Pomponatius: it may be made uſe of againſt ſome libertines, who will ſee before they believe, and who deſpiſe the obſcure arguments alledged by Divines. Nothing can more effectually reclaim thoſe men, than to convince them of the Immortality of the Soul; it is an inlet to the right way, and this firſt ſtep may be attended with happy conſequences. Pomponatius could not work upon them in that manner, he would rather have confirmed them in their error, and conſequently his hypotheſis is more prejudicial than advantageous, in order to convert that ſort of men; and indeed he would be more praiſe-worthy, if, inſtead of giving himſelf ſo much trouble to examine the arguments of the Peripatetics, he had endeavoured to find out better proofs of the Immortality of the Soul, than thoſe which ſeemed weak to him. It is to be obſerved, that Mr Arnauld alledges this particular fact concerning Des Cartes and Gaſſendus, to ſhew the wrong judgment of the Inquiſitors of Rome. The Cenſors of Rome, ſays he (60), little minded the advantage of religion, when they put into their Index that book of Des Cartes, wherein he proves the Immortality of the Soul by Philoſophical arguments, more ſolidly than was ever done; and when they put into it none of Gaſſendus's works, not even that wherein he endeavoured, with all his might, to confute thoſe arguments: which is to deprive thoſe, who have no faith, of all human means to free themſelves from their pernicious prejudices againſt that important truth. Is not this to permit the ſwallowing of the poiſon, and hinder the taking of the antidote? This they have done again, by putting into the Index another place of Des Cartes concerning the ſame ſubject. For one of his followers, who forſook him as to his Metaphyſical notions, having maintained, in a placart, that, were it not for revelation, one might believe, that thinking is only a modification of matter; Des Cartes thought himſelf obliged to confute ſuch a dangerous doctrine, and ſhew the abſurity of it; and yet this book is prohibited in the Index under this title, Notæ in programma quoddam ſub finem Anni 1654, in Belgio editum; without condemning the placart at the ſame time. Once more, this is to permit the poiſoning of one's ſelf, and at the ſame time to forbid the uſe of a counterpoiſon.

(59) Mr Arnauld adds here a ſhort and good explication of what he intended to prove.

(60) Difficultez à Mr Steyaërt, ubi ſupra, pag. 85.

I have quoted in the remark [C] an author, whoſe cenſure upon Pomponatius wants ſome reſtriction. Theſe are his words. 'Whereby (61) Pomponatius 'carried things too far, and did not a little favour 'the opinions and inclinations of the libertines. Nay, 'one can hardly forbear calling him an inſolent man, 'for ſaying, that whoever goes about to prove the 'Immortality of the Soul by Philoſophical arguments, 'does not deſerve the name of a Chriſtian; for, on the 'contrary, there is nothing more proper to diſpoſe 'the Pagans to hearken to the Goſpel, than to prove 'before-hand, that reaſon teaches us the Immortality 'of the Soul, and that therefore men muſt endeavour 'to make themſelves happy after this life: whereas, 'nothing would more effectually prevent the conver'ſion of idolaters and libertines, than their believing 'that the ſoul is mortal, according to the light of 'reaſon (62). . . . (63). Theſe are the words (64) 'that have been cenſured; for it is ſo far from be'ing true, that whoever undertakes to prove the Im'mortality of the Soul by natural reaſons, does a 'thing unworthy of a Chriſtian; that, on the con'trary, nothing is more proper to confirm him in the 'truth of his religion, than the agreement of reaſon 'and revelation, tho' the doctrines revealed ought to 'keep the firſt rank. I was therefore in the right to 'ſay, that Pomponatius was guilty of great inſolence, 'in aſſerting that a man, who alledges any arguments 'beſides thoſe taken from revelation, to prove the im'mortality of the Soul, does a thing unworthy of a 'Chriſtian.'

(61) That is by what Pomponatius ſays, that nothing can be more injurious to faith, than to attempt to prove it by natural arguments.

(62) Le Noble, Tableaux des Philoſophes, Tom. ii, p. 84, 85.

(63) Ib. p. 86.

(64) That is, thoſe that are to be ſeen above in the remark [C] at the end of the quotation from Mr le Noble.

I will examine this cenſure. The words of Pomponatius, as they are in Mr le Noble's book, may be taken in this ſenſe, that a Chriſtian, who endeavours to ſhew that both reaſon and revelation teach the Immortality

EXAMINATION of the cenſure on Pomponatius, by Mr le Noble.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and encouraged; yet since they are only Philosophical arguments, every body ought to be allowed to dispute about them, and to say what he thinks of them. The answer he made to this objection, that the doctrine of the mortality of the soul would induce men to all manner of crimes [H], is remarkable. I do not know whether we ought to believe what some authors say, that this work was condemned to be burnt by the Venetians, and disowned by the author himself [I]. One cannot excuse the audaciousness mortality of the Soul, does a thing prejudicial to faith, and makes himself unworthy of the name he bears. But I think that those words, in Pomponatius's book, signify, that a Christian, who has recourse to any arguments besides God's authority, because faith, without the help of the light of nature, is not sufficient to remove his uncertainty, does an injury to revelation, and acts contrary to the principles of a true Christian. Such is my conjecture about the true sense of Pomponatius's words: having not his apologies by me, I cannot be positive about it, and must be contented with probability. What was the state of the question between him and his adversaries? It was, whether he deserved to be accounted an heretical and impious man, because he said, that the Philosophical reasons alledged for the Immortality of the Soul, are not solid proofs, and that this doctrine cannot be well proved but by revelation. The question was not therefore to know, what judgment ought to be made of those, who undertake to reclaim the libertines fond of Lucretius, and full of contempt for the word of God. The question was not to know, whether those who alledge Philosophical arguments against these pretended free-thinkers, and endeavour to reclaim them by that method, the only one that can work upon them, do an injury to faith, and make themselves unworthy of the name of a Christian. The question was about those Christians, who have recourse to the light of nature for their own use, and to supply their personal wants, a sort of wavering men, who know not whether they ought to prefer revelation to reason, or at least do not rely on God's authority, unless it be confirmed by Philosophical arguments. Whoever says, that such men are injurious to faith, and do not act like Christians, does not make a wrong judgment of them, and does not deserve the censure I examine in this place; for, properly speaking, those men are not yet Christians, they are determined to nothing, they offer to believe the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, provided he give them better proofs than those of the the Gospel. God's authority is not sufficient to them, they will have the promises of the Scripture to be confirmed by the light of reason, otherwise they give no credit to them, if the thing be as I fancy it is, all my readers will own that Pomponatius was censured without reason: but the censure passed upon him would be well grounded in the first sense abovementioned.

I do not deny that he might have been told, that he was not a fit man to convert those who believe the Mortality of the Soul, and look upon the Gospel as a meer human book, and that therefore his Philosophy was not so useful as that of his adversaries. Had he been sincere, he would have owned this, and acknowledged, that unless he imitated those Physicians, who, to persuade their patients to take a medicine, make them believe that there is more virtue than they know to be in it; he could not have maintained against impious men, that the mortality of the Soul is certainly contrary to the light of reason. Perhaps he would not have disapproved the charitable method of the Philosophers, who should imitate those Physicians; he would have been contented to say, that he was rather for a perfect sincerity; but after all, he might have told his adversaries, that as to the resurrection, and some other doctrines, they were obliged to deal with impious men, as he would have done as to the doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul.

[H] The doctrine of the Mortality of the Soul would induce men to all manner of crimes.] This is the last thing that Pomponatius objected to himself. His answer is (65), that since man does naturally desire to be happy, and hates misery, it is enough, in order to make an honest man of him, to shew him that the happiness of our lives consists in the practice of virtue, and misery in the practice of vice. He adds, that those who teach the Mortality of the Soul make way for the most perfect virtue, which is practised without hopes of reward, or fear of punishment. Quare perfectius asserentes animam mortalem melius videntur salvare rationem virtutis quàm asserentes ipsam immortalem, spes namque præmii, & pœnæ timor, videntur servilitatem quandam importare, quæ rationi virtutis contrariatur (66). He says also, that brutish people ought to be told that their Souls are immortal, and that it is likely some authors taught it without believing it, in order to curb the licentiousness of that sort of men. Existimandum est multos viros sensisse animam mortalem qui tamen scripserunt ipsam esse immortalem: sed hoc feciſſe ex pronitate virorum ad malum, qui parum, aut nihil habent de intellectu, bonaque animi noc cognescentes, nec amantes, tantùm corporalibus incumbunt: Quare hujusmodi ingeniis necesse est eos sanare, sicut & medicus ad ægrum, & nutrix ad puerum ratione carentem se habent (67). These observations do not remove the difficulty, and are but weak solutions. What follows is more reasonable, being grounded upon experience. He says, that many wicked and profligate men believe the Immortality of the Soul, and that many good men did not believe it (68). ‘ Neque universaliter viri impuri ponunt mortalitatem, neque universaliter temperati immortalitatem: Nam manifestè videmus multos pravos homines credere, verùm ex passionibus seduci, multos etiam viros sanctos & justos scimus mortalitatem animarum posuisse. Plato namque 1, de repub. dicit Simonidem Poëtam virum divinum & optimum fuisse, qui tamen eam mortalem asseverat: Homerus quoque ut Aristoteles 2, de anima refert, existimavit sensum ab intellectu non differre: quæ autem fuerit Homeri dignitas quis ignorat? Hippoc. quoque & Galen. viri doctissimi & optimi hujus perhibentur opinionis; Alexander Aphrodisæus, magnus Alfarabius, Abubacher, Avempace, ex nostratibus quoque Plinius Secundus, Seneca, innumerique alii hoc sentire; Seneca namque lib. 7. epistolarum ad Lucilium epist. 54, quæ incipit, Longum mihi comitatum dederat mala valetudo, manifestiusque in de consolatione ad Martiam affirmat, ipsam esse mortalem: multosque alios studiosos & viros doctissimos (69) connumerat ejusdem opinionis fuisse. - - - Neither are all the vitious perſuaded of the Mortality of the Soul, nor all the virtuous of it's Immortality. For we plainly see many ill men who believe in this, but are seduced by their passions, and we know that many good and just men have taken the Mortality of the Soul for granted. Plato, in the first book of his Republic says, that the Poet Simonides was a divine and excellent man, who nevertheless affirmed the soul to be mortal. Homer likewise, as Aristotle relates in his second book on the Soul, was of opinion, that Sensation and Underſtanding were the same thing, and who can be ignorant how great a man Homer was? It is also said that Hippocrates and Galen, two very learned and good men, were of this opinion. Alexander Aphrodiſæus, the great Alfarabius, Abubacher, Avempace, and among our countrymen Pliny the second, Seneca, and innumerable others, had the same way of thinking; for Seneca in the seventh book of his epistles, epist. 54, to Lucilius, which begins thus, Longum mihi comitatum dederat mala valetudo, and more clearly in his Conſolation to Martia, affirms that the soul is mortal, and reckons up many other learned and studious men who believed the same thing.’

[I] I do not know whether . . . this book was condemned to be burnt by the Venetians, and disowned by the author himself.] Theophilus Raynaud says so. ‘ Venetos illud opus addixisse ignibus, nec de immortalitate ‘ sed de mortalitate animæ fuisse inscribendum tradit ‘ Sylvester, lib. 5, de Strigimagis, cap. 5. expostulans ‘ quod à se approbatum eum librum dixisset Pomponatius, quod negat se unquam cogitasse (70). - - - - ‘ Sylvester, in his book de Strigimagis, relates, that the Venetians condemned that book to the flames, and that it should have been intituled, of the Mortality, and not of the Immortality of the Soul, and complains of

‘ Pomponatius

(65) Pomponat. ubi supra, cap. xiv, p. 120.

(66) Ib. p. 121.

(67) Ib. p. 120.

(68) Ib. p. 119.

(69) It is certain that Seneca plainly lays down the Mortality of the Soul in those two places; but I have not observed that he gives a list of those who were of that opinion.

(70) Theoph. Raynaudus, de malis & bonis Libris, num. 43, pag. m. 26.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

audaciouſneſs and prepoſſeſſion of a Lutheran civilian [K], who maintains, that this Philoſopher read public lectures againſt the immortality of the ſoul, and that he was an infamous Magician, who vented ſome impious things about the occult virtue of ſorcery and imagination. For the reſt, he was ſo bent upon reſolving difficulties, that he minded neither ſleep, nor eating, nor drinking, nor ſpitting; it made him almoſt mad, and ridiculous to every body. He himſelf informs us of theſe particulars [L].

Since the firſt edition of this article I have ſeen in the book quoted by Father Theophilus Raynaud (k), that Sylveſter Prierias affirms that Pomponatius's book was burnt at Venice (l). He adds that if it had been in his power, that pernicious book ſhould have met with the ſame treatment every where elſe. He had confuted the opinion of Pomponatius before it was printed, but as what he writ upon that ſubject had not then appeared, he inſerted it in the book quoted by Theophilus Raynaud, and publiſhed it in the year 1521. He obſerves that two Monks had written very ſolid anſwers to that treatiſe of Pomponatius. The name of the one is Bartholomew of Piſa, and of the other, Jerom Fornarius Bachalarius. This by way of ſupplement (m).

(k) See the beginning of the remark [I].

(l) Sylveſt. Prierias de Strigimagarum Dæmonumque mirandis, lib. i, (and not lib. v, as quoted by Theophilus Raynaud; the work is only divided into three books), cap. v, pag. 19, Edit. Rom. 1575, in 4to.

(m) To the remarks [B] and [C].

'Pomponatius for ſaying that he had given his approba-
'tion to it, which he ſays he never thought of.' He had been ſaying, that it was pretended that Pomponatius himſelf condemned his own book, but that the reaſons which moved him to it are variouſly reported, ſome aſcribing it to a deſire of ſecuring his reputation, others pretending that he did it to pleaſe his friends, and others, out of a principle of conſcience. Pomponatius, mutata mente, opus ſuum de eo argumento improbaſſe dicitur, variantibus ſententiis, an id amicorum precibus dederit, an famæ ſuæ ac nomini caverit, an ex animo audierit Eccleſiam, & palinodiam cecinerit, ut conſcientiæ faceret ſatis (71). He had been ſaying alſo, that all the books, wherein it is affirmed that the Immortality of the Soul cannot be proved by Philoſophical arguments, ought to be proſcribed (72), for he pretends they make way for an abſolute negation of that Immortality. This aſſertion of his is not ſo equitable, as his acknowledgment juſt before, that the Philoſophers, who were condemned by a biſhop of Paris in the year 1227, and by Leo X, in the council of Lateteran, were not ſo abſurd as to maintain, that the ſoul is immortal and mortal abſolutely ſpeaking; immortal according to Divinity, and mortal according to Philoſophy. He explains the true ſenſe of their doctrine: they abſolutely acknowledged the Immortality of the Soul on account of revelation, without which they had believed it to be mortal. Animam ergo abſolutè videntur agnoviſſe immortalem, quòd ita aperte ferant fidei ſcita; quamvis niſi de animæ rationalis perpetuatione docerentur, ſolaque naturali ratione conſulta, negaturi fuiſſent immortalitatem. This he acknowledges particularly in favour of Pomponatius, and quotes a book wherein this reſtriction was proved, viz. the book which cardinal Contarini, a diſciple of that Philoſopher, wrote againſt his maſter. Non abſolutè ac ſimpliciter, mortalem animam cenſuiſſe videtur (Pomponatius) ſed duntaxat ſi ratio nuda conſuleretur, ut liquet ex opere Contareni Cardinalis, de immortalitate, conſcripto adversùs Pomponatium, ipſius quondam Contareni in Philoſophicis Magiſtrum. Nec aliud cenſuerim voluiſſe illos ejuſdem ævi Philoſophaſtros, damnatos à Lateranenſi Concilio ſub Leone X, & alios longè antè à Stephano Pariſienſi Epiſcopo, anno 1277, vel potiùs 1227, in reſcripto quod extat tomo 5, Bibl. Margarini pag. 1319. æquè damnatos, quod aſſererent, animam rationalem, ſecundùm fidem eſſe immortalem; at ſecundùm Philoſophiam, eſſe mortalem (73). Boccalini, according to his uſual cuſtom, jeſts upon this diſtinction of Pomponatius. He ſuppoſes, 1. That this impious man being condemned to be burnt by Apollo, proteſted, that he believed the Mortality of the Soul only as a Philoſopher. 2. That Apollo, having regard to that proteſtation, ordered the executioner to burn him only as a Philoſopher (74).

(71) Ibid.

(72) Jure libri eo doctrinæ reprobæ fermento vitiati, ſuffixione digni ſunt habiti. Ibid.

(73) Ibid. num. 42, p. 25, 26.

(74) Boccalini, Ragguagli di Parnaſo, cent. I, cap. xc, pag. m. 306.

We have ſeen above (75) how this book was uſed, and that it was not burnt.

[K] The audaciouſneſs . . . . . of a Lutheran Civilian.] His name is Godelman: Theſe are his words. 'Petrus Pomponatius Mantuanus philoſophus & Epi-
'cureiſmi defenſor maguſque nefarius in Academiis
'Italiæ publicè contra animæ immortalitatem diſpu-
'tavit: ſcripſit de fato & de incantatione libros, in
'quibus de verborum magicorum, imaginum, chara-
'cterum, & imaginationis occulta poteſtate impiè ſa-
'tis diſputavit (76). - - - Petrus Pomponatius, a Man-
'tuan Philoſopher, an advocate for the doctrine of Epi-
'curus, and a wicked Magician, diſputed publickly a-
'gainſt the Immortality of the Soul in the univerſities of
'Italy: he compoſed books upon Fate and Enchantments,
'in which he reaſons with a good deal of impiety about
'the occult virtue of magical words, images, characters,
'and imagination.' In the firſt place, it is not true that Pomponatius did publickly diſpute againſt the Immortality of the Soul in the univerſities of Italy. Such a thing cannot be charged upon him but by virtue of the Sophiſm, à dicto ſecundum quid ad dictum ſimpliciter, that is, by underſtanding in a general ſenſe what is only meant in a particular one.' He maintained, that Ariſtotle's hypotheſis afforded no proof for the Immortality of the Soul, and he anſwered all the arguments of thoſe, who pretended to prove by the doctrine of that Philoſopher, that our ſouls are immortal; but he did not abſolutely and peremptorily maintain the Mortality of the Soul. It is plain therefore, that this Lutheran is neither exact nor equitable. 2. A good author will not ſay that Pomponatius, who was a notorious Magician, denied the Immortality of the Soul. Men are ſo fully perſuaded, that if there are Devils, the ſoul of man is immortal; and commonly ſuppoſe ſuch a connexion between thoſe two doctrines, that who ever is not willing to be accounted extravagant, will never charge any body with Epicureiſm and Magic, without making ſome reflexions upon ſuch a paradox. He muſt expect, that the readers will be ſurprized at it, and that ſuch a combination will puzzle and confound them. An author, who does not foreſee ſuch a thing, muſt needs be very ſtupid; and if he foreſees it without giving himſelf the trouble to clear that difficulty, he knows but little what he does. We may therefore conclude, that Godelman is very much to blame. In the third place, he confutes himſelf; for he complains of a tract of Pomponatius, wherein all the effects commonly aſcribed to Magic, or to a pact with the Devil, are aſcribed to other cauſes; and therefore in the ſame period he accuſes him of Magic, and of having writ a book againſt the exiſtence of Magic. An author, who writes in ſuch a manner, is inexcuſable, when he does not make ſuch an obſervation as this: Pomponatius was a cheat; he believed and practiſed Magic, but he wrote againſt it, for fear of being known to be a Magician.

(75) In the remark [C], citation (23).

(76) Godelmanus, lib. i, cap. viii, de Magis apud Joh. Chriſtian. Frommannum de Faſcinatione, lib. i, Part. ii, §. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 327.

[L] He himſelf informs us of theſe particulars.] Being not able to reconcile ſome maxims of Ariſtotle with free-will, he cries out, This is what vexes me, this is what keeps me from ſleeping, and makes me mad. Iſta ſunt quæ me premunt, quæ me anguſtiant, quæ me inſomnem & inſanum reddunt (77). He ſays, that like another Prometheus faſtened to mount Caucaſus, he is continually tormented with grief. Perpetuis curis & cogitationibus rodi, non ſitire, non fameſcere, non dormire, non comedere, non expuere, ab omnibus irrideri (78). He would be more excuſable, if the cauſe of his anguiſh was not ſo unreaſonable; but for a man to vex and torment himſelf, in order to reconcile another man with reaſon, is a thing that cannot be excuſed. If a Divine endeavours, though he ſhould loſe his health, and even his life by it, to reconcile the Scripture to truth, when they ſeem to diſagree, it is a commendable and heroical action; there being ſuch an agreement, one may reaſonably hope to find it out. But how can any body flatter himſelf with ſuch hopes, with reſpect to the opinions of a private man ſubject to error, and who drinks it as fiſhes drink water?

(77) Pomponat. de Fato, lib. iii, cap. viii.

(78) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PONCET (MAURICE) Doctor of Divinity in the univerſity of Paris (a), Profeſſed Benedictin in the abbey of St Pere at Melun, where he was born, and curate of St ASPAIS in the ſame town, and then of St Peter des Arſis at Paris (b), was one of the famous preachers of the XVIth century. He preached with the greateſt boldneſs againſt the diſorders of the court of Henry III. We have ſeen above (c) that he was carried to Melun for ſome invectives he made from the pulpit the twenty-ſixth of March 1583, againſt a new fraternity of Penitents inſtituted by that king. The Paſſage I have quoted out of Peter Matthieu, is to be found in the ſame terms in the journal of Henry III, with the anſwer mentioned in this article, which Poncet it ſaid to have made to the duke of Epernon [A]. Others ſay, he made it to the duke of Joyeuſe at another time (d) [B]; which ſeems to me more likely [C]. Poncet was afraid of being carried to the caſtle of Loches, as he had been threatened ſome time before (e); and therefore he was well pleaſed when he was only confined to St Pere's abbey at Melun. He did not continue long under ſuch a diſgrace; for he had leave to return to Paris, and to be there curate of St Peter des Arſis: but he preached ſtill with his uſual boldneſs, and perſiſted in that reſolution till his laſt breath (f). He died the twenty-third of November 1586 (g). He publiſhed ſomething [D], and it is very likely his way of preaching was ſomewhat comical [E], and like that which little Father Andrew was ſo fond of in the next century.

I add that Peter de Saint Romuald, a Bernardine Fryer, commends him very much for a thing which deſerves no praiſe, viz. for having diſapproved the tranſlating of the Bible into

(a) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franç. pag. 862.

(b) Roulliard, Antiquitez de Melun, p. 627.

(c) In the remark [O] of the article HENRY III.

(d) When the duke of Joyeuſe's wedding was celebrated in the year 1581.

(e) Roulliard, ubi ſupra.

(f) Ibid. pag. 628.

(g) Ibid.

[A] The anſwer . . . . which Poncet is ſaid to have made to the duke of Epernon.] Poncet having been arreſted, that duke went to ſee him, and told him ſmileing, 'Maſter, they ſay you make people to laugh at 'your ſermons; which is very wrong; for a preacher 'ought to edify his hearers, and not make them 'laugh. Poncet without any concern replied, Sir, I 'would have you know that I preach nothing but the 'word of GOD, and that no body comes to my ſer'mons to laugh, unleſs they be wicked or atheiſtical 'people: and truly, I never made ſo many to laugh 'as you have made to cry. A bold anſwer for a 'Monk to a lord of that quality, and it was found 'very much to the purpoſe (1).'

(1) Journal de Henry III, ad ann. 1583, pag. m. 67. See alſo Peter Matthieu, Hiſt. des derniers Troubles, p. 15.

[B] Others ſay that he made it to the duke of Joyeuſe at another time.] Here follows a paſſage, wherein le Laboureur mentions the ſame thing, and adds a reflexion to it as good as the repartee of our Benedictin. 'At that time (2) there were ſome bold 'Preachers, who did not except from the number of 'ſins the cruel or looſe maxims of the cabinet. Dr 'Poncet, among others, an eloquent and very zealous 'man, boldly comprehended kings and great men 'within the extent of his miſſion; and Brantome ſays, 'that one day he grew ſo hot about this political 'axiom, He who knows not how to diſſemble, knows not 'how to reign, that he made no ſcruple to aſſert, 'They were the words of a downright Atheiſt, and open'ed a direct way for kings and princes to go all to the 'Devil, and turn true tyrants. He was, adds Brantome, one of the boldeſt Preachers that ever got into a 'pulpit. One day the duke of Joyeuſe, when his wed'ding was celebrated with an extraordinary pomp and 'great charges, meeting him in the ſtreet, told him, 'Mr Poncet, I never knew you before, and am glad to 'meet you now; for I have often heard of you, and that 'you make people to laugh at your ſermons. Poncet an'ſwered him as coldly as the other ſpoke to him angrily. 'Sir, ſaid he, it is not improper for me to make them to 'laugh, ſince you make them to cry ſo much, by reaſon 'of the great charges of your noble wedding, which the 'people have been at. The duke was forced to go away, 'though he had a great mind to ſtrike him; but if he 'had touched him never ſo little, the people, who are 'fond of ſuch bold preachers, and were then gathering, 'would have done ſome ſcandalous thing to him and his 'retinue; for that Monk was very well beloved at Pa'ris. This was a deadly hit, whereby the duke of 'Joyeuſe learned, that an honeſt prieſt, who prefers 'the public intereſt to his own, is like an unruly 'horſe, whom the brightneſs of grandeur makes more 'furious, and who ought to be cautiouſly approached, 'for fear he ſhould kick. Every body laughed at 'this, and the duke's beſt friends, who pitied him, 'blamed him at the ſame time for having thus en'gaged a Monk in the ſtreets, he who had ſo many 'dignitaries at his diſpoſal, who would have taken it 'as an honour to be jeſted upon by him, and pro'miſed themſelves ſome advantage by it (3).'

(2) That is, under the reign of Henry III.

(3) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 58, 59.

[C] This ſeems to me more likely.] For it is agreed, that being taken up he was afraid of being ſent to Loches, as he had been threatened. Would a man, who was under ſuch an apprehenſion, as he himſelf confeſſed (4), have made ſuch a blunt and diſobliging anſwer to the favourite of his prince? It is a great deal more probable that he made it, when he enjoyed full liberty, and in the middle of a ſtreet, where he knew the inhabitants of Paris would have boldly repelled any inſult offered to him. We ought therefore to keep to Brantome's account, and at the ſame time obſerve, how carleſsly the memory of ſuch events is preſerved by Hiſtorians, and conſequently how they differ in their accounts of them.

(4) See the Antiquitez de Melun, p. 627.

[D] He publiſhed ſomething.] Three books concerning eccleſiaſtical Oration by way of contemplation, Paris 1568 in 8vo. A remonſtrance to the French nobility, concerning the happineſs which the king procures to his people, and how he ought to be inſtructed to govern them well, Paris 1572 in 8vo. A funeral Oration pronounced the 31ſt of Auguſt 1574, in the church of Brecy le Buiſſon, at the funeral of Meſſire Euſtace de Conſtans, viſcount d'Aulchy, Paris 1574 in 8vo. A diſcourſe concerning the advice given to Meſſire Peter de Gondy, biſhop of Paris, about the propoſal made by him to the Divines, concerning the tranſlation of the Bible into the vulgar tongue, Paris 1578 in 8vo. Meditations familieres ſur l'Hiſtoire de l'Incarnation, Rheims 1574 in 8vo (5).

(5) Taken from Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibliothe. Franç. p. 862.

[E] It is very likely that his way of preaching was ſomewhat comical.] I have three reaſons to think ſo: for firſt, The words he is ſaid to have ſpoke in his ſermon, that was the occaſion of his confinement (6), are far from being grave. That petit tendron, [young laſs] that was kept ready for the nocturnal collation of the penitents, is very comical. 2. It is agreed on all hands, that the favourite, who received ſuch a ſharp anſwer from Poncet, cenſured him for making his hearers laugh. Laſtly, James Roulliard, his countryman and panegyriſt, wards off the blow in ſuch a manner, as makes me think, that he deſigned to anſwer thoſe who found fault with Poncet for acting the part of a jeſter or buffoon in the pulpit. Beſides his learning and piety, known to every body, they are Roulliard's words (7), he had this particular talent, that he freely preached againſt the vices of his age, preferring the truth of the word of GOD before the threatenings of great men, and the daily danger of his life. It is ſaid he had ſuch an agreeable delivery, that what the injudicious laughed at, was looked upon by the wiſeſt as a great piece of art, that the ſharpneſs of his cenſures might go down the better, and that he might the longer keep up his miniſtry, which was ſo uſeful to the church: whereas, had it not been for that, the furious courtiers, or ſome ſilly people would have endeavoured to undo him. You ſee this author dares not deny, that Poncet's ſermons made people laugh. How then can one doubt that his ſermons were ſomewhat comical? Had he boldly, but gravely, cenſured the diſorders of the court, the pleaſure he would have afforded his hearers, though never ſo great, had never made any body laugh.

(6) See, above, citation (65) of the article HENRY III.

(7) Pag. 627, of the Antiquitez de Melun.

[F] Peter

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

into the vulgar tongue [F]. The book which he writ upon that subject is extremely trifling, if we follow the judgment of Mr Arnauld [G].

[F] Peter de S. Romuald commends him . . . . for having disapproved the translating of the Bible into the vulgar tongue.] This Bernardine, who extolls him for it, chiefly admires his reason grounded on the abuse that is possible to be made of the Scripture, of which he alledges two very surprizing instances. 'Maurice 'Poncet, says he (8), was admired in his days for his 'profound learning, extraordinary piety, and singular 'zeal in reproving vice, not only by his fervent way 'of preaching, but likewise by his writings against 'Libertines and Heretics, as may be particularly seen 'in the advice which he gave to the most illustrious 'Peter de Gondy bishop of Paris, touching the tran- 'slation of the Holy Bible into the vulgar tongue. He 'maintains that such a thing ought not to be allowed 'for several reasons, one of which is, that the Bible 'would be in danger of becoming a subject of wrang- 'ling and contempt, on account of the ambiguity, 'obscurity, and variety of phrases in every language, 'from which ignorant and sensual men might take 'occasion to ruin themselves, as it happened in the last 'age to a Painter in Prussia, who having bought a 'German Bible translated by Luther, and read what 'Lot did to his daughters, behaved in the same man- 'ner to his own. It was likewise the case with a wo- 'man in Munster, at the time when it was besieged 'by the bishop, who is sovereign lord of that city. 'She having read the History of Judith translated in- 'to her tongue, took it into her head to go and kill 'the bishop, in order that she might deliver those of 'her own sect who had got possession of the town, 'from the danger of being put to death. But she was 'apprehended, and learned, at the expence of her life, 'that the letter of the Holy Scripture killeth, and 'the spirit maketh alive.'

(8) Pierre de S. Romuald, Journal Chronolog. Novemb. 23, p. 575, 576.

[G] The book which he writ upon that subject is extremely trifling, if we follow the judgment of Mr Arnauld.] We have seen elsewhere (9) what judgment he passes upon a book of the like nature composed by Peter Lizet. He has no better opinion of our Maurice's piece; for in speaking of a collection which had this title, Collectio quorumdam gravium Authorum, qui ex professo, vel ex occasione sacræ Scripturæ, aut divinorum officiorum in vulgarem linguam translationes damnarunt (10), he says that, 'It is a trifling collection of 'the most impertinent authors that have writ upon 'the subject, mixed with some good ones. . . . . It 'is a book of President Lizet. . . . . It is a piece com- 'posed by a Dominican Inquisitor of Toulouse (11). '. . . . It is the remonstrance of Fryer Maurice Pon- 'cet . . . . the bare title whereof gives us sufficiently 'to know what we are to expect from it (12). A 'DISCOURSE UPON THE ADVICE given to 'the reverend Father in GOD Peter de Gondy bishop of 'Paris. By Fryar Maurice Poncet, Doctor of Divinity. 'One of the chief reasons, as we have already said, 'for his not allowing the Bible to be translated into 'French, is because the French is a barbarous lan- 'guage which cannot be reduced to any grammatical 'rules (13). . . . . Is it then possible that the arch- 'bishop of Paris who has done the French Academy 'the honour to be a member of it can justify the pub- 'lishing at this time such a ridiculous censure passed 'upon one of the finest languages in Europe (14).'

(9) In the remark [B] of the article LIZET.

(10) It was printed at the expence of the clergy in the year 1660.

(11) Arnauld, Défense des Versions, pag. 160, 161.

(12) Ibid. pag. 162.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Ibid.

PONTIUS (CONSTANTINE), burnt in effigy at Seville in 1559, was called Constantin de la Fuente, in Latin Constantinus Fontius. Some body took one letter for another, a P instead of an F, which is the reason why this doctor is much more known by the name of Constantine Pontius [A], which does not belong to him, than by his true name. However it be, he was a man of great merit, Doctor of Divinity, canon of Seville, and preacher to Charles V (a). He followed Philip II, into England; and doubtless it was in that country, that he relished the doctrine of the Protestants, for which he was apprehended by the Inquisition, and was destined to be burnt. He did not live till the Auto de fé, at which he was to be exposed to the public view. The Spanish Historians do commonly say that he killed himself; others will have it, that he died of sickness; but it is agreed on all hands, that the Inquisition produced an effigy, which represented him, and was burnt on the day of the Auto de fé (b). Several authors say, that he was confessor to Charles V, and that he attended him on his death-bed to the last breath; but I have shewed in another place (c), that he was only his preacher, and that he was imprisoned before the death of that emperor. He wrote some books [B], which the Spanish Inquisition put into their Index without any exception (d): he is mentioned in the Martyrology of the Protestants [C].

(a) Nicol. Antonio, Biblioth. Scriptor. Hispan. Tom. i, p. 196.

(b) See Nicol. Antonio, ibid.

(c) Remark [C] of the article CARRANZA; and remark [S], citation (1), of the article CHARLES V.

(d) Constantino de la Fuente Autor condenado: todas sus obras en qualquier lengua, y especialmente la Confession del Pecador. Ind. libr. prohib. p. m. 229.

Beza,

[A] By the name of Constantine Pontius.] Thuanus calls him so, and so does Father Paul (1), who was not reproved for it by Pallavicino, though he took notice of some of his mistakes concerning that Spaniard. See above the Remark [C] of the article CARRANZA, and the remark [S] of the article CHARLES V, citat. 1.)

(1) History of the Council of Trent, lib. v, p. m. 426, Edit. 1629, in 4to.

[B] He wrote some books.] A summary of the Christian Doctrine, printed in Spanish at Antwerp. Six sermons on the first Psalm of David, printed in the same language, and at the same place in 1556 (2). A large Catechism. The Confession of a Sinner. Some Commentaries on the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, and Job. Don Nicolas Antonio (3) seems to believe, that the sermons were not made on the first Psalm, but on the fiftieth, and that they are the same with the confession of a sinner; but he is mistaken: that confession is a prayer somewhat shorter than a sermon: it is in the Protestant Martyrology (4).

(2) Epit. Bibl. Gesner.

(3) Bibl. Script. Hisp. Tom. i, pag. 196.

(4) In the eighth book, fol. 507, verso, & seq.

[C] He is mentioned in the Martyrology of the Protestants.] We find there that Egidius, Constantine Fontius, and Varquias, were the first who discovered the darkness of Spain almost at the same time (5). They are called the three pillars of truth: they preached at Seville with great zeal and success. Egidius was nominated by Charles V to the bishopric of Tortona (6), but the inquisitors were so vexed at it, that, to prevent his being made a bishop, they severely persecuted him for a long time. During that persecution, Fontius was in the Low-countries preacher and confessor (7) to Charles V. 'Being returned to Seville, after the 'death of Egidius, he re-assumed his office with great 'courage; and the affection the people had for him 'was still the same. Notwithstanding the weakness 'of his body, he continued to discharge the duties 'of his office, keeping up himself with the usual re- 'medies GOD gives us to recover the health and 'strength of the body. He had several encounters 'with the Priests and Monks, and with Waldes arch- 'bishop of Seville, and president of the conclave of 'the Inquisition. And though his enemies were fu- 'riously exasperated against him, yet he so dexterously 'warded off all their blows, that they could not bring 'him to make an open confession of his faith, that 'they might have a better hold of him. But at 'length GOD prevailed upon him in the following 'manner to make a full declaration of his truth, put- 'ting a stop to all his subtilties and shifts, which he 'had made use of against his conscience (8).' The discovery was made by his books coming into the hands of the Inquisitors, notwithstanding the great care he had taken to conceal them. 'They found 'among other books, a large one written with his 'own hand, wherein he treated of the following 'doctrines,

(5) Histoire des Martyrs, book viii, fol. 505, verso, Edit. 1582, in fol.

(6) It should be Tortosa. See the article CHARLES V, remark [S], citation (2).

(7) The Spanish Historians deny that he was his confessor. See the remark [S], citation (1), of the article CHARLES V.

(8) Hist. des Martyrs, fol. 506, verso.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Beza, who calls him Conſtantine Pontius, and who ſays that he was for a long time confeſſor to Charles V, and that he was burnt at Seville (e), did not well remember the circumſtances he had read in that Martyrology. I have read a Latin diſcourſe concerning the life and death of that Spaniard (f), wherein he is called Conſtantinus Fontius. The publiſher of that diſcourſe ſays, that it was written by Reginaldus Gonſalvius Montanus Hiſpanus. I find in it that Fontius had been a looſe man in his youth [D]; but that he mended his life, and took a right courſe, though he was ſtill faulty in one thing, that was a kind of a blot; for being a man of a very lively wit, he gave himſelf too much liberty in his jeſts. Many of his witty ſayings went about. His ſharpeſt railleries were commonly levelled at the hypocrites and ſorry preachers of that time. He perfectly learned, without any maſter, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and whatever is neceſſary to make a good preacher. He was maſter of all the beauties of his mother-tongue, and preached ſo eloquently, that an incredible number of hearers flocked to his ſermons. People had much ado to find any convenient place three or four hours before he came into the pulpit (g). He was free from avarice and ambition, and refuſed a rich canonſhip that was offered him at Toledo: his refuſal was attended with a jeſt [E]. After the death of Dr Giles (b), being appointed to preach in the cathedral, he did it

(e) Beza, in Icon. fol. 90.

(f) It is in the book intituled, Hiſpanicæ inquiſitionis & carnificinæ ſecretiora, and publiſhed at Amberg in the year 1611, per Joachimum Urſinum, Anti-Jeſuitam.

(g) Concionabatur ut plurimum octavâ horâ, tantus erat populi concurſus, ut quartâ, ſæpe etiam tertiâ horis, octavæ horæ vix in templo inveniretur commodus ad audiendum locus. Hiſpaniæ Inquiſit. Secret. pag. 254.

(b) The ſame who is called Egidius in the remark [C].

'doctrines, as the Inquiſitors declared by their ſentence, 'which was publickly pronounced, viz. of the ſtate 'of the church; of the true church, and the church 'of the Pope, whom he called Antichriſt; of the ſa'crament of the Euchariſt, and the invention of the 'Maſs, wherewith he ſaid the world was bewitched, 'by reaſon of their ignorance of the Holy Scripture; 'of man's juſtification; of purgatory, which he cal'led a wolf's head, and a monkiſh invention to feed 'the belly; of the Pope's bulls and indulgences; of 'the merit of good works; of confeſſion, and ſeveral 'other points. That book being produced, the in'quiſitors aſked him whether it was his own hand'writing: he anſwered them without any tergiverſa'tion, that the whole book was written with his own 'hand, and maintained the truth of what was con'tained in it, ſaying, you need not take further pains 'to look for evidence againſt me, you have an ample 'declaration of my faith: deal with me as you ſhall 'think fit. He continued afterwards two years in 'priſon, where he fell ſick by reaſon of his bad diet, '(though he was little concerned for it) and of the 'grief he conceived for the diſperſion of the church, 'and alſo becauſe the ſun made his priſon as hot as a 'furnace; ſo that at laſt, a looſeneſs, attended with 'the gripes, occaſioned his death and removal to a 'happier ſtate. . . . . His enemies ſpread a report that 'he had made away with himſelf, by cutting one of 'his veins with a piece of broken glaſs, to avoid the 'ignominious puniſhment he was to undergo. The 'children ſung ſongs about, which had been made by 'the tools of the Inquiſition. On the day appointed 'for the triumph, his dead body was taken up, co'vered with ſtraw, like a phantom, and cloathed, and 'then it was ſet on a chair, holding up one hand, 'and laying the other upon the chair, as artificially 'as ſuch a thing could be contrived (9).'

(9) Ibid. fol. 507.

The Latin author quoted by me in the following remarks, does alſo acknowledge that Fontius eluded the proceedings of the Inquiſition, by his ſubtile anſwers; but that he at laſt gave over all his ſubterfuges, when they ſhewed him his manuſcript. 'Raptus ad Inqui'ſitoriam arcem, etſi ex controverſiis præcedentibus 'omnium adverſariorum animos habebat vehementer 'exulceratos, tamen acutiſſimis ſuis reſponſis omnes 'eorum cavillos facilè, more ſuo, eludens, ad apertam 'fidei confeſſionem, ex qua periculum, ut ipſi exopta'bant, crearetur, trahi non poterat: atque evaſiſſet 'tandem, ut ſæpè anteà, ipſorum manus, ni mirabili 'quodam Providentiæ ſuæ artificio rotundam confeſ'ſionem veritatis ſuæ, Deus ab invito & modis omni'bus tergiverſante extorſiſſet (10). . . . . Viſo hoc li'bro Conſtantinus interrogatus ab Inquiſitoribus, an 'propriam manum agnoſceret, quum per multos dies, 'conquiſitis undique ſubterfugiis, conatus illorum elu'ſiſſet, agnoſcens porro Dei voluntatem, quæ omnem 'tergiverſandi amplius occaſionem ſibi præciditſet, ag'noſco (inquit) manum meam, ac proinde fateor, me 'iſta omnia ſcripſiſſe, quæ & vera eſſe ingenuè profi'teor (11). - - - *Being carried to the Inquiſition, although 'his former diſputes had exaſperated the ſpirits of his 'enemies to the higheſt degree, nevertheleſs by his ſharp 'anſwers he eluded their cavils with eaſe, and could 'not be prevailed upon to make a free and open confeſſion 'of his faith, which might have afforded them their 'long-wiſhed for opportunity of deſtroying him. Nay he 'would have got ſafe out of their hands at laſt, as he 'had done oftentimes before, if GOD by a wonderful de'vice of providence had not, in ſpight of all his ſhifts 'and ſubterfuges, extorted from him a full confeſſion of 'the truth. . . . . At ſight of this book, Conſtantine be'ing aſked by the Inquiſitors whether he knew his own 'hand-writing, after he had baffled their attempts for 'many days by his numberleſs evaſions, and now perceiv'ing that the will of GOD had cut him off from all op'portunity of equivocating any longer, I acknowledge my 'hand, ſays he, and thereby confeſs that I did actually 'write all theſe things, which I ſincerely believe to be 'true.'

(10) Hiſpaniæ Inquiſitionis ſecretiora, pag. m. 262.

(11) Ib. p. 264.

[D] He had been a looſe man in his youth.] Here are the words of the Latin author: 'Juventutem qui'dem tranſegit pro ſtudioſorum juvenum libera edu'catione non admodum laudatam, ſed quæ, quo minùs, 'quod ætatis ſubſequutum eſt, quàm laudatiſſimum ex'titerit, haud impedimento fuerit. Probatos enim 'ſatis mores, ut erat ingenio mirè feſtivo, & in jocis 'peracuto, una ſubinde jocandi licentia vel in prove'ctiore ætate corrumpebat (12). - - - He paſſed his 'youth, conſidering the liberal education of ſtudents, not 'in a very commendable way: nevertheleſs this did not 'hinder the following part of his life from being ex'tremely praiſe-worthy. Only, as he was naturally of 'a very chearful temper, and had an admirable turn for 'raillery, he ſometimes hurt his character, even in his 'more advanced age, by his unſeaſonable jokes.' Perhaps, the faults of his youth had never been objected to him, had he not had extraordinary gifts, which expoſed him to envy; but having got a great reputation by his eloquence and learning, he could not avoid thoſe reproaches. His friends perſuaded him to diſpute for a canonſhip (13) in the metropolitan church of Seville; and his competitor bethought himſelf of raiſing perſonal objections againſt him, and carefully collected all the ſchool-boy's tricks that might make him aſhamed, and in general, whatever he had done amiſs in his youth, certain marriages, the irregularity of his ordination, &c. Competitor & eruditione & authoritate, & ipsâ demum gratia Capituli Conſtantino nullo modo comparandus, ad exceptiones perſonales conatus omnes convertens ſuſcitavit ei ineptias omnes juventutis ſuæ, contracta videlicet, antequam ſacris initiaretur, matrimonia, neque ritè ſacris initiatum, neque rectè atque ordine Magiſterii & doctoratus inſignia acceptiſſe (14). It were to be wiſhed, that young men, who hope to make themſelves eminent, would remember ſuch examples. It would be a reſtraint upon them; they would be afraid of being upbraided with the follies of their youth, in the midſt of their glory. Thoſe, who excuſe ſuch faults, will nevertheleſs ſay, that it were better to want no ſuch indulgence. It is always a ſubject of mortification, which an enemy improves to his advantage.

(12) Ib. p. 253.

(13) Canonicatum Concionalis ſeu (ut vocant) Magiſtralis. Ibid. pag. 259.

(14) Ib. p. 261.

[E] His refuſal was attended with a jeſt.] The chapter of Toledo ſent ſome deputies to him, to deſire him to fill up the place of preacher in the metropolitan church. Conſtantine anſwered, that he was very thankful for that honour, and would endeavour to ſhew his acknowledgment; but that he would do nothing that might diſturb the repoſe of his anceſtors. Cæterùm parentum avorumque ſuorum oſſa ante multos

annos

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

it before he had recovered his health; but he happened to be so weak in the middle of his sermon, that he was obliged to do a thing which had never been seen before [F]. The director of the House of Doctrine having founded there a lecture of Divinity; our Constantine was charged with it, and performed it very well (i) [G]. You will see in the remark [C] the catastrophe of his life, and in the last remark, a story he told Cardan, which concerns apparitions [H].

(i) Taken from Hispan. Inquis. Secretiora, pag. 251, & seq.

annos sepulta conquiescere, se vero nolle quicquam admittere, occasione cujus à sancta illa quiete interturbarentur (15). To understand this jest, the reader must know, that the chapter of Toledo had then a great quarrel with the archbishop Siliceus, a man of mean extraction, who had been raised to that great post by favour. ‘ Qui ex aratro & glebis, neque virtute, neque eruditione, sed (si ita dici licet) fortunæ potius temeritate ad summam totius Hispaniæ, secundum regem ipsum, dignitatem convolarat (16). - - - He had risen in a manner from the plough to the highest dignity in Spain, next to the king himself, neither by his virtue nor his learning, but (if one may say so) by the pure rashness of fortune.’ That prelate persecuted the chief canons, and disgraced them publickly, under pretence that they were descended from Jewish families (17). He caused inquiries to be made, that were ignominious to the memory of several persons, who had been buried a hundred years before, and by that means he disturbed the repose of the dead. Fontius's jest turned upon this. Ea occasione neque à centum annis sepultis parcebatur, inquirente malo archiepiscopo, & quidem sub pretextu religionis, in parentes, avos, atavos canonicorum, eosque ad originum rationes pessimè è suis sepulchris revocante. Eas non minus impias quàm stultas contentiones, ex sua ipsius vocatione occasione arrepta, Constantinus tempestivè admodum illo conciso Laconismo perstringebat (18). The reader will not be displeased to know by the by this passage of the History of Siliceus.

(15) Ibid. pag. 255.

(16) Ibid. pag. 256.

(17) Ibid.

(18) Ibid. pag. 256.

[F] He was obliged to do a thing which had never been seen before.] He had some wine and water brought to him once or twice, and drank in the pulpit to recover his spirits. The great esteem he was in, and the authority he had got, made every body excuse the novelty of this sight. Delatus in templum viribusque adeo exhaustus, ut in medio concionis filo uno atque altero limphati vini haustu vires ad pergendum in concione reficeret, novam neque unquam antèa visam licentiam summâ viri tum gratia, tum authoritate, qua polebat, excusante (19).

(19) Ibid. pag. 258.

[G] He had the charge of making lectures of Divinity, ... and performed it very well.] The lectures he made upon some books of the scripture were admirable, if one may believe my Latin author, I shall set down his words, that the reader may be more fully acquainted with the circumstances of the writings of that reformed Spaniard. ‘ Accepit primo Salomonis libros, ‘ Proverbia, Ecclesiasten, & Cantica canticorum, atque ‘ his mirabili eruditione explicatis, librum Jobi est ‘ aggressus, quem ultra medium interpretando perduxit. Extant ipsius in hos libros prælectiones omnes manu scriptæ opera Bab. diligentissimi cujusdam ‘ ex auditoribus exceptæ, quas cum vulgaverimus, deprehenso quanto intervallo post se relinquat eos omnes, qui hactenus in eos libros quippiam ediderunt, ‘ de summa viri eruditione certius judicari poterit (20). ‘ - - - He first took in hand the books of Solomon, the ‘ Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs, and having explained these with wonderful erudition, he next ‘ set about the book of Job, more than the one half of ‘ which he went through. His lectures upon those books ‘ are still extant, all written and picked up from among ‘ his hearers by a diligent hand. As soon as these shall ‘ be published, it will appear how far he has excelled ‘ every body that has writ any thing upon the same subjects before, and from thence we shall be more able to ‘ form a right judgment of his extraordinary learning.’ You see there was a design to publish that work, and it was actually printed. See the remark [B].

(20) Ibid.

[H] A story he told Cardan which concerns apparitions.] If what Cardan says be true, our Constantine spoke of apparitions, not upon a hear-say, but as an eye-witness. ‘ Vigebat olim in Hispania hæc ars, ‘ (Necromantia) publicéque docebatur in Salamantica ‘ Academia, nunc verò publicis legibus sublata est. ‘ Unde ibi aliqua adhuc artis experimenta supersunt. ‘ Narrabat mihi Don Constantinus Fontanus Hispanus ‘ theologus, & ab exomologesi Principis Philippi Hispaniarum, dum in Vagliadolit civitate Hispaniæ, in ‘ domo Typographi, quæ malè ob strepitus audiebat ‘ nocturnos, diversaretur, prima nocte incubum sensisse: sed cùm olivas nigras in cœna comedisset, naturale existimasse, cùm incubus inter morbos numeretur. Sequenti nocte super lecto videt auditque feles concertantes, quod quanquam durum videretur, ‘ quia tamen esse poterat, & hoc naturale esse duxit. ‘ Tertia autem nocte cùm nondum dormitum isset, de ‘ hisque dissereret, tubæ vocem quasi in aure audivit. ‘ Existimans sibili speciem esse, pueros videbat, qui ‘ ibi astabant ridentes: tum vox illa cubiculum circumire cœpit, perfectoque circuitu sub lecto se abdidit, ibi diu strepens, cùm nihil videretur (21). - - - This art (Necromancy) prevailed long ago in Spain, and was publickly taught in the university of Salamanca. Now indeed such a thing is forbid by the law; yet still there are some examples of it remaining in that country. Don Constantine Fontanus, a Spanish Divine, and confessor to Philip king of Spain, told me that while he lodged in the city of Valladolid at a Printer's house, which had the name of being haunted, he felt the night-mare the first time he lay in it: but as he had eaten black olives for supper, he fancied it to be a natural effect of that; especially since the night-mare is looked upon as a disease. The following night he saw cats fighting upon the bed, which however disagreeable it was, yet because such a thing might very well be, he thought there was nothing supernatural in it. But on the third night, before he went to sleep, and as he was ruminating on these things, he heard the sound of a trumpet, as it were, in his ear. While he imagined that this was only a kind of whistling noise, of a sudden he saw boys who stood laughing: then a voice went round the chamber, and having made an end of it's circuit, got under the bed at last, and continued there muttering a long time, when nothing was to be seen.’ What Cardan says of the Magic schools, which had been in Spain, was affirmed by a Magician mentioned by Thuanus. See the remark [K] of the article TIRESIAS.

(21) Card. de Subtilitate, lib. xix, pag. 691, Edit. Lugdun. 1580, in 8vo.

POPE (JOAN) possessed the papal chair, as it is said, between Leo IV, who died the seventeenth of July 855, and Benedictus III, who died the eighth of April 858. It does not appear that Anastasius, the Library-keeper, who lived in that age, has made mention of this She-Pope [A]. Many think that Marianus Scotus, who lived two

(1) Onuphr. in Addit. ad Plat. quoted by Coëffeteau, Response au Mystere d'Iniquité, p. 506.

[A] It does not appear that Anastasius, the Library-keeper . . . . has made mention of this She-Pope.] There are some manuscripts however of this Anastasius, which contain the whole story, but this alone proves nothing; for it cannot be denied but that transcribers have added i. foreign things to the works of an author. Pav. tures us, that in the old books of the lives of the P written by Damasus, by the Library-keeper, and by Panar. us of Pisa, there is not the least mention of this woman, only in the margin between Leo IV, and Benedictus III, this fable is inserted by a later author, in various characters, and altogether different from the rest (1). Blondel, who saw in the library of the king of France, a manuscript of Anastasius, in which is found the story of the She-Pope, plainly perceived that to be an additional piece. Having read it over and over, says he (2), I observed that the elogy of the pretended She-Pope was framed in the very words of Martinus Polonus (3), penitentiary of Innocent IV, and archbishop of Cosenza, an author later than Anastasius by four hundred years, and moreover, one that was very apt to spread all sorts of fables. For that none may imagine he has transcribed, either

(2) Blondel, Eclaircissement de la Question, Si une Femme a esté assise au Siege Papal de Rome, &c. pag. 6, 7.

(3) We shall examine this in the remark [K].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

two hundred years after, is the firſt that ſpoke of her. Some others maintain he ſaid nothing either from Anaſtaſius, or any other that lived ſince the year 900, what he has inſerted in his chronicle, the diſcourſe which we find now prepoſterouſly inſerted in that of Anaſtaſius, ſhews it, both by it's conformity to the idiom of Martinus Polonus, and by the things it ſuppoſes, without apprehending, that they ſerve to prove the impoſture. He gives ſome examples of theſe things, and afterwards brings a very ſolid reaſon; which is, that the ſtory of the She-Pope can by no means agree with the account of Anaſtaſius, touching the election of Benedictus III. 'In the elogies of Leo IV, and Benedictus III, as 'they are in the manuſcript of the king's library 'ſwelled with the romance of the She-Pope, are found 'the ſame words as in the edition of Mayence: 'whence it neceſſarily follows, that (according to 'the intention of Anaſtaſius, violated by the temerity 'of thoſe who have intermixed their own dreams) 'it is abſolutely impoſſible any could have poſſeſſed 'the Popedom between Leo IV, and Benedictus III; 'for he ſays, that after biſhop Leo was taken out of this 'world, (mox) preſently all the Clergy, the chief men 'and people of Rome, determined to chuſe Benedictus: 'that immediately (illico) they went to him, intreating 'him under the title of S. Calliſtus, and that after ha- 'ving placed him upon the pontifical throne, and ſigned 'the decree of his election, they ſent it to the moſt in- 'vincible emperors Lotharius and Lewis, whereof the 'former (by the confeſſion of all the authors of that 'time) died the twenty-ninth of Sept. 855, ſeventy 'four days after Pope Leo (4).' Certainly, if we found in a manuſcript, that the emperor Ferdinand II died in the year 1637, and that Ferdinand III immediately ſucceeded him, and that Charles VI ſucceeded Ferdinand II, and held the empire for the ſpace of two years, after which Ferdinand III was elected emperor, we ſhould ſay that the ſame author could never have writ all theſe things, and that the tranſcribers muſt neceſſarily have jumbled together without judgment what had been ſaid by different perſons. Muſt not a man be mad, or drunk, or delirious, if he ſhould relate that Innocent X being dead, was immediately ſucceeded by Alexander VII, that Innocent XI was preſently made Pope after Innocent X, and poſſeſſed the chair above two years, and that Alexander VII ſucceeded him? Anaſtaſius the Library-keeper would be guilty of the like extravagance, were he the author of all we find in the manuſcripts of his work, which mention the She-Pope. Therefore I ſay, what relates to this woman is ſpurious, and comes from another hand.

(4) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c, pag. 9, 10.

Sarravius, a zealous Proteſtant, and an able man, made the ſame judgment, after he had very carefully examined the manuſcript of the king's library. He concluded from the narrative he found there, touching the election of Benedictus III, which happened preſently upon the death of Leo IV, that the ſtory of the She-Pope had been tacked to it by one that miſuſed his time (5). He ſpoke after this manner in the letters he wrote to Salmaſius, and ſupported his opinion with ſeveral other reaſons. 'Venio ad Pa- 'piſſam. Quicquid de Papiſſâ confidentius dicas, in- 'tricat ſſimum eſt omne id negotium. Sederit illa, nec 'ne, longior eſt diſquiſitio, nec unius Epiſtolæ. Jam 'autem quæro tantum, num Anaſtaſii Bibliothecarii 'legitimus ſit fœtus Vita illa, quam apud te nuper 'tranſmiſi. Ut eum cenſeam ὑποζολιμαῖον, præter 'allatas jam rationes, hæ ſuadent (6). - - - - I come to 'the She-Pope. Whatever you may confidently affirm a- 'bout the She-Pope, it is all a very intricate affair. 'The queſtion, whether ſhe poſſeſſed the chair or not, 'would take up too much time, and cannot be diſcuſſed 'in one letter. At preſent I ſhall only inquire whether 'that life I lately tranſmitted to you, be the genuine off- 'ſpring of Anaſtaſius the Library-keeper. Beſides the rea- 'ſons already alledged, the following convince me that it 'is ſpurious.' One of theſe other reaſons ſeems to me demonſtrative. The account of the She-Pope does not appear in the manuſcript of Anaſtaſius as a fact, which the author warrants to be true; he uſes the expreſſion, it is affirmed, that, &c. it is ſaid, that, &c. Now, is it poſſible that a cotemporary author, living at Rome, ſhould ſpeak in that manner of the adventures of a Pope ſo extraordinary as theſe are? 'Si Anaſta 'ſius hanc Hiſtoriam conſcripſit, rem ſua ætate, ſe 'vivo & Romæ degente, geſtam literis mandavit. 'Atqui de re tamquam parum comperta, & ſibi tan- 'tùm ex famâ cognitâ loquitur hic Auctor cum ait, 'ut aſſeritur, ut dicitur. Qui ità loquitur, non curat 'ſuo teſtimonio fidem haberi, quaſi diceret, credat 'qui voluerit, fides ſit penes Auctores. An autem cre- 'dibile eſt virum doctum & ſagacem de adeo ſingulari 'ſui temporis eventu, non inquiſiviſſe diligenter, ut 'ad poſteros res notabilis, utque maximè in dubiâ fide 'cum ſuis omnibus circumſtanciis, dimanaret (7)? - - - 'If Anaſtaſius was the author of this ſtory, he has left 'upon record a matter that was tranſacted in his own 'age, in his own life-time, whilſt he reſided at Rome. 'But this author ſpeaks of a fact as doubtful, and 'known to him only by report, when he ſays, as it is af- firmed, as it is given out. He that ſpeaks ſo does not 'care that his own word ſhould be taken for it, as if 'he ſhould ſay, believe it who will, I leave it to the 'authors. But is it credible that a learned and inge- 'nious man would not diligently inquire into ſo ſingular 'an event of his own time, but ſhould hand down to 'poſterity a memorable tranſaction, extremely doubtful in 'all it's circumſtances?' I do not believe that any author now-a-days, not even in the extreme parts of the the north, is capable of uſing a they ſay, they affirm, in relating that Alexander VII ſucceeded Innocent X, and that Clement IX ſucceeded Alexander VII. Theſe are facts that cannot be rendered obſcure but through a long ſeries of years; but with regard to a cotemporary author, they have always a compleat certainty, and therefore he is never ſo ſilly as to report them upon a hear-ſay.

(5) Inde patet quod de ea (Joanna) ibi dictum eſt, aſſumentum eſſe hominis otio abuſi. Sarravii Epiſt. CXXXVIII, pag. 144, Edit. Ultraj. 1697.

(6) Idem, Epiſt. CXL, p. 145.

(7) Idem, pag. 146. See alſo Epiſt. CXLVI, pag. 151.

Theſe are reaſons ſo proper to convince us, that Anaſtaſius has ſaid nothing of the She-Pope, that in order to invalidate them, it is not ſufficient to alledge there are ſeveral manuſcripts like that of the French king's library (8): it would be abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew the ſtory in the original of Anaſtaſius; for then one would chuſe rather to believe upon the teſtimony of one's own eyes, that this author has made himſelf ridiculous in relating contradictory things, and in uſing fooliſhly a hear-ſay, than to reaſon, or diſpute. The difficulty is not removed, by objecting that this author is not exact, and that we meet with ſeveral variations and contrarieties in his accounts of things (9): certainly, no conſequence can be drawn from thence as to thoſe matters that paſſed under his own eyes. Thoſe who ſpeak of paſt ages conſult ſeveral books, and take from one, one thing, and from another, another. And therefore if they have not judgment, they put together facts that are inconſiſtent; but this does not happen with reſpect to events that are freſh and new, and ſo notorious as the inauguration of Popes. As to thoſe who pretend the particles mox and illico, preſently and immediately, have been foiſted by another hand into the text of Anaſtaſius (10), it may be anſwered, that with the like evaſion we may get rid of every evidence that makes againſt us, and all hiſtory would be reduced to a frightful Scepticiſm. One particular, and very ſtrong reaſon, why we cannot here admit the conjecture of thoſe men, is becauſe we have proofs founded on paſſages of ſome other cotemporary authors, by which it appears, that Benedictus III was the immediate ſucceſſor of Leo IV, and that the diſtance of time between the death of the one, and the inauguration of the other, was but ſmall (11). And therefore, in reaſon, we ought to ſuppoſe, that Anaſtaſius made uſe of the particles in queſtion.

(8) See Colonies, in his Mélanges Hiſtoriques, pag. 56.

(9) Mareſius, in Examine Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, pag. 31, 32, 155; and Cocle, in the treatiſe of the She-Pope, pag. 106, & ſeq.

(10) Ibid. pag. 156, 157.

(11) See Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. pag. 30, & ſeq. and Father Labbe, in Cenſoriæ cenſo, pag. 842, & ſeq. Tom. 1. de Script. Eccl.

Let us examine one thing which has made a great noiſe, and which I think is only founded upon the familiar diſcourſes of Salmaſius. 'Marc Velſerus, one 'of the chief magiſtrates of Augſburg, having ſent in 'the year 1601 to the Jeſuits of Mayence, the manu- 'ſcript of Anaſtaſius, to get it printed: they deſired 'Marquard Freher, counſellor to his electoral high- 'neſs at Heidelberg, to aſſiſt them in this affair; up- 'on their promiſe that they would honeſtly publiſh 'what ſhould be communicated to them, he ſent 'them two manuſcripts of Anaſtaſius, in which the 'life of the pretended She-Pope was. But theſe gen- 'tlemen being contented with having two copies of 'this ſort printed, they ſuppreſſed in the reſt of the 'edition, what had been imparted to them; ſo that 'it did not appear, and Freherus was forced, by a 'kind of Manifeſto printed, to complain of the trick 'they

An examination of what Salmaſius ſaid touching the ſecret of Anaſtaſius the Jeſuits of Mayence.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

nothing about her [B], or however but very little: for he is contented to obſerve under the

'they had ſerved him (12).' This is what Blondel had heard Salmaſius ſay in the year 1640 (13). I was extremely concerned, continues he (14), becauſe no body being able to ſhew either the writing of Freherus againſt the Jeſuits, nor the copies they had cauſed to be printed for him, nor, in fine, thoſe he had ſupplied them with from the library of Heidelberg, which undoubtedly have been buried in the ruins of the Palatinate, or tranſported by the Bavarians where they thought fit, we were left deprived of the means of learning what they contained. Rivetus (15), Sarravius (16), Mareſius (17), Spanhemius (18), and Boëclerus (19), had heard Salmaſius ſay the ſame thing; and they have not failed upon his teſtimony to charge publickly the Jeſuits of Mayence with having played there a knaviſh trick. It may paſs for indiſputable that Salmaſius ſaid ſo: but it is a queſtion whether his memory, as good as it was, did not deceive him. It would be much more civil and much more charitable to impute this defect to him, than to accuſe him of calumny as Father Labbe does (20). However it be, if the ſtory of Salmaſius were true, we ſhould have here one of the ſtrangeſt prodigies that ever happened among mankind. The Jeſuits would have committed a notorious fraud, in a point controverted between the Catholics and Proteſtants. Marquard Freherus, villainouſly made a dupe in this affair, would have complained of it to the public, and have had the moſt ready and the moſt inconteſtable means that a man can wiſh for, to load with ſhame an impoſtor that he abhors. He would have been able to ſhew to all the world the conformity of the manuſcripts to the two copies they had preſented him with, and the difference that would be found between theſe two copies and the reſt: and yet there would not have been one author that had made mention of this egregious and public fraud of the Jeſuits. Du Pleſſis Mornai, who held intelligence with all the Proteſtant world, and a particular correſpondence with the Palatinate, would have known nothing of this printed letter of Marquard Freherus, for he has ſaid nothing of it in the chapter of Pope Joan (21). Rivetus, the moſt curious man in the world in all ſorts of books of controverſy, would not have been better inſtructed than Du Pleſſis in refuting Coëffeteau, who had denied the ſtory of this She-Pope. Conrad Deckher, publiſhing a book in the Palatinate to maintain this ſtory, would have been unacquainted with the adventure of the edition of Anaſtaſius. One Urſinus, who ſtiled himſelf Anti-Jeſuit, and publiſhed in the ſame country ſeveral books very ſatirical againſt the Jeſuits, would have ſaid nothing of that adventure. David Pareus, profeſſor at Heidelberg, who was perpetually quarrelling with the Jeſuits; and particularly with ſome Fathers of the college of Mayence, would have ſpared them on that point, though the war between them was as fierce as if between Turks and Moors. Never were the diſputes between Proteſtants and Jeſuits ſo violent, and eſpecially in Germany, as during the firſt thirty years of the XVIIth century, and yet amongſt an infinite number of books of controverſy, and libels that appeared againſt the Jeſuits in that ſpace of time, there would not be found one that reproached them with the cheat of the edition of Anaſtaſius. Whence could ſo univerſal a gentleneſs proceed? Was there a law made at Heidelberg after the edition of Anaſtaſius in 1602, to the ruin of the library in 1622, not to ſhew any perſon the two copies that had been preſented by the Jeſuits, and to hinder the confronting of them? Did every body agree to throw into the fire the public complaint of Marquard Freherus, and even to loſe the memory of it? Whence comes it that Salmaſius, the only one that has not had the gift of oblivion, never ſpoke of this fraud in the works he publiſhed, being contented only to entertain his friends with it in converſation? The queſtions that might be made on this ſubject are numberleſs. Father Labbe has puſhed ſome of them in an unmerciful manner, and with thundering expreſſions againſt Mareſius (22). Theſe are queſtions which are very obvious, and yet it does not appear that any of thoſe learned men, who have publiſhed what Salmaſius had told them by word of mouth about the conſequences of this edition of Mayence, ever thought to propoſe to him any of theſe doubts. Spanhemius, who was not ignorant of Father Labbe's queſtions, has made no anſwer at all. I am ſurprized, and yet I am not ſurprized at it in different reſpects; but though I am a dwarf in compariſon of theſe giants, I think, if I had had the honour to hear Salmaſius ſay what he told them, I ſhould have intreated him to give me ſome reaſons for this prodigious ſilence of all the authors who have writ againſt the Jeſuits ſince the year 1602. See the margin (23).

If a gentleman aſſured me that in 1664 he heard Mr Arnauld ſay what I am going to relate, I would plainly anſwer him in this manner. I believe Mr Arnauld has told you this ſtory, ſince you atteſt it as an ear-witneſs; but I do not believe what he ſaid; it is one of thoſe indeterminate diſcourſes of converſation, in which things are miſerably confounded. We have a thouſand inſtances of this kind in the Scaligerana, and in the Menagiana. This is the narrative which I ſuppoſe on purpoſe to furniſh out a parallel.

Meſſieurs Du Puy ſent in the year 1644 (24) to the Jeſuits of Rome the manuſcript of a council, in which there was a deciſive paſſage for the efficacy of Grace. The Jeſuits had engaged their honour that they would not curtail the manuſcript, they cauſed two copies of it to be printed faithfully, and retrenched the deciſive paſſage in all the reſt. They ſent back the manuſcript to Meſſieurs Du Puy, and made them a preſent of the two copies that were not altered. Meſſieurs Du Puy finding out the trick complained of it by a printed letter. This is what I ſuppoſe Mr Arnauld told very ſeriouſly in the year 1664.

There is not a reaſonable man but ſhould have aſked him, how comes it that no body ever boaſted of having ſeen the letter of Meſſieurs Du Puy? How comes it they did not challenge the Jeſuits to ſend ſomebody to aſſiſt at an aſſembly, in which they might compare the manuſcript both with the two copies received in a preſent, and with the reſt of the edition? Why did they not draw up an act before a Public Notary, that they might have a moſt invincible proof of the fraud? Why did you, who have writ ſo much againſt the Jeſuits, never charge them with having falſified the manuſcript of a council? Why is there not found one author, ſince the diſputes about Janſeniſm, which have produced an infinite number of pieces againſt the ſociety, that complains of the retrenching of this paſſage? What head of Meduſa has ſo petrified the hand and memory of a world of Anti-Moliniſts, that none of them ſhould print any thing about it? Would they have agreed among themſelves to ſpare the Jeſuits the ſhame they deſerved? But why ſpare them upon that point, when nothing was forgot that could give an advantage againſt them? And, in fine, is it likely that people, who have at leaſt a great deſire not to be taken in the fact, ſhould ſo groſsly impoſe upon Meſſieurs Du Puy, that their cheat muſt inevitably be diſcovered to the utter confuſion of the whole body?

Theſe difficulties cannot be removed, and they ſtrike us ſo forcibly, that unleſs we ſuffer ourſelves to be blinded with ſtrange prejudice in favour of Mr Arnauld's ſincerity, and the faithfulneſs of his memory, we muſt always think his ſtory is nothing but a fable.

But ſuppoſe all that Salmaſius relates were true, it would not affect the main point of the queſtion; for what has been already obſerved with regard to the manuſcript of the king's library would have no leſs force againſt that of the Elector Palatine. It might be ſaid upon the ſame foundation, that the ſtory of the She-Pope has been tacked to the one and the other, and therefore it might be concluded that Anaſtaſius is not the author of it.

We ſhall ſee below (25), of what force the argument is, drawn from the ſilence of cotemporary authors.

[B] Many think that Marianus Scotus . . . is the firſt that ſpoke of her. Others maintain he ſaid nothing about her.] Let us quote Coëffeteau. 'Several learned men, who reckon Marianus Scotus a pretty 'good Hiſtorian, ſuſpect that the Lutherans have 'corrupted the copy which they made uſe of in print-'ing it: for it is certain this ſtory is not to be found 'in old copies. And Mireus, canon of Antwerp, a 'learned man, particularly well verſed in hiſtory, 'who not long ſince cauſed Sigebert to be printed, 'aſſures us, that he has an old manuſcript of Maria-

'nus,

(12) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. pag. 3, 4.

(13) It is Salmaſius that Blondel meant; as Colomies, Mélanges Hiſtoriques, pag. 55, 56, has obſerved.

(14) Blondel, ubi ſupra, p. 5.

(15) Rivet. Crit. Sacri, lib. iii, ch. xiv. See alſo Spanh. de Papa fœmina, pag. 292.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Mareſius, in Examine Queſtionis, pag. 178.

(18) Spanh. de Papa fœmina, pag. 292.

(19) Boëcler. in Commentar. de Rebus Seculi noni, apud Spanh. ibid.

(20) Philippus Labbe, in Cenotaphio everſo, pag. 929, & ſq.

(21) In his Myſtere d'Iniquité, printed in the year 1611.

(22) Labbe, in Cenotaphio everſo, pag. 929, & ſq.

(23) Daniel Francus, p. 145, de Indicibus Librorum expurgandorum, relates all the objections of Father Labbe, and the only anſwer he makes is to intreat thoſe that have the letter of Freherus to produce it.

(24) This time, and afterwards the year 1664, is ſuppoſed as the æra of the narrative of Mr Arnauld, that the parallel may agree the better, there having been twenty years between the edition of Anaſtaſius, and the ruin of the Palatine library.

(25) See the remark [G].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the year 853, that Joan, a woman, ſucceeded Pope Leo IV, during the ſpace of two years five months and four days (a). Sigebert, who died in the year 1113, was a little more particular in the affair; but ſome affirm the paſſage aſcribed to him is forged [C], and ground their aſſertion upon manuſcripts, in which it is not to be found. Martin Polonus, who nus, written on parchment, which the reverend abbot of Gembloux, called Ludovicus Sombechus, ſent him, in which this fable of the pretended She-Pope is not inſerted, either in the text or in the margin. The ſame is alſo atteſted by the perſon that publiſhed at Cologn, Krantzius (26). Even Serrarius ſays he ſaw at Francfort a manuſcript in the hands of Latomus who ſhewed it him, where this ſtory is related not abſolutely, as in that of Baſil, which the Calviniſt Heroldus printed, but according to common report, ut aſſeritur (27).' Obſerve, if you pleaſe, that the edition of Marianus procured by Herold was printed from this manuſcript of Latomus (28). Now by the confeſſion of the Jeſuit Serarius this manuſcript does not differ from the edition but with regard to the terms ut aſſeritur. It contains therefore all the reſt, and conſequently there are ſome manuſcripts of Marianus that mention the She-Pope, which the Lutherans cannot be ſaid to have added to them; ſince it is certain that the manuſcript of Latomus had never been falſified by the Lutherans. It was a prieſt that furniſhed it, and took it from the library of a church (29). But it will be objected, whence proceed theſe variations of the manuſcripts of Marianus? Why do we find Pope Joan in ſome of them and not in others? I anſwer, this diverſity may ariſe as well from addition as ſubſtraction, and to know certainly whether Marianus be the author of the clauſe touching the She-Pope, it would be neceſſary to ſee the original of his book; if it were found there, he muſt have put it, if it were not found there, it would be a forged piece in the manuſcripts that have it. But as we cannot ſee the original, it is impoſſible to determine any thing that way. Another queſtion may be aſked, is it more likely that tranſcribers have caſtrated than that they have added what relates to Pope Joan? It is difficult to anſwer any thing poſitively: for there are reaſons on both ſides. It is pretended, that probably ſome tranſcribers, finding the period of the She-Pope to be ſcandalous, would not inſert it: and that probably other tranſcribers, being ſtruck with the ſingularity of the fact, would not have it omitted in their Marianus, but put it in. Some readers write, in the margin of a hiſtory or calendar, a great many ſupplements. If a Bookſeller were to reprint this hiſtory by a copy of this kind, he would inſert in his new edition all theſe marginal notes, each in it's own place, and would not always be at the pains to diſtinguiſh them from the old text. There was ſtill more room for ſuch a practice before Printing was invented: books were dearer, and therefore people choſe rather to put in the margin the ſupplements that another book could furniſh them with, than to buy two books. Now theſe marginal additions ordinarily paſſed into the text, when a new copy was writ. I ſhall add here a remark of Florimond de Remond. 'Books . . . compoſed on diſtinct ſubjects without connexion, as chronologies are, are very liable to the gloſſes of thoſe into whoſe hands they fall. We commonly ſee in them a world of gaps, which are filled up by the firſt comer, and with ſuch materials as he can light on: and very frequently trimmed up with ſome falſe piece. Every one, according to the years, readily adds what in his opinion was left out by the author, who could not take notice of all that is ſcattered amongſt a great multitude of books that we have, and amidſt the confuſion of things that happened in paſt ages. Who is he amongſt us, that does not comment, and recomment upon the Chronology of the learned Pontac, and that of Genebrard, a great maſter of languages, becauſe they have both omitted, perhaps thro' inadvertency, ſome particulars, or elſe deſignedly paſſed them over. If afterwards theſe books, with marginal notes, fall into the hands of any Printer, he is ſure to make all paſs under the name of their firſt maſter, however innocent of the faults which the author of theſe gloſſes may have committed (30).'

(a) See Blondel, pag. 17, of Eclairciſſement de la Queſtion, Si une Femme a eſté aſſiſe au Siege Papal de Rome.

By this we may perceive, how it comes to paſs that the ſtory of the She-Pope is found at length in the manuſcripts of Anaſtaſius. I own that by the ſame reaſon it ought to be found as fully in the manuſcripts of Marianus, and not in two or three words only; but it is to be obſerved, that the practice I ſpeak of muſt have been more frequent with reſpect to manuſcripts deſigned for the libraries of academies and churches. Communities had not the ſame reaſon as a private perſon to be ſaving. Now, the manuſcripts of Marianus, deſigned for the uſe of a private perſon, might poſſibly be loſt, and thoſe of Anaſtaſius might paſs from the poſſeſſion of a private perſon to that of public libraries. I do not alledge this as a convincing proof, nor even as a conjecture that cannot be refuted; but what can one do better in matters ſo uncertain, and where one gropes in the dark? See the margin (31).

What I am going to ſay has not much of the problem in it. If Marianus did not ſpeak of a She-Pope, that which we find of it in the manuſcripts of this author, cannot be attributed to the Lutherans: for theſe manuſcripts are undoubtedly prior to Luther. This Reformer appeared at a time when Printing was common, and people no longer employed themſelves in copying manuſcripts, and after all, the connoiſſeurs can very well diſtinguiſh whether a copy was writ in the XVIth century, or a long time before. I ſay then, that if the chronicle of Marianus has been lengthened out a few lines, to infert the She-Pope in it, this has been done by the Roman Catholics.

This, you will ſay, is againſt all probability: they ought to have been incomparably more inclined to cancel the adventure of this woman, wherever they found it, than to inſert it where they found it not. They ſaw very well, it was ſcandalous to their church. I anſwer, that this objection, which ſeems ſomewhat plauſible, is nothing at bottom but a meer ſhadow; for if the ſtory of the She-Pope be a fable, it was forged in the breaſt of Popery, and they were Prieſts and Monks that firſt publiſhed it. It has been believed, and adopted by ſome authors extreamly devoted to the Papacy, ſuch as Antoninus, archbiſhop of Florence, one of the ſaints of the Romiſh communion. A vaſt number of writers have related it ſincerely and honeſtly, and without ſuſpecting it did any prejudice to the holy ſee; and even after the ſectaries of Bohemia had drawn from thence an argument (32), they continued to own it, and did not begin to combat it in good earneſt till the Proteſtants thought fit to make great advantage of it. There are many other things, which the zealots of Popery were concerned to ſuppreſs, and which they have not ſuppreſſed (33), tho' infinitely more ſcandalous and diſhonourable than that.

[C] Some maintain it is a piece forged by Sigebert. What I have juſt ſaid, about the manuſcripts of Marianus, may be applied to the manuſcripts of Sigebert, monk of Gemblours, who died in the year 1113. Here follows what we read in the chronicle of this Sigebert, printed at Paris in the year 1513. Pope John, an Engliſhman. The report is, that this John was a woman, and that only one of her familiar friends knew it, who uſed to lie with her, and that at laſt, even whilſt ſhe was Pope, ſhe became with child, and was delivered. This is the reaſon why ſome do not rank her among the Popes, and that therefore ſhe does not increaſe the number of the Popes of this name (34). There are ſome manuſcripts of Sigebert, which have nothing of this paſſage. Mireus aſſures us, that in four different copies, among which was the copy of the Abbey of Gembloux, whereof Sigebert was Monk, which is the original, or at leaſt was taken from the very manuſcript that Sigebert made uſe of to publiſh it, there is no mention made of Pope Joan, not even in the margin, tho' there is abundance of things added not long ſince: however, ſays he, it is certain this fable is falſly attributed to our Sigebert (35). Add to that theſe words of Florimond de Remond: 'The forgery which we ſay has been committed in Sigebert, is obvious to the eye by the comparing of an old author, called William of Nangiac, who has writ a chronicle to the year 1302, in which that of Sigebert is tranſcribed from one end to the other, without any thing miſſing. And yet the only ſtory of this

(26) He calls himſelf Gervinus Calenius, and takes the title of Legum Licentiatus. He publiſhed the Saxonia & Metropolis of Albert Krantz, at Cologn in 1574.

(27) Coëffeteau, Reſponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 506.

(28) It is certain that John Herold publiſhed Marianus at Baſil, in the year 1550, from the original that was ſent him from Francfort by Joannes Latomus, dean of St Bartholomew's church in the ſame town. Florim. de Remond, l'Anti-papeſſe, ch. ii, num. 4, fol. 366.

(29) See the foregoing quotation.

(30) Remond, L'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. v, num. 3, fol. 375, recto.

(31) I enlarge more on all theſe conjectures in the remark [B] of the article POLONUS.

(32) See in the remark [E] what Æneas Sylvius ſays in anſwer to the biſhop of the Taborites.

(33) See the remark [G].

(34) Sigebert. Gemblacenſis, in Chronico, ad ann. 854. His words are, Johannes Anglicus, fama eſt hanc Johannem fœminam fuiſſe & uni ſoli familiari cognitam qui eam compleus eſt, & gravi facta pepere Papa exiſtens. Quare eum inter Pontifices non numerant quidam, ideo omnium numerum non facit.

(35) Coëffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 507: le gazetier Mercure, in Edit. Sigeb. ad ann. 854.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google who died about the year 1207, that is 184 years after the death of Marianus (b), enlarges much more upon the ſtory. He aſſures us, ‘ that the Joan of Marianus was called the ‘ Engliſhman, that ſhe was of the nation of Mayence, that having been got with child, ‘ ſhe was delivered in the midſt of a proceſſion, between the Coloſſus and the church of S. ‘ Clement, and that in abhorrence of her crime, the proceſſion (taking another way) ‘ hath ceaſed to paſs along that ſtreet. Thierry de Niem who wrote . . . . . about ‘ 328 years after the death of Marianus . . . . . ., adds, out of his own head, that a ‘ ſtatue was erected in memory of this accident. William Breuin who wrote * of the ‘ VII principal churches of Rome, and Baptiſt Platina who died in the year 1481, 395 ‘ years after the death of Marianus, ... (to ſwell the doſe) have mentioned the ‘ cloſe-ſtool, upon which (as they ſay) the Pope muſt ſit in order to be ſearched. And ‘ above a hundred years after, others thought fit to contribute their quota, affirming ‘ that the pretended Joan was a witch, that ſhe crowned the emperour Lewis the ſecond &c: ‘ ſo that ſcarce 460 years have been ſufficient to give a compleat form to this bear, ‘ which the poor Marianus (I know not how) brought forth.’ Thus ſpeaks David Blondel, who though he was a miniſter, yet treats this ſtory of the She-Pope as a fable, and

(b) Blondel. Eclairciſſement, &c. pag. 17, 18.

* About the year 470.

‘ this female Pope is not there. Why ſhould he have ‘ omitted it, ſince the original, from whence he ſays ‘ he had taken it, could contradict him? This manu- ‘ ſcript is ſtill to be ſeen in the Abbey of Gemblours ‘ near Louvain, if it has eſcaped the fury of the men ‘ of this age. It was there where our Sigebert ‘ was monk. His book is kept there very curiouſly ‘ by the monks, to ſhew it as a rarity, when men of ‘ learning viſit their convent. It is writ with Sigebert's ‘ own hand, in which nothing is ſaid of this new ‘ Pontif. The learned Franciſcan-Father Protaſius ‘ ſwore to me he had ſeen it, and aſſured me there was ‘ not one word of this fable in it: Onuphrius, Ge- ‘ nebrard, and others, likewiſe atteſt the ſame. It is ‘ a thing eaſy to be verified, if any incredulous per- ‘ ſon will take the trouble. The ſame Onuphrius writes, ‘ that in antient copies, which are found of Sigebert ‘ in Italy, taken from the original of Gemblours, and ‘ which are ſeen among the old libraries, there is ‘ nothing ſaid of it neither (36).’ Alexander Cook (37), has writ ſome notes againſt this paſſage of Florimond de Remond; but they do not ſerve to prove that the manuſcript of Gemblours is not antient, &c. This juſtice ought reciprocally to be done by one author to another, that if the one affirms there is ſuch a manuſcript in a public library, the other do not deny it, unleſs he knows it to be falſe (38); for we are not to ſuppoſe that an author would be ſo imprudent as to tell a lie, when he is well aſſured that his lie will be fully and eaſily diſcovered (39). Might not ſome traveller be commiſſioned to deſire to have the manuſcript of Sigebert ſhewn him? Is that denied one? Do they not take pleaſure to ſatisfy all the curious about it? I do not ſee then why Cook ſhould have depiſed what Florimond de Remond alledges of Father Protaſius. I think too he trifles, when he obſerves (39*) that Bellarmin, in aſſuring us that Molanus ſaw the manuſcript of Gemblours does not tell us to whom Molanus ſaid ſo, nor in what book it is writ. So that, concludes he, to this day no juſt proof has been brought that there is one ſingle copy in which it is not found, much leſs that it has been added to copies, where this ſtory is found. Why did he not conſult the dialogues of one of his own country? There he might have read, that Molanus, as an eye-witneſs, had aſſured Alanus Copus that the manuſcript of Gemblours contained nothing about the She-Pope, and that if it was not the original of Sigebert, it was at leaſt a copy made from the original. This would have cauſed ſeveral of Cook's remarks to fall to the ground. Note, that it is affirmed, that ſeveral impertinencies of a fabulous writer have been foiſted into the chronicle of Sigebert. Read the following words of Alanus Copus: ‘ Antiquiora Sigeberti exemplaria nullam hu- ‘ juſmodi narrationem complectuntur: & ſatis præ- ‘ terea conſtat, illius hiſtoriæ multa aſcititia & plane ‘ vana ex, neſcio, cujus Galfridi Monumetenſis libro ‘ aſperſa (40). - - - - The antient copies of Sigebert con- ‘ tain no ſtory of this kind: and beſides, it is evident ‘ enough, that many very impertinent things are taken ‘ from the book of one Jeffry of Monmouth, and interſperſed ‘ in his Hiſtory.’ We muſt not forget that Mr Spanheim owns that the words of Sigebert, related above, according to the edition of Paris, 1513, are a parentheſis, which may be taken away without injuring the recitals and chronological calculations of the author: for he gives to Benedictus III, immediately after Leo, the ſame year, which the parentheſis aſſigns to Joan (41). Mr Spanheim likewiſe very ingenuouſly acknowledges that the parentheſis is not in the manuſcript of the Leyden library (42). It is a very old manuſcript, and of the year 1154, if we believe the title.

Blondel has taken no ſide in the diſpute about the manuſcripts of Sigebert; but he intimates very clearly that he thinks it probable this author ſaid nothing of the She-Pope. One of his reaſons is this (43): ‘ Vin- ‘ cent de Beauvais, and William de Nangis (44) ‘ (who have from year to year inſerted his words in ‘ their collections, and particularly with regard to ‘ what he wrote upon the year 854, touching Bene- ‘ dictus III, and Anaſtaſius his Anti-Pope; and upon ‘ the year 857, touching Nicolas the Firſt), do not ‘ tranſcribe the clauſe concerning the She-Pope.’ This reaſon is very ſtrong, to prove, at leaſt, that the tranſcribers made uſe of a copy, that ſaid nothing of Joan. I know it is anſwered, that they ſkip this place of the original, becauſe Sigebert himſelf tells us, that ſome do not rank her among the Popes, and there- fore ſhe does not augment the number of the Popes of this name (45). This remark is likewiſe made uſe of to refute the argument Blondel draws, from the ſilence of many famous Hiſtorians concerning the She-Pope. It is ſhewn that certain Popes have been eraſed out of the catalogue of the biſhops of Rome (46); and Bede is quoted, who informs us, that two Anglo-Saxon kings became ſo odious, that it was thought proper to let their memory periſh, and to unite immediately in hiſtory the reign which preceded, and the reign which followed theſe two apoſtate princes (47). Ita referente Beda in Hiſt. Anglo-Saxonum *, adeo fuit exoſa memoria Regum paris, Ofrichi & Earfridi, propter apoſtaſiam, ut cunctis placuerit, Regum tempora computantibus, ut ablata de medio Regum perſidorum memoria, idem annus ſequentis Regis regno aſſigna- retur: but theſe anſwers can never ſatisfy an unbyaſſed judgment for even the obſervation of Sigebert ought to have been a reaſon, why the authors that adopted his narratives ſhould have ſpoke of the She-Pope. They ought, after his example, to have related the adventures of this pretended Pontif, and afterwards added, that ſhe was not numbred amongſt the Popes, &c. But as they have not ſpoke in this manner, it is a ſign they did not find in Sigebert the paſſage in queſtion. I ſhall obſerve further, that had there been a decree, ordering that the name of the She-Pope ſhould be razed out of all public records, and that her ſtatues ſhould be deſtroyed, this would have been one of thoſe remarkable circumſtances, which Hiſtorians principally relate. There was ſuch a decree againſt the memory of Domitian, who notwithſtanding that has had a place in all the Hiſtories amongſt the emperors of Rome. This very order of the ſenate is one of the things, which Hiſtorians have moſt carefully obſerved. Mr Spanheim, who cites Procopius (48), might have cited Suetonius (49). What he quotes from the Hiſtorian Bede confirms this. And when all is done, it is certain that Annaliſts, in order to reach the true ſpirit of ſuch a decree, and to anſwer the real intent of the ſenate, who deſigned that the memory of a tyrant ſhould periſh, ought to mention this ſtigmatizing ſentence. It is by no means to be thought, that thoſe, who inflict ſuch a puniſhment upon an

(41) Spanh. de Papa fœmina, pag. 53.

(42) Ibid. pag. 52.

(43) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. pag. 69. He joins to theſe two in his Latin work, pag. m. 42, Albericus Monk of Trois fontaines, Sigeberti exſcriptor, qui de Joanna filet.

(44) Here it what Genebrard ſays on the year 858, pag. m. 539. Chronica Guliel. Nangiaci, in quibus cum totus Liber alioqui Sigeberti exſcriptus ſit, hoc unum deſideretur.

(45) Qui dicuntur Docto Anacritæ exſcripſiſſe Sigebertum, nec tamen Joannæ meminiſſe, ut Albericus, Vincentius Bellovacenſis, Gwillelmus Nangiacus, non ideo illam omiſerunt, quod de ea tacuiſſet Sigebertus, ſed quod ipſo Sigeberto judice, verbis modò relatis, nomini numerum non faceret.

(46) See Mr Spanheim, de Papa fœmina, pag. 38, &c.

(47) Ibid. pag. 40.

* Beda Hiſt. Anglo-Saxonum, lib. iii, ch. ii.

(48) Spanh. de Papa fœmina, pag. 40: he cites Procopius, cap. viii, Hiſtor. arcanæ.

(49) Sueton. in Domitiano, cap. ult.

(36) Flor. de Remond, L'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. v, num. 5, fol. 376.

(37) Cook, in treatiſe of the She-Pope, pag. 82, & ſeq.

(38) Compare what Mr Arnauld ſays in the third volume of the Morale Pratique, pag. 471, & ſeq.

(39) It is not pretended but that ſome authors are imprudent enough ſome times in that reſpect: but we muſt not eſtabliſh a rule upon that.

(39*) Cook, Treatiſe of the She-Pope, pag. 82.

(40) Alanus Copus, Dialogo I, cap. viii, pag. 37, Edit. Ant. 1573, in 4to.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(c) See the remark [I] of the article BLONDEL (DAVID).

and has writ books to refute it (c). This whole ſtory, ſays he (d), is an inlaid piece of work, embelliſhed with time. We ſhall give it afterwards according to the account of thoſe who have been at moſt pains to collect the circumſtances [D]. Undoubtedly, new an uſurper, deſire that none ſhould ſpeak of him either good or ill; this would be to favour him, and to have him ſheltered from ignominy. Now, this they could not have in view, without falling into a contradiction; and therefore they deſire that what they decree againſt his memory ſhould ſerve to make him deteſted in all future ages. Conſequently they wiſh that their ſentence be expreſsly mentioned in the annals of the country.

(d) Blondel, ubi ſupra, pag. 17.

Let it be added, that there is a very wide difference between razing one out of the number of Popes, and the making no mention of him. The Anti-Popes are not in the number: thoſe, who took the name of Clement, are not reckoned among the Clements: and yet Annaliſts do not ſuppreſs the actions, the intruſion, and the diſorders of theſe falſe Popes. Mareſius puts this queſtion, Was there not in France a Charles X, whom the league ſet up againſt Henry IV? and yet no Hiſtorian has put him in the number of the kings of France (50). Grand illuſion! For tho' Hiſtorians do not put him in the number of the kings, they, however, inform us what the league did for him. The queſtion here is not, whether the She-Pope ſat in the chair rightfully: the queſtion is only about the fact; did ſhe uſurp the papal chair after the death of Leo IV? Did ſhe poſſeſs it for the ſpace of two years? Did ſhe loſe it by her death, when ſhe was delivered in the ſtreets? An Hiſtorian, who conſiders her as a falſe Pope, may very well exclude her from the number of Popes that have had the name of John, and reckon Leo IV for the 102d (51), and Benedictus III for the 103d, but he muſt neceſſarily ſpeak of the interregnum of this female uſurper. The French Hiſtorians begin the reign of Charles VII at the death of Charles VI, and do not reckon as king of France Henry VI king of England; but they do not diſſemble, that after the death of Charles VI, this Henry VI was proclaimed king of France. However ſhameful ſuch facts may be, they are too public to be entirely ſuppreſſed in Hiſtory.

(50) Sam. Mareſius, in Examine Quæſtionis, pag. 45, 46.

(51) There are many variations about the number of this Pope. See Blondel, in Examine, pag. 27.

I conclude, it is arguing ſophiſtically à non cauſa pro cauſa, to ſuppoſe that the remark of Sigebert hindered his tranſcribers from copying his account of the She-Pope. Therefore, other anſwers than that of Samuel Mareſius muſt be ſought for.

(52) In the remark [B] of the article POLONUS (MARTIN).

We ſhall ſee elſewhere (52), that the ſame difficulties are raiſed on Martin Polonus as on Marianus and Sigebert.

[D] We ſhall give this ſtory according to the account of thoſe who have been at moſt pains to collect the circumſtances of it.] There are but few wanting in the relation I am going to give, and which I take from a work of John Creſpin. 'JOHN the eighth of 'this name, took the name of Engliſhman, on the 'account of a certain Engliſh Monk of the abbey of 'Fulda, whom he figularly loved: as to his office, he 'was Pope, but as to his ſex, a woman. This maid, 'by nation a German, born at Mayence, and firſt 'named Gilberta, pretending to be of the male-ſex, 'and having taken the habit of a man, went to 'Athens with the monk her galant. At which place, 'after having exceedingly improved in all ſorts of 'ſciences, ſhe returned after his death to Rome: 'but ſtill diſſembling that ſhe was a woman. Now, 'ſince ſhe was extreamly witty, and had a graceful 'and ready way of talking at diſputations and public 'leſſons, ſo that many were vaſtly ſurprized at her 'learning; every one became ſo well affected to her, 'and ſhe gained the friendſhip of all in ſuch a manner, that after the death of Leo, ſhe was choſen 'Pope. Into which office after ſhe was introduced, 'ſhe conferred holy orders (as they call them) after 'the manner of other Popes: ſhe made prieſts and 'deacons, ordained biſhops and abbots, ſung maſſes, 'conſecrated churches and altars, adminiſtred the 'ſacraments, preſented her feet to be kiſſed, and did 'all the other things that Popes uſe to do: and her 'acts were not at that time reckoned invalid.

'During the time this woman was Pope, the emperor Lotharius, now grown old, went into a monaſtery; and Lewis the ſecond of that name coming 'to Rome, took the ſcepter and crown of the empire 'at her hands, with the benediction of St Peter.... 'Now, whilſt ſhe was in this office of Pope, ſhe was 'got with child by one of her own chaplains, a 'cardinal, who knew very well what ſex ſhe was of. 'And as ſhe was going in ſome ſolemn proceſſion to 'the church of Latran, ſhe was delivered of this 'child, thus conceived in fornication, between the 'Coloſſus and the church of St Clement, in the midſt 'of the city of Rome, in the great ſquare, even in a 'public ſtreet, in the preſence of all the people of 'of Rome: and died upon the ſpot in bringing forth 'her child, in the year of our Lord 857. Upon 'the account of this crime, and becauſe ſhe was delivered in public, ſhe was deprived of all the honour that had been uſually done to Popes, and was 'buried without any Papal pomp..... Now, that 'the Popes and anointed Fathers may ſeem to have 'ſuch a treſpaſs in abhorrence, they turn aſide from 'that place, as if they looked upon it to be ominous. '.... But that the good Fathers might not again 'fall into the like misfortune, they ordered that a 'Deacon ſhould feel the privy-parts of the perſon who 'ſhould be choſen Pope, through a cloſe-ſtool, in 'order to know whether he be a male or not. But 'now-a-days, whilſt they are Cardinals, and before 'they are choſen Popes, they get ſo many baſtards, 'that no body can doubt of their being males, and 'there is no further occaſion for ſo holy a ceremony (53).'

(53) Creſpin, l'Etat de l'Egliſe, pag. m. 243, & ſeq.

Theſe laſt words allude to thoſe Latin verſes of Johannes Pannonius, which Mr du Pleſſis has related in his Hiſtory of the Papacy (54):

(54) Pag. m. 164.

Non poterat quiſquam reſerantes æthera claves
Non exploratis ſumere teſticulis.
Cur igitur noſtro mos hic nunc tempore ceſſat?
Ante probat quod ſe quilibet eſſe marem.

That is,

The keys of Heav'n no man cou'd take,
Unleſs his ſecret parts were felt.
Why is this cuſtom now left off?
Each proves himſelf a male before.

Florimond de Remond, makes uſe of this paſſage to convict thoſe of a lie, who ſaid this cuſtom ſtill continued. Our adverſaries, ſays he (55), ... tell us, that to prevent the Papacy from falling hereafter to females, they ſtill feel, to this day, the privy-parts of the Popes, who are elected, crying out, when they touch them, with great joy, He is worthy to be made Pope. The centuriators, relating theſe ſhameful things, ſay, that with great rejoycing, they cry, He has them, he has them. To this purpoſe Pannonius made theſe verſes, which, tho' they ought to be ſuppreſſed, I was willing to put here, tranſlated into our own tongue, ſince they make an advantage of them: that one may ſee by theſe ſame authors their contradictions and calumnies. .... The verſes of Pannonius ſhew, that this method was not practiſed in his time. The authors of the Centuries and Bale dare not ſay the contrary, and immediately add a fine reaſon worthy of this profeſſion. This cuſtom, ſay they, of ſearching them, is annihilated and aboliſhed, becauſe it is no longer neceſſary, ſince their concubines and whores give ſufficient teſtimony of their exiſtence (56).

(55) Florimond de Remond, l'Antipapeſſe, lib. xvii, num. 1, fol. 410, verſo.

(56) Ibid. fol. 411.

He obſerves that John Creſpin has copied word for word the expreſſions of John Bale (57). But however we do not find in the account of Creſpin, as in that of the other, this particular, it is ſaid, that this learned and ſubtile woman wrote a book of Magic (58). Florimond has likewiſe the following paſſage from the Chronicle of James Curio. Benedictus the third, being choſen after this whore, ſucceeded to this wicked chair, after his ſecret parts had been felt: that people might not be deceived in him, as they had been in Joan a little before (59). He gives alſo the account of Boccace, and does not forget to take notice that it does not agree with that of other authors. 'Boccace.... in 'the book of illuſtrious women, has this monſter re'preſented as bringing forth a child at a general pro'ceſſion in the arms of her cardinals, with theſe verſes 'engraven (57) Ibid. num. 11, num. 5, fol. 370, verſo. Edit. 1599. in 4to.

(58) Ibid. n. 5.

(59) Ibid. n. 5.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

new pieces would have been interwoven from time to time, if the Roman Catholics had not at last thought proper to combat it. This put an end to embellishing. A vast number of writers, who were otherwise attached to the Papacy, have believed this story. Æneas Silvius, who was Pope under the name of Pius II, in the XVth century, was the first that called it in question: he even passed over it very slightly and as it were with fear; but Aventinus resolutely denied it [E]. Since that time, Onufrius Panvinius (e), Bellarmin (f), Serarius (g), George Scherer (h), Robert Parsons (i), Florimond

(e) In Notis ad Platinam.

(f) De Romano Pontif. lib. iii, cap. xxiv.

(g) Rerum Mogunt. lib. i.

(h) In a treatise purposely written on that subject.

(i) In Libro de tribus Convertionib. Angliæ, Part ii, cap. [illegible]

'engraven in the front of her picture, which translated 'from the Latin, run thus;

Joan was in tricks, and holy Scriptures vers'd,
And by great craft, was made in name a Pope:
But bringing forth a child amongst her Priests,
She shew'd she was a woman sly in fact.

But he should have said quite the reverse.

She shew'd she wan't a woman sly in fact.

'drawing out this fine story at full length, he says, 'She was a German, having studied in England with 'a young scholar, her favourite, after whose death, not 'designing to give herself up to another, she went to 'Rome, where she became famous, both for her learning 'and her good life, so that after the death of Leo V, she 'was made Pope. But GOD, says he, taking pity on 'his people, would not suffer them to be thus shamefully 'imposed upon by a woman. So that the evil spirit, which 'had given her the boldness to attempt such a wickedness, 'incited her, whilst she was in this high rank, to com-'mit whoredom. She soon found an opportunity, inso-'much, that afterwards she proved with child. O mon-'strous iniquity! O wonderful patience and goodness of 'GOD! But she, who had bewitched the eyes of all 'the world, lost her senses, and could not conceal her 'delivery. For not having time to call a midwife, she 'brought forth whilst she was celebrating divine service. 'And because she had thus deceived the world, the mi-'serable wretch, dissolved in tears, was sent to a dungeon 'by order of the Fathers, This Florentine, you see, 'does not agree with the rest, either in her educa-'tion, succession, or death (60).' Remond has not forgot the new circumstance, with which a Monk has embellished the story. Being shut up in a cloister he has represented in his poems, the She-Pope, with more shame and infamy, than was ever done by any body: it is Baptist Mantuan (61) who thus writes:

Upon a gibbet I saw this sly jade hang,
Who, dress'd like man, and feigning holy zeal,
Was to the papal chair by cunning rais'd:
Now, on the head of this audacious whore
The triple crown was plac'd, and by her side
Hung her galant, who did her crime detest.

He adds, for the embellishment of the story, the hanging the Pope's master of horse (62), which none besides himself had ever spoke of (63). Here is a passage of Mr du Plessis Mornai (64): 'Another Martin (65) of the 'order of Friar Minors, in his chronicle intituled, 'Flores Temporum, adds that this Joan conjuring a 'demoniac, and asking the Devil when he would de-'part out of him, he answered her in verse:

Papa pater patrum, Papissæ pandito partum
Et tibi nunc eadem de corpore quando recedam *.

Tell, when a female Pope shall have a child,
And I will tell thee when I shall depart.

'It was about the year 1370.' Coëffeteau assures us, that a minister named Angelocrator, said it was at a procession she brought forth a child, and that the Devil pronounced these fine verses in the air (66). Let us observe that in 1615, Rivetus owned he had not as yet heard of Angelocrator (67): nevertheless he was one that had published in 1601 a piece on Chronology with great pomp, and in 1618 was deputed to the synod of Dort (68).

Here is a new circumstance, which seems to have been invented for an answer to those who object, that a woman so cunning as she was would have found out some means to conceal her fault, 'GOD designing 'that so abominable a wickedness should not remain 'unpunished, sent an angel to this Pontif, who 'told her, her sin should be forgiven her, provided 'she was delivered in the open street, without help, 'and without calling any woman to aid or assist her 'in such a necessity. That this should serve instead 'of penance; and this amende honorable for a pu-'nishment. Which she did in obedience to the com-'mandment of GOD. This author had learned the 'story of some good old woman of Rome: for those, 'who have been at the pains to inform themselves 'about it, assured me it was still the talk of many, 'that this angel gave her the choice either to bring 'forth privately and without shame, and to go to 'hell: or publickly, and to go to paradise (69).' Florimond de Remond tells this as a story which a German, whom he does not name, spread abroad; and then adds, very conscientious truly by his account, to be delivered at a procession without having however confessed her sin, or declared her imposition upon the church. It is not so, says Scheremberg, she was delivered in the hall, upon her chair. . . . . I do not know how Serres (70) came to imagine, that a house was then built in which this strange accident happened, and which, says he, some time after was destroyed, but that nevertheless the chair is still in being. . . . . There are others who have inriched the story, to render this delivery so much the more remarkable. They assert that the last act of this unfortunate woman was not only represented in the public street, at a procession, but at the solemn procession, which we make at the feast of the holy sacrament, called Corpus Christi day. Gio. Saxon, a German, has taken a great deal of liberty upon that head. In many places of Germany, and in the ecclesiastical books and histories of Geneva, we see pictures, wherein this woman is represented under a canopy, carrying the holy sacrament, with a new born infant coming out from between her legs. . . . Imprudent as they are, they have not considered, that in the time of the female Pope, which they describe to us, the feast of the holy sacrament was not instituted, nor a long time after (71).

[E] Æneas Silvius . . . . . was the first that called it in question . . . . . Aventinus resolutely denied it.] This Silvius 'observed the 20th of August 1451 † to Juan 'de Carvajal cardinal of S. Angelo, as a conclusion 'of his reply to Nicolas bishop of the Taborites, 'that in placing thus this woman there had been nei-'ther error of faith nor of right, but ignorance of fact: 'and besides, the story was not ‡ certain (72).' Marefius observes that this author expresses himself very faintly, and that in other works he seemed to think the affair of this She-Pope was true. 'Eo quidem re-'currit, ut dicat historiam non esse certam, sed tam 'timidè, ut satis appareat eum non loqui ex animi 'sententia. Ut si quid hîc putarit incerti, magis 'forte ad circumstantias & nomen proprium hujus 'mulieris spectet, quam ad rei ipsius subsistantiam (73). '. . . . Quin ipse Doctiss. Anacrita (74) pag. 10. Pi-'um II, id est, hunc Æneam Sylvium, accenset iis 'Pontificibus qui Joannæ Pontificatum videntur ag-'novisse, eo quod Joannæ nomen cæteris Pontificum no-'minibus permixtum in Dominico Senensi, scriptæ ad Jo-'annem Carvajal epistolæ immemor vel pœnitens prostare 'passus est. Et quod amplius est ipse Æneas Sylvius 'Pontifex tandem factus hanc Historiam exscripsit in '6. mundi ætate, pag. 170. operis Historici impressi 'Norimbergæ anno 1493. per Kobergerum, inquit 'Johannes Gerhardi Augustanæ Confessionis Theolo-'gorum Doctissimus, Loco de Eccl. edit. in 4to. p. 1004 '(75). - - - Indeed he goes so far as to say the story is 'not certain, but so timerously, that it is evident enough 'he does not speak his real sentiments And therefore 'if he thought there was any uncertainty in this matter, 'it rather regarded perhaps the circumstances and the 'proper name of this woman, than the thing itself. . . . 'But even the learned examiner himself reckons Pius II, 'that is, this Æneas Sylvius among those Popes, who 'seem

(60) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papesse, ch. iii, num. 1, fol. 368, verso.

(61) Lib. iii.

(62) Alexander Cook, refuting this book of Florimond de Remond, recites pag. m. 31, these three verses of Mantuan; Hic pendebat adhuc Sexum mentita virilem Fœmina, cui triplici Phrygiam diademate mitram Extollebat apex, & Pontificalis adulter. Tom. iii, lib. iii, Alphons. fol. 44, Edit. Francf. 1573. He adds, pag. 32, that Mantuan says nothing of a groom of the stables, but of one in general, who had committed whoredom with her, nor even of any hanging unless in Hell, which is probable enough.

(63) Florimond de Remond, Anti-Papesse, ch. xxii, num. 4, fol. 426, verso.

(64) Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 162.

(65) He had just spoke of Martin Polonus.

* Chronic. Martini Minoritæ ultimæ Impress. An. 1486.

(66) Coëffeteau, Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 108: he cites the eighth book of the Chronicle of Angelocrator, in Joan. VIII. Papiss.

(67) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, Part i, p. 594.

(68) See Vossius, de Scient. Math. pag. 402.

(69) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papesse, ch. xxiii, num. 3, fol. 429.

(70) He is the author of the Inventaire de l'Histoire de France.

(71) Florimond de Remond, ubi supra.

† Epist. cxxx.

‡ Neque certa historia est.

(72) Blondel, Eclaircissement sur la Papesse, pag. 11.

(73) Samuel Marefius. Examen Quæst. de Papa fœmina, pag. 8.

(74) That is to say, David Blondel.

(75) Marefius, Exam. Quæst.

(k) See the list that Father Labbe gives in the first Tome, de Script. Eccles. pag. 837, & seq.

mond de Remond, Allatius, Launoius, Father Labbe, and several others (k) have fully confuted this old tradition. Cardinal Baronius expressed a great esteem for the work of Florimond de Remond; but he was in the wrong to affirm that the Heretics were so confounded by it that they were ashamed of having spoke of this fable [F]. This is so false that even now a days, Protestants write books to maintain the story of the She-Pope. I believe that some traditions, which are advantageous to the Popes, and supported by as strong reasons as those are which support this story, would seem worthy the utmost contempt to those who dispute most ardently for it. So certain is it, that the same (76) In the 4th book of the Annals of Bavaria.

‡ Joh. Aventin. author parum probatæ fidei: says Bellarmin. Append. ad li. de Sum. Pont. cap. x.

* Infectam hæresis scabie bestiam pietate & doctrina omnino defertam. Baro. An. To. 10. ad ann. 996. n. 54.

 In Indicib. lib. prohibitorum.

(77) Cook, on the She-Pope, pag. 10.

(78) See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccles. Tom. ii, pag. 920.

(79) In the remark [H] of the article AVENTINUS.

†† Præ cæteris commendandus fama nobilis Florimondus. Baronius, Annal. Tom. x, ad ann. 853, num. 62.

‡‡ Sic confecit monstrum istud, ut novatores pudeat quæ scripserunt vel somniasse. Ibid.

‡‡ Prorsus confodit hæreticos qui commentum illud sparserunt in vulgus, ut amplius ea de fabula hiscere non audeant. In Apparat. Sac. verbo Florimondus.

(80) Cook, on the She-Pope, pag. 2, 3.

(81) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papesse, ch. vii, num. 5, fol. 380, verso: he describes him by these two letters R. T. and answers him in the end of his work.

(82) Ibid. ch. ii, num. 3, fol. 365, verso, & fol. 366.

(83) Intituled, Le Mystere d'Iniquité, see there pag. 161, & seq.

(84) In his Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 504, & seq.

‘ seem to have acknowledged Joan as a Pope, because ‘ being either unmindful or sorry that he had writ a ‘ letter to John Carvajal, he suffered the name of Joan ‘ amongst the other names of Popes. And which is ‘ still more, Æneas Sylvius himself after he was made ‘ Pope, wrote this story in the sixth age of the world, ‘ page 170 of his historical work printed at Nuremberg ‘ in the year 1493 by Kobergerus, as John Gerhardi, a ‘ most learned divine of the Ausburg confession, says.

As to what relates to Aventinus, I must intreat all my readers to beware of the false reasoning of the English doctor, who has refuted the book of Florimond de Remond. These are his words: I own John Aventinus (76) rejects in general this story of the She Pope as a fable; but gives no reason why he rejects it. Besides, Bellarmin rejects him as an author of little credit ‡: and Baronius, sets a mark upon him, not only as a scabby sheep, but likewise as a beast infected with the mange of heresy, intirely void of piety and learning *; and several of your Popes have prohibited  his history as unworthy to be read: therefore I do not see why his rejecting that story without reason can be any prejudice to it (77). You find that in order to discredit the testimony of Aventinus, he takes advantage of the detraction, wherewith two cardinals have loaded him; but on the contrary, by reason of this detraction Aventinus ought to be considered as a good evidence (78); for Bellarmin, and Baronius and several others cry him down, only because he has taken a pleasure in ill treating the court of Rome: and we have seen above (79) that he was in his heart a good Lutheran. We must say then, that had he found the least probability in the story of the She-Pope, he would have affirmed it, and taken occasion from thence to divert himself at the expence of the Popes. Such are the Paralogisms into which one falls, when in handling a controversy, one will cavil at every thing and give up nothing.

[F] Baronius . . . . . was in the wrong to affirm that the heretics were so confounded at the work of Florimond de Remond, that they were ashamed of having spoke of this fable.] ‘ He thinks it is the best discourse that ‘ was ever made on this subject ††: and declares he ‘ would have inserted it in his annals, if the book ‘ had not been a little too large. For by this, as the ‘ cardinal also observes, he has so confounded the ‘ whole herd of heretics, who before reproached the ‘ Catholics with this fable, that now they are asham- ‘ ed of what they have said about it ‡‡. . . . . Posse- ‘ vinus is of the same opinion. For he says, he has ‘ killed the heretics stone-dead. And that since the ‘ publishing of this book the heretics are so quiet, ‘ they have not a word to say ‡‡, they dare not speak ‘ any longer of a Pope Joan (80).’ Baronius and Possevinus did not well know the situation of the affair: the book of Florimond de Remond was despised by the Protestants, and did not make them alter their opinions. A minister of Bearn wrote against it. See what Florimond says in answer to him in his second edition (81). He speaks of a certain person . . . . . to whom he will not be obliged to reply, no more than against this other, adds he, who under the borrowed name of Jesseen, count of Malta, used but a poor shift. The latter in his codicil promises abundance of great matters, and among others to shew the impertinencies and silly reasons of him, who wrote the book concerning the vulgar error about Pope Joan (82). Mr du Plessis Mornai was not ignorant of what Remond had writ, and yet he declared himself strongly for those, who hold the story of the She-Pope to be true, and made use of all their reasons. This was done in a book he published in the year 1611 (83). Coëffeteau refuted him in the best manner he was able (84): but he was refuted in his turn by Andrew Rivetus (85), who affirms that in the story of the She-Pope, there is nothing that oppose's our reason or conscience, if we hold for truth, as we still do, though the Monk (86) should run mad at it, what has been left on record to posterity (87). The book, where he speaks after this manner, was printed in the year 1615: only three years after Conrad Decker had published a book at Oppenheim de Papa Romano & Papissa Romana quod Joannes octavus fuerit mulier & peperit: and but five years after Vignier minister of Blois had maintained the same thing (88). James Cappel, minister and professor of Theology at Sedan, asserted (88*) in 1619 the story of the She-Pope in answer to the objections of Father Coton. Alexander Cook wrote a piece on purpose to refute that of Remond, and to support in general the story of the She-Pope, and to defend it against all the objections of the Roman Catholics. His book translated from English into French was printed at Sedan in 1633. Another English Professor at Wesel published a work of the same nature about the same time (89). Every body knows that David Blondel's book was refuted in the year 1655 by an advocate of Roüen, and in the year 1658 by a minister of Groningen, and that the great Salmasius had promised to answer it (90). It is known likewise that Mr Hottenger published a treatise to maintain the tradition of the She-Pope, and that Mr Zuinger, Professor of Divinity at Basil, has asserted the same pretension in his book de Festo corporis Christi, printed in the year 1685. Mr Megerlin, Professor of Mathematics at Basil, had defended a little before the same thing in his Disquisitio Chronologica de Johanna Papissa. Mr Spanheim, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, published a pretty large book according to the same prejudice in the year 1691 (91). I could name several other Protestants (92), who, since the book of Florimond de Remond, have supported what he endeavoured to destroy. And therefore there is nothing more frivolous or false, than the commendation which Baronius and Possevin have given him, for having silenced the Protestants and brought them to shame.

(85) In his Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, Part i, p. 590.

The same extravagance we find in the following words of Father Maimbourg (93): ‘ The most learn- ‘ ed ministers of the pretended reformed religion are ‘ ashamed that those of their party should fall into so ‘ gross an error, and which disgraces all such as still ‘ continue in it either through ignorance, passion, or ‘ prejudice. Mr Blondel, one of the most ingenious ‘ amongst them, has even endeavoured to undeceive ‘ them in a learned dissertation he has made on this ‘ subject. Some of the same sect, as Samuel Maresius, ‘ are offended at it, and have thought fit to combat ‘ him, and to maintain a falsehood so visible, and at ‘ present so much decried: but the late Father Labbe, ‘ a learned Jesuit, to whom we owe among many o- ‘ ther learned works the greatest part of the last col- ‘ lection of councils of the Paris edition, has so entire- ‘ ly disarmed him, and afterwards so severely punish- ‘ ed his ignorance and boldness, in the refutation ‘ (94) of this fable, which we find in the eighth tome ‘ of his councils, that I do not believe any of the ‘ brethren of this minister of Groningen dares again ‘ enter the lists, to defend so bad a cause, and so aban- ‘ doned by all reasonable people, even amongst the ‘ Protestants themselves. For at last they acknow- ‘ ledge ingenuously, that there is no other Pope Joan ‘ than this John VIII, to whom this ridiculous name ‘ was given, because he had shewn so little courage in ‘ maintaining the decrees of a general council, and of ‘ his predecessors against Photius.’ All this is full of hyperboles and lies properly so called: for since the publication of this treatise of Father Labbé, the Protestants continue to write as before for the existence of the She-Pope. I do not alledge that in 1662 there was reprinted at Helmstad, ‘ Historia Johannis VIII ‘ Romani Pontificis, virum primum simulantis, postea ‘ sexum suum partu in publica via edito prodentis, à ‘ Jesuitarum in primis technis vindicata; - - - The ‘ History

(86) That is, Coëffeteau.

(87) Rivet, Remarq. ubi supra, pag. 590. He had the same opinion, when he confuted the Jesuit Petra Sancta in 1636. See the third Tome of his works, p. 587.

(88) See the remark [L].

(88*) See his Instruction Chrétienne répondue au I Tome de l'Institution du P. Coton, pag. 514, & seq.

(89) See the remark [B] of the article FRANC.

(90) See the remark [I] of the article BLONDEL (David).

(91) Intituled, de Papa fœmina inter Leonem IV & Benedictum III Disquisitio Historica.

(92) See the names of some in the Introduction to Histor. Eccles. of Gaspar Sagittarius, pag. 686, and in the mark of the article RADULPHUS, towards the end.

(93) Maimbourg, Hist. du Schisme des Grecs, liv. ii, at the year 881, pag. 202, 203, of the first Tome.

(94) It is the dissertation which he has put under the title of Concordia Joannis Papissæ . . . . at the end of the first Tome de Script. Eccles. printed at Paris in the year 1660.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google same things appear to us true or false, according as they favour our own, or the opposite party [G]. The same force of prejudice is the cause, that the controversy about the She-Pope has been thought an affair of the utmost consequence against the church of Rome (l); but when all is done it would be but a trifle (m), for the objections, that may

(l) Cook, on Pope Joan, pag. 873.

(m) Blondel, ubi supra, pag. 96.

'History of John VIII Pope of Rome, who at first pretended to be a man, but afterwards discovered his sex by bringing forth a child in the open street, vindicated chiefly from the artifices of the Jesuits;' with some collections of Berneggerus upon the same subject (95); but I will add to the authors I have already mentioned John Lehman, who published at Wittemberg in 1669, Infelix puerperium Johannis Pontificis, - - - The unhappy delivery of Pope John, and John Daniel Artopæus author of a treatise de Johanne VIII Papissa printed at Leipsic in 1673 (96), and Mr Mayer (97) who in his treatise de Pontificis Romani electione (98), printed at Hamburgh in 1690, embraces and maintains the opinion of the reality of the She-Pope, though he owns that the reason of Allatius and Blondel had raised in him some doubts before. I must not forget Mr Misson (99) who disputes strenuously and at several times for the common tradition, and who even treats with great contempt the arguments of Blondel, and informs us (100) that an English Doctor has not long since writ a book upon the question of the She-Pope, which is not yet printed, and in which he makes admirable use of the force of a testimony drawn from the Chronicles of the ancient monastery of Canterbury. He cites (101) Mr le Sueur, a French minister, as one of the partisans of the History of the She-Pope, and as one of those who have alledged the story of the two copies of Anastasius sent to Marquard Freher. The book, in which Mr le Sueur does so, is an Ecclesiastical History whereof the seventh part, which treats of the IXth century, was printed at Geneva in 1686.

(95) See Sagittarius, Introd. in Hist. Eccles. pag. 686.

(96) See Sagittar. ibid.

(97) John Fridericus, professor of Theology at Kiel, and at Hamburgh.

(98) Pag. 244, & seq.

(99) In the 2d Tome of his Voiage d'Italie, p. 178, & seq. p. 202, & seq; and pag. 306, Edit. of 1696.

(100) Preface of the third Tome.

(101) Pag. 203, of the second Tome.

PROTESTANTS who have not believed the story of the She-Pope.

It is true there have been some ministers, who did not believe what is said of the She-Pope (102). Peucer, if we may credit Remond, did not believe it neither. He has shewn himself more conscientious than the rest, these are the words of Remond; and though an enemy to the Catholic religion and the holy Fathers, believed what was said of Pope Joan to be a fable, and did did not think fit to give it a place in his Chronicle. Which he would not have omitted, had he thought it in the least probable. Perhaps, he followed the memoirs of Melancthon, who was the most modest of all those, who have strayed from the church (103). The Jesuit Gretser (104) has quoted some passages of a little piece which had been composed by a Protestant, and printed in the year 1588 under the title of, 'Simplex Narratio indicans & exponens meretriculam quandam Anglam 'nunquam Papam fuisse, neque unquam in rerum natura extitisse, & unde figmentum illud originem 'duxisse credatur. - - - A plain narrative declaring and shewing that a certain English harlot had never been 'Pope, nor ever was in being, and whence that fiction 'may be thought to have taken it's rise.' I must not omit that Courcelles, an Arminian Professor at Amsterdam, declared for the opinion of Blondel, whose Latin book he caused to be printed, which overthrows the story of the She-Pope. He observed moreover in the Preface that he put to it (105), 1. That Boxhornius, (106) Professor at Leyden, had plainly enough given his approbation to the opinion of Blondel; 2. That he had heard that George Calixtus (107), and Herman Conringius, famous Professors at Helmstad, likewise approved it. He related (108) a passage of Nicholas Vignier, which evidently shews that this learned Protestant Historian did not think the story of the She-Pope true. I add that Gesselius, Physician at Utrecht, approved the book of David Blondel (109), and that Dr Cave and Dr Burnet (110) believe the tradition of the She-Pope to be fabulous. I add likewise, that Schoockius, a Professor in the university of Groningen, had been one of those who vigorously and publickly maintained the story of the She-Pope; but at last owned it to be a forgery (111). He had inserted in one of his books his change of opinion; and yet to avoid the scandal he retrenched this place and cancelled the leaves by the advice of his colleagues; but when the work of Blondel appeared, he no more regarded them; he printed in a second edition what he had suppressed,

(102) See the remark [I] of the article BLONDEL (DAVID), towards the end.

(103) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papesse, lib. vi, num. 5, fol. 378.

(104) Gretser. in Examine Mysterii Plessæani, pag. 301.

(105) Pag. 322.

(106) In his Universal History.

(107) Father Labbe, de Script. Eccles. Tom. i, pag. 932, puts him in the number of the partisans of the She-Pope: and justly: for in the book of this Calixtus, de Conjugio Clericorum, there is a long digression for the affirmative, on the story of the She-Pope.

(108) Pag. m. 319.

(109) Timannus Gesselius, Historia Sacra & Ecclesiast. Tom. ii, pag. 79, Edit. Ultraj. 1661, in 4to. See Father Labbe, in Cenotaphio everso, at the end of Tom. i, de Script. Eccles. pag. 986.

(110) I shall relate their words in the remark [S] of the article POLONUS. (111) Mart. Schoock, Fab. Hamel. in Præfat. & in cap. xii, Part ii, Edit. Gron. 1662.

and owned, that by comparing, one by one, the arguments of this minister, with the answers that had been made to them, he had found no answer that was good for any thing, or which did not serve rather to confirm than weaken the contrary opinion (112). Legi & expendi postea quam diligenter; quæ τῷ πεῦ Blondello ab excessu objecta fuerunt: Sed ingenue profiteri debeo, hæc omnia mihi videri κωφὰ βελη. Responsiones minus solidæ, adversariæ sententiæ firmandæ magis quam evertendæ serviunt (113). We shall see afterwards (114), what has been reported of Casaubon.

When all is done, it is reasonable to allow that the work of Florimond de Remond is not bad in it's kind, and I do not think any body had as yet so well refuted the story of the She-Pope. However, he was guilty of many blunders (115), and used too many digressions and declamations. I shall give here the extract of a letter, which informs us that his proofs seemed very convincing to Justus Lipsius. 'De quæ-'stiuncula quod petis, super pontifice Joanna fœmina, 'ut nugantur; vides, quid sentiam cum appello nu-'gas. Revera fabella est haud longè ab audacia & 'ineptiis Poëtarum. Vis clarè tu & consortes illi rem 'videre, Adito Librum gallicè nuper scriptum & edi-'tum Burdigalis, Auctore Florimundo Remundo, Con-'siliario Regio, qui totus est in hoc argumento, auctor 'ipse ad me misit & ita planè omnia exsecutus est, ut 'nobis nihil reliqui sit, præter credere & assentiri '(116). - - - As to my opinion, which you are pleased to 'ask, about the affair of Pope Joan, as men impertinently talk; you see what it is, by my calling it impertinence. In truth it is a fable not much differing 'from the boldness and silly stories of the Poets. If you 'have a mind to see that matter set in a clear light, 'consult a book lately writ in French and published at 'Bourdeaux, by Florimond de Remond, one of the king's 'counsellors, who is wholly employed in this argu-'ment. The author himself sent it to me, and he has so 'thoroughly discussed every point, that nothing remains 'for us to do, but to believe and assent.' As for the rest, many assure us that the Jesuit Richeome is the true author of this work (117). There is however a prodigious difference as to the manner of writing, between the compositions of Richeome and that; and it is not likely that those blunders, which are found in the book that appeared under the name of Florimond de Remond, could slip from one, whom the Jesuits at that time looked upon as their best French writer.

(112) Idem, in Præfatione.

(113) Schoockii Fabula Hamel. Part ii, cb. xii, pag. 124.

(114) In the remark [L].

(115) We see a list of them in the books of Blondel on this question.

(116) Lipsius, Epist. ad Aub. Miræum, inserta in Not. Miræi ad Sigebertum, apud Gretser. in Mysta Salmuriensi, p. 300.

(117) See the remark [C] of the article REMOND.

[G] The same things appear to us true, or false, according as they favour our own, or the opposite party.] This maxim cannot be called in question but by those, who let the affairs of human life pass away without seriously reflecting. The malady of prejudice would not be so bad, were we contented to determine thro' affection, when the reasons pro and con appear clearly to be equal: but we go much further, the party we love carries it, though the reasons which favour it are nothing near equal to those which oppose it. Undoubtedly this is the reason, why it is so difficult to discharge one's duty in the office of a Judge. Montaigne had a solid thought upon that head. 'What-'ever good design a Judge may have, if he be not 'much upon his guard, which few people mind, the 'byass to friendship, kindred, beauty, and revenge, 'and not only things so weighty as these, but that 'fortuitous instinct, which makes us favour one thing 'more than another, and which, without the leave 'of reason, determines our choice in two equal cases, 'or any umbrage of the like vanity, may insensibly 'convey into his judgment, the recommendation or 'disfavour of a cause, and give a turn to the balance '(118). . . . . I have heard of a Judge, that meeting 'with a sharp contest between Bartolus and Baldus, 'and some point perplexed with many difficulties, put 'in the margin of his book, a question for a friend, 'that is, the truth was so imbroiled and intricate, 'that in such a case, he might favour what party he 'thought fit. It was owing only to want of wit and 'ability, that he did not put every where, question 'for a friend. The Lawyers and Judges of our time 'find in all causes, byass enough to turn them as they 'please.

(118) Montaigne, Essais, livr. ii, cb. xii, pag. m. 426, 427.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

may be drawn from thence, are not more embarraſſing than thoſe that are founded on facts,

'pleaſe. In a ſcience ſo infinite, depending on the 'authority of ſo many opinions, and a ſubject ſo ar- 'bitrary, it is impoſſible but that a vaſt confuſion of 'judgments muſt ariſe. And indeed there is hardly 'any cauſe ſo clear, but men vary in their opinions 'about it; one court decides contrary to what another 'has done, and this other the quite contrary at ano- 'ther time. Therefore, by this licence which caſts 'a great blemiſh on the ceremonious authority and 'luſtre of our law, we frequently ſee that people do 'not ſtop when judgment is given, but run from one 'Judge to another, to determine the ſame cauſe (119).'

(119) Ibid. pag. 460, 461.

Very few men are ſo much maſters of their own hearts, as not to turn the ſcale by the weight of friendſhip, unleſs the arguments of the other ſide form a perfect even balance. Friendſhip commonly carries it, even when the arguments of the party we love are not ſo weighty. Hatred is ſtill more active. Iſidorus of Peluſium ſaid very well, that if favour has a little ſight, hatred and reſentment have none at all (120). Blondel remarks that ſome have taken a pride in verifying this maxim in the diſputes about the She-Pope (121). Is it not well known, that Bellarmin, Baronius, and ſo many others, who have writ againſt the ſtory of this woman, maintain with might and main ſeveral traditions as ill, or even worſe grounded than that? The authority of the negative argument, the ſilence of many ages, the variations, credulity, and a hundred other defects of evidences do not hinder Baronius from taking the affirmative, and from being angry with thoſe who are of another opinion; and thus in pleading his own cauſe he looks on thoſe objections as bad, which in attacking his adverſaries he takes for good proofs. Is not this judging of things according to his paſſion, and turning them ſometimes in one ſenſe and ſometimes in another, agreeably to the intereſt of his prejudices.

(120) Iſid. Peluſiota, lib. i, Epiſt. ccxx, quoted by Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. pag. 79.

(121) Blondel, ibid.

May it not be ſaid, that thoſe, who maintain with ſo much heat that the ſtory of the She-Pope is true, conſider more the intereſt of their cauſe, than the ſtate and condition of the proofs? For were they void of all paſſion, would they not remember that the ſilence of cotemporary authors has often appeared to them an invincible reaſon againſt a thouſand traditions, which the court of Rome alledges? Could they ſay with a clear conſcience, that if a tradition, which reflects ignominy upon the Albigenſes, were ſupported preciſely by the ſame proofs, and oppoſed by the ſame objections as that of the She-Pope, they would judge both of the proofs and of the objections as they do in the controverſy of the She-Pope? Is it not certain, they would laugh at the proofs and take the objections for demonſtrative arguments? Would they not affirm, that theſe arguments could not be eluded but by extravagant quirks, and that to be at the pains to invent exceptions would in truth be the trick of a Lawyer, that wants to perpetuate a law-ſuit?

CONSIDERATION on the force of the negative argument of this ſubject.

A man free from all prejudice would think the negative argument ſufficient to reject the romance of the She-Pope. By this I do not pretend to ſay, that with regard to all kinds of facts, the ſilence of cotemporary authors is a good reaſon to deny them. This ought not to be ſuppoſed but with reſpect to remarkable events, as the retreat of Charles the Vth into a monaſtery, and with regard to the eſſential and principal circumſtances of an action, which every body muſt know, and of which it would be abſurd to hope that future ages would be intirely ignorant. I rank in this claſs the kind of death which Henry II, Henry III, and Henry IV, died, the firſt killed at a tournament, the ſecond aſſaſſinated by a Monk during the ſiege of Paris, and the third murdered in his coach in the ſtreets of the ſame city. It is not to be imagined that all the Hiſtorians, who lived in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries, could be obſtinately reſolved or conſpire not to ſay a word of the abdication of Charles the Vth, nor of what was tragical in the death of theſe three Henries. You muſt obſerve, I do not conſider here in general the ſilence of cotemporary authors: I know it is very poſſible that in books of devotion, or morality, written in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries, one may relate incidently ſeveral actions of theſe four princes, without ſaying where or how they died. I mean only thoſe, who have writ either the particular Hiſtory of theſe monarchs, or the Hiſtory of Spain and France, or the general Hiſtory of Europe. It would be a prodigy, and a monſter more ſtrange than all thoſe Titus Livius mentions, not only if all theſe Hiſtorians were ſilent as to the things I have taken notice of: but even if ſeven or eight of the chief had ſuppreſſed them. Let us ſuppoſe that in the XXIVth century, there are but ſeven or eight of the beſt Hiſtorians extant, who lived in the time of Charles V, and Henry IV, or a little after: and that thoſe, who ſhall live then, find no trace of the abdication of Charles V, and of the aſſaſſination of Henry III and Henry IV, but in ſome wretched Annaliſt of the XIXth century: I do maintain they will be the moſt raſh and credulous of all men, if they give credit to this Annaliſt, and a hundred others who may have copied him. This may be eaſily applied to the diſpute about the She-Pope. I have obviated the objection of thoſe, who might pretend we have not all the Annaliſts that lived at that time. It ſuffices that there remain ſome of the chief of them. But in order to ſee more clearly, that it was impoſſible the Hiſtorians of the IXth century could have ſuppreſſed a fact ſo extraordinary as the papacy of the pretended Joan, I will make uſe of a ſhort fiction. I will ſuppoſe an author of the XIth century has related the following ſtory.

Charlemagne ſo eagerly wiſhed to be the father of his ſucceſſor, that he was extremely grieved becauſe his wife was barren. At laſt ſhe proved with child: he was exceedingly pleaſed at it: but as ſhe was delivered of a girl, he found his uneaſineſs return, and not caring to truſt to futurity, he contrived to make his daughter paſs for a ſon, and gave her the name of Pepin. Six years after, the queen proved with child again, and lay-in of a boy: but that the public might not know they had uſed any fraud, the father and mother continued to conceal the ſex of their firſt child: ſo that after the death of Charlemagne, his daughter, who paſſed for a boy, was crowned without any difficulty. In the third year of her reign the impoſture was diſcovered, and in this manner. She had called her parliament together, and repaired to them with all the ſplendor imaginable; but whilſt ſhe was making her ſpeech, ſhe fell in labour, was delivered in the preſence of this auguſt aſſembly, and died immediately. This appeared ſo horrible, that the parliament deteſted the place, and would no more aſſemble there. Meaſures were alſo taken to prevent the like accidents, and it was ordered that for the future, before they proceeded to the coronation, one of the twelve peers of the kingdom ſhould put his hand, where it ſhould be neceſſary, to diſtinguiſh whether the perſon to be crowned was a male or not. Here is a ſtory which reſembles that of the She-Pope, as one drop of water is like another.

Let us not rigorouſly preſs the parallel, let us allay it, we need not improve all our advantages. Let us ſuppoſe that the Annaliſt has unfolded the matter another way, and ſaid that after the ſecond year of the reign of this Pepin, prince Lewis, really the eldeſt ſon of Charlemagne, claimed the crown, under pretence that Pepin was a female, and that by the Salique law ſhe could not reign. A violent civil war was raiſed upon this account. Pepin refuſed to let himſelf be ſearched; but the city of Paris riſing up in arms, they forced him in his palace, ſtripped him ſtark naked, diſcovered his ſex, dethroned him, confined him in a convent, and ſet Lewis the Good upon the throne.

This adventure is ſo ſurprizing, whether it be related the firſt way, or the ſecond, that for this very reaſon, becauſe it does not appear in any Hiſtorian of the IXth century, nor even of the Xth, it ought to be rejected as a tale altogether like that of John of Paris, Peter of Provence, and the fair Maguelonne, or of Lancelot du Lac, &c. for it is morally and even naturally impoſſible, that all the Hiſtorians of that time ſhould be ſilent upon the adventures of this Pepin, and all take notice of an immediate ſucceſſion between Charlemagne and Lewis the Good, and that no tranſaction of the reign of this diſguiſed female is to be found. Not one letter writ, or received, not one ambaſſador diſpatched, no peace concluded, no declaration of war publiſhed. See the margin (122). One might as well tell me that in 1694, the Engliſh took Marſeilles and Toulon, and put all to the fire and ſword even

(122) I make this obſervation, becauſe it does not appear that the She-Pope, during the ſpace of two years and ſome months which they aſſign her, had writ, or received any letter, or ſent the leaſt thing in the world, tho' ſhe was a woman of great wit and courage. Father Labbe, in Chronolog. hiſtor. pag. 221, poſitively argument that ſilence, and a merry upon it.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google facts, or on principles acknowleged by the Roman Catholics. Theodore Beza made mention even to the gates of Arles, and afterwards re-imbarked, loaded with booty: that all this is very true, tho' neither the Gazettes of that year, nor any pamphlet upon the affairs of that time make the leaſt mention of it.

REFUTATION of the reaſons oppoſed to the negative argument.

The force of the negative arguments will be more manifeſt, when we have refuted thoſe who enquire into the reaſons of this great ſilence of cotemporary authors. They ſay, that the Papacy of this woman was looked on as ſo ſcandalous to the church of Rome, that people were forbid to ſpeak of it, and therefore authors were ſilent, ſome thro' zeal, and others thro' fear. But the anſwer that may be made utterly deſtroys this reaſoning.

I. In the firſt place it may be ſaid, it is not true that this adventure has been conſidered as a diſgrace to the Catholic religion, or as a thing that ſtrikes at the rites of the Romiſh communion; for they do not depend, according to their principles, on the perſonal qualities of Popes. The crime of Joan conſiſted in her not having lived chaſtly, but not in being delivered in the open ſtreets. Such a delivery might have been the effect of chance, or imprudence, and would not have aggravated the immorality ſhe had committed. She was culpable then, only becauſe ſhe had not preſerved her virginity. How can you ſuppoſe, that on this occaſion Rome would acknowledge herſelf covered with an ignominy which muſt be entirely forgotten, when ſhe does not conceal the wicked lives of ſeveral Popes, who, before, and after their advancement to the Papal chair, were plunged into irregularities much more heinous. The election of Joan was to the honour of the Romans: for ſhe was a perſon famous for her learning and behaviour (123). To have been ignorant of her ſex was an error of fact, and an ignorance which excuſes one, and no body is anſwerable for the ſecret amours of a diſguiſed woman. It is ſo certain that the ſtory of the She-Pope cannot diſgrace the church of Rome, that even Mr Jurieu himſelf, as much Mr Jurieu as he is, has confeſſed it. I do not think, ſays he (124), we are much concerned to prove the truth of this ſtory of Pope Joan. Tho' the Papal chair had ſuffered this ſurprize, that a woman ſhould be eſtabliſhed in it under the notion of being a man, and that this woman ſhould afterwards be delivered at a ſolemn proceſſion, as it is ſaid, this, in my opinion, would form no great prejudice. And the advantage we might draw from thence is not worth the trouble of holding a long diſpute about it. I even think, by the manner this ſtory is told, it does more honour to the ſee of Rome than it deſerves. They ſay, this She-Pope had ſtudied much, that ſhe was learned, ingenious, and eloquent, that her excellent qualities made her to be admired at Rome, and that ſhe was elected by univerſal conſent, tho' ſhe appeared as a young ſtranger, unknown, without friends, or any other recommendation than her own merit. I ſay, this is doing too much honour to the ſee of Rome, to ſuppoſe that a young man unknown ſhould be advanced to it, meerly upon the account of his merit; for it is well known, this dignity was never obtained but by intrigues. You ſee there, a Miniſter confirms the following remark of Florimond de Remond. 'But tho' this misfortune 'had happened to the church, that a woman ſhould 'hold the Roman ſee, ſince ſhe came to it by cun- 'ning and deceit, and ſince the appearance and ſhew 'ſhe made of her virtue and holy life had dazzled the 'eyes of every body, the fault ought to be laid upon 'her, and not upon the electors, who keeping 'in the plain beaten road, and walking honeſtly, 'without intrigues or ſecret practices, could not be 'accuſed of having a ſhare in the impoſture (125)'. The author adds that, this accident could not be ſo monſtrous, if it were true, as what thoſe, who call themſelves Reformed, Evangelics, and Puritans, have not only tolerated, but eſtabliſhed, nay forced ſome queens and princeſſes, to call, and declare themſelves head of the church in their ſtates and dominions, diſpoſing of pious and holy things, and eccleſiaſtical offices, according to their will and pleaſure. He had undoubtedly read this thought in Alanus Copus (126), or in Genebrard (127).

II. Secondly, it may be anſwered, it is not at all likely that Rome would forbid to make mention of an event ſo public and extraordinary as that was. Such an order would have been fruitleſs: people do not ſo expoſe their authority, by prohibitions which are not of a nature to be obſerved, and which are ſo far from ſhutting the mouth, that they rather excite an itching deſire to ſpeak (128).

III. Add in the third place, that if zeal or fear had ſtopped the pen of Hiſtorians, we ſhould not find that the firſt, who publiſhed the Papacy of Joan, were perſons devoted to the Catholic religion, and more within reach of puniſhment than others; for they were Monks. It is certain that almoſt all thoſe, who ſpread this ſtory, were good Papiſts, and nothing was farther from their thoughts than ſlander.

IV. In the fourth place, the irregularities of the court of Rome, infinitely more infamous than the Papacy of this woman would be, have been deſcribed very ingenuouſly by many authors, who were zealous for the court of Rome (129).

V. Laſtly, I ſay, that a prohibition to ſpeak of the She-Pope cannot be ſuppoſed without a contradiction; for this order to be ſilent would entirely deſtroy the principal circumſtances of the narrative. Blondel has not forgot this obſervation. Theſe are his words: 'Many . . . . have thought they could juſtify the 'ſtory of Marianus, againſt the objection taken from 'a ſilence of more than 200 years, by maintaining 'that the authors, who lived from the year 855, to 'the year 1050, forbore to ſpeak of it, becauſe they 'were aſhamed of it, and choſe rather to alter the 'order of the ſucceſſion of Popes by an affected ſilence, 'than to contribute by expreſſing an odious truth to 'the preſervation of the execrable memory of this 'harlot, who had (as is pretended) diſgraced their 'ſeries, by intruding into it. For ſetting aſide that, 'the cotemporary authors expreſs (as has been ſhewn 'before) ſome truths directly contrary to this ſuppo- 'ſition, ſtarted ſince their death: thoſe who reſided 'at Rome, as Nicolas I, and Anaſtaſius, and Wil- 'liam, the library-keeper, would have been ſtark-mad 'to think, they could (by means of their ſilence and 'ſhame) bury a filth, which is ſuppoſed to have filled 'Rome in ſuch a manner with aſtoniſhment, indigna- 'tion, and ſhame, that ſhe ſhould not be ſatisfied 'but by perpetuating the effect of her juſt diſdain, 'and ſetting forth continual marks of it to poſterity, 'by erecting a ſtatue repreſenting the cauſe of her re- 'ſentment, by the turning aſide of her proceſſions, 'and the introduction of cuſtoms unheard of before, 'and not very decent (130)' Florimond de Remond, a long time before, had made uſe of the ſame proof (131). Nevertheleſs Mr du Pleſſis Mornai had no regard to it. Onuphrius ſays that Anaſtaſius, who lived then, ſays nothing of it; nor Regino, nor many others ſince that time. But to that it might be anſwered in one word, to argue from authority negatively concludes nothing. Ranulphus alſo, in his Polychronicon, might anſwer him, that it was omitted by reaſon of the turpitude of the fact (132). The reply of Coëffeteau upon theſe words of Ranulphus is remarkable. 'It 'would be very well, ſays he (133), if theſe authors 'had not filled the chair with a true Pope in that 'time, and that they had left at leaſt ſpace enough 'for this whore to bring forth a child. Beſides, 'where is here the conſcience of the Reformed? They 'will have it, that, in deteſtation of this infamy, and 'for an eternal monument of this ſcandal, a chapel 'was built at Rome in the place where ſhe was de- 'livered; that a ſtatue of marble was erected to re- 'preſent the fact: and that indecent chairs were ſet 'up, to prevent the like accidents for the future: and 'yet they affirm, that Hiſtorians durſt not ſpeak of 'it, out of reſpect to the Popes. What ray, nay 'what ſhadow, of truth is there in things ſo incon- 'ſiſtent.' Rivetus, who refuted Coëffeteau, and who followed him almoſt ſtep by ſtep, replied nothing to this paſſage. I have not as yet obſerved any ſolution upon that point, in the writings of thoſe who defend the ſtory of the She-Pope. They have imitated Homer, who abandoned ſuch things as he deſpaired to handle well (134).

This is not to be underſtood as if I abſolutely maintained, that I know no body who has undertaken to remove the contradiction. I know Alexander Cook has examined it, and thinks he has unravelled it pretty well (135); but I know likewiſe, it had been better for his cauſe, if he had kept ſilence. He ſuppoſes there were various opinions; ſome thought the adventure

(123) Cum in urbe & Vita & ſcientia magnæ opinionis eſſet. Martin. Polonus.

(124) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Réformation, Tom. ii, p. 38, Edit. in 4to.

(125) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, ch. xi, num. 5, fol. 391.

(126) He pretends that the Engliſh, who made Elizabeth head of the church, are more criminal than the electors of the She-Pope would be. See the 8th chapter of his firſt dialogue, pag. 39.

(127) Genebr. Chron. l. iv, ad ann. 858, pag. m. 540.

(128) See Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. xxviii, fol. 442.

(129) See, ibid. ch. xv, num. 2, fol. 402, verſo.

(130) Blondel, Eclairceſſement, &c. pag. 78, 79.

(131) Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, ch. xxii, num. 1, & ch. xxiv, num. 6.

(132) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 161.

(133) Coëffet. Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 505, 506.

(134) Et quæ Deſperat tractata nitescere poſſe, relinquit. Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 149.

(135) Cook, on the She-Pope, pag. 148.

REFUTATION of an author, who has endeavoured to ſolve the contradiction objected.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google mention of the She-Pope in his ſpeech at the conference of Poiſſi. Somebody ſaid in a book, that the Papal crew hung down their heads for ſhame at the bare recital of this ſtory ture of the She-Pope ſhould be ſuffered to drop into oblivion, and others, that monuments ſhould be erected in memory of it. He gives two examples of the like diverſity of opinions; one is, that there were ſome Papiſts in France, who denied that John Chaſtel had been inſtructed by the Jeſuits to aſſaſſinate Henry IV, king of France, becauſe they would not have the Jeſuits rendered odious: and yet there were others who aſſiſted in raiſing a pyramid near the palace of Paris, by which the whole affair was made known (136). The other is, ſome people were of opinion that the writing given to Paul III, touching the reformation of abuſes, deſerved to be regiſtred; others judged it more fit to be burnt: this appears evidently from hence, that the ſaid memorial is found in the edition of the Council, printed by Crab, in the year 1551, and yet is put in the Index of books prohibited by Paul IV. . . . and was caſtrated in the edition of Councils of Dominicus Nicolinus at Venice, auſpiciis Sixti Quinti, in the year 1585, and alſo in the edition of Severinus Binnius at Cologne, 1606 (137).

(136) Ibid.

(137) Ibid. pag. 149, 150.

To overthrow this whole diſcourſe, I obſerve; firſt, that the ſuppoſition of Cook changes the ſtate of the queſtion. The point was to know whether the authors, who kept ſilence for two hundred years, were determined to it out of reſpect to or fear of the holy ſee. It is ſuppoſed, that the immediate ſucceſſors of the She-Pope enjoined, or recommended, ſilence on this ſcandalous accident, and that Anaſtaſius, and the other Hiſtorians, down to Marianus Scotus, came into this notion, either out of zeal for the honour of the church, or fear of bringing themſelves into trouble (138). This ſuppoſition is evidently and directly contrary to thoſe public monuments, which are pretended to have been raiſed, and that new ceremonial which was introduced at Rome, as they ſay, with reſpect to anniverſary proceſſions, and the election of Popes. I remark, ſecondly, that even by changing wholly the ſtate of the queſtion, the abſurdity is not avoided; for if Anaſtaſius, for example, had been one of thoſe, who thought that for the honour of the church, it was neceſſary to conceal the accident of the She-Pope, he would not have forborn to ſpeak of it, after the contrary opinion had ſo far prevailed, that the city and church of Rome ſhould have authorized it by public monuments, and by perpetual and anniverſary reglations. What end could the ſilence of an Hiſtorian in that caſe have anſwered? How whimſical, or rather how fooliſh, would it be, to think to ſuppreſs, out of regard to the holy ſee, a matter, which the whole church of Rome, openly, and publickly eternized the memory of? I ſay, in the third place, the examples Mr Cook brings ſignify nothing at all: for thoſe, who would not have had a pyramid raiſed, or the Jeſuits defamed, upon the account of John Chaſtel, were perſonally concerned in it, either through affection to that ſociety, or becauſe they believed they were not guilty. But Anaſtaſius, and the other Hiſtorians, were not perſonally concerned in the affair of the She-Pope, they did not matter her honour or her reputation, and entertained, no doubt, about the truth of the fact. Beſides, after the opinion of the neceſſity of raiſing a pyramid had prevailed, the Hiſtorians, who were moſt devoted to the Jeſuits, took notice of it, and could not have ſuppreſſed the fact, without making themſelves ridiculous. If the memorial preſented to Paul III, preſently appeared, and then diſappeared, it was becauſe the court of Rome made the opinion of thoſe quickly prevail, who were for having it ſuppreſſed. This cannot be ſaid of the monuments of the She-Pope; for it is alledged, they ſubſiſted ſeveral ages. The compariſon would be tolerable, if ſome private perſons had ſtifled the memorial, and that the court of Rome had cauſed it to be printed in the Vatican, with the moſt authentic atteſtations that can accompany what ſhe would make public in æternam rei memoriam.

(138) It is true that Anaſtaſius and the other Hiſtorians do not deny this accident, but they are ſilent about it. They ought to have told it, ſays Coëffeteau; and that is the queſtion. We ſay on the contrary they were obliged to conceal it, both by the authority of the Popes at that time, and by the cuſtom, and the conſideration of the times in which they wrote. The Popes would not let their writers diſcloſe this turpitude, to the eyes of thoſe who called their ſee in queſtion, and concealed it as much as they could, that they might not expoſe themſelves to the ridicule of the Greeks. Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reſponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part 1, pag. 595.

Samuel Mareſius, who calls a little ſubtilty (139) the contradiction Blundel had objected, does not get off from it better than Cook. He ſays, that among thoſe, who have kept ſilence, with regard to the She-Popes, ſome did it becauſe they did not think it neceſſary to inſert her in the catalogue of Popes, and the reſt, becauſe having a veneration for the holy ſee, they were aſhamed of this ſcandalous accident, but did not pretend that their omiſſion could aboliſh the memory of a thing, which the public monuments atteſted and perpetuated. We have ſeen above (140), that tho' our Joan was thought unworthy to have a place in the catalogue of Popes, and to enlarge their number, yet Hiſtorians could not diſpenſe with making mention of her falſe Popedom, the thing being too public and extraordinary. And as to this veneration for the holy ſee, and this ſhame which might have induced ſome Annaliſts to ſay nothing of a fact, whereof the whole city of Rome publickly kept up the remembrance, they are ſuch fantaſtical and fooliſh paſſions, that we cannot believe the writers, who have taken no notice of the Papacy of Engliſh Joan, capable of them. A ſenſible Hiſtorian does not ſtifle a truth for the ſake of thoſe that would have it made public, nor when he knows his ſilence can produce no good effect, and may expoſe him to ridicule, as a perſon poſſeſſed with a fooliſh ſhame. Whoever then will buſy himſelf here in the office of reconciler, loſes his pains (141). The contradiction objected by David Blondel is a knot that cannot be untied: ‘ Qui ‘ vetuſtiorum (de fœdo ejuſdem exitu, excitatis ad per- ‘ petuam memoriam monumentis publice, ſi deo placet, ‘ conteſtato) diſſimulationem pudori imputandum autu- ‘ mant, ἀσυγκλωστα κλώθειν merito cenſeantur. Quis ‘ enim Nicolaum primum, Hincmarum, Adonem, Ana- ‘ ſtaſium, Luitprandum, alioſque, quibus cum Romanis ‘ optimè conveniebat, id ſe conſecuturos ſperaſſe fin- ‘ gat; ut (quod famoſa ſtatuarum propalam proſtantium ‘ erectio, ſcrupuloſa in proceſſionum ſolennibus ſceleris ‘ conſciæ viæ declinatio, ſtercorariæ ſedis ad explo- ‘ randum Paparum ſexum decreta in poſterum inſeſſio, ‘ urbi & orbi indefinenter ebuccinabant) illatum per ‘ ſummum nefas Eccleſiæ Romanæ dedecus tacendo ‘ eluerent (142)? - - - They, who affirm that the diſſi- ‘ mulation of the ancient Hiſtorians (concerning her end, ‘ publickly atteſted, forſooth, by raiſing monuments to the ‘ perpetual memory of it) is to be imputed to their modeſty, ‘ may juſtly be thought to talk inconſiſtently. For who ‘ . . . . can imagine that Nicholas the firſt, Hincmarus, ‘ Ado, Anaſtaſius, Luitprandus, and others, who agreed ‘ perfectly well with the Romans, could ever hope, by their ‘ ſilence, to wipe off the diſgrace, moſt impiouſly brought ‘ upon the church of Rome; ſince it was daily proclaimed ‘ to the city and the whole world, by the famous erecting ‘ of ſtatues which were publickly ſold, by the ſcrupulous ‘ turning aſide of ſolemn proceſſions from the place which ‘ was privy to the crime, and by the placing of the Popes ‘ upon a cloſe-ſtool, which was decreed for the future ‘ in order to examine their ſex.’

(139) Valeret utcunque hæc doctiſſimi Viri argutiola. Mareſ. Examen Quæſtionis, &c. pag. 51.

(140) In the remark [C].

(141) Perpit pugnantia ſecum Frontibus adverſis componere. Horat. Sat. I, lib. i, ver. 102.

(142) Blondel, in Examine Queſt. de Papa fœmina, pag. 32.

The paſſage of Mr du Pleſſis contains one thing, which leads us back to the reflexion on the influence of prejudices. To argue from authority negatively concludes nothing, ſays he. Impertinent Logic in Hiſtory, anſwers Coëffeteau (143). It is rather to argue affirmatively, for all thoſe authors, as Anaſtaſius, Ado of Vienna, Rhegino, William the library-keeper, and the reſt, even the author of Vignier, if it be he that was afterwards printed under the name of Luitprand, were obliged, as faithful Hiſtorians, to write down a fact ſo memorable, which happened in their time, ſince it concerned the hiſtory they treated of: and therefore not to have writ it, is to affirm it never happened: and beſides, what ſome of them relate entirely deſtroys the fable. Pray conſider well, what Andrew Rivetus replied. ‘ If this Logic is im- ‘ pertinent in matter of Hiſtory, why is this inference ‘ reckoned bad, viz. that Peter was never at Rome, ‘ becauſe the hiſtory of the Acts, and the Epiſtles, ‘ both his own and thoſe of St Paul, ſay nothing of ‘ it? I anſwer, (ſays Bellarmin, and it is a point ‘ about Hiſtory) that one concludes nothing ab authori- ‘ tate negativè, from authority negatively. For this ‘ does not follow, Luke, Paul, Seneca, do not ſay ‘ that Peter was at Rome, therefore he was not ‘ there: for theſe three were not obliged to tell every ‘ thing; and more credit is given to three evidences who ‘ affirm a thing, than to a thouſand that ſay nothing of ‘ it, provided the latter do not deny what the former af- ‘ firm. Now it is true, Anaſtaſius, and the reſt, do ‘ not deny this accident, but they are ſilent about ‘ it (144).’ What example of the illuſion, into which the intereſt of party throws us! The ſame way of reaſoning ſeems good to us when we uſe it ourſelves, and

(143) Coëffet. Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 595.

(144) Rivet. ubi ſupra, pag. 595.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſtory (n). Florimond de Remond ſays it is falſe (o), and wiſhes the prelates had humbled the boldneſs of Theodore Beza, and ſhewn his impoſture; but they had ſo many other things of greater importance to diſcuſs, that they would have been to blame to loſe time about a queſtion of fact of ſo little conſequence. And beſides, it is not true that Theodore Beza embelliſhed his harangue with this ſtory (p). He took no notice at all of it. Mr Moreri is miſtaken when he affirms as ſomething remarkable, that among ſo great a number of people, who have aſſerted the ſtory of the She-Pope, not one Frenchman is to be found (q) [H]. As for the reſt, this multitude of teſtimonies cannot paſs for a proof, ſince

(n) See Florimond de Remond, in the treatiſe l'Anti-Papeſſe, ch. vi, num. 6, fol. m. 378, verſo.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Ibid.

(q) Moreri, under John VII, Pope.

and bad when it is uſed againſt us. The Roman Catholics will not admit the negative argument in the queſtion, whether St Peter was at Rome, and pretend it is convincing in the queſtion, whether there was a She-Pope. The Proteſtants, who think it demonſtrative in the firſt queſtion, reject it in the ſecond, and to invalidate it, even alledge what Bellarmin and other Jeſuits ſay againſt it (145). The anonymous author (146) of Judicium (147) de Samuelis Mareſii Joanna Papiſſa reſtituta, drew a parallel between the diſpute of Sibrand Lubbert with Bellarmin, and that of Samuel Mareſius with Blondel, and ſhewed that the reaſons of Samuel Mareſius are like thoſe of Bellarmin. In the firſt of theſe two diſputes, the queſtion is, whether St Peter was at Rome or not; and in the ſecond, whether there was a She-Pope or not. From whence ariſes this conſequence, if Bellarmin be a caviller, Mareſius is not leſs ſo.

(145) See Cook, in the treatiſe of the She-Pope, pag. 141, & ſeq; and Samuel Mareſius, in Examine Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, pag. 44, & pag. 20.

(146) It is Daniel Zwickerus. See Biblioth. Antitrinitariorum, pag. 152.

(147) It is a piece of 22 pages, at the end of the Quaternio Diſſertationum Theologicarum of Curcellæus, printed at Amſterdam 1659, in 8vo.

What is the reaſon that another miniſter, who would not affirm there was a She-Pope (148), has thought the ſtrongeſt arguments that are produced againſt this tradition very weak? Does it not proceed from prejudice and the intereſt of party? For, the like arguments would ſeem to him ſo ſolid in refuting a ſilly ſtory given out againſt the Waldenſes, that he would load the Monks with reproaches that ſhould not acquieſce in them. It muſt be owned that it is chiefly in the matter of controverſy that the underſtanding is the dupe of the paſſions.

(148) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformation, Tom. ii, pag. 40.

This, amongſt other bad effects, produces the diſadvantageous opinion each entertains of the contrary party. They look upon one another as obſtinate perſons, that will not ſwerve a jot from pre-conceived notions, and chuſe rather to ſeek out evaſions, than yield to reaſon. Has ſuch a ſpirit as this been ſeen to reign in the works deſigned to maintain the ſtory of the She-Pope; one imagines the authors are animated by the ſame principle, when they diſpute either againſt the Pope's ſupremacy, or the real preſence, and that if the proofs of theſe two tenets were as clear as the ſun, they would however oppoſe them, and think they had ſufficiently refuted them, provided they had furniſhed cavils like thoſe of the ſticklers for the She-Pope. Whereupon ſome believe, that nothing is to be got by gentle methods, and that ſuch an obſtinacy requires the remedy of penal laws. On the other hand, when one ſees the Roman Catholics continue to write books to ſupport the moſt ill grounded traditions, as the arrival of Lazarus into Provence, the apoſtleſhip of Dionyſius the Areopagite, &c. one thinks the ſame ſpirit leads them to reject the moſt convincing reaſons that can be alledged againſt Tranſubſtantiation. Can there be any thing more clear than the facts, by which the changes of belief that have happened in the church are proved (149), and yet the controverſiſts of Rome deny them with the greateſt aſſurance, and even treat them as impoſſible (150). How then can the Proteſtants forbear to call this obſtinacy?

(149) See among other works written by the miniſters, l'Hiſtoire de l'Egliſe, which Mr Baſnage publiſhed in the year 1699, in two volumes in folio.

A very learned Calviniſt, who has embraced the opinion of Blondel, would without difficulty aſſent to what I have juſt ſaid; for he obſerves that by maintaining ſo zealouſly that there was a She-Pope, occaſion is given to the Roman controverſiſts to confirm their followers in their falſe notions, and to make them hate the Proteſtant communion, as if it alledged nothing ſtronger againſt the other doctrines of Popery, than for the defence of the ſtory we ſpeak of. Si dicere liceat, quod res eſt, Papani Doctores dum vident quoſdam ex Noſtris, pro Johannæ Papiſſæ Hiſtoria, ut vera, velut pro aris atque focis digladiari, argumentum inveniunt ad confirmandos cæcos ſuos ſectatores, eoſque ab Orthodoxa doctrina alieniores reddendos. Cum enim non difficulter, imo ſufficienter, (licet non deberent ipſi) commentum hoc deſtruere queant, facile ſimplicioribus perſuadent, ejuſdem notæ eſſe reliqua, quæ illi, quos per calumniam hæreticos vocant, adverſus dogmata ſuæ Eccleſiæ, quam ſolam contendunt eſſe Catholicam, adducere conſueverint (151). We ſhall ſee afterwards (152) theſe are not things ſpoken at random: for I ſhall quote a Capuchin, who, to convict the Proteſtants of obſtinacy, alledges the diſpute about the She-Pope as an inſtance of it. Let us conclude with a ſhort digreſſion. I do not think there is reaſon to accuſe David Blondel of temerity, under pretence that the arguments which combate the exiſtence of the She-Pope have determined him to the negative. But if, becauſe other arguments may be oppoſed to theſe, one thinks he ought to be condemned, the condemnation muſt be founded on his not remaining neuter. This is the courſe ſome people take: they leave the queſtion of the She-Pope undecided, they neither affirm nor deny what Martin Polonus has ſaid about it. This conduct ſeems to them prudent: but do they keep to it in every thing elſe? Do they ſuſpend their judgment until proofs are brought, againſt which they can invent nothing to ſay? Not at all: they content themſelves with the pooreſt reaſonings upon a hundred other occaſions which humour their prejudices.

(150) Meſſieurs de Port-Royal have writ ſeveral books upon that with regard to the Euchariſt, and a doctor of the Sorbonne, named Langevin, has maintained it with regard to all the articles of faith. Le Journal des Sçavans, of the ſixth of February 1702, gives an extract of his book.

(151) Mart. Schoockius, Præf. Fabulæ Hamelenſis, folio ult.

(152) In the remark [I].

The ſame fault is every day obſerved in Newsmongers. Does there go a report, favourable to the enemy, and backed with all kinds of probability, they diſpute as much as they are able, and will not give credit till the thing is evidently certain. I have ſometimes told them their oppoſition could not be ſufficiently applauded, if it were accompanied with two conditions, one is, that they would be pleaſed to ſuſpend their judgment without paſſing to the negative, and the other that they would be as difficult to be perſuaded, when a piece of news is ſpread, diſadvantageous to the enemy. But then they are credulity itſelf, the ſtrongeſt appearances of falſhood make no impreſſion upon them: they combate them as much as they can, without remembering that every day they uſe weaker proofs againſt ſuch reports as are diſagreeable to them, and which for that reaſon ſeem to them unworthy of credit. They ſuffer themſelves to be taken on the firſt onſet by the Gazettes of their own nation, and ſuſtain four or five aſſaults from thoſe of the enemy's. Extreme credulity in ſome reſpects, and extreme incredulity in others, agree ſo well together in the ſame man, that they beget each other.

[H] Mr Moreri . . . . affirms . . . . that among ſo great a number of people, who have aſſerted the ſtory of the She-Pope, not one Frenchman is to be found.] In theſe words of Moreri there is a truth and a falſhood. It is certain that a world of people have related this ſtory (153): but it is falſe that we do not ſee one Frenchman among them. Mr Moreri would have avoided this miſtake, had he conſulted the Anti-She-Pope of Florimond de Remond: for there he would have found theſe words: ‘ Our French Hiſtorians and ‘ Annaliſts, going in the old road, have touched up‘ on ſomewhat of it. For in order to embelliſh their ‘ work, they have thought fit to add this fine piece ‘ to it. One ſays, ſhe was a very pretty woman and ‘ of a great genius, born in England, and fell in love ‘ with a young ſtudent. Then going on with the ‘ reſt of the ſtory, ſays it was her Valet de Chambre, ‘ that ſporting with her, got her with child, and ‘ that going one day on horſeback through the city, ‘ ſhe was delivered, and died ſuddenly upon the place ‘ after having held the ſee two years, five months, and ‘ four days. And that after her death Nicolas the ‘ firſt was choſen. This happened in 858. In which ‘ he belies all thoſe, who went before him. One of ‘ her cardinals, as this author ſays, ſporting with the ‘ life of his maſter, or rather miſtreſs, immortalized ‘ her memory in this fine verſe,

(153) See the remark [B], of the article FRANK.

Papa pater patrum papiſſa peperit partum (154).

(154) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, ch. iv, n. 4, folio 372, verſo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google since the moſt antient is poſterior by two hundred years to the fact in queſtion, and inconſiſtent with thoſe indiſputable facts related by cotemporary authors [I]. Colomiés cenſures Blondel for believing that the ſtory of the She-Pope, which we meet with in a manuſcript of Anaſtaſius, was framed in the very words of Martinus Polonus. He ſhews that an Hiſtorian, who lived before Martinus, has related the ſame thing that we ſee in this Manuſcript; but in the main, this rather favours than hurts the opinion of Blondel [K]. Thoſe, who have writ to ſhew the falſity of this ſtory, have inquired into the

The Holy Father became a mother.

If the author of the Annals of Aquitain, whom he cites, be John Bouchet, as it is very likely, he muſt have uſed an edition either prior or poſterior to what I uſe (155); for I find in mine only this: After this Leo, who ſat in the chair of St Peter eight years, an Engliſh-woman, who was thought to be a man, and was named John, was inſtalled Pope. She was born at Mayence: and when ſhe was twelve years of age, ſhe diſguiſed herſelf in the habit of a man, and went to ſtudy at Athens, where ſhe made great proficiency: afterwards ſhe went to Rome in the ſame dreſs, where ſhe was ſo much eſteemed, that the cardinals, thinking ſhe was a man, made her Pope: and ſhe held the ſee thirteen months or thereabouts. And in the thirteenth month being got with child by her Valet de Chambre, as ſhe was going to the church of St John de Lateran, between the Coloſſus and St Clement, ſhe fell in labour, and died in bringing forth. It is ſaid that upon this account, a cardinal uſed afterwards, whenever a Pope was made, to feel whether he had genitals or not (156). Florimond perhaps miſquoted, and inſtead of the Annals of Aquitain ſhould have ſet down the Annals of France by Nicolas Gilles (157). He complains moreover of another writer whom he does not name, and afterwards of the Sieur du Haillan, who would not publiſh his hiſtory in France without putting the ſtory of Joan in it, of which neither Gaguin nor Paulus Æmilius makes any mention. He acknowledges that du Haillan confeſſed that ſome deny what is ſaid of her. He thinks Stephen Paſquier is more to be blamed, who ought in his excellent Reſearches to have ſought after truth, that he might not pollute with ſuch filth the beauty of his writings (158): for after ſo many authorities and ſtrong reaſons as I had already publiſhed, the name of Pope Joan could not ſubſiſt in the world. He afterwards cenſures the Hiſtorian de Serres, who alledging the ſole authority of Platina has interpolated that paſſage, and has retrenched the it is ſaid and theſe words, that this ſtory has been left by authors unknown and of little credit. One may juſtly tell him, he ought to alledge authors fairly, and not to cite by halves.

As de Serres was a miniſter, I grant he cannot ſerve as a teſtimony againſt Moreri, who without doubt meant only to ſpeak of French Catholics; but the other writers, whom Remond quotes, have all that is neceſſary to furniſh me with a good proof. I can cite beſides thoſe, the author of l'Arbre des Batailles (159), and Martin Franc (160), and Nicolas Gilles (161), and Raviſius Textor (162), and the preſident Fauchet (163), &c. I do not know whether I ought to add du Verdier Vau-Privas, who relates at great length (164) the ſtory, without affirming or denying it; but however he ſhews he thinks it very doubtful.

[I] This multitude of teſtimonies cannot paſs for a proof, ſince the moſt antient is poſterior by two hundred years, ... and is inconſiſtent with . . . . the cotemporary authors.] Thoſe, who refute the ſtory of the She-Pope, make it evident that ſhe cannot be placed between Leo IV, and Benedictus III. They give chronological demonſtrations of it, which they ſupport by clear paſſages from the authors of the IXth century. Whence it follows, that the firſt, who ſpoke of the She-Pope two ages after, deſerves no credit at all, and that thoſe, who after that ſpread the ſame thing, copied one another without running back to the true ſource, and without making any examination, and conſequently we ought not to rely on their great number. Blondel ſays the ſame thing in other words. ‘ So, ſays he (165), Marianus is the firſt and only ‘ fountain whence all the ſtreams of later writers flow, ‘ and I do not think (after having laid open their ‘ inexcuſable fault) there is any neceſſity to go fur- ‘ ther in the examination of thoſe who have only co- ‘ pied one from another, without knowing whether ‘ the firſt had been well grounded. Tho' the witneſſes ‘ ſhould riſe by hundreds, nay by thouſands, to give ‘ depoſitions digeſted in this manner, there is not an ‘ honeſt man that would have any regard, either to ‘ their number, which ought never to counter-balance ‘ truth and reaſon, or to their diſcourſe, which in ‘ effect would be only the eccho of the firſt reveries, ‘ that might have been very eaſily convicted of im- ‘ pertinence and falſhood, if thoſe who undertook it ‘ had had more inclination to ſtudy the Hiſtory of ‘ the IXth century, than to exerciſe that abuſive elo- ‘ quence, which St Jerom in his time had called cani- ‘ nam facundiam, ſnarling eloquence.’ Some pages after he relates ſeveral examples of falſe traditions, and particularly that of the ſiege of Paris, under the reign of Lewis ſirnamed the debonaire, by the giant Iſaurus whoſe burying-place is ſhewn in the monaſtery of St Germains (166); and afterwards he concludes thus: ‘ Let (166) Ibid. pag. 93, 94. ‘ it ſuffice us, that all theſe ſtories are ſtories and no ‘ more; that though all the world ſhould hold them ‘ for oracles, it would not be in their power to change ‘ their nature; and, on the other hand, though ‘ truth (oppreſſed by the tyranny of prejudices, and ‘ braved by the vanity of romances, and betray- ‘ ed by the forgetfulneſs or cowardice of men) ſhould ‘ be for ſome time forſaken and deſpiſed, neither it's ‘ ſolitude could turn to it's ſhame, nor the efforts of ‘ it's enemies make it loſe it's dignity, nor the fair ‘ appearance of fables eclipſe it's divine light (167). (167) Ibid. pag. 94. ‘ . . . . Since then it is found ſo clear on the ſide of ‘ authors, who wrote between the years of our Lord ‘ 850 and 1050, ſince all their depoſitions agreeing ‘ together compoſe a well adjuſted body, and ſet forth ‘ the events, which are the matter in controverſy, ‘ with as great a brightneſs as if they had been drawn ‘ with a beam of the ſun, and ſince the later writers ‘ are full of contradictions and inconſiſtencies, both ‘ with thoſe that went before and with themſelves; ‘ methinks their opinion (whatever length of time it ‘ may boaſt of) deſerves no better treatment than to ‘ be (by the common voice of all who will hearken ‘ to reaſon) condemned as falſe coin (168).’ (168) Ibid. pag. 95.

The particular nature of the ſtory of the She-Pope diminiſhes much the weight of the great number of writers that have ſpoken of it. It is a caſe that is very uncommon, ſtrange, and ſingular in all it's circumſtances. It is of uſe to thoſe who give liſts of women that are either learned, or leud, or have diſguiſed their ſex. It is of ſervice to ſuch, as colleſt examples of the judgments of GOD, and ſuch as employ themſelves in writing diverting ſtories. All ſorts of authors might make ſome advantage of it. We are not to wonder then that ſo many people have thruſt it into their writings, and pretended at the ſame time it was true. One does not much examine the traditions that may ſerve for an ornament to the ſubject one treats of.

We have ſeen above (169) ſome circumſtances, which in this affair give great force to the negative argument. (169) In the remark [G].

[K] Colomiés cenſures Blondel . . . . He ſhews that an Hiſtorian who lived before Martinus Polonus has related . . . . but in the main this rather favours than hurts the opinion of Blondel.] ‘ Mr Blondel is much ‘ miſtaken in thinking that the life of this woman, ‘ as it is in the Anaſtaſius of the king's library, was ‘ framed in the very words of Martinus Polonus. ‘ For how can that be? Since Gervaſius Tilberienſis, ‘ an author more ancient by a hundred years than ‘ Martinus Polonus, in a piece, intituled, Otia Impe- ‘ rialia, written for the diverſion of the emperor ‘ Otho IV, which I have read in MS. at Mr Voſ- ‘ ſius's, relates the life of the She-Pope in the ſame ‘ terms as the Anaſtaſius of the king's library; adding ‘ only that this She-Pope was found in few Chronicles, ‘ Et in paucis Chronicis, ſays he, invenitur. If Mr ‘ Blondel had ſeen this author, perhaps he would ‘ have ſtopped his pen; but he was not known to ‘ him

(155) That of Poitiers, by Enguilbert de Marnef, 1557, in folio.

(156) Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitaine, Part ii, folio m. 60.

(157) There you find the words and things related by Remond: ſee leaf 66, of the edition of Paris 1538, by Nicolas Couteau, in folio.

(158) Paſquier ſpeaks of it in his Recherches, livr. iii, ch. iv, p. m. 165, & ch. vii, p. 178, & livr. vi, ch. v, pag. 465; but making good uſe of this cenſure of Remond, he wrote a long letter (in the 12th book, pag. m. 829, & ſeq.) in which he turned to the negative.

(159) See the remark [B], of the article FRANK.

(160) See the remark [A] of his article.

(161) In the Annales de France.

(162) In Officina.

(163) In the Antiquitez Françoiſes, in the Life of Charles the Bald, folio 53, Edit. of Paris 1602, in 8*vo.*

(164) In the 3d Tome of his Proſopographie, pag. 1667, & ſeq.

(165) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. pag. 70, 71.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the origin of it, and have alledged ſeveral conjectures. Some ſay, Pope John VIII diſcovered ſo much cowardice in the cauſe of Photius, that people thought he ſhould rather be called a woman than a man (r). This is the opinion of Baronius. But Aventinus imagines the fable aroſe on occaſion that John IX was created Pope by the intereſt of Theodora a noble and imperious whore (s), whoſe minion he was. Onufrius Panvinius thinks that Pope John XII, carrying with him a herd of ſtrumpets, among others cheriſhed Joan Rainiere; and becauſe ſhe governed him abſolutely, ſhe was afterwards in rallery called the She-Pope (t). Bellarmin will have it that the fable had its riſe from a current report, that a woman had been Patriarch of Conſtantinople (u). Allatius maintains that one Thiota, who ſet up for a propheteſs in Germany in the IXth century, was the occaſion of the ſtory. Blondel, having refuted theſe conjectures, declares that one ought not to exerciſe one's wit in fruitleſs inquiries about a ſubject that is not worth the while (x). What would become of us, adds he (y), were it neceſſary for us to gueſs, what the authors of ſo many romances, which to this day find credit among the vulgar, are grounded upon? He gives ſeveral inſtances of it. I do not think he had reaſon to reject all that is conjectured about the original of the romance of the She-Pope. I will be bold to ſay, that the Proteſtants who have ſo much exclaimed againſt him, and conſidered him as a falſe brother, have neither been equitable, or have well underſtood the intereſts of their own party. It is of little moment to them, whether this woman ever exiſted or not: a miniſter, who is none of the moſt tractable, owns it (z). But it concerns them much not to give occaſion to be looked upon, as an obſtinate ſet of people, that will never ſwerve in the leaſt from the opinions they have pre-conceived. They might juſtly have objected the ſtory of the She-Pope before it was refuted. They were not the inventers of it: they found it in ſeveral books written by good Papiſts: but after it was refuted with the ſtrongeſt arguments, they ought to have abandoned it, and not to have uſed all their induſtry to keep up the diſpute; for this was to point out to their adverſaries the method of conteſting all facts, and to countenance them in the tradition, which ſays there was one Cyriacus a Pope that abdicated the Popedom, in order to go to ſeek for martyrdom at the head of eleven thouſand virgins (aa). If they had imitated Blondel, they would have been able to have ſhewn by a notable example, that they ſubmit to reaſon, and that they are wrongfully accuſed of obſtinacy [L]. They would have been able to boaſt, that they do not maintain the other diſputes through a ſpirit of contradiction; but becauſe pertinent anſwers are not made to the difficulties they propoſe (bb). Launoi, and ſome other writers who oppoſe ill grounded traditions, diſpleaſe many, and

(r) Blondel, ubi ſupra, pag. 85.

(s) Ibid. pag. 87.

(t) Ibid. pag. 88.

(u) Pope Leo IX attempts it, Epiſt. I, chap. xxiii. See Blondel, ibid. pag. 89. Compare with this what Father Mabillon relates in his Muſæum Italicum, Tom. i, pag. 27, and conſult Spanheim. de Papa fœmina, pag. 12, & ſeq.

(x) Blondel, Eclairciſſement, &c. pag. 92.

(y) Ibid. pag. 93.

(z) Mr Jurieu: his words will be ſeen in the remark [G].

(aa) See Launoi, Epiſt. viii, Part iv, p. mihi 356, where he compares this tradition with that of the She-Pope.

(bb) See upon all this the remark [G].

' him no more than Amalricus Augerii, who lived ' in the year 1362, and who wrote a Chronicle of ' the Popes, dedicated to Urban V, wherein he ſpeaks ' of the She-Pope in theſe words: ' Joannes dictus ' Anglicus, natione magnanimus (I believe it ſhould ' be Maguntinus) poſt dominum Leonem papam in ' Romanum Pontificatum fuit aſſumptus; & poſt B. ' Petrum apoſtolum ponitur papa centeſimus decimus. ' - - - John, ſirnamed the Engliſh, a native of Mayence, ' was made Pope after Leo; and is reckoned the hun- ' dred and tenth Pope from St Peter the apoſtle.' The learned Scriverius had this author in manuſcript (170). I ſhall obſerve two things upon this paſſage. Firſt, that Gervaſe of Tilburi was not prior to Martin Polonus by a hundred years; for he dedicated his book to Otho IV (171), who was choſen emperor in the year 1198, and died in the year 1218. Blondel ſays that Martin Polonus died about the year 1270. It was in the year 1278 as Voſſius has proved it (172). My ſecond remark is, that if Blondel had known that Gervaſe of Tilburi ſpoke of the She-Pope in the words of the manuſcript of Anaſtaſius, that, as Mr Colomiés ſuppoſes, would not have hindered him from refuting the ſtory of this woman; for on the contrary he would have had ſomething to confirm him in his opinion. He would have ſaid that Martin Polonus drew from a bad fountain, to wit, a Chronicle deſigned to divert and entertain the emperor, and filled for that purpoſe with a thouſand ridiculous ſtories. Thus Gabriel Naudé diſcredits all that the ſame Martin Polonus has reported of the Magic of Pope Sylveſter II; for it is certain he has tranſlated all he ſaid of it in his Chronological Computations from this Galfridus who lived about the year 1150, and from one Gervaſius who was Orator of the city of Arles, and Chancellor to the emperor Otho III (173), but as for the reſt, the greateſt forger of fables and the moſt notorious liar that ever put pen to paper, as there would be no reaſon to doubt it after the bare reading of the book which he wrote de Ociis Imperatoris, where every thing he ſays is ſo extravagant, and ſo remote from reaſon and poſſibility, ordinary and extraordinary, that the Fables of Æſop and the Tales of Amadis are a hundred times more credible (174). Let us remember the fables he has related of the pretended Magic of Virgil, and how Naudé cenſured him for it (175). Martin Polonus owns that Gervaſe, that is Gervaſe of Tilburi (176), is one of thoſe from whom he took the materials of his Chronicle.

[L] That they are wrongfully accuſed of obſtinacy.] We have ſeen in remark [G] ſome reflexions, which tend to ſhew, that the diſputes about the She-Pope adminiſter to the Roman Catholics an occaſion to affirm, that the Proteſtants are obſtinate. Perhaps ſome readers might pretend I ſpoke ſo only by conjecture. This induces me to give here ſome practical proofs of what they would have paſs for meer ſpeculations. A Capuchin preacher, who put out a book of controverſy, in the year 1611, averred (177), that one cannot better repreſent the humour and way of our miniſters who meddle with writing, than by applying what St Athanaſius, tired with confounding, without converting, the Heretics of his time, ſaid of them †, tho' they be confuted, they will never yield. Tho' they have nothing new to ſay, yet are they not aſhamed; but bold, as leud women, they become impudent in their impieties in ſpite of all (178). ' A clear anſwer is made to ' the Miniſters, continues the Capuchin, and without ' leaving room for a juſt reply to their doubts or impoſtures. They are made to ſee with their eyes, to ' hear with their ears, to feel with their hands, that ' their objections are falſe: that their hiſtories are ' fables: that their prepoſſeſſions are unreaſonble. ' No matter, they ſtill repeat their fancies as quite ' new, without ſhame, without reaſon, without con' ſcience. Provided they fill their books with ſuch ' old paltry ſtuff, and impoſe upon ſome fool, they ' are ſatisfied. They make it appear that the wiſe ' man had reaſon to ſay ‡: Though thou ſhouldeſt bray ' a fool in a mortar among wheat with a peſtil, yet will ' not his fooliſhneſs depart from him (179).'

Now ſee by what example he endeavours to prove this unjuſt accuſation. ' It is impoſſible for theſe to ' reply to the ſolid diſcourſes, the clear reaſons, and ' unexceptionable evidences, that the Catholics have a ' thouſand times produced, to ſhew that what their ' fathers thought fit to ſay of Pope Joan is a meer ' ſtory, and a vile calumny. Mr Caſaubon, the moſt ' learned of all the pretended Reformers, who by his ' good

(170) Colomiés, Mélanges Hiſtor. pag. 57, 58. See the words of Blondel in the remark [A], citation (2).

(171) Theodor. a Niem. lib. ii, de Schiſm. cap. xix, pag. m. 97.

(172) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 486.

(173) He ſhould have Otho IV.

(174) Naudé, Apolog. des grands Hommes, ch. xix, pag. m. 558, 559.

(175) See the remark [I], of the article VIRGIL.

(176) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 486.

(177) Silveſtre de Laval Prédicateur Capucin, les juſtes Grandeurs de l'Egliſe Romaine, livr. iii, chap. v, p. 68, 69.

† Athanaſ. Orat. iv, contr. Arrian. Οὔτε γὰρ ἐλεγχόμενοι παύονται, οὔτε ἀπορούμενοι ἐντρέπονται, ἀλλ' ὡς ὕβρις πορνικὸς, ἀπηναισχύντισαν πρὸς πάντας ἦν τοῖς ἀσεβείαις.

(178) Silv. de Laval, ubi ſupra, pag. 68.

‡ Prov. xxvii, 22.

(179) Ibid. pag. 69.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and do credit to their church; for after that, it cannot be accuſed of oppreſſing people about ſuch kind of ſubjects. On the contrary, thoſe, who are ſtiff in defending theſe traditions, do but diſgrace it.

‡ Onufr. apud Platin. Annot. ad John VIII.

(180) In chap. xxvii, of the 2d part of his Theatre de l'Antichriſt, printed in the year 1610, in folio, and reprinted in 8vo, in the year 1613.

(181) Silveſtre de Laval, ubi ſupra, pag. 69, 70.

* 2 Tim. iv, 3, 4.

 1 Tim. iv, 7.

(182) Silv. de Laval, livr. iii, pag. 86, 87.

'good literature has acquired moderation, and the friendſhip of ſeveral perſons of honour and learning, particularly of Thuanus, laughs at the fable. I have heard them both agree together in ſaying, that after reading the Annotation of Onuphrius, upon the life of John the eighth in Platina ‡, it is impoſſible to believe that this imaginary Joan could ever have exiſted, as the ignorant ſay. Since that, Onuphrius, Bellarmin, Genebrard, Florimond de Remond, and fifty other Catholics have writ upon the ſame ſubject, and made the thing ſo clear, that men ought never to be believed, if that can be called in queſtion. After which, however, the little Vignier (180) has repeated this nonſenſe, in order to ſwell his ſeditious book. His Theatre, which was to be a large heap of the ſlanders of his whole cauſe, would not have been compleat without this falſehood. What ſhall we do to him? What ſhall we ſay both to him and thoſe who give credit to him, except what they ſing in their aſſemblies:'

O cruel ſons of men, how long
Will ye love vanities?
How long my glory turn to ſhame,
And follow after lies (181)?

After that, he ſpends ſixteen pages in refuting this old tradition, and concludes with theſe words: 'It is then for want of modeſty and ſenſe, and of true or probable objections, that the Miniſters, after ſo much certainty and clearneſs, dare repeat to us this piece of folly. I think, without doing them injuſtice, it may be ſaid of them, and thoſe who believe them, that they fullfil what the Apoſtle foretold was to come to paſs *. The time will come when they will not endure ſound doctrine; but after their own luſts ſhall they heap to themſelves teachers, having itching ears. And they ſhall turn away their ears from the truth, and ſhall be turned unto fables. But as to this point, whoever has the ſpirit and fear of GOD, will remember what the ſame St Paul wrote to Timothy at another time , Refute profane and old wives fables, and exerciſe thyſelf rather unto godlineſs: for in conſcience, one cannot call the Miniſters Hiſtory of Joan any other, than a profane fable, and an old woman's ſtory (182).'

Theſe two quotations of Scripture are ſufficient to ſhew that he did not abound in judgment; for they may be applied againſt his own church, which for ſome ages did not queſtion this fable. A Proteſtant, whom I have cited before, alledges this credulity as a proof of the Antichriſtianiſm of the Popiſh communion. 'Nec quando hanc foveo ſententiam (non extitiſſe Papiſſam) patrocinor Papiſmo at Babyloni adulor. Abſit. quicquid alii ſentiant, meam opinionem ei confundendæ, præ altera ſervire credo. Quod enim à pluribus ſeculis Papani conſtanter crediderint, Johannam Papiſſam Eccleſiæ præfuiſſe, completum eſt vaticinum Apoſtoli, 2 Theſſ. ii. minantis iis efficaciam erroris, immittendam à Deo, ad hoc ut crederent mendacio (183). - - - - Nor by maintaining this opinion (that there was no She-Pope) do I plead for Popery, or careſs Babylon. God forbid. Whatever others think, I believe my opinion tends more to confound her than the other. For ſince the Papiſts, for ſeveral ages, have conſtantly believed, that Pope Joan governed the church, the prophecy of the Apoſtle was accompliſhed, 2 Theſſ. ii. ver. 11. threatening, that God would ſend them ſtrong deluſion, that they ſhould believe a lie.'

(183) Martin. Schoockius, in Præfat. Fabulæ Hamelenſis, folio xii.

(184) *Ἱ νῦν ἡ ἐπὶ τῷ, aut hanc aut ſuper hac: ταῦτα οὕτως, ἢ μὴ γένοιτο, aut hanc ſerva aut peri. Plut. in Inſtitut. Lacon., pag. 141, F.

(184) The Lord forbid it me (anſwered Naboth to king Ahab who wanted to buy his vineyard) that I ſhould give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee. 1 Kings xxi, 3.

I cannot help ſaying, that the words of Athanaſius, quoted by the Capuchin, are a common-place, which all parties provide themſelves with, to decry the obſtinacy of their adverſaries. They might be retorted upon this Capuchin; for how many things did he advance, which had been a thouſand times refuted? A certain ſpirit of contradiction reigns every where more or leſs, that will not ſuffer people to renounce their former arguments. They ſeem to conſider them, as if they had received them under the ſame condition, that ſome women of Lacedæmon preſcribed when they gave their ſons the buckler, rather die than loſe it (184). Let us uſe another compariſon. They ſeem to look upon them as an inviolable truſt, or as a talent that one is charged to improve under the penalty of a curſe, or, in fine, as an intailed eſtate from father to ſon, and of ſuch a kind, that one muſt be as delicate as Naboth was concerning alienation (185). However it be, there are a thouſand diſputes, wherein the weakeſt reaſonings always recur; refute them never ſo much, they are like nature, which the ſtrokes of a fork cannot expel (186), or thoſe troubleſome inſects, which are the more eager to purſue us, the more we try to drive them away (187). Wiſe diſputants do not act after this manner: their prejudice is not ſo great as to hinder them from diſcerning what is ſtrong, and what is weak, and they imitate good warriors, who abandon ſuch poſts as it would be of no ſervice to defend.

(185) Naturam expellas furca licet uſque recurret. Horat. Epiſt. X, ver. 24. lib. i.

(187) Father le Tellier ſays this of the adverſaries of the Jeſuits in the Défenſe des nouveaux Chrétiens, pag. 28. Add to that the verſe of Horace, Sat. V, lib. II, ver. 83. Ut cornicis nunc aſſervicula quam abſterrere-tur uncto. Like dogs once blooded for wolf never leave.

(a) And not Poclain, as in Moreri.

POQUELIN (a) (JOHN BAPTIST) a famous Comedian, known by the name of MOLIERE, the ſon of a Valet de Chambre, Tapeſtry-maker to the king, was born at Paris about the year 1620. He went through his ſchool-learning under the Jeſuits in Clermont-college. He was deſigned for the bar, but after he had made an end of his ſtudy of the Civil-Law he pitched upon the profeſſion of a Comedian, having a very ſtrong inclination for Comedy (b), and being entirely bent upon the ſtage. His firſt play was l'Etourdi, which he expoſed to the public view at Lyons in the year 1653. Being ſome time after in Languedoc, he offered his ſervices to the prince of Conti, who received him very kindly, gave an allowance to his company, and took him into his ſervice, as well for himſelf, as for the ſtates of Languedoc. Having ſpent the Carnaval at Grenoble in the year 1658, he went and ſettled at Rouen, where he ſtaid all the ſummer; and having made ſome journeys to Paris privately, he had the good luck to pleaſe the king's brother, who granting him his protection, and making his company his own, introduced him in that quality to the king and the queen-mother. That company began to appear before their majeſties and the whole court the twenty-fourth of October 1658, upon a ſtage ſet up on purpoſe in the hall of the guards of the old Louvre, and were well approved, ſo that his majeſty gave orders for their ſettlement at Paris. The hall of the Petit Bourbon was granted them, to act by turns with the Italian Players. In October 1660 the hall of the royal palace was granted them (c). Moliere obtained a penſion of a thouſand livres in 1663. His company was altogether in his majeſty's ſervice in the year 1665, and he continued all the remaining part of his life to give new plays, which were very much applauded. His laſt comedy was Le Malade Imaginaire. It was acted for the fourth time on the ſeventeenth of February 1673, and he died the ſame day [A]. This is what I have taken from his life, prefixed to his

(b) See the remark [G].

(c) See the remark [H].

[A] And he died the ſame day.] The chief perſon repreſented in Moliere's laſt play, is a ſick man who pretends to be dead. Moliere repreſented that perſon, and conſequently was obliged in one of his ſcenes to act the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his works. Perhaps I have done a needleſs thing, for that book is more known and read than this Dictionary will ever be, and therefore what I tranſcribe out of that life will be no new thing to any body. I have been told of a thing by ſeveral people, which is not to be found in it, viz. that he turned Comedian only to be near an actreſs, with whom he was very much in love. Let the reader gueſs whether this particular was omitted becauſe it was not true, or for fear of doing him ſome prejudice. Many are of opinion, that his plays exceed or equal the nobleſt performances of that kind in ancient Greece and Rome [B]. It is no wonder that he did ſo well ſucceed in deſcribing the jars of married people, and the uneaſineſs of huſbands that are jealous, and have the part of a dead man. It has been ſaid by a great many people, that he expired in that part of his play, and that when he was to make an end of it, in order to ſhew that it was only a feint, he could neither ſpeak, nor get up, being actually dead. This ſingularity was looked upon as very wonderful, and afforded the Poets plentiful matter for witty conceits and ingenious allusions; which, in all probability was the reaſon why that ſtory was ſo much credited. Nay, ſome gave a ſerious turn to their thoughts, and made many moral reflexions upon that incident. But the truth is, Moliere did not die in ſuch a manner: he had time enough, tho' very ſick, to make an end of his part, as it appears from this paſſage of his life. 'The 17th of 'February 1673 (1), on which le Malade Imaginaire 'was acted a fourth time, he was ſo much troubled 'with his defluxion, that he had much ado to act his 'part; he made an end of it in great pain, and the 'ſpectators were ſenſible that he was very far from 'being what he acted: for indeed when the comedy 'was over, he went home, and was ſcarce got to bed, 'when his continual cough increaſed ſo violently, that 'one of the veins of his lungs broke. He no ſooner 'found himſelf in that condition, but he bent all his 'thoughts upon heavenly things; and immediately he 'loſt his ſpeech, and in half an hour's time was ſtifled 'by the great quantity of blood that ran out at his 'mouth (2).' But I muſt inform the reader that if ſome other writers are to be credited, Moliere was not able to hold out till the play was over. 'Moliere ... 'died in a very ſurprizing manner. He had been in-'diſpoſed for a long time; which was aſcribed to the 'trouble his wife gave him, but more ſtill to his great 'application. One day being to act le Malade Imagi-'naire, a new piece at that time, and the laſt he had 'made, he was taken very ill before he began it, and 'was like to put it off on account of his illneſs. 'Nevertheleſs, conſidering the great number of ſpecta-'tors, and being unwilling to ſend them away, he 'ſtrained himſelf, and acted his part almoſt to the 'end, without perceiving that his illneſs increaſed upon 'him. But when he came to that part of the play, 'wherein he counterfeited a dead man, he happened 'to be ſo weak, that it was thought he was really 'dead, and they had much ado to make him ſtand up. 'They adviſed him to go to bed, but he choſe rather 'to make an end; and the play being far advanced, 'he thought he could go through it without much pre-'judice to himſelf. But his zeal for the public was 'attended with a ſad conſequence to him; for as he was 'ſpeaking of Rheubarb and Sena, in the ceremony of 'the Phyſicians, ſome blood came out at his mouth, at 'which the ſpectators, and his friends being very 'much frighted, he was immediately carried home, 'and his wife followed him into his chamber, pre-'tending to be very much afflicted. But every thing 'they did to relieve him proved ineffectual, and 'he died in a few hours, having loſt all his blood, 'which came out at his mouth in great plenty (3).' The Poets, as I have already ſaid, took hold of that occaſion to ſhew their wit: they handed about a great many ſmall pieces: 'but of all thoſe that were made 'upon Moliere's death, none was better approved 'than theſe four Latin verſes; which they have thought 'fit to preſerve.

(1) Correct in Moreri 1672. I take occaſion to obſerve that in the ſame article it ought to be Poiſſon, and not Poiſſons.

(2) Life of Moliere prefixed to his works. I make uſe of the Bruſſels edition 1694.

(3) See the book, intituled, La fameuſe Comedienne, ou Hiſtoire de la Guerin, aupavant femme & veuve de Moliere, pag. 38, 39.

Roſcius hic ſitus eſt triſti Molierus in urnâ,
Cui genus humanum ludere, ludus erat.
Dum ludit mortem, Mors indignata jocantem
Corripit, & mimum fingere ſæva negat (4).

(4) Vie de Moliere, fol. * 3.

Here Moliere lies, the Roſcius of his age,
Whoſe pleaſure, while he liv'd, was to engage

With human nature in a comic ſtrife,
And perſonate her actions to the life.
But ſurly death, offended at his play,
Would not be jok'd with in ſo free a way.
He, when he mimick'd him, his voice reſtrain'd,
And made him act in earneſt what he feign'd.

I add a French epitaph (5) to thoſe Latin verſes:

(5) It is in the firſt Tome of the Mercure Galant, for the year 1673. There are in it ſeveral other ſuch pieces, with a funeral oration in proſe, which is ſomewhat waggiſh.

Cy git qui parut ſur la Scene
Le ſinge de la vie humaine,
Qui n'aura jamais ſon égal,
Qui voulant de la Mort, ainſi que de la Vie,
Eſtre l'imitateur dans une Comedie,
Pour trop bien reüſſir, y reüſſit fort mal;
Car la Mort en eſtant ravie,
Trouva ſi belle la copie,
Qu'elle en fit un original.

Within this melancholy tomb confin'd,
Here lies the matchleſs ape of human kind;
Who, while he labour'd with ambitious ſtrife
To mimick death as he had mimick'd life,
So well or rather ill perform'd his part,
That death, delighted with his wondrous art,
Snatch'd up the copy, to the grief of France,
And made it an original at once.

[B] Many are of opinion that his plays exceed or equal the nobleſt performances of that kind in ancient Greece and Rome.] Mr Perrault diſpleaſed many people by contradicting thoſe who ſay, that no modern author can be compared with Homer and Virgil, Demoſthenes and Cicero, Ariſtophanes and Terence, Sophocles and Euripides. This diſpute has occaſioned on both ſides ſeveral books, which contain very good things. But we have not ſeen hitherto the anſwer to Mr Perrault's Parallel, nor do we know when it will come out. I think I may ſay that among the productions of the pen, there are few things, wherein ſo many people have acknowledged the ſuperiority of our age, as in the comical pieces. Perhaps the reaſon of it is, that the beauties and niceties of Ariſtophanes are not known to all thoſe who are ſenſible of Moliere's wit and charms; for it ought to be granted, that in order to paſs a right judgment upon the comic Poets of Greece, it were neceſſary to be throughly acquainted with the faults of the Athenians. There is a ridicule common to all times and people, and a ridicule peculiar to certain ages and nations. Some ſcenes of Ariſtophanes, which appear dull to us, did, perhaps, wonderfully pleaſe the Athenians, becauſe they knew the fault he ridiculed. Perhaps, it was a fault altogether unknown to us, a ridicule conſiſting in ſome particular facts, and in a tranſient and common taſte of that time, of which we can have no notion, though we are able to read the originals. Theſe obſtacles do not permit us to admire that Poet according to his merit, neither in Greek nor in Latin, nor in the French verſions, though never ſo faithful and polite. Moliere is not liable to this inconveniency, we know what he aims at, and eaſily diſcover whether he deſcribes well the ridicule of the age we live in; when he ſucceeds in any thing, it cannot eſcape us. Nay, he ſeems to be more copious than Ariſtophanes and Terence, as to thoſe thoughts and nice railleries, of which all ages and polite nations are ſenſible. This is a very conſiderable prerogative; for it cannot be ſaid, that our age has not a true reliſh of the fine paſſages of the Latin Poets. If you ſhew ſome thoughts

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google have reaſon to be ſo: for it is ſaid, he knew it by experience as well as any man in the world [C]. This is what I find in a printed book, out of which I ſhall give ſome paſſages (d). What is moſt ſtrange is, that there has been a report that his wife was his own daughter (e). He made verſes with a wonderful facility (f); but he took too much of Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, &c. to ingenious ladies in old French, if you tranſlate them faithfully, though never ſo coarſely, they will tell you that thoſe thoughts are fine, delicate, and nice. There are ſome beauties of wit in faſhion at all times: one would think that Moliere is more copious in that reſpect than the ancient comic Poets. He has ſome beauties that would vaniſh away in a tranſlation, or in a country of a different taſte from that of France; but he has many others that would be preſerved in all ſorts of tranſlations, and approved whatever the taſte of the readers might be, provided they underſtood the eſſence of a good thought. See the article AMPHITRYO (6).

(d) See the remark [C].

(e) See the remark [C].

(f) See the 3d Satire of Deſpreaux.

(6) Remark [B].

[C] It is ſaid that he knew by experience the uneaſineſs of huſbands that are jealous, or have reaſon to be ſo.] I have read in a ſmall book printed in the year 1688, That (7) Moliere was leſs praiſed than his wife was courted; that ſhe was the daughter of the deceaſed Mrs Bejard, a country actreſs, who made many young ſparks of Languedoc happy when her daughter was born. And therefore, adds the author, it were a very difficult thing to know who was her father among ſo many galants: all that we know of it is, that her mother affirmed, ſhe never admitted any but perſons of quality, except Moliere, and that therefore her daughter was of a very noble blood. And indeed the only thing ſhe recommended to her all along, was to proſtitute herſelf to none but the beſt ſort of people. Moliere was thought to be her father, though he married her afterwards; however the truth of it is not well known. . . . . (8) Moliere married young Mrs Bejard ſome time after he had ſettled his company at Paris: He made ſome pieces for the ſtage, and among others La Princeſſe d'Elide, wherein his wife, who acted the part of the princeſs, (9) ſhone ſo brightly, that he had all the reaſon in the world to repent his having expoſed her in the middle of all the ſprightly youth of the court. For ſhe was hardly got to the chamber, where the king gave that entertainment, but ſhe fell deſperately in love with the count de Guiche, and the count de Lauzun fell deſperately in love with her. . . . . Moliere was made ſenſible (10), that the great care he took to pleaſe the public, kept him from obſerving how his wife behaved herſelf; and that whilſt he made it his buſineſs to divert every body, every body made it their buſineſs to divert his wife. Jealouſy awakened his tenderneſs, which had lain aſleep by reaſon of his application to ſtudy: he immediately went and made great complaints to his wife, telling her in a reproachful manner, how carefully he had brought her up, how he had ſtifled his paſſion, how he had behaved himſelf towards her, more like a lover than a huſband, and that to reward him for ſo many kindneſſes, ſhe made him ridiculous to the whole court. His wife fell a weeping, and confeſſed to him, that ſhe had had an inclination for the count de Guiche; but ſhe ſwore, that the only fault ſhe was guilty of conſiſted in the intention: ſhe added, that he ſhould forgive the firſt fault of a young woman who for want of experience will be apt to make ſuch ſteps; but that the kindneſs ſhe was ſenſible he had for her, would prevent, for the time to come, her being guilty of ſuch a weakneſs. Moliere being perſuaded of her virtue by her tears, begged her pardon a thouſand times for the anger he had expreſſed, and gently repreſented to her, that a good conſcience was not ſufficient to preſerve one's reputation, but that one ſhould take care to do nothing that may occaſion ill reports, eſpecially in an age wherein people are ſo apt to think ill, and ſo little diſpoſed to judge favourably of things (11). She quickly began again her old trade more openly than ever . . . . (12). ‘ Moliere being informed of his ‘ wife's behaviour by ſome people, who were willing ‘ to make him uneaſy, renewed his complaints with ‘ more violence than he had done before, and even ‘ threatened to get her confined. That woman being ‘ provoked to the higheſt degree with his reproaches, ‘ wept and fell into a ſwoon. Her huſband, who ‘ was extremely fond of her, repented of having put ‘ her into that condition, and did his beſt to recover ‘ her ſpirits, intreating her to conſider, that nothing ‘ but love was the occaſion of his paſſion, and that ‘ ſhe might be ſenſible of the great power ſhe had ‘ over him, ſince, notwithſtanding all the reaſons he ‘ had to complain of her, he was ready to forgive ‘ her, provided ſhe would be more cautious for the ‘ time to come. One would think that ſuch an extraordinary huſband ſhould have made her ſenſible ‘ of her fault, and brought her off from her ill courſe; ‘ but his kindneſs produced a quite contrary effect. ‘ She thought ſhe had a fair opportunity of parting ‘ with him, and therefore ſhe ſpoke in a high ſtrain, ‘ and told him, that ſhe knew well enough from ‘ whom he had thoſe falſe ſtories; that ſhe was ‘ weary of being every day accuſed of a thing ſhe ‘ was not guilty of; that he might think of a ſeparation, and that ſhe could no longer endure a man, ‘ who was always intimate with Mrs de Brie (13), ‘ who lived in their houſe, and had never left it ſince ‘ they were married. The care that was taken to pacify Moliere's wife, proved ineffectual: From that ‘ very moment ſhe conceived an extreme averſion for ‘ him; and when he had a mind to make uſe of the ‘ privileges of a huſband, ſhe treated him with the ‘ utmoſt contempt. At laſt ſhe carried things to ſuch ‘ an extremity, that Moliere, who began to perceive ‘ her wicked inclinations, conſented to the ſeparation ‘ ſhe continually deſired ſince their quarrel; ſo that ‘ without a decree of parliament, they agreed to have ‘ no commerce with one another. But Moliere could ‘ not reſolve upon it without doing himſelf a great ‘ violence; and if his reaſon made him look upon his wife as a woman unworthy of the careſſes of ‘ an honeſt man, by reaſon of her ill conduct, his ‘ tenderneſs made him ſenſible, that he would hardly ‘ be able to ſee her without enjoying the privileges of ‘ a huſband. One day as he was thinking upon it ‘ in his garden at Auteuil, one of his friends, called ‘ Chapelle, who came to walk there by chance, accoſted him, and finding him more uneaſy than he ‘ uſed to be, aſked him ſeveral times the reaſon of it. ‘ Moliere being ſomewhat aſhamed of ſhewing ſo ‘ little conſtancy under a misfortune, that was ſo ‘ much in faſhion, held out as much as he could; but ‘ having then his heart full, a thing well known to ‘ thoſe that have been in love, he yielded to the deſire of eaſing himſelf, and ingenuouſly confeſſed to ‘ his friend, that the grief wherewith he was overwhelmed, proceeded from his being obliged to uſe ‘ his wife as he did. Chapelle, who thought he was ‘ above things of that nature, jeered him, and told ‘ him he wondered that a man, who knew ſo well ‘ how to repreſent the weak ſide of other men, ſhould ‘ be guilty of a weakneſs he blamed every day, and ‘ ſhewed him, that the moſt ridiculous of all was to ‘ love a woman, when her love is not reciprocal. ‘ For my part, added he, I muſt needs tell you that ‘ if I was ſo unhappy as to find myſelf in ſuch a condition, and if I was fully perſuaded that the woman ‘ I love grants ſome favours to others, I ſhould have ‘ ſuch a contempt for her, that it would infallibly ‘ cure my paſſion. You have a ſatisfaction you could ‘ not have if ſhe was your miſtreſs; and revenge, ‘ which commonly ſucceeds love in an injured lover, ‘ may make amends for all the uneaſineſs your wife ‘ gives you, ſince you need only get her ſhut up: ‘ and this will be a ſure way to quiet your mind. ‘ Moliere, who heard his friend quietly enough, interrupted him, and aſked whether he had ever been ‘ in love. Yes, replied Chapelle, I have been in love, ‘ as a man of ſenſe ought to be; but I ſhould not ‘ have been ſo much troubled for a thing which my ‘ happineſs ſhould have required from me, and I am ‘ aſhamed to ſee you ſo uncertain. I perceive, replied ‘ Moliere, that you have never been a true lover, and ‘ that you took the figure of love for love itſelf. I ‘ will not alledge many examples, whereby you might ‘ know the power of that paſſion, but ſhall only give ‘ you a faithful account of the perplexity I am in, to ‘ make you ſenſible how little a man is maſter of ‘ himſelf, when love has got it's uſual aſcendant over ‘ him. Wherefore, in anſwer to what you ſay, that ‘ I have a perfect knowledge of mens hearts, as it appears by the public deſcriptions I daily make of ‘ them, I confeſs that I have made it my chief ſtudy ‘ to

(7) Hiſtoire de la Guerin, aupatravant femme & veuve de Moliere, pag. 6.

(8) Ib. p. 12.

(9) Ib. p. 13.

(10) Ib. p. 16.

(11) Ib. p. 18.

(12) Ib. p. 19.

(13) She was an actreſs belonging to the company, which Moliere found ſettled at Lyons the firſt time he acted there. He fell in love with that woman, and was reciprocally loved by her, and got her into his company. Hiſtoire de la Guerin, pag. 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google much liberty in inventing new words and new expreſſions [D]: nay, he was very often guilty of barbariſms [E]. You will find in Mr Baillet (g) what judgment ought to be made of his talent.

(g) Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, Tom. v, n. 1520.

Some

'to know their weak ſide; but if I have learned that 'the danger may be ſhunned, experience has but too 'well taught me that it is impoſſible to avoid it: I 'judge of it every day by myſelf.' Afterwards he gives an account of his marriage, and after ſome reflexions, he adds (14), I am therefore reſolved to live with her as if ſhe was not my wife. But if you knew the anguiſh I am in, you would pity me: my paſſion is come to ſuch a pitch, that I cannot forbear being concerned for her; and when I conſider that it is impoſſible for me to overcome my affection for her, I am apt to fancy, that, perhaps, ſhe finds it no leſs difficult to conquer her inclinations to be a coquet, and I am more diſpoſed to pity her than to blame her. You will ſay that none but a Poet can love in ſuch a manner; but it is my opinion, that there is but one ſort of love, and that thoſe who have never been ſo nice, are perfect ſtrangers to true love. . . . . (15) Do not you wonder that my reaſon ſhould ſerve only to make me ſenſible of my weakneſs, without being able to conquer it? I muſt needs tell you, replied his friend, that you are more to be pitied than I thought: but I hope time will cure you; and I beſeech you to uſe your endeavours towards it.

(14) Ib. p. 28.

(15) Ib. p. 30.

Such was the fate of that wit. In the midſt of the acclamations of the whole court, ſhining with glory, and admired in France and in foreign countries, he was tormented with a thouſand domeſtic griefs. His marriage deprived him of his honour and quiet: nay, he could not have the ſatisfaction of hating his croſs, I mean the perſon who was the cauſe of ſo much vexation. He might have been told, Phyſician, cure thy ſelf: Moliere, you who give ſo much diverſion to the public, cannot you divert yourſelf? You laugh at every body, you give very good advice to the poor cuckolds, why do not you make uſe of it yourſelf firſt? Perhaps he ſaid a thouſand times, as Horace did (16), I had rather be accounted the meaneſt of all authors, than have ſo much wit, and live ſuch an uneaſy life.

(16) Prætulerim ſcriptor delirus inerſque videri, Dum mea delectent mala me vel denique fallant, Quam ſapere & ringi. Horat. lib. ii, Epiſt. II, ver 125.

[D] He took too much liberty in inventing new words and new expreſſions.] Take notice, that I only blame the exceſs of his liberty; for I do not deny but that he was often very happy in the uſe of it, and that it proved uſeful to our language. He introduced ſome phraſes and ſome words, that are very pleaſant; and if any Grammarian ſhould think otherwiſe of it, he would deſerve no better treatment than that ancient Grammarian, who cenſured the Poet Furius for inventing ſome words which ſhortened the diſcourſe, and had no harſhneſs in them that might offend nice ears. Read this paſſage of Aulus Gellius. 'Non 'hercle idem ſentio cum Cæſellio Vindice grammatico, ut mea opinio eſt, haud quaquam inerudito. 'Verum hoc tamen petulanter inſcitéque; quod Furium veterem poetam dedecoraſſe linguam Latinam 'ſcripſit hujuſcemodi vocum fictionibus, quæ mihi 'quidem neque abhorrere à poetica facultate viſæ ſunt, 'neque dictu profatuque ipſo tætræ aut infuaves eſſe; 'ſicuti ſunt quædam alia ab illuſtribus poetis ficta durè '& rancidè. Quæ reprehendit autem Cæſellius Furiana, hæc ſunt; quod terram in lutum verſam lutéſcere dixerit, & tenebras in noctis modum factas noctéſcere, &c (17). - - - I am not of the ſame opinion with Cæſellius Vindex, the Grammarian, whom otherwiſe I do not think unlearned. But there is a great deal of preſumption and ignorance in his ſaying that the old Poet Furius has diſfigured the Latin tongue by his new-invented words of this kind, which in my opinion are neither inconſiſtent with Poetry, nor harſh and unpleaſant in the pronunciation, as ſome other words are, which have been rudely coined by famous Poets. Thoſe which Cæſellius finds fault with in Furius, are as follows; luteſcere applied to earth, growing into clay, and noctéſcere applied to darkneſs, putting on the reſemblance of night, &c.' I muſt obſerve, that there is no better forge for new words than the ſtage; for when it produces any novelty in the language, that is well approved, a world of people will immediately take it up, and ſpread it far and near by their frequent repetitions. It cannot reaſonably be denied that good authors have a right to forge new words, for otherwiſe languages would always remain poor, barren, and weak. See Voſſius (18) and ſeveral other writers (19) upon this head. It ought therefore to be granted, generally ſpeaking, that Moliere had a right to enrich his dramatic pieces with new terms, conſidering the great reputation he had acquired in that way of writing: all that can be ſaid againſt him is, that he miſuſed his right; for it ought to be remembered, that the writers of ſuch pieces are not ſenſible of the poverty of a language, as thoſe who write upon dogmatical ſubjects. It ought to be confeſſed, ſays Mr Arnauld (20), that we are more ſenſible our language wants words, when we treat of ſciences, than when we ſpeak or write about common things. This he ſays in a preface, wherein he juſtifies the liberty he took to invent the words Philoſophiſme, Philoſophiſtes, and Advertance. It is certain, that a comic Poet is not ſo excuſable for inventing new words as a Philoſopher. The latter is forced to it by an indiſpenſable neceſſity. Read this complaint of Lucretius:

(17) Aulus Gellius, lib. xviii, cap. xi, pag. m. 494, 495.

(18) Voſſius, Inſtitut. Orator. lib. iv, cap. i, pag. m. 442.

(19) Theophilus Raynaud, de malis ac bonis Libris, n. 427, pag. m. 248, quotes many of them.

(20) Arnauld, Preface to the V Dénonciation du Péché Philoſophique.

Nec me animi fallit, Graïorum obſcura reperta
Difficile inluſtrare Latinis verſibus eſſe,
(Multa novis verbis præſertim cum ſit agendum,) Propter egeſtatem linguæ, & rerum novitatem (21);
. . . . . .
Nunc & Anaxagoræ ſcrutemur Homœomeriam,
Quam Græci memorant, nec noſtra dicere lingua
Concedit nobis patrii ſermonis egeſtas (22).

(21) Lucretius, lib. I, ver. 137.

(22) Ibid. ver. 830.

I'm ſenſible the Latin is too poor
To equal the waſt riches of the Grecian ſtore:
New matter various nature ſtill affords,
And new conceptions do require new words.
. . . . . .
Now let's examine with a curious eye
Anaxagoras his Philoſophy,
By copious Greece term'd Homœomery:
For which our Latin language, poor in words,
Not one expreſſive ſingle voice affords.

CREECH.

It was not by reaſon of the rules of quantity that he wanted words; for thoſe who wrote Philoſophical books in proſe did likewiſe complain of it. 'Quanta verborum nobis paupertas, imo egeſtas ſit, nunquam magis quam hodierno die intellexi. Mille res 'inciderunt, cum forte de Platone loqueremur, quæ 'nomina deſiderarent, nec haberent: quædam vero 'cum habuiſſent, faſtidio noſtro perdidiſſent. Quis 'autem ferat in egeſtate faſtidium (23). - - - I was never more ſenſible than I am to day of the great poverty or rather want of words in our language. While we were diſcourſing of Plato a thouſand things offered themſelves which had no names; and ſome had loſt what names they had formerly, by means of our diſtaſte. Now what can be more ridiculous than diſtaſte in the middle of want?' Obſerve, by the by, the two cauſes of the poverty of languages mentioned by Seneca: one is, that ſome words have not yet been found out; the other is, that ſeveral grow out of uſe. It is alſo to be obſerved, that the Romans even when they wrote nothing but epigrams, complained that they wanted words (24); from whence we may conclude, that Moliere was ſenſible of the ſame want, and therefore he might well have recourſe to invention. Laſtly, I obſerve, that the birth of one word is commonly the death of another (25). Which holds true, particularly in France; and therefore it cannot be expected that our language ſhould ever ceaſe to be poor.

(23) Seneca, Epiſt. LVIII, init. pag. m. 266.

(24) See Pliny the younger, Epiſt. XVIII, lib. iv.

(25) Juſt as in the productions of nature, generatio unius eſt corruptio alterius.

[E] He was very often guilty of barbariſms.] I might give a hundred inſtances of it, but I ſhall confine myſelf to two, which I take out of a piece prefixed to his works in ſome editions, wherein he thanks the king. He gives a wonderful turn to it, and perhaps it is the beſt ſmall piece that ever he

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Some pretend, that the glory of invention does not belong to Moliere, and that he made a good uſe of the comedies acted by the Italians at Paris [F]. Thoſe are in the wrong who ſay that Mr Boileau changed his note after the death of that great Comedian: if we may believe ſome ignorant Critics, he praiſed him in his life-time, and blamed him when he was in his grave. The truth is, that he continued to commend him after his deceaſe, only he found fault with him for humouring too much thoſe that ſat in the pit; which is a reaſonable cenſure in ſome reſpects, but unjuſt in the main [G]. Father Bouhours's verſes in Moliere's praiſe (b), are the beſt that ever he made, if we relie upon Menage's judgment (i). I do not know whether the Italians like he wrote. Mind theſe four verſes: he ſpeaks to his Muſe:

(b) You will find them in the 2d volume of Menage's obſervations upon the French language, pag. 15.

(i) Ibid. pag. 12.

Vous pourriez aiſément l'étendre (26),
Et parler des tranſports qu'en vous font éclater
Les ſuprenans bienfaits, que ſans les meriter
Sa liberale main ſur vous daigne repandre.

(26) C'eſt-à-dire, votre compliment.

The author's meaning is, that his Muſe received great favours, though ſhe did not deſerve them; but according to the grammatical ſenſe, thoſe verſes ſignify, that though the king did not deſerve thoſe favours, yet he beſtowed them upon Moliere's Muſe. And therefore this is a barbarous expreſſion. Here is another inſtance:

Les Muſes ſont de grandes prometeuſes,
Et comme vos ſœurs les cauſeuſes
Vous ne manqueriez pas ſans doute per le bec.

The author means, that his Muſe would be like her ſiſters, who are full of talk; but according to the literal ſenſe the plain and only meaning of thoſe words is, that ſhe would prove a very prattling Muſe, tho' her ſiſters are of a quite contrary humour. Obſerve, that by a barbariſm, I do not mean an expreſſion, or a word, taken from another language, and unknown to the French, but a diſpoſition of words againſt the rules, which is looked upon as barbarous by our beſt grammarians.

There is in the ſame poem Marquis repouſſable; which is a barbariſm. There is alſo prevenant amas; another barbariſm: for the word prevenant is only uſed in the figurative ſenſe, and does not denote a man, who goes before others.

[F] Some pretend . . . . . that he made a good uſe of the comedies acted by the Italians at Paris.] I ſhall not ſcruple to quote an anonymous book for this: it is printed, and therefore ſufficient to juſtify what I advance; for I am only to prove that ſome will have it, that the Italian comedies acted at Paris were Moliere's original. Read the following paſſage: Arlequin is brought in ſpeaking thus: 'If the Italian 'players had never appeared in France, perhaps Mo- 'liere had never been what he was. I know he was 'perfectly acquainted with the old comic Poets; but 'after all, he had his firſt notions from our ſtage. 'You know that his Cocu Imaginaire is il Ritratto of 'the Italians: Scaramouche interrupted in his love, 'produced his Facheux: his Contre-temps are only Ar- 'lequin, Valet étourdi, and ſo with moſt of his pieces: 'and in theſe latter times, is not his Tartuffe our Ber- 'nagaſſe. It is true, he excelled in his characters, 'and his comedies are ſo full of ſenſe, that they ſhould 'be read to young people as ſo many inſtructions, to 'give them a true notion of the world. And yet 'thoſe excellent Italian originals produce nothing 'now (27).'

(27) Livre ſans nom, divided into five dialogues, printed at Paris and in Holland in the year 1695, pag. 6, of the Dutch edition.

[G] Mr Boileau . . . . found fault with him for humouring too much thoſe that ſat in the pit; which is a reaſonable cenſure in ſome reſpects, but unjuſt in the main.] Moliere was dead when Mr Boileau praiſed him in one of his Epiſtles (28), as much, or more, than in the ſatire he had inſcribed to him (29). It is therefore a great piece of injuſtice to ſay, that he praiſed him out of policy, and for fear of being bantered by him upon the ſtage, if he ſhould ſay nothing to his advantage, or if he ſhould venture to criticize him. But, will ſome ſay, he criticized him when he had nothing to fear, and therefore the ſuſpicion entertained of him ſeems to be well grounded. I am not of that opinion; I believe that if he had made his Art Poëtique in Moliere's life-time, he would have inſerted in it the cenſure contained in the following verſes. It was, in a manner, eſſential to his ſubject; there is in it a very judicious obſervation, which ſhould be an inviolable rule, if comedies were only made to be printed; but becauſe they are chiefly deſigned to appear on the ſtage in the preſence of all ſorts of people, it is not juſt to require they ſhould be adapted to Mr Boileau's taſte. Theſe are his words.

(28) The VIIth.

(29) The IId.

Etudiez la Cour, & connoiſſez la ville,
L'une & l'autre eſt toûjours en modeles fertile.
C'eſt par là que Moliere illuſtrant ſes écrits
Peut-être de ſon Art eût remporté le prix;
Si moins ami du peuple en ſes doctes peintures,
Il n'eût point fait ſouvent grimacer ſes figures,
Quitté pour le bouffon, l'agreable & le fin.
Et ſans honte à Terence allié Tabarin.
Dans ce ſac ridicule où Scapin * s'envelope,
Je ne reconnois plus l'Auteur du Miſanthrope (30).

* One of Moliere's plays.

(30) Deſpreaux, Art Poëtique, Cant. III, ver. 391, & ſeq.

Study the court, and know the city well:
So ſhall your various characters excel.
It was by this that Moliere in his plays
Perhaps, as victor, might have claim'd the bays;
If he, to pleaſe the rabble of the town,
Had not ſometimes affected the buffoon;
Preferr'd low farce and drollery to wit,
And more like Tabarin than Terence writ.
In that ſame bag which Scapin doth encloſe,
The author of the Miſanthrope I loſe.

He blames Moliere for endeavouring to pleaſe, not only men of a nice judgment, but alſo the common people. Moliere had ſome reaſons for it, and might have ſaid what Arlequin anſwered in a like caſe. 'Thoſe jeſts, ſaid I to him, (to Arlequin) are plea- 'ſant enough in your plays; it is pity they are not 'equally good. I own it, replied he, but they pleaſe 'ſeveral young people, who come to our play-houſe 'only to laugh, and who laugh at any thing, and 'very often without knowing why. Our plays are 'frequently acted before ſuch people, and if our jeſts 'were not ſuited to their capacity, our houſe would 'be very often empty. I am ſorry, ſaid I to him, 'that you have almoſt left your old pieces off; they 'were well approved by men of ſenſe, they contain- 'ed many things of good uſe in morality, and I dare 'ſay, that your ſtage was a place where vice was ſo 'effectually ridiculed, that every body found himſelf 'inclined to love virtue meerly out of reaſon. Should 'we act none but our old pieces, replied he, our 'play-houſe would be little reſorted to, and I will 'tell you what Cinthio formerly told St Evremond, 'that good actors would be ſtarved notwithſtanding 'their excellent plays (31).' It ought to be obſerved, that players are at great charges, and that plays are no leſs deſigned for the diverſion of the people, than for the diverſion of the ſenate (32); and therefore they muſt be adapted to the taſte of the public, in order to bring a numerous audience; for without that although they were a perfect compound of ingenious, nice, and exquiſite, thoughts, the actors would be ruined by them, and they would be of no uſe to the people.

(31) Livre ſans nom, pag. 4, &c.

(32) Mind their words of Terence in his prologue to his Andria. Poeta quum primum animum ad ſcribendum appulit, Id ſibi negoti credidit ſolum dari Populo ut placerent quas fecerit fabulas.

A GENERAL obſervation againſt thoſe who cenſure this Dictionary.

This is what may be ſaid, not only againſt thoſe who cenſure Moliere, but alſo againſt thoſe who find fault with many other books, becauſe they do not conſider the ſeveral uſes they are deſigned for, and becauſe there are many things in them which they could wiſh the author had left out. What do I care for that, ſays one? What is it to me, ſays another, that ſuch a one had a bad wife? To what purpoſe ſo many quotations, ſo many merry thoughts, ſo many Philoſophical reflexions, &c? Such are the complaints of thoſe

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

like Moliere's plays, tranſlated into their language, by one of their countrymen ſettled in Germany (k). It is more difficult in a work of this nature than in others, to preſerve all the beauties of an original in a tranſlation. For the reſt, what I have ſaid of Moliere's inclination for the ſtage, is to be found with new circumſtances in a book of Mr Perrault [H]. The readers will not be diſpleaſed to know what became of the company of Comedians headed by Moliere, when that excellent actor came to die [I]: it may ſerve to make his merit known.

(k) His name is Nicolas di Caſtelli, and he ſtiles himſelf Secretary to the Elector of Brandenburg: he publiſhed that verſion at his own charges in the year 1698, at Leipſic, in four volumes in 12mo.

thoſe who cenſure this Dictionary: but they will give me leave to tell them, that they want the moſt neceſſary notion to paſs a right judgment upon this work. They do not conſider that it ought to be of ſome uſe to all ſorts of readers, and that if it had been intirely framed according to the taſte of the greateſt puriſts (33); it would go out of it's natural ſphere. I would have them to conſider, that if I had kept to their notions of perfection, my book would indeed have been acceptable to them, but then many others had been diſpleaſed with it, and it had remained in the duſt of the Bookſeller's warehouſes. What a poor thing would two or three large folio's be for him, if there was nothing in them but what may pleaſe thoſe who pretend to gravity, and to an exquiſite taſte, and who would have the moſt copious ſubjects explained in the ſhorteſt way? They may, if they pleaſe, make ſuch a reflexion as Socrates made at the ſight of a fair (34); but the fair will nevertheleſs be as it ought to be.

(33) Give me leave to call by that name thoſe very ſtrict obſervers of the laws of perfection, who ſet up as a ſtandard in all things the taſte of the few, or the choice wits.

(34) Quam multis rebus ego non egeo? How many things here are, ſaid he, which I do not want? Vide Eraſmum, in Apoph. pag. m. 168.

[H] His inclination for the ſtage is to be found with new circumſtances in a book of Mr Perrault.] Moliere is one of the illuſtrious men, whoſe pictures Mr Begon (35) cauſed to be engraved, and has alſo procured to the public their hiſtorical encomiums. Mr Perrault, who wrote thoſe encomiums, ſays, that Moliere was born with ſuch an inclination for the ſtage, that it was impoſſible to prevent his turning comedian. He had ſcarce made an end of his ſtudies, wherein he did very well ſucceed, but he joined with ſeveral young men of his age and inclination, and reſolved to form a company of comedians, to act in the provinces of the kingdom. His father . . . made uſe of all his friends to diſſuade him from it, and not being able to prevail upon him by their remonſtrances, and the promiſes they made him in his name, he ſent to him the maſter in whoſe houſe he boarded during the firſt years of his ſtudies . . but the maſter was ſo far from perſuading him to leave the profeſſion of a comedian, that young Moliere prevailed upon him to embrace the ſame profeſſion . . . Having formed his company, he went and acted at Roüen, and from thence he removed to Lyons, where having pleaſed the prince of Conti, &c (36). The remaining part of the elogy is very curious.

(35) Intendant of Juſtice and Marine.

(36) Perrault, of Illuſtrious Men, pag. 79.

[I] The readers will not be diſpleaſed to know what became of the company of players headed by Moliere, when that excellent actor came to die.] What I find upon this ſubject in a book of Mr Chappuzeau is as follows. Before that company was ſettled in the royal palace, they diſcovered their merit at Paris in the Foſſez de Neſle, and in St Paul's ward, at Lyons, and in Languedoc. They were juſtly accounted the beſt country-players. The two Brothers Bejar, and du Parc, were ſome of the chief actors. Du Croiſy, who headed a company of country-players, and la Grange, a very good player, joined with them. They acted for ſome time in the hall of the petit Bourbon, by an agreement with the Italian players, who had been already ſettled there. After the theatre of the Royal Palace was opened to them, where they acted till the beginning of Lent 1673. Moliere happening to die at that time, four players of his company joined with that of the Hôtel de Bourgogne, and becauſe thoſe that remained were not in a capacity to go on, the king was pleaſed to make but one body of the company of the Marais (37), and of that of the Royal Palace. Mr Colbert was ordered to pitch upon the beſt actors of thoſe two companies, and to form out of them a fine company, that ſhould be called the king's company. It was ſettled in the Hôtel du Roy, in the ſtreet called Rue Mazarine (38), and they began to appear in public upon a Sunday, the ninth of July 1673. The players were forbidden to act upon the theatre of the Royal Palace, and upon that of the Marais. Note, that Moliere, who was the firſt orator of the company of the Royal Palace, reſigned that place to la Grange ſix years before he died (39).

(37) It was ſettled in 1620, and called the king's company.

(38) Otherwiſe called the Foſſez de Neſle.

(39) Taken from a book, intituled, Le Theatre François. Mr Chappuzeau is the author of it.

PORCIA, the daughter of Cato Uticenſis, had ſuch a noble ſoul, that ſhe was not corrupted by the ill examples of her mother and of her aunts [A], but only imitated the virtues of her father. She applied herſelf very much to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, and gave convincing proofs of her great courage; for conjecturing that Brutus, her huſband, was preparing for a great enterprize, ſhe wounded herſelf with a knife, to ſhew by

(1) She did alſo proſtitute her daughter to him. See, above, citation (1), of the article CASSIUS LONGINUS (CAIUS).

(2) Οὕτω μὲν ἦν ὁ πρὸς καίσαρα Σερβιλίας ἔρως περιβόητος. Uſque adeo Serviliæ fuit in Cæſarem pervagatus amor. Plut. in Bruto, pag. 986.

(3) Idem, in Catone minore, pag. 785.

(4) A ſon and our Porcia.

[A] She was not corrupted by the ill examples of her mother, and of her aunts.] Cato Uticenſis was unfortunate with relation to the fair ſex; his ſtar proved in that reſpect very unlucky and malignant. He had two uterine ſiſters, called Servilia: one of them was Brutus's mother, and ſuffered herſelf to be debauched by Julius Cæſar (1), and it was the talk of the whole town (2). The other was married to Lucullus, and proved ſo leud, that her huſband put her away. She retired to her brother's, who was ſo kind as to take her into his houſe, and carry her along with him in his travels. It was no glorious thing for him to have ſuch an infamous woman in his houſe, nor eaſy to take care that ſhe ſhould not go on in her ill courſe. She was not by a great deal ſo ill ſpoken of as ſhe had been before, when it appeared, that ſhe willingly ſubmitted to Cato's cuſtody, and ſtrict way of living, following him in his flight: nevertheleſs, Cæſar did further reproach him with this ſiſter of his (3). Attilia, Cato's wife, was ſo leud, that her huſband was obliged to part with her, having had two children by her (4). He married a ſecond wife, whom he afterwards yielded to Hortenſius by way of loan; and he married her again when ſhe was a widow, and Hortenſius's heireſs (5): which afforded Cæſar a fair opportunity of cenſuring Cato's life (6). Beſides, Cato being of age to marry, courted a maid who had been contracted to Metellus Scipio. Her name was Lepida. The contract was broke, ſo that being at liberty to marry, ſhe anſwered Cato's deſires, and was betrothed to him. But at laſt, Metellus Scipio being ſorry that he had broke his engagement, left nothing unattempted to recover Lepida, and ſucceeded in his deſign (7). 'At which Cato was very much incenſed, and reſolved to go to law about it; but his friends perſuaded him to the contrary. However, he was ſo moved by his heat of youth and paſſion, that he writ Iambics againſt Scipio, which had all the wit and ſatire of Archilochus, without his impudence and ſcurrility. After this he married Attilia, the daughter of Soranus, which was the firſt, but not the only woman he ever knew; in this much leſs happy than Lælius, the friend of Scipio, who, in the whole courſe of ſo long a life, never knew but one woman (8).' The laſt part of this paſſage is needleſs, with reſpect to the text of this remark; but it contains

(5) See, above, the remark [O], of the article of the firſt HORTENSIUS (QUINTUS).

(6) Taken from Plut. in Catone minore, pag. 770, 784.

(7) Plut. ibid. pag. 762.

(8) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by her patiently bearing the pain, that she could hold her tongue, and consequently that she deserved to be intrusted with her husband's secret [B]. He imparted it to her, whereby she came to know that there was a design to kill Cæsar. But if she raised herself then much above her sex, she appeared like other women on the day of the execution; for she was transported with such a violent uneasiness, that she fell into several swoons, and was thought to be dead [C]. We do not know what she did, nor what she said when she heard of the success of that enterprize, and during the war in which her husband found himself engaged against Cæsar's friends; but we know that having accompained him to the sea-side, and expressed a great constancy, she could not forbear shedding tears at the sight of a certain picture [D], and that she put an end to her life with great courage, when she heared that Brutus had killed himself [E]. Note, that when tains a matter of fact so curious, that I thought the reader would be glad to know it. Is there any man at this day, of Lælius's quality, and intimately acquainted with the general of an army, who, like him, during the course of a long life, never knew any woman but his wife? Nay, is there any young man of Cato's quality, who keeps himself chaste till he gets into the nuptial bed? These particulars are therefore very extraordinary, and deserved that I should lengthen the quotation.

[B] She wounded herself with a knife, to shew .... she could hold her tongue, and ..... deserved to be entrusted with her husband's secret.] If the reader will have a full view of her noble behaviour on this occasion, he must read the whole following passage of Plutarch: 'Porcia being addicted to Philosophy, a great 'lover of her husband, and full of courage and pru-'dence, resolved not into enquire to Brutus's secrets be-'fore she had made this trial of herself: she turned all 'her attendants out of her chamber, and taking a little 'knife, such as they use to cut nails with, she gave 'herself a deep gash in the thigh, upon which follow-'ed a great flux of blood, and soon after violent pains, 'and a dangerous fever, occasioned by the anguish of 'the wound. Now, when Brutus was mightily af-'flicted for her, she, in the heighth of all her pain, 'spoke thus to him: Brutus, I being the daughter of 'Cato, was given to you in marriage, not like a con-'cubine, to partake only in the common civilities of 'bed and board, but to bear a part in all your good, 'and all your evil fortune: and for my part, when I 'I look upon you, I find no reason to repent the 'match; but from me, what evidence of my love, 'what satisfaction can you receive, if I may not 'share with you in bearing your most hidden griefs, 'nor be admitted to any of your counsels that require 'secrecy and trust? I know very well that women 'seem to be of too weak a nature to be trusted with 'secrets; but certainly, Brutus, a virtuous birth and 'education, and a conversation with the good and ho-'nourable, are of some force to the forming our man-'ners, and strengthening our natural weakness. 'And I can boast that I am the daughter of Cato, 'and the wife of Brutus; in which two great titles, 'tho' before I put too little confidence, yet now I 'have tried myself, and find, that even against grief 'and pain itself I am invincible. Which words hav-'ing spoke, she shewed him her wound, and related 'to him the whole trial that she had made of her own 'constancy: at which he being astonished, lifted up 'his hands to Heaven, and begged the assistance of 'the gods in his enterprize, that he might live to be 'a husband worthy of such a wife as Porcia. So hav-'ing comforted his wife, he left her (9).' Valerius Maximus (10) is shorter in his account, and supposes other circumstances, for he affirms, that she knew her husband's design before she wounded herself. He adds, that she wounded herself the very same day that Cæsar was assassinated, and she did it to try whether she could be so courageous as to put an end to her life, if Brutus's attempt should be attended with an ill success. Observe how Historians vary about the most memorable adventures.

(9) Plut. in Bruto, pag. 989.

(10) Valerius Maximus, lib. iii, cap. ii, num. 15, pag. m. 254.

[C] She was transported with such a violent uneasiness, that she fell into several swoons, and was thought to be dead.] The only design of Plutarch, in the particular account he gives of that accident, is to shew Brutus's intrepidity. These are his words: 'In the mean 'while there came one in all haste from Brutus's 'house, and brought him news that his wife was 'a-dying: for Porcia being extreamly disturbed with 'expectation of the event, and not being able to bear 'the greatness of her cares, could scarce keep herself 'within doors, and at every little noise or voice she 'heard, leaping forth, and starting suddenly, like 'one of the mad Priestesses of Bacchus, asked every one 'that came from the Forum, what Brutus was doing? 'and continually sent one messenger after another to 'enquire. At last, after long expectation, the strength 'of her body could hold out no longer, but overcome 'with her doubts and fears, she fainted away. She 'had not time to betake herself to her chamber, for 'as she was sitting amongst her women, a sudden 'want of spirits, and a great stupidness seized her, 'and her colour changed, and her speech was quite 'lost. At this sight her women made a great and 'lamentable outcry, and many of the neighbours run-'ning to Brutus's house, to know what was the mat-'ter, the report was soon spread abroad that Porcia 'was dead; tho' she recovered in a little while, and 'came to herself again. When Brutus received this 'news, he was extreamly troubled, not without rea-'son, yet was not so carried away by his private 'grief, as to neglect the public concern.' (11) Cæsar was killed soon after.

(11) Plut. ubi supra, pag. 990.

[D] Having accompanied her husband to the sea-side .... she could not forbear shedding tears at the sight of a certain picture.] Plutarch's narrative contains some things that are to Porcia's honour, and therefore it will not be improperly inserted in this place. 'Bru-'tus began to despair of any good event of such pro-'ceedings; and resolving to leave Italy, passed by land 'through Lucania, and came to Elea by the sea-side. 'From hence it was thought convenient, that Porcia 'should return to Rome: she was overcome with grief 'to part with Brutus, but strove as much as possible 'to conceal it; but in spight of all her constancy 'and resolution, a picture which she found there 'accidentally betrayed it. The story of it was, the 'parting of Hector from Andromache, when he went 'to engage the Greeks, giving his young son Astyanax 'into her arms, and she fixing her eyes upon him, 'with an earnest and affectionate look. As soon as 'she spied this piece, the resemblance it bore to her 'own concern made her burst out into tears, and seve-'ral times a day she walked where that picture 'hung, to gaze at it, and weep before it. Upon this 'occasion, when Acilius, one of Brutus's friends, re-'peated out of Homer these verses, wherein Adro-'mache speaks to Hector.

Be careful Hector, for with thee my all,
My father, mother, brother, husband fall.

Brutus smiling, replied, but I must not answer Porcia, as Hector did Andromache, Mind you your wheel, and to your maids give law.

'For tho' the natural weakness of her body hinders 'her from acting what the strength of men can per-'form, yet she has a mind as valiant and as active 'for the good of her country, as the best of us. This 'relation is in the Memoirs of Brutus, written by 'Bibulus, Porcia's son (12).' That Bibulus, who pro-ceeded from Porcia's first marriage, wrote a small book concerining the exploits of Brutus (13). There was at least another child by that marriage (14).

(12) Ibid. pag. 994.

(13) Ibid. pag. 959.

[E] She put an end to her life with great courage, when she heard that Brutus had killed himself.] Those who do not understand Latin, will find hereafter in a passage of Plutarch, the sense of this apostrophe of Valerius Maximus: Tuos quoque castissimos ignes Porcia,

(14) Idem, in Vita Catonis minoris, pag. 771, A.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

when she married him, she was the widow of Bibulus, by whom she had children (a): If President du Vair had known it, he would not have ascribed to her an answer [F], which probably belongs to another PORCIA, sister to Cato Uticensis, and wife of one Domitius Ænobarbus (b), and was doubtless endowed with noble qualities, since Cicero (c), Lollius, and Varro, wrote an encomium upon her. She died before Cæsar was killed.

(a) See the end of the remark [D].

(b) Plut. in Catone Utic. pag. 778, F.

(c) See Cicero, Ep. ad Atticum, xxxvii, & xlviii, lib. xiii.

Porcia, M. Catonis filia, cuncta sæcula debita admirationi prosequuntur: Quæ cum apud Philippos victum & interemptum virum tuum Brutum cognosceres, quia ferrum non dabatur, ardentes ore carbones haurire non dubitasti, muliebri spiritu virilem patris exitum imitata. Sed nescio an hoc fortius, quod ille usitato, tu novo genere mortis absumpta es (15). Plutarch relates the same thing, and quotes Valerius Maximus, and another author; but he further says, that there was a letter in Brutus's name, whereby it appeared, that Porcia resolved to die, because she was not assisted in her sickness. 'As for Porcia .... Nicolaus the Philosopher, and 'Valerius Maximus write, that being desirous to die, 'but being hindered by her friends, who continually 'watched her from killing herself, she snatched some 'burning coals out of the fire, and shutting them 'close in her mouth, stifled herself, and died. Tho' 'there is yet extant a Letter of Brutus to his friends, 'in which he laments the death of Porcia, and accuses them for neglecting her so, that she desired to 'to die, rather than languish with her disease. So that 'it seems Nicolaus was mistaken in the time. For 'this Epistle (if it is indeed authentic, and truly Brutus's) gives us to understand the disease, and the love 'of this lady, and the manner of her death (16).'

(15) Valer. Maximus, lib. iv, cap. vi, pag. m. 394, 395.

(16) Plut. in Bruto, in fine, pag. 1009.

[F] President du Vair .... would not have ascribed to her the answer he does.] One of the decrees pronounced by that president concerns a suit in Law in the parliament of Provence, between a woman, who had married again nine months after her being a widow, and the relations of her first husband. She was deprived, by virtue of that decree, of the things left her by her husband's last will, and of her nuptial advantages, for having married again before the year of her mourning was out (17). Mr du Vair alledges a great many sentences out of the Pagan authors, and the ancient Fathers against second marriages (18), and says, that our Porcia declared, that a virtuous woman never marries but once. Dido being intreated to marry again, wishes that she may rather die..... Nevertheless, being afterwards persuaded to it, and deploring her misfortune, she says,

(17) Oeuvres du Sieur du Vair, pag. 859, Edit. of Geneva 1017, in 8vo.

(18) Compare what has been said in the remark [E], of the article GONZAGA (LUCRETIA OF).

Extinctus pudor, &, quâ solâ fidera adibam,

For you alone I suffer in my fame,
Bereft of honour, and expos'd to shame.

DRYDEN.

as believing, with great reason, that those who married twice, were neither honest nor happy. And therefore, as we read in Tertullian, Fortunæ muliebri coronam non imponebat nisi univira, --- No woman is compleatly fortunate, unless she has been true to one husband; which agrees with the saying of the celebrated Porcia, Brutus's wife, Fœlix & pudica matrona non nubit nisi semel (19), ---- A virtuous and happy woman never marries but once. That Porcia could not have said this, without condemning herself, since Brutus was her second husband. I am apt to think, that Mr du Vair was led into this error for want of a due attention in reading St Jerome's words. They are not exact, and besides they contain a falsity, and therefore they may very well occasion a mistake: but after all, the answer in question is not ascribed to Porcia, Brutus's wife, in the words of that Father. St Jerome having mentioned Marcia, Cato's younger daughter (20), who would never marry again, adds, that Brutus married Porcia, who was a maid (21), and that Cato married Marcia, who was not a maid (22), and that accordingly Marcia did not scruple to leave Cato, in order to marry Hortensius, whereas Porcia would not live without Brutus. Afterwards St Jerome mentions Porcia the younger, who made the answer we have seen in Mr du Vair's passage. 'Martia Catonis filia minor cum quæreretur 'ab ea, cur post amissum maritum denuo non nube- 'ret, respondit, non se invenire virum, qui se magis 'vellet, quàm sua. Quo dicto ostendit divitias magis 'in uxoribus elegi solere, quam pudicitiam, & multos 'non oculis, sed digitis uxores ducere. Optima sanè 'res, quàm avaritia conciliat. Eadem cum lugeret 'virum, & matronæ ab ea quærerent, quem diem habe- 'ret luctus ultimum: ait, quem & vitæ. Arbitror, 'quæ ita virum quærebat absentem, de secundo matri- 'monio non cogitabat. Brutus Porciam virginem 'duxit uxorem, Martiam Cato non virginem: sed 'Martia inter Hortensium Catonemque discurrit, & 'sine Catone vivere Martia potuit, Portia sine Bruto 'non potuit. Magis enim se unicis viris applicant 'fœminæ, & nihil aliud nosse, magnum arctioris in- 'dulgentiæ vinculum est, ... Portia minor, cum 'laudaretur apud eam quædam bene morata, que se- 'cundum habebat maritum, respondit: Felix & pu- 'dica matrona, nunquam præterquam semel nubit (23). '---- Martia, Cato's younger daughter, being asked 'why she did not marry again after her husband's 'death, answered, that she found no man who preferred her person to her fortune: by which she insinuated, 'that riches in a wife are generally valued above chastity, and that many are determined in their choice not 'so much by their eyes as by their fingers. A noble effect 'of avarice! The same lady being asked, while she bewailed the loss of her husband, what bounds she prescribed to her mourning; answered, the same as to 'her life. I fancy that a woman who mourned in this 'fashion for her deceased husband, had no thoughts of a 'second marriage. Brutus married Porcia, who was a 'maid .... Porcia the younger, when some body at her house 'cried up the virtue of a certain lady that had a second 'husband, answered: a virtuous and happy woman never 'marries but once.' One cannot well apprehend what he means by Porcia the younger, Porcia minor, for the ancient history does not mention two daughters of Cato Uticensis; and if it mentions two Porcia's, it is to inform us, that one of them was Cato's sister, and the other his daughter. At this rate the latter should have been Porcia the younger, Porcia minor; but she could not have declared against second marriages so severely as St Jerome relates it. Some will have it that he means the other Porcia, Cato's sister. Meminit Hieronymus (Porciæ Domitio nuptæ) adversus Joviniannum, qui tale ejus dictum celebrat (24): Cum apud eam, &c. But why should he call her Porcia minor? It is more likely that he meant one Porcia, younger sister of Brutus's wife, and, perhaps, confounding his notions, he calls Porcia minor the same woman, whom he calls Marcia a little before. We must remember, that Marcia, wife of Cato Uticensis, was with child when her husband parted with her in favour of Hortensius (25). Perhaps she was delivered of a daughter, who is indifferently called Porcia minor, or Marcia (26), tho' it was not usual for daughters to go by their mothers name. Perhaps St Jerome, for want of attention, changed the two names of one woman into two persons. What is certain is, that the answer he ascribes to Marcia is of the same nature with that which he ascribes to Porcia the younger. It was of some use to him to distinguish them; for he was very willing to increase the number of such examples. He alledges those of Annia, and Marcella, and of Valeria. The first answered, that she would not marry again; for, said she, if I should get a good husband, I should be afraid of losing him (27), and if I should get a bad one, I should find it a very hard case, having been so kindly used by my first spouse. Marcella answered, I am so well satisfied with having been married once, that I do not want to be married again. Valeria was contented to answer, that her first husband was still alive as to her (28). Anniam cum propinquus moneret, ut alteri viro nuberet; esse enim ei & ætatem integram, & faciem bonam: nequaquam, inquit, hoc faciam. Si enim virum bonum invenero, nolo timere, ne perdam: si malum, quid necesse est post bonum pessimum sustinere? .... Marcella major rogata à matre sua gauderet-ne se nupsisse, respondit; ita valde, ut amplius nolim. Valeria Messalarum soror, amisso Servio viro, nulli volebat nubere.

(19) Oeuvres du Sieur du Vair, pag. 820.

(20) Such a daughter of Cato is not mentioned by the Pagan authors.

(21) This is false: she was Bibulus's widow.

(22) Plutarch says no such thing.

(23) Hieronym. lib. i, adverf. Jovinianum, pag. m. 36.

(24) Glandorp. Onomaft. pag. 716.

(25) Plut. in Catone minore, pag. 771.

(26) The author of the Scholia upon St Jerome, ad locum supra relatum, is of opinion, that this Marcia was so called because of her mother.

(27) See, above, the remark [A], of the article GONZAGA (JULIA OF).

(28) Hieronym. ubi supra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

nubere. Quæ interrogata cur hoc faceret, ait ſibi ſemper maritum Servium vivere (29).

It is to be obſerved, that if theſe maxims afforded a copious ſubject to the advocates, who pleaded againſt the widow concerned in Mr du Vair's decree, ſhe afforded them more matter ſtill by her haſtily marrying again, in the ninth month of her widowhood, and without waiting for the end of Lent. She not only tranſgreſſes, ſaid the advocates (30), her private mourning, and deſpiſes the memory of her late huſband and benefactor, but ſhe does alſo defile the time appointed for a public penitence, ſhe breaks the laws of the church, and ſcandalizes every body. But why ſo haſtily? If you could not ſtay till the end of a year already ſo far advanced, why did not you ſtay at leaſt till the end of Lent, which was already half gone. Perhaps, the heat of youth tranſported you, and as Tertullian ſays, deſpumare iſtis nuptiis ſanguinis fervorem oportuit: - - - that marriage was neceſſary to bring down the violent heat of the blood. Such an excuſe could hardly be admitted from a young maid, in the flower of her age. Tho', as St Jerome ſays, libido majorem in virginibus patiatur famem, dum dulcius putat omne quod neſcit: - - - the luſt of a virgin is more fierce and ravenous, while ſhe fancies there is a remarkable ſweetneſs in every thing ſhe has not tried. And will an old woman alledge it, after ſhe has been twenty-five years married to man, who was ſeventy years old when he died? How came you then to contain yourſelf during your huſband's life, when the title of wife, and the cover of marriage, gave you more liberty, and the ſight of an old man raiſed in you a greater luſt? Many civil laws were thundred out againſt her; but ſhe alledged againſt them the Canon-Law, and the indulgence of the Pope's decrees (31). It is a ſcandalous thing, that ſome injunctions of the Civil Law ſhould have been enervated by the Canon-Law, to countenance the abuſes of marriage (32).

(29) Accordingly an antient author ſays, that viduæ luctus pro marito erat- - - - a widow's mourning was to her inſtead of a huſband. Which Lucan did ſince transfer to the praiſe of Pompey's wife, ſaying, Perfruitur lachrymis & habet pro conjuge luctum. Now all her comfort in her tears doth lie, And mourning doth her huſband's place ſupply. Du Vair, ubi ſupra, pag. 820.

(30) Ibid. pag. 818.

(31) Ibid. pag. 826, 834.

(32) See, above, citation (42), of the article PIENNE.

PORCIUS (MARCUS) one of the greateſt men among the ancients, commonly known by the title of CATO THE CENSOR, was born at Tuſculum (a), in the year of Rome 519 [A]. He began to bear arms at ſeventeen years of age, and ſhewed not only much courage, but alſo a great contempt of pleaſures, and even of the conveniencies of life [B]. He was a man of an extraordinary ſobriety, and no bodily exerciſe ſeemed to him unworthy of him; for at his return from his campaigns, he betook himſelf to plow his ground, but did not neglect to cultivate his mind, eſpecially in order to ſpeak well, a talent neceſſary to him, ſince he pleaded many cauſes in the neighbouring towns; which he did ſo generouſly, that he would never receive any reward for it. The diſcourſes of a Pythagorean Philoſopher (b), which he heard at Tarentum, when that town was re-taken by Fabius Maximus, in whoſe army he ſerved, did very much ſtrengthen his inclination for temperance. Valerius Flaccus, who had a country-ſeat near that of Cato, was deſirous to ſee that young man of whom he was told ſo many remarkable things; and finding that it was a good plant which wanted only to be cultivated and tranſplanted into better ground, he perſuaded him to come to Rome. Cato made himſelf ſoon eſteemed in that city, and having ſuch an officious patron as Valerius Flaccus, quickly raiſed himſelf. He was firſt of all elected Military Tribune, afterwards they made him Queſtor, and then by degrees he came to be Conſul (c) and Cenſor (d). No man was ever better qualified than he for the office of Cenſor, nor did better diſcharge the duties of it. He made uſe of his ſeverity, eloquence, and exemplary life, to put a ſtop to the luxury and other vices of the Romans (e): which was the reaſon

(a) Cornel. Nepos, in Fragmento Vitæ Catonis. Plut. in Catone Majore, init. pag. 336.

(b) His name was Nearchus.

(c) In the year of Rome 558.

(d) In the year of Rome 569.

(e) Taken from Plut. in Vita Catonis Majoris.

[A] He was born . . . . in the year of Rome 519.] Here is the proof of it, 'Anno poſt conſul primum 'fuerat (Q. Maximus) quam ego natus ſum (1). - - - - 'The year after I was born, Fabius Maximus was 'choſen conſul for the firſt time.' They are Cato's words in a book of Cicero. But the Faſti Conſulares place the firſt conſulſhip of Fabius Maximus in the year of Rome 520. All the dates ſpecified in the ſame book ſhew, that the Latin words I have quoted ought to be read thus. See Grævius's edition, where you will find a note of Vincent Contarinus, and another of Charles Langius, which clear the matter, I infer from the poſition of that year, that Livy and Plutarch are miſtaken, when they ſay, that Cato pleaded his cauſe at eighty-ſix years of age, and accuſed Sergius Galba four years after (2). He died at eighty-five years of age, for it was in the year of Rome 604, under the conſulſhip of Lucius Marcius, and Manius Manilius, which was eighty-ſix years before Cicero's conſulſhip, as Cicero obſerves (3). Corradus is a little miſtaken upon this paſſage. He ſays (4), that Cato was born ſeven years after the conſulſhip of Claudius Cento, and Sempronius Tuditanus, which falls in with the year of Rome 513; and that he was in his thirtieth year under the conſulſhip of Cornelius Cethegus, and Sempronius Tuditanus, that is in the year of Rome 549. This computation is wrong, any body may ſee that there are only twenty-nine years from the year of Rome 520, to the year 549. Corradus obſerves a little farther (5), that Cato was born in the year 521, and that being dead in the year 604, he lived at leaſt eighty-five years; which is a wrong calculation. Some pages after (6) he ſays, that Cato died in the year 605, at eighty-five years of age, being born in the year 521, which does not reſtify the computations. However, we may ſay that he lived to that age, for Cicero affirms it in expreſs words. 'Annos quinque & LXXX natus ex- 'ceſſit è vita cum quidem eo ipſo anno contra Ser. 'Galbam ad populum ſumma contentione dixiſſet, 'quam etiam orationem ſcriptam reliquit (7). - - - - - He died in the eighty-fifth year of his age. That very year he had pronounced a vehement ſpeech againſt Servius Galba, which he likewiſe left in writing.' Cato did not only write that pleading againſt Galba, but alſo inſerted it in his Origines (8). Pliny denotes the time of Cato's deceaſe too indeterminately: 'Cir- 'ca captas, ſays he (9), Carthaginem & Corinthum '. . . . ſupremum is diem obiit. - - - - He died about the time that Carthage and Corinth were taken.' Thoſe two towns were conquered in the year 608. I do not find that he ſays in his nineteenth book, as Glandorpius will have it (10), that Cato died at eighty-five years of age: I only find there, that he died a year after he had perſuaded the Romans to begin the third Punic war (11). The twenty-ninth book ſhould have been quoted, where theſe words are to be found, 'Hic Cato DCV. anno urbis noſtræ o- 'biit, LXXXV. ſuo (12). - - - - This Cato died in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and in the year of Rome '605.' Paterculus agrees with this as to the year of Rome, for he ſays, that Cato died three years before the deſtruction of Carthage (13). I will not cenſure Moreri for placing Cato's deceaſe in the year of Rome 606, but I think it ſomewhat ſtrange, that the fault he has committed in ſaying, that it was during the ſecond Punic war, has not been mended hitherto (14).

(1) Cicero, de Senect. cap. iv, pag. m. 392.

(2) Titus Livius, lib. xxxix, pag. m. 762. Plut. in Catone Majore, pag. 344, 345.

(3) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 109.

(4) Corradus, in Brutum Cicer. pag. 109.

(5) Ib. p. 110.

(6) Ib. p. 150.

(7) Cicero, ibid. pag. 149.

(8) Quam orationem in Originibus ſuis retulit paucis ante quam mortuus eſt an diebus an menſibus. Ibid. pag. 165.

(9) Plin. lib. xiv, cap. iv, pag. m. 124.

(10) Glandorp. in Onomaſt. pag. 714.

(11) Plin. lib. xix, cap. xviii, pag. 197.

(12) Idem, lib. xxix, cap. i, pag. 668.

(13) Paterc. l. i, cap. xv.

[B] He ſhewed . . . . a great contempt of pleaſures, and even of the conveniencies of life.] I ſhould be too prolix, ſhould I mention whatever is to be found in books upon this ſubject; and therefore I ſhall only ſet down a paſſage of Seneca, whereby it appears, that Cato was contented with one horſe for himſelf and baggage, and looked after him himſelf. 'M. Cato 'Cenſorius (quem tam reip. hercule profuit naſci quam Scipionem:

(14) I write this in March 1721.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

reaſon why it has been ſaid, that he was not leſs ſerviceable to the republic of Rome by making war againſt immorality, than Scipio by his victories over the enemies (f). It was well known that he would exerciſe the cenſorſhip with the utmoſt rigour; which was one of the reaſons why the Patricians oppoſed him when he ſtood for that office; but that ſame reaſon induced the people to prefer him to all his competitors. This circumſtance is admirably repreſented by the beſt Latin Hiſtorian, together with his elogy [C]. The inſcription of the ſtatue erected to him, was a glorious teſtimony of his (f) See the paſſage of Seneca in the remark [B].

‘ Scipionem: alter enim cum hoſtibus noſtris bellum,
‘ alter cum moribus geſſit) canterio vehebatur, & hip-
‘ poperis quidem impoſitis, ut ſecum utilia portaret.
‘ . . . . . O quantum erat ſæculi decus, imperatorem ‘ triumphalem, cenſorium (& quod ſuper omnia hæc
‘ eſt) Catonem, uno caballo eſſe contentum, & ne toto
‘ quidem! Partem enim ſarcinæ, ab utroque latere
‘ dependentes, occupabant. Ita non omnibus obeſis
‘ mannis, & aſturconibus, & tollutariis præferres uni-
‘ cum illum equum, ab ipſo Catone defrictum (15)?
‘ - - - - Cato the Cenſor (a man of as great conſequence
‘ to the republic as Scipio: for the one fought againſt our ‘ enemies, and the other againſt our vices) uſed to ride
‘ upon a gelding, which carried at the ſame time his ‘ cloak-bag and his neceſſaries . . . What an honour was
‘ it to that age to ſee a man who had triumphed as a ‘ general, and enjoyed the dignity of Cenſor, and (which ‘ is more than both theſe) to ſee Cato put up with one
‘ horſe, and even not require a whole one to himſelf!
‘ For his baggage hanging down on each ſide took up
‘ part of him. Who would not prefer that honeſt geld-
‘ ing, rubbed down by Cato himſelf, to all the ſleek
‘ nags, fine genets, and ſmooth ambling horſes, in the ‘ world.’ He had ſlaves enough to do it for him, but he rather choſe to ſave them that trouble. It was his inclination: he plowed the ground, dreſſed like his ſlaves, and then ſat down at table with them, eating of the ſame bread, and drinking of the ſame wine (16). Seneca might have mentioned a thing more remarkable ſtill than what he relates. When he entered upon the government of Sardinia, though his predeceſſors there uſed to require tents, bedding, and cloaths, upon the public account, and to charge them heavily by furniſhing proviſions and entertainments for a great train of ſervants and friends: he, on the contrary, by his frugality ſhewed an incredible difference, for in nothing wanted he the contribution of the public; nay, he would walk on foot to viſit the cities, and with one perſon only of the common town-officers, who carried his garment, and a cup to offer ſacrifice in (17).

(15) Seneca, Epiſt. lxxxvii, pag. m. 353.

(16) Plut. in Marco Catone, pag. 337. See alſo Valerius Maximus, lib. iv, cap. iii, num. 12.

(17) Idem, Plutarch. pag. 339.

[C] This circumſtance is admirably repreſented by the beſt Latin Hiſtorian, together with his elogy.] This paſſage of Livy is ſo fine, that I can neither forbear to ſet it down at length, nor be ſo bold as to tranſlate it. ‘ In hoc viro (M. Porcio) tanta vis animi ingenii-
‘ que fuit, ut quocunque loco natus eſſet, fortunam
‘ ſibi ipſe facturus fuiſſe videretur: Nulla ars neque
‘ privatæ, neque publicæ rei gerendæ ei defuit. Ur-
‘ banas ruſticaſque res pariter callebat. Ad ſummos
‘ honores alios ſcientia juris, alios eloquentia, alios
‘ gloria militaris provexit. Huic verſatile ingenium
‘ ſic pariter ad omnia fuit, ut natum ad id unum di-
‘ ceres, quodcunque ageret. In bello manu fortiſſi-
‘ mus, multiſque inſignibus clarus pugnis: idem po-
‘ ſteaquam ad magnos honores pervenit, ſummus im-
‘ perator: idem in pace, ſi jus conſuleres, peritiſſi-
‘ mus: ſi cauſa oranda eſſet, eloquentiſſimus: nec is ‘ tantùm, cujus lingua vivo eo viguerit, monumen-
‘ tum eloquentiæ nullum extet. Vivit imò, vigetque
‘ eloquentia ejus, ſacrata ſcriptis omnis generis. Ora-
‘ tiones & pro ſe multæ, & pro aliis, & in alios.
‘ Nam non ſolùm accuſando, ſed etiam cauſam dicen-
‘ do fatigavit inimicos; ſimultates nimio plures &
‘ exercuerunt eum, & ipſe exercuit eas. Nec facilè
‘ dixeris, utrum magis preſſerit eum nobilitas, an ille
‘ agitaverit nobilitatem. Aſperi proculdubio animi, ‘ & linguæ acerbæ, & immodicè liberæ fuit, ſed in-
‘ victi cupiditatibus animi, & rigidæ innocentiæ, con-
‘ temptor gratiæ, divitiarum: in parſimonia, in pati-
‘ entia laboris periculique ferrei propè corporis, animi-
‘ que, quem ne ſenectus quidem, quæ ſolvit omnia,
‘ fregerit: qui ſextum & octogeſimum annum agens
‘ cauſam dixerit, ipſe pro ſe oraverit, ſcripſeritque, no-
‘ nageſimo anno Sergium Galbam ad populi adduxerit ‘ judicium. Hunc, ſicut omni vita, ita tum (cenſu- ‘ ram) petentem premebat nobilitas: conſenſerantque,
‘ præter L. Flaccum, qui collega in conſulatu fuerat, ‘ candidati omnes, ad dejiciendum honore eum, non ‘ ſolùm ut ipſi potius adipiſcerentur, nec quia indigna-
‘ bantur novum hominem cenſorem videre, ſed etiam
‘ quòd triſtem cenſuram, periculoſamque multorum
‘ famæ, & ab læſo à pleriſque, & lædendi cupido ex-
‘ pectabant. Etenim tum quoque minitabundus pete-
‘ bat, refragari ſibi qui liberam & fortem cenſuram
‘ timerent, criminando. Et ſimul L. Valerio ſuffraga-
‘ batur: illo uno collega caſtigare ſe nova flagitia, &
‘ priſcos mores revocare poſſe. His accenſi homines,
‘ adverſa nobilitate non M. Porcium modò cenſorem
‘ fecerunt, ſed etiam collegam ei L. Valerium Flaccum
‘ adjecerunt (18). - - - This man carried with him ſo ‘ vigorous a ſpirit and pregnant wit, that howſoever he ‘ were born and deſcended, it ſeemed he was able to ‘ make way of himſelf to advancement and honour. He ‘ wanted no art and ſkill meet and requiſite for the ma- ‘ naging either of private buſineſs of his own or public ‘ affairs of ſtate: cunning he was in country huſbandry,
‘ as well as in civil policy. Some are advanced to the ‘ higheſt dignities and moſt honourable places by their deep ‘ knowledge in the law; others attain to promotion by ‘ eloquence: and there be again who have riſen and be- ‘ come great through martial proweſs and feats of arms.
‘ But this man was by nature ſo trainable and pliant to
‘ all alike, that whatſoever he addicted and gave him-
‘ ſelf unto, a man would have ſaid, he had been born
‘ and framed even from his mother's womb to it, and to ‘ nothing elſe. In war a moſt hardy and valiant ſoldier:
‘ and in many battles fought in fields highly renowned,
‘ Being mounted once to high places of honourable calling,
‘ a right excellent commander he proved and general of
‘ an army. In peace again for ſound counſel in the Ci- ‘ vil Law, paſſing well learned: for pleading at the bar
‘ and making orations, moſt eloquent. Neither carried
‘ he himſelf ſo, that his tongue flouriſhed only while he ‘ lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his ſin-
‘ gular eloquence; but it liveth, nay it flouriſheth ſtill,
‘ immortalized, as it were, and recommended to poſterity
‘ in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extant
‘ many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his ‘ own cauſe as for the defence of his friends, yea and in- ‘ vectives alſo againſt others: for able he was to put ‘ down and weary his adverſaries, not only by declaiming
‘ and accuſing them, but alſo by pleading his own cauſe.
‘ Factious quarrels and enmities there were exceeding ‘ many, that tormented him; and he plagued others with
‘ as many: and hard it is to ſay or ſet down, whether ‘ he were urged and preſſed upon by the nobility, or him-
‘ ſelf courſed and baited them more. Doubtleſs by nature
‘ he was auſtere and rigorous, his ſpeech was ſharp, bit-
‘ ing, and beyond meaſure plain and free: but he carried
‘ a mind with him that ſtooped to no deſires and luſts
‘ whatſoever: his life, ſo ſevere and preciſe as it was,
‘ untouched and without all ſpot of blame: deſpiſing all ‘ fawning favours, and contemning earthly riches. In ‘ thrift and frugality, in ſobriety and patience, in ſuffe-
‘ rance of travail and danger, his body was ſteel to the ‘ very back. And as for his mind and courage, it was ‘ ſuch as very age and time (which abateth and con- ‘ ſumeth all things elſe) was not able to break and ‘ daunt: when he was fourſcore years old and ſix, he ‘ pleaded at the bar for others: he made orations for his ‘ own defence, and wrote books: and in the ninetieth year
‘ of his age he convented Sergius Galba before the people,
‘ to receive his judgment by them. As all his life-time
‘ before the nobility was ſet againſt him, ſo when he ſtood
‘ now to be Cenſor, they preſſed hard upon him: inſomuch
‘ as all his competitors (excepting L. Flaccus, who had ‘ been his colleague in the conſulſhip) complotted together,
‘ how they might give him the repulſe, and put him be-
‘ ſide the cuſhion: not only for that their own teeth
‘ watered, and they were deſirous themſelves rather of ‘ that honour; nor becauſe they repined to ſee a new ‘ riſen gentleman, and one of the firſt head to be a Cenſor;
‘ but alſo becauſe they looked for no other but that his ‘ cenſorſhip would be rigorous and prejudicial to the name
‘ and reputation of divers men; conſidering how he had ‘ been croſſed and hurt by very many, and was deſirous
‘ himſelf

(18) Liv. lib. xxxix, cap. x., xli.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his reforming inclination [D]. He expreſſed a great indifferency for the erection of ſtatues [E], and, in general, for praiſes (g); nevertheleſs, he highly commended himſelf (b), and was willing that people ſhould ſee in his books the great encomiums he beſtowed on himſelf. He harangued very often, and inſerted ſome of his orations in his Roman Hiſtory [F]. That Hiſtory, and the book he wrote concerning the art of war, are not extant (i). He compoſed ſome books of agriculture (k), and was very particular in the deſcription of that art (l). He wrote alſo ſomething concerning Rhetoric, and it is likely he was the firſt Roman who writ upon that ſubject (m). He was accuſed ſeveral times, and always defended himſelf very well: he was ſo ſure of his innocence, that an action being brought againſt him, he offered to ſubmit to the judgment of

(g) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 347.

(b) Ibid. & pag. 344, B.

(i) Plin. in Præf. Vegetius, lib. i, cap. viii.

(k) They are ſtill extant.

(l) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 351.

(m) See Quinctilian. Inſt. Orat. lib. iii, cap. i.

‘ himſelf to wait them a ſhrewd turn, and meet with ‘ them again. For even then, while he laboured and ‘ ſued for the place, he uſed minatory ſpeeches, and gave ‘ out that they only were oppoſed againſt him, who feared ‘ they ſhould have a cenſorſhip ſharply exerciſed without ‘ partiality and reſpect of perſons. And herewith he ‘ maintained the ſuit of L. Valerius with him, ſaying ‘ that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, ‘ he ſhould be able to repreſs the wicked enormities newly ‘ come up and riſe in the city, and to bring in requeſt ‘ again the ancient manners and faſhions of the old world. ‘ Men were much moved in theſe reſpects and conſidera- ‘ tions; and ſo maugre the heads of the nobility, they ‘ not only created him Cenſor, but alſo adjoined unto him ‘ L. Valerius Flaccus for his companion in that govern- ‘ ment *.’

* Taken from Philemon Holland's Engliſh tranſlation of Pliny.

[D] The inſcription of the ſtatue erected to him was a . . . . teſtimony of his reforming inclination.] ‘ The ‘ people did like his cenſorſhip wondrous well; for ‘ ſetting up a ſtatue for him in the temple of the god- ‘ deſs of health, they put an inſcription under it, not ‘ of his warlike feats and triumphs, but ſuch a one as ‘ ſignified, That this was Cato the Cenſor, who by his ‘ good diſcipline and ordinances reclaimed the Roman ‘ commonwealth, when it was declining and ſupinely ‘ tumbling into vice (19).’ Cornelius Nepos obſerves, that Cato's ſeverity put a ſtop to the luxury which had already crept into the commonwealth. Cato Cenſor cum eodem Flacco factus, ſeverè præfuit ei poteſtati. Nam & in complures nobiles animadvertit, & multas res novas in edictum addidit, quare luxuriâ reprimeretur, quæ jam tum incipiebat pullulare (20).

(19) Plut. ubi ſupra. pag. 347.

(20) Cornel. Nepos, in Fragmento Vitæ Catonis, pag. m. 384.

[E] He expreſſed a great indifferency for the erection of ſtatues.] The following words of Plutarch are to be found next to thoſe I have quoted in the remark [D]. ‘ Now before this ſtatue honour was done to himſelf, ‘ he uſed to laugh at thoſe who loved ſuch kind of ‘ things, ſaying, They were not ſenſible that they ‘ gloried chiefly in the workmanſhip of Engravers ‘ and Painters, but that the citizens bore about his ‘ faireſt image in their breaſts. When any ſeemed to ‘ wonder at him, that he ſhould have never a ſtatue, ‘ when many ordinary perſons had one; I would, ‘ ſaid he, much rather be aſked why I have not one, ‘ than why I have one.’ Ammianus Marcellinus mentions this noble anſwer. Cenſorius Cato . . . . interrogatus quamobrem inter multos nobiles ſtatuam non haberet, malo, inquit, ambigere bonos quamobrem id non meruerim, quam, quod eſt gravius, cur impetraverim muſſitare (21). Note, that Plutarch in another place of his works (22), ſhould not have ſaid abſolutely, that Cato would not ſuffer that a ſtatue ſhould be erected to him.

(21) Amm. Marcell. lib. xiv, cap. vi, pag. m. 21.

(22) Plut. in Præcept. Reip. Ger. pag. 820, B.

[F] He inſerted ſome of his orations in his Roman Hiſtory.] He wrote that Hiſtory in his old age, and divided it into ſeven books. The firſt contained the actions of the kings of Rome; the ſecond and the third contained the origin of all the towns of Italy; for which reaſon it is thought he intituled the whole work Origines. In the fourth he deſcribed the firſt Punic war; and in the fifth he deſcribed the ſecond, which he did ſummarily, and by way of ſections. He deſcribed in the ſame manner the following wars, to the pretorſhip of Sergius Galba, who conquered the Luſitani. He mentioned things without naming thoſe who had done them. He took notice of the rarities that were to be found in Spain and Italy, and ſhewed a great deal of learning and exactneſs (23). Obſerve theſe words of Cornelius Nepos, ‘ Ab adoleſcentia ‘ confecit orationes: Senex hiſtorias ſcribere inſtituit ‘ (24); - - - He made orations from the time that he ‘ was a young man, and in his old age he ſet about ‘ writing a Hiſtory.’ And at the ſame time remember that Cicero ſays, that Cato went about that work the very ſame year that he died (25). Which affords a very good reaſon to cenſure Livy, who ſuppoſes that Lucius Valerius, tribune of the people, making a ſpeech againſt Cato in the year 558, quoted his Origines (26). Cato was then but thirty-nine years of age, from whence it ought to be inferred, that he had not writ that book yet, and that Livy, who is doubtleſs the author of the ſpeeches related by him, forgot to reconcile his ſuppoſitions with Chronology. He affords an argument againſt himſelf, for he obſerves in another place (27), that Cato's ſpeech for the Rhodians, made in the year 587, had been inſerted in the fifth book of the Origines: which ſhews, that thoſe Origines had not been publiſhed when the tribune Valerius made a ſpeech againſt Cato. It were in vain to ſuppoſe ſeveral editions of that work, ſome larger than others, ſince no ancient author intimates any ſuch thing, and beſides, the firſt was only made when the author was far advanced in years (28). Father Noris (29) found fault with Livy upon this account: Voſſius (30) had ſaid before that cardinal, that he believed Livy was miſtaken, in ſuppoſing that the tribune of the people (31) made an objection to Cato which he took out of his Origines. Obſerve, that we read in the epitome of the forty-ninth book of Livy, that Cato's ſpeech againſt Galba was to be found in the Origines. But he made it the laſt year of his life: See above, what I have quoted out of Cicero (32). He publiſhed above one hundred and fifty Orations, very much commended by Cicero, though he obſerves, that no body read them (33). Doubtleſs, they were uſed a hundred years after Cato's death, as we uſe now a-days the ſpeeches that were made in the ſtates of the kingdom of France, or at the opening of the audiences in the XVIth century. A freed man of Cicero criticized with great ſubtilty, upon Cato's ſpeech for the Rhodians; but ſee in Aulus Gellius the anſwer that was made to his criticiſms (34).

(25) See the remark [A], citation (7).

(26) Liv. lib. xxxiv, pag. m. 623.

(27) Ibid. lib. xlv, pag. 882.

(28) Cornel. Nepos, ubi ſupra.

(29) Noris Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 4.

(30) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. i, cap. v, pag. 21.

(31) His name was not Oppius, as Voſſius affirms.

(32) In the remark [A], citation (7).

(33) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 114.

Let us conſider theſe words of Cornelius Nepos, ‘ Atque horum bellorum duces non nominavit, ſed ‘ ſine nominibus res notavit. - - - He did not name the ‘ generals who commanded in thoſe wars, but ſet down ‘ their actions without their names.’ The commentators upon Pliny, without excepting Father Hardouïn, knew nothing of this paſſage. I prove it thus, Pliny obſerves, that Cato, who had ſuppreſſed the names of the generals in his Annals, mentioned the name of an elephant. ‘ Certe Cato, cum Imperatorum nomina ‘ Annalibus detraxerit, eum (elephantum) qui fortiſſime ‘ præliatus eſſet in Punica acie, Surum tradidit voca- ‘ tum (35). - - - It is certain that Cato, while he omitted the names of the generals in his Annals, did not forget to take notice that the elephant which fought moſt ſtoutly in the Carthaginian army, was called Surus.’ Read this note of Father Hardouïn (36). ‘ Auctoris men- ‘ tem aſſequi cum minime poſſent Plinii editores, hanc ‘ poſtremam vocem corruptam rati ſcripſere, cum Impe- ‘ ratorum nomina annalibus deſcriberet, contra fidem codi- ‘ cum Reg. 1, 2. ceterorumque melioris notæ, à ſcrip- ‘ toris mente longiſſime aberrantes, cujus hæc ſententia ‘ eſt: Cato, inquit, Imperatorum Punicorum nomina ‘ annalibus ſuis apponere neglexit: idem tamen, quod ‘ nomen elephanti eſſet, qui tunc fortiſſime præliatus, ‘ referre operæ pretium duxit. - - - The editors of Pliny, not underſtanding his meaning, fancied that a word was corrupted, and put in while he deſcribed (inſtead of while he omitted) the names of the generals in his Annals. But in this they contradict the beſt manuſcripts, particularly the 1ſt and 2d in the king's library, groſsly miſtaking the ſenſe of the author which is this: Cato, ſays he, left out the names of the Carthaginian generals in his Annals; at the ſame time he thought it worth his while to mention the name of the ſtouteſt elephant.’ He thought that Cato had only omitted the

(23) Taken from Cornel. Nepos, ubi ſupra.

(24) Ibid.

(35) Plin. lib. viii, cap. v, pag. m. 142.

(36) Hardouin. in Plin. Tom. i, pag. 253.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of one of his enemies [G]. He was no friend to the Phyſicians, and did not approve the ſtudies that were moſt in vogue among the Grecians [H]: nevertheleſs, he ſtudied the the names of the Carthaginian generals; he would not have thought ſo, if he had remembered the words of Cornelius Nepos.

Note, that the fragments of Cato's Origines publiſhed by Annius Viterbienſis, are accounted a ſuppoſititious piece; but thoſe which have been collected by Riccobonus, and printed at the end of his treatiſe of Hiſtory, are genuine. They have been enlarged by Auſonius Popma, and added by him with notes to the other writings of Cato (37).

(37) At Leyden 1590, in 8vo.

[G] He was accuſed ſeveral times, and defended himſelf . . . . . and offered to ſubmit to the judgment of one of his enemies.] 'But neither did he himſelf eſcape 'ſcot-free in his managery of affairs; for if he gave 'his enemies but the leaſt hold, he was ſtill in danger, 'and ready to be brought to juſtice: for he is re- 'ported to have eſcaped at leaſt fifty indictments, 'and one above the reſt, which was the laſt, when 'he was fourſcore and ſix years old, about which 'time he had this remarkable ſaying, That it was 'hard for him who had lived cotemporary with others 'a great while ago, to plead now before a new race of 'men. Neither did he make this the laſt of his law- 'ſuits; for four years after, when he was fourſcore 'and ten, he accuſed Servilius Galba: ſo that he ar- 'rived (we ſee, as Neſtor did) to three uſual ages of 'man, and that in continual action (38).' Theſe words of Plutarch want to be corrected in ſome places, for it is not true that Cato lived ſo long, and it had been better to uſe the preciſe number forty-four, as it is in Pliny. 'Cato primus Porciæ gentis, ſays he (39), 'tres ſummas in homine res præſtitiſſe exiſtimatus, ut 'eſſet optimus Orator, optimus Imperator, optimus 'Senator: quæ mihi omnia, etiamſi non prius, atta- 'men clarius fulſiſſe in Scipione Æmiliano videntur, 'dempto præterea plurimorum odio, quo Cato labo- 'ravit. Itaque ſit proprium Catonis, quater & qua- 'dragies cauſam dixiſſe, nec quenquam ſæpius poſtu- 'latum, & ſemper abſolutum. - - - It is ſaid of Cato, 'the firſt of the Porcian family, that he had three of the 'greateſt qualifications that a man can be ſuppoſed to 'have; for he was eſteemed an excellent Orator, an 'excellent General, and an excellent Senator. But in 'my opinion Scipio Æmilianus was poſſeſſed of the ſame, 'if not before Cato, at leaſt in a more eminent degree, 'with this advantage that he had not, like Cato, a 'great number of enemies. This may be peculiarly ſaid 'of Cato that he pleaded his cauſe forty-four times, and 'that no man was ever ſo often accuſed and always ac- 'quitted.' Aurelius Victor made uſe of the ſame number forty-four (40), wherein he is more exact than in what he ſays, that Cato being eighty years of age, became Galba's accuſer. He ſhould have ſaid, being eighty-five years of age: See the remark [A]. Moreri is ſtrangely miſtaken, when he ſays, that Cato's enemies proſecuted him above four hundred times. I muſt not forget theſe words of an ancient author. 'Cato 'ſextum & octogeſimum annum agens, dum in rep. 'tuenda juvenili animo perſtat, ab inimicis capitali 'crimine accuſatus, ſuam cauſam egit. Neque aut 'memoriam ejus quiſquam tardiorem, aut firmitatem 'lateris ulla ex parte quaſſatam, aut os hæſitatione 'impeditum animadvertit. Quia omnia iſta in ſtatu 'ſuo æquali ac perpetua induſtria continebat. Quin 'etiam in ipſo diutiſſimè actæ vitæ fine diſertiſſimi 'oratoris Galbæ accuſationi defenſionem ſuam pro 'Hiſpania oppoſuit (41). - - - While Cato was in the 'eighty-ſixth year of his age, and perſiſted in ſerving the 'republic with a youthful activity, he was accuſed of a 'capital crime by his enemies, and forced to plead his 'cauſe. Neither could any one perceive the leaſt decay 'in his memory, nor weakneſs in his lungs, nor faltering 'in his ſpeech. For he had preſerved all theſe in their 'wonted vigour by an even and uninterrupted exerciſe. 'Nay it was remarkable, that in the height of his old 'age, he made his defence for Spain, in oppoſition to the 'charge of that eloquent Orator Galba.' There are two faults in this paſſage, for Cato was not eighty-ſix years old, when he pleaded the firſt of the two cauſes mentioned by Valerius Maximus; and he was Galba's accuſer in the ſecond, and not obliged to clear himſelf of Galba's accuſations: the latter wanted but little of being condemned, and would have undergone that puniſhment, had he not raiſed the compaſſion of the people (42).

(38) Plut. in ejus Vita, pag. 345.

(39) Plin. lib. vii, cap. xxvii, pag. 47.

(40) Galbam octogenarius accuſavit, ipſe quadragies quater accuſatus, glorioſe abſolutus. Aurel. Victor. de Vir. Illuſtr.

(41) Val. Maximus, lib. viii, cap. vii, num. 1, pag. m. 677, 678.

(42) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 165.

To make an end of my Commentary upon the text of this remark, I need only quote Valerius Maximus, whoſe words run thus: 'Cato ſuperior ſæpenumero 'ab inimicis ad cauſæ dictionem vocatus, nec uſto 'unquam crimine convictus: ad ultimum tantum 'fiduciæ in ſua innocentia repoſuit, ut ab his in quæ- 'ſtionem publicam deductus, Ti. Gracchum, à quo in 'adminiſtratione reip. ad multum odium diſſidebat, 'judicem depoſceret. Qua quidem animi præſtantia 'pertinaciam eorum inſectandi ſe inhibuit (43). - - - - 'The elder Cato, being often accuſed by his enemies, but 'never convicted of any crime, did at laſt put ſo much 'truſt in his own innocence, that when he was brought to 'a public trial, he offered to ſubmit to the judgment 'of Ti. Gracchus, a man, whoſe meaſures he had vio- 'lently oppoſed, and who therefore was looked upon as 'his profeſſed enemy.'

(43) Valer. Maximus, lib. iii, cap. vii, num. 7, pag. 309.

[H] He was no friend to the Phyſicians, and did not approve the ſtudies that were moſt in vogue among the Grecians.] I ſhall quote Plutarch, who having ſaid, that Cato was diſpleaſed to ſee the three Philoſophers, deputed by the Athenians, ſo well approved at Rome, and that he adviſed the ſenate to ſend them home immediately (44), goes on thus. 'Yet this he did not out 'of any anger (as ſome think) to Carneades; but be- 'cauſe he wholly deſpiſed Philoſophy, and out of a 'kind of pride, ſcoffed at the Greek Muſes and Lite- 'rature: for indeed he would uſe to ſay, that Socra- 'tes was a prating ſeditious fellow. . . . . And to fright 'his ſon from any thing that was Greek, he uſed a 'much harſher tone than was uſual with one of his 'age, pronouncing, as it were, with the voice of an 'Oracle, That the Romans would certainly be deſtroy- 'ed, when they were once to be infected with Greek, 'tho' time ſhewed the vanity of this his way-ward ſay- 'ing; for in truth, the city of Rome grew never greater 'than when they entertained the Greek learning; 'nor had he an averſion only to the Grecian Philo- 'ſophers, but the Phyſicians alſo; for having, it 'ſeems, heard how Hippocrates ſhould ſay, when the 'king of Perſia ſent for him, and would have fee'd 'him even with ſeveral talents, That he would never 'aſſiſt Barbarians, who were enemies to the Grecians; 'he affirmed, that this was now become a common 'oath to be taken by all Phyſicians, and ſo enjoined 'his ſon to have a care and avoid them; for that he 'himſelf had written a little treatiſe, whereby he gave 'preſcriptions, and cured thoſe who were ſick in his 'family (45).' If you deſire to ſee the very words of Cato, read this paſſage of Pliny: 'Mox à ſævitia ſe- 'candi urendique, tranſiſſe nomen in carnificem, & 'in tædium artem omneſque Medicos, quod clariſſime 'intelligi poteſt ex M. Catone, cujus auctoritati tri- 'umphus atque Cenſura minimum conferunt: tanto 'plus in ipſo eſt. Quamobrem verba ejus ipſa pone- 'mus. Dicam de iſtis Græcis ſuo loco, Marce fili: 'quid Athenis exquiſitum habeam, & quod bonum 'ſit illorum litteras inſpicere, non perdiſcere, vincam. 'Nequiſſimum & indocile genus illorum: & hoc puta 'vatem dixiſſe: Quandocunque iſta gens ſuas litteras 'dabit, omnia corrumpet. Tum etiam magis, ſi Me- 'dicos ſuos huc mittet. Jurarunt inter ſe barbaros 'necare omnes Medicina. Et hoc ipſum mercede faci- 'unt, ut fides iis ſit, & facile diſperdant. Nos 'quoque dictitant barbaros: & ſpurcius nos, quam 'alios opicos, appellatione fœdant. Interdixi tibi de 'medicis (46). - - - Soon after, from their cutting and 'burning, they got the name of bangman, and all Phy- 'ſic and Phyſicians came to be diſliked; as evidently ap- 'pears from M. Cato, whoſe triumph and cenſorſhip add 'no weight to his authority; ſo much greater was his 'perſonal worth. For which reaſon I ſhall ſet down his 'own words. Son Marcus, ſays he, I ſhall take a 'proper opportunity of ſpeaking my mind concerning theſe 'Greeks, and of telling you what diſcoveries I have made 'at Athens. I ſhall prove that it is a good thing to know 'a little of their learning, but not to be thoroughly ac- 'quainted with it. Believe it as if an oracle had ſaid 'ſo, that they are a moſt villainous and intractable 'ſet of people. Whenever that nation ſhall introduce their 'learning here, it will corrupt every thing; eſpecially if 'they

(44) See, above, the article CARNEADES, remark [F].

(45) Plut. in Catone majore, pag. 350.

(46) Plin. lib. xxix, cap. i, pag. 667, 668.]

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the Greek tongue; but it is said that it was not till his old age [I]. He lived a long life (n); and preserved a great strength of body and mind to the last. Being a man of a strong constitution, he wanted women in his old age, and because he could not conceal, as much as he desired, his keeping a concubine, he married again [K]. His second wife was not of the same quality with him. We shall see (o) what answer he made to his son, who complained of it. It is said that this under-match did not prove so advantageous

(n) See the remark [A].

(o) In the remark [K].

'they send us their Physicians at the same time. They are sworn among themselves to destroy all Barbarians with their Physic. This they do for a fee, that they may be the more trusted, and have the better opportunity of doing the work effectually. They will call us Barbarians likewise, and give us more opprobrious names than they give to the rest. I have charged you to have nothing to do with the Physicians.' This may serve to confute those who say, that Carneades's speech against Justice, was the chief reason that moved Cato to advise the senate to send away immediately those Athenian prattlers. I know a man of great parts, who thought that Cato gave that advice, because Carneades had undermined the foundations of the Roman Policy, and discovered a mystery, which was the basis of the power and glory of that ambitious Republic. Those who governed it, made people believe, that reason and uprightness were the rule of their actions; but Carnenades speaking against Justice, alledged this proof amongst others, That the Romans would be obliged to return into huts, if they would be just, that is, restore what they had invaded (47). I believe Cato was displeased with this argument, and clearly saw the consequences of it; but I am persuaded that more powerful reasons incensed him against those Athenian deputies, &c.

(47) Omnibus populis qui florerent imperio & Romanis quoque ipsis qui totius orbis potirentur, si justi velint esse, hoc est si aliena restituant ad casas esse redeundum, & in necessitate ac miseriis jacendum. Carneades, apud Lactant. lib. v, cap. xvi, pag. 341.

Here I must take notice of a falsity that is to be found in Agrippa and Montagne, and which has been learnedly confuted by Dr Drelincourt, professor of Physic. 'Romani quondam sub Catone Censorio medi-'cos omnes & urbe tota, & tota Italia pepulerunt, eorum 'funesta mendacia, crudelitatemque aversati. - - - The 'Romans, formerly in the time of Cato, the Censor, drove 'all the Physicians out of Rome and Italy, detesting their 'pernicious lies and cruelty.' They are Agrippa's words (48): Montagne expresses himself thus (49). The Romans had been six hundred years without any Physicians, and having tried them, expelled them from Rome by the help of Cato the Censor. Many modern writers might be quoted who say the same. John Langius, a German Physician, affirms, that Cato the Censor, caused the Greek Physicians to be forbidden to come to Rome (50). Gaspar à Reies, a Spanish Physician, says, that Cato's opinion, that all the Greeks and Egyptians should be turned out of Rome, was approved without any contradiction, and that all the Physicians of Rome being natives of Greece or Egypt, were involved in the decree pronounced by the senate, pursuant to the desires of that severe Censor (51). He adds (52), that this proscription was made in the year of Rome 590, and lasted till the reign of the first emperors. But this is all groundless; for it cannot be proved that Cato used his interest with the senate or the people to obtain that decree, or that there was such a decree in his time. On the contrary, we read in Pliny, who of all ancient authors may be most easily quoted to the disadvantage of the Physicians, that the senate banished them a long time after Cato's decease. Et cum Græcos (antiqui) Italia pellerent, says he, DIU POST CATONEM, excepisse Medicos (53). The meaning of this passage seems to be, that all the Greeks, except the Physicians, were expelled from Italy. It is the sense the learned Dr Drelincourt puts upon it (54); but it is certain, those words are to be understood otherwise; they signify, that the Physicians were particularly comprehended in the expulsion; for had they been excepted, Pliny would have had no occasion to alledge the reasons so exactly mentioned by him to justify both the prejudices of Cato, and the severity of the Roman senate. 'Non 'deferam Catonem, they are his words in the following 'page, tam ambitiosæ artis invidiæ à me objectum, 'aut Senatum illum qui ita sensebat. - - - - I will 'not leave Cato, nor the senate, which passed that 'censure, exposed to the envy of such an ambitious pro-'fession.' It appears from the Law-Dictionaries (55), that the word excipere very often signifies not to except or to exclude, but namely and expresly to include. Note, that Pliny should not have said, that the city of Rome was without Physicians for the space of six hundred years. Dr Drelincourt shewed the contrary in a speech he delivered (56) in July 1671. It is a very good apology for the Physicians, and it has been reprinted twice. See also Gaspar à Reies (57).

(48) Agrippa, de Vanit. Scientiar. cap. lxxxiii, p. m. 196.

(49) Montagne, Essais, book ii, cap. xxxvii, p. m. 788.

(50) Langius, Epist. Medic. II, lib. ii, pag. 482.

(51) Gaspar à Reies, in Elysio jucund. Quæst. Campo, Quæst. I, num. 13, p. m. 11.

(52) Ibid. pag. 12, 13.

(53) Plin. lib. xxix, cap. i, pag. 668, 669.

(54) Drelincurtius, Apol. Medica, pag. 47, Edit. 1693.

(55) See Father Hardouin upon this passage of Pliny.

(56) In the university of Leyden.

(57) Reies, ubi supra, Quæst. I, num. 17.

[I] It is said he studied the Greek tongue in his old age.] I make use of these words; it is said, because there are some authorities pro and con. Cato, one of the interlocutors in Cicero's dialogues de Senectute, declares, that he began to learn the Greek tongue in his old age. 'Quid, quod etiam addiscunt (Senes) ali-'quid? ut Solonem versibus gloriantem videmus, qui 'se quotidie aliquid addiscentem senem fieri dicit. 'ut ego feci, qui Græcas litteras senex didici. Quas 'quidem sic avide arripui, quasi diuturnam sitim ex-'plere cupiens (58). - - - What shall we say as to this, 'that old men are still learning? As we find Solon boast-'ing in his poems, that he learned something new 'every day, as he grew old: and as I did, who studied 'the Greek-tongue in my old age; and took to it as gree-'dily as if I had been drinking after a long thirst.' Let us consider this passage of Plutarch: 'He is said 'to have learned Greek late, and when he was 'pretty old; and that as to his Rhetoric, he profited 'a little by Thucydides, but much more by De-'mosthenes, and indeed his writings are handsomely 'mixed both with Greek sayings and histories; 'nay, many of them translated word for word, are 'interwoven with his own apophthegms and sentences, '(59).' This passage does not favour Cicero, and one might infer from it, that Cato was not so old when he learned the Greek tongue. What I am going to say is still more proper, to shew that he learned it much sooner than it is thought. Plutarch confutes those who said, that there was still a speech of Cato delivered in Greek before the Athenians. It is not true, says Plutarch (60), for he spoke to the Athenians by an interpreter, tho' he might have made his harangue in Greek, if he had pleased. Cato was not then forty-five years of age. Some Historians say, that being Prætor in Sardinia, he was taught the Greek tongue by Ennius. 'In prætura Sardiniam 'subegit ubi ab Ennio Græcis literis institutus (61). 'He subdued Sardinia in his prætorship, and was there 'taught the Greek tongue by Ennius.' This subegit of Aurelius Victor is an untruth, which Moreri did not perceive. Sardinia was already conquered when Cato was sent thither in the quality of Prætor. Moreri says, he conquered it in the year 556. Mrs le Fevre (62) places that Prætorship in the year 555, and therefore Cato was then but thirty-six years of age, and consequently it cannot be said that he learned the Greek tongue in his old age, or the testimony of Aurelius Victor ought to be rejected. I shall quote hereafter (63) some words of Cicero, whereby it appears that our Cato had no Greek learning.

(58) Cicero, de Senectute, cap. viii, pag. m. 406. See also cap. i, pag. 386, & Valerius Maximus, lib. viii, cap. vii, n. i.

(59) Plut. in Catone Majore, Pag. 337.

(60) Ibid. pag. 343.

(61) Aurel. Victor, de Viris Illust. p. m. 70.

(62) Anna Tanaquilli Fabri filia in Aurel. Victor. ibid.

(63) In the remark [L], citation (115).

[K] He could not conceal. . . his keeping a concubine, he married again.] The following passage out of Plutarch is a good piece of history (64). 'Cato having lost his 'own wife, he married his son to the daughter of Paulus 'Æmilius, who was sister to the second Scipio Afri-'canus; so that being now a widower himself, he 'made use of a young servant maid, who came pri-'vately to him; but the house being very little, and 'a daughter-in-law also in it, the intrigue was quick-'ly discovered; for the young wench seeming one day 'to pass by a little too boldly to Cato's bed-chamber, 'the youth, his son, though he said nothing, seemed 'to look a little grim upon her; the old man per-'ceiving it a little offensive, without finding any fault, 'or saying a word, away he goes, as his custom was, 'with his usual company to the market: among the 'rest, was one Salonius, a clerk of his, to whom he 'called aloud, and asked him, whether he had married 'his daughter?' The conclusion was, that Cato desired to have that maid, and the match was quickly struck up. . . . Now whilst this marriage was in hand, Cato's son, taking some of his friends along with him, went and asked his

(64) Plut. ubi supra, pag. 333.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google advantageous to him as he expected [L]. He was a good husband, and a good father (p), and no less exact in keeping his family in good order, than in reforming the disorders of the town. Some great statesmen are not able to put their domestic concerns upon a good foot, and have a better success and less trouble in the administration of public affairs, than in the management of their families. Cato was not like them, he understood Oeconomics as well as Politics, and found the way to confine his servants tongues, so that they should not divulge what passed in his house [M]. One would his father, for what offence he brought in a mother-in-law upon him; but Cato presently cried out, Soft, and fair, good son, what thou doſt is agreeable enough to me, nor do I find any fault with it; only I desire to have several children, and to leave the common-wealth more such citizens as thou art. . . . . Cato had a son by this same venter, to whom, from his mother, he gave the surname of Salonius.' This Cato Salonius was the father of Marcus Cato, the father of Cato Uticensis, who therefore was not the grand-nephew of the Censor, as Moreri affirms (65) but his great-grand-son.

(p) See the remark [N], towards the end.

(65) This error is corrected in the edition of Paris 1699.

[L] This undermatch did not prove so advantageous to him as he expected.] St Jerome designing to prove, that those who marry a poor wife to be quiet at home, do not obtain their end, alledges the example of Cato. The severity of that Censor could not free him from the ill effect of his wife's pride, tho' she was a woman of a mean extraction. 'M. Cato Censorius habuit 'uxorem Actoriam Paulam, humili loco natam, vino-'lentam, impotentem, & (quod nemo posset credere) 'Catoni superbam. Hoc ideo dico; ne quis putet si 'pauperem duxerit, satis se concordiæ providisse (66). '---Cato the Censor married Actoria Paula, a woman 'of a mean birth, given to drinking, outragious, and '(which is a thing that one could scarce believe) insolent 'to Cato. I mention this, least any one should think that 'he has sufficiently provided for his peace at home by mar-'rying a poor wife.' I do not find that Cato had above two wives. But this passage of St Jerome cannot be understood of the first, and therefore ought to be understood of the second, tho' Plutarch does not call her Actoria Paula, and says she was the daughter of one Salonius. He gives us the following account of Cato's first marriage. 'He married a wife more noble 'than rich; being of opinion nevertheless, that both 'of them so qualified, are usually haughty and proud: 'But yet that those of noble blood, would be more 'ashamed of base things, and consequently more obe-'dient to their husbands in all that was fit and hand-'some for them (67).' From whence we may infer, that he was resolved to bear the pride of his wife, whether she was noble or rich; but that he hoped a wife of a good family would make him less uneasy than a rich one: he took other measures in his second marriage; he pitched upon a wife of no birth, and no fortune, and yet she proved proud and passionate: so easy it is to be deceived, and to make a wrong guess about such a thing. See the remark [G] in the article of AVENTINUS. A famous author quotes that passage of St Jerome, in one of his books, wherein he disapproves the custom of requiring from the students in Divinity, or the ministers, that they shall marry the widows or daughters of the pastors whom they are to succeed. He says, that such a condition is somewhat tyrannical, and that it were better to leave them at liberty to chuse a wife with a pretty good portion. 'Optandum Patroni non injicerent compedes iis, quos 'ad ministerium promovere laborant, obtrudendo illis, 'aut demortuorum Pastorum viduas, aut filias. Quod 'tamen, proh dolor! nimis quam frequenter in hoc ipso 'Fœderato Belgio contingit (68). ---It were to be 'wished, that patrons would not lay this heavy bur-'then upon such as they endeavour to put in as mini-'sters, viz. that they should be obliged to marry the wi-'dows or daughters of their deceased predecessors; which 'nevertheless, to our shame be it spoken, is too often the 'case in these United Provinces.' 'Ut non probo, says 'he (69), illius patris institutum, (videatur Plutarch. 'in Demetr.) qui ut persuadere posset filio, vetulam lo-'cupletem uxorem ducere, ex Euripidis Phœnissis occi-'nebat (70). Ubi lucrum suadet, reluctetur licet natura 'uxorem ducatis: ita neque consultum pastori, ut re-'spectu unius misericordiæ, pauperem uxorem domum 'ducat. Nam licet poëta Græcus existimet, sponsam 'sine dote non habere loquendi libertatem: talis tamen 'sæpe deprehenditur procacissima esse, atque marito 'suo quam immorigera; imo nec absimilis Actoriæ 'Paulæ, quam (testis est Hieronym. lib. 1. in Jovin.) 'cum Censorius Cato, &c. ---As I do not approve of 'that father's conduct, (See Plutarch in the life of Demetrius) who, in order to persuade his son to marry a 'rich old woman, was constantly buzzing into his ear 'this expression of Euripides, When money is to be had, 'never scruple to marry any woman, how much 'soever you may dislike her; so neither do I think it 'advisable for a pastor to marry a poor wife for the sake 'of doing an act of charity: since notwithstanding what 'the Greek Poet says, That a wife without a dowry has 'not the privilege of speaking, yet some such are to 'be found who are extreamly saucy and disobedient to 'their husbands, and not unlike Actoria Paula, whom, 'according to St Jerome, when Cato the Censor, &c.' There may be some reason in what he says.

(66) Hieronym. adv. Jovinianum, lib. 1, pag. m. 37.

(67) Plut. ubi supra, pag. 347.

(68) Schoockius, ubi infra.

(69) Martinus Schoockius, Exercitat. pag. 259, Edit. in 4*to.*

(70) See, above, citation (4), of the article PHILLA.

[M] He found the way to confine his servants tongues, so that they should not divulge what passed at home.] The following passage shews how he behaved himself towards his slaves. 'He purchased a great many 'slaves out of the captives taken in war, but chiefly 'he bought up the young ones, who were capable to 'be (as it were) broken and taught like little whelps 'and colts; but none of these ever went into another 'man's house, except sent either by Cato himself, or 'his wife. If any one of them were asked what Cato 'did, they answered, They did not know. When a 'servant was at home, he was obliged either to do 'some work, or sleep; for indeed Cato loved those 'most, who used to lie down often to take a nap, 'accounting them more docile than those who sate up 'much, and more fit for any thing, when they were 'refreshed with a little slumber. Being also of an 'opinion, That servants would take the greatest pains 'imaginable to satisfy their venery, he set a certain 'price to be paid by those who conforted with his 'bondwomen, but would suffer none to be concerned 'with any others abroad. At first, when he was but 'a poor soldier, he would not be difficult in any thing 'which related to his diet, but looked upon it as a 'pitiful mean thing, to quarrel with a servant for 'the sake of his own belly; but afterwards, when he 'grew richer, and made any feasts for his friends and 'companions, presently when supper was done, would 'he with a leathern thong scourge those who had 'waited and dressed the meat carelessly. He always 'contrived that his servants should have some diffe-'rence one among another, always suspecting and 'fearing a good understanding between them. Now 'those who had committed any thing worthy of 'death, he accordingly punished, if in the opinion of 'their fellow-servants they were found guilty (71).' This passage contains several particulars, whereby it appears, that Cato was a man of great sense and great ability. His finding out a way to prevent his servants divulging what passed in his house, is a greater exploit than one can think. Such a thing is near as difficult as to find out the Philosophers stone: besides it is of great advantage; for can there be a greater slavery, than to be afraid of the prattling of one's servants? It is to be a slave in one's own house. This is admirably well expressed by Juvenal.

(71) Plut. ubi supra, pag. 348.

- - - Taceant illi, sed prodere malunt
Arcanum, quam subrepti potare Falerni,
Pro populo faciens quantum Lausella bibebat.
*Vivendum recte cum propter plurima, tunc his Præcipue caussis, ut linguas mancipiorum
Contemnas: nam lingua mali pars pessima servi.*
Deterior tamen hic, qui liber non erit, illis
Quorum animas & farre suo custodit, & ære (72).

(72) Juven. Sat. IX, ver. 115.

*- - - There's a lust in man no charm can tame,
Of loudly publishing our neighbour's shame;*

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google would think that he was to blame for ſuffering them to lie with his maids for a certain ſum of money which they were to pay him (q); but he had ſome reaſons for it. He was more liable to cenſure upon another account, I mean for his eagerneſs to improve his eſtate, and increaſe his revenues; for he was guilty of the worſt ſort of uſury [N]. I have mentioned, in another place (r), the ſpeech he made for the preſervation of the law, whereby women were forbidden to wear ornaments: I have alſo pointed, in the ſame place, at a ſpeech which ſhews, that he knew how to enliven the majeſty and gravity of his diſcourſes. We ſhould have a wrong notion of him, ſhould we think that auſterity was the only ingredient in his ſpeeches and converſations; for he knew how to intermix them with railleries and agreeable ſtrokes: he had many witty ſayings [O]; even young people might have been pleaſed with his converſation; he talked freely

(q) See the remark [M].

(r) In the remark [B], of the article PRETEXTATUS.

On eagles wings immortal ſcandals fly,
While virtuous actions are but born and dye.
Let us live well, were it alone for this,
The baneful tongues of ſervants to deſpiſe.
Slander (the worſt of poiſons) ever finds
An eaſy entrance, to ignoble minds:
And they whoſe vicious lives ſuch abject foes muſt fear
More mean and wretched far than their own ſlaves appear.

STEPH. HARVEY.

Cato had not ſo much reaſon as many other Romans to be afraid of the indiſcretion of his ſlaves; but he looked upon their ſilence as a thing that was requiſite in a well-ordered houſe. He is not to blame for hating their ſprightlineſs; for commonly the more lively and ingenious footmen are, the greater knaves they prove. When the miniſters of a prince do not love one another, ſome keep a watchful eye over the conduct of others, they dread one another, and their maſter is thereby better ſerved, and leſs betrayed. The ſame may be ſaid, in proportion, concerning private families, where there are a great many ſervants; and it may be inferred from thence, that Cato acted according to his uſual prudence, when he cunningly fomented diſcord among his domeſtics. He cannot be ſo well excuſed for permitting them to lie with his maids for a certain price. It was a natural conſequence of his forbidding them to ſport out of his houſe; but at preſent ſuch a regulation would not be approved; there is no houſe of honour where ſuch a ſport is allowed; and maids are turned out whether they play their leud tricks at home or abroad. As for the men, it is required they ſhould keep themſelves chaſte, at leaſt within doors.

[N] His eagerneſs to improve his eſtate . . . . he was guilty of the worſt ſort of uſury.] 'But being, after 'all, much given to an extravagant deſire of gain, he 'looked upon agriculture rather as a pleaſure than 'profit; reſolving therefore to lay out his money in 'laſting and ſolid things, he purchaſed ponds, hot-'baths, grounds full of Fullers-earth, paſtures and 'wood, whereby a great revenue flowed in unto him, 'and ſuch a one (he uſed to ſay) as Jupiter himſelf 'could not hurt. He was alſo given to a moſt blame-'able uſury in his traffic by ſea; and that was thus: 'He would that thoſe whom he put out his money 'to, ſhould have many partners: Now when the 'number of them and their ſhips came to be fifty, he 'himſelf would put in but one ſhare; for which 'Quintion, whom he had made a freeman, and who 'traded and ſailed along with the ſaid adventurers, 'was to be his factor; ſo that thus there was no dan-'ger of loſing his whole ſtock, but only a little part, 'and that with a proſpect of great profit. He like-'wiſe lent money to thoſe of his ſlaves who would 'borrow any, with which they bought alſo other 'young ones, whom, when they had taught and bred 'up at his charges, they would ſell again at the year's 'end; but ſome of them Cato would keep for him-'ſelf, giving juſt as much for them as another had of-'fered. To incline his ſon to be of this kind of 'temper, he would uſe to ſay, That it was not like a 'ſolid man to leſſen an eſtate, but rather like a weak 'widow. But a farther argument of Cato's avaricious 'humour, was, when he took the boldneſs to affirm, 'That he was a moſt wonderful, nay, a godlike man, who 'left more behind him than he received' (73).' Theſe are wrong maxims: His advice and example, in this reſpect, were very pernicious to his ſon, and did not anſwer the care he had taken in other reſpects to bring him up, like a good father. He himſelf taught him learning, though he had a ſlave who taught many others: But he thought not fit, as he himſelf ſaid, to have his ſon reprimanded by a ſervant; or lugged, it may be, by the ears, when found tardy in his leſſon: Nor would he have him owe to a ſervant the obligation of ſo great a thing as his learning; wherefore he himſelf (as we were ſaying) taught him his Grammar, Law, and Fencing: Nor did he only ſhew him to bow to throw a dart, to fight with other arms, and to ride; but even to play at fiſty-cuffs, to endure both heat and cold, and to ſwim over the moſt rapid and rough rivers. He ſays likewiſe, That he wrote Hiſtories in great characters, with his own hand, that ſo his ſon, without ſtirring out of the houſe, might learn the experience and virtuous exploits of his forefathers: Nor did he leſs abſtain from ſpeaking any thing obſcene before his ſon, than if it had been in the preſence of thoſe ſacred virgins which we call Veſtals (74). Cato practiſed a very fine maxim, which Juvenal deſcribes thus,

(73) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 349.

(74) Ibid. pag. 348.

Nil dictu fœdum viſuque hæc limina tangat,
Intra quæ puer eſt. Procul hinc, procul inde puellæ
Lenonum, & cantus pernoctantis paraſiti.
Maxima debetur puero reverentia: ſi quid
Turpe paras, nec tu pueri contempſeris annos,
Sed peccaturo obſiſtat tibi filius infans (75).

Suffer no leudneſs, or undecent ſpeech,
Th' apartment of the tender youth to reach;
Far be from thence the glutton paraſite,
Singing his drunken catches all the night:
But farther ſtill be woman; woman firſt
Was evil's cauſe, herſelf of ills the worſt.
Boys ev'n from parents may this rev'rence claim;
For when thou doſt at ſome vile action aim,
Say, ſhould the harmleſs child with-hold thy hand,
Would it not put thy fury to a ſtand?

J. DRYDEN, jun.

(75) Juven. Sat. XIV, ver. 44. See alſo Plato in the fifth book de Legibus.

[O] He had many witty ſayings.] Plutarch has collected many of them (76): I ſhall only mention one, uſing Balzac's paraphraſe and prologue. 'The very 'Cenſors, Madam, though ſadneſs ſeemed to be one of 'the functions of their office, did not altogether lay 'aſide all manner of raillery. They were not always 'bent upon ſeverity; and the firſt Cato, that trouble-'ſome and intolerable honeſt man, ceaſed ſometimes 'to be troubleſome and intolerable. He had ſome 'glimpſes of mirth, and ſome intervals of good hu-'mour. He dropped now and then ſome words that 'were not unpleaſant; and you may, Madam, judge 'of the reſt by this. He had married a very hand-'ſome wife, and Hiſtory tells us, That ſhe was ex-'tremely afraid of the thunder, and loved her huſ-'band very well. Thoſe two paſſions prompting her 'to the ſame thing, ſhe always pitched upon her 'huſband as a ſanctuary againſt thunder, and threw 'herſelf into his arms, at the firſt noiſe ſhe fancied 'ſhe heard in the ſky. Cato, who was well pleaſed 'with the ſtorm, and very willing to be careſſed 'more than uſually, could not conceal his joy: He 'revealed that domeſtic ſecret to his friends, and 'told them one day, ſpeaking of his wife, that ſhe 'had found out a way to make him love bad weather, 'and that he never was ſo happy as when Jupiter 'was

(76) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 349, & in Apophth. pag. 198.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google freely at table with his friends, and had always ſome merry thoughts. He was then very well pleaſed to hear them diſcourſe of the merit of illuſtrious men, but would not ſuffer that the wicked ſhould be well or ill ſpoken of. I muſt not forget the judgment he made of kings, whom he took to be inferior in merit to the great man who had flouriſhed in a republican ſtate [P]. I muſt alſo take notice of the opinion he entertained of women guilty of adultery: he believed they were all poiſoners [Q]. This was very ſevere, but not ſo much as the puniſhment he inflicted upon a Roman Senator for kiſſing his wife in the preſence of his daughter (s), for he ſtruck him out of the liſt of the ſenators merely upon that account. It is ſaid that he would not have grown young again; a thought very worthy of his great ſenſe [R]. What he told a nobleman, whom he ſaw coming out of a bawdy-houſe, ſavours of a looſe morality; but he might have excuſed himſelf by alledging this axiom, that out of two evils the worſt ought to be avoided [S]. It is a miſtake to ſay, that he introduced among the Romans the cuſtom of

(s) See the remark [O], towards the end.

'was angry. The man who diverted himſelf in this 'faſhion was upon other occaſions all ſeverity. He 'was all rigor, all juſtice (77).'

(77) Balzac, Diſcours à Madame la Marquiſe de Rambouillet, pag. m. 49, 50, of his Oeuvres diverſes.

It will not be improper to obſerve at what time he ſaid this; it was during his cenſorſhip, when he degraded the ſenator Manlius, who, it is likely, would have been made conſul the year following, and was only degraded for giving a kiſs to his wife in the day-time, and in the preſence of his daughter (78). Some are of opinion, That at Rome, and in ſome other countries, it is neither becoming nor prudent, for a huſband to careſs his wife in the ſight of his children; nevertheleſs, they believe that Cato was too rigid, and that he made the education of children too difficult: They take it to be a piece of injuſtice, that the ſenator Manlius ſhould have paid ſo dear for ſuch a kiſs. Plutarch taxes Cato with too great a ſeverity, but at the ſame time he blames Manlius. Theſe are his words, Cato deprived a Roman ſenator of the ſenatorial dignity, becauſe he kiſſed his wife in his daughter's preſence, wherein he was a little too rigid. But if it be a ſhameful thing, as certainly it is, to kiſs and embrace one another in the preſence of others (79); it is more ſhameful ſtill to abuſe and chide one another, to ſport with a wife in private, and then to reprove and give her hard words before every body (80).

(78) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 346.

(79) Εἰ δὲ αἰσχρὸν ἐστιν ὅσα πρὸ ὀφθαλμῶν ἐστιν ἅπαντων παρόντων ἀσπάζεσθαι καὶ φιλεῖν καὶ περιβάλλειν ἀλλήλους. Sed tamen ſi eſt (ut profecto eſt) turpe conjuges in præſentia aliorum blandiri, oſculari, & amplécti ſeſe invicem. Ibid. See, below, citation (109), (110).

[P] The judgment he made of kings, whom he took to be inferior in merit to the great men . . . . . of a republican ſtate.] 'King Eumenes being come to Rome, 'the ſenate gave him a very good reception, and the 'greateſt men of the town ſtrove to careſs and honour 'him. But Cato appeared unwilling to do the ſame, 'and did not care to ſee him. Whereupon a friend 'of his told him, I wonder you ſhun king Eumenes, 'who is a very good prince, and a great friend to the 'Romans. To which he anſwered, I have nothing 'to ſay againſt it: however, this I muſt needs ſay, 'that a king is by his nature a ravenous beaſt; and 'there never was a king, though never ſo commend'able, that deſerved to be compared with Epaminon'das, Pericles, Themiſtocles, Manius Curius, or A'milcar, firnamed Barca (81).' Which puts me in mind of what I have heard ſome Engliſh gentlemen ſay, that royalty is a very chargeable thing, and that many ſoldiers and ſhips would be maintained with what is neceſſary for the maintenance of a king. It is certain that a king's expences, merely for the civil liſt, are prodigious. How many guards and officers muſt be kept in pay? One volume would not be ſufficient to explain all the offices belonging to the court of the emperor of Conſtantinople; and any one who reads the State of France (82), and finds ſo many uſeleſs mouths in it, the twentieth part whereof would be ſufficient to maintain and ſerve the king, ſo that the reſt are only a troubleſome and ſtately ſuperfluity, muſt needs own, that this very thing would be a burthen upon the people. The ſame ſuperfluities are to be ſeen, in proportion, in all monarchical governments; and if it had been ſaid, that they may be of uſe to imprint a reſpect in the inferiors, and to give foreigners a great notion of the power of a prince, Cato would have anſwered, That that very thing ſhewed that kings are neceſſarily ſuch as he deſcribed them.

(80) Id. in Præceptis Conjugalibus, pag. 139, D, E.

(81) Plut. in Caton. Majore, pag. 340.

(82) It is a book reprinted very often. Codinus (they are Vigneul Marville's words, pag. 70, of the third volume of his Mélanges) in his account of the ceremonies obſerved at the table of the emperors of Conſtantinople, makes me ſweat at the ſight of ſo many myſteries.

[Q] The opinion he entertained of women guilty of adultery . . . . that they were all poiſoners.] Quintilian ſays, This judgment was an authority that might be alledged by an advocate pleading againſt an adultereſs, who is accuſed of being a poiſoner. Si cauſſam veneficii dicat adultera, non Marci Catonis judicio damnata videatur, qui nullam adulteram non eandem eſſe veneficam dixit (83)? Quintilian is in the right to think that this ſentence of Cato was of ſome weight in the cauſes ſpecified by him; but, generally ſpeaking, it is not to be admitted. If it be true, that a huſband has been poiſoned, and that his wife had committed adultery, thoſe who think ſhe is guilty of her huſband's death, go upon ſtrong preſumptions, and may lay great ſtreſs upon her adultery; but it would be wrong to infer, without any exception, that ſince a wife is not faithful to her huſband ſhe will poiſon him. Many ſuch women are kind to their huſbands, and take care of them when they are ſick. In a word, they would by no means poiſon them, though they were of a croſs humour: and therefore Cato's maxim is overſtrained.

(83) Quintil. Inſt. Orat. lib. v, cap. xi, pag. m. 244.

[R] It is ſaid that he would not have grown young again.] The words aſcribed to him by Cicero, upon this ſubject are admirable. '(84) Quo quidem me 'proficiſcentem (85) haud ſane quis facile retraxerit, 'neque tamquam Peliam recoxerit (86); & ſi quis 'Deus mihi largiatur, ut ex hac ætate repueriſcam, & 'in cunis vagiam, valde recuſem: nec vero velim, 'quaſi decurſo ſpatio, ad carceres à calce revocari: 'quid enim habet vita commodi? quid non potius la'boris? ſed habeat ſane; habet certe tamen aut ſatie'tatem, aut modum; non lubet enim mihi deplorare 'vitam, quod multi & ii docti ſæpe fecerunt, neque 'me vixiſſe pœnitet: quoniam ita vixi, ut non fruſtra 'me natum exiſtimem: & ex vita ita diſcedo, tam'quam ex hoſpitio, non tamquam ex domo: commo'randi enim natura diverſorium nobis, non habitandi 'dedit. - - - While I am going thither, no man ſhould eaſily prevail upon me to return back, or to have my fleſh renewed like Pelias. If any god put it in my choice to grow young again at this age, and to ſquawl out in a cradle, I ſhould certainly beg to be excuſed; neither would I incline to begin my race anew, after having almoſt reached the goal. For what is there in life ſo much to be deſired? Or rather what things are in it not diſagreeable? But let us ſuppoſe it to be a ſtate of pleaſure, there ought to be a fulneſs of that pleaſure, at leaſt ſome bounds ſet to it. I am not ſorry for having lived, as many learned men have pretended to be, neither do I repent of it; becauſe I have lived in ſuch a manner as to think that I was not born in vain. I leave the world not as an houſe, but as an inn upon the road: for nature has provided us with a lodging for a ſhort ſtay, not for a conſtant habitation.' Obſerve the coherence of the maxims of that great man. He was not ſorry that he had lived, he believed he had acted a glorious part upon the ſtage of the world, and yet he would not go through it again, if a god ſhould offer it him (87); and he does not inſiſt upon a reaſon, which he took to be a true one, viz. That this life is liable to a thouſand inconveniencies, and has very few conveniencies.

(84) Cicero, de Senect. cap. ult. pag. m. 452.

(85) That is, to the place whither the ſouls repair when they leave their bodies.

(86) See the remark [C], in the article PELIAS, concerning the miſtake that is here.

(87) See the end of the remark [R], in the article TULLIA.

[S] What he told a nobleman whom he ſaw coming out of a bawdy-houſe, ſavours of a looſe morality; but he might have excuſed himſelf by alledging this axiom, that out of two evils the worſt ought to be avoided.] I think Horace is the only perſon who mentions this particular,

Nil medium eſt. Sunt, qui nolint tetigiſſe, niſi illas,
Quarum ſubſutâ talos tegat inſtita veſte:
Contrà, alius nullam, niſi olenti in fornice ſtantem.
Quidam notus homo cùm exiret fornice, Macte

Virtute

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of kiſſing their kinſwomen, to know whether they had drunk wine [T]. As for the reſt,

Virtute eſto, inquit ſententia dia Catonis.
Nam ſimul ac venas inflavit tetra libido,
Huc juvenes æquum eſt deſcendere, non alienas
Permolere uxores (88).

(88) Horat. Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 28.

That is, as Mr Dacier renders it, 'People do not 'know how to keep a medium. Some do not care 'to meddle with any women, but ſuch ladies as wear 'long robes trimmed with purple. Others are only for 'common women. Whereupon it is ſaid, that the 'Divine Cato ſeeing a man of quality coming out of 'a houſe of ill repute, told him: Well done, dear 'Sir, go on; thither you ought to go, when you are 'inflamed with love, inſtead of debauching your neigh-'bour's wife.' Here follows Mr Dacier's note upon Macte virtute eſto (89): 'They are the words of Cato 'the Cenſor, who ſeeing a man of quality coming out 'of a houſe of ill repute, praiſed him, and exhorted 'him to do always ſo; but obſerving afterwards that 'he kept there continually, he told him, Friend, I 'praiſed you for going thither ſometimes, but not for 'making your conſtant abode in that place. Adoleſcens, 'ego te laudavi quòd interdùm huc venires; non quòd hic 'habitares.'

(89) Dacier upon this paſſage of Horace, Tom. vi, pag. 130, 131, Dutch edition.

[T] It is a miſtake to ſay that he introduced among the Romans the cuſtom of kiſſing their kinſwomen, to know whether they had drunk wine.] There is no doubt that the Romans forbad women the uſe of wine, and that to prevent their drinking of it in private, they introduced the cuſtom for men to kiſs their kinſwomen (90); but it is not true that Cato eſtabliſhed that law or that cuſtom. We read in Pliny (91) that one Egnatius Mecenius, who killed his wife, becauſe ſhe had drank wine, was acquitted by Romulus. We read the ſame thing in Servius, upon the 737th verſe of the firſt book of the Æneid. The abſolution of that huſband ought not to be looked upon as a ſtrange thing, ſince by the law of Romulus the puniſhment of a wife for her crimes was left to the diſcretion of the huſband and relations; and the two greateſt crimes ſhe could be guilty of, were to be unfaithful to her huſband, and to drink wine. Romulus, when he eſtabliſhed that law, was perſuaded that a woman guilty of adultery would attempt any thing; and that the drinking of wine was the beginning of adultery. This you may ſee in Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (92). It is highly probable, that the firſt king of Rome followed therein the old laws of Italy, among which none was more ancient than that whereby women were forbidden to drink wine; for we find that king Faunus whipped his wife to death, becauſe ſhe drank ſome, contrary to cuſtom. Sex. Clodius in eo libro quem Græcè ſcripſit, refert Fauni hanc uxorem fuiſſe: quæ quia CONTRA MOREM, decuſque regium clam vini ollam ebiberat, & ebria facta erat, virgis myrteis à viro uſque ad mortem cæſa (93). Plutarch mentions this, as you will ſee hereafter, in a place where I correct a fault, which, as far as I can remember, the critics have taken no notice of.

(90) See the paſſage of Valerius Maximus, quoted above, in citation (49), of the article EREMITA; and Aulus Gellius, lib. x, cap. xxiii; and Tertullian, in Apologet. cap. vi.

(91) Plin. lib. xiv, cap. xiii.

(92) In the ſecond book of the Roman Antiquities, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 93.

(93) Lact. lib. i, cap. xxii. See alſo Arnobius, lib. v, p. 165, & Plutarch. ubi infra.

From what has been ſaid, it ought to be inferred, That Cato the Cenſor was not the author of that law I have been ſpeaking of; and therefore there is a great miſtake in theſe words of Lomeierus: 'Apud 'Romanos mulieres paſſim oſculo ſalutabantur à pro-'pinquis, quo explorarent, an contra legem temetum 'olerent. Inſtitutum hoc erat Catonis teſte Plinio, 'lib. xiv. cap. 13 (94). - - - The Romans ſaluted their 'kinſwomen wherever they met them, in order to find 'out whether they had been drinking wine contrary to the 'law. According to Pliny, this was inſtituted by Cato.' This he ſays in his diſſertation concerning kiſſes. He has quoted Pliny, without giving himſelf the trouble to conſult him; for if he had conſulted him, he would have found that Pliny cites Cato, not as having introduced thoſe cuſtoms, but only as a writer, who mentioned them. 'Cato (ſcripſit) ideo propinquos fe-'minis oſculum dare, ut ſcirent an temetum olerent. 'Hoc tum nomen vino erat, unde & temulentia ap-'pellatur (95). - - - Cato writes, that men kiſſed their 'kinſwomen for this reaſon, that they might know whe-'ther they ſmelt of temetum, which at that time was 'the name for wine; from thence comes the word temulentia (ſignifying drunkenneſs).' I think Lomeierus took what he ſays from Kempius, whoſe words he read with little attention. He has vented a falſity for want of underſtanding the words of that writer; and another, though he underſtood them. Kempius affirms, That women were forbidden the uſe of wine by Cato's authority; and that afterwards the men began to kiſs their kinſwomen, to know whether they acted contrary to the law. 'Poſtmodum Succeſſu temporis '(96) cum ex auctoritate M. Catonis vinum mulieri-'bus interdictum eſſet, primùm viri cognatarum os 'cæperunt oſculari, ut odor indicium faceret, ſi bi-'biſſent. Affinibus & propinquis oſculari eas jus eſt, ut 'ſobrias comprobent, inquit Arnobius Lib. II. adverſus 'gentes. Vinum enim mulierem bibiſſe perindè erat, 'ac ſi in adulterio ac gravi crimine deprehenſa, capi-'tali ſupplicio plectenda eſſet, ceu Plinius habet Li-'bro XIV. Hiſtor. Nat. cap. 13 (97). - - - Afterwards 'in proceſs of time, when women were forbidden the uſe 'of wine by Cato's authority, men firſt began to kiſs their 'kinſwomen, that they might diſcover by the ſmell whe-'ther they had been drinking. Arnobius ſays, that their kinſmen and relations kiſſed them to make proof of their ſobriety. For the ſame puniſhment 'was inflicted upon a woman for drinking, as if ſhe 'had been convicted of adultery, or ſome other capital 'crime; according to Pliny Book XIV of his Natural 'Hiſtory.' It is plain that the quotation out of Pliny, at the end of this paſſage, does not concern the beginning of it; and yet Lomeierus made uſe of it to prove what he tranſcribed from Kempius, at the beginning of the Latin words which I have juſt now quoted.

(94) Lomeier, Genial. Dierum, Part i, pag. 357.

(95) Ibid.

(96) The reader had quoted the Canon-Law, and mentioned ſeveral things that happened after Cato; judge therefore whether his Poſtmodum, &c. is rightly placed.

(97) Martinus Kempius, Diſſert. XVI, de Oſculis, pag. m. 637.

Here is the fault, which, as I have ſaid, has not been obſerved in Plutarch's text. That Hiſtorian having aſked why the Roman ladies carried no myrtle into the chappel of the good goddeſs, though they uſed all other ſorts of leaved branches, anſwers, that the reaſon of it was, becauſe that goddeſs had been married to a man, who whipped her with a rod of myrtle, when he came to know that ſhe had drunk wine. Πότερον (ὡς οἱ μυθολογοῦντες ἱστοροῦσι) Φαυλίᾳ μὲν ἦν γυνὴ τῶ μάντεως, οἴνῳ δὲ χρησαμένη κρύφα, καὶ μὴ λαθοῦσα, ῥάβδοις ὑπὸ τῦ ἀνδρὸς ἐκολάσθη μυρσίνης (98). That is, as Xylander renders it, An credendum eſt fabulæ, quæ perhibet Faulii cujuſdam aruſpicis uxorem cùm clàm poto vino non ſeſe-liſſet, à marito virgis myrteis fuiſſe caſtigatam. The Greek word Φαυλία, ought to be changed into Φαύνα; for not only the author quoted by Lactantius affirms, that the good goddeſs had been married to Faunus, &c (99); but Plutarch obſerves it alſo in the life of Cæſar. Ῥωμαῖοι δὲ νύμφην δρυάδα Φαύνῳ συνοικήσασαν. Romanam nympham Dryada Fauno nuptam (100). The Latin tranſlator might have boldly corrected that paſſage, but inſtead of rectifying it, he ſpoils it, and tranſlates it wrong. He ſuppoſes that Plutarch anſwered, that myrtle was not carried into the chapel of the goddeſs, becauſe the wife of one Phaulius had been whipped, &c. This is not the ſenſe of the original; Plutarch does not denote a man who may be called ſlightingly, quidam, a certain man; he ſays, That the woman whipped by her huſband was the ſame that was worſhipped at Rome by the name of the good goddeſs. Amyot avoided this laſt miſtake, which is the moſt conſiderable. He tranſlates the paſſage in this manner: Is it becauſe ſome fabulouſly report that ſhe was married to one Flavius a ſoothſayer, and that her huſband having ſurprized her while ſhe was drinking wine privately, whipped her with rods of myrtle. Boxhornius (101) made no obſervation upon Xylander's tranſlation of thoſe words.

(98) Plut. in Quæſt. Romanis, pag. 268, D.

(99) See, above, citation (95).

(100) Plut. in Cæſare, pag. 711.

(101) He publiſhed, with notes, Plutarch's tract de Fluminibus Romanis, in Greek and Latin, in the year 1637, in 4to.

What I have ſaid concerning the cuſtom of the Romans, who kiſſed their kinſwomen, wants a further explanation. Plutarch explains it very well, and it appears from the account he gives of it, that the women went and kiſſed their kinſmen, when they met them. This is a remarkable circumſtance, which the other writers have wholly omitted. Why, ſays he (102), do women kiſs the mouth of their kinſmen? Is it becauſe, as moſt think, women being forbidden to drink wine, a cuſtom was introduced, that they ſhould kiſs the mouth of their kinſmen, when they met them, that thoſe who had drunk ſome might be convicted of it? or for the reaſon alledged by Ariſtotle the Philoſopher (103) - - - - - or rather, that privilege was granted to the ladies, as a thing that redounded to their honour, when it appeared that they were related to many honeſt men: or becauſe men

(102) Plut. ibid. pag. 265.

(103) Viz. that the Trojan ladies having burnt Æneas's fleet, pacified the men by their embraces and kiſſes.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

reſt, he was both a great Orator and a profound Civilian [U]; two qualities which ſeldom meet together, no more than thoſe of eloquent Preacher and learned Divine (t). You will ſee in one of the remarks (u), in what degree Cato Uticenſis deſcended from him. I have obſerved ſeveral faults in the Hiſtorical Dictionaries and in ſome other writers, which I ſhall ſet down in my ſupplement, where I ſhall give the article of the other illuſtrious Cato's.

(t) See the remark [U].

(u) At the end of the remark [K].

men were not allowed to marry their kinſwomen, the latter were permitted to make much of them, ſo far as to kiſs them, which was the only ſign of kindred amongſt them; for heretofore they did not marry women related to them, as now it is not lawful for them to marry their aunts and ſiſters, and it was a long time before they were allowed to marry their couſins. I need not examine whether the reaſons alledged by Plutarch are very ſolid; I ſhall only conſider the facts mentioned by him, which are worth knowing. It plainly appears from his words, that the women kiſſed the men publickly, as they met them either in the ſtreets, or elſewhere. Civility required that the men ſhould not begin firſt, for it would have looked as if they had ſome ſuſpicion that their kinſwomen had drunk wine. The women were to preſent their mouths, and that very thing was a ſign they were not guilty. Their innocence had been doubtful, had they not boldly and readily offered to kiſs the men. Such a cuſtom at this day would occaſion many new thoughts, and a world of witty conceits and ſorry jeſts, for men are ſometimes very ſweet upon their couſins. A wiſe mother would not be very willing that the couſins of her daughters ſhould have the privilege of knowing whether they ſmell of wine. It is to be obſerved, that Propertius told his unfaithful miſtreſs (104), in a reproachful manner, that ſhe pretended to have more kinſmen than ſhe had, that ſhe might not want kiſſes, (104) Cynthia, and not Phryne, as Kempius, ubi ſupra, pag. 636, falſly ſuppoſes.

Quin etiam falſos fingis tibi ſæpe propinquos
Oſcula ne deſint (105) qui tibi jure ferant (106).

Often falſe kinſmen you invent for this,
That you may have a fair pretence to kiſs.

(105) There is in the printed copies nec deſunt: I follow Gebhardus's correction.

(106) Propert. Eleg. VI, lib. II.

I ſhall conclude this remark, as I have begun it, that is, with cenſuring a fault concerning Cato. Kempius ſays, that he publiſhed a law whereby married people were forbidden to kiſs one another in the preſence of their daughters, and he quotes Plutarch for it. But Plutarch ſays no ſuch thing: we have ſeen above (107) what he ſays upon that ſubject. 'Nihilominus tamen parcè inter veteres maritale oſculum, '& non niſi admodum circumſpectè, ac remotis arbitris, ne liberi ſcilicet inde furtivis amorum illecebris ſtimularentur, M. Catonem Cenſorinum (108) 'Stoicæ diſciplinæ addictum, edicto prohibuiſſe, ne 'Maritus conjugem deoſcularetur in præſentiâ filiæ, 'Manliumque, quem omnium opinio Conſulem deſignabat, Senatu ejeciſſe, quod uxorem coram filia nubili exoſculatus eſſet, Auctor eſt Plutarchus in Catonis vitâ pag. 346 (109). - - - Nevertheleſs among 'the ancients conjugal kiſſes were given in a very frugal and circumſpect manner, and that too when no body 'was by; for fear that the children ſhould be inflamed 'thereat with the hidden temptations of love. Plutarch 'relates that Cato the Cenſor made a law which forbid 'the huſband to kiſs the wife before the daughter, and 'that he degraded the Senator Manlius, who, as every 'body expected, was to have been conſul for the year 'following, becauſe he had kiſſed his wife in preſence of 'their daughter that was grown up.' It is not true, that Cato enacted any law, or cauſed it to be enacted on that account. He puniſhed Manlius by the ſole authority of his office, which could not ſerve for a precedent: the Cenſors who ſucceeded him were not obliged to imitate him. I find no other example of ſuch a puniſhment, and it is very likely a great many people uſed the ſame liberty that Manlius took. The laws can hardly extend to ſuch prohibitions; all that can be done, is to give good advice, and make people afraid of being cenſured. I think Clemens Alexandrinus did not blame Cato's ſeverity. See how he adviſes married people to forbear kiſſing one another in the preſence of their ſervants (110).

(107) In the remark [O].

(108) It ſhould be Cenſorium. It is not true that this Cato was addicted to the ſect of the Stoics. Kempius miſtakes him for Cato Uticenſis, his great-grandſon.

(109) Kempius, ubi ſupra, Diſſert. XV, pag. 615.

(110) Clemens Alexandr. Pædag. lib. iii, cap. xii, pag. m. 258.

(111) Val. Maximus, lib. viii, cap. vii, num. 1.

(112) Quintil. Orat. Inſtit. lib. xii, cap. iii, pag. m. 565.

[U] He was both a great Orator and a profound Civilian.] See Valerius Maximus (111), and Quintilian (112), or rather, this fine paſſage of Cicero, whereby it appears, that Cato excelled in many things. 'Quid 'Marco Catoni præter hanc politiſſimam doctrinam 'tranſmarinam, atque adventitiam defuit? num quia 'jus civile didicerat, cauſas non dicebat? aut quia 'poterat dicere, juris ſcientiam negligebat? at utroque in genere & laboravit, & præſtitit: num propter 'hanc ex privatorum negociis collectam gratiam tardior in republica capeſſenda fuit? nemo apud populum fortior, nemo melior ſenator, idem facile optimus imperator: denique nihil in hac civitate temporibus illis ſciri, diſcive potuit, quod ille non tum 'inveſtigarit, & ſcierit, tum etiam conſcripſerit (113). - - - What elſe was wanting in Marcus Cato, beſides 'that polite and foreign learning which was newly 'brought to Rome? Did he forbear to plead cauſes, for 'having ſtudied the Civil Law? or did he neglect that 'ſtudy, becauſe he had the art of pleading well? No, he 'applied himſelf to both with great induſtry and ſucceſs. 'Was he at all the more remiſs in ſerving the republic, 'becauſe he had thus acquired a good deal of favour by 'managing the affairs of private men? None had a 'greater influence with the people, none was accounted a 'better Senator, and every body allowed him to be an 'excellent general. In ſhort there was nothing at Rome 'in thoſe days that could be either underſtood or learned, 'which he did not thoroughly enquire into, know, and 'even write of.' Thoſe who have been endowed with the nobleſt talents of rhetoric, and the moſt profound knowledge of the laws have been ſo few, that ſuch a conjunction may well be looked upon as one of the moſt eminent and extraordinary qualities of our Cato. I am not ignorant that Cicero (114) endeavours to prove, that none can be a great Orator without having an univerſal knowledge. 'Illud eſt, ſays he (115), 'hujus inſtitutæ ſcriptionis, ac temporis, neminem 'eloquentia, non modo ſine dicendi doctrina, ſed ne 'ſine omni quidem ſapientia florere unquam, & præſtare potuiſſe. Etenim cæteræ ferè artes ſe ipſæ per 'ſe tuentur ſingulæ: bene dicere autem, quod eſt ſcienter, & perite, & ornate dicere, non habet definitam aliquam regionem, cujus terminis ſepta teneatur. 'Omnia quæcunque in hominum diſceptationem cadere poſſunt, bene ſunt ei dicenda, qui hoc ſe poſſe 'profitetur, aut eloquentiæ nomen relinquendum eſt. '- - - It will be proper to obſerve in this treatiſe that 'no man was ever famous for his eloquence, who had 'not acquired, beſides the art of ſpeaking, a kind of univerſal knowledge. For every other art ſtands in a 'manner ſingly by itſelf: but to ſpeak well, that is, to 'ſpeak properly, judiciouſly, and ornately, has no particular province to which it is bounded. A man who 'profeſſes to do this, muſt expreſs himſelf handſomely upon 'every ſubject that can fall under debate, otherwiſe he 'muſt give over his pretenſions to eloquence.' I know likewiſe that he maintains, that Lucius Craſſus and Marc Antony the Orator, two of the moſt eloquent perſons of their time, were not ignorant men, as ſome believed; and, on the contrary, that they had a great deal of learning (116): but he himſelf owns that experience is againſt him; and if he had not confeſſed it, he might have been eaſily convicted of his error by ſome examples. 'Et in noſtra civitate, & in ipſa 'Græcia quæ ſemper hæc ſumma duxit, multos & ingeniis, & magna laude dicendi ſine ſumma rerum 'omnium ſcientia fuiſſe fateor (117). - - - I confeſs 'that both in our city, and in Greece, which always held 'theſe things in the greateſt eſteem, there have been many 'endowed with extraordinary parts, and famous for 'ſpeaking well, though they wanted this univerſal learning.' Durſt he have ſaid, that Demoſthenes might be accounted a learned man, if compared with Ariſtotle? Durſt he have ſaid, that Ariſtotle might have compoſed as good orations as thoſe of Demoſthenes? To ſpeak the truth, the talents of eloquence, and a vaſt erudition, do ſeldom meet together. This may be obſerved now, as it was in former times. The moſt famous preachers, generally ſpeaking, have no great ſkill in the Oriental languages and critical learning, and are not very profound Divines. See upon this the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (118), where you will find what ſome perſons

(113) Ciceto, de Oratore, lib. iii, fol. m. 93, B. He had been ſaying in the firſt book, fol. 66, A. Quid vero ille M. Cato? nonne & eloquentia tanta fuit, quantam illa tempora, atque illa ætas in hac civitate ferre maximam potuit, & juris civilis omnium peritiſſimus?

(114) In Libris de Oratore.

(115) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. ii, init. fol. m. 71, B.

(116) Ibid.

(117) Ibid. C.

(118) Pag. 624, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſons, well qualified to judge of this matter, have ſaid about it. To which I add the teſtimony of the abbot of Saint Cyran: You have ſhewed me by experience, ſays he to a Jeſuit (119), what I have heard ſay ſeveral times, that it is a very difficult thing to be both a good preacher and a very learned man. Dr Huarte maintains, that learning and eloquence do not belong to the ſame faculty of the ſoul; that the former belongs to the underſtanding, and the latter to the imagination. See the ninth and tenth chapters of his Trial of Wits. Imperialis confutes him as well as he can (120), and does not prove his aſſertion. It is certain, that the Divine Providence diſtributes its gifts in ſuch a manner, that they are commonly ſeparated, ſome fall to one man's ſhare and ſome to another's. Thoſe who have received the gift of obtaining victories do not know how to improve them; and thoſe who might improve a victory, are not qualified to obtain it (121). Thoſe who excel in the knowledge of languages, and matters of fact, are not maſters of reaſoning. It cannot be denied, that, if Bochart did very much exceed M. Claude in learning, he was much inferior to him in urging difficulties, reſolving controverſial objections, and diving to the bottom of a Theological or Philoſophical diſpute. Balzac was a little ſurprized, when he ſaw a ſolid diſcourſe publiſhed by Father Faure, a great preacher (122).

(119) St Cyran in his Cenſure de la Somme Theologique du Pere Garaſſe, pag. 8, of the Avis au Pere Garaſſe.

(120) Joh. Imperialis, in Muſæo Phyſico, lib. ii, cap. vii.

(121) See, above, citation (13), of the article CÆSAR.

(122) See the Diſſertation printed at the end of the Socrate Chrétien, pag. 11, & ſeq.

PORSENA (CHRISTOPHER) See PERSONA.

PORTUGAL (ALFONSO SIXTH OF THAT NAME, KING OF) was born the twenty-eighth of Auguſt 1643. He was hardly ſeven years of age when he diſcovered ſome grains of folly. The diſorder of his mind did not leſſen his ambition it only diſcovered it the more plainly; for prince Dom Theodoſio, eldeſt brother of Alfonſo, dying the fiftheenth of May 1653, Alfonſo did not diſſemble his joy. He made it appear that he ſpoke in earneſt, when, the very firſt day of his brother's illneſs, he ſaid, he ſhould not be ſorry if it proved mortal, ſince he ſhould get a crown by it. He took poſſeſſion of that crown, under his mother's regency the fifteenth day of November, 1656 (a). He diſcovered more and more his bad qualities: he paid no regard to his governour's advice: he drew his ſword againſt the firſt perſons he met, and, if he did not kill them, it was not his fault: he ran about the ſtreets in the night with a parcel of rakes: he committed a thouſand violences, and played a thouſand mad tricks, in bawdy-houſes [A], and boaſted of it the next day, as of a glorious action. All the means, that were uſed to bring him off from theſe ill courſes proving ineffectual, it was reſolved to remove from him the perſons, who ſpoiled him, and they were carried away by main force out of his apartment. He was very angry at it, and left Liſbon to go to Alcantara. To prevent the ill conſequences of this retreat, the queen-regent, his mother, was obliged to put the government of the ſtate into his hands; which was done at Liſbon with the requiſite ceremonies, the twenty-third of June 1662. From that time three or four great lords, who had engroſſed that young prince, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to bring the queen into diſgrace [B], and ſucceeded ſo well in it, that ſhe was forced to execute, in March

(a) Her name was Louiſa Frances de Guſman. Her huſband, who, being duke of Braganza, became king of Portugal in 1640, died the ſixth of November 1656. See concerning this Revolution an anonymous book, printed at Paris in 1689, with this title, Hiſtoire de la Conjuration de Portugal. It was written by the Abbot Vertot, and is not leſs eſteemed than the Hiſtory of the Revolutions of Sweden, publiſhed by him in 1695.

[A] He committed a thouſand violences, and played a thouſand mad tricks in bawdy-houſes.] The relation (1) which affords me this article, informs me, (2) that he ran about the ſtreets with thoſe rakes; that they got into ſcandalous places, where they offered a thouſand violences to women; that he never went out with them in the night, but the next day one might hear many tragical ſtories; that he was dreaded every where as a wild beaſt; that, though he viſited proſtitutes in their own houſes, ſome were brought to his palace; and that he boaſted of ſuch mighty feats with them, as exceeded all belief. After the queen-mother's retreat, he formed two companies, one of foot, and the other of horſe, which he called, The little and great patrol, conſiſting of the moſt profligate men in the kingdom (3). He went out every night with them, and attacked every body he met in his way. His attendants had generally their ſwords drawn, to be more ready to obey his orders; and, the better to ſurpriſe people, they blackened them, leſt the brightneſs of the ſteel ſhould diſcover their deſign. Thoſe who came back with bloody ſwords, were highly commended by the king. 'His debauchery was as exorbitant as 'his fury; either he went to leud women, or they 'were brought to him at a country-ſeat near Alcan-'tara; and his favourites indulged him in it, to re-'move the report that he was impotent. (4)'

(1) The title of it may be ſeen in the margin of the text of this article, citation (b).

(2) Pag. 19.

(3) Ibid. pag. 91, 92.

(4) Ib. p. 95.

[B] Three or four great lords uſed their utmoſt endeavours to bring the queen into diſgrace.] They were not in the wrong to believe, that the queen deſigned to ſet the crown on the head of her ſecond ſon; for, in the reaſons alledged to ſhew the nullity of the marri ge, which are printed at the end of the relation, it is ſaid, That, conſidering the incapacity and impotency of king Alfonſo, the queen, his mother, who was fully perſwaded of it by a private conſultation of her Phyſicians about it . . . . reſolved, during her regency, to put the ſceptre into the hands of the Infant her ſecond ſon. Alfonſo revenged himſelf: He was well pleaſed to hear all the queen's actions reflected upon in his preſence. Some people met at night under the queen's window, at a time when ſhe uſed to ſhut herſelf up, in order to ſay her prayers, and broke her windows, and gave her ſuch injurious words, as are not fit to be put in writing (5). Upon a day of the Conception of the Holy Virgin, the king, in the preſence of the whole court, went by the queen, who ſat in her gallery, without paying her the uſual civility (6). On the day ſhe left the court, the king ſeemed to be very well pleaſed, and having accompanied her to the country-ſeat ſhe had pitched upon, he left her at the door of the firſt room, without ſhewing her any civility. He returned to Liſbon in the night on horſeback, being very chearful, and coming up to the coaches of the ladies he met, he ſaid many indecent things to them (7). Not long before ſhe died, ſhe acquainted her two ſons with the condition ſhe was in: the Infant wept; but the king was ſo far from being moved with it, that he bantered his brother for his tenderneſs, and oppoſed his deſign of ſetting out immediately (8). It is certain that queen had a great many vexations on account of her ſon Alphonſo. It is the fate of moſt ſovereigns, and it is not the leaſt miſery that attends them. Of all men, ſovereigns ſtand moſt in need of children, and no men are more diſquieted by them than they are. When they have no children, they ſee either many intrigues carried on, to give them a ſucceſſor, or exceſſive honours paid to another family. When they have children, they are tormented with jealouſy, to ſee the riſing-ſun adored. They are very happy, if they are ſuffered

(5) Ib. p. 85.

(6) Ib. p. 86.

(7) Ib. p. 90.

(8) Ib. p. 110.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

March 1663, a deſign, which perhaps was not ſo deeply rooted in her heart, as ſhe pretended; I mean, her deſign of leaving the world, to mind only her ſalvation. After ſhe had retired to a country-ſeat, the king indulged his vicious inclinations more than ever, ſo far as to make no account of the outſide of religion [C]; which ſhews, that his very favourites could not govern him [D]. They were, for ſome time, three or four; but at laſt the count de Caſtelmelhor ſupplanted the reſt, and ſecured his intereſt, by pretending he had diſcovered a horrid conſpiracy [E]. The infant Dom Pedro (b) was ſuſpected of a deſign to make himſelf king, and met with ſo many occaſions of diſcontent, that he left the court after the king had made his public entry at Liſbon, with his new ſpouſe, the twenty-ninth of Auguſt 1666. The queen-mother died the twenty-eighth of February in the ſame year. The new queen was a French princeſs, but of the houſe of Savoy (c). She prevailed with the Infant, by her intreaties, to return to Liſbon, where he had a great deal of vexation. The king gave her alſo a great deal of trouble, upon many occaſions; and from that time there was nothing but complaints and broils. The removal of the count de Caſtelmelhor, upon the repeated ſollicitations of the Infant, did not advance the affairs of that prince. The recalling of Antonio de Souſa de Macedo, ſecretary of ſtate, proved ſuch a terrible blow to the queen, that ſhe reſolved to ſee no body but the king, who ſaid nothing to her but what was offenſive and indecent. That ſecretary of ſtate had very much offended the queen, and had been deprived of his office at her ſollicitation; but he was reſtored in an inſulting manner. The Infant reſolved to turn him out at any rate, and went to the palace (d) with ſuch a ſtrong guard, that the ſecretary, relying no longer upon the king's protection, left the court. Afterwards the king was prevailed upon to order, that the ſtates ſhould meet the firſt of January 1668; but, before the day came, the queen made uſe of a terrible expedient: ſhe retired into a convent the twenty-firſt of November 1667, and acquainted the king, that ſhe deſigned to return into France; and declared to the ladies, who accompanied her, that her marriage had never been conſummated: ſhe mentioned it in her letter to her pretended huſband. Thus an action for impotency was brought againſt Dom Alfonſo [F]; a prince, who made ſuch boaſts of his amorous exploits (e). As ſoon as he had read the queen's letter, he went to the convent, and would have cauſed the gates

(b) He was the king's only brother.

(c) Her name was Mary-Frances-Elizabeth, and ſhe was born the 21ſt of June 1646, from the marriage of Charles Amadeus of Savoy, duke of Nemours, with Iſabella de Vendôme, daughter to the duke of that name, natural ſon of Henry IV.

(d) In October 1667.

(e) See the remark [A].

ſuffered to reign, till they die a natural death: the ſaying of Ovid may be particularly applied to them:

(9) Ovid. Metam. lib. i.

Filius ante diem patrios inquirit in annos (9),

[C] So far as to make no account of the outſide of religion.] Theſe are the words of the author who is my voucher. 'He had ſo little reſpect for religion, that, 'without any reaſon, he heard maſs in his own cham- 'ber, upon the week-days, whilſt he was in bed, and 'at an unſeaſonable hour. Upon holy-days, he never 'went to his chapel till he had dined; which was the 'reaſon that maſs was never ended in his chapel, but 'when they were ſinging veſpers in the other churches: 'And, becauſe he could not be excuſed from 'hearing ſermons, he ordered the preachers to cut 'them ſhort. Some, refuſing to obey, were baniſhed, 'and others would not preach. However, ſome had 'the courage to exclaim againſt ſuch diſorders; but 'it was to no purpoſe, becauſe others made their zeal 'inſignificant by the baſe flatteries which they mixed 'with their ſermons (10).'

(10) Relation, pag. 97.

[D] His very favourites could not govern him.] Doubtleſs, they had ſenſe enough to know, on the one ſide, that nothing could more endanger his crown, than his contempt of holy ceremonies: and, on the other, that an appearance of devotion was the beſt way to cover his irregularities, it was therefore their intereſt to inſpire him with ſuch a policy; ſince therefore, they did not make him a conſtant attendant upon the public exerciſes of devotion, and did not teach him to put on a devout countenance at ſuch hours, which, much more than charity, covers a multitude of ſins, we may very well believe, that they could not do it. They had been certainly very ſtupid, had they permitted a young prince, ready to comply with their will, to draw upon himſelf the hatred of the preachers, by ſuch an unpleaſing and mortifying order, as that of making ſhort ſermons. Was it not to wound them in the moſt ſenſible part? Some choſe rather to be baniſhed, or not to preach at all, than to obey that order (11). There was another thing, wherein this prince had no regard for the Preachers. He laughed at comets in the moſt extravagant manner. Here is a paſſage out of the above-mentioned relation. 'At 'that time there appeared a comet: the king being 'told that it foreboded the death of kings, or a change 'in their ſtates, gave it a thouſand hard words from 'his terras, called it a thouſand names, and fired a 'piſtol at it.' It was an eaſy thing to draw his true nativity, conſidering what ſort of men he exaſperated, and the great follies he committed.

(11) See the foregoing remark.

[E] The count de Caſtelmelhor . . . . ſecured his own intereſt, by pretending he had diſcovered a horrid conſpiracy.] The pretended diſcovery of a great plot, is a piece of craft frequently neceſſary to prevent conſpiracies, or to get rid of ſuſpected perſons. It is no matter, tho' no body be convicted: an alarm has been raiſed, and due meaſures have been taken to keep people in awe. The count de Caſtelmelhor made the king believe, that there was a deſign to take away his crown, and at the ſame time ſpread a report, that he had diſcovered that conſpiracy by a divine revelation. He accuſed the queen, the duke of Cadaval, and ſeveral other perſons, who were out of favour. It was therefore reſolved, that enquiry ſhould be made into the pretended conſpiracy. . . . . That enquiry laſted a long time, either to ſhew, that they proceeded impartially in the matter, or to ſtrike a greater terror into the accuſed perſons, by exaggerating the pretended diſcoveries that were made every day. . . . Tho' the information laid no charge upon the accuſed, ſome pretended that they were not innocent; but the Judges ſhewed an unſhaken integrity, and moſt of them acquitted the innocent. The accuſed deſired to know what they were accuſed of; but a copy of their accuſation was denied them. And tho' that information ought to have been declared null, as containing no proofs againſt thoſe who were accuſed, yet it was preſerved, by the intereſt of the favourites, as a hand ready to ſtrike a blow, upon another occaſion on the heads of the perſons accuſed (12). This was a refined piece of policy.

(12) Relation, pag. 100.

[F] An action for impotency was brought againſt Dom Alfonſo.] The queen's confeſſor had begun to carry on an intrigue, ſome months before, with count de Schomberg, and confeſſed to him the perplexity that princeſs was in. The king's impotency was one of the firſt things that were revealed to him. 'The 'queen, being no longer able to live under the con- 'ſtraint, which the king's brutality, and the favou- 'rite's cruelty, reduced her to, diſcovered to Father 'de Ville, her confeſſor, that ſhe was extreamly de- 'ſirous to acquaint the count de Schomberg with all 'her misfortunes, and the apprehenſion ſhe was in of 'ſomething worſe; that the duke of Beaufort, and 'the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

gates to be broken open, if the Infant had not prevented it. The next day he told his brother, in a great paſſion, and in very indecent words, that he was more a man than people thought. The queen declared, before ſeveral counſellors of ſtate and officers of the crown, the reaſon of her retreat, and that ſhe deſigned to get her marriage declared null. She writ to the chapter of the cathedral church of Liſbon (f), and deſired them to take congnizance of that affair. It was immediately propoſed to marry her to the Infant. The brief for a diſpenſation was not long a coming. In a word, they made ſuch diſpatch, in all reſpects, that, on the twenty-third of November 1667, Dom Pedro took poſſeſſion of the royal palace, and, the ſecond of April following, married Mademoiſelle d'Aumale; for ſo ſhe was to be ſtill called. The chapter had declared the marriage null the twenty-eighth of March foregoing [G]. I forgot to ſay, that, when Dom Pedro took poſſeſſion of the palace, he ſecured the king's perſon, who, on the ſame day, ſigned a writing, whereby he acknowledged, that he reſigned the kingdom to his brother, of his own motion. The ſtates of the kingdom declared Dom Pedro regent. He might have been proclaimed king, and have added to the royal authority, wherewith he was inveſted, a title which is of great uſe, even when another man is poſſeſſed of the whole monarchical power. Spain made a prudent uſe of this revolution, to conclude a treaty of peace (g), which the League, that was concluded, in 1667, between France and Portugal, might have prevented, had not a peace been neceſſary to a kingdom, which had lately got another maſter by ſuch proceedings. This is what I have taken from a book (b) printed at Amſterdam. I do not pretend to warrant the truth of it [H]; and, if I had ſome authentic and private (f) The archbiſhopric was then vacant.

(g) It was concluded the 13th of Febr. 1668. See Wicquefort, de l'Ambaſſad. Tom. i, pag. 367.

(b) Intituled, Relation des Troubles arrivez dans la Cour de Portugal, en l'année 1667 & 1668.

'the biſhop of Laon, had recommended to her to repoſe an entire confidence in him; ſo that ſhe was perſuaded, he was the only man that could allay her grief, and afford her the means of getting glorioufly out of the ſad condition ſhe was in. That Jeſuit, who was very faithful to his miſtreſs, and behaved himſelf with great diſcretion and prudence in the midſt of ſo many dangers, approved the queen's deſign, and imparted it to the count de Schomberg; and, becauſe they had a mutual eſteem for each other, he gave him a particular account of the queen's trouble, according to the order he had received, and his own inclination. He alſo told him, that the report about the king's impotency was but too true; and that it was to be feared, the conſequences of it would prove diſmal; that a private door had been lately contrived in the queen's chamber; and that the bed had been placed in ſuch a manner, that one might get into it through that door, without being ſeen by thoſe, who were in the chamber; and that it was to be feared ſomebody would come in that way, to ſupply the king's weakneſs (13).' This is what I find in the Memoirs of Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt (14); who was very well acquainted with the affairs of the court of Portugal. The queen's confeſſor, and the confeſſor (15) of the infant Dom Pedro, did very much contribute to the revolutions of that country (16).

(13) Mémoires de Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt, pag. 319, 320.

(14) They were printed in 1701.

(15) He was alſo a Jeſuit.

(16) See the ſame Memoirs, pag. 322, & ſeq.

It muſt be confeſſed, that few perſons have been in a more deplorable condition than that queen, before the revolution: for (17) the next day after ſhe married king Alfonſo . . . . it appeared, that things did not paſs ſo agreeably between two perſons of their age as might have been expected. At firſt this was only perceived by thoſe, who had the neareſt acceſs to them; but by degrees the thing went farther, and began to lay the foundation of a third cabal in that court, of which the two weakeſt, as it commonly happens, ſided againſt the ſtrongeſt, and at laſt triumphed over it . . . (18). The king was not of a more courteous diſpoſition than he had been before his marriage: he went on in his old way, and gave every day new vexations to the queen, ſo far as to declare he was in love with the firſt lady of her chamber . . . The count de Caſtel Melior, his favourite, having (19) gained one of the queen's women, whom ſhe truſted moſt, had only an outward reſpect for that princeſs; ſo that the king and his favourite, abating ſome civilities they ſhewed her in public, made it appear that they cared little for her in private. Such an odd conduct gave the queen occaſion to miſtruſt them, and to ſuſpect that they were contriving pernicious deſigns againſt her; but the more ſhe had reaſon to complain, the more ſhe was cautious in expreſſing her reſentment, not knowing whom to truſt. . . . France, from whence ſhe was lately come, was ſtill in her mind; and the deſire ſhe had of doing what was expected from her took up all her thoughts; and therefore ſhe was more willing to diſſemble her grief, than to ſeek a remedy for it. But, though her unhappineſs was very great, ſhe was uneaſy upon another account; for ſhe could not bear the injuſtice that was done to the Infant, and, upon all occaſions, ſhe endeavoured to reſtore him to the king's favour. How unhappy was this queen! ſhe was at the ſame time both a wife and a maid; ſhe had an impotent and a brutiſh huſband; ſhe was afraid of his ill deſigns; ſhe miſtruſted every body; ſhe ſaw a prince, whom ſhe eſteemed, and who loved her (20), cruelly perſecuted. The king of Portugal had particular reaſons for being civil and complaiſant to his ſpouſe: he ought to have acted like an inſolvent debtor, who endeavours to pacify his creditors by his humility, and great civility, qui nummos non geſtat in burſa, mel ſalem habeat in bucca. He ſhould at leaſt have given good words; but, on the contrary, he abuſed his wife, not conſidering that he could not make amends for his abuſive language. Moſt huſbands, in a like caſe, are humble and complaiſant: they endeavour to ſhew the falſity of the proverb, That one misfortune is always attended with another. This is alſo the uſual practice of diſloyal wives; they do whatever they can, by their flatteries and ſubmiſſion, to make their huſbands eaſy with their horns.

(17) Fremont d'Ablancourt, ubi ſupra, pag. 294.

(18) Ib. p. 295.

(19) Ib. p. 296, 297.

(20) The Infant conſidered, that, if the proceſs of the queen-mother had been executed, he would have been now in poſſeſſion of what he valued more than the crown, and that he ſhould not have the vexation to ſee ſo beautiful a princeſs (the queen married to Dom Alfonſo) ſo unworthily treated. Ibid. pag. 294.

[G] The chapter had declared the marriage null, the twenty-eighth of March foregoing.] Their ſentence imports, that the two parties had done their beſt to conſummate the marriage, without being able to ſucceed in it, and that the whole fault was to be aſcribed to the huſband. I ſhall ſet down their own words ſomewhat at length. 'It appears, that, during that time '(21), having endeavoured both of them to conſummate the marriage, they could not effect it, though 'they uſed their endeavours towards it, by reaſon 'of the prince's impotency, which proceeds from an 'infirmity, which he has had from his childhood, 'and which is now altogether incurable. Which 'may be ſufficiently made out by means approved of 'in law; ſo that the impotency is at leaſt morally 'certain: and therefore there is no need of an inſpection, 'or a better proof, ſuch as that of three years, or any 'other arbitrary time. This whole matter having 'been examined, with ſome others acts, in conformity to the laws, we judge the marriage, between 'the ſaid moſt ſerene prince and princeſs, to be contracted de facto, and not de jure, and we declare it 'to be void, and that the ſaid prince and princeſs 'may diſpoſe of themſelves as they ſhall think fit, 'and divide their eſtates according to the tenor of 'their contracts (22).'

(21) That is, the ſpace of fifteen months.

(22) Relation, pag. 218.

[H] I do not pretend to warrant the truth of it.] Who hears but one ſide, hears nothing: I ſhould be very glad to ſee an anſwer of the Count de Caſtelmelhor to the author of the Relation. There is one thing, which I do not underſtand: if the follies of Dom Alfonſo had been ſuch as they are repreſented by that author, they could not have been unknown to the ambaſſadors or envoys of the Moſt Chriſtian King; and, if they knew them, they could not be ignorant, that this

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

private memoirs of the contrary party, I would produce them without any partiality; for or againſt Dom Alfonſo, that the readers might be the better able to judge of the whole matter. That prince was ſo far from appealing from the ſentence, whereby he was declared impotent, that he acquieſced in it viva voce, and by writing. The new married couple, having lived together for ſome time, demanded the Pope's diſpenſation, for the greater precaution, to confirm that, which the cardinal de Vendoſme, legate à latere in France, ſent them before they married. The Pope granted their requeſt. It is certain that the queen alledged great motives of conſcience, to get her marriage diſſolved (i) [I]; and that it would be unreaſonable to put a malicious this prince was in a condition, wherein private men are not allowed to diſpoſe of their eſtates. Thoſe who are guilty of ſuch follies, uſe to be ſhut up, or at leaſt are put under the guardianſhip of their relations. How comes it then, that the miniſters of France did not acquaint the king their maſter, when the marriage of Dom Alfonſo was on foot, that he was a madman, and, beſides, ſuſpected of impotency? It has been ſaid, that princeſſes are victims ſacrificed to the intereſt of the ſtate; which was never truer than with reſpect to Mademoiſelle d'Aumale. The favourites of Dom Alfonſo ſuborned a woman to declare, that the king had got her with child (23): but ſhe ſwore afterwards that it was falſe. The author of the relation (24) lays a great ſtreſs upon that woman's oath; but he had no reaſon for it: what ſhe ſaid ought not to be regarded; for, ſince ſhe could tell a lie at the ſollicitation of a favourite, ſhe might as well tell a lie againſt a prince, who was a priſoner, and near being depoſed. Such retractations ſhould not be admitted as an evidence: whoever will be ſuborned to ſay a thing, may as well be ſuborned to deny it (25).

(i) Taken from the ſame Relation.

(23) Relation, pag. 96.

(24) Pag. 248.

(25) Confer quæ ſupra, in the article CALVIN, remark [T].

[I] The queen alledged great motives of conſcience, to get her marriage diſſolved.] This wants to be explained; otherwiſe one would be apt to think, that the queen, miſtruſting her temper, and not being able to oppoſe the inclinations of nature, had a mind to make uſe of the lawful remedy, which ſhe did not find in the perſon of Dom Alfonſo. In a word, one would be apt to think, that ſhe had not the gift of continence; and that ſhe wanted a huſband, for fear of tranſgreſſing the laws of chaſtity. But this would be a wrong interpretation of the motives of conſcience alledged by her. It is therefore neceſſary to explain the matter, in order to prevent the falſe judgments of the readers.

I. Dom Alfonſo, notwithſtanding his impotency, was a very unchaſte and leud man; and therefore he was guilty of ſin in that reſpect, and brought the ſame guilt upon the queen; for the looſeſt Caſuiſts are agreed, that, without certain conditions, which were wanting in Alfonſo, it is a piece of leudneſs in a huſband to come near his wife, and in a wife to permit it. This cannot be more particularly explained in our language. It is not likely that a perſon of her rank, whoſe ſteps are expoſed to the public view, would have engaged, without an extreme neceſſity, in a ſuit, wherein an hundred things, contrary to modeſty, were to be diſcuſſed.

II. The queen knew, that the king and his favorite would never conſent to Dom Pedro's marriage; and therefore, ſince the king was not in a capacity to get children, ſhe could no longer diſſemble, without expoſing the kingdom of Portugal to diſmal revolutions, which ſhe thought herſelf obliged to prevent, not only out of love for that kingdom, but alſo out of conſcience.

III. Whenever the king had a mind to ſport with a young woman, he made uſe of a fore-runner: one of his favourites broke the ice, and then the prince did his beſt to get in through the breach He deſigned to uſe the queen in the ſame manner; and therefore the queen was obliged in honour and conſcience to get herſelf diſengaged from ſuch an huſband.

Thoſe three things want to be proved; and therefore I ſhall ſet down what I find in the Reaſons alledged for the invalidity of that marriage(26).

(26) Relation, pag. 251.

What follows concerns the firſt point. 'Conſcience continually dictated to her majeſty, that, 'after a tedious experience of ſixteen months, ſhe 'was obliged to part with the king, without deſiring 'to make a longer trial, eſpecially conſidering, that, 'being fully ſenſible of his incurable impotency, 'and having frequently conſulted her confeſſor about 'it, to manage that important affair with greater ſe-'crecy, the ſame confeſſor, having maturely conſidered the thing, and what he was to ſay about it, declared before God, that he believed her majeſty 'was no longer obliged to do violence to her conſcience, by cohabiting with the king.' As to the ſecond head, I refer the reader to the two hundred and fifty ſecond page of the relation.

What concerns the third head is contained in the following words. The queen ſaw her honour, which was always dearer to her than the crown, and her own life (27), 'expoſed to great dangers, and had very 'good reaſons to think ſo. Though it be never ſo 'neceſſary to mention them, yet virtue and modeſty 'will not allow me to ſay more of the matter, than 'what is abſolutely neceſſary to give a right notion of 'it. One of thoſe reaſons was, that, though the 'king knew he ſhould never be able to get children, 'yet he expreſſed a very great deſire of getting ſome; 'to be reſtored (28) to the throne by that means, and 'to put an end to the common report of his impo-'tency, which made him more uneaſy than his own 'weakneſs. And therefore, the more he was ſenſible 'of his impotency, the more he endeavoured to ſhew 'the contrary, by proſtituting himſelf to all ſorts of 'women, hoping to keep his crown by that means, 'and to vex his brother to death, whom he mortally 'hated, becauſe he ſaid, and knew for certain, that 'his majeſty would never get any children, by reaſon 'of his impotency. The other reaſon is, That the 'queen was not ignorant of what was then kept ſecret, 'and which the judges afterwards came to know, by 'the declaration of the perſons concerned, viz. that, 'when the king had a mind to lie with a maid, not 'being able to do it himſelf, by reaſon of his impo-'tency, he cauſed her to lie, in his chamber, and in 'his own preſence, with one of his favourites, to 'make the thing more eaſy to him; though, after 'all, he did not ſhew himſelf more a man than before; 'as it appears from the depoſitions of thoſe concerned 'in it, who have ſworn it upon the holy goſpel. And 'what made the queen moſt apprehenſive, that the 'king, without any regard to his honour and con-'ſcience, had ſuch a deſign upon her, was her being 'continually ſollicited, in the king's name, towards 'the latter end of April, 1667, by his moſt intimate 'favourites Enrigo Enriguez de Miranda, and the 'Count de Caſtelmeglior, with the marchioneſs his 'mother, lady of honour to her majeſty, to remove 'in the night from her apartment, (where the king 'had made hitherto no difficulty to come to her) in-'to that of his majeſty, to lie with him (29), con-'trary to the ancient form, and the uſual cuſtoms of 'the palace, and without any apparent neceſſity. And, 'becauſe the queen declined it ſeveral times, with all 'poſſible gentleneſs, alledging for her reaſon, not that 'which made her moſt apprehenſive (30), (for, not-'withſtanding this new uneaſineſs, ſhe would have 'complied with the king's will, having always been 'very ſubmiſſive to him) but modeſty, which will not 'allow a woman of honour, much leſs a princeſs and 'queen, to make, without any neceſſity, ſuch an ex-'traordinary alteration; which doubtleſs would have 'occaſioned ſeveral reflexions upon her's and the 'king's reputation; the king fell into ſuch a paſſion, 'that, in the night of the ſame day, he had a mind 'to drag her out of her bed into his apartment. But, 'after many threatnings and hard words, holding a 'dagger in his hand, he told her, that ſhe muſt re-'ſolve upon it in twenty-four hours; and then, if ſhe 'refuſed to comply with his deſires, he ſwore he 'would drag her, or get her dragged by four footmen. 'The queen was ſenſibly afflicted at it; and therefore 'the next day ſhe ordered her confeſſor to complain of 'it to the count, and to deſire him to prevent it, 'proteſting, that ſhe had rather die than do what the 'king

(27) Ibid. pag. 253.

(28) This is a very improper word: for king Alfonſo had not been dethroned yet.

(29) Compare with this the remark [F], towards the end, where mention is made of another device, which made the Queen uneaſy.

(30) I put here a NOTA BENE, becauſe the author expreſſes himſelf in ſo intricate a manner, that it requires great attention to underſtand his meaning.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google malicious conſtruction upon the deep melancholy which appeared in her face [K], as ſoon as ſhe was ſenſible of her huſband's weakneſs. Dom Alfonſo was ſent into the iſle of Tercera, where he continued ſeveral years: but there being ſome reaſon to fear, that the enemies of the ſtate would reſcue him from that place, in order to raiſe troubles in the kingdom, he was removed to a ſafer place, viz. the caſtle of Cintra, ſeven leagues from Liſbon, where he died of an apoplexy, the twelfth of September 1683 (k).

(k) Taken from the Mercure Galant, for October 1683.

The queen of Portugal, formerly his wife, followed him ſoon after; for ſhe died at Palhavam, the twenty-ſeventh of December 1683 (l), being in the thirty-eighth year of her age. Her only daughter, the Infanta of Portugal, was born the ſixth of June 1669, and contracted to the duke of Savoy in 1679. That marriage was made public in the council of ſtate of Portugal, on the fifth of September: the ſtates of the kingdom were aſſembled to ratify it, and to derogate from a law, whereby the princeſſes of the royal family, who marry foreign princes, are excluded from the crown (m) [L]. Notwithſtanding which, this marriage was broke, before the duke of Savoy ſaw the Infanta: ſhe died, without having been married, the twenty-firſt of October 1690. The queen her mother took great care of her education: ſhe wrote with her own hand ſome inſtructions for the Infanta, which were found after her death (n), and are very fine. They may be ſeen at length in the Mercure Galant for the month of May 1684 (o). King Dom Pedro married, in 1687, a daughter of the Elector Palatine, who died in the year 1699, aged thirty-three years (p). Several particulars are to be found in the Memoirs of Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt, printed in 1701, concerning Dom Alfonſo's reign, the diſſolution of his marriage, his depoſition, &c.

(l) Mercure Galant, for February 1684, pag. 123.

(m) Taken from the Paris Gazette.

(n) Mercure Galant, for May 1684, pag. 23, 24.

(o) Pag. 25, & ſeq.

(p) See l'Eſprit des Cours de l'Europe, for September 1699, pag. 480.

Since I have mentioned the mariage of the duke of Savoy with the Infanta of Portugal, it may not be improper to add here, that it was thought the court of France had greatly influenced this affair. The reaſoners have not failed to argue hereupon, and to alledge ſeveral motives, with as much confidence, as if they had been let into the ſecrets of the cabinet. I will not examine what they relate: I will only point out a book, in which one of their lies has been refuted (q).

(q) The fifth volume of the Reply to the Queſtions of a Provincial, ch. vi.

' king deſired, or any thing unworthy of her. This, ' together with the fear that was imprinted in the ' queen's mind, is the reaſon why from that time ſhe ' never thought herſelf ſafe, whilſt ſhe remained ex- ' poſed to a danger, which ſhe could not ſo well avoid ' at another time, as ſhe did then; eſpecially con- ' ſidering, that the woman, whom her majeſty ' ought to have placed the moſt confidence in upon ' ſuch an occaſion, viz. her lady of honour, was the ' perſon whom ſhe had moſt reaſon to miſtruſt, by rea- ' ſon of the advice ſhe had given her, becauſe ſhe was ' the mother of the king's favourite, and openly ex- ' preſſed a great deſire that the queen ſhould have ' children by any means whatever, in order to make ' her's and her ſon's fortune; having ſaid, in expreſs ' words, to the confeſſor, in a conference they had ' together upon that ſubject, in order to perſuade him ' to prevail with the queen to change her bed and ' apartment, that it would be only for five or ſix ' nights, and then ſhe aſſured him, that the king ' would go to the queen as he did before.'

[K] The deep melancholy, which appeared in her face.] If any one aſks, how I come to know, that the queen was melancholy, he need only read the following paſſage, which is to be found among the reaſons alledged for the invalidity of that marriage. ' The firſt time the king lay with the queen. which ' was three or four days after ſhe arrived in Portugal, ' that princeſs was ſo ſenſible of his impotency, tho' ' ſhe was ignorant of things of that nature, that her ' confeſſor, who perceived ſhe was very melancholy, ' and ſuſpected the truth of what was ſaid, having ' taken the liberty to ask her, out of confeſſion, ' with all due modeſty and civility, whether there was ' any ground for what was reported, or whether ſhe ' might quickly expect to ſee the fruits of her mar- ' riage; ſhe anſwered him (as may be ſeen in the pro- ' ceedings) in ſuch a manner, as made him ſenſible of ' what ſhe thought already of the ſtate of her mar- ' riage, and of the king's inability to get chil- ' dren (31).' I ſhould be glad to ſee a book lately publiſhed (32).

(31) Relation, pag. 250.

(32) I have been told ſince now, that the hiſtory of this Princeſs, written by Father Orleans, a Jeſuit, has been publiſhed at Paris in May 1696. This I find in the firſt edition; and now I hear that this hiſtory has been reprinted at Amſterdam, and yet I have not been able to ſee it.

[L] And to derogate from a law, whereby princeſſes, who marry foreign princes, are excluded from the crown.] It is called, The law of Lamego. It was made by Dom Alfonſo Henriquez, the firſt king of Portugal, in the ſtates general aſſembled at Lamego, after the victory he obtained over five Mooriſh kings at the battle of Urica, in the year 1139. It is enacted by that law, that the princeſſes of the royal blood, who marry foreigners, cannot ſucceed to the crown. It is by virtue of that law, that the dukes of Parma were excluded from the crown of Portugal, tho' they are deſcended from the princeſs Mary, eldeſt ſiſter of Catherine, grandmother to king Dom Pedro (33).

(33) I have taken this from a Paris Gazette of the year 1679.

POZZUOLO, in Latin Puteoli, a town in the kingdom of Naples, has now but ſome few inconſiderable remains of its ancient luſtre. It was built by the Samians, in the fourth year of the LXIVth Olympiad, which was the 232d year of Rome (a). It was called Dicæarchia (b). It did belong, for ſome time, to the inhabitants of Cumæ, who made it their harbour (c). The Romans conquered it, during the ſecond Punic war, in the year of Rome 538, and put a ſtrong garriſon in it (d). They made it a colony twenty years after, and changed its name into that of Puteoli (e) [A]. It was one of the beſt ports they had upon that ſea [B]. It became very conſiderable for the beauty of the public ſtructures that were

(a) Euſeb. in Chron.

(b) By contraction Dicharchia. The Latin Poets made uſe of that word, even when it was called Puteoli.

(c) Strabo, lib. v.

(d) Livius, lib. xxxv.

(e) Livius, lib. xxxii, & xxxiv. See alſo the inſcription given by Andreas Schottus, in Itinerario Italiæ, Part iii.

[A] Into that of Puteoli.] Either becauſe of the great number of wells, or by reaſon of the ill ſmell of the hot waters (1).

(1) Strabo, lib. v.

[B] It was one of the beſt ports the Romans had on that ſea.] The merchantmen of Alexandria had their ſtore-houſe there, as it appears from theſe words of Seneca. ' Subito hodie nobis Alexandrinæ naves ap- ' paruerunt, quæ præmitti ſolent & nunciare ſecuturæ ' claſſis

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

were raiſed in it (f), I mean its Temples, Circus's, Theatres, and Amphitheatres. The country-houſes, which the moſt wealthy citizens of Rome, and Cicero, among the reſt, built near that town, contributed ſtill more to make it famous (g). Some ſay its purple was more valued than that of Tyre [C]. I ſhall ſay nothing of its baths; every body knows they were very famous [D]; and they are ſo to this day. Auguſtus (b) and Nero (i) ſent new colonies thither. It was burnt down by Alaric, in the 410th year of the Chriſtian Æra, and by Genſeric in the year 455 (k). Totila took it ninety years after, or thereabouts; and it was then diſmantled, and plundered with ſuch fury, that it remained uninhabited for the ſpace of ſixteen years. The Greeks having rebuilt it, it recovered itſelf by degrees, ſo that it was a good place, when Romuald II, duke of Benevento, made himſelf maſter of it in the year 715, and deſtroyed it with fire and ſword. It was plundered by the Hungri in the Xth century. After ſeveral revolutions, it fell at laſt into the power of Alfonſo of Arragon, king of Naples, in the XVth century. Earthquakes have made ſtrange devaſtations in this town, at ſeveral times, eſpecially in the year 1538 (l). The place, wherein Gaſſendus mentions them, will give me occaſion to obſerve a miſtake of his abbreviator [E]. I ſhall alſo take notice of a blunder of Benjamin Tudelenſis [F].

(f) See the Antiquities of Pozzuolo, written by Scipio Mazzella.

(g) Ibid.

(b) Frontin. de Colon.

(i) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xiv.

(k) Scip. Mazzella, ubi ſupra.

(l) Taken from the ſame Scipio Mazzella.

'claſſis adventum; tabellarias vocant. Gratus illorum
'Campaniæ adſpectus eſt: omnis in pilis Puteolorum
'turba conſiſtit - - - In hoc omnium diſcurſu prope-
'rantium ad litus, magnam ex pigritia mea ſenſi vo-
(2) Seneca, Epiſt. LXXVII, init. Compare what Suetonius ſays, in Auguſt. cap. xcviii. 'luptatem (2). - - - - This day, on a ſudden, we had
'a fight of the Alexandrian ſhips, which are uſually
'diſpatched before, to give notice that the fleet will ſoon
'arrive, they call them tabellariæ. The fight is pleaſing to
'the people of Campania, who ſtand in crowds on the
'ſhore of Puteoli . . . Whilſt every one elſe ran in haſte
'to the ſtrand, I found great pleaſure in my own lazi-
'neſs.'

[C] Some ſay its purple was more valued than that of Tyre.] Scipio Mazzella ſays ſo, and quotes Pliny for it: however it is certain, that Pliny does not ſpeak of the purple, but of a kind of vermillion with ſome purple in it. Theſe are Mazzella's words: 'Fu da gli antichi
'tenuta in gran ſtima la purpura, che ſi faceva in
'Pozzuolo, che per la bontà & eccellenza ſua avanzava
'quelle di Tirio, de Getulico, e del Laconico, ch'erano
'purpure pretioſiſſime. Di che Plin. nel. 35. lib. al 6.
'capo della purpura parlando così ſcrive. Quare Puteo-
'lanum potius laudatur, quàm Tyrium aut Getuli-
'cum, unde precioſiſſimæ purpuræ (3). - - - The purple
'of Puteoli was held in great eſteem by the ancients, as
'exceeding in goodneſs thoſe of Tyre, Gætulia, and La-
'cedæmon, which were the moſt valuable purples, ac-
'cording to Pliny, lib. xxxv. cap. 6.' He ſhould have conſidered, that the word Puteolanum is to be referred to purpuriſſum è creta argentaria, which Pliny had been ſpeaking of: women uſed it for a paint (4).

(3) Scipione Mazzella, Antichita di Pozzuolo, pag. 6, & 7, Edit. Napol. 1606, in 8*vo.*

(4) Quiaque iſtas buccas tam belle purpuriſſatas habes. Plautus, in Trucul. Act. II, Sc. II, ver. 35. See alſo the ſame Plautus, in Moſtell. Act. I, Sc. III, ver. 101.

[D] Its baths . . . were very famous.] See the treatiſe of John Eliſius, a Phyſician, de Balneis Puteolanis, corrected and enlarged by Scipio Mazzella: it is printed at the end of the Antiquities of Pozzuolo. There are in it ſome Latin verſes, written by Alcadinus in praiſe of thoſe baths. Alcadinus was born at Syracuſe, and his father ſent him to Salerno, to ſtudy there, where he made ſo great a progreſs in Philoſophy and Phyſic, that he was quickly made profeſſor of thoſe two ſciences. He acquired ſo great a reputation in Phyſic, that ſeveral princes deſired to have him. He cured the emperor Henry VI, who fell dangerouſly ſick in the kingdom of Naples, and ever after he was a favourite of that emperor, who beſtowed many preſents upon him. After Henry's deceaſe, he was Phyſician to the emperor Frederic II, and made, at his requeſt, the verſes I ſpeak of. He flouriſhed in the year 1191, and lived fifty-two years (5). Thomas Bartholinus does not mention him in his catalogue of Phyſicians, who have been Poets.

(5) Taken from Scipio Mazzella, de Balneis Puteolanis, pag. 260.

[E] A miſtake of his abbreviator.] Gaſſendus ſays, that earthquakes do ſometimes produce mountains in the continents, and iſlands in the ſea. As to the mountains, he alledged what happened near Pozzuolo, in the year 1538. 'Mirabilius videri poteſt, ſays he
'(6), enaſci ex oppoſito non modo in continentibus
'montes, ſed etiam in medio mari inſulas. Nam de
'montibus quidem facit fidem Puteolanus ille, quem
'Simon Portius * ita deſcribit, ut fuerit una nocte ad
'pluſquam M. paſſuum altitudinem, ex pumicibus, ci-
'neribuſque congeſtus; id nempe ſub finem Septem-
'bris, anni M. D. XXXVIII. - - - - It may ſeem
'more ſtrange, that not only mountains, ſhould ariſe on
'the continent, but iſlands likewiſe in the ſea. As to
'mountains, it is confirmed by what Simon Portius re-
'lates of one that was thrown up near Puteoli, conſiſt-
'ing of pumice-ſtones and aſhes, about the end of Sep-
'tember 1538.' Though Berneir was a man of learning, he miſtook a word in this paſſage, the ſenſe of which is very plain. He did not conſider, that Puteolanus ought to be referred to terræ motus; but he made an author of it. What is no leſs ſurpriſing, ſays he (7), is, to ſee mountains of pumice-ſtones and aſhes ariſe in one night, in the middle of a continent, as Puteolanus relates. Which puts me in mind of the Hexameron Ruſtique, wherein la Mothe le Vayer obſerves, that du Pinet — made two Roman gentlemen of two kinds of marble (8), and that Coëffeteau (9) ſpeaks of Captain Corſinius, inſtead of the town of Corſinium.

(6) Gaſſendus, Phyſicæ, §. iii, membro I, lib. i, cap. vi, pag. 50, Oper. Tom. ii.

* Epiſt. de Conſt. agri Put.

(7) Bernier, Abrégé de la Philoſophie de Gaſſendi, Tom. v, pag. 127, Lyons 1684.

(8) See the article PINET, citation (26).

[F] The blunder of Benjamin Tudelenſis.] He ſays, not only that the town Puteoli was called Surrentum in former times, but alſo that it was built by Tſintſan Hadar-Ezer, who betook himſelf to flight for fear of king David. Ulterius profectus fui Puteolos quondam Surentum dictum, urbem magnam, quam olim condidit Tſintſan Hadar Ezer, quum metu Davidis regis (in pace quieſcentis) aufugiſſent (10). Thoſe two falſities have been taken notice of by Mazzella (11), and Conſtantin l'Empereur (12), and afterwards by Pinedo (13), who obſerves, that this Tſintſan Hadar is mentioned in the ſecond book of Samuel, chap. viii. v. 3. and that the ſuppoſititious Joſeph Ben-Gorion, tells the ſame fabulous ſtory in the third chapter of his firſt book. This ſhews the ſpirit of the Jewiſh nation, and even of all others. Every people fancies, that their great men have performed many things in the remoteſt countries. David, whoſe name was unknown in Italy, till the Romans read Joſephus, and who lived about three hundred years before the foundation of Rome, did ſo fright Romulus, if Benjamin may be credited, that this founder of Rome dug out a way of fifteen miles under the mountains near Puteoli to hide himſelf. Hinc per milliaria quindecim ſub montibus iter conficitur. Operis author eſt Romulus, qui Romam condidit, atque hæc omnia fecit cum ſibi à Davide Iſraelitarum rege & Joabo exercitus duce metueret. Alia etiam cum ſupra, tum infra montes urbis Neapolis exſtruxit (14). Here follows the note of Conſtantin l'Empereur: it contains an exclamation, which is not too vehement, conſidering the impertinence of that rabbin. 'Quis
'ad tantum ſtuporem non obſtupeſcat? coætaneos fa-
'cit Davidem & Romulum, quum trecentis circiter
'annis poſt Davidem regnare cœperit. Quod in du-
'bium vocari non poteſt; ſed ex diverſis hiſtoricis
'conſtat, & paſſim à Chronologis obſervatum, quo-
'rum verba repetere neceſſe non eſt in tanta luce.
'Huic parallelum eſt, quum Romulum talparum
'more in terram ac longiſſimas ſpecus ſe recipitie fin-
'git, ſive eas metu Davidis, qui ante aliquot ſecula
'mortem obierat, excavaſſa ſcribit. Quis ad hujuſ-
'modi non ſtomachetur? ſi nos ita aberraremus, quàm
'ſuperbe nobis Judæi inſultarent (15). - - - Who is
'not aſtoniſhed at ſuch ſtupidity? he makes David and
'Romulus cotemporaries, when the latter began his reign
'about three hundred years after David: which cannot
'be doubted, but is evident from ſeveral Hiſtorians, and
'conſtantly obſerved by the Chronologers; whoſe words I
'need not repeat in ſo clear a point. Parallel to this is,

(9) In the 18th chapter of the 3d book of his tranſlation of Florus.

(10) Benj. Itiner. pag. 14, Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1633.

(11) Mazzella, Antichita di Pozzuolo, pag. 4, & 5.

(12) L'Empereur, Notis in Benj. Itiner. pag. 159.

(13) Pinedo, in Stephanum Byzantinum, voce Δικαιάρχεια, pag. 236.

(14) Benjam. ibid. pag. 15.

(15) L'Empereur, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

his making Romulus hide himself under ground like a mole, for fear of David, who had been dead some centuries before. Who can swallow such absurdities? If we were guilty of the like, how haughtily would the Jews insult us?'

PRADILLHON (JOHN BAPTIST) born in the Limousin, 'retired 'when very young to the solitude of the Feuillants, the abbey and chief of the order 'in the diocese of Rieux. The cloyster presently acknowledged his merit; from the 'age of twenty-five years he shared in the government, and at the age of forty 'he became its judge and head. This election was repeated four times, and, if the 'laws of their condition had not opposed it, the esteem and inclination of his Monks 'would have continued him always in this post (a). . . . . He died at Paris in 'his monastery of the street of St Honoré, the twenty-fifth of September, 1701 (b)'. I will take some notice of the books he published [A].

(a) Mercure Galant, month of October 1701, pag. 253.

(b) Ib. p. 263.

[A] I will take some notice of the books he published.] 'The intimate acquaintance and familiarity, which 'there was at Rome between him and the learned 'Fagnanus, where he was procurator-general at that 'court, has procured us a practical treatise of the 'Canon-Law, which not only the monks, but the 'ecclesiastics also, consult in matters of discipline. It 'is not easy to collect together in a large volume so 'great a number of important matters, with so 'much order and perspicuity, as is contained in this 'small volume. The Feuillant nuns of Toulouse 'owe to it the discovery of the secret and almost in-'credible austerities of their first mothers. The public 'has relished his accounts (1).' He is the author of a book, intituled, The conduct of Don John de la Barriere, first abbot of the Feuillants, during the troubles of the League, and his attachment to the service of king Henry III. This work was printed in 1699: the Journal des Savans of the thirteenth of September, 1700, has given an abstract of it. Pradilhon had taken several journeys, for the good of his congregation, which gave him access to the most celebrated archives of the provinces of the kingdom. As he had a great deal of discernment with respect to ancient writings, and an honesty proof against all interest, the learned referred themselves to his extracts alone: the testimony of the famous Mr Baluze, in his Popes of Avignon, is to him instead of an entire elogium. The nobility willingly trusted him with the examination into their titles; he had studied that matter by way of amusement; but his modesty would never suffer him to publish what he had written on that subject (2).

(1) Mercure Galant, month of October 1701, pag. 255, 256.

(2) Mercure Galant, ubi supra, pag. 259, &c.

PRÆPOSITUS (NICOLAS) was a Physician at Tours, and composed a Dispensatory, which is full of thefts, if we believe the author I am going to cite [A]. The Sieur Konig (a) calls him a Physician of Salernum. It is a mistake.

(a) In Biblioth. vet. & nova. pag. 661.

[A] He composed a Dispensatory, which is full of thefts, if we believe the author I am going to cite.] This author's name is John de Renou: I have given his article. He informs us (1), that there have been four Physicians, named Nicolas each of which has written a Dispensatory, and that, among these, he, who is surnamed Præpositus, formerly a Physician at Tours, 'has made no scruple to seize to himself the honour 'and labour of the other three, by transcribing word 'for word, and attributing to himself, the antidotary 'of a certain Pharmacographer, named James des 'Parties (2), which had been before compiled and 'transcribed by Nicolas Myrepsus, and other Antido-'tariographers; and, besides this, has maliciously 'concealed the surname of the said Nicolas's, the bet-'ter to hide the manifest theft he has been guilty of 'from their writings, and has been contented to put 'at the head of the compositions, which he stole 'from them, the said name of Nicolas alone, without 'specifying the surname of Nicolas of Alexandria, Ni-'colas of Florence, or Nicolas of Salernum; from 'whom he has taken (and they from the above said 'James des Parties) what he falsly ascribes to 'himself.' He has deceived many persons; for the common Apothecaries look upon him as the true and rightful author of all the barbarous and gross compositions, which are in a certain vulgar and trivial Dispensatory, in the frontispiece of which he has put his name and surname. But he has been so malicious, that he has put his name alone at the head of each composition, to make it be believed, that he is the author of it, tho' the contrary is very well known. This may be of use to those writers, who would continue the list of plagiaries begun by Thomasius.

(1) John de Renou, in the 6th book of the Antidotary, ch. vi, pag. 751, Edit. of Lyons 1637. See also his Introduction to Pharmacy, ch. xvii, pag. 489; and in the preface, and the 3d chapter of the 5th book of the Antidotary, & alibi passim.

(2) The author of Lindenius renovatus says, pag. 490, that Jacobus de Partibus, born at Tournay, was Physician of Charles VII, King of France, and Philip duke of Burgundy, and that he died canon of Tournay, about the year 1465. See the article PARTS.

The author of Lindenius renovatus (3), citing the Chronology of the Physicians, composed by Wolfgang Justus, affirms, that Nicolas Præpositus seems to be the same as Nicholas Myrepsus, surnamed the Alexandrian, and that it is said, he was a Physician at Lyons about the year 1524. Now this Wolfgang Justus had said (4), that Nicolaus Myrepsus Alexandrinus, Præpositus alias dictus, lived among the modern Greeks about the year 1198, and (5) that Nicolaus Alexandrinus lived before Ægineta, i. e. before the year 420 (6). Judge a little, I pray, whether he considered the matter nearly. We find in Lindenius renovatus (7), that the Dispensatorium Nicolai Præpositi ad Aromatarios, sive Introductiones in Artem Apothecariatus, was printed at Lyons, in 1505 and 1536, in 4to; and at Paris, in 1582, in 4to.

(3) Pag. 842.

(4) Ib. p. 840.

(5) Ib. p. 829.

(6) Ib. p. 865.

(7) Pag. 842.

PRAT (ANTONY DU) chancellor of France, and afterwards cardinal, in the reign of Francis I, was born at Issoire in Auvergne. It is agreed, that he was a man of great abilities, but not that he was a good man. He is blamed, among other things, for the Concordate, that was made between Leo X and Francis I, in the year 1516. It is said, that by that means he introduced into the kingdom a pernicious usage [A], whereby the choice of bishops was transferred to the court; which

[A] It is pretended, that he introduced, by the Concordate, a pernicious usage.] I design to quote some authors upon this subject, and I begin with the words of a Jansenist (1): 'Chancellor Antony du Prat, 'cardinal, archbishop of Sens, bishop of Alby, 'Valence, Die, and Gap, and abbot of Fleury, as-'sembled (2) in the convent of the great Augustins 'at Paris, the bishops of his province, who attended 'the court, and caused some ordinances to be 'read, which he had made for the explanation of the 'Christian doctrine, and for the discipline of the 'church, against the errors of Luther, which made 'a great noise in Europe at that time . . . . (3)

(1) Dialogue entre deux Parroissiens de St Hilaire du Mont, sur les Ordonnances contre la Traduction de Mons, pag. 37, of the first volume of the pieces, concerning that translation.

(2) In the year 1528.

(3) Ib. p. 38.

That

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which was the ready way to beſtow mitres upon men more worldly and vain, than learned and virtuous. But it may be anſwered, that the church was not better ſerved

That prelate never reſided in any of his dioceſes, and never performed any epiſcopal function, except that ordinance againſt Martin Luther, Philip Melanchthon, Oecolampadius, and Zuinglius; for Calvin and Beza were not yet talked of. This good prelate is ſaid to have aboliſhed the Pragmatic Sanction, that is, the pure obſervation of the ancient canons in the church of France, and to have been the author of the Concordate between king Francis I and Leo X, whereby the apoſtolical diſcipline has been deſtroyed in France, canonical elections have been aboliſhed, and the Gallican church brought under a deplorable ſlavery.' The archbiſhop of Ambrun took that chancellor's part, and endeavoured to make the Janſeniſts odious to the court; as if by diſapproving the Concordate they envied the advantages that accrue to his majeſty from it: They endeavour, ſays he (4), to deprive his crown of a great advantage: they exclaim, in the tenth page of the firſt libel, againſt the Concordate, that was made between Francis I and Pope Leo X. That good prelate, ſay they, ſpeaking of chancellor du Prat, cardinal and archbiſhop of Sens, is ſaid to have aboliſhed the Pragmatic Sanction, that is, the pure obſervation of the ancient canons, &c. . . . . They bear an ill will to that great man, becauſe, in a council he held in his province of Sens, in the year 1528, he forbad the tranſlations of the Bible into the vulgar language. Theſe words were criticized by a perſon, who wondered (5) he ſpoke of the Concordate in a manner ſo unbecoming his character. 'He ſhould have learned from the moſt famous Hiſtorians, and the verbal proceſſes of the clergy of France, what opinion the biſhops, the parliaments, and good men, have always had of that treaty. He ſhould not have been ignorant, that for a long time public prayers were put up in ſeveral churches, to beg of GOD that it might be aboliſhed, by the reſtoration of canonical elections (6), as it appears from ſeveral Rituals, ſuch as that of Vannes, printed at Lyons, and another of Clermont, printed in 1608, by order of the late cardinal de la Rochefoucaut. Laſtly, ſince he ſets a great value upon the authority of the archbiſhop of Paris, he ſhould at leaſt have ſpoken of it as that prelate does in the life of Henry IV, wherein he ſays, pag. 229, that the General Aſſembly of the Clergy, held at Paris in 1599, made a long remonſtrance to the king, whereby the prelates intreated him not to take upon him to nominate to the biſhoprics, abbies, and other benefices, with cure of ſouls. And he ſhould not have appeared leſs knowing than a prince like Henry IV bred up in hereſy, and in the war, who notwithſtanding anſwered the clergy, as the archbiſhop of Paris tells us, that he acknowledged the truth of what they had told him concerning the nomination to benefices, but that he was not the author of that abuſe.' I ſhall add another paſſage (7). It is not true, that the writers of Port-Royal have reaſon to bear an ill-will to chancellor du Prat, becauſe he forbad the tranſlations of the Bible into the vulgar language in the council of Sens, of the year 1528; 'for he never iſſued ſuch a prohibition, being contented to forbid only the printing of the ſacred books, without the authority of the ordinary: which does not concern the verſion of Mons, which was approved by the ordinary of the place where it was printed. Neither is it true, that it is a fault not to ſpeak of cardinal du Prat as of a great man, and that the author of the Dialogue is to blame for ſpeaking of him as he does, ſince no one, who is ever ſo little acquainted with our Hiſtory, can deny, that no man was more cried down than he was by the writers of his time. Belcarius, biſhop of Metz, calls him Bipedum nequiſſimus, - - - the worſt of men, and accuſes him of having bribed the judges to condemn to death the Sieur de Semblance. Probably it is upon him that Budæus beſtows the ſtrange encomium which is at the beginning of the 260th page * of his book intituled Forenſia.'

It is certain, that the Concordate was attended with terrible abuſes in the collation of benefices: hence it is, that, upon the complaints of the three eſtates of the kingdom, aſſembled at Orleans, in the year 1560, a regulation was made, which might have put things in a very good way, if it had been obſerved. It runs thus, 'All archbiſhops and biſhops ſhall be, for the time to come, upon a vacancy, elected and nominated, viz. the archbiſhops, by the biſhops of the province, and the chapter of the archiepiſcopal church: the biſhops, by the archbiſhop and biſhops of the province, and the canons of the epiſcopal church, together with twelve notable gentlemen elected by the gentry of the dioceſe, and twelve notable citizens, who ſhall be likewiſe elected in the town-houſe of the archiepiſcopal or epiſcopal city. All which being convened upon a certain day, by the chapter of the vacant ſee, and aſſembled in the aforeſaid manner, ſhall agree in the choice of three perſons, duly qualified according to the holy canons and councils, and of thirty years of age at leaſt, whom they ſhall preſent to us, that we may elect one of the three for the vacant archbiſhopric or biſhopric.' I ſhall ſet down the words of a commentator (8), to give the reader a notion of the evils, which it was thought that ordinance would remedy. 'If the divine and human laws had been obſerved by thoſe who profeſs them, or whoſe buſineſs it is to put them in execution, this article would certainly have been needleſs; for the things mentioned in it were regulated by the ancient laws and holy ordinances, as they are here. But the calamities of the time, the boldneſs, avarice, and the credit of great men, had corrupted and altered every thing; and the miſchief would have daily increaſed, had not our judicious prince, or thoſe who aſſiſt him, prevented it. Ignorant and fooliſh men were poſſeſſed of the beſt benefices and the nobleſt dignities and biſhoprics, by favour, friendſhip, and money; and becauſe, for want of capacity and experience, they were not able to diſcern good from evil, and knew not how to diſtinguiſh virtue from vice, they acted exactly according to their mean knowledge. Nay, ſometimes they were appointed biſhops before they were intirely formed in their mothers womb; the ill effects of which have been felt in all Chriſtendom. The poor afflicted people could not forbear murmuring, being governed by ſuch men, or their lieutenants and vicars, of the ſame ſtamp with their maſters, who laid intolerable burdens upon them, though they themſelves did not care to touch them with one of their fingers; until the LORD opened the eyes, the heart, and the mouths of the people, to ſee and complain, and of princes to hear, and of the king to judge with equity and uprightneſs. I think we have reaſon to hope from Charles IX, our king, what the Augurs or Soothſayers ſaid of Auguſtus, in whoſe reign the whole monarchy was ſo well governed, and enjoyed all manner of proſperity and happineſs. It appears by this article, that good and honeſt men, well ſkilled in learning, ſhall receive a reward for their labours; the ignorant ſhall be rejected and laid aſide; and young people will be encouraged to appear on the noble ſtage of virtue. Sucking children will be no longer raiſed to eccleſiaſtical dignities, a burden too heavy for their weak ſhoulders, eſpecially in what concerns religion, which requires, that none ſhould be appointed to teach it but ſuch as are honeſt, chaſte, and holy, and whoſe fleſhly luſts are extinguiſhed through age, or the love of GOD. For, to appoint for the government of the church ignorant men and children, who are not able to govern themſelves, is a ſtrange and extravagant thing, and no leſs contrary to all divine and human laws, than if one ſhould appoint a pupil to be guardian of another pupil, and a blind-man to lead another blind-man. . . . . The good king Lewis XII, perceiving ſuch a fault among his clergy, ſaid, that aſſes had a better time than horſes; for horſes, added he, gallop to Rome in queſt of benefices, but many aſſes are provided with them. Which is the reaſon why they have been expoſed by ſeveral paſquinades and famous libels; and the following verſes have been made upon the loſs of the elections, againſt thoſe, who have uſurped them, and thoſe who are unworthily poſſeſſed of church-preferments.

(4) Requête preſentée au Roi par l'Archevêque d'Ambrun, pag. 270, of the aforeſaid volume.

(5) Remarques ſur la Requête de l'Archevêque d'Ambrun, pag. 271, of the ſame Tome.

(6) Quintin, in his ſpeech to the clergy, in the general aſſembly of the ſtates of the kingdom in 1561, ſpoke with great vigour for the reſtoration of the elections. See Preſident de la Place, Hiſt. de l'état de la Religion & Republique, fol. m. 143, verſo, & ſeq.

(7) Remarques, &c.

* Lib. iii.

(8) Joachin du Chalard, advocate in the great council, Sommaire Expoſition des Ordonnances du Roi Charles IX, fol. 7, verſo, Paris 1568.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſerved in the time of the elections, than it was under the Concordate [B]. I can hardly believe what is ſaid by ſome Hiſtorians, that cardinal du Prat diſcovered a deſire of being made Pope [C]. Some authors ſay, that he pretended a retention of urine,

Au temps paſſé l'Eſprit Saint eſliſoit
Ceux, dont ſouloit l'Egliſe eſtre ſervie.
En ce temps-là, vertu fruit produiſoit:
Car les eleuz eſtoyent de ſainte vie.

Mais maintenant les mondains par envie
Ont uſurpé la ſainte eſlection,
Dont s'en enſuy humaine affection:
Et par ainſi tous vices procedez

Sont des Paſteurs: qui nous ſont concedez
Par les chevaux, par la poſte, & par dons.
Trop mieux vauldroit les eſlire à trois dez:
Car à l'hazard ils pourroyent eſtre bons.

In times of yore, the Holy Spirit choſe
Such as moſt uſeful to the church cou'd be:
Virtue then had its crown; ſince only thoſe
Elected were, of noted ſanctity.

But now the worldlings have uſurp'd the choice,
Low grov'ling minds, by baſeſt motives ſway'd:
Hence favour and affection rule each voice,
And hence the vileſt men are paſtors made.

Who fitteſt are in churches to preſide,
By bribery alone determin'd is:
Better with box and dice the choice decide,
And truſt to chance for good ones, hit or miſs.

If I write the article of Genebrard, as I hope I ſhall, I will not forget to mention the book he publiſhed, to ſhew the neceſſity of reſtoring canonical elections (9). He called the Concordate a myſtery of iniquity.

(9) It was burnt by the hangman. See the XIth Diſſertation of Natalis Alexander, in Selecta Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ capita, Seculi XV, & XVI.

[B] The church was not better ſerved in the time of the elections, than it was under the Concordate.] It appears from the jeſt of Lewis XII, mentioned in the foregoing remarks, that there were many abuſes under the Pragmatic Sanction, and before the Concordate. The archbiſhop of Ambrun maintains (10), that the Concordate has removed the abuſes, the Simony, and the cabals which formerly prevailed in the elections. An Abbot Commendatory does very much enlarge upon thoſe diſorders. 'A great lady was ſaying one day, 'in my hearing, that ſhe heard king Francis ſay, that 'the chief reaſon, which moved him to make the 'Concordate with Pope Leo, in order to aboliſh the 'elections of biſhops and abbots, and of ſome priors, 'was becauſe thoſe elections were attended with great 'abuſes among the Monks; for, without any regard 'to a man's abilities and learning, which were then 'very rare in monaſteries .... they elected, moſt 'times, the merrieſt fellows, the greateſt whoremon-'gers and tipplers, the greateſt lovers of dogs and 'hawks, in a word, the greateſt debauchees, that they 'might have the liberty to live a looſe and diſorderly 'life, under ſuch abbots and priors, who were bound 'by an oath to indulge them in their debaucheries. 'The worſt of all was, that, when they could not 'agree in their elections, they frequently fought and 'wounded one another; nay, ſometimes their quarrels 'were attended with murder: in ſhort, they made a 'greater noiſe, and formed more cabals and factions, 'than there are at the creation of the rector of the 'univerſity of Paris, which I have ſeen formerly; 'I do not know whether it be ſo ſtill. Beſides, ſome 'elected a ſilly Monk, who wanted courage and re-'ſolution to keep them to their duty, and threatened 'him, when he pretended to ſeverity. Others elect-'ed a poor wretch, who ſtole their money and ſtarv-'ed his Monks, which occaſioned great complaints, 'and the impoveriſhing of the abbey.... In a word, 'there were many other abuſes in thoſe elections, 'which I paſs over in ſilence. Beſides, that great 'king, conſidering the many ſervices of his nobility, 'and not being able to reward them with the re-'venues of his demeſns, and the money ariſing from 'taxes, (for the whole was neceſſary to carry on his 'long wars) he thought it more proper to beſtow 'upon them ſome abbies, and other church-prefer-'ments, than to leave them in the hands of the 'Monks, a ſort of men, ſaid he, good for nothing 'but eating and drinking, gaming, making bow-'ſtrings and ferret-bags, catching rabbets, whiſtling 'to linets, and living an idle and diſorderly life; and 'therefore it was then a common ſaying, As idle as 'a Prieſt or a Monk; and likewiſe, as covetous and as 'great a whoremonger as a Prieſt or a Monk; as the 'Italians ſay, Preti, fratri Monachi & pulli, mai non 'ſon ſatulli (11). .... It is to be obſerved, that, if 'the elections have been attended with abuſes among 'Monks, thoſe of biſhops have not been more regu-'lar; for, when a man had a mind to be made a bi-'ſhop, he bribed the canons and other dignified men 'with money or great promiſes: ſo that it was rather 'a downright Simony, than a lawful and holy electi-'on; in imitation of many Popes of thoſe times, who 'bribed the cardinals in order to get their votes. 'There were alſo great tumults and factions in the 'chapters, ſo far as to beat and kill one another; 'as it was formerly practiſed in Germany; for the 'canons were fighting men, as they are ſtill, and made 'uſe of ſwords, as well as of the Breviary. The bi-'ſhops lived a very diſorderly life in thoſe times: they 'reſided in their dioceſes more than they do now, for 'they never left them; but then they minded 'nothing but dogs, hawks, feaſts, and whores, of 'whom they had a Seraglio; as I have been told of 'one, who picked up young and handſome girls of 'ten years of age, and had them bred up and down 'in ſeveral villages (as gentlemen do their dogs) in 'order to make uſe of them when grown up. They 'were allowed to live ſuch a ſcandalous life; for they 'were ſo much dreaded, that none would have had 'the courage to cenſure them for it. I might ſay a 'great deal more upon this ſubject, but I will not 'raiſe a ſcandal. Our preſent biſhops (ſaid a great 'man to me) are more diſcreet, or at leaſt more cun-'ning hypocrites, and know better how to conceal 'their vices. GOD forbid that what I have ſaid of 'the ancient and modern biſhops, ſhould be under-'ſtood of all; for in former times many of them were 'good and holy men, as there are ſtill, and there will 'be many, with GOD's bleſſing, who loves and never 'forſakes his people (12).'

(11) Brantome's Memoirs, Tom. i, in his diſcourſe upon Francis I, pag. 251, & ſeq.

(12) Brantome, ibid. pag. 255.

[C] It is pretended, that cardinal du Prat diſcovered a deſire of being made Pope.] The gentlemen of Port-Royal took care to repreſent to the archbiſhop of Ambrun what Laurence Capelloni relates concerning the death of Antony du Prat. 'Clement VII, ſays that 'author, being dead, cardinal du Prat had ſuch an 'extravagant deſire of being made Pope, that he took 'the liberty to tell the king, that it was in his pow-'er to raiſe him to the Holy See. The King, being 'willing to ſee how far his ambition would carry him, 'gave him leave to go on. The cardinal added, 'That, if His Majeſty would be pleaſed to uſe his in-'tereſt with the college of cardinals, in order to make 'him Pope, he would be contented with the name, 'and the king ſhould have the power. The king, 'perceiving the exceſſive ambition of this man, and 'conſidering the great difficulties of ſuch an enter-'prize, which could not be executed without vaſt ſums 'of money, anſwered him, Faith, Mr Chancellor, the 'cardinals are ſo greedy, that I have no mind to ſa-'tisfy their greedineſs. The cardinal replied, That, 'if the king approved of the deſign, he would find 'four hundred thouſand crowns to put it in execution. 'The king told him, For what I know, Sir, you have 'the ſum you mention; but I have no mind to con-'cern myſelf with ſuch a project. This anſwer made 'the cardinal ſenſible, that he was to blame, not ſo 'much for having expreſſed his ambition, as for hav-'ing diſcovered his great riches. He grew ſo melan-'choly upon it, that he fell ſick, and his illneſs, 'which was inconſiderable at firſt, increaſed very 'much, when he was told, that the king, knowing 'that he kept his bed, had ordered his goods and 'money to be ſeized, telling thoſe, who complained 'of it in the cardinal's name, that he dealt with him 'as he had adviſed him to deal with others: So that,

'ſays

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

urine, in order to get out of a danger [D]. It is not likely, that his ignorance of the Latin tongue was so great, as Jonston will have it [E]. It has been observed, that ' says that Historian, the cardinal died, God knows ' how, (Dio sa come) very uneasy about it (13).' It will not be improper to add, that those gentlemen intimated to that prelate, that he could not doubt of the truth of that story, since he had approved the book wherein it is to be found. Such was, say they (14), the death of that great man, of whom one cannot give an ill character, without offending the archbishop of Ambrun. And yet it is observable, that this story is mentioned in the lives of the cardinals, written by Aubery, and printed for Soly, in 1645, with an authentic approbation of Messire George d'Aubusson, wherein he declares, that the truth of History is exactly represented in that book; and therefore it is somewhat strange, that his great employments should so quickly make him forget his first studies.

(13) Remarques, ubi supra, pag. 272.

(14) Ibid.

Mr Varillas (15) gives us Capelloni's narrative, without citing him, and observes, that du Prat grew so big, that his table was cut hollow, to make room for his belly. He adds (16), that this cardinal, ' after he had ' been in a languishing condition for half a year, died ' the 9th of July 1535 (17); and to make a kind of ' satisfaction to his cathedral church of Sens, into ' which he never entered, tho' he had been a long ' time archbishop of that place, he desired to be buried ' in it.' We are told another story, which is more disadvantageous to Francis I, than that of Capelloni. I shall set it down, to shew how little such narratives ought to be minded; for there is hardly any greater sign of falsity, than when a thing is differently related, and applied to different times and persons. ' It was ' a peccadillo of the court, like that of king Francis I, ' to trick cardinal Marcellus (§ α) out of his money, ' for the king wanted money. Melanchthon, who says ' he was very well acquainted with that cardinal, re- ' lates the thing in the following manner: The king, having received some letters from Rome, spread a report, that Pope Paul was dead. He sent for that cardinal, whom he knew to be an ambitious man, and very desirous to be made Pope, and told him that piece of false news. The cardinal represented to the king how much it concerned him and his kingdom, that the next Pope should be a good friend to him. It is certainly so, replied the king; what if we should make you Pope? The cardinal approved the motion. This cannot be done without money, said the king, and I have not the necessary sums to carry on such a project. The cardinal offered him two tuns of gold. That is enough, said the king; I will add to it something of my own. The ' next letters, that came from Rome, brought advice ' that the Pope was still living, and had not been sick. ' The cardinal told the king of it, and demanded his ' money. The king's answer was, I will chide my ambassador for writing to me false news: as for the ' money, he said, If the Pope be not dead, he will die (18).' The author, who relates this story, quotes a book of Melanchthon, which I have not (19), and therefore I cannot tell whether he is exact; but I find in another work of Melanchthon, a fact which seems to keep a medium between this story, and that of Capelloni. Here it is related at length. ' Rex ' Galliæ, pater Francisci, indigebat subitò pecunia. ' Itaque per alium quendam ad suum Cancellarium ' ex Roma, & per postam mittit ei literas, significans ' Papam esse mortuum. Lectis literis, mox properat ' Cancellarius ad Regem, ei nunciaturus tanquam ali- ' quid novi. Rex legit literas, simulans se nescire, & ' interrogat quid sibi sit faciendum? Respondit Can- ' cellarius, consultissimum esse mittere Romam Lega- ' tum, & aliquem constituere Papam, qui sit à parti- ' tibus regis Galliæ. At Rex: ad eam rem opus est ' pecunia, sicut dicitur: Nulla pecunia est satis magna, ' aspiranti ad Pontificatum. Cancellarius dicit, se ad- ' huc habere duas thonnas auri; utrum sufficerent? ' Respondit Rex: Bene est, & ego aliquid pecuniæ ' addam. Cura igitur unam thonnam auri perferri ad ' me. Postquam eam Rex acceperat, subornat alium ' nuntium afferentem ei literas, Papam adhuc vivere, ' & non esse mortuum. Egregium sanè inventum, ' quo quasi cornicum oculos confixit, & avarum per ' suam avaritiam decepit (20). - - - The king of France, the father of Francis, on a sudden wanted money. ' Wherefore he caused a letter to be sent by another hand, ' and by the post, from Rome, to his chancellor, informing him, that the Pope was dead. The chancellor having read the letter, hastened to the king, to acquaint him with the news. The king read the letter, pretending ignorance, and asked what was to be done? The chancellor replied, that it is most advisable to send an ambassador to Rome, and set up one for Pope, who was a friend to the king of France. The king answered, that money was necessary for that purpose, and that no sum was large enough to one who aspired to the pontificate. The chancellor said, he had two tuns of gold, if that would do. The king replied, it is well, I will add some money to it; therefore send one of the tuns to me. After the king had received it, he suborned another messenger to bring him a letter, acquainting him that the Pope was not dead. An ingenious device this, to deceive an avaritious man by the means of his own avarice!' According to this passage, it was not Francis I, who tricked his chancellor out of his money, but another king of France, father to Francis. But because the father of Francis I was not a king, it should be said, that Melanchthon means Henry II, father to Francis II; but can Francis II be rightly denoted by the bare name of Francis? Manlius did no honour to his master, by publishing a narrative, wherein the persons are so ill described. I leave it to the reader to observe how differently the three stories mentioned by me have been related.

(15) Hist. de François Prémier, livr. vii, pag. 241, of the 2*d Dutch edition.*

(16) Ibid. pag. 242, 243.

(17) The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, Aug. 1684, Art. VIII, pag. 629, mentions the year 1534, on the authority of the first Dutch edition of Varillas's Francis I. It appears from the epitaph of this Chancellor, mentioned by Frizon, pag. 574, 575, of the Gallia purpurata, that he died the 9th of July 1535, aged 72 years.

(18) Jeremiah de Pours, Divine Melodie du Saint Pfalmiste, livr. v, pag. 1090.

(19) He quotes Dom. pag. 3, fol. 171.

(20) Joannes Manlius, in Locorum communium Collectaneis ex Lectionibus Philippi Melanchthonis excerptis, pag. 375, Edit. Francof. 1568. This book might be intituled, Melanchthoniana.

[(§ α) The margin (19) cites Dom. p. 3. fol. 171, an author or book which Mr Bayle says he had not. The same story is found in the Joco-seria of Melander, n. 34 of the first tome of the Francfort edition, 1615: it is there quoted from D. Pezelius, Postill. Mel. part III, pag. 170. Probably the cardinal Marcellus here is no other than du Prat himself, of whom the same story is related, and whose Latin name Pratellus, in Melanchthon, may, perhaps, have been changed into Marcellus by the German Booksellers. Rem. Crit.]

[D] Some authors say, that he pretended a retention of urine to get out of a danger.] ' How many persons could ' I name, whose sickness had saved their lives, as ' formerly Augustus's? How many have avoided ' death, only because their great infirmity made every ' body believe that they were near their grave? * Multorum mortem distulit morbus, & saluti illis fuit videri ' perire. Cardinal du Prat was released out of prison in ' the reign of Francis I, for fear he should die of a re- ' tention of urine, having imposed upon his Physicians ' by drinking privately the water he made. And we ' have seen a favourite of Henry III, who succeeded ' so well in pretending to be a dying man, in order ' to divert some impending danger, in the reign of ' Henry IV, that he lived thirty years under the late ' king in perfect health (21).' I fancy la Mothe le Vayer took one man for another. If I am not mistaken, no author says, that our du Prat was imprisoned; but it is reported that cardinal Balue bethought himself of drinking his urine, that he might be set at liberty, by Lewis XI, on pretence of retention of urine (22). They are la Mothe le Vayer's words: he quotes the life of Lewis XI, written by Peter Matthieu; his quotation is right (23). And tho' it is not impossible that two ministers of state should make use of the same device in different times, I do not think, the two stories related by that author are true: it was still an easier thing for him to confound the time and the persons he speaks of. Many others have done it, and will do it for the time to come.

* Seneca, Epist. LXXIX.

(21) La Mothe le Vayer, Discours de la Santé & de la Maladie, in the 8*th volume of his Works, pag.* 185, 186.

(22) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter xlii, in the 10th volume of his Works, pag. 339.

(23) These are Peter Matthieu's words, lib. x, num. 3, pag. m. 524. He drank his urine so privately, that it was thought he would die of a retention of urine. The king ordered him to be visited; the Physicians gave him over, &c.

[E] It is not likely that his ignorance of the Latin tongue was so great as Jonston will have it.] That author wrote a little book, intituled, Naturæ Constantia, wherein he pretends to prove, that the world does not grow worse and worse. Among other instances of the ignorance of former ages, he alledges our du Prat, who thought that molossus signified a mule, and that the Latin word for a mule was mulctus. Placet hic adjicere, says he (24), & exemplum du Prat Episcopi & Cancellarii Galliæ; qui cum in literis ab Henrico VIII, Angliæ Rege ad Franciscum I, Galliarum Regem scriptis, ista verba, Mitto tibi duodecim molossos, offendisset, mulos per molossos intellegi existimavit: & post

(24) Jo. Jonstonus, de Naturæ constantia, pag. 73, Edit. Amstel. 1632.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that he was a great lover of young asses flesh [F], and that others loved it in imitation of him.

He was a great persecutor of the Protestants: some of them say, that, as a punishment from God, he died in despair [G]. A famous Historiographer supposes, that he was cruelly tormented by the stings of his conscience, remembring that he had introduced several innovations, whereby the people were oppressed (a). I shall set down the epitaph which Beza made on him (b).

(a) Mezerai, Abr. Chronol. Tom. iv, pag. m. 584, ad ann. 1535.

(b) Antonio Pratensi, Cancellario Galliarum, inter obsequiosissimos. Amplissimus vir hic jacet, Beza, Poëmat. pag. 94, Edit. Tertiæ.

& post animadversso errore, molossos se pro muletis accepisse, duplicata insitia subjunxit. It is to be observed, that Jonston cites no body for this, tho' in other places he very carefully quotes his authors for the most trifling things. Some ascribe this slander to Beza, as it appears by the following words. 'Perhaps it will be 'with cardinal de Birague's ignorance, as it was with 'that of cardinal du Prat, who, according to Beza, 'when king Francis I had received twelve English 'mastives from Henry VIII, the letter saying duodecim molossos, asked of the king one of the mules sent 'to him from England; and being told by the king 'that they were mastives, he excused himself, saying, 'he thought there was in the letter duodecim muletos 'But, after all, Mr Aubery, who has written a very 'faithful history of the cardinals, shews that this ignorance, which Beza ascribes to cardinal du Prat, is a 'meer calumny; and he proves it by the testimony of 'Feron, who calls him a very learned and famous 'Civilian, of Sadolet, who pitched upon him to 'censure his Latin works, and of Auton, who praises 'him for his eloquent speech, which he made in 'Latin before the emperor Maximilian (25).'

 Tom. iii, pag. 355.

(25) Naudé, Dialogue de Masurat. pag. 426. See also Father Garasse, pag. 641, of his Doctrine Curieuse.

I know not whether Beza has this story in any of his works; but I know that it is to be found in a book of Henry Stephens (26).

[F] It has been observed, that he was a great lover of young asses flesh.] He was like Mæcenas, in this respect, who was the first that brought asses-flesh into vogue. Pullos earum (asinarum) epulari primus Mæcenas instituit, multum eo tempore prælatos onagris: post eum interiit auctoritas saporis (27). After the death of that favourite, people grew weary of that food. Meibomius observes, that the same thing was seen in the time of Antony du Prat (28). Simile quid de Antonio Pratense, Galliæ Cancellario, refert Johannes Bruyerinus lib. xxiii. de re cibaria cap. xx. Ætate nostra, inquit, Antonius Pratensis, Galliæ Cancellarius, imitator exstitit Mæcenatis in eo genere escæ (carnis nempe asininæ) quàm avidissimus; verum & cum ipso gratia quoque illius carnis sepulta est (29). That book of Meibomius being somewhat scarce, I hope the reader will not be displeased to find here several particular facts mentioned by that author, whereby it will appear, that men bring their taste into slavery, out of flattery; and that a favourite can bring into fashion, not only such cloaths as he likes, but also such meats as suit with his palate (30). 'Potuit vero '(Mæcenas) & gulæ tantum aut peculiaris sibi appetitus grátia cibo isto vesci cœpisse familiarius: quem 'deinde ob ipsius auctoritatem alii, quasi assentatione 'quadam, cariorem & in pretio habuere, donec ab 'obitu Mæcenatis rursum vilesceret, quod usu venire 'in ejusmodi rebus fere solet. Sic acipenserem Plinius 'refert lib. IX. cap. XVII. nullo in honore fuisse suo, 'id est, Trajani tempore: quem tamen Serenus Sammonicus apud Macrobium Saturn. lib. III. cap. XVI. 'docet, tum apud antiquos fuisse in pretio, tum post 'Plinium suo ævo gratiam ejus ad epulas quasi postliminio rediisse. Sic Horatius rhombum & ciconiam 'nullo in cibis usu fuisse scribit, antequam id docuisset 'vir prætorius, sive is fuerit, dubitantibus Acrone & 'Porphyrione, Asellius, sive Rufus, aut Sempronius. 'Et addit, mergos, vile alias cibi genus, si quis assos 'dixerit futuros suaves, juventutem Romanam pravi 'docilem id facile credituram. Versus sunt Serm. 'lib. II. Sat. II.

(26) In the 29th chapter of his Apology for Herodotus, pag. m. 334.

(27) Plin. lib. viii, cap. xliii.

(28) Joh. Henricus Meibomius, in Vita Mæcenatis, cap. xxvi, pag. 165.

(29) I have verified this quotation out of Bruyerinus: it is right, except that instead of lib. xxiii, it should be lib. xiii.

(30) Meibom. ibid. pag. 165, 166.

'Tutus erat rhombus, tutoque ciconia nido,
Donec vos auctor docuit prætorius. Ergo
Si quis nunc mergos suaveis edixerit assos,
Parebit pravi docilis Romana juventus.

'Nec dissimile quid contigit superiori seculo Romæ. 'De Hadriano VI, enim Pontif. Max. narrat Paulus 'Jovius (31), &c. - - - - Mæcenas might accustom him- 'self to that dish, because he had a particular taste 'that way: whilst others pretended to esteem it, out of 'flattery to him: till after the death of Mæcenas, it 'fell again into disesteem, as generally happens in things 'of this nature. So Pliny relates, (lib. IX. cap. XVII) 'that, in his time, that is, in the reign of Trajan, the 'sturgeon was in no esteem; which yet Serenus Sammonicus (in Macrobius, lib. III. cap. XVI) tells us was 'in esteem among the Ancients, and even in his time, which 'was after Pliny's, had, by stealth, as it were, gained a 'place in entertainments. So Horace writes, that the turbot 'and stork were not served up at tables, till a person of 'quality shewed the way: whether he was Asinius, or 'Rufus, or Sempronius, is uncertain; for Acron and 'Porphyry are in doubt about it. He adds, that if any 'one should say, the cormorant, otherwise a mean dish, 'would be very good eating stewed, the youth of Rome 'would easily come into the belief of it. His verses 'are,

Safe swam the turbot, safe the stork cou'd rest,
Unclaim'd by nicer palates, in her nest,
Till a rich glutton serv'd them at his feast.
Nay, were it said, a cormorant, when stew'd,
Becomes, by dressing, most delicious food,
The youth of Rome their taste woa'd thence refine,
And each young lord upon a cormorant dine.

(31) Meibomius mentions here what I have quoted in the remark [R], of the article HADRIAN VI.

'Something, not unlike this, happened at Rome in the 'last age. For Paul Jovius relates of Pope Hadrian VI, &c.'

[G] Some say, that, as a punishment from GOD, he died in despair.] Henry Stephens, having mentioned a lieutenant-criminal, (who died distracted, after he had uttered several blasphemies against GOD) adds (32), 'Chancellor du Prat died also a miserable death, not- 'withstanding his Hostel-Dieu [Hospital], (of which 'king Francis I said, that it was not large enough to 'contain all those whom he had reduced to beggary); 'for he died at Nantoillet, his country-seat, his stomach being eaten up by worms, and uttering blasphemies against GOD, with great impatience, occasioned by the violent pain he felt, and (as some say) 'by the vexation he was under to see his trunks sealed 'up, so that he said, see what it is to serve a king 'with body and soul. This du Prat was the first, 'who thought fit that the parliament should take cognizance of heresies, because he said, they are attended with blasphemy. It was he likewise who 'gave the first commissions to put to death those 'who opposed the church of Rome, being weary of 'the long proceedings in Berquin's trial.

(32) Henry Stephens's Apology for Herodotus, ch. xxvi, pag. m. 310.

PRÆTEXTATUS (PAPYRIUS) made himself famous at Rome from his youth, by keeping a thing secret which his mother had a mind to know. This story is mentioned in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary; but all the wit of it has been left out; and therefore I shall give a more faithful account of the thing [A]. I shall

[A] I shall give a more faithful account of the thing.] The senate not being able to put an end to a matter of great moment, that was under debate, put it off till the next day, and ordered that the thing should be kept secret, till they had made a decree about it. Young Papyrius, who had followed his father into the senate, according to the custom of that time, being asked by his mother what had been done in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I shall also direct the reader to the first author of the story, better than has been done by the writer of that Supplement: the thing is of some importance on this occasion [B].

in the assembly, answered, that every body was ordered to be silent about it, and that therefore he was not allowed to say any thing of it. This answer increased the lady's curiosity. The youth, being more importuned than before, was obliged to tell a lie, in order to make himself easy, without disobeying the senate. He told his mother, that this question had been debated, whether it would be more advantageous to the Republic, to allow a husband to have two wives, or a wife to have two husbands. The lady, surprized at this discourse, went out hastily to acquaint the other women with it; so that the next day a whole crowd of them appeared at the gate of the senate-house, entreating the assembly, with tears in their eyes, that they would rather ordain, that a woman should have two husbands, than that a man should have two wives. The senators were surprized to see these women making such an uproar; but young Papyrius explained the thing to them, telling them what device he had made use of to satisfy his mother's curiosity. The senate admired him for it, and ordered, that, for the time to come, he should be the only boy allowed to be present in the assembly. This is the origin of the surname Prætextatus (1). We find this story in Aulus Gellius: I shall set down the words of that author. Secretum rei & silentium deberi puer affirmans animum ejus ad inquirendum everberat. Quærit igitur compressus violentiusque. Tum puer, matre urgente, lepidi atque festivi mendacii consilium capit. Actum in senatu dixit, utrum videretur utilius magisque è Republicâ esse, unusne ut duas uxores haberet, an ut una apud duos nupta esset. Hoc illa ut audivit, animo compavescit: domo trepidans egreditur: ad ceteras matronas defert quod audierat. Perveniunt ad senatum postera die matrumfamilias caterva, lacrymantes atque obsecrantes orant una potius ut duobus nupta fieret, quàm ut uni duæ. Senatores ingredientes in curiam, quæ illa mulierum intemperies & quid sibi postulatio isthæc vellet, mirabantur. Puer Papyrius in medium curiæ progressus quid mater audire instituisset, quid ipse matri dixisset, rem, sicuti fuerat, denarrat. Senatus fidem atque ingenium pueri deosculatus consultum facit, ut posthac pueri cum patribus in curiam ne introeant, nisi ille unus Papirius (2). Macrobius transcribed this almost word for word; but he added to it a circumstance, that is not to be found in Aulus Gellius: he says, that the senators looked upon the boldness of those women as an ill-boding prodigy, at which they were amazed (3).

(1) Ei puero postea cognomentum honoris gratia inditum prætextatus, ob loquendi tacendique in ætate prætextata prudentiam. Aulus Gellius, lib. i, cap. xxiii.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Ut non parvæ rei prodigium illam verecundi sexus impudicam insaniam pavescebant. Macrob. Saturn. lib. i, cap. vi, pag. m. 211.

The author of the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary has committed two faults. I. He supposes (4) that Papyrius told his mother, that the senate had ordered, that a man should have two wives. That author should have said, that he made her believe, it had been debated, whether this would be more advantageous to the republic, than to order that a woman should have two husbands. II. He supposes, that those women begged of the senate, that women might have the same advantage that was granted to men the day before, and that each of them might be allowed to have two husbands. This account makes the story insipid, and deprives it of it's pleasantness: nay, it represents those ladies as altogether ignorant of their true interest; for what could they get by asking such a thing? Is it not manifest, that, all things duly considered, they had been rather in a worse than in a better condition, if each man might have had two wives, and each woman two husbands? The best thing they could hope for, was, to be upon the same terms; for if each of them might have said, I have two husbands, she might also have said, I share them with another. Are two halves more than a whole? I know, one may think of several cases, wherein it would be an advantage to them; but, upon other accounts, and in several other cases, which one may easily suppose, the disadvantage would counterbalance, and, perhaps, exceed the advantage.

(4) At the word Papyrius.

[B] It is of some importance on this occasion to direct the readers to the first author.] Notwithstanding the authority of Aulus Gellius, I should be apt to think that it is an idle story: But I cannot believe it to be so, when I consider, that the grave Cato the Censor mentioned it in a speech. And therefore, the better to enable the readers to pass a right judgment upon this matter of fact, it is not sufficient to acquaint them that Macrobius mentions it (5); for such a compiler of witty sayings and stories, as he is, does not deserve to be much credited. Witty sayings and stories are frequently forged in one's closet. Those who invent them, being unwilling to lose their labour, publish them, and ascribe them to certain persons, who lived at such a time, omitting no circumstances that may make them credible. When these inventions are diverting, and afford matter for slander, they take root in the memory, and pass from mouth to mouth. They are collected, and often printed; but good judges will only commend the wit that is in them, without taking them for real matter of fact. This is the judgment that ought to be made of several stories and witty conceits, mentioned by Macrobius; and therefore his authority is very inconsiderable, as to this commotion of the Roman ladies. Aulus Gellius, whom he transcribes, is a more credible writer; for he lived nearer the time when the thing is said to have happened; and yet all those, who quote no other author but him upon this occasion, want discernment. Cato should be quoted for this story, since Aulus Gellius had it from him: He does not quote the very words of that Censor, because he had not then the original, but he gives the sense of them. 'Historia, 'says he (6), de Papirio Prætextato dicta scriptaque 'est à M. Catone in oratione, qua usus est ad milites 'contra Galbam, cum multa quidem venustate atque 'luce atque munditia verborum. Ea Catonis verba 'huic prorsus commentario indidissem, si libri copia 'fuisset id temporis, quum hæc dictavi. Quod si non 'virtutes dignitatesque verborum, sed rem ipsam scire 'quæris, ferme ad hunc modum est. M. Cato relates this story of Papirius Prætextatus in an elegant 'oration to the army against Galba. I should have inserted the words of Cato in this commentary, if I had 'been master of the original, when I wrote it. But, if 'you desire to know the fact itself, stripped of the beauty of 'language, it is thus.' There is some probability, that this story is true, since the grave Cato mentioned it in a speech that was published, I am not ignorant that this Censor jested now and then (7); but it was neither a proper time, nor a fit place, for a man of his character to jest in. Perhaps it will be objected to me that Livy, who mentions another commotion of the Roman ladies, says nothing of this; but it may be answered, that perhaps he gave an account of it in the books of his history that are lost. I shall observe, by the by, that the other commotion was occasioned by the law, whereby women were forbidden to wear any ornaments. There was a design to suppress it. Some tribunes desired it might be kept up; others were against it. Our Cato, who was consul that year (8), made a vigorous speech (9) for the preservation of that law, and against the liberty women took of running in crowds, and making a great uproar in the streets. Nevertheless the law was repealed: the tribunes, who opposed it were obliged to consent to it, when they saw their houses beset by those mutinous women (10). 'Capitolium turba homi-'num faventium adversantiumque legi complebatur. 'Matronæ, nulla nec auctoritate, nec verecundia, nec 'imperio virorum, contineri limine poterant: omnes 'vias urbis, adituque in forum obsidebant: viros des-'cendentes ad forum orantes, ut florente republica, 'crescente indies privata omnium fortuna, matronis 'quoque pristinum ornatum reddi paterentur. Auge-'batur hæc frequentia mulierum indies; nam etiam 'ex oppidis conciliabulisque convenerant. Jam & 'consules prætoresque, & alios magistratus adire & 'rogare audebant. Cæterum minimè exorabilem al-'terum utique consulem M. Porcium Catonem habe-'bant; qui pro lege, quæ abrogabatur, ita disseruit '... (11). Hæc quum contra legem proque lege 'dicta essent, aliquanto major frequentia mulierum 'postero die sese in publicum effudit, unoque ag-'mine omnes tribunorum (12) januas obsederunt, qui 'collegarum rogationi intercedebant: nec ante absti-'terunt quam remissa intercessio ab tribunis esset. 'Nulla deinde dubitatio fuit, quin omnes tribus le-'gem abrogarent, anno vigesimo post abrogata est, 'quam lata. - - - The capitol was filled with a crowd 'of those, who favoured and opposed the law. The 'matrons could not be kept at home either by authority, 'by

(5) Macrobius is the only author quoted in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

(6) Aulus Gellius, ubi supra.

(7) See Balzac, Oeuvres diverses, in his Discours de la conversation des Romains, pag. m. 49. I have quoted his words in citation (77) of the article PORCIUS.

(8) It was the year of Rome 558.

(9) See his oration in the 34th book of Livy, at the beginning.

(10) Tit. Liv. lib. xxxiv, init. pag. m. 621.

(11) Ibid.

(12) That is, of Marcus and Publius Brutus, tribunes of the people, who opposed their colleagues, who designed to propose that the Lex Oppia should be abrogated.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'by modeſty, or by the command of their huſbands: they 'thronged all the ſtreets that led to the Forum; petition- 'ing the ſenators, as they paſſed, that, in the preſent flou- 'riſhing ſtate of the common-wealth, they would conſent 'that the matrons ſhould be allowed to adorn themſelves 'as formerly. This concourſe of women increaſed daily by 'the means of aſſemblies and cabals. They even had 'the boldneſs to petition the conſuls, prætors, and the 'other magiſtrates. But they found one of the conſuls, 'M. Porcius Cato, inflexible, who thus harangued in 'favour of the law, which was repealed . . . . The 'reaſons for and againſt the law being thus urged, there 'was the next day a greater concourſe of women, who 'beſieged the doors of thoſe tribunes, who oppoſed the 'motion of their colleagues, nor left them, till they had 'promiſed to drop their oppoſition. After this, the law 'was unanimouſly repealed, it being twenty years ſince 'it was enacted.'

An obſervation upon the manner of citing authors.

I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that the way of quoting authors is ſo faulty, that it were to be wiſhed ſome rules were laid down for it. The moſt inconſiderable things may be brought into a method; and if there was a method for the manner of quoting authors, it would prevent ſeveral abuſes. If any one undertook to lay down ſuch rules, he ſhould tell us how far writers may be allowed to add ſomething of their own to the matters of fact related by them. We have ſeen that Macrobius amplified the ſtory we read in Aulus Gellius. A Spaniſh Jeſuit has added more to it; for he affirms, that on that day the ſenators came later than uſually from the aſſembly, and that it was the reaſon why Papyrius's mother aſked him what buſineſs took them up ſo long. Como el negocio era peſado, y los votos no ſe concertavan, falieron aquel dia los Senadores algo mas tarde de ſu conſejo de lo que ſolian: lo qual fue occaſion para que la madre del Papyrio le preguntaſſe, porque cauſa ſe havian detenido tanto en el Senado (13). He ſuppoſes the boy anſwered, that the thing under debate was to be kept ſecret till it ſhould be determined another day. Theſe circumſtances are not to be found in Aulus Gellius, nor in Macrobius: however, I think that, if there is any fault in advancing them, it is but a ſmall one; and the Spaniſh author ſeems to me more inexcuſable for quoting not only thoſe two ancient writers, but alſo Alexander ab Alexandro, Volaterranus, and Charles Stephens.

(13) Juan de Torres, primera parte de la Philoſophia Moral de Principes, lib. i, pag. 59, Edit. of Barcelona 1598.

PRICE (JOHN) flouriſhed in the XVIIth century He was a native of England, and a very learned and judicious man. After he had travelled a long time, he retired to Florence, where he turned Catholic (a). . . . . He died at Rome in the year 1676 (b). He publiſhed ſeveral learned books [A], and left behind him a Commentary upon the Epiſtles of Pliny the younger, which will ſhortly be printed (c). He has been praiſed by very learned men [B]. He ſtaid a conſiderable time at Paris, and publiſhed ſome books in that city; but he left it in 1646, and returned into England (d). Sarravius ſays, he had reaſon to be angry with France (e), and that he was a man who deſerved to be admired on account of his learning and great conſtancy in adverſity (f).

(a) Colomiés, Bibl. Choiſie, p. 142, Amſterdam 2699.

(b) Ib. p. 143.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Sarrav. Epiſt. CLXIX, pag. 173.

(f) Idem, Ep. CLVII, pag. 162.

(e) Ille in Angliam heri repatriavit erga Galliam noſtram peſſime, nec immerito, animatus. Ibid.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral learned books.] He put out at Paris, in 1635, Apuleius's Apology, with notes in 4to; and in 1646, Annotationes in Evangelium Matthæi, in 4to, and Annotationes ad Epiſtolam Jacobi, in 8vo; and in 1647, Acta Apoſtolorum ex ſcriptura, Patribus, Græciſque ac Latinis ſcriptoribus illuſtrata, in 8vo. His notes in Pſalmos & in pleroſque alios libros Novi Teſtamenti, were printed at London, in 1660, in folio. His commentary upon Apuleius's metamorphoſis was printed at Tergow in the year 1650 in 8vo. 'He intended to reprint Apu- 'leius's Apology, with ſeveral new notes of his own, 'and to publiſh Aulus Gellius, upon whom he had 'written many obſervations, Avienus de oris mariti- 'mis, and ſeveral corrections upon Heſychius, whoſe 'index he inſerted at the end of Apuleius's metamor- 'phoſis; I mean the index of the authors alledged by 'Heſychius. But his ſight being grown very weak, 'he ſays, in one of his notes, that he thinks he ſhall 'not be able to perform his deſigns (1).' The notes of this writer upon Apuleius's metamorphoſis are ſo long, that, whereas the text contains only two hundred and ſixty-two pages, they take up ſeven hundred and thirty-four pages, and are printed in a ſmaller letter than that of the text. The author declares his deſign was to fill his notes with new and good things, which was no eaſy taſk, ſince he wrote after ſo many other commentators (2). He adds, that he obſerves what Apuleius took from Tacitus, Suetonius, and Salluſt, and particularly from Virgil, and ſome other writers, and what Ammianus Marcellinus, Sidonius, St Jerom, and St Auguſtin took from him; that, above all things, he has endeavoured to print the text as like the original as he could, and that he has corrected about three hundred places, only by way of conjecture, having but one manuſcript in his hands. It was the ſame manuſcript which he gave to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who preſented it to the Bodleian library. He had Colvius's edition, with Caſaubon's notes, written with his own hand, and the edition of Vicenza, of the year 1488. He takes it to be the moſt ancient, next to that of Rome in 1472, and follows it in many places preferably to the later editions. Theſe two editions of Apuleius have been omitted by Mr Fabricius (3); the moſt ancient edition mentioned by him is that of Venice, 1493.

(1) Colomiés, Bibl. Choiſie, pag. 142, Amſt. 1699.

(2) Dedimus operam ut & appoſita & nova afferremus: rem poſt tot alios haud adeo in proclivi ſitam. Jo. Pricæus, in Præfat.

(3) Joh. Albertus Fabricius, in Bibl. Latina, pag. 137.

[B] He has been praiſed by very learned men.] 'Price 'is praiſed by Sarravius, in his letters; by archbiſhop 'Uſher, upon St Ignatius's epiſtles; by Heinſius in 'an epiſtle to Charles Dati; by Mr Selden more than 'once, in the ſecond book de Synedriis Ebræorum; by 'Voſſius in his Harmonia Evangelica; by Mr Morus, 'in his notes upon the New Teſtament; by Redi, in 'his tracts of the generation of inſects; but particular- 'ly by Axenius upon Phædrus (4).' Sarravius obſerves, that Price complained, that Salmaſius had treated him with contempt. In order to pacify him, Sarravius preſented him with a book of Salmaſius. Unicum quod ſupererat (exemplar) donavi doctiſſimo viro tuique ſtudioſiſſimo Jo. Priceo, ut eum placarem aliquo modo conquerentem, quod in Miſcellis Defenſionibus contemptim à te eſſet habitus (5).

(4) Colomiés, ubi ſupra, pag. 143, 144.

(5) Sarravius, Epiſt. CXLIV, pag. 150.

PRIDEAUX (JOHN) biſhop of Wincheſter, and a very eminent Divine, was born in 1578, at Stafford in Devonſhire. He was admitted into Exeter-college at Oxford, in the year 1596, where he made a great progreſs in a very little time. His ſtrong conſtitution enabled him to apply himſelf very much to ſtudy; and, having an excellent memory, he quickly reaped the fruits of his labours. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſubtilty in diſputing, and was made fellow of Exeter-college in 1602. He ſucceeded Dr Holland in the rectorſhip of that college, and was admitted Doctor of Divinity. He was made Regius profeſſor of Divinity, when Dr Abbot was promoted to the biſhopric of Saliſbury. He diſcharged the duties of his rectorſhip with ſo much prudence and politeneſs, that many ſtudents reſorted to Exeter-college, where they made ſo great a progreſs by his wiſe remonſtrances, and the good choice of their tutors, that many of them proved an ornament to the church and ſtate. He

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

continued in that employment thirty-two years, or thereabouts. He was no leſs careful in diſcharging the duties of his profeſſorſhip; which he did with great learning, expreſſing an inviolable fidelity to the king and the church of England. He exerciſed that profeſſorſhip ſomewhat above twenty-ſeven years. He was five times vice-chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford, and was made biſhop of Wincheſter in the year 1641. He died the twenty-ninth of July 1650, being ſeventy-two years of age (a). He publiſhed ſeveral books [A]. I need not ſay, that he ought not to be confounded with another PRIDEAUX [B], who put out a ſecond edition of the Marmora Arundelliana.

(a) Taken from Freherus's Theatrum, pag. 550. He quotes Antony Wood's Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] He wrote an apology for Caſaubon contra Andream Eudæmon-Johannem, printed at Oxford in 8vo, in the year 1614. His Hypomnemata Logica, Rhetorica, Phyſica, Tyrocinium ad ſyllogiſmum legitimum contexendum, &c. Heptades Logicæ, &c. came out in the ſame town; as alſo Lectiones decem in totidem Religionis capita: Lectiones 22, Orationes 13, Conciones 6, & Oratio ad Jacobum Regem: Orationes 9 inaugurales in promotione Doctorum: Faſciculus controverſiarum Theologicarum: Theologiæ Scholaſticæ Syntagma, & Conciliorum Synopſis: Manuductio ad Theologiam Polemicam: Iſagoge ad omnigenæ Hiſtoriæ lectionem, and ſeveral others. I omit the books he wrote in his mother-tongue.

[B] Another PRIDEAUX, who put out a ſecond edition of the Marmora Arundelliana.] His Chriſtian name is Humphry, and he is a ſtudent of Chriſt-Church in Oxford. He ſhews a great deal of learning in the book he publiſhed in that town, in the year 1676, in folio, with this title, Marmora Oxonienſia ex Arundellianis, Seldenianis, aliiſque conflata. It is a book in folio. He inſerted in that work what Mr Selden had publiſhed at London in 1628, with this title, Marmora Arundelliana. This book of Mr Selden contained an explication of part of the marbles, which the earl of Arundel cauſed to be brought from the Levant. Prideaux inſerted alſo in his work Lydiat's notes upon ſome of thoſe marbles: but what he wrote of his own is the moſt conſiderable part of that book: for he reviſed and commented upon, recenſuit & perpetuo commentario explicavit, not only the inſcriptions of the marbles of the earl of Arundel, but alſo thoſe of ſeveral other monuments of the ſame nature beſtowed upon the univerſity of Oxford. It is to be obſerved, that Mr Selden explained only the inſcriptions of twenty-nine Greek and ten Latin marbles. He pitched upon thoſe, which ſeemed to him moſt conſiderable among many others; for the Arundelian marbles amounted to about two hundred and fifty. They were brought to London in 1627, and placed in the garden of Arundel-houſe. Thomas Howard, earl of Arundel had been at great pains and expence to procure them, and ſent William Petty, a very learned man into the Levant for that end. 'Ea (marmora) illuſtriſſimus Comes, dum in 'Italia degerat, (quæ ei altera patria erat) ex antiqua-'rum Aſiæ, Græciæ, & Italiæ urbium ruinis, operâ 'doctiſſimi viri Gulielmi Pettæi in hac re uſus, ſum-'mis impenſis conquiſivit. Græcorum pleraque è 'Smyrna habuit; ea ibi * Gaſſendus (ſi fides ipſi hac 'in re habenda ſit) narrat operâ Peireſkii ſui primo de-'tecta erutaque fuiſſe, perſolutis quinquaginta Aureis 'per Sampſonem quendam illius negotia Smyrnæ pro-'curantem; ſed cum inde convehenda eſſent, Turca-'rum fraude Sampſone in carcerem conjecto, ibi de-'tenta erant, donec ea illuſtriſſimus Arundelliæ Comes 'majori pretio per Pettæum redempta cum aliis, quæ 'per eundem procuratorem collegerat, Londinum in 'hortos Palatii Arundelliani, anno Dom. noſtri 1627 'curavit transferenda (1). - - - - The illuſtrious earl, 'whilſt he reſided in Italy, collected theſe marbles, at a 'great expence, out of the ruins of the ancient cities of 'Aſia, Greece, and Italy; in which he was aſſiſted by 'a very learned man, Mr William Petty. He had moſt 'of the Greek from Smyrna: Gaſſendus (if he is to be 'believed) ſays, they were firſt diſcovered there, and 'dug up, by the care of Peireſk, who paid for them fifty 'piſtoles by the hands of one Sampſon, who tranſacted his affairs in that city: but, when they were to be conveyed 'from thence, Sampſon being thrown into priſon by the 'treachery of the Turks, they were detained there, till 'the earl of Arundel, having paid a greater price for 'them by the hands of Petty, ſent them, together with 'others, which he had procured by the ſame hand, to 'the garden of Arundel-houſe in London, in the year '1627.' Henry Howard, earl of Arundel, his grandſon, preſented them to the univerſity of Oxford; and thoſe, who had the like monuments, did the ſame in imitation of him. 'Quæcunque Vir immortalitate 'digniſſimus Thomas Arundeliæ Comes, legatione 'quaſi ſolemni eam ob rem inſtitutâ, infinitis impenſis, & repetito ſæpius capitis periculo eruditiſſimi viri Gulielmi Pettæi, cui procuratio ea demandabatur, Europâ, Aſiâque excuſſis, in Britannias 'noſtras deduxerat, Nepos ejuſdem, tanto Avo non 'inficiandus, æternitati & muſis hic loci demum conſecrabat: reliquiſque quotquot fuere eruditæ antiquitates Patronis autor extitit, ut ad tanti Auſpicis morem quæcunque apud ſe laterent ex temporum naufragio Tabulæ ibidem appenderent (2). - - - The 'nephew of the immortal Thomas earl of Arundel, a 'gentleman worthy of ſuch an uncle, beſtowed on this 'univerſity whatever the earl had collected of this ſort, 'at a great expence, by the means of Mr William Petty, 'who often hazarded his life in procuring them from all 'parts of Europe and Aſia: which example was follow-'ed by all the patrons of ancient learning, who depoſited 'in the ſame place whatever lay by them, ſaved out 'of the ſhipwreck of time.' The firſt word of this paſſage ſignifies, that the grandſon beſtowed upon the univerſity of Oxford, all the marbles that his grandfather had procured; but it is not true: he only gave one half of them, and ſome few more, the reſt being loſt when the earls of Arundel left their houſe in the time of the civil wars. Dr Prideaux ſays ſo in his preface; and therefore his wrong account may be rectified by himſelf (3). 'Arundelliana (marmora) plura 'quam centum & triginta numerantur; hæc tamen 'vix ultra dimidiam partem eorum conficiunt, quæ 'inſigniſſimus Arundelliæ Comes collegerat; cetera, 'cùm tempore nuperrimi belli civilis incendii in hortis 'Arundellianis Londini, pulſis inde dominis, diu 'neglecta jacuerunt, aut furtim ſurrepta, aut ſervo-'rum negligentiâ corrupta, aut à Lapicidis (4) ad 'reficiendas ædes adhibita in magnum rei literariæ 'damnum amittuntur. - - - There are more than 'one hundred and thirty Arundelian marbles, yet 'theſe are ſcarce more than half of what the earl of 'Arundel collected: the reſt, having lain a long time 'neglected, in the gardens of Arundel-houſe at London, 'in the time of the civil war, when the owners were 'driven from thence, and either ſtoln, or ſpoiled by the 'negligence of ſervants, or made uſe of by maſons in the re-'pairing of houſes, are loſt to the great detriment of learn-'ing.' This ſhews, that Mr Vigneul Marville does not go upon a falſe report, when, having mentioned thoſe marbles, he adds: 'It is a deplorable thing, that 'during the civil wars of England, moſt of thoſe 'marbles were made uſe of for the repairing of doors 'and chimneys. This will not encourage the curious 'to be at ſuch great expences (5).' I would enlarge upon the importance of thoſe marbles, were it not that they make an article in the Supplement to Moreri's dictionary, and in the Journal des Savans of the twenty-fifth of April 1678. Note, that Humphry Prideaux tranſlated into Latin a tract of Maimonides de jure pauperis & peregrini apud Judæos, printed with his notes at Oxford, in the year 1679, in 4to. He is alſo author of the life of Mahomet, which I have ſo often quoted in the article MECCA. I am told he is dean of Norwich.

(2) Idem, Epiſt. Dedicator. init.

(3) Idem, in Præfat.

(4) The author ſays, two pages after, that he has read all the inſcriptions but one, viz. that of a marble, one half of which was made uſe of by a Maſon, and the letters of the other half are defaced. Alterâ à Lapicida quodam ad reficiendum focum in Palatio Arundelliano adhibitâ.

(5) Vigneul Marville, Mêlanges, Tom. ii, pag. 301, 302, Dutch Edit.

* In Vita Peireſkii, lib. iv, ad ann. 1629.

(1) Humphridus Prideaux, Præf. ad Marmora Oxonienſia.

PRIERIAS

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PRIERIAS or DE PRIERIO (SILVESTER) a monk of the order of St Dominic, was so called because he was of the village of Prierio in Italy (a). He flourished at the begining of the XVIth century. He passed for a learned Divine, and an eloquent preacher, and he published several books. He was master of the sacred palace under Pope Leo X, and some say that he passed from this employ to that of general of the Dominicans: but they do not mark the time of his promotion to this first dignity of the order. What makes me believe that they are mistaken [A] is, that an author, who has extremely commended him, remarks that he was made vicar-general of the order of the Dominicans, and that he would have risen to a higher degree, if death had not prevented it (b). He had been honoured by the senate of Venice with the office of professor in the university of Padua (c) from whence he had been called to Rome to discharge the like office, with a public stipend, after which he became master of the sacred palace (d). He succeeded very ill in writing against Luther [B]. It is said that he was the first who wrote books against him: it is the opinion of Onuphrius Panvinius (e): and of several other writers. Nevertheless some pretend that the Divines of Louvain and some others disputed this priority with him (f). I have read in Antonius Senensis that the first work which he wrote against Luther was printed at Rome in the year 1520, under the litle of Errata & Argumenta Martini Lutheri recitata, detecta & repulsa &c (g). This is not true [C]. We may see in the Answer to the Questions of a Provincial (b) a mistake of Moreri copied by Mr du Pin. Our Prierias boasts in his reply to Luther that he had refused a bishopric (i). He carried the relaxation of morals very far; for he pretended that it is not even necessary, in order to be justified in the sacrament of Penance, to have attrition, and that it is sufficient to be sorry for not having it, or even to desire to be sory for it (k). His doctrine concerning Equivocations is not much better [D].

(a) In the Montferrat according to some, or in the Aflezan according to others: but to give a clear notion of the situation of this place, I must say that it is in the Montferrat of Savoy, between the Marquisate of Ceve, and that of Final, and very near the town of Ceve.

(b) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. i, pag. 209.

(c) Mr Du Pin, Tom. xiv, pag. 115, pretends that he was a long time professor of Divinity at Boulogne.

(d) Ghilini, ubi supra.

(e) Onuphrius, in Citron. Eccles. ad ann. 1521, apud Anton. Senensem, in Bibloth. Præd. cat. pag. m. 223.

(f) Labbe, Differt. de Script. Eccles. Tom. i, pag. 374.

(g) Anton. Senensis, in Bibl. Prædicat. pag. 223.

(h) At pag. 619, of Tom. i.

(i) Seckend. Histor. Luther. lib. i, pag. 39, col. 1.

(k) Journal de Trevoux, Sept. 1703, p. 1623, French Edit.

[A] What makes me believe that they are mistaken.] Besides the reason that I alledge in the text, I will say here that Augustin ab Ecclesia, who has written the History of the bishops of Piedmont, has added to it a long catalogue of all the ecclesiastics of the dominions of the duke of Savoy, on both sides of the Alps, who have been generals of the order; but he does not mention Silvester Prierias (1). Nevertheless he was well acquainted with him; for he observes in his Corona Regia Sabaudica, that Prierias was born at Prierio a village of the western Liguria under the marquisate of Ceve (2).

(1) This remark was communicated to me by Mr Minutoli.

(2) See Oldoini, in Athenæo Ligustico.

[B] He succeeded very ill in writing against Luther.] The indulgences were the first thing which was attacked by that Reformer. He opposed them by reasons; but Eckius and Prierias, who answered him, not finding themselves sufficiently strong, had recourse to common-places, and laid down for a foundation . . . . . the authority of the Pope and the consent of the school-men; concluding, that we ought to receive indulgences as an article of faith, since they proceeded from the Pope, who was infallible in matters of faith, and who had approved the doctrine of the school-men (3). Here is the judgment of Father Maimbourg on this method of reply. 'Silvester Prierask, instead of solidly refuting, as he 'might have done, what Luther had answered him in 'his book, published another filled with excessive exaggerations of the power and authority of the Pope, 'which he raises infinitely above all the councils, of 'which he speaks in terms which even Rome would 'not approve of: This gave Luther a handle to render this authority odious to the Germans, and to 'make a diversion, by applying himself warmly to 'so nice a point which was not the thing in controversy. So necessary it is, in opposing heretics to 'keep precisely to what the faith teaches, without 'meddling unseasonably with litigious questions thro' 'an over-hastiness of temper, in which we give our 'adversary the advantage of being able to maintain 'his opinion, with as much right as we have to oppose it (4).' Nothing can make us better understand the bad success of the writings of Prierias, than to know that he was commanded by the Pope to write no more on matters of controversy. Respondit Silvester Prierias tam feliciter ut ipse Pontifex indixerit illi silentium (5).

(3) Father Paul, History of the Council of Trent, book i. See also Pallavicini, Hist. of the same Council, book i, ch. vi, num. 3.

(4) Maimbourg, Hist. du Luther. livr. i, pag. 30, 31, Dutch Edit.

(5) Erasm. Epist. LXXI, lib. xix, pag. m. 887.

[C] It is not true that the first book . . . . was printed in the year 1520.] In the year 1518, Luther published a book which was an answer to a dialogue that Prierias had written against him (6). Prierias answered him by a work intituled, De juridica & irrefragabili veritate Romanæ Ecclesiæ Romanique Pontificis, Liber tertius, index quidem longissimus, sed brevissimum Epitoma (7). Luther refuted this reply in the same year 1518. I do not pretend to maintain that Prierias's first book against Luther was not printed at Rome in 1520, as Antonius Senensis and Mr Du Pin affirm (8). I only maintain that it had been printed before that year. For the rest, I believe that John Eckius, a German Divine, wrote his Obelisks against Luther's thesis on indulgences before Prierias took pen in hand; but he did not intend to publish this piece, and I am of opinion that Luther published it together with his own refutation. He had recovered a manuscript copy of this little work of John Eckius (9). Note that John Tezelius, a Dominican, and Inquisitor in Germany, and the first of the commissaries for the publication of indulgences, is the person who first wrote against Luther; for, in a public dispute at Francfort on the Oder, he laid down a thesis, in which he opposed that of Luther, and he had already published a piece in German against a sermon which Luther had preached on indulgences (10).

(6) See Seckend. Hist. Luther. lib. i, pag. 31, col. 1.

(7) Ibid. p. 39, col. 1.

(8) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. xiv, pag. 115, Dutch Edit.

(9) See Seckend. ubi supra, p. 30, ad ann. 1518.

(10) Seckend. ibid. pag. 25, 26. See also Mr du Pin, Tom. xiii, p. 35.

[D] His doctrine concerning equivocations is not much better.] Let us quote it as it is to be found in the Anti-Coton. 'The same Andreas Eudemonojohannes 'Cydonius, in page 40, builds on the authority of 'Silvester, in the fifth accusation, question 13, where 'he says, When the judge does not proceed judicially, because the accused is not simply subject to him, or for some other reason, then though a lie be unlawful, it is not a mortal sin; because it is neither contrary to what justice requires, nor in a true judgment, but that which is usurped: A lie will not even be a venial sin, if in answering fraudulently, and, as they say, sophistically, he says something which is false, according to the sense of the judge, but which is true according to his own; because in this case, not being his subject, he is not obliged to speak the truth.* We must understand that by this judgment, which is not a true judgment, but usurped over those who are not his subjects, he means the authority of civil magistrates over the Clergy, and principally over the Jesuits, who are not even subject to the bishops (11).' The Jesuit Eudæmon Johannes had quoted these words of Prierias in his apology for Garnet, now here is what he answered to the author of the Anti-Coton. 'Sylvestri verba profers non infideliter . . . . sed Gallicè 'pervertis potius quam vertis: quero enim ex te ubi 'illa legeris in verbis Sylvestri, Voire le mensonge ne sera pas mesme peché veniel? Imo inquit ille, non 'erit etiam veniale si respondendo, &c. Tu ut mendaciis totus scates, de tuo verbis ejus mendacium addidisti, cum ita verteris mendacium non erit peccatum veniale. Nunquam somniavit vir ille mendacium ullum esse posse, quod peccatum minimum veniale non sit: sed negavit peccatum esse veniale cum injusto judice æquivocationibus agere, quod ipsum S. Gregorius docuit (12). - - - You quote the words of Sylvester not unfaithfully . . . . but you rather pervert, than translate it into French: for I ask you where you read in the words of Sylvester, Voire le 'menfonge

* Quando judex non proceedit, vel quia accusatus ei non est subjectus simpliciter, vel in hoc casu, aut quacunque alia de causa, tunc licet mendacium sit illicitum, non tamen est mortale, quia nec contra deliberatum justitiæ, nec est in judicio vero, sed in usurpato. Immò non erit etiam veniale si respondendo cautissimè & ut aiunt sophisticè dicat aliquid falsum apud sensum judicis & apud suum verum.

(11) Anti-Coton, pag. 24.

(12) Eudæmon Johannes, Anti-Coton, Confutat. cap. iii, p. 113.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' menſonge ne ſera pas meſme peché veniél ? What he ſays is, It will not even be a venial ſin, if in anſwering, &c. You, as you are wholly given to lying, have added to his words a lie of your own, by tranſlating it thus, A lie will not be a venial ſin. That author never dreamt that there could be any lie, which is not a venial ſin: but he denied that it is a venial ſin to uſe equivocations before an incompetent judge, which very thing St Gregory taught.' It is very probable that by theſe words, he underſtands the judgment of magiſtrates, the author of the Anti-Coton means our Sylveſter, and not Eudæmon Johannes. In this caſe he commits a miſtake; for the book, out of which the paſſage cited in the apology for Garnet is taken, was written a long time before there was any Jeſuit in the world. It was dedicated to Leo X, who died in the year 1521. Eudæmon Johannes (13) did not forget to critize thereupon the author of the Anti-Coton. He likewiſe cenſures him (14) for not having underſtood that V. Accuſat. ſignified, not the fifth Accuſation, but Voce Accuſatio, under the word Accuſation.

(13) Ibid. pag. 114.

(14) Ibid. pag. 112.

PRIEZAC (DANIEL DE) counſellor of ſtate in ordinary, born in the caſtle of Priezac in Limoſin (a), was choſen, in the year 1639, to fill up the only place that was left among the forty members of the French academy (b). He wrote ſeveral books [A], and died in the year 1662.

(a) Pelliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Academie Françoiſe, pag. 229.

(b) Ibid.

[A] He wrote ſeveral books.] I ſhall uſe here the words of Mr Pelliſſon (1): ' His printed works are, ' Obſervations againſt the book of Melroſe, intituled, Philip the Prudent. Vindiciæ Gallicæ. Three volumes ' concerning the privileges of the Holy Virgin. Diſceptatio legitima, in controverſia mota inter Apoſtolicæ Cameræ cognitorem, Actorem; & Eminentiſſimos Cardinales Barberinos, excellentiſſimumque urbis Romæ Præfectum; Defenſores. One volume in quarto of Political Diſcourſes. He is now (2) writing a ſecond ' volume.' Note, That the Vindiciæ Gallicæ is an anſwer to the Mars Gallicus of Janſenius.

(1) Pelliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Academie Françoiſe, pag. 354.

(2) Mr Pelliſſon wrote this in the year 1652.

PRYNN (WILLIAM) an Engliſh Lawyer, made himſelf very much talked of during the civil wars of Charles I, and the parliament. He had a great deal of inconſtancy and impetuoſity in his temper. He declared ſo violently againſt the Epiſcopal clergy, that he expoſed himſelf to an ignominious puniſhment; for he was condemned to have his ears cut off [A]: which was executed, and proved advantageous to him, when the war broke out between the king and the parliament. He was looked upon as a glorious confeſſor of the Good Cauſe, and as one who had ſuffered for the purity of the goſpel. He was a member of the houſe of commons, and expreſſed a great animoſity againſt the royaliſts; nevertheleſs, either thro' inconſtancy, or private diſcontent, he grew milder afterwards, and was impriſoned. He wrote a ſmall piece in his confinement [B], wherein he repreſented to the parliament, that they ought not to bring the king to his trial; and that the army, which oppreſſed the liberty of the parliament, was directed by the counſels of the Jeſuits. He had before publiſhed a book, wherein he exhorted the parliament to exterminate by penal laws

[A] He was condemned to have his ears cut off.] A miniſter of Baſil ſeems to ſay, that he was alſo condemned to be tranſported into America; but it is more likely he meant, that he was condemned to ſpend the remaining part of his life in a dungeon. Theſe are his words: ' Author noſter Prynnus, Baſtwicus & Burtonus, trium Facultatum Doctores, quod ' contra iſtam tyrannidem hiſcere auſi fuiſſent auribus ' mutilati, extra anni ſoliſque viam expulſi ſunt quo ' longa tabe perimerentur (1). - - - Our author Prynn, ' Baſtwick, and Burton, Doctors of three Faculties, had ' their ears cut off, and were baniſhed beyond the ſun's ' annual courſe, for daring to open their mouths againſt ' this tyranny.' Here follows a paſſage of Mr Baillet, wherein we find at what time, and in what place, William Prynn had his ears cut off. It contains alſo ſome other particulars, and therefore I ſhall ſet it down at length. ' (2) There is indeed an ANTI-' ARMINIANISM of William Prynn; but the title ' does not ſo much concern the Arminians themſelves, ' as the nature of their doctrines. The deſign of his ' work is only to ſhew, that the doctrine of abſolute ' Predeſtination, ſuch as the Calviniſts teach it, has ' been conſtantly believed by the Chriſtian Church. ' This Prynn ſeems to be the ſame with that famous ' enemy of the biſhops of England, and particularly ' of the unfortunate William Laud, archbiſhop of Can-' terbury (3). He had his ears cut off by the com-' mon executioner, in the Palace-yard of Weſtminſter, ' the 30th of June 1637, for his tragedy concerning ' the breaking of the Sabbath, and the ſtate of the ' biſhops; and being fined five thouſand pounds, with ' a Phyſician named Baſtwick, and a London miniſter ' named Burton, was clapped up in a priſon, where ' he was to remain the reſt of his days. But he was ' ſet at liberty, when Charles I. was put to death, ' and even choſen a member of Parliament (4). He ' wrote afterwards a prodigious number of books, ' moſt of them in his mother-tongue; and was made ' keeper of the records in the tower of London. He ' died about eighteen or nineteen years ago.'

(1) Wolfgangus Meyerus, S. Th. D. & Verbi divini in Eccleſia Baſil. Miniſt. Senior, Epiſtola Dedicator. Fulcimenti Gladii.

(2) Baillet, in the firſt Tome of the Anti, num. 88.

(3) Here is a paſſage of Dr Smith, in Vita Cambdeni, pag. 56. Illo (Archiepiſcopo Laudo) in carcerem detruſo, Gulielmus Prinnus, ob ſeditioſos libellos ſtigmate inuſtus, in D. Archiepiſcopi ſcrinia, tum ut ſi quicquam, quod fictis criminibus objectis aliqualem induceret colorem, occurriſſet, inde excerperet, tum ut quantum erat documentorum quod Viro innocentiſſimo iiſdem diluendis, cum pro Tribunali ſiſtendus eſſet, de capite dicturus, uſui eſſe potuerit, quoque auferret, animo malevolo involavit. - - - Archbiſhop Laud being thrown into priſon, William Prynn, who had been branded for writing ſeditious libels, ſearched the archbiſhop's papers, with a malicious deſign of taking from thence whatever might give a plauſible colour to the accuſations brought againſt him, as alſo whatever might be of uſe to that moſt innocent prelate in juſtifying himſelf at his trial. See the article CAMBDEN, remark [M].

(4) He had been releaſed before, and was a member of the Houſe of Commons.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google laws all the Independants [C]. If it be true, that he ſaid what is aſcribed to him, concerning the perſon, who ſet London on fire [D], he was a very great viſionary. He wrote a vaſt number of books, which ſhew his great reading [E]. He died the twenty-fourth of October 1669, aged ſixty-nine years (a).

(a) Witte, in Diario Biographico.

[C] To exterminate by penal laws all the Independants.] He dedicated that book to the Houſe of Commons. I have it tranſlated into Latin, and printed in 1649. The author of that tranſlation was a Swiſs miniſter, named Wolfgang Meyer. The title runs thus: Guilielmi Prynn Angli Armigeri Aulæ Lincolnienſis, Fulcimentum Gladii Chriſtianorum Regum, Principum & Magiſtratuum: Quo ipſorum Hæreticos, Idololatras, Schiſmaticos, Sectarum Authores, & Blaſphemos, pro criminis gravitate puniendi autboritas, jus ac poteſtas teſtimoniis Veteris ac Novi Teſtamenti, edictis & praxi Chriſtianorum Imperatorum. Regum, Statuum & Magiſtratuum, ſanctionibus item & ſtatutis Regni Angliæ: conſenſu denique optimorum tàm veteris, quàm recentioris Eccleſiæ Doctorum, & Politicorum, contra hodiernos Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ turbatores, veterum Donatiſtarum, & Monaſterienſium Anabaptiſtarum æmulos, ſolidiſſimè vindicatur. Prynn alledges in that book all that can be ſaid for the power of the ſword againſt errors; he brings in arguments, authorities, cuſtom, the deciſions of Doctors, the Confeſſions of Faith, &c. Father de Sainte Marthe, a French Benedictin, made no ſmall uſe of this book, to ſhew, that the edict of Nantes was lawfully repealed? See his anſwer to the complaints of the Proteſtants, or the extract which Mr Couſin has given of it (5). In the year 1643, Prynn began to oppoſe the Independants, who thought that the ſuppreſſion of Epiſcopacy would prove inſignificant, and even prejudicial, if people were to ſubmit to the ſynodal government of the Puritans. Voſſius wrote the following words to Grotius in September 1643. 'Unum eſt in quo non ſatis conveniat illis, qui ſe Epiſcopis opponunt. Multi omnem regendæ Eccleſiæ poteſtatem penes preſbyterale collegium eſſe volunt. Alii vero ajunt hoc jugum gravius Epiſcopali. Quare contendunt, ſingulis id committendum Eccleſiaſtis, ut ſecundum Dei verbum, populum doceant, & gubernent. Atque ſic ab Epiſcopalibus & Preſbyteralibus (ſicuti vocant) diſtincti, independentes nuncupantur. Prynnius, cujus magna adeo in Parlamento eſt authoritas, prioris eſſe ſententiæ dicitur; ſed multi hac parte ei adverſantur, qui cætera convenire videntur. Eſtque plurimorum id judicium, utcunque infracta omni Regis poteſtate, & abolito Epiſcopatu, geminum agerent triumphum, eos inter ſeſe mox commiſſum iri; quia multi non à Preſbyterii poteſtate minus, quam Epiſcoporum abhorreant (6). --- There is one thing in which the oppoſers of Epiſcopacy do not agree. Many would have the whole power of governing the church lodged in the college of Preſbyters. Others ſay, this yoke is heavier than that of Epiſcopacy. Wherefore they contend, that it ſhould be left to every particular Eccleſiaſtic, to teach and govern his flock, according to the word of GOD. And, thus, being diſtinct both from Epiſcoparians and Preſbyterians (as they are called) they have gained the name of Independants. Prynn, whoſe authority is ſo great in parliament, is ſaid to be of the former opinion: but many, who agree with him in other things, oppoſe him in this. And it is the opinion of many, that, after having triumphed over both the regal and epiſcopal power, they will ſoon quarrel among themſelves, there being many who abhor the power of the Preſbytery no leſs than that of the biſhops.' Here is an inſtance of mens inclination to run into extreams. Part of thoſe who hated Epiſcopacy were againſt the Preſbyterian ſynods, and pretended that it was a more intolerable yoke than that of the Hierarchy. Prynn ſtrenuouſly oppoſed them, and was for inflicting a corporal puniſhment upon them. See his Fulcimentum gladii.

(5) In the Journal des Sçavans, of the 26th of April 1688. See alſo the Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Sçavans, for March 1688, pag. 384.

(6) Voſſius, Epiſt. ccccl.xii, p. 409, col. 1.

[D] Concerning the perſon, who ſet London on fire.] If the following words had not been printed, I would not inſert them in this place. 'This thought .... 'puts me in mind of William Prynn's extravagance... 'That madman maintained to a gentleman of my acquaintance, from whom I have it, that Pope Alexander VII had ſet London on fire in the year 1666, and that he came into England in the diſguiſe of a Coal-man (7).'

(7) Le Grand, Hiſt. du Divorce de Henri VIII, Roi d'Angleterre, pag. 32. of the continuation of the 2d part.

[E] He wrote a vaſt number of books, which ſhew his great reading.] I find the following paſſage in Witte's Diarium (8). GUIL. PRYNNE, Anglus, Swainſwica-Somerſetenſis, Collegii Oriolenſis Oxoniæ Commenſalis, Artium Baccalaureus..... Libri quos varii admodum, Theologici nimirum. Hiſtorici, Politici & Polemici argumenti conſcripſit ad 170; adverſaria potius quam opera nuncupari merentur, adeoque (9) ipſum pene Toſtatum æquaſſe videtur..... Libros à ſe conſcriptos moriens Hoſpitio Lincolnienſi quod Londini eſt, legavit, qui voluminibus XXXVII. in fol. & 4. continentur. ---- William Prynn, a Somerſetſhire gentleman, bachelor of arts of Oriel college in Oxford.... He wrote 170 pieces on different ſubjects, namely, Divinity, Hiſtory, Politics, and Controverſy; which deſerve rather the title of Adverſaria, than Works; inſomuch that he ſeems to have equalled Toſtatus..... At his death, he left the books he had wrote to Lincolns-Inn in London, conſiſting of thirty-ſeven volumes in folio and 4*to.*' I ſhall ſet down a paſſage of Schoockius, whereby it appears, that Prynn was praiſed for his great reading, and that he was a rigid Puritan, who could not ſo much as endure the drinking of healths (10). 'Is eſt qui auguſto elogio ab eodem (D. Voetio) condecoratur in diſput. de ebrietate, & quidem ſecundum hanc formulam: Diffuſæ eruditionis Juriſconſultus Gul Prynne (11), cum generis nobilitate tum rara pietate conſpicuus, in Tract. Anglico, adverſus Salutes conſcripto. Liber hic Prynnii (de quo viro ante aliquot annos tam amplus rumor per Britanniam & Belgium fuit) ſi reſpondeat ejuſdem Tractatui de Spectaculis, (nam hunc ſolum vidi) dixerim, diffuſam eruditionem Authoris (licet hic ipſe à D. Voetio oſtentetur ut nobilis) reſpondere ſcopis diſſolutis, atque ſervire confirmando dicto vulgato, quod eam ſolam vim fortem eſſe agnoſcit, quæ fuerit unita. Fueritne vero Prynnius pius ſolus Deus novit, quum D. Voëtius quando favet, nimis quam liberalis ſit in titulo illo concedendo. Certe hoc non poſſum cognoſcere ex ejuſdem libro de Spectaculis, niſi pariter Phariſæi pii fuerint agnoſcendi, eo, quod cuminum & anethum decimarent.---- He is the Perſon, whom Voëtius honours with a grand elogy, in his Diſputation on Drunkenneſs. It is as follows: William Prynn, a Civilian of extenſive learning, famous both for the nobility of his family, and his piety, in the Engliſh tract which he wrote againſt drinking healths. If this book of Prynn's (who was ſo much talked of for ſeveral years in England and Holland) be like his treatiſe againſt plays, (for I have ſeen no other) I will venture to ſay, that the extenſive learning of the author (tho' he himſelf be extolled by Voetius for the nobility of his birth) is like a rope of ſand, and ſerves to confirm the common ſaying, which allows that force only to be ſtrong, which is united. But whether Prynn was a man of piety, God only knows, when Vöetius is too liberal in beſtowing that title on him. I am ſure I cannot diſcover this from his book on Public Shows, unleſs at the ſame time the Phariſees be allowed to have been pious, becauſe they tithed cummin and anniſeed.'

(8) Ad 24. Oct. 1669.

(9) This adv does not make a right conclu-ſion; for Toſtatus's works are not like Adverſaria.

(10) Martin. Schoockius, Exercitat. Variarum, pag. 302, Edit. 1663, in 4*to.*

(11) The edition of this diſputation, de ebrietate, which I make uſe of, is that of 1667, in the fourth volume, Diſput. Scholar. pag. 503, has only, D. Gisb. Voetius de Ebrietate, Diſputatio Juridica. Gul. Prynn. in tractatu, &c.

PRIOLO (BENJAMIN) in Latin Priolus, author of an Hiſtory of France, from the death of Lewis XIII, to the year 1664, was born at Saint Jean d'Angeli, the firſt of January 1602. He deſcended from the Priuli or Prioli, an illuſtrious family, which has afforded ſome Doges to the republic of Venice [A]. He was but fifteen

[A] He deſcended from the Priuli, or Prioli, an illuſtrious family, which has afforded ſome Doges to the Republic of Venice.] ANTONY PRIOLI, nephew to LAURENCE, and JEROM PRIOLI, brothers and doges of Venice one after another, came very young into France, in the reign of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google fifteen years of age, when he loſt his father and mother, which doubtleſs increaſed the obſtacle he met with in the courſe of his ſtudies: but thoſe obſtacles did not abate, in the leaſt, his eager deſire of being a learned man. His inclination for learning was ſo great, that he ſpent whole days and nights in reading without any interruption (a). He ſtudied firſt at Orthez, and then at Montauban, and afterwards at Leyden. He improved himſelf by the lectures of Heinſius and Voſſius in this laſt town, and beſtowed three years in reading all the Greek and Latin Poets and Hiſtorians. Being deſirous to ſee and conſult Grotius, he took a journey to Paris, and then went to Padua, by reaſon of the great reputation of Cremoninus and Licetus, of whom he throughly learned the opinions of Ariſtotle, and of the other ancient Philoſophers. He returned into France, from whence he went again into Italy, to get himſelf acknowledged by the Prioli as one of their relations [B]. He attached himſelf to the duke of Henry II, with an ambaſſador of the family Lauredano, his uncle by the mother's ſide. He fell in love with a daughter of a gentleman of Saintonge, who was at Paris about a conſiderable law-ſuit. He married her, and having carried her to Venice, they were both ſo unkindly received by the Republic, and their relations, that the diſſolution of their marriage was a thing reſolved upon. It would have been declared void according to the laws, had not the ambaſſador, who repreſented in France the body of the Republic, ſigned the contract; for which he was cenſured by a decree of the year 1554; and it was voted, that Antony, and his poſterity, ſhould be excluded from all offices in the ſenate. This ill ſucceſs moved him to leave Venice, and, having ſecured his effects, he returned to France, and ſettled in his wife's country, at St Jean d'Angeli. He had many children: MARK, the eldeſt, was the father of JULIAN, and Julian was the father of BENJAMIN, who makes the ſubject of this article. Julian ruined himſelf by his four marriages, and the expences he was at in the war, being the firſt officer of the regiment de la Force. Benjamin was his ſon by his fourth wife. He put his father's name under the cut engraved by the famous Pitau, and prefixed to his Hiſtory of France: that cut may be had ſtill at the Print-ſellers. The inſcription runs thus: Benjaminus Priolus Santo. Juliani F. Eques Venetus, Rerum Gallicarum Scriptor florentiſſimus. Which ſhews Sorbiere's miſtakes concerning the father of Benjamin Priolo.

(a) Tanta fuit in illo diſcendi intemperies, ut noctes diebus continuaret evolvendo quidquid voluminum edidit Romana aut Graia vetuſtas. Joannes Rhodius, de Vita Benjamini Prioli, pag. 3.

That family increaſed very much, and was naturalized in the reign of Charles IX. They entirely embraced the Reformed Religion under Henry IV, and there has been ſeveral eminent miniſters of that family (1). They were ſollicited by a letter (2) from the doge, Leonard Donato, to return to Venice, but did not care to do it, being well ſettled in France. They troubled themſelves no more about Venice; but it may be proved, by a paſſage out of the book, intituled, Recherches de la Nobleſſe, printed at Montaubon in 1616, that they always pretended to be originally from Venice. The author of that book, who was a gentleman of Bearn, called la Roque, ſays, that the Prioleau's (ſo he writes their name) (3) of Saintoigne and Aunix, were not originally of Venice, as ſeveral of them pretended, in ſeveral records, under the reign of Henry III, but that they are antient gentlemen, who had a mind to derive their pedigree from the Venetians, becauſe their name was like that of the noble Prioli of Venice. Tho' this paſſage contains a falſity, it irrefragably confutes the Sorberiana. The falſity I ſpeak of, manifeſtly appears by the good ſucceſs of Benjamin Priolo, in making out his extraction from the Prioli of Venice. The genealogical memoir, preſented by him, having been examined, the Republic ordered, that a patent ſhould be drawn up, which he received from Mr Grimani, ambaſſador in France in the year 1660, with a gold chain and medal worth three hundred piſtoles. By that patent the ſenate acknowledged him to be a noble Venetian knight. The arms of the Prioli are blazoned and added to the ſeal, and round about, Non data, non conceſſa, ſed adnata, ſenatus decreto. The title is alſo in Latin, and the reſt in Italian. Mr Prioli received at the ſame time a congratulatory letter from Laurence Prioli, proveditor of the ſea, who was then the head of the family.

It ought to be obſerved, that the Republic of Venice takes no notice of the baſtards of noblemen. Their very fathers will not own them, and even abandon them; for it is not the cuſtom of the noble Venetians to have private miſtreſſes: they apply themſelves to courtezans, and club for the keeping of one; by which means they avoid being jealous one of another: but if the courtezan has a child, none of them owns it (4).

[B] He went again into Italy, to get himſelf acknowledged by the Prioli, as one of their relations.] So I paraphraſe the Latin words of John Rhodius, In Italiam reverſus eſt, quærendis apud Venetos originis ſuæ primordiis (5). The author adds, That the ſenate of Venice gave Benjamin Priolo a very kind reception, and made him a knight, but without admitting him to the prerogatives of his family, the laws of the Republic not permitting it, becauſe he deſcended from one Antoni Prioli, who had married a foreigner out of Venice. Blandè acceptus à Senatu, factus eques, ſed excluſus generis ſui prærogativa, quoniam Antonius Priolus ejus avus paternus, qui Princeps fuit Reip. Venetorum, non potuit legitimum matrimonium extra urbem & cum extera contraxiſſe ſalvis patriæ legibus (6). That author is in the wrong to ſay, that Antony Prioli was a doge; and he ſhould not have ſaid, that he was Benjamin's grand-father, but his great-grand-father. He is alſo miſtaken as to the time: the patent whereby the ſenate owned Benjamin to be related to the Prioli of Venice, was not granted before the year 1660. What he ſays in the concluſion of his elogy, that Mr Priolo took orders after the death of his wife (7), is a great falſity.

The two following paſſages will confirm what I have ſaid in the foregoing remark. Mr Priolo, ſpeaking of the town of St Jean d'Angeli, makes this ſmall digreſſion: 'Ibi mea infantia vagiit, hic aërem primum hauſi. Hæc terra, mihi atavis Venetis, iiſque illuſtribus, neſcio quo caſu, primum tacta. Si decora meæ gentis à me intermiſſa ſunt, forſan nepotibus inſtaurabuntur; & Sant-Angelium olim me alumno gaudebit (8). - - - There I firſt drew my breath; being deſcended of a noble Venetian family. If the honours of my race are loſt to me, perhaps they will be reſtored to my poſterity; and St Angeli will one day boaſt of having educated me.' You ſee that he publickly boaſts of his Venetian extraction, as he does alſo in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his work to the Republic of Venice: 'O Patria! ſays he, O vaſti pelagi dominatrix! agnoſce tuum civem, vel ſolo nomine Prioli tibi dilectum. - - - O my country, O miſtreſs of the wide ocean! acknowledge thy citizen, dear to thee by the name alone of Prioli.'

As for the reſt, I beſeech the readers to mind what I am going to ſay. There is a very remarkable difference between other Hiſtorical Dictionaries and mine. I am not contented, according to the cuſtom of thoſe Dictionaries, to give a general account of a man's life; but I collect, as much as the few books I have will permit me, the moſt curious and remarkable paſſages, the judgments that have been made of thoſe I ſpeak of, and the faults that have been committed concerning them. I examine, I prove, I confute, as there is occaſion. But when I have no proofs to confute a falſity, I am forced to leave it without a confutation; and my ſilence, in that reſpect, is not a ſign, that I warrant the truth of the facts mentioned by me. The authors, whom I quote, ought to be anſwerable for what they advance. It is enough for me to confute the falſities that are known to me, and to be always diſpoſed to confute thoſe I ſhall diſcover by the help of others, and by my own enquiries. No one can do me a greater pleaſure than to impart to me the proofs and explanations that are neceſſary to rectify the miſtakes (9) inſerted in this work, upon the credit of authors. I ſhall always be ready to do whatever juſtice and truth require. I can be poſitive about it: I know

(4) Taken from a manuſcript Memoir.

(5) Johannes Rhodius, de Vita Benj. Prioli, pag. 4.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ipſe patet ſe ſacris addixit, rerum humanarum & ſæculi pertæſus, pervicacis, ingrati. Ibid. pag. 7.

(8) Priolus, de Rebus Gallicis, lib. vi, n. 38, pag. m. 283.

ADVERTISEMENT to the reader once for all.

(9) This muſt be likewiſe underſtood of my own miſtakes.

(1) A nephew of Benjamin, was miniſter of the church of Niort.

(2) Dated the 15th of April 1608.

(3) I have it from very good hands, that ſome miniſters in thoſe parts writ their name Prioleau. But it ought to be obſerved, that the pronunciation being the ſame in the greateſt part of France, whether that name be written Priolo, or Prioleau; and the French not being very nice and exact, it is no wonder that the name of that family ſhould have been differently ſpelt.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

duke of Rohan [C]; who was then in the ſervice of the Venetians, and ſo inſinuated himſelf into his favour, that he became one of his moſt intimate confidents. The duke ſent him twice into Spain upon important negotiations, and left to his diſcretion the management of all particular affairs, whilſt he commanded the troops of France in the Valteline, and in the country of the Griſons. Mr Priolo was in all the battles, and ſhewed his courage both on foot and on horſeback (b). Being uncertain of his fate, after the death of that duke, he retired to Geneva, being lately married to Elizabeth Michaeli of a very noble family (c). He bought a country-ſeat at Saconnent near Geneva, where he reſted after the toils and fatigues of his foregoing life. The duke of Longueville being named plenipotentiary of France for the treaty of Munſter, and being deſirous to carry him thither, as a man, whoſe parts and counſels would be of great uſe to him, Mr Priolo reſolved to leave Geneva and to ſettle at Paris [D]. He ſtaid half a year at Lyons, where he had ſeveral conferences with cardinal Barberini about controverted doctrines; the reſult of which was, that he, his wife, children, and domeſtics, abjured the Proteſtant religion, and immediately received the communion from the cardinal's hands. He did not enjoy a long repoſe at Paris; for the civil war quickly broke out, and he engaged in the faction of the malecontents, which occaſioned the ruin of his fortune (d). This is what I find in a Latin piece, written by John Rhodius, and printed at Padua in 1662. The following particulars come from another hand. Being dazzled with the prince's glory, with whom he had ſided, he neither regarded the many favours, which the queen-mother beſtowed upon him, nor the great promiſes of Cardinal Mazarin; which was the cauſe of his misfortune: he was forced to retire into Flanders, his eſtate was confiſcated, and his family baniſhed. Having regained the king's favour, he reſolved to live a retired life, and to follow his ſtudy, ſupporting himſelf on the wreck of the tempeſt he had ſuffered. It was then, and to divert his melancholy, that he wrote [E] with great impartiality know my own thoughts, and I have given ſome inſtances of it. For example, it is a great pleaſure to me to be put in a capacity of ſhewing the impoſture, or illuſion, of the author of the Sorberiana, in what he ſays concerning the father of Benjamin Priolo, &c. I muſt make another obſervation: a falſity diſadvantageous to an honourable family, would be ſlighted, if it were only to be found in a ſmall inconſiderable piece, which is ſoon forgot; but if it be inſerted in a large volume, eſpecially in a folio book, called a Dictionary, it makes one more uneaſy. For the alphabetical order of this ſort of books does ſo ſhorten the enquiries of the curious, that every body will have them in ſmall libraries, as well as in great ones, even tho' they are not good; and therefore it is to be feared, that what is contained in them will be believed every where, and laſt for ever. But it ought to be conſidered, at leaſt as to this work, that my bare relating what has been ſaid by another, does not multiply the number of authorities. Should I relate a thing, without quoting any body for it, I ſhould ſet up for a new evidence: but ſince I quote the very words of the authors, whoſe names I put in the margin, what I ſay is only grounded upon their authority. A tranſient piece, a ſmall book, whoſe title ends with ana, a heap of ſeveral indigeſted collections, found in Sorbiere's cloſet, and containing looſe diſcourſes of converſation, do not become more weighty and conſiderable, becauſe they are quoted in a large volume. They are ſtill what they were before, and nothing elſe. It is to be obſerved, that of all things, that make the ſubject of common converſation, there is none that is leſs to be depended upon, than what is ſaid about the origin of families. For when a man raiſes himſelf, envy on the one hand, or flattery on the other, do quickly forge obliging or diſobliging falſities, which ſpread far and near; but with this difference, that ſatirical falſities ſpread more, and are ſooner credited than flattering lies.

(b) In Rhætia & Tellina valle, cùm Gallicis armis præeſſet Rohanius, Priolus omnia pro nutu verſavit. Præliis variis illic cum Germanis & Iberis certátum: ubique interfuit: pugnavit eques, & pedes. Ibid. pag. 4.

(c) Cùm ante trimeſtre uxorem duxiſſet Elizabetham Micheliam, illuſtri genere, ſcilicet atavis editam principibus Lucenſis Reip. & Micheliis patriciis Venetis, unde Principes non pauci. Ibid.

(d) Taken from Rhodius, ubi ſupra.

[C] He attached himſelf to the duke of Rohan.] John Rhodius's expreſſion, Incidit illic in inſtlicem Rohanii Ducem (10), ought to be rectified. It ſeems to ſignify, that Mr Priolo was beholden to chance for his firſt acquaintance with the duke. The truth is, that his family had been in the duke of Rhoan's intereſt, and the duke of Soubiſe, brother to the duke of Rohan, was his godfather. Take notice, that he was not admitted into the duke's family, as his Phyſician, and that he was not aftewards his ſecretary (11), as we are told in the Sorberiana. I have been informed, that, all the time he was in that poſt, he was only very intimate with the duke, and never had any ſkill in Phyſic, but ſuch as one may get by a general ſtudy of Philoſophy.

(10) Joh. Rhodius, ubi ſupra, pag. 4.

(11) Patin ſays he was. See, below, citation (17).

[D] Mr Priolo reſolved to leave Geneva; and to ſettle at Paris.] The attentive reader will eaſily perceive the incoherency of this narrative: it is a fault of Rhodius, which I will correct. That author has ſhewed here, that it is an eaſier thing to write the hiſtory of an illuſtrious man in good Latin, than to prevent great gaps and omiſſions in relating a fact. Is it not a very incoherent narrative to ſay, that a man went and ſettled at Paris, becauſe the duke of Longueville had a mind to carry him to Munſter, without informing his reader whether, or no, he accepted his propoſal? 'Longavillanus Dux ad conventum Monaſterienſem 'cum ſumma poteſtate de pace Legatus iturus, eo 'Priolum invitavit, ejus operâ & conſilio uſurus in 'tam arduo negotio. Hinc illi decretum Geneva re'licta irrevocabilem pedem Lutetiæ figere, quo to'tam familiam . . . deduxit. Lugduni ſex menſes re'manſit. . . . Non diu tranquille Lutetiæ egit, cùm 'derepentè ſtudia partium exarſere, & bella civilia 'cœpta (12). - - - The duke of Longueville was ſent to (12) Rhodius, ubi ſupra, pag. 4, & 5. 'the congreſs of Munſter, with full power to treat of 'peace; whither he invited Priolo, in order to make 'uſe of his advice and aſſiſtance in ſo difficult an un'dertaking. Hence he reſolved, having left Geneva, to 'ſettle at Paris, whither he had brought his whole fami'ly. He ſtaid ſix months at Lyons. . . . He was not long 'quiet at Paris, the rage of party ſoon after burſting out, 'and the civil war being kindled.' To fill up this gap, I muſt obſerve, that Mr Priolo ſet out from Geneva to go to Munſter, according to the duke's deſire. He was there about a year, and then he returned to Geneva, from whence he went into France, in order to ſettle at Paris. Being at Munſter, he contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with the nuncio Chigi, who was afterwards Pope Alexander VII. He wrote to him a congratulatory letter in Latin, when he heard that he was made Pope, and received from him a very devout anſwer, with ſome medals, &c. The duke of Longueville was ſo well ſatisfied with his ſervices, that he aſſigned him a penſion of 1200 livres upon the principality of Neufchatel (13), and, not long before he died, he preſented him with 1200 crowns, as the laſt token of his affection (14).

(13) It was paid him till that prince died.

[E] It was . . . to divert his melancholy that he wrote . . . the hiſtory of France.] He repreſents himſelf as a man perſecuted by fortune, and declares, that he ſet about that hiſtory to drive away his melancholy. 'Inter maximas ærumnas natus eſt hic fœtus, quem lin'ſturus eram, ſi licuiſſet. Paſſim notabuntur veſtigia 'minus alacris animi. Quid reſpondeam, non habeo. 'Humanæ imbecillitatis ingens patrocinium neceſſitas. 'Non fama, ſed requies mihi quæſita, fallendis innu'meris tædiis, ipſe me damnavi in hanc arenam (15). - - - This offſpring was produced amidſt the greateſt miſ'fortunes; which, if it had been in my power, I would 'have ſhaped into form. There appeared up and down 'in

(14) Taken from the abovementioned Memoir.

(15) Benj. Priolus, Lectori ad calcem Hiſtoriæ.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google impartiality, a History [F], which has been reprinted ſeveral times: the beſt edition is that of Leipſic 1686 [G]. He was put again upon negotiations; for, in the year 1667, he was ordered to go to Venice upon a ſecret affair as it appears from a credential letter, that was found among his papers, drawn up by Mr de Lionne. He could not make an end of that journey; for he died of an apoplexy at Lyons, in the archbiſhop's palace. I advanced, upon a hear-ſay, in the firſt edition, that he died in the hoſpital of Lyons; but I correct that fault in this ſecond edition; and I do ſincerely proteſt, that I ſaid ſo only according to the ſentiments of thoſe, from whom I had it at Geneva. I had no reaſon to believe, that they were not rightly informed; and, as they expreſſed their eſteem for this author, they alledged that particular only as an inſtance of the misfortune of men of letters. It was out of pity to him, and to ſhew the injuſtice of the time, that they alledged it upon occaſion of Pierius Valerianus's book de Infelicitate Litteratorum, which ſome body in the company had mentioned. I omit alſo the paſſage I had quoted out of the Sorberiana: I have been fully informed, that Sorbiere was groſsly miſtaken, as it will appear from the remarks I point at (e). I would have confuted him in the firſt edition (f), had I then had the neceſſary information. Mr Priolo left behind him ſeven children, who loſt, by his death, the penſions he enjoyed; but his name ſupported them, and they ſupported it in their turn, (e) Viz. the remarks [A] and [B] of this article.

(f) See the remark [B], towards the end.

'in it the traces of a mind ill at eaſe. I know not what 'to anſwer. Neceſſity is the grand excuſe for human 'weakneſs. I ſought not fame, but eaſe; and I under- 'took this work, to take off my mind from reflecting on 'the innumerable misfortunes of my life.' If his life written by himſelf were to be printed, we ſhould find in it a very particular account of his great troubles. It is one of the books he promiſed to publiſh, as we ſhall ſee hereafter (16).

(16) In the remark [I].

[F] He wrote with great impartiality, a Hiſtory.] What I have quoted of it, in the article of the marſhal de Guebriant's widow, is ſufficient to ſhew, that the author took the liberty to publiſh things that might offend great perſons. Any one, who reads what he ſays of the duchеſs of Longueville, will be convinced of his boldneſs. Patin went upon a fallacious probability, when he wrote theſe words: Mr Prioleau, who was formerly ſecretary to the duke of Roban, has written the Hiſtory of France in Latin, from the death of the late king, in gratiam Mazarini. His book is intituled, Conatus Hiſtorici: it will be full of flattery; but that is eſſential to the age we live in (17).

(17) Patin, Letter CC, pag. 190, of the 2d volume. It is dated the 14th of September 1660.

Sorel did not paſs the ſame judgment upon that hiſtory, but rather had a contrary opinion of it (18). The author was ſo far from being a flatterer, that, having obtained the king's licence, he thought it neceſſary, before he made uſe of it for the impreſſion of the whole work, to ſee how the chief perſons of the court would like the liberty he took: and therefore he publiſhed firſt (19) the ſubſtance of his hiſtory in one book, keeping the freedom of his pen under ſome reſtraint; and yet ſome miniſters thought he was too free, and declared that they would oppoſe the impreſſion of his work, unleſs it was caſtrated by ſuch examiners as they ſhould appoint. Mr Priolo made his remonſtrances to the king, who gave him leave to have his hiſtory printed at Charleville (20): which was performed in the year 1665, and the book was publickly ſold in France (21); that edition is a quarto book, and is not intituled Conatus Hiſtorici, but Benjamini Prioli ab exceſſu Ludovici XIII, de Rebus Gallicis Hiſtoriarum libri XII. It was reprinted once at Utrecht (22), and twice at Leipſic.

(18) See Sorel's Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 366, 367, Paris 1667.

(19) At Paris for Cramoiſi 1662.

(20) A town belonging to the duke of Mantua, ſituate upon the Maeſe, between Sedan and Charlemont.

(21) Taken from the Memoir abovementioned.

(22) In the year 1669, in 12mo.

I muſt obſerve, that this hiſtory is quoted in the Life of Cardinal Mazarin, written by Aubery; in the Life of the Prince of Conde, and in ſome other pieces. I am ſure, that, if it had been written in French with the ſame ſprightlineſs and ſtrength, which appears in the Latin, it would have been printed above ten times. It would very much pleaſe thoſe, who are fond of the modern taſte; for it is full of thoſe characters and deſcriptions, which are now ſo much in vogue: The phraſes of Tacitus are very frequent in it, and ſeem to come in of themſelves. I ſhall ſay nothing of ſeveral private intrigues, mentioned by the author, who had them from the firſt hand. It appears by the works of count Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato, and by the memoirs of the regency, that he was employed in ſome negotiations.

[G] The beſt edition is that of Leipſic 1686 (23).] For there are ſome letters in it, which the author ſuppreſſed in the edition of Charleville; and very good alphabetical tables, and beſides, very curious and inſtructive notes (24). There is alſo in that edition a Latin tranſlation of what was ſaid of that work in the Journal des Savans (25). Mr. Gallois took ſuch an ingenious turn to expreſs his thoughts about it, that, though the author had ſome reaſon to be diſſatisfied, he had no good pretence to complain: ſo true it is, that ſome railleries are offenſive, and yet one dares not appear to be offended at them (26). The Latin tranſlator has not preſerved the niceneſs of the raillery in every part of his verſion; and I will venture to ſay, he has not only enervated, but alſo falſified the laſt period. Let the reader judge of it. The words of the journaliſt run thus. Had I not purpoſed to forbear giving my opinion about the books mentioned in this journal, perhaps the ſtyle of this hiſtory would be the thing I ſhould leaſt find fault with (27). Compare this with the Latin: Ita ut niſi omnino propoſitum eſſet abſtinere à librorum judicio, de quibus in his Ephemeridibus nonnullæ (28) ſolent proferri, diceretur fortaſſe, ſtylumbujus hiſtoriæ ejus eſſe generis, in quo vix quicquam occurrat quod correctionem mereatur. According to this tranſlator, Mr Gallois ſays, that Priolo's ſtyle is of ſuch a nature, that there is hardly any thing in it that deſerves to be mended. But he is far from ſaying ſo: his meaning is, that the hiſtory he ſpeaks of does not ſo much deſerve to be cenſured on account of the ſtyle, as upon other accounts: And therefore his words ſhould have been rendered thus; In ſtylo hujus hiſtoriæ pauciora quam in cæteris omnibus fortaſſe reprehenderem. The author was not ſurpriſed, that ſome ſevere and even devout perſons were diſpleaſed with the ſpecimen of his work; he took it to be a ſign of the merit of his performance: 'Procul tetrici & moroſi, ſays he, (29) 'immo devoti. Tales me carpſerunt lecto primo meo 'libro. Eorum flagello patientiam indulſi, Boni argumentum talibus diſplicere. - - - Away from me, ye 'ſour and ſevere, and even ye devout. Such perſons 'cenſured me in my laſt book. I patiently endured 'their laſh, ſince to diſpleaſe ſuch perſons is an argument 'of merit.' He owns that he never was at ſchool, or at an univerſity (30). Why then, will ſome ſay, does he acknowledge in his epiſtle dedicatory to the doge and ſenate of Venice, that he is beholden to the univerſity of Padua for his beſt inſtructions? 'Illa veſtra 'Antenorea altrix mei, dulcis Artium parens .... 'me ſuis præceptis imbuit .... hæc me docuit à cel- 'ſa mentis arce deſpicere errantes, & ex veris cauſis 'ſcire, ſub quantis tenebris jaceret mortalium dies. - - - 'Your univerſity of Padua, the pleaſing mother of arts 'and ſciences, gave me the firſt inſtructions of my 'youth. . . . . She taught me to look down from the 'lofty ſummit of the mind on wandring mortals below, 'and to diſcover the true reaſons of the darkneſs, with 'which they are benighted.' I anſwer, that he does not contradict himſelf; his meaning is, that he learned all his Latin of himſelf, without the help of any ſchool-maſter; but he does not ſay ſo as to the ſciences; he acknowledges, that the profeſſors of Padua had been his maſters.

(23) It is in 8vo, and the ſecond edition of that town.

(24) See the remark [I], of the article GUEBRIANT.

(25) Of the 22d of February 1666.

(26) Heu quam miſerum eſt ab eo lædi, de quo non poſſis queri? Pub. Syr.

(27) Journal des Sçavans, of the 22d of February 1666, pag. m. 159, 160.

(28) One does not know what that adjective refers to, and whatever ſenſe be put upon it, it cannot be that of the original.

(29) In his advertiſement to the reader, at the end of the book.

(30) Etſi nullas ſcholas nec Academias unquam viderim, & nullo niſi me præceptore uſus ſim, nemo tamen me temere debet arbitrari niſi Latini ſermonis bene peritus. Ibid.

There ſeems to be a more real contradiction between him and Rhodius; and yet they may be reconciled, by ſuppoſing (31) that Priolo was ſent to Orthez, and to Montauban, to go through his claſſical learning; but

(31) I have been aſſured that it was ſo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google turn, and have been well settled for a long time [H]. I cannot say whether the books he designed to publish will ever be printed [I]. It is pity they have not been published. I will set down some of his maxims [K], and the judgment he made upon Cicero, and Livy, and the most celebrated writers of ancient Rome [L].

that he payed no regard to the rules of his masters, and learned Latin by another method.

[H] He left behind him seven children, who lost .... the pensions he enjoyed .... and have been well settled.] Cardinal Mazarin left him, by his last-will (32), a pension of 1500 livres, assigned upon the whole legacy of the duke of Mazarin; and when the king granted him a licence to print his history in 1661, he gave him a pension of 2000 livres. This appears from the State of France, published at that time, in the list of men of letters. Though his family lost this noble income, they found some other helps. The court took care of them. The eldest son was placed in the finances by Mr Colbert, and raised himself very much. The younger brother was made a life-guard-man, not being twenty years of age. He is now an exempt in the first troop (33). Of the five daughters, three are nuns, and the two others hold the first rank among the gentlewomen belonging to two of the most considerable duchesses of the court. The eldest nun was a prioress in the royal monastery of Chaillot, and was named by the king, in 1692, to establish the rule, that is now observed by the ladies of the royal-house of St Cir near Versailles. She is the spiritual founder of it (34).

(32) It has been printed.

(33) I write this in April 1701.

(34) Taken from the abovementioned Memoir.

[I] I cannot say whether the books he designed to publish will be in printed.] The following words are in the last page of his history: Opera Benjamini Prioli brevi edenda. Vitanda in vita, seu de stultitia humanæ gentis, Lib. IV. Quæstionum naturalium, seu de re plantaria veterum & recentiorum, Lib. III. Opus Emunctum, triginta annorum Meditatio, quod jam celebratur sub apertiori titulo, & falsò nonnulli sibi asscripserunt. De Vita & Gestis Henrici Rohannii Ducis. De Vita & Moribus Cæsaris Cremonini. Vita Benjamini Prioli. Judicium de Scriptoribus Græcis & Latinis. Epistolarum Senilium ad Maximos Europæ Proceres centuria singularis.

It is very probable the life of this author will be prefixed to a book (35) taken from the maxims, which have been found among his papers: and which form a natural image of the heart of man, according to the various events of human life.

(35) By his son.

[K] I shall set down some of his maxims.] Man, said he, is only possessed of three things, the soul, the body, and wealth; which are continually exposed to three sorts of snares: the soul is exposed to the snares of Divines, the body to the snares of Physicians, and wealth to those of Lawyers. Rhodius expresses it thus: Cùm tribus tantùm homo constet, anima, corpore, & bonis: tres insidiatores illis perpetuò imminere: adulterinos Theologos animæ per laqueos conscientiæ injectos, nihil ad bonos mores, & solidam pietatem: medicos corpori, per pharmaca noxia, cùm rusticatio, diæta, & mens hilaris, sola morbis opitulentur: bonis rabulas forenses, per litium articulos & formulas, cùm per arbitros idoneos amputandæ sint radices, crescentibus sine fine familiarum malis (36). A wise man ought not to be too forward, if he has a mind to succeed at court: A good judgment and submission are the only means of obtaining one's desires. A man ought not to make himself too familiar with any body; that is, he ought to reveal nothing but what he would have made public: for can any thing be more absurd, than to expect that others will be more faithful to you than you have been to yourself (37). A man, who frequents the court, ought particularly to avoid failing into the snares of the fair sex. Cavendum præsertim in aulâ à fallacibus fœminarum vinclis: omnes nugaces esse, infidas, & judicii modicas, nunquam eodem tenore mentis & animi (38) Leudness is the fulness of all evils: it hurts the soul, the body, the reputation; and, what is most sensible to debauched men, it affects their purse. It is a piece of folly to marry, unless a man be bound in a special manner to prevent the extinction of his family. We have much ado to govern ourselves; why then should we undertake to govern what is most ungovernable. Rhodius expresses those maxims better than I do. Scortationem ultimum malorum, indecoram, noxiam, probrosam; animum, corpus, famam, & quod magis dissolutum hominem afficit, crumenam lædentem. Quæcunque uni venditat sui corporis jura, cuilibet fine discrimine sui copiam facit. Uxorem ducere, insanum; si eos excipias, qui propagando sanguinis hoc debent suis penatibus; vix potens humana vis se regere, adscisit difficillimum quod regat, ut qui remigiis vix lembum subigit, remulcum adjungit (39). He abhorred lying to such a degree, that he could not hear of it without falling into a great passion; and he exhorted his children, above all things, to avoid that fault, and to live a pious life. Every Christian, said he, ought to hate lying; and a gentleman ought to be free from it, tho' he be not a Christian. He mortally hated those, who laughed at the scripture. Mendacium ita aversabatur, ut ad solam mentionem excandesceret, nihil prius veritate & pietate in Deum, liberis commendans. Omnem Christianum à mendacio alienum esse debere; nobilem autem, etiamsi Christianus non sit. In deriso res Scripturæ Sacræ, horum hoc seculum feracissimum, inexpiabili odio flagrabat (40). He was a great observer of justice, but little regarded the outside of religion (41). This puts me in mind of Montagne, who, though no very devout man, protests, that he had naturally an aversion for a lie (42).

(36) Jo. Rhodius, ubi supra, pag. 6. See the Cortegiano, of Castiglione, lib. ii, pag. m. 295.

(37) Nulli se facere nimis sodalem oportere, id est, nihil revelare, nisi quod publici juris esse velis. Nam quid ineptius quàm putare aliquem tibi magis fidum, quàm tibi ipse fuisti. Ibid.

(38) Ibid.

(39) Ibid.

(40) Ibid. pag. 7.

(41) Justi & æqui servantissimus, religionis parum, quæ quidem in externis actibus versatur. Ibid. pag. 5.

[L] I shall set down the judgment he made of Cicero and Livy, and the most celebrated writers of ancient Rome.] He was no great admirer of Cicero: he admired Livy, and found him so inimitable, that despairing to copy his excellencies, he resolved to imitate Tacitus. He was extremely fond of Seneca, and preferred Lucan to Virgil, and the tenderness of Catullus to the majesty of Horace. Rhodius, his good friend, and his panegyrist, wonders at the oddness of his taste. Senecam deperibat: nescio quo malo genio M. Tullium ingentem virum, Romanæ eloquentiæ patrem, non admiratus est: cæteros ad unguem tenebat. Tit. Livium inimitabilem prædicabat, idcoque desperans, nobis posterisque Tacitum repræsentavit. Lucanum præferebat Virgilio: quis hoc credat? Et teneras Catulli amationes Horatianæ majestati (43). It is certain, that this judgment is wrong; for a man, who prefers Livy to Tacitus, should place Cicero above Seneca, and Virgil above Lucan. The eloquence and character of Cicero, Livy, and Virgil, are much of the same kind (44). Those authors do not affect to be bright; they cast, without any affectation, a light, which adorns the whole work: but does not dazzle the reader; as those of some other writers, who, instead of letting every ray pass through its proper medium, have recourse to a kind of dioptric, in order to collect together an infinite number of rays, to cast the greater light. It is their chief study: It was the method of Seneca, the two Pliny's and Tacitus. Lucan, in like manner, toils and labours hard to express himself in an uncommon manner, and to appear great and lofty. It must be confessed, that they were men of very great parts, and perhaps they would have taken a more natural course, if they had lived in the time of Cicero, Livy, and Virgil; but they began to study when the true taste began to be depraved. It was with the Romans, as it is with those, who are used to drink excellent wines; their taste grows dull, nothing will serve their turn but Brandy, or the strongest liquors. A majestic, natural, and uniform eloquence became insipid, when people were used to it: they were for witty strokes and flights; the day-light was not sufficient for them, they wanted flashes of lightning. The French begin to be sick of the same distemper. Seneca and Tacitus complied with the common taste; they were afraid of being slighted, if they should write like the authors of the golden age. However it be, their style is quite different from that of Livy. How comes it then, that Priolo did so much admire that historian and Seneca at the same time? How could he prefer Lucan to Virgil, and Seneca to Cicero? There is no uniformity in such a judgment: but one must not dispute about tastes. We must be contented with the matter of fact. I shall set down Mr Priolo's words relating to Livy (45). ' De me equidem dixero, si ' quis ævi prisci inflexit sensus, fuit ille Livius, quem ' unicum scriptorem Romanum imperium tulit majestate suâ dignum. Ita spiritus & quasi voces re- ' præsentabat, ut & agere eadem & loqui credas di-

(42) See the 19th chapter of the 2d book of his Essays, pag. m. 579, 580.

(43) Jo. Rhodius, ubi supra, pag. 7.

(44) Setting aside the difference which depends, 1. On the characters of the subjects treated by them; 2. On prose and verse.

(45) Priolus, ad Lectorem, in Limine Historiæ, fol. m. col. iij. verso.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'cendi genere non anxio, sed limpido, & quod me 'torquet, non imitabili ..... Ego desperatione 'Livianæ imitationis (46) nulli me addicere decrevi. --- 'As to my own opinion, I take Livy to have been the 'noblest author, that the Roman empire ever produced. 'He represented the very spirit and words of persons in 'so lively a manner, that you would think he is acting 'and speaking the same things; and this he does, not in 'a forced and laboured, but an easy and clear, and (what 'gives me pain) an inimitable style.' What follows concerns his admiration of Seneca. 'Ego M. Tullium 'magni semper feci; sed si hodie viveret, stylum im- 'mutaret. Seneca, qui eum ingenio & judicio longissime superavit, usus est dicendi genere auribus sui 'temporis accommodato, nec de imitatione Tulliana 'unquam cogitavit, jactatæ puritati arenam suam fine 'calcæ præferens. Certè mirari satis non possum eorum ingenia, qui quicquid altum spirat, inflatum & 'tumidum appellant. Tales Lucanum, tales Statium 'suæ censuræ subjiciunt (47). --- I always greatly 'esteemed Cicero; but, if he were now alive, he would 'alter his style. Seneca, who far surpassed him in abi- 'lity and judgment, employed a style adapted to the ears 'of his cotemporaries, nor did he ever think of imitating 'that of Cicero, preferring his own sand without chalk 'to the boasted purity of that writer. Indeed I cannot 'enough wonder at the disposition of those, who call every 'thing, that is lofty, swelling and bombast. Such per- 'sons find fault with Lucan and Statius.' I shall likewise set down what he says concerning his imitation of Tacitus. 'Profiteor me furem esse notæ rapacitatis, 'habeo piceatas manus, omnia rapio. Taciti & alio- 'rum audax prædo, crudas ejus paginas in opus meum 'propello. Poteram adscito fuco dissimulare, non cu- 'ravi. Nisi centonibus stylum animes in desita lin- 'gua, quid nisi languidum & emortuum expectandum (48). --- I profess myself to be a thief of singular 'rapaciousness; I have pitched hands, and lay hold on eve- 'ry thing. A bold plunderer of Tacitus and others; I transfer his indigested pages into my own work. Unless you 'animate a dead language with passages of the ancients, 'what is to be expected but a languid and lifeless per- 'formance?' His style was criticised by the Jesuit Cossard; and, if I am not mistaken, it was at him this sharp reply was levelled (49). 'Meum stylum ab- 'ruptum, inæqualem, immo, (ut verbis ejusdem scioli 'utar) nullum: scatere paginam centonibus & furtis. 'Scias, ó blenne, quisquis es, familiares mihi à puero 'antiquos scriptores, in aula & in castris aliquando 'lectos, nunc sese offerre non vocatos, & abhinc qua- 'draginta annis nequidem eos libasse, & dictasse totam hanc Historiam inter ambulandum, ne litura 'quidem imperata: tantum abest, ut bis aliquid unquam scripserim. --- My style, forsooth, is broken, un- 'equal, and (to use the words of the same pretender to 'criticism) no style at all. Know, thou coxcomb, who- 'ever thou art, that I have had an intimate knowledge 'of the ancients from my childhood; that I read them at 'court, and in the camp; that they now present them- 'selves to me uncalled; that I have not dipped into them 'for these forty years past; and that I dictated this his- 'tory walking up and down, without blotting out any 'thing of it; so far am I from writing any thing twice 'over.' We learn from the last words of this passage, how that History of France was composed. The author dictated it, as he walked, and made no rasures in it: which is a very extraordinary thing.

(46) He says, that Buchanan endeavoured in vain to imitate Livy. Buchanan Titum Livium præstare nobis conatus est; certè vigesies à capite ad calcem antequam ad suum opus se accingeret, eum lectitasse perhibetur .... Buchananus, illius equidem simia est, tantum ab eo distans, quantum simia ab homine. Ibid.

(47) Ibid. fol. cap. iv.

(48) Ibid. fol. cap. v.

(49) Ibid. in fine; libri C c 4 verso.

PRISCILLIAN, a Spanish Heresiarch, lived in the IVth century. He was endowed with very fine qualities [A]; he had a quick wit, and a great deal of eloquence and learning, he was laborious, sober, and free from avarice. An eager thirst after knowledge, which induced him in his youth to study Magic (a), made him listen to the Rhetorician Helpidius, and to a lady, who had embraced some errors of the Gnostics (b). He was infected with them, and employed his utmost skill to spread them. He gained over many people, especially women, who flocked to him [B]: nay, some bishops followed his sect. This poison having spread itself in several towns, great endeavours were used to put a stop to it. A synod met at Sarragossa (c), at which the bishops of Aquitain assisted (d). Priscillian, and all his adherents, were condemned for refusing to appear at it, and the secular arm was employed to expel them from all the towns. These Heretics were so little concerned at this condemnation, that they made Priscillian a bishop. He left Spain with Instantius and Salvianus, two prelates of his party, in order to go to Rome, and justify himself to the Pope. As they passed through Aquitain, they gained many disciples. Euchrocia,

(a) Idem vanissimus & plus justo inflatior profanarum rerum scientia, quin & Magicas artes ab adolescentia eum exercuisse creditum est. Sulpicius Severus, Sacræ Hist. lib. ii, pag. m. 163.

(b) That Rhetorician and that lady were instructed by one Marc, an Egyptian. It is falsly said in Moreri's Dictionary, that this Marc instructed Priscillian.

(c) In the year 381.

(d) Among others, Delphinius bishop of Bourdeaux. Vide Alteserram, Rerum Aquitanicarum, lib. v, cap. v, pag. 323.

[A] He was endowed with very fine qualities.] Sulpicius Severus expresses it thus: 'Ab his (Agape quadam non ignobili muliere, & rhetore Helpidio) Priscil- 'lianus est institutus, familia nobilis, prædives opibus, 'acer, inquietus, facundus, multa lectione eruditus, 'disserendi ac disputandi promptissimus: felix profecto, 'si non pravo studio corrupisset optimum ingenium, 'prorsus multa in eo animi & corporis bona cerneres. 'Vigilare multum, famem, sitim ferre poterat, ha- 'bendi minime cupidus, utendi parcissimus (1). --- 'Priscillian was instructed by one Agape, a woman of 'some note, and a Rhetorician called Helpidius. He was 'of a noble family, wealthy, of an impetuous and restless 'temper, eloquent, very learned, and most ready at dispu- 'tation: Happy had it been for him, if he had not cor- 'rupted the best genius by a wrong application; for he 'had many excellent qualities both of mind and body. He 'could watch long, and endure hunger and thirst; was 'not eager to get, and very temperate in the use of 'riches.'

(1) Sulpicius Severus, Sacr. Histor. lib. ii, pag. 162, 163.

[B] He employed all his skill to spread them. Women flocked to him .... bishops .... came over to his sect.] I shall quote again Sulpicius Severus for it. Is ubi doctrinam exitiabilem aggressus est, multos nobilium, plurosque populares authoritate persuadendi & arte blandiendi allicuit in societatem. Ad hoc mulieres novarum rerum cupidæ, fluxa fide, & ad omnia curioso ingenio, catervatim ad eum confluebant. Quippe humilitatis speciem ore & habitu prætendens, honorem sui & reverentiam cunctis injecerat. Jamque paulatim perfidiæ istius tabes, pleraque Hispaniæ pervaserat: quin & nonnulli episcoporum depravati, inter quos Instantius & Salvianus, Priscillianum non solum conversione, sed sub quadam etiam conjuratione susceperant (2). I shall likewise set down Maimbourg's paraphrase upon these Latin words. 'That Heresiarch, being sensible on the one hand, 'and knowing by his own experience, that men are 'naturally very much inclined to voluptuousness, 'which occasioned a general corruption of mankind 'before the Flood; and knowing, on the other hand, 'the weak side of people, especially of women, who 'are easily imposed upon by a shew of piety; pre- 'tended to so much holiness, that there never was 'a greater hypocrite than that impostor. And in- 'deed no man did ever appear less fond of the world, 'for which he affected to express a great contempt 'in all things, by the meanness of his dress, his be- 'haviour, and his conversation; by his modest and 'humble look, the austerity of his life, and his 'great charity to the poor; talking of nothing 'but penitence, fasting, watchings, prayers, and the 'contempt of all worldly things, in order to be 'perfectly united to God. So that he was quickly 'accounted, all over Spain, a great servant of God, 'and a man of a wonderful holiness, and admired up- 'on that account. Women, who are more easily de- 'luded by such deceitful appearances, and whose na- 'tural curiosity makes them fond of novelty, and 'extraordinary things, especially in point of religion, 'flocked to him, to be directed by him, tho' he was 'as yet but a lay-man. Being, moreover, learned, 'and having the talent of persuading, and insinuating 'himself into mens minds, by his nice and ingeni- 'ous flatteries, he quickly found himself the head of 'a great

(2) Ibid. pag. 163.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Euchrocia, the wife of the Rhetorician Delphidius (e), received them at her country-houſe, and was ſo charmed with Priſcillian, that ſhe followed him every where. Several other women were ſeduced by theſe Heretics, and left all, to accompany them in their journey [C]. The Pope refuſed to hear them, and ſo did St Ambroſe; but the Imperial court was more indulgent, and granted them a reſcript, importing, that their churches ſhould be reſtored to them. They returned into Spain, where they had ſo great an intereſt, that Ithacius, their accuſer, being ſummoned to give an account of his conduct, as a diſturber of the peace of the church, fled into Gaul. He ſo exaſperated the tyrant Maximus againſt theſe ſectaries, that they were ordered to repair to the council of Bourdeaux. Inſtantius was condemned in it. Priſcillian, ſeeing the condemnation of his companion, deſired to be referred to Maximus; which was granted him. His enemies followed him to the court, and proſecuted him ſo warmly, that he was condemned (f) to death (g). I ſhall give the character of Ithacius, the chief promoter of Priſcillian's death [D], and the conſequences

(e) De quo vide Alteſerram, ibid. cap. iii, pag. 316, 317; & Auſonium, in Profeſſor. n. 5.

(f) In the year 385.

(g) Taken from Sulpicius Severus, Hiſtor. Sacr. lib. ii.

'a great party in moſt provinces of Spain, not only 'among women, and the common people, but alſo 'among perſons of quality and eccleſiaſtics, ſome of 'whom were biſhops, who, like others, adhered to 'him as a ſaint (3).'

(3) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontificat de St Leon, livr. i, pag. 44, 45, Dutch Edit. He quotes the words of Sulpicius Severus, in the margin.

[C] Euchrocia, the wife of the Rhetorician Delphidius . . . . and ſeveral other women . . . . left all to accompany them in their journey.] If we believe what ſome ſay, they began in the ſpirit, and ended in the fleſh. Euchrocia was at firſt charmed with the outward devotion and pious diſcourſes of this heretic; but by degrees he charmed her with ſomething elſe; he lay with her, and got her with child. If it be ſaid that the Latin words, which I ſhall quote preſently, ſignify, that he lay with Procula, Euchrocia's daughter, I will not obſtinately deny it: perhaps it is the beſt ſenſe that can be put upon thoſe words. The outward devotion, which Priſcillian had affected for a long time, did not make him forget, that young Procula was preferable to her mother. 'Iter eis præter interiorem Aquitaniam fuit: ubi tum ab impe-'ritis magnifice ſuſcepti, ſparſere perfidiæ ſemina, 'maximeque Eluſanam plebem, ſane tum bonam & 'religioni ſtudentem, pravis prædicationibus perver-'tere: à Burdigala per Delphinum repulſi, tamen 'in agro Euchrociæ aliquantiſper morati, infecere 'nonnullos ſuis erroribus. Inde iter cœptum ingreſſi, 'turpi ſane pudibundoque comitatu, cum uxoribus at-'que alienis etiam fœminis, in quis erat Euchrocia, 'ac filia ejus Procula: de qua fuit in ſermone ho-'minum, Priſcilliani ſtupro gravidam, partum ſibi 'graminibus abegiſſe (4). - - - They took their jour-'ney thro' Aquitain, where, being ſplendidly received by 'the ignorant, they ſcattered the ſeeds of perfidiouſneſs, 'and by wicked diſcourſes perverted the minds of the 'good and pious people of Gaſcony. Being driven from 'Bourdeaux by the Dauphin, they ſtopped a little at the 'eſtate of Euchrocia, where they infected ſome perſons 'with their errors. Thence they proceeded on their 'intended journey, with a ſhameful and ſcandalous re-'tinue, with other mens wives and daughters, among 'whom was Euchrocia, and her daughter Procula; 'concerning whom it was reported, that, being with 'child by Priſcillian, ſhe was delivered in the graſs.' It was well for Delphidius that he died young; for he had not the misfortune to ſee the debauchery of his daughter, and the execution of his wife (5). Every body knows, that Euchrocia and Priſcillian were put to death at the ſame time (6). A panegyriſt of Theodoſius inveighed againſt that cruelty in an eloquent manner: he did not ſpare Maximus, who had condemned to death the wife of an illuſtrious Poet, becauſe ſhe was accuſed of being too devout. 'De 'virorum mortibus loquor, cum deſcenſum recorder 'ad ſanguinem feminarum, & in ſexum cui bella par-'cunt non parce ſævitum? Sed nimirum graves ſub-'erant, invidioſæque cauſæ ut unco ad pœnam clari 'vatis matrona raperetur. Objiciebatur enim, atque 'etiam exprobrabatur mulieri viduæ nimia religio, & 'diligentius culta divinitas (7). - - - Do I mention 'the death of men, when I remember, that he deſcended 'to ſpill the blood of women, and treated that ſex with 'cruelty, which even war ſpares? But no doubt there 'were weighty reaſons for puniſhing the wife of an illu-'ſtrious Poet: for it was objected againſt her, that ſhe 'was too religious, and too diligent a worſhipper of 'God.' Some wonder how Priſcillian could draw in ſo many devout women, ſince his pretended devotion was attended with ſuch offenſive leudneſs. He confeſſed at his trial, that he had had leud meetings with women in the night-time, and that he was ſtark naked, when he prayed (8). But others ſay, that he drew in the fair-ſex by that very thing: it is Maimbourg's opinion. I ſhall again ſet down his paraphraſe upon the words of Sulpicius Severus. 'When people are pre-'poſſeſſed with an opinion of a man's holineſs, they 'will blindly ſubmit to all his orders, and look upon 'all his deciſions as ſo many oracles, eſpecially when 'they indulge the inclinations of corrupt nature: and 'therefore that profligate wretch found it no difficult 'thing to perſuade his followers, that, when the ſpi-'rit, which comes from God, was perfectly united 'to them by a certain form of prayer, which he 'taught them, they might lawfully give a full 'ſcope to the luſts of the fleſh; and that God is not 'offended at it, ſince the fleſh does not proceed from 'him, but from the wicked principle, as well as mar-'riage. By virtue of that abominable doctrine, the 'women, who did not love their huſbands, left 'them againſt their will *, and huſbands likewiſe * Severr. lib. ii. 'left their wives, of whom they were weary; and all 'of them, and in general all his followers, prayed 'together as he did, as if they had been in the ſtate of 'innocency, and then defiled themſeves with all ſorts 'of pollutions. Such is commonly the end of the 'new doctrines, enthuſiaſms, and new ways of pray-'ing more fanatical than myſterious, of ſome men, 'who pretend to be extraordinarily enlightened, 'and who, beginning with the ſpirit to deceive the 'world, ſeldom fail to end with the fleſh (9).

(4) Sculp. Severus, ubi ſupra, pag. 165.

(5) Minus malorum munere expertus Dei, Medio quod ævi raptus ea. Errore quod non deviantis filiæ, Pœnaque læſus conjugis. Auſonius, in Profeſſor. n. 5, p. m. 160.

(6) Sulpic. Severus, ubi ſupra, pag. 170.

(7) Latinus Pacatus, in Panegyrico Theodoſio dicto, cap. xxix, pag. m. 509.

(8) Nec diffiteor, ſi obſcenis ſe ſtudiiſſe doctrinis, nocturnos etiam turpium feminarum egiſſe conventus, nudumque orare ſolitum, nocentem pronunciavit. Sulpic. Severus, ibid. p. 170.

(9) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 45, 46.

[D] I ſhall give the character of Ithacius, the chief promoter of Priſcillian's death.] That Spaniſh biſhop was a debauched and impudent man, and ſacrificed every thing to his paſſions. He plainly ſhewed, that he was not actuated by the love of truth, and that his violent perſecution of thoſe heretics proceeded only from a principle of vanity. The firſt ſteps he made engaged him to go through with it: he was fond of obtaining a compleat victory, and of ſhewing his great intereſt and authority; the loſs of his cauſe would have been intolerable to him: he left nothing unattempted with the tyrant Maximus, in order to triumph by the favour of the ſecular arm. And, becauſe he was afraid of being thwarted in his deſign by wiſe and judicious men, he was ſo impudent and malicious as to accuſe of Priſcillianiſm all thoſe whom he did not like. Whoever faſted, or applied himſelf to the reading of pious books, was cried down by this violent perſecutor as an accomplice of that ſect. He was ſo bold as to accuſe St Martin of favouring theſe heretics, becauſe he exhorted him to leave off his proſecutions, and entreated Maximus not to ſhed the blood of thoſe ſectaries. Such are the abominable devices of moſt of thoſe, who charge others with hereſy: they are renewed in every age, and yet the world is impoſed upon by them to this very day, as if they had never been practiſed before. Sulpicius Severus deſerves to be highly commended for ſaying, that the Priſcillianiſts were not more unacceptable to him than their accuſers. Secuti etiam accuſatores Idacius & Ithacius Epiſcopi: quorum ſtudium in expugnandis hæreticis non reprehenderem, ſi non ſtudio vincendi plus quam oportuit certaſſent. Ac mea quidem ſententia eſt, mihi tam reos quam accuſatores diſplicere. Certe Ithacium nihil penſi, nihil ſancti habuiſſe definio. Fuit enim audax, loquax, impudens, ſumptuoſus, ventri & gulæ plurimum

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google consequences of that severity [E]. St Martin, bishop of Tours, refused to communicate with the bishops, who put Maximus upon such violent proceedings; and, having suffered, at last, an act of communion with them even to be extorted from him, he was very sory for it the remaining part of his life; and even believed it was the reason, why the gift of miracles, flagged in his person. Some other bishops imitated him [F], in not admitting Ithacius and his adherents to their communion. Ithacius was not uneasy at it during the life of Maximus his protector, and the idol of his flattery; but, when he lost that support, he was punished for his fault. Pope Leo was not so nice as St Martin; for rimum impertiens. Hic stultitiæ eo usque processerat, ut omnes etiam sanctos viros, quibus aut studium inerat lectionis, aut propositum erat certare jejuniis, tanquam Priscilliani socios aut discipulos, in crimen arcesseret. Ausus etiam miser est, ea tempestate Martino episcopo, viro plane Apostolis conferendo, palam objectare hæresis infamiam. Namque tum Martinus apud Treveros constitutus, non desinebat increpare Ithacium, ut ab accusatione desisteret: Maximum orare, ut sanguine infelicium abstineret: satis superque sufficere, ut episcopali sententia hæretici judicati ecclesiis pellerentur (10). St Martin's intercession proved so powerful, that, whilst he was at Triers, these heretics were not brought to their trial; but, as soon as he went away, some bishops gained Maximus, and prevailed with him to break his word to him (11). Priscillian was condemned to death, and then Ithacius, being fully satisfied, desisted from his accusation, that is, he did not appear against him before the Judges, when the sentence came to be confirmed. A gross artifice, which Sulpicius Severus justly laughs at. Ceterum Ithacius videns quam invidiosum sibi apud episcopos foret, si accusato etiam postremis rerum capitalium judiciis astitisset (etenim iterari judicium necesse erat) subtrahit se cognitioni frustra calido jam scelere perfecto (12). Latinus Pacatus uses these sanguinary bishops as they deserved, and shews the scandal they occasioned by laying their unclean and bloody hands upon sacred things. He exclaims against the iniquity of the tyrant Maximus, who cherished and supported such prelates (13). 'Quid hoc majus poterat 'intendere accusator sacerdos? fuit enim, fuit & hoc 'delatorum genus, qui nominibus antistites, revera 'autem satellites, atque adeo carnifices, non contenti 'miseros avitis evolvisse patrimoniis, calumniabantur 'in sanguinem, & vitas premebant reorum jam pauperum. Quinetiam cum judiciis capitalibus astitissent 'cum gemitus & tormenta miserorum auribus ac luminibus hausissent, cum lictorum arma, cum damnatorum frena tractassent, pollutas pœnali manus 'contactu ad sacra referebant, & cæremonias quas in'cestaverant mentibus, etiam corporibus impiabant. 'Hos ille (14) Phalaris in amicis habebat, hi in oculis ejus, atque etiam in oculis erant: nec injuria, à 'quibus tot simul votiva veniebant, avaro divitum 'bona; cruento innocentium pœna; impio religionis 'injuria. - - - - What more could a priestly accuser 'have done? For there was this kind of informers, who, 'being bishops in name, but in reality soldiers, and 'consequently executioners, not content to have deprived 'wretches of their paternal estates, pursued them to 'death, and took away the lives of those, whom they 'had before impoverished. Moreover, after sitting in 'judgment in capital matters, and hearing and seeing the 'groans and torments of miserable men, after handling 'the Lictors rods, and the chains of the condemned, they 'performed the sacred rites of religion with polluted hands, 'and defiled its ceremonies. These were the tyrant's 'friends, who satisfied his avarice with the estates of 'the rich, his cruelty with the punishment of the inno'cent, and his impiety with the prophanation of religion.'

There is another thing to be observed in Ithacius, in which the most violent accusers resemble him. No bishop would have found it a more difficult thing, than he, to give an account of his own conduct, and yet he was the warmest in defaming and prosecuting others. This unaccountable behaviour has been observed by the heathens, who say that innocence is the most necessary qualification of an accuser. 'Cognosce quam multa esse oporteat in eo qui alterum 'accuset . . . . Primum integritatem atque innocentiam singularem. Nihil est enim quod minus ferendum sit, quam rationem ab altero vitæ reposcere 'eum, qui non possit suæ reddere (15). - - - Consider 'how many things are requisite in him, who accuses 'another . . . . First, integrity and singular innocence. 'For nothing is more intolerable, than for him to call 'another to an account for his actions, who cannot give 'an account of his own.' But those, who set up for accusers, are generally the least concerned about it. There are persons whose books are full of absurdities, contradictions, prophanations, innovations, and dangerous paradoxes and heresies, and yet they fail not to charge many people with heresy; and had they a Maximus at their disposal, we should hear of nothing but of men deposed, proscribed, anathematized, to say no worse. It is probable these irregular and unjust proceedings will last as long as the world.

[E] The consequences of that severity.] The words of Mr Flechier, one of the best writers of his time, are so fine, that, in copying them here, I am sure to please all my readers, 'That execution occasioned se'veral disorders; for the capital punishment of that 'Herefiarch gave a new strength to his heresy. He 'was magnificently buried by his followers, and ho'noured as a martyr; and those, who had procured 'his condemnation, making an ill use of their interest 'at court, persecuted good men with impunity. 'Whoever † fasted, and loved a retired life, was 'immediately suspected by them; whoever was more 'sober and regular than they, was a guilty person. 'Those, who did not please them, were immediate'ly accounted Priscillianists, especially when their 'death was like to be acceptable to the prince, or to 'fill his coffers with their ‡ spoils; for they deprived 'men of their lives and estates, as they thought fit, 'and preserved the tyrant's friendship by calumnies, 'and cruelties, and other actions like his (16).'

[F] Some other bishops imitated St Martin.] Going on to shew the ill consequences of the punishment of Priscillian, I make use of the words of Mr Maimbourg, which are better than any translation I can make of them. 'What was most deplorable, was, a kind of a 'dangerous schism occasioned in Gaul by this action 'of Ithacius. For, on the one hand, a bishop of 'great authority, called Theognostus, having highly 'condemned it, and afterwards separated from his 'communion, was followed therein by most bishops, 'who thought, as well as he, that they could not communicate with a man, who had dishonoured his character and the church, by defiling himself with the 'blood of those, whose death he had procured: But, 'on the other hand, many bishops, bribed by Itha'cius, whose accomplices they were, or who approved 'what he had done, sided with him, and finding 'themselves powerfully supported by the prince, who 'favoured Ithacius, met at Triers in a kind of council, 'or rather in a conventicle, where he was absolved, 'and declared innocent, by a formal sentence (17).' We are told afterwards how St Martin refused to communicate with them, till he was made sensible, that by complying he should obtain from Maximus a revocation of the order, whereby all the Priscillianists, that should be found, were to be put to the sword (18). St Martin did not approve, that Heretics should be put to death, and was afraid that many of the best Catholics would be involved in that slaughter, because those, who, by reason of their modest and mortified look, seemed to be more regular than others, were accounted Priscillianists, without making any distinction between hypocrites and truly devout men (19). And therefore being of opinion, that of two evils he was to chuse the least (20), he yielded for a short time to the violence offered to him, and assisted with those bishops at the ordination of Felix bishop of Triers. . . . The very next day he went away very melancholy, and very sorry, that such an ordination had been made; and perceiving that the gift of miracles, which † GOD had bestowed upon him, did not exert itself so often as it did before, he endeavoured to make up that loss by his penitence. As for the schism, occasioned by Ithacius, it did not last long, because Maximus, his protector, having been defeated some time after by the ‡ great Theodosius, and killed by the soldiers at Aquileia, he was forsaken by all the bishops of his party, and punished with banishment, in which he died.

(10) Sulpicius Severus, ubi supra, pag. 168, 169.

(11) Quoad usque Martinus Treveris fuit, dilata cognitio est: & mox discessurus egregia authoritate à Maximo elicuit sponsionem, nihil eruentum in reos constituendum. Sed postea Imperator per Magnum & Rufum episcopos depravatus, & à mitioribus consiliis deflexus, causam præfecto Evodio permisit, viro acri & severo. Ibid. pag. 169.

(12) Ibid. pag. 170.

(13) Latinus Pacatus, ubi supra.

(14) That is, the tyrant Maximus, vanquished by Theodosius.

(15) Cicero, in Verrem, lib. i, fol. 22, B.

† Sulpic. Sever. de Vita S. Mart.

‡ Pacat. in Panegyr.

(16) Flechier, Histoire de Theodose, livr. iii, pag. m. 303, ad ann. 385, Paris, in 12mo, 1680.

(17) Maimbourg, ubi supra, pag. 57, 58.

(18) Ibid. pag. 59.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Ibid. pag. 60, where he quotes these words of Sulpicius Severus, Dial. III, Satius æstimans ad horam cedere, quam his non consulere quorum cervicibus gladius imminebat.

† Sever. ibid.

‡ Ibid. de Vir. illust. cap. ii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google for he approved Priſcillian's execution [G]. Maimbourg makes uſe of a diſtinction, which is not very far from being ridiculous (b). I do not examine whether theſe Heretics believed and practiſed whatever is imputed to them (i); I ſhall only ſay, that it ſeems, one of their opinions has been condemned, which yet has been approved in St Auguſtin [H].

(b) See the remark [G].

(i) See Moreri's Dictionary, the Dutch edition, in the addition to the article PRISCILLIAN.

[G] Pope Leo . . . . approved Priſcillian's execution.] Maimbourg (21) acknowledges, that Heretics had not been puniſhed with death till then; but he maintains, that they may be juſtly treated with that ſeverity, as it has been frequently practiſed ſince. And, not to mention, ſays he, 'thoſe who have proved in their 'books, that it is not only lawful, but very proper to 'treat them ſo; we need only read what St Leo wrote 'upon this ſubject, when, giving the neceſſary orders 'to proceed in Spain againſt Priſcillian's hereſy, he 'praiſes Maximus for that action, and ſays; ‡ That 'the rigour and ſeverity of his juſtice againſt that Here- 'ſiarch and his followers, whom that prince put to death, 'has been very ſerviceable to the clemency of the church. 'For, tho' ſhe is contented with the mild judgment pro- 'nounced by the biſhops againſt obſtinate Heretics, ac- 'cording to the canons, and tho' ſhe is not for bloody exe- 'cutions (§ a), yet ſhe is very much aſſiſted and ſup- 'ported by the ſevere conſtitutions of the emperors, ſince 'the fear of ſo rigorous a puniſhment ſometimes moves 'Heretics to have recourſe to the ſpiritual remedy, in or- 'der to cure the mortal diſtemper of their hereſy by a true 'converſion.' The ſame Maimbourg ſays (22), that the greateſt fault of Ithacius was, his applying himſelf to a ſecular court in a cauſe meerly eccleſiaſtical, and procuring the death of thoſe Heretics to the utmoſt of his power, which is contrary to the laws of the church; and therefore, ſays he, when the clergy implore the aſſiſtance of princes and magiſtrates againſt them, they always proteſt they do ſo earneſtly wiſh for their amendment, that they do not deſire they ſhould be puniſhed with death, but rather that they ſhould find mercy, leaving it however to the Judges to act according to the laws, for the good of the church and ſtate. This is meer grimace; it is at leaſt a conduct ſo oppoſite to the ſolemnity of a ſerious tribunal, that no one can think it ſtrange, that the Inquiſition ſhould be ridiculed upon that account. You require of princes, that they ſhould make laws againſt Heretics; you highly commend them when they appoint a capital puniſhment for them; you deliver up to them thoſe, whom you declare to be Heretics: you therefore, properly ſpeaking, are the cauſe of their death. When you tell the magiſtrates, that you are not for their being put to death, you act a meer farce (23). Why do you not aſk the ſame favour for aſſaſſins? For you ſay, that a Heretic is worſe than a poiſoner and a murderer. Ariſtotle's maxim, Poſito uno abſurdo multa ſequuntur, was never truer than in the preſent caſe. The abſurdity of maintaining that men ought to be puniſhed with the ſword for their opinions, is attended with a thouſand abſurdities; and thoſe, who advance it, fall into a thouſand contradictions. It is to be obſerved, that the inquiſitors condemn people to death, and are not contented to declare that a man is a Heretic (24).

(21) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 56.

‡ Profuit diu iſta diſtrictio Eccleſiaſticæ lenitati, quæ etſi ſacerdotali contenta judicio cruentas refugit ultiones, ſeveris tamen Chriſtianorum Principum Conſtitutionibus adjuvatur, dum ad ſpirituale nonnunquam recurrunt remedium qui timent corporale ſupplicium. S. Leo, Epiſt. XCV, ad Turib.

(22) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 57.

(23) See Jurieu, Apologie pour la Réformation, Tom. ii, pag. 241, 257, Edit. in 4*to.*

(24) See Jurieu, ibid.

[(§ a) In countries, where the Inquiſition prevails, Heretics are puniſhed with burning. Now, as in ſuch puniſhment, there are neither bones broken, nor blood ſpilt, the queſtion is to know, whether the maxim Eccleſia non novit ſanguinem, expreſſed here in equivalent terms by St Leo, is in this reſpect obſerved, or only eluded. REM. CRIT.]

[H] It ſeems, one of the opinions of the Priſcillianiſts has been condemned, which yet has been approved in St Auguſtin.] Theſe three things are certain; 1. St Auguſtin believes, that man is invincibly determined to evil by his natural corruption, or to good by the Holy Spirit. 2. This doctrine deprives man of free-will, taking this word for the liberty of indifference. 3. St Auguſtin's doctrine has been ſolemnly approved by the church. Now we ſhall ſee, that the Priſcillianiſts were condemned, becauſe they deſtroyed free-will, by ſubmitting man's will to a fatal neceſſity, which it cannot oppoſe (25). That is to ſay, they were condemned, becauſe they deſtroyed free-will, taking that word not for the faculty of acting voluntarily (26), and with a very agreeable propenſity, but for the power of chuſing between two contraries; and therefore they were condemned for a doctrine, which was approved in St Auguſtin. Let us conſider how Pope Leo confutes them. ' * If it be lawful to believe and 'teach that doctrine, virtue ought no longer to be 'rewarded, nor ought vice to be puniſhed; and all 'human and divine laws may be violated with impu- 'nity; becauſe it will never be poſſible to give judg- 'ment in favour of good actions, or againſt ill 'actions, if the will is overcome by a fatal neceſ- 'ty.' (27) Now can any body doubt, (I ſtill uſe Maimbourg's words (28), without adopting all that he ſays) whether St Leo believed, what we are obliged to believe, viz. that grace does ſo influence our minds, as to lay no neceſſity upon us, and that it does not in the leaſt deprive us of our free-will or liberty of indifference, by virtue of which we may chuſe one of two things that are contrary, and do good by grace, or evil of our ſelves. I eaſily believe, that they differ from St Auguſtin in explaining the cauſes, which determine the will; but they muſt needs have agreed with him in this point, that the principle, which moves it, does not allow it to ſtop, or go back, or turn aſide. But the reaſons alledged by Pope Leo, to confute theſe Heretics, are grounded upon that very thing; it is therefore certain, that, when he condemned their doctrine, he refuted St Auguſtin, and that he could not approve the doctrine of that Father, without adopting what he had rejected in the Priſcillianiſts. I do not examine whether he argues right; I only ſay, that all the proofs he builds upon rewards and puniſhments, laws and judgments, would be wrong againſt this ſect, if they were not good againſt St Auguſtin's ſyſtem. Take notice, that St Leo argues from the conſequences of the doctrine of a fatal neceſſity; and that he does not ſay, that theſe Hereties acknowledged theſe conſequences: which ſhews, that he argued againſt the doctrine itſelf, independently of the principle on which they grounded it, and of the conſequences they actually drew from it. I make this obſervation, becauſe it confirms the text of this remark.

(25) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 65.

(26) It cannot be ſuppoſed, that any Heretic did ever deprive man of that faculty.

* Quod ſi ſit credi licuit, & deceri, nec virtutibus præmium, nec vitiis pœna debitur. Omnisque non ſolum humanarum Legum, ſed etiam divinarum Conſtitutionum decreta ſolventur. Quia neque de bonis, neque de malis actibus ullum poterit eſſe judicium, ſi in utramque partem fatalis neceſſitas motum mentis impellit. S. Leo, Epiſt. XCIII.

(27) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 66.

(28) I made uſe of his tranſlation of the words of St Leo, Ibid. pag. 65, 66.

PRODICUS, a native of Julis (a) in the iſle of Cea [A], one of the Cyclades, cotemporary with Democritus, and diſciple of Protagoras, was one of the moſt celebrated Sophiſts of Greece. He flouriſhed in the LXXXVIth Olympiad (b), and had, among other ſcholars, Euripides, Socrates (c), Theramenes (d), and Iſocrates (e). He did not ſcruple to teach in private at Athens, though he was ſent thither with the character of an ambaſſador by his countrymen, who had before conferred ſeveral other public employments upon him (f), and though one would have thought, that the glory he had gained by haranguing the Athenians,

(a) Suidas.

(b) Euſeb. in Chron.

(c) Plato, in Menone, pag. 425.

(d) Suidas.

(e) Plutarch, and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, in the Life of Iſocrates.

(f) Plato, in Hippia Maj. pag. 1246.

[A] In the iſle of Cea.] Suidas ſays in expreſs words, that Prodicus was born in that iſland, ἀπὸ Κέω τῆς νήσου, and calls him Κεῖον as he had been called by Plato (1), Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (2), Plutarch (3), Diogenes Laertius (4), &c. From Κέως comes Κεῖος, and by contraction Κῆος, which the Latins have expreſſed Ceus, Ceius, or Cius (5). Menage (6) cenſures Marſilius Ficinus with great reaſon, for rendring Πρόδικος Κεῖος in Plato, Prodicus Chius. Amyot has done the ſame in his tranſlation of the life of Iſocrates. The Latin tranſlator of Philoſtratus has committed the ſame fault; for he calls Prodicum Chium the ſame perſon whom Philoſtratus calls Πρόδικον Κῖον (7). The French tranſlator was doubtleſs more careful

(1) In Protagora, & paſſim alibi. He ſays in Hippia Majore, p. m. 1246, that Prodicus came ἐκ Κέω ex Cea Inſula.

(2) In Vita Iſocr.

(3) Ibid.

(4) In Protagora.

(5) See Weſſeling, in Iſocrat. Vitam, & Menag. in Diog. Laert. pag. 419.

(6) Ibid.

(7) In Vita Sophiſt. pag. 442.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Athenians, on the day of his public audience, ſhould have made him reſerve his talent for the like occaſions. Plato, who frequently mentions, and even praiſes him, though not without irony (g), the darling figure of Socrates, his great interlocutor, intimates, that the deſire of getting money moved Prodicus to keep ſchool; and it is certain he got a great deal by that trade. Philoſtratus (b) ſeems to be of Plato's opinion; for he ſays, that Prodicus loved money, and ſpent it for his diverſion. He went from town to town, diſplaying his eloquence; and, though he did it in a mercenary manner [B], he received great honours at Thebes, and greater ſtill at Lacedæmon. His declamation at fifty drachms [C], πεντηκοντάδραχμος, was very much talked of: ſome learned men ſay it was ſo called, becauſe each hearer was obliged to give him fifty drachms (i), which make above four French crowns. Prodicus muſt needs have had a very eloquent ſtile [D], ſince he was ſo much followed, though he had a diſagreeable

(g) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, in his letter to Pompey, blames Plato for ſpeaking ill of Prodicus, and of ſeveral others.

(b) In Vita Sophiſt. lib. i, p. 500.

(i) Hofman, in the article PRODICUS, ſays only five drachms.

careful to conſult the Latin tranſlation of Philoſtratus, than to examine the Greek text; for he renders it, Prodicus, a native of Chio. Caſeneuve, who blames him for it, and cenſures him for ſome other miſtakes (8), takes no notice of two, which deſerve to be cenſured. The Greek words run thus: Προδίκῳ δὲ τῷ Κῖῳ ὄνομα τοσοῦτον ἐπὶ σοφίᾳ ἐγένετο ὡς καὶ τὸν Γρύλλου Ξενοφῶντα ἐν Βοιωτοῖς δεσμώτην ἀκροᾶσθαι διαλεγομένου, καθιςάντα ἐγγυητὴν τῷ σώματι. The French tranſlator renders theſe words in the following manner. Prodicus, a native of Chio, and ſon of Grillus, was ſo much eſteemed, that being a priſoner in Bœotia, Xenophon was bail for him, that he might hear him. 1. Xenophon, and not Prodicus, ſhould have been called the the ſon of Gryllus. Caſeneuve ſays ſo himſelf, pag. 43; and yet, when he cenſures the verſion, pag. 42, he ſays the tranſlator ſhould have ſaid, Prodicus, a native of Cio, and ſon of Gryllus, &c. 2. It was Xenophon, and not Prodicus who was a priſoner; and yet any one, who reads this tranſlation, will think that Xenophon was bail for the priſoner Prodicus. Tho' Caſeneuve was not ignorant, that this ſophiſt was not a native of the iſle of Cio, he knew not what countryman he was; for he ſays he was born in the iſle of Cio, now called Standia. This is not true; for he was born in the iſle of Cea, or Ceos, now called Zea. Moreri, who makes him a native of the iſle of Cos (9), was led into that miſtake by ſome writers, who had more learning than he. Eraſmus calls him Coum, page 394 of his Adages. Charles Stephens does the ſame in his Dictionary, which has not been corrected by Lloyd or Hofman, neither have they amended what he falſly aſcribes to Suidas, viz. that he made Prodicus a native of the iſle of Cio. Menage (10) thinks an error has crept into the firſt chapter of the third book of Quintilian, where Prodicus is called Chius. I have not found that error in the editions I have conſulted. Maucroix, in his tranſlation of the great Hippias, printed at Paris in 1685, ſays, that Prodicus was born in the iſle of Cos. Father Goulu committed the ſame fault in the French tranſlation of Socrates's Apology. (11)

(8) Caſeneuve, Commentaire ſur les Epiſtres de Philoſtrate, pag. 42.

(9) In the Dutch edition they have put it Col: it is an error of the preſs.

(10) Menag. in Laert. p. 419.

(11) It is in the 2d part of Phyllarchus's Letters. See pag. 581.

[B] In a mercenary manner.] See Philoſtratus (12) and Plato. The latter ſays, that young men of the richeſt and nobleſt families being enticed by Prodicus, Gorgias, Polus, and Hippias, who went from town to town, gave them a great deal of money, and beſides promiſed them to remember it gratefully, whilſt they neglected to be inſtructed by their fellow-citizens, who would have taught them for nothing (13).

(12) In Vit. Sophiſt. pag. 488.

(13) Plato, in Apolog. Socr. pag. 15, 16, & in Theagen, p. 93.

[C] The declamation at fifty drachms.] I make uſe of the word declamation, without depriving myſelf of the liberty of uſing another term, if there is occaſion for it. The word ἐπίδειξις in Plato and Suidas ſeems to ſignify an harangue, wherein the author diſplays all his Rhetoric, intending to ſignalize himſelf both on account of the importance of the ſubject, and the great concourſe of hearers. Thoſe who render ἐπίδειξιν ποιεῖν, ſpecimen edere, have not a wrong notion of the thing; for they give us to underſtand, that an Orator exerts all his ſtrength, as if he were to produce a maſter-piece. I think this is the reaſon why the brighteſt orations, viz. thoſe that contain a panegyric or an invective, have been aſcribed by the Rhetoricians to the demonſtrative kind, ἐπιδεικτικὸν. However it be, there is ſome difficulty about the ἐπίδειξις πεντηκονταδράχμου of Prodicus. Suidas ſays, that Prodicus is the firſt, who made it, and does not tell us what it was: nevertheleſs Voſſius makes him ſay, that all thoſe, who had a mind to hear that Orator, gave him fifty drachms, that is, four French crowns, and two Spaniſh rials. Quanti orationes ejus fieri ſoleant, illud argüit, quod qui audire eum vellet, is, Suida teſte, quinquaginta drachmas perſolveret; hoc eſt quatuor coronatos Gallicos, ac duos inſuper regales Hiſpanicos (14). It is very likely, that Voſſius depended upon Creſollius (15), and went no farther. He makes uſe of the ſame valuation of money as that Jeſuit does; but whereas, in the book of the Jeſuit, the ſum of four crowns and two rials, paid to Prodicus by each hearer, is only an explication of Suidas's words, or a conſequence drawn from them, it is in Voſſius a formal teſtimony of Suidas. Judge how cautious one ought to be in reading ordinary authors, ſince ſuch a man as Voſſius takes ſuch a liberty. Let us ſee what he had ſaid in another book (16). He had related, as a matter of fact taken from Ariſtotle, that when Prodicus perceived, that his hearers did not mind what he ſaid, he uſed to propoſe to them ſomething relating to his art, which he would not teach for leſs than fifty drachms. The paſſage of Ariſtotle ſeems capable of two ſenſes; one is, that Prodicus had an oration full of ſuch lively ſtrokes, that ſome of them were ſufficient to expel the drowſineſs of the hearers; the other is, that he had a treatiſe of Rhetoric, which contained ſeveral ſecrets proper to excite the attention of the hearers, though they were never ſo weary. Τέτο δ' ἐςὶν, ὥσπερ ἔφη Πρόδικος, ὅτε νυςάζοιεν οἱ ἀκροαταὶ παρεμβάλλειν τὴς πεντηκονταδράχμε αὐτοῖς. Hoc autem eſt, ut dixit Prodicus, cum dormitant auditores, inferre aliquid demonſtrationis quinquaginta drachmarum ipſis (17). According to the firſt ſenſe, he had made an oration, which he kept for the beſt days that is for ſuch hearers as gave him fifty drachms; and, according to the ſecond ſenſe, he had a collection of good remedies to keep his hearers from ſleeping, which he imparted to none but thoſe who gave him that price. Which puts me in mind of a famous profeſſor of Philoſophy (18) among the Proteſtants of France, who would not teach certain ſophiſms, unleſs he was paid according to the price he ſet on them. Voſſius keeps to the firſt ſenſe in one of his books, and to the ſecond in another. It were no eaſy thing to determine which of the two is the trueſt, conſidering that Ariſtotle and Suidas have affected to be very ſhort upon this ſubject: but Plato acquaints us, that Prodicus's ἐπίδειξις πεντηκονταδράχμος was rather a lecture, than an oration. Socrates complains, in a bantering way, that he is not able to diſcourſe well of the nature of names, becauſe he had not heard the ἐπίδειξις of fifty drachms, which, according to Prodicus, diſcovered the whole myſtery; he had only heard that of one drachm, τὴν δραχμιαίαν (19). Creſollius did not underſtand this laſt word: He took it to be the ſame thing, in Plato, with what was called before πεντηκονλάδραχμος. Plato qui rem eamdem memorat, ea cauſa δραχμιαίαν ἐπίδειξιν nominavit (20). Madam Dacier, in her notes upon Ariſtophanes's comedy; intituled, The Clouds, page 235, had a better notion of the thing. Prodicus, ſays ſhe, was an extraordinary vain man, and had ſo good an opinion of his own learning, that he never taught any thing gratis. He had diſcourſes ready made of all prices, from an obolus to fifty drachms.

(14) Voſſius, de Rhetor. natura, p.g. 69.

(15) Creſol. Theatr. Rhetorum, lib. iii, cap. v, pag. 178.

(16) Voſſius, Inſtitut. Orator. lib. iii, cap. ii.

(17) Ariſtot. Rhetor. lib. iii, cap. xiv.

(18) David Deroudon.

(19) Νῦν δὲ οὐκ ἀκήκοα, ἀλλὰ τὴν δραχμιαίαν. Plato, in Cratylo, pag. 265.

(20) Creſollius, ubi ſupra.

[D] A very eloquent ſtile.] This may be proved by the teſtimony of ſeveral grave authors. Maximus Tyrius (21) ſays, that the beauty of expreſſion, καλλιλογίαν, was Prodicus's true character. According to Marcellinus (22), he made an exact choice of his words. Themiſtius ſays, that his orations were full of ornaments and charms, πολυτελεῖς τε καὶ γέμοντας ἡδονῆς. I think Naudæus (23) had no good reaſon to place him among the Sophiſts, who made ſpeeches

(21) Diſſert. VII. init.

(22) In the Life of Thucydides, who ſays, that he imitated τὴν τοῦ Προδίκε εἰς τοὺς ὀνόματος ακριβολογίαν.

(23) Synt. de Studio Liber. p. 87, in the collection of diſſertations de Studiis inſtituendis, printed in 1645, where there is Prodichum Chium. The laſt fault is, without doubt, Naudæus's.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

disagreeable voice (k). It is said, that Xenophon being a prisoner in Bœotia [E], and desiring to hear him (l), satisfied his curiosity, having found a person, who was bail for him. Few harangues have been so much quoted, or have occasioned so many applications, as that, wherein our sophist feigned that virtue [F], and pleasure, disguised like women, came to Hercules and strove which should gain him. The Athenians put him to death as a corrupter of youth (m). Had it been no other corruption than that, mentioned by Aristophanes, in one of his Comedies (n), when he said, this man has been spoiled by reading of books, or by Prodicus, or by the conversation of great talkers, the punishment would have been a little too severe; but it is not improbable he was accused of teaching his scholars Atheism [G]. I do not know, whether any author besides Plutarch says, that he was a man of a weak and sickly constitution [H].

(k) Δυσήκοον καὶ βαρὺ φθεγγόμενος, dissonè & injucundè loquens. Philostr. pag. 500. See also Plato, in Protag. pag. 220.

(l) Philostr. pag. 499.

(m) Ἐν διαφθορᾷ κώμιον ποιῶν ἀποθανεῖν ὑπὸ τῶν νέων. Athenis hausta cicuta mortuus est quasi juvenes corrumperet. Suidas.

(n) Id. Suid.

speeches without any preparation upon any subject proposed to them. The quite contrary may be inferred from what we read in the lives of the Sophists, written by Philostratus, page 487, that Gorgias was the first, who went through that trial, and that he did it, to eclipse the glory Prodicus had acquired by going from town to town, and reciting elaborate speeches. Being willing to go beyond that Orator, whom he laughed at on account of his frequently repeating the same pieces (24), he resolved to try what he could do without preparation. We need not doubt, that the beautiful stile of Prodicus's speeches was attended with subtil thoughts, and that he contributed, at least as much as any body else, to the Athenians forbidding the Sophists to plead causes. They could no longer bear, that the subtilties of those men should make that appear just, which was unjust (25). See the Proverb, Πρόδικος σοφώτερος, more knowing than Prodicus. Erasmus was mistaken in believing, that this proverb was not meant of Prodicus the Sophist but of another. See how he is censured for it in Casneuve's Notes upon Philostratus's Letters, page 42, 43. See also The Clouds of Aristophanes. Notwithstanding the railleries of that Poet, it may be inferred from what he says, that our Sophist was accounted a man of a great deal of wit and learning.

(24) Ἐπικόπτων τὸν Πρόδικον ὡς ἴωλά τε καὶ πολλάκις εἰρημένα ἀγορεύοντα ἐπαθήκεν ἑαυτὸν τῷ ψαιρῷ. Philostr. pag. 488.

(25) Ibid.

[E] Xenophon being a prisoner in Bœotia.] Charles Stephens did not understand that passage of Philostratus. He explains it as if that author had said, that Prodicus was so considerable a man, that Xenophon, being apprehended in Bœotia, obtained leave to go home, because Prodicus was bail for him. Lloyd and Hofman have retained that mistake of Charles Stephens word for word.

[F] The harangue, wherein Prodicus feigned that virtue] I make use of the word harangue, not only because Philostratus gives me that notion of it, but also because Prodicus's profession leads one to it. It is not unlikely such a fiction might be the subject of a declamation. However, it is true that Xenophon (26), who gives us the substance of it, speaks of it as of a piece written concerning Hercules, ἐν τῷ συγγράμματι τῷ περὶ τὸν Ἡρακλέους. What Mr Charpentier says of it is more particular; In the book, says he, which the learned Prodicus wrote concerning the life of Hercules. Suidas tells us, that it was a book intituled Ὧραι, the hours: nevertheless, that work of Prodicus may be called an harangue. I have said, that this fiction has been frequently quoted, and has occasioned many explications: and I have good reasons to say so, Cicero (27), Quintilian (28), and Maximus Tyrius (29) speak of it; but Silius Italicus, quoted by Moreri, says nothing of it. He feigns something like it in honour of Scipio Africanus. Lucian also has imitated that fiction (30). Among the moderns, I shall only quote Henry Stephens, who mentions it in his exhortation, prefixed to the Greek translation of the Catechism of Geneva (31).

(26) Lib. ii, de memor. Socratis.

(27) Cicero, Officior. lib. i, cap. xxxii, Epistol. XII, ad Famil. lib. v.

(28) Quintil. lib. ix, cap. ii.

(29) Maxim. Tyr. Orat. IV, init.

(30) Lucian. in Somnio.

[G] He was accused of teaching his scholars Atheism.] Sextus Empiricus ranks him among Atheists (32). Cicero does the same, though not so directly; for he says that Prodicus affirmed, that human gratitude had occasioned the belief of the existence of the gods. This is no less contrary to sound Theology, than if one should say, as some have done, Primus in orbe Deos fecit timor, fear has brought religion into the world: or, as others would have it, religion was invented by wise Politicians to keep people in awe. Cicero shews, that Prodicus's opinion is destructive of religion. ‘Quid? ii qui dixerunt totam de Diis immortalibus ‘opinionem fictam esse ab hominibus sapientibus Rei- ‘pub. causâ, ut quos ratio non posset, eos ad officium ‘religio duceret, nonne omnem religionem funditùs ‘sustulerunt? Quid Prodicus Chius? qui ea quæ pro- ‘dessent hominum vitæ Deorum in numero habita esse ‘dixit, quam tandem religionem reliquit (33)? - - - - ‘Do not those, who pretend, that the belief of a GOD ‘is the meer fiction of politic men, for the good of the ‘public, utterly destroy all religion? What religion did ‘Prodicus the Cbian leave, when he said, that those ‘things, which are profitable to the life of man, are ‘reckoned in the number of the gods?

(31) Beroher, in his Scholia upon that passage of Henry Stephens, makes Prodicus a native of the isle of Cos, or of the isle of Chios, and since he says that he was a man formæ auctoritatis, he shews, that he ran into the mistake of Charles Stephens's Dictionary.

(32) Sext. Empir. adv. Math.

(33) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, circa fin. pag. m. 170.

[H] He was of a weak and sickly constitution.] Plutarch observes, that when a public employment is to be conferred, the vigour of a man should be considered, and not his age; and that, therefore a robust old man ought not to be excused from it, as it was reasonable to dispense with Prodicus in his youth. It is upon this occasion that he acquaints us with that Sophist's infirmity. He couples him with a man so lean and so weak (34), that the passage deserves to be set down. (35) And therefore, as he who would advise the Sophist Prodicus, or the Poet Philetas, who were both young, but thin, lean, and sickly (36), and kept their bed the greatest part of the time, to concern themselves with public affairs, would be senseless; so would those be, who should forbid such old men as Phocion, Massinissa the African, and Cato the Roman to exercise public offices.

graciles & ob infirmitatem valetudinis crebro decumbentes. Ibid.

(34) See the article PHILETAS.

(35) Plut. an senì sit gerenda Respublica, pag. 791, E.

(36) Νέοις μὲν, ἰσχνοῖς δὲ καὶ νοσώδεσι καὶ τὰ πολλὰ κλινοστρώτοις δ' ἀδύνατον ἦν τὰς ἀλλοτρίας ἄρχειν. Integra quidem ætate verum

PRODICUS, an Heretic of the IId century (a), founder of the sect of the Adamites, followed the abominable opinions of Carpocrates, to which he added the impudence of public copulation of both sexes [A]; for he ordered, that women should be in common: so that, at a public feast, every man took the first woman he lighted upon, after the candles were removed; and leudness was accounted the mystical ceremony of the initiation (b). Those who are endued with the least spark of piety, are struck with horror, when they see, that, so soon after the death of the Apostles, the doctrine of the mystical union, which ought to be among the faithful, was understood of the carnal copulation of men and women, and that those Heretics durst affirm, that the true participation of mysteries consisted in that. What could be expected from such a man as Prodicus, who believed, that human souls were sent into bodies, not in order to

(a) See the remark [A], in the article ADAMITES.

(b) Theodor. Hæret. Fab. lib. i, cap. vi, & lib. v, c. xxvii.

[A] To which he added the impudence of public copulation of both sexes.] Here are Theodoret's words. Οὗτος προσφανῶς λαγνεύειν τοῖς Καρποκράτους προσέθεικε δόγμασι. Hic ad decreta Carpocratis adjecit palam & publicè scortari (1). The only proof Theodoret alledges for it is, that Prodicus ordered a community of women; that is to say, that, in the meals which the ancient Christians called Ἀγάπαι, every man should enjoy a woman, as chance should bring them together in the darkness of the room. This they

(1) Theod. Hæret. Fabul. lib. i, cap. vi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(c) Idem, lib. v, cap. x, & xx. (d) Clem. Alexand. Strom. lib. i, pag. 304. I shall observe in the remark [H] to be punished, but to pay homage to the angels, who had created the world, by all manner of sensuality (c)? The followers of Prodicus boasted, that they had the secret books of Zoroaster (d), and maintained, that God was not to be prayed to (e), and that no man ought to expose himself to martyrdom by confessing the truth (f).

(f) Tertull. in Scorpiac. cap. ult.

(e) Ibid. lib. vii, pag. 724.

of the article ZOROASTER, that the words of Clemens Alexandrinus are equivocal.

they called communicating, and being initiated into the mystery. I do not find, that Theodoret had any reason to ascribe this additional doctrine to Prodicus, since Clemens Alexandrinus, on whose credit he speaks, imputes (2) the whole matter to Carpocrates; for, having mentioned upon a meer hear-say, and not as a thing to be found in their writings, the infamous custom of removing the candles, and lying one with another, he says, that Carpocrates should have established those laws for dogs, hogs, and goats: and therefore Clemens Alexandrinus did not believe, that Carpocrates had left them to the care of some of his successors; for instance, to Prodicus. Thus Theodoret alledges an author, who is against him. That author observes, that the men, before they went to those feasts, acquainted the women, whom they had a mind to lie with, that they made choice of them. Μελετήσαντας δὲ ἐν τοιαύτῃ ἀγάπῃ τὴν κοινωνίαν, μεθ' ἡμέραν ἤδη παρ' ὧν ἂν ἐθελήσωσι γυναικῶν ἀπαιτεῖν τὴν τῶ Καρποκρατείω· (ἐ γὰρ θέμις εἰπεῖν θείω·) νόμε ὑπακοήν. Meditatos autem in ejusmodi agape communionem, interdiu jam, à quibus velint mulieribus exigere Carpocrateæ (divinæ enim nefas est dicere) legis obedientiam (3). Which is likely enough: The passions are too ingenious to be inactive on such occasions, and to refer the whole matter to chance. The Carpocratians knew therefore, pretty near, who should fall to their share, and were not wholly in the case, mentioned by a Roman Poet.

(2) Stromat. lib. iii, p. 430.

(3) Ibid.

Mox juniores quærit adulteros
Inter mariti vina: neque eligit
Cui donet impermissa raptim
Gaudia luminibus remotis:
Sed jussa coram non sine conscio
Surgit marito: seu vocat institor,
Seu navis Hispanæ magister,
Dedecorum pretiosus emtor (4).

(4) Horace, Od. VI, lib. III.

Marry'd, their lessons she improves
By practice of adulterous loves,
And scorns the common mean design,
To take advantage of her husband's wine;
Or snatch in some dark place
A hasty illegitimate embrace.
No! the bribed husband knows of all,
And bids her rise, when lovers call:
Hither a merchant from the Streights,
Grown wealthy by forbidden freights,
Or city Cannibal repairs,
Who feeds upon the flesh of heirs.
Convenient brutes! whose tributary flame
Pays the full price of lust, and gilds the slighted shame.
Lord ROSCOMMON.

I must add, that Theodoret is not so exact, as he should have been, in quoting Clemens Alexandrinus about another circumstance. He makes him say of Prodicus, what is properly and directly said of some others, and cannot be applied to Prodicus, but in general, and with several indirect arguments.

PRUDENTIUS, in Latin Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, a Christian Poet, was born in the year 348 [A] in Spain; but it is disputed whether it was at Calahorra, or Saragossa, or in another town of that country [B]. Those who say that he was [A] He was born in the year 348.] This appears from these words:

Hæc dum vita volans agit
Inrepsit subito canities seni,
Oblitum veteris me Saliæ Consulis arguens
Sub quo prima dies mihi (1).

(1) Prudent. in Prolog. Oper.

Whilst thus my fleeting being hastes away,
Old age creeps sudden on, and marks me gray:
Old Salia's consulship's forgotten quite,
The year, in which I first beheld the light.

The meaning of which is, that he was born under Salia's consulship; but we find, that the consuls of the year 348 were Flavius Philippus, and Flavius Sallia, or Sallea (2). Observe that, those who make him flourish in the year 380 (3), are as much mistaken, as those, who make him flourish in the year 430 (4).

(2) Onuphrius, on the 3d book of the Fasti, shews by an inscription, that his name was Sallea.

[B] It is disputed whether it was at Calahorra, or at Saragossa, or in another town of that country.] Aldus Manutius, Sixtus Senensis, Possevin, and some others, make him a native of Saragossa; but Mariana maintains, that he was born at Calahorra (5). They alledge for the first opinion the hymn in honorem sanctorum decem & octo Martyrum Cæsaraugustanorum (6), which begins thus:

(3) Sixtus Senensis is censured for it by Father Labbe, de Script. Eccles. Tom. ii, pag. 794.

(4) Biblioth. Hisp. p. 205.

(5) Mariana, Hist. Hisp. lib. iv, cap. xvii.

Bis novem NOSTER populus sub uno
Martyrum servat cineres sepulchro:
Cæsaraugustam vocitamus urbem
Res cui tanta est.

(6) It is the 4th of the book περὶ Στεφάνων.

MY country-men, with pious zeal, give room
To twice nine martyrs ashes in one tomb.
Cæsar Augusta is the city's name,
Which only can so great an honour claim.

We read the following passage in the same hymn:

NOSTER est quamvis procul hinc in urbe
Passus ignota dederit sepulchri
Gloriam victor, prope litus altæ
Forte Sagunti.
NOSTER, & NOSTRA puer in palæstra,
Arte virtutis, fideique olivo
Unctus, horrendum didicit domare
Viribus hostem (7).

(7) Prudent. ib. Hymn. IV, ver. 97.

Tho' martyr'd in a foreign land he dye,
The conqueror, perhaps, will not deny
On fam'd Saguntum's shore his corpse interr'd to lye.
OUR country-man, 'midst us he did a hero grow,
And learn'd, with th' oil of faith, to triumph o'er the foe.

Prudentius speaks of St Vincent, who was born at Saragossa. A like proof is alledged for the second opinion; for these two verses are to be found in the hymn, in honorem sanctorum Martyrum Hemiterii & Chelidonii Calagurritanorum (8):

Hoc bonum salvator ipse, quo fruamur, præstitit
Martyrum cum membra NOSTRO consecravit oppido (9).

(8) It is the first of the book Περὶ Στεφάνων.

(9) Id. Hymn. I, ver. 115.

This good our Saviour's bounty did bestow,
From him alone our happiness does flow,
Who kindly to OUR city doth decree
The blood of martyrs slain shou'd sacred be.

And in the very hymn for the martyrs of Saragossa we read this:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was made conſul, are groſly miſtaken [C]. They ſhould only have ſaid, that he had a very conſiderable office (a). He was fifty-ſeven years of age when he betook himſelf to write Poems upon matters of religion. He had been an advocate, and then a judge, afterwards a ſoldier, and at laſt he had a noble employment at court [D]. He does not deny that he was a looſe man in his youth (b). There is more zeal for religion, than poetical ornaments, in his works (c). He did not always obſerve the rules

(a) See the remark [D].

(b) Ibid.

(c) Melior omnino Chriſtianus, quam Poëta, meo judicio. Lilius Gregor. Gyraldus, Dialogiſmo xxv, pag. 906, Tom. ii, Oper. See alſo the ſame Gyraldus, in Poët. Hiſtoria, pag. 290.

NOSTRA geſtabit Calagurris ambos
Quos veneramur (10).

OUR Calahorra both ſhall bear,
Whom we revere.

(10) Id. Hymn. IV, ver. 31.

Mariana made uſe of thoſe two paſſages; but the author (11), who wrote againſt him, ſhews, that, if they afforded a good proof, they would be inſignificant for that very reaſon, becauſe they cannot be ſolid, without the paſſages brought for the contrary opinion be ſo too. In a word, Thoſe reaſons prove too much, and conſequently prove nothing. He confutes Mariana and Aldus Manutius's arguments reciprocally one by the other, and ſays, that, though Prudentius was not born at Saragoſſa, nor at Calahorra, he might call them noſtra, becauſe they were ſituated in Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, his native country. He confirms his opinion by two remarks (12): One is taken from theſe words concerning Tarragona:

(11) Pedro Mantuano, Advertencias à la Hiſtoria de Juan de Mariana, pag. 82, & ſeq.

O triplex honor, o triforme culmen
Quo NOSTRÆ caput excitatur urbis
Cunctis urbibus eminens Hiberis (13).

(12) Ib. p. 85.

O triple honour, triple height of fame,
Which thus, above all elſe, exalts OUR city's name!

(13) Prudent. Hymn. VI, ver. 142.

The other is grounded upon this, that Prudentius, who ſays many things of Merida, where St Eulalia was born, does not call it noſtra; becauſe, ſays he, it was not in Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, but in Hiſpania Luſitanica. Obſerve that he is miſtaken concerning thoſe words, noſtra puer in palæſtra: he (14) underſtood them of Valencia (15), where St Vincent ſuffered martyrdom; but it is plain they are meant of Saragoſſa, where he was born and bred up.

(14) Pedro Mantuano, ubi ſupra, p. 84, 85.

(15) A town in Hiſpania Tarraconenſis.

This Critic is better at pulling down than at building up; for, when he goes about to prove, that Salia, in the Aſturias, is Prudentius's birth-place, he alledges no good reaſon for it, though he ſhews a great deal of ingenious learning. His chief argument is built upon theſe words; oblitum veteris me Saliæ Conſulis (16). He pretends (17), that if veteris refers to Conſulis, there would have been two conſuls called Salia, one before the other, and Prudentius muſt have been born under the conſulſhip of the firſt. But it is not true, that there was a Salia major and a Salia minor, as there was a Scipio Africanus major, and a Scipio Africanus minor. This objection would have ſome force, if Prudentius was very exact in the choice of his words. But, after all, if we refer veteris to a town, as Pedro Mantuano will have it, what will become of the word Conſulis? His ſaying (18) that it ſignifies a year, will never be a ſatisfactory explication.

(16) See the remark [A].

(17) Ib. p. 87.

(18) Ib. p. 90.

(19) Aldus, in Vita Prudentii.

(20) See Father Chamillard upon Prudentius, p. 1.

(21) Ibid.

(22) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. Tom. iii, p. 6, of the Dutch Edit.

(25) That is, oblitum veteris me Saliæ, &c.

(24) See his Diſſertation de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. ii, p. 793.

(25) Pedro Mantuano, ubi ſupra, p. 86, 87.

[C] Thoſe, who ſay, that he was made conſul, are groſly miſtaken.] Aldus Manutius (19) calls him Vir Conſularis, and Maſſaliæ Conſul. His miſtake proceeds from not rightly underſtanding the letters V. C. added to the names of Prudentius, and from reading in his manuſcript oblitum veteris Meſſaliæ conſulis arguens, whereas it ſhould be me Saliæ. The two letters V. C. ſignify Vir Clariſſimus, as Alciatus obſerves (20), and not Vir Conſularis, a title that was grown out of uſe at that time (21). Here follows a paſſage of Mr du Pin. ‘ (22) Moſt authors have not underſtood this paſſage (23), and ſome, as Aldus Manutius, Sixtus Senenſis, Poſſevin, and even Father Labbe, thought he had been conſul of a town called Meſſalia, which Father Labbe (24) fancies to be Marſeilles. It is a blunder. They took the name of the conſul Salia, who was conſul with Philippus in 348, for the name of a town, and aſcribed to Prudentius the title of conſul, which belongs to Salia, under whoſe conſulſhip Prudentius came into the world.’ The author, who criticizes Mariana (25), confutes Antonius Nebriſſenſis, who thinks, that Prudentius was born under Meſſalia's conſulſhip: he ſhews, there was no conſul of that name, from the beginning of Dioclesian's reign to the time of Anaſtaſius. He confutes Aldus, who believed that Prudentius had been conſul of Meſſalia (26): he ſhews, there is no ſuch conſul in the Faſti Conſulares, and that the ancient authors never mentioned a town called Meſſalia. There was indeed a town called Maſſilia, and now Marſeilles. But, ſays he, ever ſince the diviſion of the empire under Conſtantine, it was an uſual thing to elect a conſul at Rome, and another at Conſtantinople, or both at Rome, and then both at Conſtantinople; and ſometimes two at Rome, and two at Conſtantinople at the ſame time; but it does not appear, that any of the weſtern conſuls did ever reſide at Marſeilles. It is ſufficient to ſay, that, if Prudentius had been conſul, he would have ſaid ſo in the paſſage which may be ſeen at the beginning of the following remark.

(26) It ſhould be Maſſilia.

[D] He was fifty-ſeven years of age when he betook himſelf . . . . . He had been an advocate, and at laſt he had a noble employment at court.] He himſelf gives us a ſhort account of his life, without forgetting the leudneſs of his youth.

Per qninquennia jam decem,
Ni fallor fuimus; ſeptimus inſuper
Annum cardo rotat, dum fruimur ſole volubili.
Inſtat terminus, & diem
Vicinum ſenio jam Deus adplicat.
Quid nos utile tanti ſpatio temporis egimus?
Ætas prima crepantibus
Flevit ſub ferulis: mox docuit toga
Infectum vitiis falſa loqui, non ſine crimine:
Tum laſciva protervitas,
Et luxus petulans (heu pudet ac piget!)
Fœdavit juvenem nequitiæ ſordibus ac luto.
Exin jurgia turbidos
Armarunt animos, & male pertinax
Vincendi ſtudium ſubjacuit caſibus aſperis.
Bis legum moderamine
Frenos nobilium reximus urbium:
Jus civile bonis reddidimus, terruimus reos.
Tandem militiæ gradu
Evectum pietas Principis extulit,
Adſumptum propius ſtare jubens ordine proximo (27).

(27) Prudent. in Prologo Operum.

Ten Luſtra, with ſeven added years,
Are paſt, and roll'd away,
Since firſt my eyes beheld the ſun,
And open'd on the day.

Life's limit almoſt I approach;
Old age is ſtealing on;
In all this ſpace of fleeting time,
What good thing have I done?

The tyrant's laſh my boyiſh age
For manhood did prepare;
Inſtructed them in all the quirks
Of the evaſive bar.

Then wantonneſs and luxury
(Of which I now repent)
Into my ſoul of every vice
The ſtrong infection ſent.

Next broils, and fierce contention's rage,
Arm'd every angry thought;
And many hazards, many ills,
Deſire of conqueſt brought.

Twice

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google rules of quantity; beſides, he does not appear to be orthodox in all his opinions [E]: the liberty he took in ſaying, that few people are damned, would not be born with at preſent.

Twice with the righteous rein of law
Two cities I controll'd;
Encourag'd good and modeſt men,
But ſhock'd the bad and bold.

At length, to military rank
Rais'd by my prince's hand,
He kindly bad me nearer to
His royal perſon ſtand.

He bethought himſelf ſomewhat late, though not too late (28), of renouncing the vanities of the world, and making pious verſes. It may be a queſtion, whether his publiſhing the debaucheries of his youth will be of advantage to all his readers. A young debauchee, who may reply to thoſe who reprove him, Prudentius, that pious and devout Poet, did as I do when he was young, I will do as he did when I come to be fifty-ſeven years of age, makes a very bad anſwer; and yet it appears to him ſolid, and lulls him aſleep in his ſins.

(28) Nam ſera numquam eſt ad bonos mores via, Quem pœnitet peccaſſe pene eſt innocens. - - - - For it is never too late to reform: he who repents of having ſinned, is almoſt innocent. Seneca, in Agamemn. Act. II, ver. 342, pag. m. 262.

[E] He does not appear orthodox in all his opinions.] He ſays expreſsly, that the damned have a day of reſt every year, and that it is the day, on which our Saviour came out of hell. How came he to know this?

Sunt & ſpiritibus ſæpe nocentibus
Pœnarum celebres ſub Styge feriæ,
Illa nocte, ſacer qua rediit Deus
Stagnis ad ſuperos ex Acheronticis (29):

The damn'd have reſt from pain, their tortures ſtay,
And hell's inhabitants keep holiday;
On that bleſt night, in which the Son of God
From out thoſe gloomy realms in triumph rode.

(29) Prudent. Hymn. V. Cathemer. ver. 225, p. m. 21.

Marcent ſuppliciis Tartara mitibus,
Exſultatque ſui carceris otio
Umbrarum populus liber ab ignibus:
Nec fervent ſolito flumina ſulphure (30).

The puniſhments of Tartarus abate,
And, free from penal fires, their diſmal fate,
The airy people a ſhort reſpite know,
Nor the dire ſtreams with uſual ſulphur flow.

(30) Ib. ver. 233.

He affirms in another place, that GOD damns but few people.

Quæſitor ille ſolus
Animæque corporiſque,
Enſiſque bis timendus
Prima ac ſecunda mors eſt.
Idem tamen benignus
Ultor retundit iram,
Paucoſque non piorum
Patitur perire in ævum (31.)

He only ſearches out the heart,
The lord of life and death,
The ſword that twice is to be fear'd,
The firſt and ſecond death.

Yet he, in mercy to mankind,
Puts th' edge of juſtice by,
And of th' ungodly ſuffers few
Eternally to die.

(31) Ib. Hymn. VI, ver. 89, p. 24.

He is very much blamed for deſiring, not the glory of heaven, but the ſtate of a man, whoſe ſufferings are not exceſſive. He ſays, he will be contented, provided his ſoul be not caſt into the deepeſt dungeon of hell; and deſires no better fate after the reſurrection (32).

Multa in theſauris Patris eſt habitatio, Chriſte,
Diſparibus diſcreta locis, non poſco beatâ
In regione domum: ſint illic caſta virorum
Agmina, pulvereum quæ dedignantia cenſum
Divitias petiere tuas: ſit flore perenni
Candida virginitas, animum caſtrata reciſum.
At mihi Tartarei ſatis eſt ſi nulla miniſtri
Occurrat facies, avidæ nec flamma Gehennæ
Devoret hanc animam, merſam fornacibus imis.
Eſto: cavernoſo, quia ſic pro labe neceſſe eſt
Corporeâ, triſtis me ſorbeat ignis Averno:
Saltem mirificos incendia lenta vapores
Exhalent; æſtuque calor languente tepeſcat.
Lux immenſa alios, & tempora vincta coronis
Glorificent: me pœna levis clementer adurat (33).

(32) See the Bibl. Univerſ. Tom. xii, pag. 286, 287.

In heav'n, thy father's dwelling-place, O Chriſt,
Are many manſions. In that happy region
I aſk not to be plac'd: be there the ſouls
Of thoſe, who, bravely ſcorning worldly gain,
Have ſought thy riches: there be plac'd the chaſt,
Eunuchs in mind. For me, if heaven conſent,
That no dark miniſter of hell approach me,
Nor its devouring flames enwrap my ſoul,
I'm ſatisfied. But ſince the ſtains of guilt
Require purgation in annealing fires,
O! Let ſome milder flame, with languid heat,
Gently exhale, and purge away my crimes,
Let others at a crown of glory aim:
I aſk but lighter puniſhment at beſt.

(33) Prudent. in Hamartigenia, ſub fin. p. 227.

Dr Perkins, a Proteſtant Divine, ſays this is an impious prayer, and that it ought not to be aſcribed to Prudentius (34). He is not the only one who thinks that it is a piece added to his Hamartigenia. However it be, Victor Giſelinus, a Catholic writer, highly condemns this prayer, in a work (35) that is very much commended by Poſſevin (36). Obſerve that it is to be found as a genuine piece in the moſt exact editions (37); whereas ſome verſes, that are accounted ſuppoſititious, have been left out. You will not find in Heinſius's edition, as in that of Sichardus, the third Strophe of the hymn falſly intituled, Ad incenſum cerei Paſchalis (38). That title, and that Strophe, not being in the beſt manuſcripts, have been left out as ſuppoſititious pieces. The prayer, that is at the end of the Hamartigenia, would likewiſe have been expunged, if there had been any reaſons to believe that it was not genuine. But here is a hereſy, of which he cannot be cleared by denying the thing: he believed the materiality of the ſoul.

(34) Dictum impium & non tribuendum Prudentio ait noſter Perkinſius. Rivet, Crit. Sacri, lib. iii, cap. xxvi, p. 1123, Tom. ii, Oper.

(35) In his Notes upon Prudentius.

(36) See Rivet, ubi ſupra.

(37) For inſtance, that of Nicolas Heinſius.

Reſciſſa ſed iſta (39) ſeorſum
Solvunt hominem perimuntque:
Humus excipit arida corpus,
Animæ rapit aura LIQUOREM (40).

When ſoul and body by the hand
Of death divided are,
The body to the duſt returns,
The liquid ſoul to AIR.

(38) It is the 5th of the Cathemerinon.

(39) That is, the body and the ſoul.

(40) Prudent. Hymn. X. Cathemerin. ver. 9.

The following verſes make it plain, that he means a material ſubſtance by Animæ liquorem.

Non occidet, inquit,
Interior qui ſpirat homo: luet ille perenne
Supplicium, quod ſubjectos male rexerit artus.
Nec mihi difficile eſt LIQUIDAM circumdare flammis
Naturam, quamvis PERFLABILIS illa feratur
Inſtar Noti: capiam tamen, & tormenta adhibebo (41).

Th' interior man, he ſays, will never die,
But bear eternal puniſhment in hell.
I can conceive a liquid nature, tho'
Impaſſive as the wind, by flames encompaſs'd,
Suffer eternal burnings.

(41) Id. contra Symmach. lib. ii, ver. 184.

Mr le

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

preſent. It might be of ſome uſe to him, in anſwering the objections of the Marcionites againſt whom he wrote a poem; but, at the bottom, he could not clear up by it the difficulties concerning the origin of evil [F]. There are ſeveral editions of his works

Mr le Clerc obſerves (42), that theſe words of Prudentius, Animæ rapit aura liquorem, do naturally ſignify the mortality of the ſoul, and that an Epicurean would not expreſs himſelf better. It is certain, that this verſe, and the foregoing, explain a doctrine which is to be found in the books of ſeveral Pagan authors concerning the characters of death (43). It is, ſaid they, the reſolution of a compound into its principles, each of which returns to the place from which it came, the body into the earth, the ſoul into the air or the æther. If we conſider how Lucretius expreſſes himſelf on this head, it will appear, that Prudentius might be looked upon as his abridger.

(42) Le Clerc, Biblioth. Univerſelle, Tom. xii, pag. 166.

(43) See, in the article AMPHIARAUS, citat. (35), what I have quoted out of Epicharmus.

Denique cœleſti ſumus omnes ſemine oriundi,
Omnibus ille idem Pater eſt, unde alma liquenteis
Humorum guttas Mater cum Terra recepit
Fœta parit nitidas fruges, arbuſtaque læta,
Et genus humanum (44)
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Cedit item retro de Terra quod fuit ante,
In terras: & quod miſſum 'ſt ex Ætheris oris,
Id rurſum Cœli rellatum templa receptant:
Nec ſic interimit mors res, ut Materiaï
Corpora conficiat, ſed cœtum diſſupat ollis (45).

(44) You will find it in citat. (58), of the article JUPITER.

(45) Lucret. lib. II, ver. 990.

Laſtly, we all from ſeed cœleſtial riſe,
Which heav'n, our common parent, ſtill ſupplies.
From him the earth receives enlivening rain,
And ſtrait ſhe bears bird, tree, and beaſt, and man.
. . . . . .
And ſo each part returns, when bodies die,
What came from earth to earth, what from the ſky
Drops down, aſcends again, and mounts on high.
For death does not deſtroy, but diſunite
The ſeeds, and change their order and their ſite.

CREECH.

(46) See the remark [R], of the article LUCRETIUS.

(47) And alſo in ſome other books. See Mr le Clerc, ubi ſupra.

But, though theſe two Poets agree in their expreſſions, their notions are quite different. The return of the ſoul to its principle was a true death, according to Lucretius (46), but not according to all other Heathens, and leſs ſtill according to Prudentius, who ſoon after (47) explains himſelf ſo poſitively, that one cannot doubt of his believing the immortality of the ſoul.

I deſire I may be allowed to ſay, that Dr Perkins's judgment ſeems too ſevere to thoſe, who have a regard to equity and charity. They think, that this Poet was willing to be deprived of happineſs in heaven, and to ſuffer a moderate puniſhment after this life, becauſe he looked upon himſelf as a man unworthy of the ſupream beatitude, and too worthy of puniſhment. Is ſuch an humility impious? May not one call it a ſacrifice of himſelf to the divine juſtice?

[F] He could not clear up by it the difficulties concerning the origin of evil.] I have propoſed them in ſeveral places of this Dictionary (48); but, in order to ſhew, that the Philoſophers are not the only men, who mention thoſe objections, I ſhall ſet down a long paſſage of a learned Divine. ‘ (49) The Manichees and ‘ the Marcionites raiſed an objection againſt, the or- ‘ thodox, mentioned by Prudentius (50), in its full ‘ ſtrength, viz. That, if the God, who governs the ‘ world, was not pleaſed with vice, he would prevent ‘ it, ſince he is not ignorant of the corruption of ‘ men, and is able to prevent it. They pretended, ‘ that it is one and the ſame thing, to do evil, or to ‘ ſuffer it, if one can hinder it. Prudentius anſwers, ‘ in the firſt place, that God is not pleaſed with vice, ‘ ſince he has appointed a remedy for it, and ſaves ‘ thoſe, who abſtain from it. But, replied thoſe Here- ‘ tics, a man cannot ſin againſt God's will, ſince he ‘ is the maſter of our hearts, and inclines them as he ‘ thinks fit. Our Poet, in order to reſolve this diffi- ‘ culty, has only recourſe to free-will, without which ‘ there can be neither vice nor virtue. He very much ‘ enlarges upon it, and proves his aſſertion by the ‘ example of our firſt parents, of Lot, and his wife, ‘ of Naomi's daughters-in-law, and of brothers, one of ‘ whom, as we daily ſee, loves virtue, and the other ‘ gives himſelf up to vice. To which he adds this ‘ general maxim:

‘ Omnibus una ſubeſt natura; ſed exitus omnes
‘ Non unus peragit, placitorum ſegregè formâ.

‘ All men are of the ſame nature, but all of them ‘ have not the ſame fate, becauſe all of them have not ‘ the ſame will. It appears from what has been ſaid ‘ above, that Prudentius believed, that men are born ‘ corrupt; but what he ſays here ſhews, he did not ‘ believe, that ſuch a corruption did neceſſarily deter- ‘ mine them to evil. He adds, that God has ap- ‘ pointed rewards and puniſhments, becauſe men may ‘ be good or bad as they pleaſe. If the Manichees ‘ had farther objected to him, that it had been better ‘ if there had been no free-will, and no happineſs ‘ beſtowed as a reward; and if men had been neceſ- ‘ ſarily happy, by being neceſſarily determined to the ‘ love of virtue, than to make them ſo fatal a preſent ‘ as liberty, whereby moſt of them become unhappy ‘ for ever: I ſay, if the Manichees had objected ſuch ‘ a thing to him, perhaps he would have made uſe of ‘ the principle abovementioned, viz. that few people ‘ are damned. How do we know but Prudentius came ‘ to have ſuch a thought by reaſon of this objection, ‘ which might eaſily come into his mind.’

Theſe laſt words of Mr Le Clerc contain nothing but what is very probable: I believe with him, that if our Poet had found himſelf hard preſſed, he would have anſwered, that the number of the damned is very ſmall: and therefore that we ought not to cry out ſo much againſt the rigours of divine juſtice, which expoſe mankind to miſery. But this anſwer would not have ſatisfied the Manichees, and would not have paſſed even for a palliative remedy; for here is what they might have replied. You acknowledge that our objection would be good if two thirds, or if half the human race were eternally damned. You confeſs then, that the good principle cannot make choice of a plan, in which the damnation of the greateſt part of mankind is included. You confeſs then, that infinite goodneſs is inconſiſtent with the eternal unhappineſs of ſo many perſons. By this confeſſion you deſtroy your whole ſyſtem; for you cannot admit this inconſiſtency without acknowledging, that the eternal unhappineſs of a very great number of creatures would be a mark of cruelty in him who ſhould puniſh them. You know very well that infinite goodneſs cannot be mixed with cruelty, and if you could comprehend that, without any mixture of this vice, the Lord of all things, might condemn to the flames two thirds or half of the human race, you would no longer think the infinite goodneſs inconſiſtent with this condemnation. Here then is the foundation of your anſwer; the good principle would be cruel, if a great number of perſons were damned; but becauſe few are damned, he is not cruel, and preſerves all the characters of infinite goodneſs. Conſider well to what you expoſe yourſelf. You ought to grant us, that the damnation of all men would be the effect of extream cruelty, Actus ſævitiei ut octo, as the ſchool-men would ſay, who meaſure the whole extent of a quality by eight degrees. Conſequently the damnation of the half of mankind would be the effect of four degrees of cruelty. From whence it follows, that the damnation of a fourth part of mankind would be a ſign of two degrees of cruelty in GOD. Make the number of the damned as ſmall as you pleaſe, it will always prove a degree of cruelty in GOD, which however ſmall it be is inconſiſtent with infinite goodneſs, ſince this goodneſs neceſſarily excludes all mixture of the contrary quality (51). In one word, if there is cruelty in damning a thouſand millions of ſouls, there is in damning nine hundred millions, and this proves that there is in damning eight hundred millions, and ſo on; for the difference would be only of more to leſs, and this kind of abatement will never lead you from cruelty to infinite goodneſs, but at moſt to a goodneſs leſs mixed with the contrary vice, a goodneſs inconſiſtent with a principle

(48) In the articles MARCION, MANICHEES, PAULICIANS.

(49) Biblioth. Univerſelle, Tom. xii, pag. 182, & ſeq.

(50) Theſe are his words:
Si non vult Deus eſſe malum, cur non vetat? inquit.
Nil refert auctor fuerit factorque malorum.
Anne opera in vitium ſceleris pulcherrima verti,
Cùm poſſit prohibere, ſinat? quòd ſi velit omnes
Innocuos agere Omnipotens, nec ſancta voluntas
Degeneret, facto nec ſe manus inquinet ullo.
Condidit ergo malum Dominus, quod ſpectat ab alto,
Et patitur, fierique probat, tamquam ipſe crearit.
Ipſe creavit enim, quod, cùm diſcludere poſſit,
Non abolet, longoque ſinit graſſarier uſu. Prudent. in Hamartig. ver. 640, pag. m. 227.

(51) Compare with this § 1. of the 2d article of Jurieu Critique réjouïe

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google works [G]. His books againſt Symmachus were written before the victory obtained over Radagaiſus in the year 405, and after that which Stilico obtained over Alaric, near Pollentia, in the year 402. He mentions the latter (d), and ſays nothing of the other, though his ſubject required it.

(d) Prudent. in Symmach. lib. ii, ver. 695, &c. ſeq.

(52) See the article ORIGEN, remark [E], citat. (4).

a principle eternal and eſſentially good (52). On the other ſide, if there is no cruelty in damning an hundred thouſand perſons, why would there be any in damning two hundred thouſand perſons? And if infinite goodneſs is not impeached by the damnation of two hundred thouſand men, neither would it be by the damnation of three hundred thouſand, and you can aſſign no number which can leſſen it's fulneſs, ſince three hundred thouſand does not hinder it's continuing ſuch; acknowledge then that your ſyſtem falls to the ground, if you pretend to anſwer our difficulty by leſſening the number of the damned. We may apply here a thought of Horace (53), with all the ſubtilties of the Sorites (54). The true anſwer is, to maintain that the damnation of all men would be but an act of juſtice without any mixture of cruelty, ſmall or great. The method therefore of our Poet would be defective.

(53) Eſt vetus atque probus centum qui perficit annos, &c. Horat. Epiſt. I, lib. ii, ver. 39. See the whole paſſage in citat. (91), of the article CHRYSIPPUS.

(54) See the remark [O], of the article CHRYSIPPUS.

I ſay nothing of another defect in his anſwer; the objection of his adverſaries is grounded upon this, that a being, which can prevent evil, and does not prevent it, wills it. This notion is plain. What ſignifies it to ſay, as our Poet does, that GOD has given to man a full power of doing good, and that man is the ſole cauſe of ſin by the abuſe of free-will? This does not weaken the objection: it is to give his theſis for a reply, it is ignoratio elenchi, and petitio principii, ſince the Manichees directly attack the hypotheſis of a free creature whom a good principle will ſuffer to fall into ſin.

[G] There are ſeveral editions of his works.] That of Aldus at Venice, 1502, in 4to, is not the firſt, as he pretended. That of Deventer went before it (55). Some ſay he put out two editions; but there is ſome reaſon to believe, that they ſay ſo without any foundation (56). Mr du Pin (57) mentions the Antwerp edition, 1540, in 8vo, which contains the notes of Antonius Nebriſſenſis, and Sichardus. I have an edition of Antwerp in 8vo, with the notes of thoſe two authors; but it is of the year 1546. The Epiſtle Dedicatory, written by Sichardus, is dated from Baſil, in March 1537. Geſner, in his Bibliotheque (58) mentions an edition of Baſil, by Cratander, 1527, with Sichardus's Scholia, and another edition of Baſil by Henricus Petri of the ſame town. Father Labbe (59), followed the Antwerp edition of Plantin, 1564, with Theodorus Pulmannus's notes (60) and corrections, and Victor Giſelinus's commentary. The two books againſt Symmachus were printed at Paris in 1614, with Grangæus's notes: Mr du Pin calls him by miſtake Gangræus. He ſays, the laſt edition of Prudentius is that of Amſterdam 1667, with Heinſius's notes and corrections. He ſhould have ſaid Nicolas Heinſius, leſt the works of the ſon ſhould be aſcribed to the father. I think he might have mentioned the edition in uſum Delphini, by Father Chamillard at Paris, 1687. Moreri ſays, there is an Amſterdam edition of Prudentius, 1670, with the notes of Nicolas Heinſius, and the author's life: I have not been able yet to know whether this be true. I have only the edition of the year 1667, in 12mo, printed by Daniel Elziver, without the life of Prudentius: it (61) is in Sichardus's edition. As for the edition Variorum, publiſhed by Weitzius, it was printed at Francfort, or Hanaw, 1613, and not at Hanover, as Mr du Pin ſays.

(55) Nicolaus Heinſius, in Præfat. Prudentii.

(56) Ibid.

(57) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, pag. 5.

(58) Fol. 125.

(59) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. ii, pag. 262.

(61) Written by Aldus Manutius.

The reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here Father Chamillard's judgment concerning thoſe who have written upon this author. 'Giſelinus ſectatus eſt tantum ea 'quæ omnium erant facillima & minime ſcitu neceſſaria, lapſus in multis etiam & hallucinatus. Nebriſſenſis hæret in Prudentio magis, ſed eſt brevior & 'ſingula delibare ſatis habet, quæ ad fabulam, hiſtoriam & penitiorem ſcriptoris cognitionem requirun'tur, omittit. Quid quod Apotheoſim, Hamartigeniam, duos contra Symmachum libros qui ſunt 'præ cæteris tamen digniſſimi qui legantur non at'tigit . . . Heinſii variæ lectiones in Prudentium adſperſis interdum lectiſſimis notulis perquam eruditæ 'ſunt & accuratæ ut ab Heinſio profectas facile noris. '. . . Weitzius qui cum editas hactenus in Prudentium notas collegiſſet, addidit etiam ſuas, eaſque 'minime contemnendas, hoc uno cæteris ſuperior 'quod veterum autorum locos indicet, ac eos præcipue 'ſacræ ſcripturæ quos Prudentius operi ſuo intexuit. 'Mitto Jacobum Spiegelium qui commentariolum edi'dit in oden Prudentii inſcriptam omnis hora, ejus 'enim in illam notæ non ſolum ſunt propter nimiam 'prolixitatem moleſtæ, verum etiam minutis quibuſdam 'ac pene puerilibus nugis ab ipſa grammatica repeti'tis refertæ. Mitto etiam Adamum Siberum, Geor'gium Remum, Adamum Theodorum Siberum, An'dream Wilkium: quorum alii verba ſex interdum 'aut ſeptem protulerunt, in hymnos tres aut quatuor 'totos, alii in unum duntaxat, ut merito ab interpre'tum Prudentii numero ſint expungendi. Aliter ſen'tiendum de Scholiis Iſonis quæ quamvis admodum 'brevia ſint quidquid eſt tamen gravioris modi ſol'vunt (62).' He very much commends Fabricius's notes upon five hymns of Prudentius, and thoſe of Eraſmus upon the two laſt hymns of the CATHEMERINON.

(62) Stephanus Chamillard è Societate, Jeſu, Præfat. ad Prudent. in uſum Delphini.

(60) He calls him Pulmaninus Cranenburgius. Mr du Pin calls him Pulman Graffembourg. He has committed two faults; for, beſides that he ſhould have ſaid Cranenbourg, (it is a ſmall town in the duchy of Cleves, where Theodorus Pulmannus was born) he ſhould not have expreſſed himſelf ſo as to make one think, that it was the author's ſirname.

PSAMMITICHUS, king of Egypt, 640 years before the birth of CHRIST, was the ſon of Necus, whom Sabacus, king of Æthiopia, cauſed to be put to death, when he invaded Egypt. The ſon would have had the ſame fate, had he not made his eſcape into Syria. He was recalled, when Sabacus retired into his country, and was one of the twelve great lords, who governed Egypt (a). Each of them had his portion; but they acted, in concert, or rather like partners, or colleagues, than like neighbouring princes (b) Pſammitichus drew upon himſelf the envy of the eleven other princes, either becauſe the wealth he got, by the duties laid upon merchandiſes (c), enabled him to make alliances with foreigners, or becauſe they were afraid he would be king of the whole country, as it had been foretold by an Oracle [A]. Wherefore they confined him to marſhy places, where perhaps he had remained all his life-time, had he not been informed, that ſome foreigners, who had made a deſcent into Egypt, deſtroyed

(a) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. clii.

(b) Ibid. cap. clxvii.

(c) Diodor. Sicul. lib. i, cap. lxvi.

[A] As it had been foretold by an Oracle.] The Oracle had told them, that he, who ſhould make his libations in a braſs cup, ſhould have the whole kingdom to himſelf. It happened, on the laſt day of a ſolemn feſtival, the twelve kings being in the temple of Vulcan, ready to make their libations, that the Prieſt, who was to give them the golden cup, which they uſed for that ceremony, miſtook the number, and brought only eleven cups. Pſammitichus, being the laſt of all, and having no cup, pulled off his helmet, and uſed it for the libations. The other kings, remembering the Oracle, would have killed him, to prevent the effect of it, had they not certainly known that he had no hand in the Prieſt's miſtake (1). I know not how to excuſe Athenæus; he makes Herodotus ſay, that the Egyptian Prieſts drank out of braſs cups, and that it does not appear, that the kings themſelves, when they ſacrificed in public, made uſe of a ſilver cup; ſo that Pſammitichus, who was the youngeſt king, made his libations with a braſs cup, whilſt

(1) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. cli.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

deſtroyed all the flat country. They were Ionians and Carians. Being told that they were men of braſs [B], he conceived great hopes, by reaſon of an Oracle delivered to him. He went to ſee what it was, and, having engaged thoſe foreigners to ſtay with him, he made himſelf maſter of all Egypt by their means. He ſhewed himſelf very thankful, and gave them ſome lands near the Nile, below the town of Bubaſtus (d). From that time he always had foreigners in his pay, and even gave them the precedency above the ſoldiers of his own nation, in the war he made againſt Syria (e); at which the Egyptians were ſo incenſed, that two hundred thouſand men left him. They went and ſettled in Æthiopia [C], and made a blunt anſwer to the reaſons he alledged, to perſuade them to return into their country [D]. He left nothing unattempted to make up that loſs, and particularly applied himſelf to make trade flouriſh: he was kind to foreigners, and granted them all manner of protection, putting a ſtop to the barbarity exerciſed upon them in the foregoing reigns. He made an alliance with the Athenians, and ſome other Greek nations, and would have his children inſtructed by them (f). He cauſed alſo many children to be inſtructed by the Carians and Ionians, whom he had placed on the banks of the Nile; and it was the firſt time, that men, ſpeaking a different language from that of Egypt, ſettled in that country (g). By this means, as Herodotus obſerves (b), the curious, who, in proceſs of time, travelled in Egypt, found there ſeveral people who underſtood them, and were their interpreters. I have examined, in another place (i), whether the town of Naucratis was built under the reign of Pſammitichus by ſome inhabitants of Miletus. This Prince reigned fifty four years [E], and died in the third Year of the XLth Olympiad (k), leaving his kingdom to his ſon Necus (l). He was buried at Sais, where he was born, the chief town of the lower Egypt, in the temple of Minerva (m), where the Saites buried all their kings (n). He was the firſt king of Egypt who drank wine (o): he ordered, that the ſprings of the Nile (p) ſhould be looked for: and, in order to know who were the moſt antient people in the world, he cauſed two children to be brought up, ſo as to hear no body ſpeak; and, becauſe, when they came to be two years old, they ſpoke a Word, which ſignifies bread, in the Phrygian Language, the Egyptians were obliged to give up their pretenſion to the greateſt antiquity, and to yield, in that reſpect, to the Phrygians (q). No ſiege did ever laſt a longer time than that which Pſammitichus laid to the town of Azotas (r); for it held out twenty nine years. The taking of that town, was not ſo glorious to him, as the dexterity wherewith he ſtopped a torrent, that had like to have overflowed his kingdom. The Scythians, having defeated the Medes, ruled in Aſia, and were marching towards Egypt. Pſammitichus met them in Paleſtine, and, by his preſents and entreaties, perſuaded them to go back; and it was then that ſome of them plundered the temple of Venus Urania at Aſcalon (s). Moreri, and the continuators of his Dictionary, made but little account of this king, ſince, inſtead of inſerting in his Article ſuch things as belong to him, which, as we have ſeen, are neither few nor common, they have only filled it with things that concern his Succeſſors.

(d) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. clix.

(e) Diodor. Sicul. lib. i, cap. lxvii.

(f) Ibid.

(g) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. clix.

(b) Ibid.

(i) In the article NAUCRATIS.

(k) Calviſius, Helvicus, &c.

(l) Herod. lib. ii, cap. clviii.

(m) Strabo, lib. xvii, pag. 551.

(n) Herod. lib. ii, cap. clxix.

(o) Plutarch. de Iſide, pag. 353.

(p) Athen. lib. viii, pag. 345.

(q) Herod. lib. ii, cap. ii.

(r) Ibid. cap. clvii.

(s) Ibid. lib. i, cap. cv.

whilſt the others made them with ſilver cups (2). If you read the 151ſt chapter of the ſecond book of Herodotus, you will ſee, that Athenæus relates the matter very unfaithfully. His tranſlator is no leſs unfaithful: here is the Greek, Ψαμμήτιχον δὲν νεώτερον ὄντα τῶν ἄλλων βασιλέων χαλκῆ φιάλη σπεῖσαι, τῶν ἄλλων ἀργύρεια σπενδόντων. The tranſlator renders it thus, Itaque Pſammetichum aliis regibus poſteriorem libaſſe argentea phiala, ſuperiores autem ænea.

(2) Athen. lib. vi, pag. 231.

[B] That they were men of braſs.] Pſammitichus, being reduced to a low condition by the envy of the other kings, conſulted an Oracle of Latona in the town of Butis, which was accounted the beſt in all Egypt. He was anſwered, that revenge would come to him by ſea, when men of braſs ſhould be ſeen. The Pirates, who had landed in Egypt, were armed from head to foot: ſuch armed men had never been ſeen in that country: and therefore it was thought they were men of braſs, and Pſammitichus was informed of it. He began then to have a good opinion of the Oracle, to which he had till then given no credit (3). It is pity Herodotus, whoſe relations are ſo charming, did not live in another age, or was not ſenſible of the difference between Hiſtory and a piece of Poetry. In the latter, things muſt not be unfolded without a miracle; the reader muſt be ſtruck with admiration at any rate: but Hiſtorical events ought to be attended with ſimplicity; and if a judicious reader does not find it in an Hiſtorian, he may very well believe that the author has inſerted wonderful fictions in the room of it. I wonder Herodotus left any gleanings after him. He knew nothing of the Oracle mentioned by Polyænus (4). The god Hammon adviſed king Tementhes to beware of cocks. A Carian informed Pſammitichus, that no nation before the Carians had ſet creſts upon their helmets. This was ſufficient to make Pſammitichus raiſe a great many Carians.

(3) Herod. lib. ii, cap. clii.

(4) Polyænus, Strateg. lib. viii, num. 3.

[C] They went, and ſettled in Ethiopia.] Strabo (5) ſays, they were under the dominion of a queen, to whom the iſland of Meroë did belong, and that they inhabited the province of Tenefis near that iſland, and an iſland above that of Meroë. Pliny (6), quoting Ariſtocreon, mentions the ſame fugitives, and a town called Eſar, which they inhabited for the ſpace of three hundred years. What he ſays of it's ſituation does not agree with Ptolemy, nor with Strabo's account.

(5) Lib. xvi, pag. 530, lib. xvii, pag. 541.

(6) Lib. vi, cap. xxx.

[D] And made a blunt anſwer to the reaſons he alledged, to perſuade them to return.] At firſt Pſammitichus ſent to them their captains, to perſuade them to return into their country; and then he himſelf went to them: he exhorted them to conſider, that they forſook their country, their wives, and children. They unanimouſly anſwered him, ſtriking their ſhields with their lances, We ſhall never want a country as long as we are able to handle theſe arms, and we ſhall never want wives and children, as long as we can make uſe of theſe other things. When they ſpoke the laſt words, they were ſo impudent as to ſhew their nakedneſs. Precibus ad ſententiæ mutationem eos ſolicitani, templa, patriam, uxores, liberos, recordari jubet. Tum univerſi haſtas clypeoſque pulſantes, contentâ voce reſpondent, quoad arma in poteſtate habeant facile ſibi patriam reperturos; reductis quoque tunicis genitalia oſtentant, nunquam ſibi uxores aut liberos defore, quamdiu his ſint inſtructi, dictitantes (7).

(7) Diodor. Sicul. lib. i, cap. lxvii, pag. 59.

[E] He reigned fifty-four years.] Herodotus (8) ſays ſo: Euſebius makes him reign only forty-four years, and Moreri fifty-eight years.

(8) Herod. lib. ii, cap. cli.

PTOLOMY

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PTOLOMY, king of Egypt, the eleventh of that name, was ſirnamed Auletes, by reaſon of his great inclination to play on the flute. He ſucceeded his father (a) towards the beginning of the CLXXVth Olympiad, and in the year of Rome 673 (b). He laid heavy taxes upon Egypt, in order to pay the vaſt ſums neceſſary, to gain and preſerve the friendſhip of the Roman people. This made him odious; and beſides being deſpiſed by his ſubjects, by reaſon of his ſuffering the iſland of Cyprus to be ſubdued by the Romans, he was expelled from the kingdom. He went to Rome, and demanded, for a long time, that the republic would protect him, and enable him to recover his dominions. He met with many oppoſitions in his negotiation, and, at laſt, having no hopes he left Rome, and went to Epheſus, where he obtained letters, by which Gabinius was ordered to reſtore him to his kingdom, wherein he happily ſucceeded (c). I have ſaid, in another place (d) what became of Berenice, the eldeſt daughter of this king; and here I ſhall obſerve, that Arſinoë, his younger daughter, reigned for ſome time [A]: but, properly ſpeaking, it was the famous Cleopatra, his other daughter, who ſucceeded him.

(a) His name was Ptolomy Lathurus.

(b) See Calviſius, ad hunc annum.

(c) See the article BERENICE, Ptolomy's daughter.

(d) Ibid.

If any one deſires a more particular account of the life, manners, and fortune of this king, he may read his Hiſtory, publiſhed at Paris in 1698, by Mr Baudelot de Dairval.

[A] Arſinoë, his younger daughter, reigned for ſome time.] Here I perform the promiſe, I made (1), to ſupply Moreri's brevity. I ſay then, that ARSINOE ſtole away from the palace, whilſt the neceſſary preparations were making to attack Julius Cæſar, who had the young king in his power (2). She went to the Egyptian army, and commanded jointly with Achillas; and a quarrel quickly ariſing between her and Achillas, each of them being willing to have the whole command, ſhe cauſed him to be killed by the eunuch Ganymede (3). But, Cæſar having ſet the young prince at liberty, Arſinoë was obliged to yield to her brother. After the victory of Cæſar, and the death of young Ptolomy, Cæſar, for the ſecurity of Cleopatra, ordered that Arſinoë ſhould leave Egypt (4). Appian informs us, that Megabyzus, a Prieſt of Diana, at Epheſus, received her into his houſe as a queen (5); and he had like to have been puniſhed with death upon that account, when Marc Antony, out of complaiſance to Cleopatra, cauſed Arſinoë to be killed at Miletus. He ſeized on Megabyzus, for the good reception he had given that princeſs. Cleopatra releaſed him at the requeſt of the Epheſians.

(1) In the article ARSINOE.

(2) Cæſar, de Bello Civ. lib. iii, ſub fin. Lucanus, lib. x, ſub fin.

(3) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr. circa init. pag. m. 378.

(4) Ibid. pag. m. 396.

(5) Appian. de Bell. Civil. lib. v.

PUCCIUS (FRANCIS), born at Florence, of an illuſtrious family, forſook the church of Rome, when he came to examine the diſputes about religion, which aroſe in France in Calvin's time: he was then at Lyons. He came into England and ſtudied Divinity at Oxford, and then at London: afterwards he removed into Swiſſerland, where he had a diſpute with Socinus about the ſtate of the firſt man. One would infer from thence, that he was accounted an Orthodox man by the Proteſtants; but it was not ſo: the magiſtrates of Baſil expelled him for his opinions. He returned to London, where he was impriſoned on account of his doctrine. Being ſet at liberty, he removed into the Netherlands, and challenged Socinus to a verbal diſpute. They diſputed ſeveral times in Poland, in the preſence of the church of Cracow, but could not agree. Whereupon Puccius, breaking with the ſectaries of that country, followed ſome perſons, who ſtudied Magic [A], and went with them to Prague, where he returned to the Roman

[A] Who ſtudied Magic.] The author I have quoted uſes theſe words: In comitatum ſe dedit aliquorum magiæ ſtudioſorum, quibuſcum Pragam pervenit (1). It is beſt to conſult Socinus, who ſpeaks of it more at large (2). He ſays, that Puccius, being condemned by the arbitrators of the diſpute he had with him at Cracow, would not confeſs, that he had been worſted; but no body would hear him any longer: the ſynod of the Unitarians did not vouchſafe to read his new piece. Socinus adds, that he received from him an Italian book concerning the ſeal ſet to the ſcripture (3). Puccius ſaid, that every thing was incomprehenſible in that divine book, and that the only way was to wait for the coming of the two men, mentioned in the eleventh chapter of St John's Revelation; that they would explain all the myſteries of the Bible, and that no diſputation was to be made uſe of before their coming to compoſe the differences about matters of religion. He believed, thoſe two men would quickly appear, becauſe he reckoned the 1260 days of the reign of the beaſt for ſo many years, and becauſe, according to his computation, that reign began with the council of Nice. He expected a conſiderable employment under the miniſtry, or miſſion, of thoſe two men (4); and, whilſt he flattered himſelf with theſe hopes, he grew acquainted with two Engliſhmen in the retinue of the Palatin Laſki, who was returning from an embaſſy into England. One of them was a Phyſician, the other had been a Magician, and they were both Catholics; but they promiſed a ſpeedy and general reformation, which GOD would make in Chriſtendom by their means. They boaſted of a familiar converſe with the angels. The Phyſician neither ſaw nor heard any thing, but wrote down punctually what his companion ſaid that he ſaw and heard. Socinus, and ſeveral others, adviſed Puccius not to follow thoſe two perſons; but they could not diſſuade him. He went to Prague with them, and reunited himſelf to the Romiſh church; on which occaſion he wrote a long letter to Socinus, wherein he aſſured him, that one of the angels which uſed to appear to one of thoſe gentlemen, applied himſelf directly to him, and induced him to abjure his errors. Statim autem fere ut Pragam pervenit, factus eſt Papiſta, & miniſtros pontificios adiens, ſuæ ab Eccleſia Romana olim defectionis veniam, conveniente ſatisfactione exhibita, impetravit. Ac mox huc ad amicos & præſertim ad me, ad quem hac de re bene longas literas dedit, de ſuo, ut ipſe loquitur, ad Catholicæ Sanctæque Dei Eccleſiæ gremium reditu diligenter ſcripſit, aſſerens, ſe verbis unius ex illis Dei Angelis, qui ſociis illis ſuis reſponſa dare ſolent, ad ſe nominatim loquentis, monitum atque impulſum id feciſſe, diuturnumque errorem ſuum tandem agnoviſſe (5). Socinus's letter, in which theſe words are found, was written in the beginning of the year 1586, not long after Puccius was returned to Popery. For the reſt, he was a Merchant at Lyons, when he began firſt to reliſh the Proteſtant doctrines: his noble birth permitted him to be of that profeſſion without any diſgrace, according to the principles of the Italians. I ſay, his nobility, for it is affirmed that he was of the family of the Pucci, which has afforded three Cardinals. Scias eum ante plures annos, cum Lugduni, quamvis ex nobili admodum familia, quæ etiam tres Cardinales habuit, natus, ut patriæ ipſius adeoque totius noſtræ Etruriæ mos fert, mercaturam exerceret, exorientibus illis de religione in Gallia diſſidiis, quæ

(1) Hoornbeek, Apparat. ad Controverſ. Socinianas, pag. 52.

(2) In his third Letter to Matthew Radecius.

(3) Librum . . . cui titulum fecit de Bibliis occluſis, deque Elia qui ea aperturus eſt. Socin. Epiſt III, pag. 380, Vol. 1. Biblioth. Fratrum Polonorum.

(4) Dum Puccius in hac venturi Eliæ expectatione totus eſt, dumque ſeipſum participem hujus divinæ legationis ore ſperat, quemadmodum ipſe libellus non obſcure indicat. Socin. ibid.

(5) Socin. ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Roman communion (a). Notwithſtanding this it is ſaid that he was burnt at Rome [B]. He had no learning, and gave himſelf up to Fanaticiſm [C]. But the principal doctrine that he was fond of, was, that honeſt men ſhould be ſaved, even though they were Pagans [D]. Mr Baillet ſpeaks of him [E].

(a) Taken from Hoornbeek, Apparat. ad Controverſias Socinianas, pag. 52.

quæ necdum ſopita ſunt, ſtatuit, mercatura relicta, ſe totum ſtudio Sacrarum Literarum tradere, ut quid ſentiendum in noſtra religione eſſet, dilucide cognoſcere poſſet (6).

(6) Ibid. pag. 379.

[B] Notwithſtanding it is ſaid, that he was burnt at Rome.] It is ſaid (7), the archbiſhop of Saltzburg cauſed him to be ſeized and ſent to Rome. This man deſerved to have been ſupported by the Inquiſitors, becauſe he furniſhed them with a ſpecious pretence to declaim againſt the principles of the Proteſtants. Puccius returning into the boſom of the Catholic church, may the controverſiſts ſay, after he had endeavoured to fix among thoſe who were ſeparated from it, in France, Switzerland, England, and Poland, is a convincing proof, that when any one has abandoned the principle of authority, and put himſelf on that of examination, he can find no ground to rely on any where; he rambles from one party to another, and not being able to find any ſure footing, he is obliged, like Noah's dove, to return to the ark again. A fine commonplace which two modern authors (8) have lately inſiſted upon (9), when they returned into the Romiſh communion; but it is only a meer blaze, for the way of authority neceſſarily leads every particular man to be a Mahometan in Turkey, a Heathen in China, and always of the national religion.

(7) Ab Archiepiſcopo Saliſburgenſi captus tandem, & Romam miſſus, in rogo periit. Mieræus, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 860.

(8) Mr Papin and Mr de Verſé.

(9) I write this in 1696.

[C] He had no learning, and gave himſelf up to Fanaticiſm.] This is the character that Voetius gives of him. ' Fr. Puccius natione Italus Filidinus (10) in-
' ſtar cothurni omnium aut nullius religionis, nullius
' eruditionis literariæ, philoſophicæ, ſcripturariæ, mo-
' litus eſt libellum Goudæ in Hollandia anno 1592,
' editum & Clementi VIII, dedicatum, quo aſſerit
' univerſalem reſtitutionem, & fidem naturalem in
' Deum, per quam omnes ſalvari poſſint. Fanatico
' illi errori (jactat enim revelationes rat. 120, pag. 94.)
' mox publica ſcripta oppoſuerunt, ex Reformatis
' Franciſcus Junius ex Lutheranis Lucas Oſiander, ex
' Pontificiis Nicolaus Serrarius. De hominis iſtius
' univerſali ἀπαιδευσία ex ſcriptis, de ingenio &
' moribus ex epiſtolis Socini judicare poteris Epiſt. 3.
' quæ eſt ad Matth. Radecum Secret. Gedanenſ. Puccius
' prior Socinum ſatis ſarcaſticè perſtrinxerat in colla-
' tione de Mortalitate, quæ poſtea typis edita fuit
' in 4to (11). - - - Franciſcus Puccius, an Italian, a
' man of all religions, or none, of no manner of learning
' either in Philoſophy or the Scriptures, wrote a book,
' which was publiſhed at Gouda in Holland, in the year
' 1592, and dedicated to Clement VIII, in which he
' aſſerts the reſtoration of all things, and the natural
' faith in GOD, by which all men may be ſaved. This ' fanatical error (for he boaſts of revelations) was pre-
' ſently oppoſed in print by Francis Junius, a Calviniſt,
' Luke Oſiander, a Lutheran, and Nicolas Serrarius, a
' Papiſt. Of this man's utter ignorance one may judge
' by his writings, of his wit and morals by the epiſtles
' of Socinus. Puccius had before ſarcaſtically attacked
' Socinus in a conference concerning Mortality, which was
' afterward printed in 4to.'

(10) See, below, citat. (12).

(11) Giſb. Voëtius, Diſputat. Theolog. Tom. ii, pag. 234, 235.

[D] That honeſt men ſhould be ſaved, even though they were Pagans.] Tobias Pfannerus attributes this opinion to him, on the credit of two perſons whom he quotes.
' Franciſcus Puccius Fedelinus, Romæ quidem poſtea
' neſcio quâ de causâ combuſtus, ignorationem & in-
' credulitatem Evangelii, vel defectum Baptiſmi ad
' ſalutem nulli obeſſe (ſtatuit) modò ſtudeat vitæ in-
' culpatæ, quoad externos mores, nec præfractè quic-
' quam neget: ineſſe omnibus naturaliter hanc facul-
' tatem, ut poſſint & velint ſalvi fieri, etiam abſque
' ſcrutinio quæſtionum Theologicarum; ut Oſiander †,
' & poſt hunc Joh. Ludovicus Hartmannus ‡ teſtan-
' tur (12). - - - - Franciſcus Puccius Fedelinus, who
' afterward, for what reaſon I know not, was burnt
' at Rome, held, that the ignorance and diſbelief of the
' Goſpel, or the want of Baptiſm, would hinder no man's
' ſalvation, ſo he lead a blameleſs life as to his morals,
' and did not deny any thing out of obſtinacy: and that
' there is a natural ability as well as deſire in all men to
' be ſaved, without the examination of Theological que-
' ſtions, as Oſiander, and, after him, John Ludovicus
' Hartmannus teſtify.'

† Oſiand. Cent. XVI, lib. iv, cap. xlvi, col. ibid.

‡ I. L. Hortmann. de ſt. Concil. Tom. iv, Fericul. 6. Perſe. 16. Exerc. 67, (pag. 701.)

(12) Tob. Pfannerus, Syſt. Theologiæ Gentilis, p. 493.

[E] Mr Baillet ſpeaks of him (13).] He tells us, that Luke Oſiander publiſhed a book in the year 1593, againſt one Francis Puccius, and that it may be the ſame book which is intituled, Anti-Puccius. He adds theſe words: ' Francis Puccius ſeems to me to be the ' author of Puccianiſm; that is to ſay, of a new ſect
' which laſted but a little while, and remains buried
' under the ſtones which were caſt at it by the Cal-
' viniſts, Lutherans, and Catholics. Going a little ' farther back, I find that this Puccius may be the
' ſame with Franceſco Pucci of Florence, who re-
' tired to Baſil, and had ſome diſpute with the arch-
' heretic Socinus, in the year 1577, concerning the
' ſtate of the firſt man before his fall, and who main' tained the immortality of all creatures, and conſe-
' quently of man by the creation. But I will not
' ſay that this Florentine is the ſame (14) with Francis
' Puccius Filidinus, of whom mention is made in the
' firſt claſs of the Index of authors, and books, con-
' demned by the Council of Trent; wherein it is re-
' marked, that this man falſly took on him the name
' of Pucci.' Note, that there is an Anti-Puccius quoted, as written by Fauſtus Socinus; but that is not the title of the book, it is only quoted ſo for brevity's ſake. That work conſiſts of four parts. It contains, 1. A diſcourſe of Puccius, concerning the immortality of all creatures before ſin. There are ten theſes in it, each of which contains one of the ten arguments, on which he grounded his paradox. 2. Socinus's Anſwer to thoſe ten theſes. 3. The Rejoinder of Puccius to the Anſwer. 4. The Reply of Socinus (15), it is very long and elaborate. All this is under the general title De ſtatu primi hominis ante lapſum diſputatio, in the ſecond volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

(13) In the Acts, num. 33. See alſo num. 69.

(14) It is certain that he is the ſame.

(15) Intituled, Ad Defenſionem Fr. Puccii Reſponſio.

PUTEANUS (Erycius) author of a vaſt number of books [A], was born a Venlo in Guelderland the fourth of November, 1574. He ſtudied firſt at Dort, from whence he went to Cologn to learn Rhetoric, and to go through a courſe of Philoſophy in the college of the Jeſuits: after which he was a ſtudent of the Law at Louvain. He there took his bachelor's degree in the month of June 1597, and profited much by the lectures of Juſtus Lipſius, who conceived a great eſteem and particular friendſhip for him. He went into Italy in the year 1597, and ſtaid ſome time

[A] Author of a vaſt number of books.] See the catalogue of them in Valerius Andreas's Bibliotheque, and in the Theatre of Ghilini; but it is more compleat in Mr Witte (1). They are moſt of them ſmall tracts, and never any man ſeemed more perſuaded of the truth of the maxim of a Greek Poet, That a great book is a great evil (2). It is eaſy for a man to multiply the number of his books, if he will publiſh all that he writes. Our Puteanus was guilty of this fault, he printed even the collection of the teſtimonies, which he gave to his ſcholars (3). Mr Colomies has publiſhed a thing which cannot be better placed than here. ' Mr Voſſius told me, that Moret, a
' famous Printer at Antwerp, reproaching Erycius
' Puteanus, the ſucceſſor of Lipſius, that he writ only
' ſmall books; the latter anſwered him, that Plutarch,
' and ſeveral others among the Antients, did ſo as ' well as he. Moret immediately replied, Do you
' believe that your books, which I cannot ſell, are as

(1) Witte, Memoriæ Philoſophorum, pag. 567, & ſeq.

(2) See Mr le Fevre, in the Lives of the Greek Poets, pag. 141, 142. He attributes this thought to the Poet Callimachus. Here are the words of Callimachus, as they are related by Athenæus, in the beginning of the third book, Τὸ μέγα βιβλίον τοῦν ἔλεγεν εἶναι τῷ μεγάλῳ κακῷ. Magnum librum parem eſſe dicebat magno malo.

(3) See the little book called Erici Puteani Martyrium Academicæ ſive doctrinæ & probitatis tuendæ, printed at Leyden 1618.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

time with Juan Fernando de Velaſcos, governor of the Milaneſe; after that he went to Padua, and lodged with the famous Pinelli (a). They took him from thence in 1601, to make him profeſſor of eloquence at Milan. He gained a great deal of reputation in that employment, inſomuch that he was honoured with the office of Hiſtoriogapher to his Catholic Majeſty; and in 1603 the city of Rome admitted him and his poſterity into the number of their freemen and patricians. He took his degree of Doctor of Law at Milan, more rituque majorum (b). He took a wife (c) alſo there in the year 1604, and had a great many children by her. He praiſed her, and them, very much in his letters [B]. He removed to Louvain in 1606, to ſucceed to the chair of the profeſſorſhip, which Juſtus Lipſius had filled with ſo much glory. He was very much conſidered in the Low-Countries, and had the titles of Hiſtoriographer to the king of Spain, and counſellor to the arch-duke Albert. He was alſo governor of the caſtle of Louvain (d). He died in 1646 [C], and was buried in a chapel where none had been buried before him: it was that of St Charles Borromeo, in the church of St Peter at Louvain (e). He was a man of merit and learning, and kept a great correſpondence by letters [D]. He affected to ſcatter in his works what we call flaſhes of wit; this ſucceeded ſometimes, but on many occaſions his witticiſms were not natural, but a meer forced playing upon words. He publiſhed a book intituled Statera Belli & Pacis, which made a great noiſe, and which had like to have ruined him [E]. Nevertheleſs, it is a work which ſhews that he underſtood the true intereſts of (a) Moreri falſely ſuppoſes that Pinelli lived at Milan.

(b) That is to ſay, according to the antient ceremonies.

(c) Who was called Mary Magdalen Catherine de la Tour, Turriana.

(d) Taken from Valerius Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 206, 207.

(e) Vita Erycii Puteani, in limine, Epiſt. Poſthum.

(4) Colomiés, Opuſcula, pag. 124, 125, Utrecht Edit. 1669.

(5) Article CCXXIX, of the Critiques Hiſtoriques.

(6) Eryc. Puteanus, Epiſtolar. ſelectarum Apparatu, Epiſt. X, Centuriæ IV, pag. m. 10.

(7) Martial. Epigr. XIII, lib. iv.

(8) It is the 6sth of the firſt century, pag. 26.

(9) Ibid. pag. 27, 28.

(10) See the 28th letter of the 4th century. It was writ in the year 1620.

(11) See the 55th letter of the ſame century. It was writ in 1628.

(12) See the ſame letter.

(13) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom. ii, pag. 220.

(14) Lor. Craſſo, Iſtoria de' Poëti Greci, pag. 193.

(15) Ghilini, Teatro d'Huomini Letterati, Vol. ii, pag. 75.

(16) In Diario Biographico.

(17) In Memoriis Philoſoph. pag. 565. Konig quotes this book, and yet places it in 1644.

(18) Bullart, ubi ſupra.

(19) Prefixed to his poſthumous Letters, printed at Louvain 1662.

(20) He was knight of the order of Chriſt, and governour of the caſtle of Louvain.

(21) In the 2d Tome of his Miſcellanies, pag. 368, Rotterdam edition.

'as good as Plutarch's? This made Puteanus angry, 'and he immediately went out of Moret's ſhop (4).' See Mr Baillet in the firſt tome of the Judgments of the Learned, chap. x. ſect. concerning the ſmalneſs of his books. Read alſo theſe words of the ſecond tome (5): It is true that this Puteanus paſſed for a tatler, and a great writer of little books, but he was otherwiſe a very learned man.

[B] He praiſed his wife and children very much.] There is nothing more agreeable than a good wife, ſays he in a letter, to a friend, I ſpeak by experience, mine always appears to me young and fair; for altho' ſhe has had ſeveral children, ſhe keeps the charms of her face. 'Illa mihi ſemper juvencula, 'ſemper pulchra; quia & ætatis florem, & formæ 'decus, toties jam puerpera ſervat. Imò illa mihi 'bona eſt, & qualem ex Apiculâ naſci Simonides vo- 'luit. Opportunè hic igitur illud Theognidis uſur- 'pem:

Οὐδὲν Κύρν' ἀγαθῆς γλυκερώτερόν ἐσι γυναικὸς.
Μάρτυς ἐγὼ, σὺ δέ μι γίγνυ ἀληθοσύνης.

'Vin' & Latine dicam?

Nil uxore bona, Cyrne, eſt jucundius: hujus
Cum tibi ſim teſtis, tu mihi teſtis eris (6).

'She ſeems to me always young, always fair; be-
'cauſe notwithſtanding ſhe has had ſo many children,
'ſhe ſtill preſerves the flower of her age, and the beauty
'of her face. She is always good to me, and ſuch
'a one as Simonides deſired to have born of Apicula.
'Therefore I may here fitly quote theſe verſes of Theognis:

Of all good things, ſure, a good wife's the beſt:
Thou, Cyrnus, ſhalt the truth of this atteſt.

This is what he wrote in 1626. This would not have have ſatisfied the deſire of a Roman Poet. Puteanus's wife appeared ſtill young and handſome to her huſband, becauſe ſhe was ſo ſtill: the buſineſs is to appear ſo, when one is no more ſo. The Poet's wiſh was thus:

Candida perpetuo reſide, Concordia, lecto,
Tamque pari ſemper ſit Venus æqua jugo.
Diligat illa ſenem quondam: ſed & ipſa marito
Tunc quoque cum fuerit, non videatur anus (7).

Fair Concord ever on their bed attend,
And, Cytherea, the bleſs'd pair befriend.
When youth is paſt, and wrinkled age appears,
May neither to each other ſeem in years.

Puteanus writes in another letter (8), in 1617, that ſhe had brought him four ſons and four daughters, and that he had loſt three boys. He ſeems to be well pleaſed with his having daughters, and gives a reaſon for it (9). He had male children after that. His ſon Fauſtus bore arms (10); but that did not laſt long, for he became a bare-footed Carmelite at the end of two years, that he might, in ſome meaſure, imitate his brother John-Stephen, who had taken the habit of the Jeſuits (11). Puteanus ſpeaks alſo of two other ſons, of which one called Juſtus, was ſecretary to the archbiſhop of Compſa, Apoſtolical Nuncio; the other, named Maximilian, ſtudied at home (12).

[C] He died in the year 1646.] Mr Bullart doth not ſuppoſe this, for he ſays that Puteanus, born on the fourth of November, 1574, died, aged ſeventy years, after he had been profeſſor of Hiſtory at Louvain near forty years (13). This is to ſay downright, that he died in 1644, Lorenzo Craſſo (14) is much in the wrong in placing his death in 1624; he miſtook for want of giving ſufficient attention to theſe words of Ghilini, L'anno M. DC. XXIV. fu il Puteani, da malattia oppreſſo, percio ſcriſſe queſto Epitaffio da metterſi ſopra la ſua ſepoltura (15). It is plain that this only ſignifies, that he was very ſick that year. The Sieur Witte (16) places Puteanus's death in the year 1646, and the ſeventy-firſt of his life; he ſhould have ſaid the ſeventy-ſecond. He places it in the ſame year, 1646, in the abridgment which he gives us of this profeſſor's life (17). Valerius Andreas is the author of that abridgment, and therefore we may depend upon it.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have conſulted the life of Puteanus prefixed to his poſthumous letters, publiſhed by his ſon-in-law, and I find there that he died the ſeventeenth of September, 1646, in the caſtle of Louvain.

[D] And kept a great correſpondence by letters.] This appears by the letters which he has publiſhed, and much more by this paſſage of Mr Bullart. To conclude, it was this learning that made him conſiderable in the chief courts of Europe, and which obliged almoſt all princes, all learned men, ambaſſadors of kings, and generals of armies, to give him tokens of their friendſhip and eſteem by their letters, of which there were found above ſixteen thouſand in his ſtudy, put in order (18).

The diviſion of his works into five tomes (19) ſhews that the ſecond tome comprehends his letters, that is to ſay, Epiſtolarum Atticarum apparatus, nimirum promulſis. This comprehends three hundred letters. Miſſus ſecundi, three hundred alſo. Bellaria, as many. Deliciæ adoptivæ, one hundred. Epiſtolarum Atticarum Centuria ſingularis & nova. Epiſtolarum Atticarum apparatus novus, this contains four hundred letters. Apparatus Poſthumus in quatuor Centurias diſtributus. A collection of letters which he writ to Mr de Zuylichem, and Daniel Heinſius, publiſhed at Leyden by Boxhornius in the year 1647. Add to them the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh centuries of poſthumous letters, printed at Louvain, 1662, by the care of Xiſtus Antonius Miſer (20) his ſon-in-law, who had alſo printed, in the ſame place and year, the four preceding centuries. See Mr de Vigneul Marville (21).

[E] He publiſhed a book called, Statera Belli & Pacis, which . . . had like to have ruined him.] This book was

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of his Catholic Majeſty better than thoſe who meddled only with affairs of ſtate. A ſatire was publiſhed during the negotiation of a treaty between his Catholic Majeſty and the United Provinces in 1633. The author adviſed to peace, and ſhewed that the continuation of the war would be very prejudicial to the Spaniſh Netherlands. He ſpoke very clearly of the advantages which the enemies had already gained, and of the victories which they might expect. Voſſius, his good friend, and the moſt pacific man in the world; I mean, the fartheſt from certain authors, who to animate the people to continue a war, ſet before them a thouſand artificial deſcriptions of their forces, and of the enemies weakneſs, was concerned that Puteanus ſhould bring himſelf into trouble by publiſhing a work of a quite contrary nature (22).

(22) Voſſius, Epiſt. CXCIX, pag. m. 218. This letter is dated in July 1633.

'His diebus haut lætus accepi, optimum, & diſertiſſimum virum Erycium Puteanum, in periculum, aut certè moleſtias aliquas incidiſſe. Scripſit ſtateram Belli, & Pacis, quo nonnullis de partium ſuarum impotentia prolatis, complures offendit. Noſti faſtum Hiſpanorum, & principum aures, quorum nec hæ, neque illi veritatem accipere ſuſtinent. Itaque niſi noſſem multos ei in aula Bruxellenſi, quo vocatus eſt, amicos eſſe; niſi quoque ingenium, & eruditionem illius æſtimari ſcirem, ſiniſtri aliquid vererer. Nunc optima non omnino deſpero. Utinam non aliud audire cogatur, quam quod olim in ſimili ferè negotio, à Phalaride ajunt fuiſſe dictum Simonidi (23), Μέλοιεν σοὶ Μισῶν εὐκλεεῖς πόνοι. - - - - I lately received the melancholy news, that the beſt and moſt learned man, Erycius Puteanus, was fallen into danger, or, at leaſt, ſome trouble: he wrote the Statera Belli & Pacis (Balance of War and Peace), where he mentioned ſomething of the weakneſs of his party, which offended many. You know the pride of the Spaniards, and the ear of princes, neither of which, can bear the truth. Therefore did I not know that he had many friends in the court of Bruſſels, whither he is called, and that his ingenuity, and learning are very much eſteemed, I ſhould fear ſome miſchief. Now I hope for the beſt. I wiſh he may be forced to hear no worſe than what was formerly ſaid to Simonides by Phalaris on a like occaſion, Mind your Muſe, it is moſt honourable for you.' He communicated his uneaſineſs to a Phyſician of Dort, who anſwered him, that Puteanus had acted imprudently, and that ſuch a fault would not be pardoned in Holland (24). 'De Cl. Puteano quod ſcribis, valdè me percuſſit, quamvis tale quid metuerem, cum legiſſem ſtateram, doctè magis, quam prudenter ſcriptam. Accepi ab eo literas, ſtatera jam edita, quam tamen præter morem ſuum non miſit. Eam Catzius Haga (ubi impreſſam (25) quoque noſti, nec hoc noſtro melius) ex conventu ordinum, ubi cum plauſu excepta, attulit, & mihi legendam tradidit. Deus bone! quam bonus ille Belga, tam malus Politicus. Non hic ferremus, qui talia de nobis, quæ ille de Rege, de importuna Archid. legatione, & ſimilia. Ac niſi amici omnia pro illo, eſt quod metuamus vicem optimi, & elegantiſſimi ingenii. - - - - I was very much troubled at what you wrote me concerning Puteanus, altho' I was afraid of ſome ſuch thing, when I had read his Statera, a tratiſe rather learned than prudent. I received letters from him when his Statera was publiſhed, which nevertheleſs he ſent not to me contrary to his cuſtom. Catzius brought it from the Hague, (where you know it was printed not better than this edition of ours) from the aſſembly of the States, where it was received with applauſe, and lent to me to read. Good God! how good a Dutchman, how ill a politician! Here we ſhould not ſuffer ſuch things to be ſaid of us, as he ſays of the king, and of the unſeaſonable embaſſy of the arch-duke, and the like. And unleſs his friends do their utmoſt for him, there is reaſon to fear the fate of the beſt and fineſt genius.' He adds, that he was ſummoned to Bruſſels, and that he was to be farther examined; that the preſident Roſe was his enemy, but that ſome other conſiderable people protected him, and that it was hoped that their protection would ſave him. Without doubt every body will be glad to ſee the names of thoſe protectors. It is a part of the hiſtory of Puteanus. 'Ob amicos quos plurimos habet, nihil illi periculi fore putabat. Sibi addictiſſimum habet, Varambonum Archiepiſcopum Ceſarienſem Infanti à ſacris, Chiffletium Medicum, qui plurimùm apud Ser. Inf. poſſunt, & alios, ſed infeſtum Roſam Præſidem Hiſpanis obnoxium, & paci ut dicitur, adverſum, qui etiam cauſa eſſe putatur, cur decem jam menſibus, nullæ ex Hiſp. literæ ad εἰρηνοποιοὺς. Infans quoque Cardinalis, qui jam in Burgundia, non minùs quàm Eugenia, illi benè volunt. Deum rogo, & benè faciant, neque ob παῤῥησίαν hanc gravius animadvertant in virum candoris melle penitus imbutum. - - - - He did not imagine that he was in any danger, by reaſon of the many friends he had. Verambonus, archbiſhop of Ceſarea, chaplain to the Infant, is his great friend, and Chiffletius the Phyſician, who have great intereſt with the moſt ſerene Infant, and others: but the preſident Roſe, his enemy, a creature of Spain, and averſe, as it is ſaid, to peace, who alſo is thought to be the occaſion why no letters are come from Spain theſe ten months to the plenipotentiaries. The Infant Cardinal, who is now in Burgundy, as well as Eugenia, wiſh him well. I beſeech God they may be favourable to him, and not too ſevere on this freedom, in a man of ſo much candour and eloquence.' The buſineſs terminated according to the deſires of this Phyſician. I muſt not forget to tell you that an anonymous author writ againſt this work of Puteanus: that anſwer was intituled, Anti-Puteanus, ſive Politico-Catholicus ſtateram Puteani inducias expendentis alia ſtatera expendens (26). I have a little book (27) which contains Puteanus's Statera, and the anonymous anſwer, with two letters, in which is the judgment of a Hollander on that anſwer. The author of theſe letters ſuſpects that the anonymous writer was a church-man (28), and even a monk (29), and redicules him for ſaying, that courage and prudence were only to be found in the Catholic church (30), that the revenues of Holland were drained; that it's people groaned under the heavy taxes; that it's troops were cowardly; that it's victories were rather prejudicial than advantageous; that the king of Spain could well enough ſpare thoſe towns he had loſt; that the Dutch got their victories by treachery, and that they had given much more for them than they were worth. To morrow, ſays his critic, he will tell us that it is advantageous for Spain, to have our troops encamp in the heart of Brabant, for the fields will become more fruitful by the dung our horſes will leave behind. 'Nec minus ridiculus eſt, cum tributis & exactionibus ſupra quam fas eſt Batavos premi queritur, qui iſtos cenſus ſe Dominis ſuis debere, & felicitatis ſuæ ac fortunarum non niſi ſpicilegium eſſe credunt. . . . Verum enimvero, quam lepide fatuus eſt hic ſcriptor, cum milites Federatorum timidos lepores vocat, cum Batavos pugnam ſemper declinare ſcribit: victorias nobis magis nocuiſſe, quam profuiſſe. Illane ſcribere non veretur poſt claDem Turnhoutanam & Flandricam? An & tunc Henrici Bergii culpa terga vertit Hiſpanus? Et quando quæſo Regi Hiſpaniarum ac ſuis perſuadebit, Sylvam Ducis, Veſaliam, Venloam, Ruræmundam, Trajectum ad Moſam, expugnata ad Scaldim & alibi caſtella, victam Bercam nobis nocere? Regem vero ſuo commodo iis carere? quia non ſine magnis impenſis ea vicimus. Dicet propediem, utile eſſe Brabantis, exercitus noſtros in ipſo pene Brabantiæ meditullio ſtare & in hoſtico ali, ut ab equorum multitudine ſtercorati agri uberiorem ſegetem ferant (31). Nor is it leſs ridiculous to complain, that the Dutch are oppreſſed with aſſeſſments and taxes beyond meaſure, who believe that they owe thoſe tributes to their governors, and that they are only the gleanings of their happineſs and good fortune. . . . But, indeed, how ſimple a writer is this, when he ſays that the ſoldiers of the allies are fearful hares, that the Dutch always declined fighting: that our victories were always more hurtful than profitable to us. Was he not afraid to write ſuch things, after the battles of Turnhout and Flanders? What then, did Spain turn it's back thro' the fault of the count de Berg? And when I beſeech you, will he perſuade the king of Spain, and his countrymen,

(23) It ſhould be Steſichoro.

(24) Joh. Beverwyck. Epiſt. ad Voſſium. It is the 172d, pag. m. 111, 112, dated the 8th of July 1633.

(25) This was not the firſt edition; for it was printed firſt in the Spaniſh Netherlands, in 4to.

(26) See the Acts of Mr Bluet, ann. 158.

(27) Privatâ Colmopoli, apud Batavum patriæ libertatis & pacis amantiſſimum, in 12mo.

(28) Impenſe cavet, ne aliter eſſe videatur quam ex ſacrorum ordine. Barlæus, Epiſt. CCXIV, pag. 458, Tom. I.

(29) Videtur conculos galeam induiſſe, aut galea culeum, ita amice conjunxit, & ex eodem ore jam Theologo jam militi digna judia. Idem, Epiſt. CC.VIII, pag. 451.

(30) In Principe Auraco nec fortitudinem, nec prudentiam agnoſcit, hac freetus ratione, quia Catholicus non eſt. Audi verba: Ad eum. . . . In ſolo Catholico vera & ſolenda & prudentia. Ibid. pag. 453.

(31) Ibid. pag. 454.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſatire againſt king James was falſely attributed to him [F]. It is affirmed that he did very great ſervice to the king of Poland (f). Thoſe who would ſee the praiſes which ſeveral learned men have given him, and the honours which ſome princes did him, need only read the Cenſura of Sir Thomas-Pope Blount [G], and the Academy of men, that Boſleduc, Weſel, Venlo, Ruremond, Maeſtricht, and the forts gained upon the Scheld, and elſewhere, and the conqueſt of Berg op Zoom were hurtful to us? Did the king loſe them to his real advantage, becauſe we conquered them, not without great expence? In a little time he will ſay, it is to the advantage of the Brabanters, that our armies ſhould encamp in the very heart of Brabant, and be there maintained by free quarter, becauſe the fields will produce greater plenty of corn, when dunged by ſuch a multitude of horſes.'

(f) See the remark [H].

(32) Theſe two letters are the 213th, and the 214th, of Barlæus.

The author of that anſwer (32) has been known a long time to be Barleus. I have alſo another little book (33), which, beſides the Statera Belli & Pacis, and the Anti-Puteanus, contains a political Diſſertation of Puteanus de induciis Belgicis, and a letter of Lipſius, with notes on that letter (34), and ſome other little treatiſes. Lipſius's letter was written from Louvain the third of January, 1595, to a great lord, who aſked him, Bellumne an potius induciæ expediant Regi Hiſpaniarum cum Gallo, Anglo, Batavo? - - - Whether it is better for the king of Spain to have peace or war with France, England, and Holland? It is full of malice againſt Holland, and of maxims of refined politics (35). The author of the Notes refutes them ſolidly, and calls himſelf Juſtinus Bonæfidius Mont. He treats Lipſius very roughly. See (36) the complaints the Jeſuit Petra Sancta made of it.

(33) Printed at Leyden, in officina Elzeviriorum 1633, in 12mo.

(34) Notæ ſeu Stricturæ Politicæ ad Juſti Lipſii Epiſtolam.

(35) This letter of Lipſius had been anſwered before in the year 1618, by John Gael, advocate at the Hague.

(36) In the article LIPSIUS, remark [C].

The event ſhewed that Puteanus was in the right; for if Spain had concluded either a peace, or a truce, with the United Provinces, in 1633, it would have avoided a great many vexations and loſſes, and would have been, perhaps, in a more flouriſhing condition at this time. I do not pretend to excuſe this profeſſor, he had better have kept within his own ſphere; it is imprudent to publiſh all ſorts of truths; but we muſt not imagine that his book brought any thing new to Holland, they knew well enough the ill condition of the Spaniſh Low-Countries. It is the firſt thing that the politicians inform themſelves of, in relation to their enemies; and the people generally believe more than is true.

However that be, this profeſſor did not ſufficiently conſider the words of Salluſt, which he put at the beginning of his book, and which ſhewed him ſo plainly the reaſons why it is dangerous to adviſe princes. They have other people enough to conſult; futurity is unknown to the wiſeſt heads; and bad advice is very often followed with good ſucceſs; ſo true is it, that fortune diſpoſes of all things according to her fancy. It is Salluſt who ſpeaks thus: Scio ego, ſays he (37), quam difficile atque aſperum factu ſit, conſilium dare regi, aut imperatori; poſtremo cuiquam mortali, cujus opes in excelſo ſunt: quippe cum & illis conſultorum copiæ adſint; neque de futuro quiſquam ſatis callidus, ſatiſque prudens ſit. Quinetiam ſæpe prava magis, quam bona conſilia proſperè eveniunt: quia pleraſque res fortuna ex lubidine ſua agitat. Princes repent a thouſand times of having followed the advice of good heads; becauſe things often fall out, which make them judge, that if they had taken another courſe, they would have done ſome very notable thing. Thoſe they have to do with commit faults that one would not think them capable of. A good counſellor does not rely upon thoſe faults, and therefore he diſſuades from thoſe enterprizes, which a fool, or a raſh fellow propoſe; but it falls out that thoſe unforeſeen faults, or ſome unexpected accidents, would have rendered the enterprize infallibly ſucceſsful, if they had engaged in it. The ſureſt way, is not to be forward in giving advice about the public affairs, of which Salluſt knew the reaſons very well.

(37) Salluſt. Orat. II, ad Cæſarem de Republica ordinanda, init. p. m. 527.

[F] A ſatire againſt king James was falſely attributed to Puteanus.] The title is, Iſaaci Caſauboni Corona Regia, id eſt, Panegyrici cujuſdam verè aurei, quem Jacobo I, Magnæ Britanniæ, &c. Regi, fidei defenſori delincarat, fragmenta ab Euphormione inter ſchedas τῦ μακαρίτυ inventa, collecta, & in lucem edita 1615, pro officina regia Jo. Bill Londini. Mr Almeloveen lent me the book (38) in 1693. It was then very ſcarce, but Mr Thomaſius has printed it ſince in his Hiſtoria Sapientiæ & ſtultitiæ Humanæ. Nothing can be more ſatirical; the worſt of princes was never worſe treated by an ill-natured writer, than the good king James was by the fierce Scioppius; for we muſt not doubt that Scioppius was the author of that bloody piece. I ſhall quote one who tells us that Puteanus publickly denied that he was the author of it. 'Non potuit 'ſatyricorum manus effugere Jacobus Britanniæ Rex, 'utut doctiſſimus & laudatiſſimus Princeps: cui ſub 'ſpecie Panegyrici Poſthumi à Caſaubono ſcripti, 'cujus quaſi fragmenta inter ſchedas ejus reperta, per 'inſignem nequitiam, continuo myſteriſmo horrenda 'flagitia objiciuntur. Lepide alioquin ſcriptus liber 'eſt; cui titulus, Caſauboni Corona Regia, &c. . . . 'Refertur in Georgii Richteri vitâ Epiſtolis ejus præfixâ pag. 21. è Colloquio cum Erycio Puteano acceſſiſſe Richterum, quod Puteanus ejus libelli autor 'habitus fuerit: cujus rei verò famam ille innixè declinans velut Apologiæ loco ſcriptum quoddam exhibuerit, cui nomen, Perjurium RUFFI & GIBBOSI, præfatus, quo delatorum ſuorum virulentiæ 'ac ſiniſteritati ſatis fuiſſe obviatum exiſtimaverit (39). That James, king of Great-Britain, tho' the moſt learned and praiſe-worthy prince, could not eſcape the pen of the ſatiriſts, who, under the notion of a Poſthumous Panegyric, written by Caſaubon, fragments whereof were found among his papers, have moſt villanouſly abuſed him. The book is otherwiſe wittily written, and intituled, Caſauboni Corona Regia, &c. . . . . It is ſaid, in the life of George Richter, prefixed to his letters, that Richter was told by Erycius Puteanus, that this libel was attributed to Puteanus; to clear himſelf from which imputation, he wrote a book by way of apology, called, the Perjury of Ruffus and Gibboſius, and he tells us in his Preface, that he thinks he had ſufficiently obviated the virulency and barbarity of his accuſers.' Theſe words of Mr Morhoff were not rightly underſtood in the extract that was given of his book. 'We may put into this claſs alſo, the ſa'tires which attack the honour of the moſt virtuous 'perſons, as that which is called Caſauboni Corona 'Regia, &c. which was attributed, without any rea'ſon, to Mr du Puy, and which lays enormous crimes 'to the charge of James I, king of England, 'from which Mr du Puy has ſufficiently cleared 'him in his Perjurium Ruffi & Gibboſi (40).' Here are two faults: I. Without doubt the author of this extract thought that Erycius Puteanus was the famous Peter de Puy, whoſe life was written by Mr Rigault. When one ſays Mr du Puy without any addition, ſpeaking of books and learned men, he ought to mean him who was the king of France's library-keeper, that wonderful man, who, together with his brother, afforded ſuch aſſiſtance to men of letters, and who held ſuch learned conferences. II. It is not true that the author, of whom Morhoff ſpeaks, juſtifies king James from thoſe egregious crimes which are imputed to him in that ſatire; he only juſtified himſelf from having writ that wicked libel, and ſhewed the malice of thoſe that ſlandered him. We will quote a curious paſſage. They attribute to John Barclay a very biting ſatire writ againſt James, king of Great Britain, called Corona Regia; in which, under the ſpecious title of Panegyric, he very ſharply attacks the reign of Henry VIII, the birth and celibacy of queen Elizabeth, but eſpecially the birth and actions of James, whom he ſlanders by a diſcourſe as ingenious as it is injurious. Curioſity has carried that book over all Europe, and that prince finding himſelf painted in ſuch black colours, got all his allies to make a ſtrict enquiry after the author, in order to puniſh him. And there being ſome ſuſpicion of Erycius Puteanus, profeſſor of eloquence in the univerſity of Louvain, the archduke Albert cauſed an information to be brought againſt him, but he was found innocent (41).

(38) It is a book in 12mo, of 127 pages.

(39) Morhofius, Polyhiſt. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 78.

(40) Bibliotheque Univerſelle, Tom. xiii, pag. 23.

[G]. The Cenſura of Sir Thomas-Pope Blunt.] But blot out theſe words, Inter præcipua Galliæ ornamenta dum viveret

(41) Bullart, Academy of Sciences, Tom. i, pag. 198.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of Bullart (g) [H]. One of the principal friends he had at Milan was secretary of the council, whose name was John Baptist Saccus. I shall speak something of the manner after which Puteanus educated a young gentlewoman [I], for whom he interested himself.

(g) See also Mr Baillet, Jugemens sur les Critiq. Gramm. num. 503.

viveret, merito suo semper habitus est Erycius Puteanus (42). They are quoted from Casaubon's Preface to the Historia Augusta; but 1. our Puteanus was not a Frenchman. 2. He was not very much known when Casaubon published that book (43). He lived more than forty years after that book of Casaubon's was published.

(42) Pope Blount, Censura Authorum, pag. 689, Edit. Lond. 1690.

(43) It was printed at Paris 1603.

[H] And the Academy of Bullart.] You will find this there. ‘ (44) It was this great learning which ‘ having gained the heart of Urban VIII, induced ‘ this great Pontiff to send him his picture, in a ‘ medal of gold of great weight, and some copies of ‘ his works. It was the same learning that obliged ‘ the cardinal Frederic Borromeo to receive him ‘ into his palace when he returned to Milan, and ‘ to give him part of the relics of his uncle St Charles ‘ Borromeo, which that learned man gave to the ‘ collegiate church of St Peter in Louvain. It was ‘ also this learning that made him be tenderly be- ‘ loved by the count de Fuentes, governor of Milan, ‘ and after that by the arch-duke Albert, who when ‘ he had placed him in the chair of Justus Lipsius, ‘ received him also with honour into the number of his ‘ counsellors. To conclude, it was his learning that ‘ made him considerable in several courts of Europe ‘ (45). . . . . He had the honour to save the king of ‘ Poland's life, by the explaining of an enigmatical ‘ writing formed in unknown characters, which no ‘ body could either read or understand, and which ‘ contained a detestable and horrid conspiracy against ‘ that prince.’

(44) Bullart, ibid. Tom. II, pag. 220.

(45) What I suppress here is found in the remark [D].

We find the following words relating to this last head, at the beginning of his posthumous letters. ‘ Ejus ‘ ingenio ac solertia conjurationem Polonicam dete- ‘ ctam & sic impeditam fuisse tanti momenti fuit ut ‘ omne præmium superarit. Verba Patris Hermanni ‘ Hugonis qui Marchioni Spinolæ à sacris confes- ‘ sionibus erat, æstimanda hic sunt: mea cautio erit, ut ‘ Rex Poloniæ sciat, cui salutem debeat suam, ut ‘ Pharaonis liberalitatem imitetur in Josephum, aut ‘ Assueri gratitudinem in Mardochæum. Polo- ‘ nia quidem recepit hoc ab illo beneficium, sed in ‘ universum orbem Christianum extensum est, quod ‘ quale quantumque sit Bohemia & turbæ inde natæ ‘ satis declararunt (46). - - - By his ingenuity and dili- ‘ gence the Polish conspiracy was detected and prevented, ‘ a thing of such moment as exceeds all reward. The ‘ words of Father Herman Hugo, confessor to the marquis ‘ of Spinola, are very remarkable: I will take care that ‘ the king of Poland shall know to whom he owes his ‘ safety, that he may imitate the liberality of Pharaoh ‘ to Joseph, or of Ahasuerus to Mordecai. Poland, ‘ indeed, immediately received this benefit from him, but ‘ it extended to the whole Christian world, and of what ‘ sort, and how great it is, Bohemia, and the disturbances ‘ raised there, sufficiently declare.

(46) Vita Erycii Puteani, in limine, Epist. posthum.

[I] The manner after which Puteanus educated a young gentlewoman.] He writ to his friend, that he would not suffer her to let herself be kissed; that, says he, is dangerous for Italian girls. Our Flemish ones may do it without any hazard or detriment; they do not understand that there are any love-lessons in ogling and kisses; but those of your country know very well the consequences of it, and for this reason I have taught her our language, and all our customs, except that of kissing. If I did not quote the author's own words, perhaps the reader might think that I magnify this. I therefore do it, and you will find that I have fallen short of his meaning. De puella vestra quid scribam? Valet, viget, jam matura viro, jam plenis nubilis annis. Mores & linguam quoque nostram discit, tamen oscula non libat. Sic eam habeo, uti educata est. Scis tu, ut confringi vas cito Samium solet. Pudica quidem Belgarum oscula, sed tamen oscula: & insinuentur multo honestius, quam figantur. Abhorrere illa ab hoc ritu debet, & si pudicitiæ alumna esse velit, illæsum usque quoque verecundiæ florem servare. Nesciunt nostræ virgines ullum libidinis rudimentum oculis aut osculis inesse, ideoque fruuntur. Vestræ sciunt. Si nostra esse hæc quoque incipiet, particeps candoris nostri erit, & castæ immunitatis capax (47). Kempius quotes this passage in his learned and curious compilation de Osculis, and refers us to a professor of Philosophy at Leyden. This Professor, treating of temperance, one of the four cardinal virtues, proposes this among other questions: Is the custom which is allowed to strangers in the Low-Countries, and elsewhere, to kiss other people's wives, widows, and maidens, when they pay them a formal visit, conformable to the laws of chastity (48)? He answers, that this custom is very ancient; but the several wise men of antiquity looked on it as a little unchaste. He quotes Socrates, who would have people absolutely abstain from it, there being nothing which stirs up the fire of love so much as kisses. He quotes Seneca, as saying that a maiden was accused of impudence, because she received a kiss (49). He says, that the antients were persuaded, that kissing made a strong attack on chastity (50), and proves it by these words of Ovid:

> Oscula qui sumpsit, si non & cætera sumpsit,
> Hæc quoque quæ data sunt perdere dignus erat.
>
> He that took kisses, and took nothing more,
> Deserves to lose what he obtain'd before.

His conclusion is, that ceremonial kisses are not contrary to chastity, provided they are given without any further desire, and that we must not think that every body is so easily moved, that kisses of civility may not be altogether honest. Neque existimandum est, omnium esse tam pronam & irritabilem ad libidines naturam, quin citra violationem castitatis, ac citra libidinem ullam, id genus mediorum, officii tesserulæ causa, adhiberi possit (51). This determination, and the reason on which it is grounded, are solid and good; but what can be more foolish than the quotation out of Ovid, for the verses of that Poet concern only the kisses of lovers? This professor is to be blamed for quoting them on such a subject. He should have laid aside the learning that is in his thesis, and kept to the difference of climates, like Puteanus. Those familiarities which are dangerous in Italy, are very little, or not at all so in the northern countries. This is certainly the meaning of the Louvain professor; for he had no thoughts of a farewel kiss, or of a kiss upon the return from a long journey. There is no probability that on such occasions we would have excepted his young Italian maid from that custom. There were other occasions enough, in which he might prescribe her a particular rule, and in which she might, according to the knowledge of her nation (52), experience what Horace says (53).

(47) Erycius Puteanus, Epist. ad Joh. Baptistam Saccum, apud Martinum Kempium. Dissertat. XVI, de Osculis, num. 6, pag. 626.

(48) Quæritur tertio, An cum lepidus cultusque temperantiæ sit ignotus, bene conveniat receptus inter aliquot nostrates Belgas, aliasque nationes, osculo, qui peregrini soleant figunt alienis urbibus, vultui, ac virginibus, quando ea humanitatis causa fiebant? Athenæus Heurnius, Exercitat. Ethic. XLII, pag. 173.

(49) Apud sanctissimum Senatum, Virgines Sacerdotem de sexuali lasciva fuisse Sacerdotum] petentis, inde arguitur impudentiæ quod osculo fabrata fuisset. Ibid. Hear it not the question. See Seneca's Controvers. II, lib. I.

(50) Osculo pudicitiam virginis deliberi confebant veteres, unde illud Ovidii. Ib.

(51) Ibid.

(52) Nesciunt nostræ virgines . . . vestræ Kissing. See above, citation (47).

(53) Oscula quæ Veteres quarta parte ter Nectaream imbuere . . . K. Which Peter doth in Nectar lib. I, Ode XIII.

The Leyden professor hath not strained what he says of Socrates, Socrates apud Xenophontem abstinendum esse in totum ab ista osculandi consuetudine censet: quia nihil, inquit, ad amorem incendendum acrius est osculo (54), for that ancient Philosopher has expressed himself on this in the liveliest manner imaginable. Critobulus, said he (55), is more rash than if he had thrown himself upon the point of naked swords, or leaped into fire, for he had the boldness to kiss a fine face. Is this so great a rashness? says Xenophon to him. ‘ Truly ‘ I fancy I could very easily expose myself to the ‘ same danger. Ah, unfortunate, says Socrates, do ‘ you know what follows after kissing a fine face? ‘ Do not you lose your liberty? Do not you become ‘ a slave? Do not you engage in excessive expences ‘ to obtain a destructive pleasure? Do not you find ‘ yourself unable to do good, and constrained to fol- ‘ low those things which you would despise if your ‘ reason was not corrupted? O God! said Xenophon, ‘ this is to attribute a strange power to a kiss. ‘ Are you astonished at it, says Socrates? Do not ‘ you see little spiders whose bite is so venomous, ‘ that it causes strange pains, and makes people lose ‘ their senses? I know it very well, said Xenophon; ‘ but those creatures spit out their poison when they ‘ bite. Do you think, added Socrates, that love- ‘ kisses are not venomous, because you do not see ‘ the poison? Know, that a fair woman is an ani- ‘ mal more dangerous than scorpions, because they cannot (54) Heerebord. ubi supra.

(55) Xenophon, de Memorab. Socratis, lib.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google himself. As she was an Italian, he did not permit her to follow the Flemish customs,

'cannot hurt unless they touch us; but beauty 'wounds us without coming near us. What way 'soever we perceive it, it shoots out it's venom, 'and perverts our understandings. Perhaps it is 'for this reason that the Cupids are represented 'with bows and arrows, because a fair face wounds 'us from afar. I advise you then, Xenophon, when 'you see any beauty to fly without looking behind 'you; and as for you, Critobulus, I think it would 'be proper for you to be absent a whole year, for 'that will be time little enough to heal your wound.' Can any morality be more worthy of a great Philosopher than this? Our good Casuists would not judge it too severe, nor find any hyperbole in the comparisons of Socrates (56). The maxims of an antient Roman had no less rigour. He had a freed-man whom he loved very much, and a daughter who began to grow marrigeable. He knew that this freed-man had kissed her, and punished him severely, tho' there was something which might be urged as an excuse in the circumstances of that fault; but he had no regard to that, nor to the friendship which he had for the criminal, he considered only the consequences of the punishment. It is not said whether he was satisfied with the ordinary punishment of a kiss, which was whipping; there is a probability that he was not: however it be, we know that his chief motive was to let the damsel understand, that even in respect of kissing, she should keep herself a virgin for her husband, and preserve the first flower for him. 'Si alie-'næ fœminæ osculum infixum rationis sit verbere vin-'dicare; nonne qui illud puncto temporis fecerit, in-'comparabili horarum spatio verberatur, & suavitas 'voluptatis exiguæ dituturno dolore punitur (57). - - - 'If the laws inflict the punishment of whipping upon a 'man for giving a kiss to another woman than his 'own wife; is not he, who did that in a moment of 'time, scourged for some hours, and the sweetness of a short 'pleasure punished with a long continued pain.' Valerius maximus expresses himself finely on this subject. 'Quid P. Mænius? quam severum pudicitiæ custodem 'egit! In libertum namque gratum admodum sibi 'animadvertit, quia eum nubilis jam ætatis filiæ suæ 'osculum dedisse cognoverat, cùm præsertim non li-'bidine, sed errore lapsus videri posset. Ceterùm 'amaritudine pœnæ, teneris adhuc puellæ sensibus, 'castitatis disciplinam ingenerari magni æstimavit. 'Eique tam tristi exemplo præcepit, ut non solum 'virginitatem illibatam, sed etiam oscula ad virum sin-'cera perferret (58). - - - What of P. Mænius? how 'severe a guardian of chastity was he, in that he pu-'nished his freed-man, who was a great favourite with 'him, because he understood he had given a kiss to his 'daughter when she was marriageable; especially when 'he might seem to have committed that fault not through 'lust but mistake. But he thought it of great consequence 'to imprint a singular regard for chastity in that young 'maid, by the bitterness of the punishment. And he 'taught her, by this severe example, that she should pre-'serve not only her virginity untouched, but even her 'kisses for her husband.' Penelope would not have thought this morality too severe. See the remark [L] of her article. We have spoken (59) of a Florentine lady who managed herself after this rule, and of a law which was grounded on the same maxim (60). This law subsists no longer in France, but it is not abrogated at Naples. Half the donations of the man who is contracted, and dies before the consummation, belongs to the woman, if she gave him a kiss, but otherwise she has nothing. Does not this shew that she has no longer any first-fruits to bestow (61), and that therefore she ought to be indemnified? These are maxims unknown to a great many nations, that judge of things quite otherwise, and do not set them at so high a rate. We will quote the author of the Saint-Evremoniana. A kiss, which in Turkey, Italy, and Spain, is the beginning of adultery, at Paris is only a meer civility; and if that Persian, who made so many mysterious voyages to get three kisses of the fair Cyrus, had been at Paris, he would not have valued that pleasure so much as he did. There are no visits now in which there are not kisses, but they are like money, which we value just as we please; and as kisses are a merchandise which costs nothing, and does not wear out, and is always plentiful, no body is sparing of them, and few are greedy of them (62). What I am going to quote out of Montagne is not of the same sort, for that author considered only kisses of civility; but as what he says is an evidence of the custom of his time, I may join it to the words of the Saint-Evremoniana. The reader will distinguish where there is occasion. 'Scarcity gives a relish to meat. 'Thus the manner of salutations, which is particular 'to our nation, takes off, by it's frequency, the plea-'sure of kisses, which Socrates says is so dangerous 'and powerful to steal our hearts. It is an unpleasant 'custom, and injurious to the ladies, to hold out their 'lips to every one who has three footmen in his reti-'nue, how disagreeable soever he be.

*Cujus * livida naribus caninis*
Dependet glacies, rigetque barba:
Centum occurrere malo culilingis.

'And we ourselves do not get much by it; for as the 'world is at present, we must kiss fifty ugly ones 'for three that are handsome; and for a tender 'stomach, as such of my age have, one bad kiss is 'too much for a good one (63).' We have seen before (64), in a passage of Erasmus, what concerns the custom of England. We will see here what Kornmannus says concerning some towns in Germany (65): 'Apud Germanos in multis locis usitatum vidi Colo-'niæ Agrippinæ, Tubingæ (66), &c. Ubi nefas 'grande creditur si juvenis ad puellam veniens ipsam 'non osculetur, & amplexetur: aut in aliis locis con-'trarium obtinet: si enim quis apud nos in cho-'rea puellam osculetur indignata prorumperet. Quam 'me? &c. aut in occulto & ubi nemo videt benè 'patiuntur, imo per totam noctem non semel ferre, 'recusant: nam post factum osculum nihil reliqui ma-'net, quod cernatur: tantum de absterſione agitur. 'Among the Germans I have observed in many places, 'as at Cologn, Tubingen, &c. where it is accounted very 'uncivil, if a young man, approaching a young woman, 'does not kiss and embrace her; but in other places, 'the contrary custom prevails: for if any one among us 'should kiss a girl in a dance, she would immediately 'fly into a passion, and say, What do you take me to be? '&c. In private, and when no body sees them, they 'will take it well enough; nay, they will not refuse 'it all the night long; for a kiss leaves no marks be-'hind it; only wipe the mouth.'

The remark of the author of Saint-Evremoniana; That in some countries a kiss passes for the beginning of adultery, would make some commentators quote a hundred passages. They would not forget the words of Achilles Tatius, where kisses are called fine preludes; nor those wherein they are considered as such a powerful bait, that people are more astonished that they are not followed by the whole game, than that the other advances were in vain. Μέχει τινῶν ἐπὶ τῶν φιλημάτων ἱσάμεθα, φιλτάτη; καλὰ, τὰ προοίμια. προσθῶμεν ἤδη τι καὶ ἐρωτικόν. Quousque tandem charissima Leucippe, basiis insistemus? specioſa quidem certe initia hæc sunt, verum aliquid etiam ex iis quæ ab amantibus expetuntur, addamus (67). - - - How long, my dear Leucippe, shall we stick at kisses? These are certainly very fair beginnings; but let us add a little more of what lovers desire. Οὐδέν σε ἠρέθισεν εἰς ἀφροδίτην κἂν μίαν, ὦ δέησις, ὦ χρόνε, ἐχ ἡ τῶν σωμάτων συμπλοκή. ἀλλὰ, τὸ πάντων ὑβρεισικώτατον, προσαπτόμενος, καὶ φιλῶν, ὕτως ἀνέσης ὡς ἄλλη γυνή. Quid, quod animum tuum non modo non pellexerunt preces meæ, ut semel saltem mihi morem gereres: sed ne ullum quidem idonei temporis opportunitas, aut mutuus complexus, aut aliud quidpiam apud te pondus habuerunt. Quinimo, quod omnium contumeliosissimum est, è complexu meo, EX IPSIS DISSUAVIATIONIBUS æque discedis atque alia mulier (68). - - - - What shall I say, not only intreaties have been insufficient to prevail on you

(56) Confer quæ Achilles Tatius, lib. ii, pag. m. 79.

(57) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxi, cap. xi.

(58) Valer. Maximus, lib. vi, cap. i, num. 4, pag. m. 513.

(59) In citation (1), of the article GUALDRADA.

(60) Citation (1), of the article MAMMILARIANS.

(61) Quia ex osculo vir capit gaudium, & sponsa verecundiam, & quod Sponsus osculando videtur quasi cepisse castrum. Alii eam assignant rationem, quia osculum est actus carnis, & pro medietate est quasi corrupta caro. Kempius, Dissert. XV, de Osculis, pag. 607.

(62) Saint Evremoniana, pag. 271, Dutch edition 1701.

* Mart. Epigr. VII.

(63) Montagne's Essays, book iii, ch. v, pag. m. 271.

(64) Citation (57), of the article ERASMUS.

(65) Kornmannus, de Linea Amoris, pag. m. 189, 190.

(66) Thomas Lanfius, apud Kempium, Dissert. XVI, pag. 624, has given the lie to Kornmannus about Tubingen.

(67) Achilles Tatius, lib. ii, pag. 107.

(68) Ibid. lib. v, pag. 347.

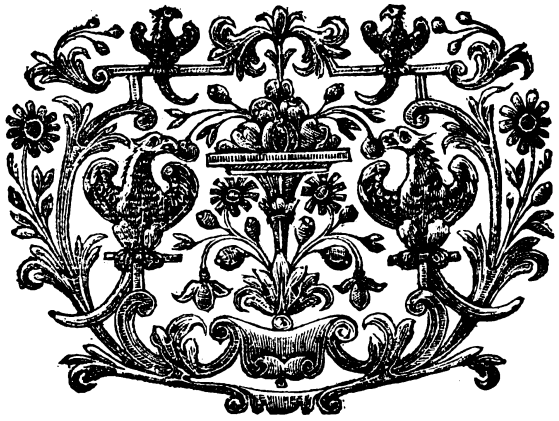
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cuſtoms, which he would not have thought to be dangerous if ſhe had been born at Louvain.



ſo much as once to grant me the favour, but even no opportunity of time, or mutual embraces, or any thing elſe have any weight with you. Nay what is moſt provoking of all, from my embraces, and even kiſſes, you go away as a woman would do. Theſe are the complaints of a woman. But I may very well be allowed to comment on theſe words of the Saint-Evremoniana, That a kiſs is a merchandiſe which does not wear out. A man who had not run through a courſe of Philoſophy, and yet was uſed to inform himſelf of the reaſons of every thing, aſked a Phyſician one day, why certain ſtatues of braſs bear the marks of the kiſſes which are given them (69), and that no ſuch thing was ever perceived on the face of the moſt famous courteſans? The Phyſician told him, that the ſtatues were expoſed for many ages to the devotion of a prodigious number of people, but that the duration of beauty is very ſhort. He was not ſatisfied with this, but ſaid, that the difference between the hardneſs of the braſs and the ſoftneſs of the fleſh ought to make a compenſation, and ſo much the more, becauſe the kiſſes of reſpect which are given to the idols are very ſuperficial, and do not come near the forcible impreſſion of the others. The Phyſician was ſenſible of theſe two diſparities, and gave another reaſon; which was, that whatever the rubbing takes off from the ſtatue, is loſt for ever, whereas what is loſt in living bodies is reſtored by their nouriſhment: that man was very well ſatisfied with this ſecond anſwer. The rigid readers may ſay theſe are trifles, but muſt there be no trifles in ſuch volumes as theſe? Muſt not the reader find from time to time a place, where he may reſt, I mean, ſome things that are not ſerious.

To conclude, I muſt needs ſay, that Puteanus was much in the right, not to breed an Italian girl as they did the Flemiſh ones. All muſt act in ſuch an affair, according to the law of cuſtom; neither the law of nations, nor the law of nature include this part of education? the diverſity of climates and opinions is the beſt rule here. We ſhall ſee, in another place (70), what a profeſſor of Groningen has obſerved in a work, in which he has drawn the parallel of ſome cuſtoms, which the Rigoriſts (71) condemned, and of ſome others which they allowed of.

(69) See, above, citation (17), of the article GERGENTI, to which we may add this paſſage of Lucretius, lib. I, ver. 317.
Tum portas propter ahena
Signa manus dextras oſtendunt attenuari
Sæpe ſalutantum tactu, præterque meantum.
The brazen ſtatues that our gates adorn,
Shew their right hands diminiſhed and worn
By th' touch of theſe that viſit or paſs by.
CREECH.

(70) In the remark [M], of the article SAINT-ALDEGONDE.

(71) Note, that this name is not that which is given them by the Proteſtants of Holland: for they call them Precijiſts.

QUELLENEC

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Q.

QUELLENEC (CHARLES DE) Baron of Pont in Bretagne, made a great figure, under the name of Soubiſe, among the Proteſtants, in the reign of Charles IX. He took the name of Soubiſe in 1568, when he married Catherine de Parthenai, the only daughter of John de Parthenai, lord of Soubiſe. We ſhew in another place (a) ſome of the conjunctures in which he evidenced a great deal of courage, and how he defended himſelf againſt thoſe who committed the Paris Maſſacre on St Bartholomews day (b), under whom he was forced to fall at laſt. The curioſity of ſome of the court ladies, with reſpect to his naked body, which was laid, with the others, before the Louvre, has already been taken notice of (c). The proceſs of impotency which was entered againſt him [A], and which will give me occaſion

(a) In the article SOUBISE (JOHN DE PARTHENAI).

(b) See citation (8), of the article PARTHENAI (CATHERINE DE).

(c) Ibid.

[A] The proceſs of impotency entered againſt him.] Thuanus ſays expreſsly, that it was his mother-in-law, and not his wife, who entered the proceſs. Mr Varillas ſays the ſame thing in his two editions of Charles IX. Mezerai, not conſidering the conſequences, has ſaid of the wife what Thuanus ſaid of the mother-in-law. I have cenſured him for it (1), for the honour and glory of Catherine de Parthenai; for altho' a woman may enter ſuch a proceſs without blemiſhing her honour, yet it is better not to do it, eſpecially conſidering the youth of the heireſs of Soubiſe. There are certain actions (2) which are no ſin, and do not imprint any note of infamy, neither de facto, nor de jure; however, becauſe it is better to let them alone than to do them, they have ſomething which tarniſhes the reputation; ſo that an Hiſtorian ought to take great care not to impute them to thoſe who did them not. He is not allowed to be unexact, and to confound the mother with the daughter, or one ſiſter with another. The more celebrated a Hiſtorian is, the more cautious he ought to be, for when he is very famous, he becomes a public ſource; he alone ſerves as an original record to a great many writers all the world over. How many able men are there that will not think themſelves deceived if they follow Mezerai (3)?

I have ſaid ſomething in another place (4) which may ſerve as an excuſe to the lady Soubiſe; and certainly what ſhe did againſt her ſon-in-law needs an apology. A time of perſecution, ſuch as ſhe lived in, was not proper for ſuch proceedings. A church under trouble and arms at the ſame time, and which is in that condition, in order to maintain the reformation of doctrine and manners, ought not, under pretence of impotency, to draw a young huſband before judges of a contrary religion. It is certain, that in all times and places, proceſſes of this nature bring very little honour to thoſe that enter them; and whether they obtain a new huſband, or not, they are always an object of raillery and contempt as long as they live, and not without reaſon; for the ſteps they take are ſo contrary to modeſty, a virtue which is the crown and ornament of that ſex, and without which they cannot ſhare in human glory, that no body can have any reſpect for a woman who takes ſuch a courſe.

Without going out of the bounds of indulgence, we may ſay here of thoſe women, what was ſaid, tho' a little too rigorouſly, againſt the widows which marry. I ſhall uſe Mr du Vair's own terms (5). St Jerom to Marcellus, ſays, that ſecundas nuptias non appetimus, ſed concedimus, by a certain indulgence, which is not altogether exempt from blemiſh: as if he ſhould ſay with the law, indulgentia quos liberat notat . . . (6). In what terms ſoever the ſaying of the Apoſtle be expreſſed, juniores viduæ nubant, we muſt conceive that it was ſaid by way of indulgence to the incontinence of ſome women, ut maritum potius accipiant quam diabolum, & ſciant ſibi non tam maritos datos quam adulteros imputatos, as St Jerome ſays, ad Salvinam. Now as St Cyprian ſays, aliud eſt ad veniam ſtare, aliud eſt ad gloriam pervenire. There is a great deal of difference between ſaying, that their incontinence ſhall not be imputed to them for a ſin, and to ſay that it ſhall be imputed to them for grace. This is the moſt favourable judgment that can be made of theſe pleaders in matters of impotency, conſidering the manner of proceeding which they muſt follow.

I. It is a great ſtep to confeſs publickly, that one cannot contain one's ſelf. Now every woman who enters ſuch a proceſs, declares before all the world, that ſhe has this defect: ſhe delivers an act (7) which remains with the Public Notaries, and which affords a ſubject of raillery to thoſe who are inclined to be merry, and even an occaſion of fear to a new huſband. For if he be obliged to take long voyages, or has a long ſickneſs, how ſhall he rely on the virtue of a wife who has confeſſed her incontinence to the whole world?

II. The interrogatories they muſt anſwer before the judges, are ſo nice and troubleſome for a woman of honour, that none can have a good opinion of a maid who can paſs thoſe bounds, and anſwer to ſuch queſtions. I ſay a maid, becauſe thoſe who accuſe their huſbands generally pretend to be ſuch; and they muſt needs do it when it is their firſt marriage, as it is generally. An advocate ſtrangly puzzled ſuch a complainant once: he aſked her, in the preſence of ſeveral people, whether her huſband had careſſed, kiſſed, and embraced her. She anſwered yes. Who told you, quoth he, that this is not enough? Where did you learn the reſt? If you have your maidenhead, as you pretend, you ought not to know that your huſband is impotent; and if you know it, it is a ſign that you have tried what another man can do? He preſſed her ſo hard, that ſhe bluſhed, and ſaid ſhe could not anſwer to ſuch puzzling queſtions. I will give the whole ſtory in Latin. Erumpit interdum inverecunda intemperies mulierum. . . . Erumpit inquam impudens, & in facie erubeſcentium populorum, genialis tori revelat & denudat arcana, & de mariti frigiditate conqueritur, allegans hanc ſufficientem & evidentem repudii vel divortii cauſam, quod ſemivir eſt, & inutilis matrimonio, qui non eſt promptus ad coitum. Eleganter quidem Gaufridus de Heroum villa, familiaris meus, unius talium in cauſa hujuſmodi confudit audaciam. Cum enim ei patronus datus eſſet à judice celebraturo, ut putabatur divortium, & mulier generoſa audientibus amicis & ſuffragatoribus, advocato ut ſit diligentius merita cauſæ ſuæ exponeret, ſcrutatus eſt ab ea vir prudens, an alium maritum quandoque habuerit. Quod cum illa negaſſet, quæſivit iterum an adhuc virgo eſſet, dicens: hoc ſibi inquiſitu, & ſcitu perneceſſarium, ne à diſcreto judice caperetur occaſione aliqua in ſermone. Illa vero hoc (verecunde tamen, eo quod ſibi non bene credebatur) aſſeruit. Et ille, an ſimul de noctu dormire confueverint

(1) In the remark [C], of the article PARTHENAI (CATHERINE DE).

(2) Certain qualities are named in the ſchools, perfectio ſimpliciter ſimplex. Every quality melior ipſa quam non ipſe, is of that ſpecies.

(3) Franciſcus Quelletrius Dux à Britannia, cui ab uxore Catharina Parthenia Subizia impotentiæ accuſato divortium intentabatur. Ulr. Huber. Hiſt. Civil. Tom. ii, pag. 353.

(4) See the remark [C], of the article PARTHENAI (CATHERINE DE).

(5) Du Vair, pag. 820, of his works, Geneva Edit. 1617.

(6) Ibid. pag. 824, 825.

(7) Note, that I do not mean that they make ſuch a confeſſion in direct terms; we know that they generally ſpeak only of the commendable deſire they have of getting children; but the public is not ſatisfied with that, they generally put another conſtruction upon it.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google occasion to quote some passages of a book published in the year 1612, was the true cause consueverint, & se invicem osculari & amplexari maritus & ipsa, inquisivit. Quæ omnia cum illa fateretur: unde ergo, inquit patronus, nosti virgo pudicissima, prudentissima, pudoratissima, quod efficacem tecum virum non impleverit, & totius matrimonii jura non persolvit? Quis te docuit, quid sit coitus, ut eum tecum coiisse neges, inter tot oscula, tot amplexus, qui te pro libitu quoties voluit pertractavit licentia maritali? Nam & quædam animantia certum est se invicem osculando misceri. Alia se tenuiter tangendo concipiunt. Et sunt qui suo gravidante calore, ab aëre temperato impregnantur, & pariunt. Hic illa tandem erubuit, hoc solum dicens, se quid ad hujusmodi captiones biscret, non habere (8).

(8) Joan. Sarefberiensis, in Policratico, sive de nugis curialium, & vestigiis Philosophorum, lib. viii, cap. xi, pag. m. 504, 505.

III. They must resolve to suffer an inspection of the secret parts. Other proofs are too weak, for this reason the judges have recourse to this, and order an inspection; they cause the woman to be inspected, to see whether she be deflowred. Where is the modesty of those who dare begin a process which has such consequences? With what impudence must they be armed? There was an advocate of the parliament of Paris, in the beginning of the reign of Lewis XIII, who wrote strenuously against the inspection, and used two arguments; one is, that it is immodest; the other, that is uncertain. This is, says he (9), the first thing that is now ordered in such cases, when the marriage has been contracted with a maid, who being inspected, and reported to be an undefiled virgin, all the proof of the husband's impotency, and his condemnation are grounded upon it .... (10). Such an inspection is very indecent, and not becoming the modesty which a woman ought to have, and therefore it is odious, and she ought to avoid it, there being nothing more commendable in a woman than modesty. Gratia verecundiæ mulieris super aurum, Eccles. vii. especially in her who calls herself a virgin, quæ seipsam debet erubescere, & nudam videre non posse, says St Jerom. Epistola citata ad Lætam. De Institutione filiæ; and St Ambrose in his 64th epistle, Nihil sanctius in virgine quam verecundia; and in the first book of offices, Est pudicitiæ comes verecundia; and again, in the first chapter of the book of the institution of a virgin; In virgine est dos quædam verecundia quæ taciturnitate cognoscitur, so that she who complains of her husband's impotency, and, in order to a separation, suffers men to see, pry into, and handle those parts which nature would have to be hid, ought to be looked on as impudent, and without shame ... (11). A woman, (says Herodotus, at the beginning of his history) puts off shame with her shift. And St Cyprian, De habitu virginum, tract. 2. Simul cum amictu corporis, pudor ponitur. Pliny, in the seventeenth chapter of the seventh book of his Natural History, says, that the bodies of drowned men always float on their backs, with their faces upwards; but women with their bellies and faces downwards, as if nature, careful of their honour, would hide that which could not modestly be seen. Quasi pudori defunctarum parcente Naturâ. Nay, this putting off of cloaths, and denudation, was formerly a punishment, as Nicephorus says, in the eighth chapter of the seventh book of his History; and Tacitus, libro de Moribus Germanorum, speaking of the punishment of adulterous women. For this only reason several have looked on these inspections as evil, and reproved them. St Ambrose, in the same epistle, 64, reproving Syagrius, bishop of Verona, for ordering that a nun, who was accused of leudness, should be searched, uses these words: Quid sibi velit, & quò spectet quod Obstetricem adhibendam credideris non possum advertere; itane ergo liberum erit accusare omnibus, & cùm probatione destiterint, petere genitalium secretorum inspectionem? & addicentur semper sacræ virgines ad hujusmodi ludibria, quæ & visu & auditu horrori & pudori sunt? Quæque in alienis auribus sine damno pudoris resonari non queunt, ea possunt sine ejus tentari verecundia (12)? By which it appears, that this great man abhorred to hear these things so much as spoken of; so far was he from approving them, adding, that he had never read that maids used to be inspected. We do not find that the Romans, who were ignorant of nothing that belonged to good manners, used this means to convict their vestals who were accused of incest, tho' they were very severe in their enquiries after, and in the punishment of that crime ... (13). From whence we may conclude, that the Romans did not, in those doubtful cases, inspect the women to be satisfied, and thence drew proofs of their virginity or corruption, as is done now adays; whether they judged that kind of proof uncertain, and not to be depended on, or whether they rejected it as indecent, and contrary to a woman's modesty; which was so much in esteem with them, that the same Valerius, in the first chapter of the second book, speaking of Spurius Carvilius, who put away his wife because she was barren, says, that they would not let her be searched. Quò matronale decus, munimento verecundiæ tutius esset, in jus vocanti corpus ejus attingere non permiserunt, ut inviolata manus alienæ tactu relinqueretur. In which they were not like those, who immediately, upon a process of separation, order that the woman shall be inspected, tho' they might begin in a more decent manner with the inspection of the husband, and the wife might be searched, if there was occasion for it, without going so fast, or causing them to be searched at the same time without any interval, that they may the sooner be separated; as if it was a thing that required great haste, and that it could not be deferred without the public being very much concerned at it.

(9) Vincent Tagereau, Discourse of the Impotency of Men and Women, chap. iv, pag. 57, Edit. of Paris 1612.

(10) Ibid. pag. 58.

(11) Ibid. pag. 60.

(12) You will find in Mr Du Pin's Biblioth. Tom. ii, pag. 278, Dutch edition, an exact and true abridgment of this letter of St Ambrose to Syagrius.

(13) Tagereau, ubi supra, pag. 63.

IV. The congress must be resolved upon, for almost all other means of discovering impotency are insufficient. Now it is impossible to conceive, that a woman, who hath not lost all shame, can think, without horror, on the circumstances of a congress; for after the parties have taken an oath (14), that they will endeavour sincerely, and without dissimulation, to consummate the marriage, without any let or hindrance on either side, and after the viewers have sworn, that they will make a faithful relation of what shall pass at the congress, they retire into a chamber, where the man and the woman are searched again; the man to know whether he hath no ailment ..... the woman, to consider the condition of her privy parts, and by that means to know the difference of the dilatation before and after the congress, and whether there hath been any intromission. ..... In [*] some processes (as that of de Bray) (15), the parties are viewed naked, even from the crowns of their heads to the soles of their feet, etiam in podice, to know whether they have any thing about them that may advance or hinder copulation. The privy parts of the man are washed with warm water, (to what purpose?) and the woman put for some time into an half bath (16). This done, the man and the woman go into one bed in the day-time, the men-viewers being present, who remain in the chamber, or retire (if both or one of the parties require it) into some wardrobe or adjacent gallery, the door being half open. As for the matrons, they keep about the bed; and the curtains being drawn, it is the man's business to do his duty, and prove his power by carnally knowing his wife, &c (17). .... To conclude, the parties having been some time in bed, as an hour or two, the viewers being called, or coming of their own accord, and opening the curtains, inform themselves of what has passed between them, and search the woman again, to know whether she is wider than when she went to bed, and whether the intromission has been made; and also an facta sit emissio, ubi, quid, & quale emissum. This is not done without a candle, and spectacles for those who use them, nor without very nasty and odious enquiries; and then they make their verbal process of what was done at the congress, or rather of what they would have, which they deliver to the Judge, who is in the hall, or some other room of the house, with the Proctors and practitioners of the Ecclesiastical Court, waiting the end of this action. This is not all, the husband is permitted to call the searchers, if he succeeds. Antony Hotman observes that Dr Hostiensis advised the midwives to use warm water, to wash the bodies of the women they inspect, in order to take off any restringents that may have been used; which is repeated by Panormus, in cap. Fraternitatis de frigid. & malef. (18). The Protectors of the Congress pretended that this method was sure; but Antony Hotman maintained, that it was deceitful. When they are told, says he (19), of the artifices used by some women to straiten themselves, they pay no regard to it, insisting, that by the washing used at the visitation, all that is removed, and the truth appears. Yet we have seen, in our time, a woman of no great quality, who having a process against her husband for impotency, and afterwards dropped it, because she proved with child, had, by art, so straitened herself for carrying on the process, that she had need of a Surgeon at her labour. Et Prepositus in cap. consultationis de frigidis & malef. And after him the author of the book intituled, Sylva

(14) Ibid. pag. 123.

[*] This appears by the report of the last congress, dated April 21, 1578.

(15) He was a treasurer. See Brantome, in the first volume of the Gallant Ladies, pag. m. 97, 98.

(16) See the reason below, citation (18).

(17) See the text below, citation (31).

(18) Antoine Horman, pag. 47, of the first Treatise de la Dissolution du Mariage.

(19) Idem, in the 2d Treatise, pag. 34. See also pag. 47, of the first Treatise.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cauſe why they were ſo curious. Thuanus doth not tell us that the queen-mother would

Sylva Nuptialis, lib. 2. ampliatione 5. relate that a woman in Italy ſtraitened herſelf ſo very much to pleaſe her huſband, that afterwards neither he, nor any other man could have to do with her. Here is another paſſage of this Pariſian Advocate (20). De Bray, who is ſo much talked of, and whoſe caſe has been printed, ſiniſtrum tantum habebat teſticulum ex defectu naturali, and at the firſt congreſs (having gone thither twice in ſeveral days) arrexerat ſufficienter ad coeundum, ac ſubſtantiam ſeroſam & aquoſam extra vas emiſerat, quæ non poterat dici verum ſemen, ſed non intromiſerat, according to the report of † three Phyſicians, three Surgeons, and three Matrons, who were preſent. The Judges, without minding the natural defect, ordered that ‡ De Bray ſhould come to the congreſs again, before they came to a definitive ſentence, if he thought fit to do it; (which was as much as to ſay, that the intromiſſion had been wanting) and having declared that he would not go, and that his wife had hindered him twice when he was there, he was ſeparated only becauſe there had been no intromiſſion in the congreſs, tho' there was no proof in the proceſs of the virginity of his wife. And it is remarkable, that when he ‡ went to the congreſs the ſecond time, the Judges adviſed him, that if there was an intromiſſion he ſhould call the ſearchers, that they might ſee and teſtify it. By which it is plain, that they do not conſider, in theſe proceſſes, the quality of the ſeed, nor whether the man arrigit etiam ſufficienter ad coeundum: but they require a viſible intromiſſion. (a moſt indecent thing!) Had not this Lawyer reaſon to maintain (21), that the congreſs is not only more proper to ſuppreſs the truth, than to bring it to light, but alſo that it is immodeſt and brutiſh? Has he not reaſon to oppoſe to the impudence of thoſe who demand it, the remainder of ſhame which is ſeen in public ſtews? Even common women, ſays he (22), ſhut up and hide themſelves. Eſt aliqua etiam proſtitutis modeſtia (ſays the ſame Seneca) & illa corpora publico objecta ludibrio aliquid, quo infœlix patientia lateat, obtendunt, adeo quodammodo lupanar verecundum eſt: and Ovid;

Ignoto Meretrix corpus junctura Quiriti,
Oppoſita populum ſubmovet ante ſera.

He quotes (23) alſo theſe fine words of St Auguſtin; 'Opus ipſum quod libidine peragitur, non ſolùm in 'quibuſque ſtupris ubi latebræ ad ſubterfugienda 'hominum judicia requiruntur, verùm etiam in 'uſu ſcortorum (quam terrena Civitas licitam tur-'pitudinem fecit) quamvis id agatur quod ejus Civi-'tatis nulla lex vindicat, devitat tamen publicum 'etiam permiſſa & impunita libido conſpectum: & 'verecundia naturali, habent proviſum Lupanaria ipſa 'ſecretum, faciliuſque potuit impudicitia non habere 'vincula prohibitionis, quam impudentia removere la-'tibula illius fœditatis. Quid concubitus conjugalis 'qui ſecundum matrimonialium præſcripta tabularum 'procreandorum ſit cauſa liberorum? nonnè & ipſe, 'quamvis ſit licitus & honeſtus, remotum ab arbitris 'cubile conquirit? nonnè omnes famulos, atque ipſos 'etiam Paranymphos, & quoſcumque ingredi quælibet 'neceſſitudo permiſerat, antè mittit foras quam vel 'blandiri conjux conjugi poſſit? Nec ipſi filii, ſi qui 'jam inde nati ſunt, teſtes fieri permittuntur. - - - 'The act itſelf, not only in all caſes where concealment 'is ſought to avoid public juſtice, but alſo in the uſe of 'common women (a vice tolerated by the ſtate) tho' the 'action be ſuch as no law takes cognizance of; yet even 'in theſe caſes, where it is done with impunity, ſhuns 'the public view; and by a natural modeſty, the very 'ſtews are provided with their ſecret places. And it 'has been found eaſier to take from immodeſty the re-'ſtraint of a probibition, than for impudence to remove 'the concealments of that filthineſs. What ſhall we ſay 'of conjugal embraces in lawful matrimony for procreation 'of children? Does not even that, tho' lawful and 'honeſt, ſeek a place retired from all obſervers? Are not 'all the ſervants, and the bride-maids, and all relations 'who were before admitted, obliged to retire before the 'huſband can ſo much as careſs his wife, nor are the chil-'dren themſelves, if any be of that marriage, permitted 'to be preſent.'

Theſe are the proceedings which the heireſs of Soubiſe was to ſubmit to, when ſhe was at law with the Baron du Pont. They would injure the memory of the illuſtrious mother of the duke de Rohan, that heroine, who ſignalized herſelf at the ſiege of Rochelle; if it were true, that in the prime of youth, modeſty did not prevent her entering ſuch an action againſt her huſband, as obliged her to act ſuch a part. It is for this reaſon I have taken great pains to excuſe her, by laying all this contrivance upon her mother. I have endeavoured alſo to excuſe her mother. When I ſaid, that in thoſe times they were to ſubmit to ſuch proceedings, I had regard to the Decree of the parliament of Paris, which forbad, on the eighteenth of February, 1677, the Judges, Civil and Eccleſiaſtical, to order, for the time to come, any proof of congreſs in matrimonial cauſes (24). It is ſtrange that ſo many wiſe heads ſhould be ſo long before they thought of aboliſhing this law. 'There have been more diſſolutions 'of marriages within theſe hundred years, ſince the 'introducing of the congreſs into France, than were 'ever ſeen before. It is for this reaſon that the par-'liament of Paris, at laſt judging that the congreſs 'was any enemy to chaſtity, and that it was not 'a true proof of a man's virility, abrogated it the 'eighteenth of February, 1677, by a ſolemn decree, 'ℭc (25).' Theſe are the words of an able Phyſician, who had ſaid before (26), 'That the congreſs, which 'had been formerly aboliſhed by the emperor Juſti-'nian, as contrary to Chriſtian purity, was re-'eſtabliſhed by ſome curious people of our age: for 'it is the infamy of both ſexes, and the diſhonour 'of our times: I do not believe that we can find in 'Hiſtory any examples of it but what are ridiculous. 'It is a law which offends modeſty; it is too hard 'and ſevere on the man. It expoſes to public view 'thoſe parts which nature has hid with ſo great care; 'and a man muſt have witneſſes, which he avoids 'when he follows the law of nature; for what a ſhame 'is it to ſhew that at mid-day, which we are careful 'to hide even in the night? It is only a pretence for 'a divorce, and an effect of the laſciviouſneſs and 'audaciouſneſs of women. It is they have produced 'in the minds of the Judges the thought of a trial as 'uncertain as it is immodeſt: perhaps there is not 'one man of a thouſand, who can come off victorious 'from this public congreſs.' There has been a complaint of this abuſe a long time. The Advocate I have quoted, and who lived at the beginning of the XVIIth century, ſets forth very pathetically the injuſtice of this cuſtom; and ſeeing the diſorder increaſe, he endeavoured to oppoſe it. And foraſmuch, ſays he (27), as the ſeparations for impotency are more frequent now than they ever have been, altho' there are not more men impotent now than formerly, which have been always rare (thoſe at leaſt in whom one may perceive any token by the ſearch, whether the defect be natural or accidental) and of ten ſeparations we ſhall hardly find one, where they have been able to diſcern any defect in the man by inſpection; which makes many people wonder and complain of it: I have enquired, with the greateſt diligence, from whence this can proceed. He obſerves that many people favoured theſe diſſolutions of marriages. Not being able to believe that there can be ſo much impudence, and ſo little conſcience in him, or her who complains, that they ſhould demand a ſeparation without any reaſon; as ſoon as ſuch proceſſes are entered, they haſten to the condemnation of the party who is accuſed of impotency. And if it is the man, and he refuſe out of ſhame, or for ſome other reaſon, to accept of the congreſs, or has no intromiſſion, they declare him impotent, tho' there appears no other defect in him; ſaying, that if they were in the ſame caſe, they would ſhew their ſtrength and vigour. But, perhaps, they would find it difficult, if they ſhould happen to be in the ſame trouble, by reaſon of the ſhame, fear, vexation, hatred, and other difficulties which neceſſarily attend ſuch an act, and hinder the execution of it (28). He gives us a great many particulars on this head, which are very curious and rational, and which I ſhall ſet down, without fearing that wiſe men will take it amiſs; for can any one be offended to find here what a grave author publiſhed by authority at Paris above eighty years ago (29), and the only deſign of which is to inſpire horror for theſe unlawful and immodeſt cuſtoms (30). 'It is a ſtrange and almoſt in-'credible thing, that ſuch an act that was blamed by 'the Pagans for it's filthineſs, and for being againſt 'nature, (that is to ſay, againſt modeſty, which, according (20) Tagereau, ibid. pag. 30, 31, 32.

† This report was made the 21th of April 1578.

‡ It is the ordinance of the 14th of May following.

‡ This appears by the report and verbal proceſs of the laſt congreſs.

(21) See the 7th chapter of his treatiſe.

(22) Ibid. pag. 353. He quotes pag. 157, theſe verſes of Martial, Epigr. XXXV; (and not XCI, as he takes it).
Et meretrix abigit teſtem veloque ſeraque,
Raraque Summenii fornice rima patet.

(23) Idem, pag. 154, 155, quoting the 18th chapter of the 14th book de Civitate Dei.

(24) Venette, Tableau de l'Amour Conjugal, pag. 579. See the Journal des Sçavans, of the fifth of July 1677, pag. 208, Dutch Edit.

(25) Nicolas Venette, doctor of Phyſic, royal profeſſor of Anatomy and Surgery, and dean of the college of Phyſicians at Rochelle, pag. 578, 579, of his Tableau de l'Amour Conjugal, 7th Edit. 1696. This edition is larger and more correct than the preceeding ones. The author has added a preface to it, which deſerves to be read. I have quoted him in the article JOUBERTUS, remark [C].

(26) Ibid. pag. 577.

(27) Tagereau, ubi ſupra, pag. 7, 8.

(28) Ibid. pag. 9, 10.

(29) The ſecond edition of Tagereau's book, which I uſe, is of the year 1612, the firſt is of the year 1611.

(30) Ibid. pag. 159, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google would see, by the naked body of this Baron, whether the process was well or ill grounded. Neither do our other famous Historians say so. However, it might be true

'cording to St Augustin, is naturally in all men) 'should be received amongst Christians, and by church-'men, who should have more modesty than other 'people. It is true, it is not long since they began 'to use this method, being first introduced, as may 'be supposed, by some impudent man, who being 'prosecuted for a separation, demanded a congress, 'boasting that he would there shew his vigour, which 'was permitted, there being more appearance than 'reason for it. It perhaps also was allowed, to prevent 'women from undertaking such processes, lest they 'should be obliged to perform such an unseemly act. 'But this method has neither served to discover the 'truth and ability of men, nor to deter women from 'these prosecutions. On the contrary, they are be-'come bolder, knowing very well that the intromis-'sion required at the congress, to prevent a separa-'tion, depends on them, no man whatsoever being 'able to do it without their consent, either voluntary 'or forced (31), and that it is a sure and infallible 'way of gaining their cause, and being separated: 'and, which is worse, they have introduced the cu-'stom of ordering a congress, when a man is sued for 'impotency, omitting, or neglecting, the ancient 'forms, insomuch that men are compelled, by im-'prisonment, to submit to a congress, if they refuse 'to do it freely, or do not consent to a separation; 'a thing so absurd, that one would hardly believe it, 'if one did not see it. Now this custom being in-'troduced without any good reason, ought neither to 'be followed nor continued. Quod enim non ratione 'introductum est, sed errore primum, deinde consuetudine 'obtentum est, in aliis similibus obtinere non debet. l. 'Quod non ratione. De legibus & senatus-consultis. 'Besides the shame which accompanies the congress, 'sufficient to hinder the execution, it's circumstances 'render it impossible, viz. The fear which a man has 'of so many people that see, search, and handle 'him, on whose report his reputation depends, nay, his 'ruin or preservation; as also of failing in that which 'he has undertaken, and which is of so great impor-'tance to him. The vexation of being prosecuted 'upon such a shameful account, which renders him 'the town-talk, and laughing-stock of every body. 'The hatred also which he has for his wife, for 'bringing him to that, instead of procuring his ho-'nour and advantage. Add to this the constraint put 'upon him, by confining him in a prison if he will 'not go to the congress, or consent to the separation. 'All these things are true remedies of love, and di-'rectly contrary to it's principal work and action, 'which requires secrecy, assurance, friendship, and 'a mind not ruffled by shame, fear, hatred, and vexa-'tion, which infallibly render the effect and execution 'of the congress very difficult, and even impossible; 'as Ambrose Paré observes in his works, book twenty-'eight, of the sixth edition, where he treats of the 'report of the impotency of men and women: it is not 'in the first editions. And a man must be without 'shame and apprehension of any thing, and worse 'than a beast, who can perform the congress, not-'withstanding all these hindrances; considering also '(as St Augustin says, in the fourteenth book De 'Civitate Dei, the twenty-third chapter) that copu-'lation doth not depend only on our will, &c.'

(31) He says, pag. 125, concerning the congrès souvent adviennent des altercations honteuses & ridicules, l'homme se plaignant que la partie ne le veut laisser faire, & empesche l'intromission: elle le niant, & disant qu'il y veut mettre le doigt & la dilater, & ouvrir par ce moyen .... encore ne sçauroit il quelque erection qu'il fasse, si sa partie veut l'empescher, si on ne lui tenoit les mains & les genoux, ce qui ne se fait pas.

Mr Venette is too much a gentleman to take it ill, if I believe that he is mistaken in what he says of Justinian. I have heard very learned Civilians say, that there are no footsteps of the congress in the old Civil-Law, and that is an abomination invented in these last ages. We will quote Vincent Tagereau again (32).

(32) Tagereau, ubi supra, pag. 4, 5.

'Now although marriage, in it's first institution, and 'by the Evangelical-law, be inseparable, unless one 'of the parties dies, or at least so as that the parties 'separated may marry again; and it is not found that 'the Jews, Greeks, or Romans, with whom divorces 'were usual, had any laws concerning the marriages 'of the impotent; except the Athenians, who had 'one made by Solon, by which a woman who was 'maried to an impotent husband, was allowed to co-'habit with any one of her husband's relations; and 'the Romans another, made by the emperor Justi-'nian, near 1300 years after the foundation of Rome, '(there being none before) by which he first of all 'allowed the women, rather by favour, than reason, 'and contrary to the Divine-law, to be divorced 'from their impotent husbands, and to put them 'away: as he made many other laws in favour of 'the women, by the persuasion of the empress 'Theodora, who ruled him, and made him do what 'she pleased, as the same Bodin says in that place of 'his Republic, which has been quoted (33), and in 'the second chapter of the fifth book. However the 'Canonists, in imitation of Justinian, have allowed 'the same liberty to the women, if their husbands 'should prove impotent; so that they be married to 'another after their separation, permitting the same 'also to those husbands whose wives are too strait, 'which Justinian had not done, there being hardly 'any such women to be found.'

(33) That is in the third chapter of the first book.

The advocates, who pleaded for ..... in 1677, maintained that the congress has no foundation neither in the authority of the laws, nor in the opinions of the doctors; that there is no mention made either in the Civil or in the Canon Law, of the inspection or congress; that it is only practised in France, and not above fixscore years ago; that the ancient books afford us only two ridiculous precedents for it (34).

(34) Journal des Sçavans, ubi supra.

It is likely Mr Venette's error proceeds from a transposition of ideas, which has confounded the knowledge of Justinian's law. He would no longer permit that the ripeness of males should be decided by an inspection of their privy parts. He fixed it to the age of fourteen years, whether they were vigorous or not, and looked on what had been practised until that time as a very immodest thing. He thought himself obliged to exceed the modesty of the Romans, who forbad the regulation of the ripeness of the girls by inspection (35); but they made no such prohibition with respect to the boys.

(35) Pubertatem autem veteres quidem non solum ex annis, sed etiam ex habitu Corporis in masculis: ut vere. Nostra autem Majestas capiens esse cautior veterum temporum existimans, bene putavit: quod in utroque etatum antiquis imposuerunt esse vitum est, id est, inspectionem habitudinis corporis, hoc etiam in masculis extendere. Et ideo nostra sancta Constitutione promulgata, puberatem in masculis post decimum quartum annum completum illico initium accipere disposuimus: antiquitatis normam in feminis bene positam, in suo ordine relinquentes, ut post duodecim annos completos viripotentes efficiantur. Institut. lib. 1, Tit. XXII.

Theodoret did very much inveigh against the laws of Plato, which ordained not only that girls and women advanced in years should practise naked all the exercises proper for men, but also that some inspectors, in order to judge whether the persons of either sex were marriageable, should make them strip themselves (36). Τὴν δὲ τὰ τῶν γαμων χρονα ξυμμετριαν δικαστὴς σκοπῶν κελεύτω, γυμνὰς μὲν τὰς ἄῤῥενας, γυμνὰς δὲ ὑφαλὰ μέχει θεωμένω τὰς γυναῖκας. Judex vero inspiciens judicet quænam ætas celebrandis nuptiis conveniat: eamque ob rem nudos mares, nudasque umbilico tenus feminas inspiciat (37). Equity required from Theodoret that he should not pass over in silence the caution of the legislator, with respect to the girls, who were only to be naked to the navel (38). Theodoret, I say, should have opposed Plato's law, as it was thus limited; whereas he opposes it, as if there had been no limitation at all. He alledges the saying of king Candaules's wife, That a woman puts off modesty at the same time she puts off her shift; from whence he concludes that this philosophical legislator taught the women who were betrothed to put off all shame. Τοιγαροῦν ὁ φιλόσοφος τὰς νυμφευομένας γυμνοῖ τῆς αἰδοῦς καὶ ἀναίδειαν ἐκδιδάσκει. Quare Philosophus pudore spoliatas exuit, & impudentiam docet (39). Theodoret's way of reasoning on this occasion has not all the exactness or preciseness of a strict Logician; but what he says against Plato's institution concerning dances and shews, at which both sexes might assist naked, is just: he pretends that it was the ruin of modesty, and a school of lasciviousness. Οὐ γὰρ τὰ μόνον εἰς ἀναίδειαν ἐπαιδοτρίβησαν γυμνούμεναι καὶ γυμνώσης ἂν δέοις θεώμεναι, ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλοὺς ἀλλήλοις ἀφορμὰς πρέπουσαν ἀκολασίας, τῶν γὰρ δὴ γυμνῶν σωμάτων ἡ θεωρία, καὶ τὰς ἀνδρεας, καὶ τὰς γυναῖκας εἰς ἔρωτας ἐκτόπους ἠρέθιζεν. Non modo enim ad impudentiam erudiebantur nudatæ, nudosque viros spectantes, sed multas invicem incontinentiæ occasiones præbebant; Nudorum enim corporum aspectus ad nefarios amores & viros & feminas provocabat (40). This confirms the remarks I made in another place (41) against the custom of the Lacedemonians. But we must say that Plato's laws were not put into execution like those of Lycurgus; they were mere speculative laws, which, as Theodoret observes (42), were not so much (36) Theodor. de Græc. affect. lib. IX, pag. m. 615.

(37) Ibid. pag. 616.

(38) It is to be observed that they begun at the head.

(39) Ibid.

(40) Ibid.

(41) In the article LYCURGUS.

(42) Theodor. ubi supra, pag. 615.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google true that she cast her eyes, on those naked bodies with the same intent; and there are some books wherein she is accused of it [B], and even of having ordered the body of the Baron du Pont to be looked for among all the rest [C]. I shall say, in one of the remarks, why I give that gentleman the name of Quellenec [D].

The passages which I have inserted in the first remark of this article, have displeased several people, and made them assert with great heat that they containe dintolerable obscenities, though I was always persuaded that they took the thing wrong, yet I was almost resolved to leave out those passages in this second edition; and it was the advice of some persons, for whom I have a very great esteem: but some other persons, of no less judgment than they, dissuaded me from it, and told me that the reasons I have given of my conduct are a good excuse, and that it sufficed to insert here the apology already published in a single sheet. I follow their advice, and recite those reasons [E]; to as received in the country of that Philosopher: and therefore it cannot be said that Justinian was obliged to suppress the abuses which this Father of the church condemned.

We will end this digression with a passage of the Menagiana, which informs us that this abuse of the congress was not then so frequent. Those who are pleased with the suppression of scandals, will read this with edification. 'An official, in the time of Mr de 'Gondy, whose name I do not well remember, told 'me, that during forty years that he had been in 'that post, he had only ordered the congress once; 'it was to a Miller, and as he performed his duty 'very well, his wife said to him, Jacob, why did 'not you do the same at home, and then we should 'not have had the trouble to come here (43)?

(43) Menagiana, pag. 291, 292, of the first Dutch edition.

[B] There are some books wherein she is accused of it.] John Lætus Professor at Franeker (44) says, that the queen gave orders that they should look out for the body of Soubize, a gentleman who was thought to be impotent, and that when it was found, she looked upon his privy-parts and laughed very heartily in the presence of many ladies. 'Subisii nobilis qui frigidæ & 'minimè ad procreandam sobolem aptæ naturæ esse 'dicebatur cadaver jussit investigari Regina, inventum '(45) pudenda illius, cum suarum pedissequarum numeroso comitatu, non sine magno & effuso risu inspexit.' Could a thing of this nature be unknown to d'Aubigné? and if he had known it, would he have omitted it in his History? His silence will certainly decide the business so much the more, because he observes that the ladies viewed Soubise, to see whether he was incapable of marriage, because there was a process against him upon that account (46). Mr Varillas would not have concealed this action of the queen-mother, for he doth not spare her in things of lesser or greater importance. Speaking of the siege of Rouen, he says (47), That the queen-regent was blamed for carrying the king her son into the forts as soon as they were taken, as if she had a design to use the eyes of that prince to slaughter; and that people found fault with her for having too curiously viewed the naked body of a young woman who had dressed her self in man's cloaths, to increase the number of the defenders: which shews that people will forgive nothing to the great ones. Another Professor of Franeker maintains, that the queen searched Soubise's impotency very curiously (48).

(44) Compend. Hist. universf. pag. m. 424. He quotes de Statu Religionis in Gallia. We shall see in the following remark the words of the author whom he quotes.

(45) This word placed there makes a solecism.

(46) D'Aubigné, Hist. Tom. ii, pag. 545.

(47) Varillas's Hist. of Charles IX, lib. iv, ad ann. 1562.

[C] And even of having ordered the body of the baron du Pont to be looked for among all the rest.] This is an aggravating circumstance which I will not warrant; let him who advances it answer for it: It is a Protestant writer. 'Rex, Regina, fratres & Regius comi-'tatus frequens sub vesperam Lupara egrediuntur, stra-'gis illius per urbem effusæ conspiciendæ causa. Su-'bizius vir nobilis, frigidæ & minimè ad procreandam 'sobolem aptæ naturæ esse dicebatur: illius cadaver 'jussit investigari Regina, & pudenda illius, cum sua-'rum pedissequarum numeroso comitatu, inspicit, non 'sine magno & effuso risu (49). --- The king, the queen, 'the king's brothers, and a number of attendance, went 'out in the evening from the Louvre, to see the slaughter 'that had been made in the city. Soubise, a nobleman, 'had been accused of frigidity, and incapacity of propa-'gation; the queen caused his body to be sought for, and 'viewed his privy-parts, together with several of her 'ladies, with a great deal of laughter.'

(48) Cujus cadaver cum reliquis ante Regiam projectum à Regina ejusque puellis diligenter, si nota impotentiæ appareret, inspectabatur. Huber. Hist. Civil. Tom. ii, pag. 353.

(49) Commentar. de Statu Religionis & Reipubl. in Regno Galliæ, Part iv, fol. m. 39, verso.

[D] The name of Quellenec.] So Mr Varillas calls him in the second edition of his History of Charles IX. Now as that edition was rectified, according to the remarks of Mr d'Hosier, one of the greatest Genealogists in France (50), there is no doubt but that the baron du Pont, who married the heiress of Soubise, must be called so. This name is very much mangled in most Historians, which probably has been occasioned by an error of the press. The Printers of Thuanus's History, put Quellevetum Pontium instead of Quellenecum Pontium (§ α); hence it is, that Mezerai calls this baron Quelleve-Pontivy: which is making two faults; for Pontivy was a lord of the house of Rohan. This last fault is not to be found in Mezerai's Chronological Abridgment, but only in his large History. I must observe by the by, that he whom he called Charles in his large History, is called Francis in the abridgment. Thuanus and the second edition of Varillas, give the name of Charles to the baron du Pont, and therefore it seems to me to be his right name. Varillas in the first edition used the word Kuellevé. It was still the fault of the Printers of Thuanus: If Varillas made some alteration in the orthography of the word, it is likely he did it because he remembred that several noble families of Bretagne put a K to their names. A famous author, has not long since called him Franciscus Quelletrius, dux à Britannia (51).

(50) See the letter published by Mr Larroque in his Animadversions upon Varillas.

[(§ α)] This is corrected in Mr Buckley's edition of Thuanus. See Tom. III. pag. 131. REM. CRIT.]

(51) Huber. Hist. Civil. Tom. ii, pag. 353, printed at Franeker in 1692.

[E] I will recite those reasons.] I do not know whether any body remembers still the two small pieces that came out in 1697: one was intituled The Judgment of the public . . . . upon the Critical Dictionary, and the other reflexions upon . . . . the judgment of the public, &c. In the last of these two pieces is the apology, which I was advised to insert here, and which has been thought sufficient to remove my readers scruples, I heartily wish it may have that good effect. Here follows what I answered to my Critic. '(52) We may add to the 'three instances which he alledges, what he has said 'against the article, wherein I have set down some pas-'sages out of a book of Tagereau. He could not 'chuse a worse subject of complaint; for I will shew, 'in a proper time, that I had very good grounds to 'insert in my work what I have said of the congress. 'I might say as an Historian, that Quellenec was ac-'cused of impotency, and that it was his mother-in-'law, and not his wife, who entered the action against 'him. Truth obliged me to make that remark in 'favour of an heroine of our party. As a faithful Hi-'storian, it was my duty to criticize those who cast a 'blot upon that lady, supposing that she sued her hus-'band upon such an account in the flower of her age. 'This is to declare that I do not think it a com-'mendable thing for a woman to engage in such pro-'ceedings. Every author has the privilege of shewing 'the reasons of his opinion; and therefore as a com-'mentator on my own text, I might, nay I ought to 'set forth the proofs of the opinion which I did ad-'vance, and consequently relate what Tagereau had 'published against the practice of those times: We 'would appear wiser than our fathers, but we are not 'so wise. That advocate, in the parliament of Paris, 'easily obtained a licence to publish a book, in which 'he laid open all the filthiness of the congress: But 'great clamours are raised in Holland against an au-'thor who only transcribes some passages out of that 'book. Is not this a respect of persons, which be-'trays an ill turn of mind, or a corrupt heart? But 'will some say, this advocate set forth those things 'only to oblige the judges to suppress such a practice, 'which was contrary to modesty and liable to injustice. 'But do not I declare with the utmost indignation that 'this practice was infamous, because it weakened the 'principle of shame, the precious source of chastity? 'Can any one take the right side with more zeal than (52) Réflexions sur un Imprimé qui a pour Titre Jugement du Public, &c. p. 3, 4.

I have

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to which I shall add one instance, taken from the approbation which Justus Lipsius gave to the book of an advocate, who, in a cause concerning the dissolution of a marriage [F], found himself obliged to relate several obscene things, and even was merrier than the necessity of the subject required. If any one is not satisfied with what ‘ I have done in this article? Besides, as an Historian, ‘ have not I the right to relate a custom which was a ‘ long time practised in the district of the parliament ‘ of Paris, and which is not abolished in other places? ‘ Certainly the manner of proceeding in civil and cri- ‘ minal causes belongs to historical facts; and if there ‘ be any thing singular in it, many travellers and ‘ writers of relations are very careful to be informed of ‘ it. What a pleasure had it not been for Pietro della ‘ Valle to find a book in Persia which might have in- ‘ formed him of a very odd custom, as well as Tage- ‘ reau could inform him of the ceremonial of the con- ‘ gress? I ask whether the verbal processes of the jury ‘ and matrons in certain causes, are things to be re- ‘ jected when one goes about to make an exact col- ‘ lection of all the usages and customs of a nation? Fu- ‘ retiere, who did not write an Historical Dictionary ‘ with comments, but a Grammatical one, made use of ‘ those processes. Did any body find fault with him ‘ upon that account? Dr Menjot . . . . . who was a ‘ man of great probity, has put a great many lascivious ‘ things in his discourse concerning the Furor uterinus, ‘ and barrenness. It would be a ridiculous thing to ‘ censure him for it, since, as a Physician, he had a ‘ privilege to do it; his subject required or allowed ‘ it. Now, I say, that a compiler, who relates and ‘ comments, has all the privileges of a Physician and ‘ of an advocate, &c. according as there is occasion; ‘ he may use their verbal processes, and the terms of ‘ their profession. If he relates the divorce of Lotha- ‘ rius and Tetberga, he may give an abstract of Hinc- ‘ mar, archbishop of Rheims, who writ down all the ‘ impurities which were proved whilst the proceedings ‘ lasted. One ought never to judge of a commenting ‘ Historian before one be well acquainted with the ‘ laws of History, and the privileges of a commenta- ‘ tor. If those gentlemen had read the commentary ‘ which Andrew Tiraquellus writ on the laws of mar- ‘ riage, they would have seen there a great many more ‘ obscenities. Yet he was a counsellor in the parlia- ‘ ment of Paris, and one of the most illustrious men of ‘ the last century, as well for his learning as for his ‘ virtue.’

[F] The approbation which Justus Lipsius gave to the book of an advocate, who in a cause concerning the dissolution of a marriage.] Sebastian Roulliard, one of the most learned advocates of the parliament of Paris, pleaded in the year 1600 for a gentleman, who had been accused of impotency by his wife. She had gained her cause before the official of Sens, and afterwards before the delegates of the primacy of Lyons. The husband appealed from their sentence, and obtained commissaries from the Apostolical See to give a final determination in the matter. Roulliard, his advocate, published A Capitulary, shewing, That a man born without any visible testicles, but having all the other marks of virility, is capable of matrimonial duties. The gentleman was born so, and it was on this imperfection that his wife grounded her suit for impotency. He maintained that he had consummated the marriage, not by the ridiculous means which she supposed, but by the natural effort of his sex (53). He demanded that she might be inspected, and for a convincing proof, and the most frequent that can be practised on such occasions, be offered to accept the congress, to shew, that he was capable of erection, intromission, and ejaculation, which were objected to him (54). The judges had neither ordered a congress nor an inspection, the woman having declared that those two things offended her modesty (55). From these offers of the husband Roulliard drew what consequences he thought most proper, and discoursed at large of the use of the testicles, according to the doctrine of the Philosophers, and the observations of the Anatomists. He did not trouble himself with paraphrases and covered speeches, but he used the terms of art with the greatest liberty; and sometimes mixed with his discourse some Latin verses which were very obscene; but the application he made of them was very ingenious. He seems to be all along upon a serious tone, and yet the whole book is full of drolleries and merry thoughts. He sent a copy of it to Justus Lipsius, who answered him thus. ‘ Ita, ita, venit ad ‘ nos libellus tuus, Deum immortalem, venustus, lepi- ‘ dus, & pro ipsâ re libellus (56). . . . . Sed ô te (au- ‘ sim dicere?) nequam! Novios, Pomponios, Titin- ‘ nios, Petronios, quidquid hoc genus Atellanas, Mi- ‘ mos, Satyras scripsit, vincis aut æquas. Imo uno ‘ vincis, quòd Salvo pudore & probitate jocaris. Quid ‘ jocaris? seriò loqueris, & de illo quod Græci Neces- ‘ sarium vocant, necessariò, atque id apud judices, agis. ‘ Meum & meorum risum! quâ fronte, quàm sub- ‘ strictâ aure, Cassii & Catones vestri hæc audiunt? ‘ . . . . . Extra jocum, argutus tuus libellus & in re ‘ seriâ, nec seriâ, seriò doctus (57). - - - Yes, yes, I have got your little book, but good God! how elegant and diverting, how much to the purpose . . . . but oh! you knave shall I call you, you excel, or at least equal the Novii use s, Pomponiuses, Titinniuses, Petroniuses, and all the rest who have written farces, mimes, or satires; nay in this you excel them all, that you jest without trespassing on modesty or probity. How jest? you speak seriously and treat necessarily of what the Greeks call necessary, and that before the Judges. It is good sport to me and my friends to think with what countenance and attention your Cassiuses and Catos hear those things . . . . without jest, your witty book about a matter se- rious and not serious at the same time, is in good car- nest a learned one.’ In another letter he protests that he has praised Roulliard’s Capitulary without any irony, that he had not the least thought of reflecting on the author’s morals, and that he knew well enough that they were unblameable, and of the greatest purity. Ego te, cum Varrone hoc dicam, modo scænatili tetigerim? ὡς ὄναρ. Joci fuerunt innoxii, puri, & nivtos di- cam, quia & frigus, credo, habuerunt. De moribus tuis ne mihi verbum, scio sanctos esse: aut scripta tua mibi mentiuntur, character ille interioris mentis (58). Note that Lipsius had already begun to set up for a bigot, and yet he judged very well and charitably of Roulliard’s Capitulary. I do not know whether the wife’s advocate published his process; but had he been never so grave, he could not have avoided a thousand gross obscenities: his case, or his answer to Roulliard, would inform us of several circumstances of that process. I know very little of it. See the margin (59).

I must take notice, that Roulliard and Tagereau were not of the same principles. The interest of the cause which Roulliard had in hand, induced him to maintain, that the practice of the congress and inspection on of the parts was lawful; so that, says he (60), ‘ All those concurring circumstances were a sufficient ‘ motive for the Judges to order the congress, which ‘ the said appellant offered to submit to, since he af- ‘ firmed to have had carnally to do with his said ‘ wife, and in such a case, standum est verbo viri, qui ‘ dicit se uxorem cognovisse cap. continebatur de desponsat. impub. considering that the man is the head of the woman, and ought to have that prerogative over her; besides, he has a legal presumption for him that he has known his wife, glass. cap. inspicimus de ‘ regul. in 6. cap. literas ë de presumpt. . . . . At least ‘ to make that presumption void, the midwives must ‘ depose the contrary; and that by the inspection of ‘ the secret parts of the wife, they have found her a ‘ virgin, cap. proposuit ë de probat. Now this is so ‘ far from being mentioned in the process, that on the ‘ contrary, after several evasions, she has acknowledg- ‘ ed she has been defloured by her husband; and, be- ‘ cause she pretended it had not been done by a manly ‘ effort, which an inspection would have decided, she ‘ would never consent to it, nor the Judges order it, ‘ notwithstanding the pressing instances of the appel- ‘ lant. . . . . (61) As for the congress, which the ‘ said lady pretends to reject on account of mode- ‘ sty.

Ah si cubitum locus exigit, omnibus illum
Deliciis imple, & sit procul inde pudor.

If opportunity present the bliss,
Snatch it, nor lose, thro’ modesty, a kiss.

For

(53) Roulliard, Capitulaire, pag. 8.

(54) Ib. p. 9.

(55) Ib. p. 40.

(56) Lipsius, Epist. LXVI, Centuriæ ad Germanos & Gallos, pag. m. 697.

(57) Ib. p. 698.

(58) Idem, Epist. LXXV, ejusd. Centur. pag. 707.

(59) It appears from those two Letters of Lipsius, that Roulliard pleaded for a Baron, and gained his cause. I guess it was on that occasion that Julian Peleus, advocate in the parliament of Paris, published his treatise De solutione matrimonii ob defectum virilium non apparentium. See the last paragraph of this remark [F].

(60) Roulliard, ubi supra, pag. 39.

(61) Ib. p. 41.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

what I say for my justification, he is desired to consider that it would have been very needless to have omitted these passages of Tagereau in my second edition; for his book is

' For duelling is, indeed, forbidden to prevent revenge ' by offensive weapons; but not between a husband ' and his wife, whose half-sweet and half-sowte trial ' tends only to renew peace and love. However, in ' the present case bellum justum, as Livy says, quia ' necessarium, and necessity renders that lawful, which (62) Ib. p. 43. ' would be unlawful in itself .... (62). The congress ' is the usual and most certain proof that can be used ' in a case of impotency, witness Lucian in his eunuch. ' Nec inimicum videri debet probationis genus quod solum ' est, says Quintilian in his seventh declamation; at ' least the bishops courts in France have admitted it, ' and the court has authorized it by several decrees, ' particularly that of the 20th of January, 1597, made ' against one, who being accused of wanting testicles, (63) Ib. p. 44. ' would not submit to it. .... (63) Certainly the best ' precaution that can be used is to come to an actual ' trial: Nec enim de veritate dubitari potest, quoties cum ' incertis experimenta conveniunt, æquumque est non sem- ' per auribus sed & oculis credere: especially when we ' are induced to it by a desire of peace, which will ' better excuse a lawful copulation, though done open- ' ly, than all clandestine doings can justify an unlaw- ' ful divorce. Otherwise it would be an absurd thing ' to admit, for the proof of adultery; the evidence of ' one who should say that he has seen, ἄρδεα ἐν ἀσ- ' θενείᾳ, and likewise that in order to avoid the sup- ' position of a child, the Civil Law should permit the ' inspection of a woman; and yet, that to justify the ' validity of a marriage (which is a thing much more ' important) one should be unwilling to see, impactum ' Thyrsum borto in cupidinis.'

These reasons, and several others which he produces, are far from being so good as Tagereau's arguments. I fancy, that if Roulliard had been some months after to plead for a woman, who had refused to submit to the inspection and congress upon a motive of modesty, he would have used the same arguments and maxims as Tagereau, and refuted himself very well. It is the fate of advocates, they must reason sometimes after one manner, and sometimes after another, according to the variety of the causes which they are to defend (64); and note, that they quote the same authorities upon quite contrary subjects. You have seen (65) how Tagereau opposes St Cyprian's authority, and that of St Ambrose, against the practice of inspection, and you will see that Roulliard cites the same authors to maintain it. ' (66) It is to no purpose to ' say, that his wife, pretending to modesty when it is ' too late, and upon an occasion when it is not neces- ' sary, objects that she would be ashamed to have her ' secret parts inspected, and to go to the congress, ' for she must be forced to it, since she has brought ' things to such a pass.

Quàm bene dispositum terris ut dignus iniqui
Fructus consilii, primis authoribus instet.

(64) Compare this with the remarks [B] and [C], of the article ANTONY (Marc) the Orator.

(65) Above, in the remark [A], citation (3).

(66) Roulliard, ubi supra, pag. 40.

' I add, that in such cases the inspection is usual, so ' that it cannot be said that there is any injustice in ' requiring that which is practised by the common ' law: for we learn from St Cyprian in his epistles, ' and from St Augustin and St Ambrose, that in cases ' relating to the defloration of virgins, inspection has ' been always practised; nay we are told by Clemens ' Alexandrinus 7. Strom. and by Suidas in verbo Jesus, ' that the Virgin Mary submitted to it, the Sanhedrim ' of the high-priest having ordered that she should be ' inspected, to discover whether she remained a virgin, ' and whether our Lord, whom they had a mind to ' adopt into their own order, should be matriculated in ' their registers as the son of Joseph, or as the son of ' the living God, and of a Virgin-mother. Chassa- ' næus (67) recites the story at length in the fourth ' part of his Catalogus gloriæ mundi, distinct. 6.' Roulliard used a trick of his profession. The Fathers he quotes condemn the practice of the inspection, and therefore are proofs that it was practised: he quotes them to prove that custom, and suppresses the rest; that is not fair: the authority of an evidence ought not to be cut into two; so that here we may apply the maxim of the Civilian Celsus, ' Incivile est ' nisi tota lege perspecta, una aliqua particula ejus pro- ' posita judicare vel respondere (68). - - - It is irregu- ' lar without considering the whole law, to give judg- ' ment or answer one part of it.'

(67) It is certain that Chassanæus, pag. m. 824, tells a long story on that head, but observe that Clemens Alexandrinus, book viii, Strom. pag. m. 736, does not speak of the Sandhedrin, he only says μετὰ τὸ τεκεῖν αὐτὴν μαιωθεῖσαν, φασί τινες παρθένον εἶμεν. Quidam dicunt eam postquam peperisset, inspectam ab obstetrice, inventam fuisse virginem. - - - Some say that after she was delivered, she was inspected by the Midwife, and found to be a maid.

(68) Leg. incivile 24. D de Legibus.

There is one thing in which these two lawyers agree, that is, to deplore the multitude of processes which were entered against husbands on account of impotency. ' (69) Her relations .... have unjust- (69) Roulliard, ' ly .... prompted her to sue for a dissolution of ibid. pag. 5, 6. ' her marriage, by reason of his pretended impoten- ' cy, and other false stories which it had been better ' for her to conceal,

- - - - Quam protinus urbi
Pandere res alta sylvâ & caligine mersas.

- - - - The secrets to reveal,
Which darkness and the shady woods conceal.

' It was the misfortune of the appellant, that the ' corruption of the age has given a free course to ' these proceedings, dedit hanc contagio labem, & da- ' bit in plures; whereas for the space of twelve hun- ' dred years, in which modesty appeared in the faces, ' and was rooted in the souls of the women of France, ' there were scarce so many suits on that account as ' there are now almost daily. .... (70) The appel- (70) Ib. p. 46. ' lant, deploring the misfortune of this age, in which ' the women on very slight pretences get themselves ' divorced and separated from their husbands, repre- ' sents to you this complaint of Tertullian, - - - Ubi ' est illa felicitas matrimoniorum qua per sexcentos ' ferme annos nulla repudium domus scripsit? at nunc ' in fœminis præ auro nullum est leve membrum, ' præ vino nullum est liberum osculum, repudium ' vero quasi votum est, & matrimonii fructus. - - - - ' Where is that happiness of marriages, when for near ' six hundred years there was no divorce in any family? ' but now among our women every member is loaded ' with gold, all their kisses are spoiled by wine, and ' divorce is, as it were, a vow, and the fruits of ma- ' trimony. A thing of very pernicious consequence, ' as well to the public as to private persons.' This is what Roulliard says; compare it with Tagereau's words which you have seen above (71). (71) Citation (27).

If any body asks me to what purpose are all these passages of Roulliard? I answer, 1. That they prove that the most venerable tribunals have permitted the advocates to express themselves plainly on obscene matters. 2. That they shew how far the approbation of a great Critic (72) which I have alledged as (72) Justus Lipsius. an example, extended. 3. That they confirm some of Tagereau's observations, or serve to give some light to the matter, by the conflict of the arguments pro and con. If any one replies, that I have not the same liberty as the advocates; I reply in my turn, that I, as well as the register of a court, ought to be allowed to mention the reasons which an advocate has alledged. The nature of my work, which is made up of History, and of a critical commentary, requires it. If any one would now-a-days give us a collection of causes, and go back so far as those which were pleaded in the beginning of the XVIIth century, he might very well publish the substance of Roulliard's Capitullary, and in the very terms of the author. He might perhaps think it more proper to substitute the modern language in the room of the old French; but no body can justly blame those who alledge for a proof the very words of an original, rather than a version. This is the method I have prescribed to myself.

Since the impression of this, a gentleman of worth (73) hath informed me, 1. That the baron d'Argen- (73) Mr Marais, advocate in the parliament of Paris. ton, who married Magdalen de la Chastre, was the person for whom Roulliard published his Capitulary (74). One may know by that, the meaning of these words of Lipsius's letter to that advocate. ' Quid autem ille (74) Lipsius, ubi supra, pag. 698. ' baro? te patrono vir erit, aut fiet? .... Unum ta- ' men etiam quæro, vel te augure Cominæos (75) (75) Every one knows Philip de Comines was baron d'Argenton. ' nobis radicula hæc propagabit? Cui tamen favere ' me fateor, ob sacrum illud nobis nomen. Illius ' autem misereor, quæ tua opera fortasse Tantali ali- ' quo fato contabescet. - - - But what shall I say of the ' baron? will your patronage make a man of him? ...

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google is not ſcarce, and is to be found entire in an alphabetical collection, and conſequently in a work which is extremely like my Dictionary. Laurence Bochel, advocate in the parliament of Paris, has inſerted it at length in the third tome of his Bibliotheque of the French law, at the letter S, under the word Separation (d). No body found fault with him for having adopted the whole book of Tagereau; why then ſhould I be blamed for quoting only ſome paſſages out of it? If it be ſaid that people are more nice now than they were then, I ſhall refute this objection in a diſſertation at the end of this work, and in the mean time I ſhall obſerve, that I have acquainted my readers, that the book I have quoted was printed in the year 1612. Ought any one to be ſurprized or offended becauſe the ſtyle of ſuch a work is not faſhionable? I add, that obſcenities are allowed even now in cauſes of this nature in a full court [G]; and that the judges, though they are divines, do not reform that uſage: they cannot do it nor can they make any uſe of the obſervation of an author I have cited (e). See the margin (f). For the reſt, as the epoch of cuſtoms that have ſomething particular and extravagant in them, is a thing that the curious are glad to know, I thought it not improper to ſet down here what authors have told us concerning the epoch of the congreſs [H].

(d) I have been informed of this by Mr Marais, advocate in the parliament of Paris.

(e) In the remark G].

(f) The Bibliotheque du Droit François, written by Bochel, was reprinted at Paris in 1667. See the Journal des Sçavans, of the 10th of May 1667, pag. 2. 196.

' I aſk likewiſe will this little root produce more Co-
' mineſes? I confeſs I incline to favour him on account of ' his name, which we eſteem ſacred. But I pity him,
' who perhaps will pine away like another Tantalus.'
2. That there is an edition of Roulliard's Capitulary larger than that which I made uſe of. Mine is an 8vo, and only contains forty-ſeven pages; the other is a large book in 12mo, and contains one hundred and thirty-nine pages. There is in page 139 a ſonnet by the author, and in another page, without any number, this epigram,

Ad Lectorem,

Hæc ſi ſcripta putes parum ſeverè
Fruſtra te mihi præbeas ſeverum.
Nam quis ſchemate nī Thalaſſionis
Inumbrare queat Thalaſſionem?
Ergo quamlibet obſtrepente Momo
Fas ſit perrigier manu pudica
Quod ſolum datur auribus pudicis.

[G] Obſcenities are allowed in cauſes of this nature in a full court.] Here is a paſſage of a letter written by Mr Bourſault to the biſhop of Langres. ' I have ' often wondered, that my lords the biſhops ſhould ' ſuffer the judges of their courts to be prieſts, or that ' the doors are not ſhut up when a cauſe is pleaded, ' by reaſon of the plain things that are ſpoken there, ' which generally dwindle into obſcenities. I never ' had the curioſity to go thither, but I have heard it ' ſpoken of by ſo many different perſons, and all that ' they have told me ſeemed ſo free, that probably ' modeſty is baniſhed from thoſe tribunals. I deſire ' no other evidence for it than the ſubject which gave ' occaſion to theſe verſes:

Dans une Officialité
Ces jours paſſez une Soubrette,
Paſſablement belle & bien faite,
Et d'une robuſte Santé;
Avec la Bienſéance ayant fait plein Divorce,
Dit qu'un vieux Médecin l'avoit priſe par force.
Qu'il falloit ou le pendre, ou qu'il fût ſon Mary:
Et comment, dit le Juge, a-t-il pû vous y prendre?
Vous êtes vigoureuſe, il falloit vous deffendre;
L'avoir égratigné, déviſagé, meurtry:
J'ay, Monſieur, luy répondit-elle,
De la force quand je querelle;
Mais je n'en ay point quand je ry.

Within theſe few days an Abigail
To th'biſhop's court was brought.
Handſome enough, and pretty tall;
And ſtrong, as all there thought:
Having with modeſty made a full divorce,
She ſaid an old doctor had ta'en her by force;
And I will have him hang'd, ſaid ſhe,
Unleſs my huſband he will be.
How could he take you? ſays the judge; my friend,
You're ſtrong enough, and could your ſelf defend.
You ſhould have ſcratch'd and claw'd him too;
Yes, Sir, quoth ſhe, that I can do
In quarrels well enough;
But truly, Sir, not when I laugh.

' Was not this girl finely forced, when ſhe laughed ' all the while (76)?' All that can be done is only to prevent the exceſs: but as long as there are any law ſuits about adultery, impotency, keeping of baſtards, or the reparation of womens honour, the judges muſt neceſſarily hear ſome obſcenities. An advocate of Paris (77) did very much exclaim againſt the cuſtom of pleading, at the time of the Carnaval, the ſmutty Cauſe, as they call it. But if that abuſe was taken away, there would ſtill remain many cauſes, which only differ from it more or leſs.

(76) Bourſault, Lettres nouvelles, pag. 173, 174, Dutch edition.

(77) Called Martin Huſſon. See his book de Advocato, printed at Paris in 1666; the Journal des Sçavans, of the 22th of April 1666, ſpeaks of it, pag. 175, Dutch Edit.

[H] What authors have told us concerning the epoch of the congreſs.] We have ſeen (78) that of its abolition in the diſtrict of the parliament of Paris. It may be certainly fixed to the 18th of February 1677; but that of its original is uncertain. There are ſome authors who ſay that it did not begin until the middle of the XVIth century, and that the ancients did not make uſe of it. I have refuted the Phyſician who thought that Juſtinian aboliſhed it. That emperor ' (79) in the Code * de repudiis, ſays, that if a huſ- ' band and his wife have lived two years together, ' without conſummating the marriage (80), it ought ' to be diſſolved. In the twenty-ſecond novel (81) ' he prolongs the time of two years to three, reckoning from the day of the celebration of the ' marriage. That novel adds a remarkable reaſon; ' from which we may learn, that we ought not to ' force nature, by a trial that is not only ſhameful but ' ſometimes too haſty: edocti namque ſumus ex iis quæ ' ante hoc provenerunt, quoſdam amplius quam biennium ' temporis non valentes, poſtea potentes oſtenſos miniſtrare ' ſiliorum procreationi. This is all that we find in the ' Civil Law concerning the accuſation of impotency; ' neither the inſpection nor the congreſs appear in it. ' The Canon Law agrees with the Civil, and all its ' deciſions in that matter are contained in two diffe- ' rent kinds. . . . . (82) Nevertheleſs it has introduced ' another ſort of proof, which is the inſpection; it has ' been received by ſeveral Conſtitutions, and particularly by the chapter, litteras de frigidis; but two ' conſiderable reflexions ought to be made on it. The ' firſt . . . . the ſecond . . . . that after the inſpection, ' if it be favourable to the ſtate of marriage, there is ' no occaſion to confirm it by any other proof. This ' is the determination of the gloſs on the chapter ' propoſuiſti de probationibus; and as for the inſpection ' they proceed in it in this manner: The huſband is ' inſpected firſt; if he appears to be potent they go ' no farther, and the woman is obliged to be ſilent, ' and they ſpare her modeſty againſt her will, which ' her raſhneſs has already too much blemiſhed. But ' when, after the inſpection of the huſband, there is ' ſome doubt about his ability, the woman is inſpect- ' ed, provided ſhe has not been married before. The ' Canon  requiſiſti goes further, and ſays, that after ' an inſpection favourable to the huſband, he cannot ' be unmarried though he ſhould confeſs his impoten- ' cy. . . . . Theſe are all the proofs that we find in ' the Civil and Canon Laws concerning the accuſations ' of impotency. In the Civil Law the triennium; in the

(78) Above, Quotation (24).

(79) Journal des Palais, Part 2, pag. 23.

* Lib. 2.

(80) The words of the Law are, ſi matrimonium contraxerint minime propter naturalem imbecillitatem valent.

(81) The Novel calls it agere quæ à natura vires data ſunt, and in Greek πράττειν τὰ παρὰ τῆς φύσεως δεδομένα δύναμιν. I have this remark from Mr Marais.

(82) Journal des Palais, ubi ſupra, pag. 24.

 Cap. 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'the Canon Law the affirmation of the parties, with 'that of seven of their relations; and at the utmost 'extremity the inspection of the parties; the laws re- 'quire no more; they do not in the least mention the (83) Ib. p. 25. 'congress. . . . (83) The congress . . . without doubt, 'owes its original to some rash young fellow, who 'demanding it, the judges being surprized at the no- 'velty of his demand, thought at first that he ought 'not to be refused; so that as one precedent gives oc- 'casion for another, the error of the congress was in- 'sensibly established. Thus all the authors who have ‡ Vincent Tage- 'treated of this matter speak of it ‡, and among the reau. Antony 'rest Antony Hotman a famous advocate of the par- Hotman. Pe- 'liament of Paris, towards the end of the last cen- leus. Anne Ro- 'tury. He says that this practice was only establish- bert. 'ed forty years before he wrote. . . . . The books of 'the ancients furnish us but with two instances to 'support it, and they are both equally ridiculous; 'one is in Lucian, who tells us that one Bagoas de- 'siring to be admitted into an assembly of Philoso- 'phers, as some doubted whether he was a man, 'some body said that he should make such a trial: a 'proposal becoming the impudence with which that 'author so often reproaches the false Philosophers. 'The other example is in Peter Ancharanus, on the † In the decre- 'chapter Litteræ †, where he says, that a certain official tals de Frigidis. 'of Venice, to try an impotent man, shut him up 'with a debauched woman, on whose report he di- 'vorced him. Ancharanus does not say that this is 'an example to be imitated; neither was it followed 'in his country, nor in any other parts of Italy no 'more than in Spain or the Netherlands. All nations 'allow only of inspection in a cause concerning im- 'potency; and we do not find by the writings of 'their lawyers that the congress is in use among 'them.'

The chronological calculation which we have just seen, as taken from a book of Antony Hotman, is more indeterminate than it is represented. These are the words of that author (84). The argument taken from (84) Antony Hotman's first treatise on the dissolution of marriage for the impotency and frigidity of the man or the woman, pag. 59. the practice of times past, to authorize the congress, cannot be traced up farther than thirty or thirty-five years. And there is a great deal of probability that it was introduced not so much by order of the judges, as by consent of the parties offering to do it; in which case it is said, nullas esse judicis partes. I. Si convenerit. De jud. And this practice (with submission to better judgments) ought not to be drawn into custom, and authorized; on the contrary, if it has been tolerated in former times, it is better to amend it, as has been done in several like cases. 'As for (85) Idem, in the second treatise, pag. 58. 'the congress, says he in another place (85), introduced 'about thirty-five or forty years ago, altho' it seems 'at first sight that it may serve for the clearing up the 'truth, in a cause of a man's impotency, and (as 'we may say) rectify the fault which might have been 'made in the inspection, without which, perhaps, 'it would not have been ordered; nevertheless, the 'action being duly considered, is not only immo- 'dest and brutish, but also useless, by reason of it's 'circumstances, which render the effect and execution 'of it impossible.' The author who speaks thus died in 1596; but I do not know the true date of his book (86), I have only the Paris edition, 1610, and therefore I cannot fix the epoch which I look for. All that I can say, is, that admitting the evidence of this advocate, we cannot carry it up higher than the year 1540. You see that he maintains the same thing as Tagereau did, he declares plainly against the congress, and alledges a great many things which are to be found in Tagereau's treatise. He surpasses him also with respect to obscenities; so that we have here a new and illustrious example of the liberty of expressing one's self obscenely when the subject requires it, and when one endeavours to suppress an abuse that is very contrary to public modesty. It is said that Hotman writ that book, to serve a kinsman who had appealed from the congress (87), and who lost his cause. Roulliard reproaches him with it in the edition of 12mo of his Capitulary. The loss of that cause should have been imputed to the Judges, and not to the Advocate, who brought so many arguments against that new custom that he deserved the Judges should give it for him. He did not forget to say that the proceedings at the congress afford matter for a thousand foolish discourses in all sorts of company. 'The 'wisest men have always been for the mildest and 'least shameful remedies; whereas they seem now a 'days to have forgot all honour and modesty, in or- 'der to favour a brutish impudence; and what is 'more shameful still, the men have, in some trials, 'inspected the women, and the women have been ad- 'mitted to inspect the men, which has been the sub- 'ject of so much derision and mockery, that such 'proceedings serve, in most places, for pleasant 'stories and jocular discourses; whereas what be- 'longs to justice ought to be treated seriously, and 'with fear and reverence (88).' Among several other reasons he alledges this (89), that the inspectors have never reported, mulierem fuisse carnaliter à viro cognitam, at a congress; but it is said, that once or twice the woman cried out as if her husband did hurt her; which the assistants hearing, advised the parties to agree and go home together; which they did, and the woman never complained afterwards: which is as much as to say, that the parties being agreed after the process was begun, and the inspection made, they were told of this expedient, by means of which it appeared that the woman did not complain without cause, being yet a virgin, and reported as such, and that the husband was not in the wrong for maintaining also that he was not impotent; and the report of the integrity of the woman was looked upon as truth, and so both were satisfied. He condemns the inspection as much as the congress, without making any mention of the many alterations that were made afterwards in the edict of the Pretor de ventre inspiciendo (90).

(86) See the remark [B], of the article ROBERT.

(87) Journal des Palais, ubi supra, pag. 20.

(88) Antony Hotman's first treatise, p. 63.

(89) Idem, in the second treatise, pag. 63.

(90) Journal des Palais, ubi supra, pag. 20.

QUETIF (JAMES) a Parisian, and a Monk of the order of St Dominic, was accounted a learned man. He published some books [A], and had spent a great deal of time in composing the Bibliotheque of the writers of his order, when he died at Paris in the convent of the Reforme, in St Honoré street, the second of March 1698, at the age of eighty years (a).

(a) Taken from a letter of Mr Pinsson des Riolles.

[A] He published some books.] These are the titles of them; Concilii Tridentini Canones, editio aucta, cui accessit index accuratus Legatorum, Patrum, & Oratorum. Item Index Librorum prohibitorum, at Paris 1666, in 12mo. Hieronymi Savonarolæ Epistolæ spirituales & asceticæ ex Italico in Latinum versæ. Item vita Savonarolæ à Joanne Francisco Pico cum notis. Compendium revelationum Savonarolæ & additiones quibus varia ad hanc vitam acta, epistolæ, diplomata, instrumenta publica, scriptorumque monumenta, Apologiæ, &c. referuntur (1), at Paris, 1674, in three volumes in 12mo. Petri Morini Parisiensis Opuscula & Epistolæ primum editæ, at Paris 1675, in three volumes in 12mo. Concerning this Peter Morin, and this edition of his Opuscula, see the Select Letters of Mr Simon (2).

(1) See the Journal des Sçavans, January 20, 1676, pag. 23, Dutch Edit.

(2) At pag. 241, & seq.

QUILLET (CLAUDIUS) a native of Chinon in Touraine, was one of the good Latin Poets of the XVIIth century. I have mentioned in another place (d) the occasion which obliged him to retire into Italy. I now add that 'being at 'Rome, and frequenting the house of the French ambassador, who was the mareschal 'd'Estrées, he was made secretary of the embassy (b) [A]'. I do not know for what

(d) In the article GRANIER, remark [I].

(b) Sorberiana, p. 173, Dutch Edit.

[A] He was made secretary of the embassy.] 'This 'place was contended for by Mr de Lionne; but Quil- 'let carried it, and de Lionne put himself into the 'service of cardinal Mazarin, for want of a better 'employment, and Quillet's refusal, who chose the 'worse, as the event has verified: for one died 'without

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

what reaſon he was angry with cardinal Mazarin; but it is certain that he ſpoke very ill of his Eminence [B] in a poem which he publiſhed in the year 1655. The cardinal received the inſult with a great deal of mildneſs, and was ſo eaſily ſatisfied with the excuſes of the author, that he promiſed him an abbey [C]. The poem I ſpeak of contains ſome things which Mr Baillet condemns very much [D]. The Abbot Quillet wrote ſome other books, which have not been publiſhed [E].

'without raiſing himſelf higher, and the other has 'been promoted to the chiefeſt places in the govern-'ment (1).' Theſe particularities are curious, but I do not know whether they are true.

(1) Sorberiana, at the word Quillet, pag. m. 173.

[B] It is certain that he ſpoke very ill of his Eminence.] You will find in the continuation of the Menagiana (2) what he ſaid againſt the cardinal.

(2) Pag. 131, 132, Dutch edition.

[C] Cardinal Mazarin was ſo eaſily ſatisfied with the excuſes of the author, that he promiſed him an abbey.] This deſerves to be inſerted at length, out of the Continuation of the Menagiana (3). 'The Calli-'pedia of Mr Quillet, diſguiſed under the name of 'Calvidius Lætus, is a very fine Latin poem. Being 'ſomewhat diſcontented, he inſerted in it ſome verſes 'againſt cardinal Mazarin, and his family, he cauſed 'that book to be printed in Holland. The cardi-'nal being informed of it, ſent to Mr Quillet to 'come and ſpeak to him, and inſtead of ſhew-'ing him any reſentment, he only complained very 'mildly of the little regard he had ſhown for him 'in that poem. You know, added he, that I have 'had an eſteem for you a long time, and if I have 'done nothing for you, it is becauſe importunate peo-'ple get all my favours; but I promiſe you that the firſt 'abbey that ſhall be vacant ſhall be for you. Mr Quil-'let affected with the cardinal's goodneſs, threw him-'ſelf at his feet, aſked his pardon, and promiſed to 'correct his poem in ſuch a manner as would pleaſe 'him; praying at the ſame time, that he might dedi-'cate it to him, which the cardinal granted. Accord-'ingly he printed the ſecond edition corrected, in '8vo, at Paris, 1656, and dedicated it to the cardi-'nal, who a little while before had given him a conſi-'derable abbey; but death prevented his enjoying it 'long. The firſt edition, which is the moſt ſcarce, 'was printed at Leyden in 4to, 1655: that of Paris 'is larger.'

(3) Pag. 130, 131. See Coſtar's Letters, Tom. i, p. 176.

[D] His poem contains ſome things which Mr Baillet condemns very much.] See what he ſays (4). 'This 'abbot, intending to teach men how to get fine children, 'has endeavoured to reduce all the precepts of his 'new art into four books in Latin verſe, intituled, 'Callipædia. Tho' he does not tell the public from 'from whence he had ſo many rarities, yet it appears, 'that for an abbot (5), he knew more of the 'matter than the moſt experienced laymen, and that 'he was able to teach nature itſelf. . . . . (6). It is 'ſaid, that there are ſome things in it finely touched; 'but that it contains ſome deſcriptions concerning gene-'ration, which are very infamous, and unbecoming a 'man who has any ſenſe of modeſty, and that he 'ſeems thro' the whole work to make oſtentation of 'his reading of Petronius, and therefore the praiſes 'which Coſtar beſtowed on the Callipædia, in a let-'ter to the author *, muſt be looked upon as meer 'compliments.'

(4) Judgment on the Poets, Article 1511.

(5) According to the Menagiana above, citat. (3), he was not an Abbot when he wrote that poem.

(6) Baillet, ubi ſupra.

* It is the 20th letter of Coſtar's ſecond Tome, p. 598, 599.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have read the Callipædia, printed at Paris in the year 1656 (7). This is the title of it: Cl. Quilleti Callipædia ſeu de pulchræ prolis habendæ ratione poema didacticon. Cum uno & altero (8) ejuſdem Authoris carmine. The preface mentions the things that were added to the Paris edition, which are more in number than thoſe that are left out. It is a very fine picce as to the Poetry; the reading of Lucretius appears much more in it than that of Petronius. Thoſe who told Mr Baillet that the author ſpeaks very freely of what concerns generation, were not miſtaken; but it is not true, that this is unbecoming a man who has any ſenſe of modeſty; for the abbot Quillet ſays nothing but what is to be found in ſeveral books of Phyſic written by grave authors. I do not know whether he had any other maſters; but I am ſure that the reading of the moſt ſerious writers is ſufficient to teach one all the precepts that he gives. He is called Abbas Dudavillæus at the end of the licence, and Abbas D. S. in the epiſtle dedicatory.

(7) Mr Bumbolot has been pleaſed to ſend it me.

(8) Thoſe two poems are an Epiſtle ad Eudoxum in hexameter verſes, and an Elegy in obitum Patri Gaſſendi.

[E] He wrote ſome other books which have not been publiſhed.] The abbot de Marolles having mentioned (9) the Callipædia, and ſome other French and Latin verſes which Quillet had preſented to him, goes on thus. He had compoſed another large poem in twelve books in Latin, intituled Henricias, in honour of king Henry IV, but I do not know whether that work, and his tranſlation of all the ſatires of Juvenal into French verſe, will ever appear in print; ſince editions of the beſt poems, written by the moſt excellent Poets, muſt be paid for now a days; and thoſe that have been printed, which are very many even in Latin, are ſcarce read now. I ſhall forbear making an enumeration of them; the reader would be ſurprized at it. I believe the following paſſage of Coſtar is to be underſtood of the Henricias. 'I am ſorry you have taken from me the words con-'voiter [to covet] and convoitiſe [deſire], for I would 'make uſe of them very much to the purpoſe, in order 'to expreſs the great deſire I have to ſee the continua-'tion of your divine Latin poem, the beginning of 'which you have been pleaſed to ſend me. If the re-'maining part is like the beginning, that poem is as 'much beyond the fine Callipædia, as the fine Cal-'lipædia is beyond all the works of that nature which 'our age has produced. What a pleaſure will it be 'for me, Sir, if you keep your word, and bring me 'four thouſand verſes as fine as thoſe which I have 'juſt now read (10).'

(9) In the enumeration of thoſe who preſented him with books.

(10) Coſtar, Letter à l'Abbé Quillet: it is the 230th of the ſecond Tome, pag. 598.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, compoſed an Hiſtory of Alexander. It is ſo fine, and ſo well written, that they are in the wrong who take it to be the work of an author of the middle age [A]; but there is ſome reaſon to wonder that

[A] That it is the work of an author of the middle age.] Here is a paſſage of Guy Patin. 'Are you ſure 'that Quintus Curtius lived under the empire of Ti-'berius? Some ſay it was under that of Auguſtus, 'by reaſon of his fine Latin ſtyle, and others place 'him in the reign of Veſpaſian, with ſome appearance 'of reaſon. I had formerly a maſter, who had a very 'particular opinion concerning Quintus Curtius. He 'ſaid, that his hiſtory was but a romance; that his 'ſtyle indeed was beautiful, but that there were groſs 'geographical miſtakes in it. . . . . The ſame maſter 'told us, that the author of that book was a learned 'Italian, who wrote it about three hundred years ago. 'That Quintus Curtius was never quoted by any an-'cient author, and that it was a fictitious name. That 'the river Indus, the river Ganges, and ſome other 'parts of the Indies, are mentioned in that hiſtory, 'tho' they were unknown to the antients who lived 'before Ptolomy, who is the firſt and the oldeſt au-'thor that ſpoke of China under the name of Sinæ. '. . . . This is a controverſy . . . . which I hope will 'be determined in the fine book of the late Mr Voſ-'ſius concerning the Latin Hiſtorians, which is now 'printing in Holland (1).' I ſhall make ſome animadverſions on theſe words. I. It is not true, that the Indus, the Ganges, and ſome other parts of the Indies were unknown before Ptolomy. Strabo and Pliny, who lived the one under Auguſtus, and the other, under Veſpaſian, ſpeak of thoſe two rivers; now Ptolomy lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius. II. What ſort of argument is this? Quintus Curtius mentions ſome rivers unknown to the Antients, who lived before Ptolomy; therefore his Hiſtory was forged about the middle of the XIVth century. Can it be denied, that

(1) Patin, Letter XLIV, p. 183, 184, of the firſt Tome.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that no body ſhould have mentioned it before the XVth century (a). One ought to be leſs ſurprized to find ſome incredible things in it, than not to find more of them. Nay, the author was ſo cautious as to prevent the reproach of credulity, which he had reaſon to be afraid of [B]. It had been better ſtill, if he had related fewer prodigies, and that in the very age of Ptolomy one might have ſpoke of the rivers and provinces mentioned by him? III. Since Quintus Curtius did not uſe the word Sinæ to denote China, there was no reaſon to obſerve that no body had made uſe of that word before Ptolomy. Take notice that Patin's letter is dated the 15th of September, 1650; and that in a letter of the 14th of June in the ſame year, he ſpeaks like a man who had read Voſſius's book. How comes it then that he ſpeaks of it here as of a book that is in the preſs? For the reſt, Guy Patin's maſter was not miſtaken, when he ſaid that Quintus Curtius had not been quoted by any of the Antients. Such a ſilence cannot be ſufficiently wondered at; it is a very ſingular misfortune. That Hiſtorian has this common with ſeveral others, that we know not where he was born, nor when he lived, and that his book has been maimed and corrupted; but perhaps he is the only author of merit, who has not been quoted by any body during ſo many ages (2). Acidalius was ſomewhat angry at it. 'Illa autem, ſays he (3), vix omnino quemquam 'calamitas extra Curtium afflixit, ut reliquorum ſcriptorum nemo mentionem ejus uſquam, vel uno verbo, 'certam dico mentionem, & indubitatam faciat, ad 'unum omnibus tacentibus, quaſi de compacto ut conſpiraſſe videantur ad ſupprimendum hominis nomen, 'ad famam prorſus opprimendam. In hoc quis non 'indoleat? quis non miretur & indignetur? - - - - - Scarce any author but Curtius has ever been attended with the misfortune of not being mentioned, ſo much as in a ſingle word, by other authors: I ſpeak of a certain and undoubted mention; all of them being ſilent, as if they had conſpired to ſuppreſs his name and quite obſcure his reputation. Who is not affected with grief, wonder, and indignation at this?' Father le Tellier wonders at that ſilence, and takes it to be the reaſon why ſome have been of opinion, that this hiſtory is the work of a modern author. 'Hic 'mirari cum Acidalio licet ſingulare Curtii fatum 'quod ſcriptor Nobiliſſimus, & nihilo primis inferior, 'non ſolum communi illa temporum injuria duobus 'truncatus libris, aliis quoque locis mutilus, plurimis 'depravatus ad nos pervenerit: verum etiam, quod 'nulli forte præterea contigit, tam multis ætatibus ig'notus latuerit, ſicut ante ſeculum à Chriſto nato de'cimum nemo omnium repertus ſit qui vel per tran'ſennam Curtii hiſtorici, ſcriptæve ab illo hiſtoriæ 'mentionem injecerit. Quæ res, opinor, nonnullos 'adduxit ut ſuſpicarentur non genuinum Curtii ac 'vetuſtum, ſed ſuppoſititium recentioris cujuſquam 'ſcriptoris fœtum eſſe, qui poſt renatas litteras, felici 'veterum imitatione eximiam ſcribendi facultatem 'adeptus, opus hoc ſuum Romano ſub nomine prodire 'voluerit (4). - - - Here let me wonder, with Acidalius, at the common fate of Curtius, that this moſt noble writer, and not inferior to the beſt, is not only come down to us with two books, loſt thro' the injury of time, maimed in other places, and in many corrupted; but alſo, which perhaps never happened to any other author, was unknown for ſo many ages, inſomuch that before the Xth century, from the birth of Chriſt, no one is found who makes the leaſt mention of the Hiſtorian Curtius or the hiſtory written by him. This, I ſuppoſe, has induced ſome perſons to ſuſpect, that we have not the ancient and genuine work of Curtius, but the ſuppoſititious production of ſome modern writer, who, ſince the revival of learning, having acquired an excellent faculty of writing, by an happy imitation of the antients, publiſhed this work of his under the name of a Roman author.' It might be inferred from theſe words, that they begun to quote that Hiſtorian in the Xth century; and yet that commentator in uſum Delphini names no author that mentions him before the XVth century; for Antony Panormita is the moſt ancient author that he alledges in the catalogue of the Teſtimonia, that concern Quintus Curtius. That catalogue is much larger in Freinſhemius; yet it contains no author that lived before Panormita (5). I do not know why the abbot de la Roque, in his Journal des Savans of the 18th of April, 1678, makes Father le Tellier ſay, that Quintus Curtius has not been placed among the Hiſtorians by any author before the XVth century (6). It is certain, that this Jeſuit does not mention the XVth century, but the Xth. I have cited his words (7). The argument he makes uſe of againſt thoſe, who pretend that this hiſtory of Alexander was forged ſince the reſtoration of learning, is not a convincing one. He ſays that Gaultier wrote a poem, intituled, Alexandreis, which in many places is only made up of Quintus Curtius's words put into verſe, and that this Poet lived in the XIIth century. Quorum conjecturam vel una refellit Gualteri Belgæ Alexandreis, jam inde uſque à duodecimo æræ Chriſtianæ ſeculo condita, ux unius ſæpe Curtii vocibus in verſum redactis (8). But it might be anſwered, that a modern author, deſigning to write a hiſtory of Alexander, and to publiſh it as the work of Quintus Curtius, made uſe of Gaultier's poem, and put into proſe all the paſſages that he liked. As for me, who cannot believe that any learned man of the XVth century has been able to write in ſo good a ſtyle, and ſo like the ancient way of writing, as that of Quintus Curtius, I need no other reaſon to convince me, that the author of that hiſtory lived before Suetonius; and therefore I approve of thoſe, who blame Angelus Decembrius for ſaying, that Quintus Curtius took many things from Arrianus (9). I know that Iſaac Pontanus, a learned man, did very much approve Decembrius's opinion; but he was not infallible. 'Nos quoque, ſays he (10), poſt Decembrium aliquot 'ad varios datis epiſtolis .... idem adſtruximus ac 'demonſtravimus poſt ævum Trajani & Adriani cla'ruiſſe, & Taciti inſuper maximi Authoris imitatorem 'eſſe, ejuſque non ſemel verba ac dictionem expreſ'ſiſſe, & uſum ſubinde iis vocibus quæ non niſi ab au'thoribus ejus ævi uſurpantur. - - - - - I alſo, after Decembrius, have confirmed and demonſtrated the ſame thing in ſome letters to different perſons; namely, that he flouriſhed after the time of Trajan and Adrian, and that he imitated that great author Tacitus, and often made uſe of his very words and phraſes, as alſo ſuch words as were uſed only by the authors who lived at that time.' This is ſaying poſitively, that Quintus Curtius flouriſhed after the emperor Hadrian: How comes it then that in two other letters (11), he endeavours to ſhew that the paſſages of that author, which ſome apply to Auguſtus, and others to Claudius and Veſpaſian, ought be underſtood of Trajan?

(a) See in the remark [A], Father le Tellier's words, and the reflexion I made upon them.

I ſhall conclude this remark with a paſſage of Vigneul-Marville. 'Some Critics, ſays he (12), are of 'opinion, that the name Quintus Curtius was forged 'by an Italian wit, who compoſed that Hiſtory, or 'Romance, about three hundred years ago. I do not 'know what proof they have for it; the truth is, 'that none of the ancients mention him: But grant'ing this to be true, is it not a wonderful thing, that 'a man, who was a good Latin writer, and who had 'writ a book, that was able to immortalize his 'name, if he had made himſelf known, ſhould have 'been willing to ſacrifice his glory to that of an ima'ginary Quintus Curtius, who could not enjoy it? A 'learned man would formerly make me believe, that 'the name of that author, who was an Italian, is to 'be found latinized in that of Quintus Curtius. It 'may be ſo, but who will explain that emblem? It is 'too late now to do it.'

[B] He was ſo cautious as to prevent the reproach of credulity, which he had reaſon to be afraid of.] I take this from la Mothe le Vayer in his Judgment concerning the principal Hiſtorians, page 204 of the third tome of his works in 12mo. He ſays that Arrianus is one of the moſt cautious Hiſtorians in relating prodigies; but that Quintus Curtius 'is more cautious ſtill. 'We need no other proof for it, than what they ſay 'of one or two miraculous fountains, which ſprung 'up as ſoon as Alexander had encamped near the 'river Oxus. Arrianus tells us, that one was a foun'tain of oil, and the other of clear water, without 'raiſing any ſcruple about the truth of ſuch a ſtory 'in the minds of his readers. Quintus Curtius †, 'who ſays nothing of the ſpring of oil, relates, that 'as they were digging ſome wells, they found a 'ſpring,

(2) This is more than what I have ſaid of PATERCULUS (ſee, above, the remark [B], of the article PHÆDRUS), and of QUINTUS CALABER, in his article, citation (7).

(3) Valens Acidalius, Animadv. ad lib. iv, Curtii.

(4) Michael le Tellier. in Præfat. ad Q. Curtium, in uſum Delphini.

(5) By a letter of Mr de la Croſe from Berlin I learn, that Johannes Sariſburienſis, in the XIIth century; and Michael Scot, in Menſa Philoſophica, in the XIIIth century, have cited Quintus Curtius.

(6) The Abbot de la Roque, having ſaid what I have quoted, and ſome other things, goes on thus, After this remark, Father le Tellier examines, &c. Which ſhews that he imputes to him all that he had been ſaying.

(7) Obſerve, that the Journal de Trevoux, May 1705, p. 811, ſays, that there is an error of the preſs in this paſſage of Father Tellier, and that it ought to be read ante Seculum à Chriſto nato quintum decimum.

(8) Michael le Tellier, ubi ſupra.

(9) Græcorum & Arriani conſtat Hiſtoria, ex quorum fontibus hic ſcriptor ... opus ſuum excudit. Ang. Decembrius, de Polita Literaria.

(10) Joh. Iſacius Pontanus, Epiſt. ad Wicquefortium. It is the LXXVIth of thoſe that Mr Matthæus publiſhed at Leyden in the year 1695.

(11) Written to Voſſius, viz. the LXXXVIIth and XCVIIth of the ſame collection of Mr Matthæus.

(12) Vigneul Marville, Mélang. Tom. ii, pag. 302, Dutch Edit.

† Lib. viii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and if he had oftener intimated that he did not believe all the ſtories which he relates. I have ſaid in another place (b) that the reading of his book recovered a king of Naples, from his illneſs. We have an excellent French tranſlation of his work (c). The learned Freinſhemius wrote a fine commentary upon that Hiſtorian, and a ſupplement to the two firſt books, and to ſome other places that are loſt. Father Michael le Tellier, a Jeſuit, ſhews in his preface (d) that it is more likely he lived in the reign of the emperor Claudius than in that of Veſpaſian. In taking notice of Moreri's miſtakes, I ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome other things [C]. Cardinal du Perron was too great an admirer of Quintus Curtius [D].

(b) Citation (11), of the article NAPLES (ALPHONSUS I, king of).

(c) Made by Vaugelas.

(d) Ad Q. Curtium, in uſum Delphini.

Nothing can more effectually bring a man off from the exceſſive admiration he might have for him, than the remarks publiſhed by Mr le Clerc, intituled, Judicium de Quinto Curtio. They are at the end of his book de Arte Critica, and they do manifeſtly ſhew ſeveral great faults of that famous Hiſtorian, his ignorance of Aſtronomy and Geography, his contradictions, his wrong deſcriptions, his ill taſte in the choice of matter, his careleſſneſs in dating the events, &c. The greateſt part of thoſe faults might be found in moſt ancient Hiſtorians, if one would take the pains, or was ſufficiently qualified to criticize them ſeverely. I do not know but it might be ſaid, that his ignorance of certain things, is a proof that he did not live in theſe later times; for if a man of the XIVth or XVth century had been able to write that Hiſtory of Alexander, he muſt have had more talents than were neceſſary to compoſe

'ſpring in the king's tent, which having not been 'obſerved before late, occaſioned a report that it was 'a new one: Alexander himſelf being glad that 'people ſhould believe it was a divine favour, and a 'gift from Heaven (13). That I may clearly ſhew 'with what circumſpection that Hiſtorian uſed to 'relate things, the truth of which might be queſtion-'ed, I ſhall ſet down the words which follow the 'account he gives of a dog in the kingdom of So-'phita, that ſuffered all his limbs to be cut to pieces, 'rather than to let go his hold of a lion. 'Equi-'dem, ſays he †, plura tranſcribo, quàm credo. Nam 'nec affirmare ſuſtineo de quibus dubito, nec ſubdu-'cere quæ accepi. - - - In truth I tranſcribe more than 'I believe. For I neither can affirm what I doubt of, 'nor ſuppreſs what I have received from others. 'Theſe words muſt be applied to that paſſage of the 'ſame book, wherein it is ſaid, that during Ptolomy's 'ſickneſs, a ſerpent ſhewed Alexander in his ſoundeſt 'ſleep the herb that would cure him. For when an 'Hiſtorian makes it appear that he does not deſign 'to impoſe upon the credulity of his readers, he may 'write any thing, as I have already ſaid, ſpeaking of 'Livy.'

(13) Compare this with the article PHASELIS, remark [B]. The words of Quintus Curtius, lib. viii, cap. x, n. 14, are remarkable. In ipſo tabernaculo regis conſpectus eſt fons quem quia tarde notaverant ſubito extitiſſe finxerunt, rexque ipſe credi voluit donum Dei id fuiſſe.

† Lib. ix.

[C] In taking notice of Moreri's miſtakes, I ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome other things.] I. He had no good reaſon to repreſent Quintus Curtius as a Roman knight. That title is not given to Quintus Curtius mentioned by Cicero, nor to Curtius Rufus mentioned by Tacitus, nor to Quintus Curtius Rufus ſpoken of by Suetonius, who are three perſons, one of whom was our Hiſtorian, as ſome learned men will have it. II. The excellency of his ſtyle is not a good reaſon to doubt whether he is not more ancient than Titus Livius; on the contrary, it may move one to think that he did not live before Livy, but at the ſame time. It is an eaſier thing to find a harſh ſtyle beyond Livy's time, than in the age wherein he lived. Is it not the golden age of the Latin ſtyle? III. It is not true, that Quintus Curtius, in the tenth book, or elſewhere, makes a digreſſion about the facility of his age. Moreri ſhould have ſaid about the felicity. I take notice of this only to ſhew his careleſſneſs: he tranſcribed without any judgment even the errors of the preſs. This had crept into a paſſage of la Mothe le Vayer (14), and he faithfully tranſcribed it, though it was an eaſy thing to perceive how it was to be mended. IV. Suetonius does not ſay that Quintus Curtius Rufus, a great Rhetor, lived in Tiberius's time. What he ſaid concerning that Rhetor is not extant, and it is only by a liſt which was found in a manuſcript that we came to know that he ſpoke of him. Perhaps Voſſius is not miſtaken in conjecturing, from the age of thoſe who precede and follow that Rhetor in that liſt, that he lived in Tiberius's time (15); but this does not prove that Suetonius placed him in the reign of that emperor. V. Moreri ſhould not have aſſerted that Quintus Curtius Rufus, mentioned by Suetonius, is the ſame Curtius Rufus ſpoken of by Tacitus (16). The latter was the ſon of a gladiator, and attained to the conſulſhip, without having taught Rhetoric (17). VI. Moreri is very much in the wrong to wonder that Quintilian, who mentions all the conſiderable Hiſtorians in the tenth book of his Inſtitutions, written under the empire of Domitian, ſhould ſay nothing of Quintus Curtius's Hiſtory. What Moreri aſcribes to Quintilian is falſe; he ſpeaks but of four Hiſtorians at moſt, and therefore his ſilence is of no uſe to thoſe who alledge it as a proof, that Quintus Curtius had not then publiſhed his book. 'Quod argumentum .... validius 'ſemper mihi viſum eſt, quam quod à Quintiliani ſi-'lentio petunt adverſarii. Quaſi vero hiſtoricorum 'catalogum Fabius texuerit, qui quatuor admodum 'ex iis appellavit: ſuperſtites autem, in quibus eſſe 'potuit Curtius conſulto prætermiſerit (18). - - - - - 'W*hich argument .... always appeared to me of more 'force than that which our adverſaries borrow from 'the ſilence of Quintilian. As though Quintilian had 'drawn up a catalogue of Hiſtorian, who has named 'but four of them at moſt: he deſignedly paſſed over 'thoſe that were ſtill extant, among which Curtius 'might be.*' VII. We may therefore reckon as a new fault what is ſaid in theſe words, which (19) cannot be excuſed but by ſuppoſing that this work had not yet been publiſhed in his time. All theſe faults are to be found in la Mothe le Vayer (20). VIII. Raderus did not write a ſupplement to Quintus Curtius, but a commentary. I ſhall ſay nothing of Moreri's wrong quotations (21). I muſt obſerve, by the by, that the ſupplements of Chriſtopher Bruno came out in the year 1545. That author taught Philological learning at Munich, and dedicated his Quintus Curtius to the duke of Bavaria. Poſſevin (22), and James Gourdon (23) affirm, that Quintianus Stoa had ſupplied what is wanting in Quintus Curtius; but Freinſhemius never ſaw that ſupplement (24). Others maintain, that Quintianus Stoa made none (25). I add what Colomies obſerves about the edition of Quintus Curtius, Lugduni apud Paulum Frellon, 1615, in 12mo. 'That edition, 'ſays he, (26) Which is little known, has this pecu-'liar to it; that beſides the common ſupplements 'aſcribed to Chriſtopher Bruno, a monk of Bavaria, 'it contains ſome others tranſcribed from a manuſcript 'of the library of St Victor, by John Maſſon, arch-'deacon of Bayeux, brother to Papyrius Maſſon, who 'is well known to the learned. Thoſe ſupplements, 'the author whereof could not be found out by the 'two Maſſons, were written by Francis Petrarch, if 'we believe Scaliger in the ſecond Scaligerana: In 'Bibliotheca S. Victoris, ſays he, primus liber Q. Curtii 'erat, ſed deprehendi eſſe compoſitum à Petrarcha.' I further add, that Vaſſan writ one day to Goldaſtus, that the firſt book of Quintus Curtius would quickly be publiſhed. Eſt in manibus, Pap. Maſſonii liber ille I. Quinti Curtii hactenus deſideratus, quem ubi primum publicaverit tibi exhibebo (27).

(14) It is in my edition in 12mo, of la Mothe le Vayer's works, Paris 1681, pag. 197, of the 3d Tome.

(15) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 152.

(16) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xi.

(17) Before he was promoted to any dignity he was in the ſervice of the governor of Africa. Tenuis adhuc & obſcurus obtinenti Africam comes hæſerat. Plin. Epiſt. xxvii, lib. vii.

(18) Mich. le Tellier, ubi ſupra.

(19) That is, Quintilian's ſilence.

(20) Ubi ſupra, pag. 197, 198.

(21) Moreri quotes Pliny, Epiſt. VII, it ſhould be Epiſt. XXVII, and Voſſius, lib. - ſhould be lib. i.

(22) In Bibliotha Selecta.

(23) In Chronol. cap. xx, num. 31, pag. Freſh. Pitiſc. cap. iii.

(24) Freinſhem. ibid.

(25) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi ſupra, p. 199.

(26) Colomies, Bibliotheca, p. 184, 185.

(27) See the 31ſt letter in the collection of the letters written to Goldaſtus, and publiſhed in 1688.

'Florus

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google pose it in the first century: he must have had eminent qualities, and have spent his life in study. Could such a man be ignorant of what every body knew then, that the moon is not eclipsed both when it is new and full? But this is one instance of Quintus Curtius's ignorance (e).

(e) Lunam deficere cum aut terram subiret aut sole premeretur. Q. Curtius, lib. iv, cap. x.

(28) Perroniana, at the word Stiles, pag. m. 307.

'Florus next to him, he is so florid, and so elegant. 'Mr Des Portes, who was an excellent judge of style, 'gave the first rank to Quintus Curtius (28).' I had rather praise that Historian with some restriction, as Famianus Strada did. 'At Q. Curtio, says he (29), 'quamquam iis virtutibus exornato, quibus constat aut 'heroicis eum temporibus vixisse, aut dignum fuisse 'qui viveret, non defuêre, qui objicerent quæsiti in- 'terdum medicamenta candoris, & numerorum usum 'paulo intemperantiorem. - - - As for Quintus Curtius, 'though he was adorned with those virtues, which make 'it appear either that he lived, or deserved to have 'lived, in the heroical times, some objected to him the 'want of candor, and too free a use of numbers.' Balzac (30) taxes a modern author with the same fault, and uses the very same words of that Jesuit. I mention this by the by, to discover a small piece of Plagiarism.

(29) Famian. Strada, Prolusion. Academ. lib. ii, Prolus. III, pag. m. 266.

(30) In a Latin letter to Mr Silhon, pag. m. 194.

QUINTILIAN (MARCUS FABIUS) was born at Calagurris in Spain (a). It is said, that he was brought to Rome by Galba (b), and it is certain that he taught Rhetoric in that city with great reputation. He was the first who taught it there publickly at the charge of the government (c). He was discharged from that laborious profession, after he had exercised it for the space of twenty years (d). He had several domestic afflictions, which had like to have overcome his constancy, and which made him complain of his cruel fate [A]. He lamented above all things the death of a son of ten years of age, who was an extraordinary promising child (e). He was not contented to give rules to speak well; but he also shewed his eloquence at the bar: he pleaded for queen Berenice in her presence (f), and was accounted so good an advocate, that some persons writ down his pleadings to sell them to the Booksellers [B]. Some

(a) Adserat usque licet Fabium Calagurris alumnum. Ausonius, in Professoribus, pag. m. 145. That town stands upon the Ebro, and is now called Calahorra.

(b) Chronic. Eusebii sub Olymp. CCXI, pag. m. 162. See the remark [E].

(c) Ibid. sub Olymp. CCXVI, pag. 164.

(d) Post impetratam studiis meis quietem quæ per viginti annos eruditionis juvenibus impenderam. Quintil. Præf. lib. i.

(e) See the remark [A].

(f) Quintilian. lib. iv, cap. i, pag. m. 168.

[A] He had several domestic afflictions, which .... made him complain of his cruel fate.] The death of his wife, who was but nineteen years of age, made him inconsolable. He praises her very much. 'Omni 'virtute quæ in fœminas cadit functa, insanabilem at- 'tulit marito dolorem .... illi dolori quem ex matre 'optima atque laudem omnem supergressa, paucos ante 'menses ceperam gratulor (1). - - - She being a wo- 'man adorned with every virtue proper to her sex, her 'husband was inconsolable for the loss of her..... I 'am pleased with that grief, which I felt some months 'before, for the best of mothers.' She left him two sons, whereof one died at five years of age, and the other at ten. The latter was the eldest, and had extraordinary gifts: besides fortune begun already to put him in the way to dignities; a man who had been consul had adopted him; and another, who was prætor, and his uncle by his mother's side, designed to make him his son-in-law. Tene consulari nuper adoptione ad omnium spes bonorum patris admotum, te avunculo prætori generum destinatum, te omnium spe Atticæ eloquentiæ candidatum superstes parens tantum ad pœnas amisi? Quintilian's affliction for so many losses was very great; he resolved to leave off writing, and to throw into the fire what he had already composed; he was afraid of being taxed with little affection and tenderness, if he should make use of his tongue to any other purpose, than to inveigh against Heaven. He did not forget to say, that there is a malicious and jealous Being, who will not suffer children that promise great things to live long. I must set down his own words, that the reader may see how far the wisest Heathens let loose their impatience. 'Tunc 'igitur optimum fuit, infaustum opus, & quicquid 'hoc est in me infelicium literarum, super immaturum 'funus consumpturis viscera mea flammis injicere, ne- 'que hanc impiam vivacitatem novis insuper curis fa- 'tigare. Quis enim mihi bonus parens ignoscat, si 'studere amplius possum? ac non oderit hanc animi 'mei firmitatem, si quis in me est alius usus vocis, 'quàm, ut incusem deos, superstes omnium meorum? 'nullam terras despicere providentiam tester? si non 'meo casu, cui tamen nihil objici, nisi quod vivam, 'potest: at illorum certè, quos utique immeritos mors 'acerba damnavit (2)..... Juro per mala mea, per 'infelicem conscientiam, per illos manes numina dolo- 'ris mei; has me in illo vidisse virtutes ingenii, non 'modò ad perspiciendas disciplinas, quo nihil præ- 'stantius cognovi, plurima expertus, studiique jam 'tum non coacti, (sciunt præceptores,) sed probitatis, 'pietatis, humanitatis, liberalitatis; ut prorsus possit 'hinc esse tanti fulminis metus; quòd observatum ferè 'est, celerius occidere festinatam maturitatem; & esse 'nescio quam, quæ spes tantas decerpat, invidiam; 'ne videlicet ultra quàm homini datum est, nostra 'provehantur (3). - - - Then it had been best to have 'thrown into the flames, which were about to consume 'my own bowels, all the unhappy learning I am master 'of, and no longer to fatigue myself with new studies. 'For what good parent can forgive me, if I go on with 'my studies; and will not rather abhor my resolution, 'if I make any other use of words, than to accuse the 'gods for suffering me to survive my whole family, and 'deny that there is any providence; if not upon my own 'account, to whom nothing can be objected, but that I 'am still alive, yet certainly upon the account of those, 'who, without deserving it, have been snatched away by 'an untimely death..... I swear by my misfortunes, by 'my unhappy reflexions, by those shades the deities of my 'grief, that I discovered in him not only a readiness to 'receive instruction, in which he excelled all I have 'ever met with, but also the virtues of probity, piety, 'humanity, and liberality; insomuch that the fear of 'this terrible stroke might proceed from this, that what- 'ever is early ripe is soonest blasted, and that there is a 'kind of envy, which destroys so great hopes, lest we 'should exceed the limits prescribed to man.' Nevertheless he changed his mind as to his work; he went on with it, and finished it.

(1) Quintil. Præfat. lib. vi, p. m. 267.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Ib. p. 268.

[B] Some persons writ down his pleadings, to sell them to the Booksellers.' There were at that time some men at Rome, who could write a whole speech in Shorthand, though the Orator spoke never so fast. That art is, at present, better known and practised in England than in any other country. Those who took the pains to write in that manner what they heard at the bar, did not always do it out of curiosity, but sometimes out of avarice. They were willing to get some good pieces to sell them to the Booksellers. The authors were sometimes the worse for it; for they saw, that the writer had forgot some good things, and the works, that were thus handed about under their names, were but imperfect pieces. This was our Quintilian's case, as he himself tells us, having mentioned a plea, which a youthful ambition prompted him to impart to the public. 'Id est in causa Nævii Apruniani so- 'lùm quæsitum, præcipitatane esset ab eo uxor; an se 'ipsa sua sponte jecisset. Quam actionem equidem 'solam in hoc tempus emiseram, quod me ipsum se- 'cisse seductum juvenili cupiditate gloriæ fateor. Nam 'cæteræ, quæ sub nomine meo feruntur, negligentia 'excipientium in quæstum notariorum corruptæ, mi- 'nimam partem mei habent (4). - - - This was the only question in the cause of Nævius Aprunianus, whether 'he threw his wife down the precipice, or she threw 'herself down. This is the only pleading I have hitherto 'made public, which I confess I did out of a youthful 'desire of glory. For the rest, which go under my name, 'being

(4) Quintil. lib. viii, cap. xi, p. m. 321, 322.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Some are of opinion, that he was made conſul [C]: it is more certain, that he was preceptor to the grand-ſons of Domitian's ſiſter [D]. It is not certainly known whether ' being corrupted through the negligence of thoſe who took

' them in writing, in order to get money by them, con-
' tain very little of mine.'

[C] Some are of opinion that he was made conſul.] They ground their opinion upon theſe words of Auſonius. ' Quintilianus conſularia per Clementem orna-
' menta fortitus, honeſtamenta nominis potius videtur
(5) Auſonius, in Gratiar. Actione, pag. m. 712, 713. ' quam inſignia poteſtatis habuiſſe (5). - - - Quintilian,
' having obtained the conſular ornaments by the favour
' of Clement, ſeems rather to have had the honour of the
' name than the marks of the power.' Vinetus on theſe words ſays, that Marcus Arricinius Clemens, and Titus Flavius Clemens having been for ſome time very much in Domitian's favour, loſt it to ſuch a degree, that he cauſed them to be put to death. He does not know which of thoſe two Clements procured Quintilian the honour ſpoken of by Auſonius; but, ſays he, it was not the ordinary conſulſhip; for the Faſti make no mention of it, and therefore it was but a ſubrogated conſulſhip (6), Vinetus might have conjectured, that it was Flavius Clemens, as it will appear hereafter. The paſſage of Auſonius is confirmed by theſe verſes of Juvenal:

(6) Vinet. in Auſon. p. 713.

- - - - - - - - - - Unde igitur tot
Quintilianus habet ſaltus? exempla novorum
Fatorum tranſi: felix, & pulcher, & acer,
Felix, & ſapiens, & nobilis, & generoſus
Appoſitam nigræ lunam ſubtexit alutæ:
Felix, orator quoque maximus & jaculator,
Et ſi perfrixit, cantat bene, diſtat enim, quæ
Sidera te excipiant modo primos incipientem
Edere vagitus, & adhuc à matre rubentem.
Si fortuna volet, fies de rhetore conſul,
Si volet hæc eadem, fies de conſule rhetor (7).

(7) Juven. Sat. VII, ver. 188.

Amidſt this waſtful riot, there accrues
But poor ten ſhillings for Quintilian's dues:
For to breed up the ſon to common ſenſe,
Is ever more the parents leaſt expence.
From whence then comes Quintilian's vaſt eſtate?
Becauſe he was the darling ſon of fate;
And luck, in ſcorn of merit, made him great.
Urge not th' example of one ſingle man,
As rare as a white crow, or ſable ſwan.
Quintilian's fate was to be counted wiſe,
Rich, noble, fair, and in the ſtate to riſe:
Good fortune grac'd his action, and his tongue;
His colds became him, and when hoarſe he ſung.
O, there's ſtrange difference, what planets ſhed
Their influence on the new-born infant's head!
'Tis fate that flings the dice; and as ſhe flings
Of kings makes pedants and of pedants kings.

DRYDEN.

We learn at leaſt from this paſſage, that Quintilian got riches and honours; but Juvenal intimates, that fortune contributed to it as much, or more than his merit. If the thirty-ſecond letter of the ſixth book of Pliny was written to our Quintilian, there is no reaſon to think that Juvenal was in the right, when he repreſented that teacher of Rhetoric as an opulent man. Pliny ſays, that the perſon to whom he writes, had no great eſtate (8), he does not believe him able to equip his daughter as ſhe ſhould be, ſince ſhe was to be married to a man of note, and therefore preſents her with a conſiderable ſum (9), that ſhe may go to her huſband in a good equipage. ' Cum tamen ſit nup-
' tura honeſtiſſimo viro, Nonio Celeri, cui ratio civi-
' lium officiorum neceſſitatem quandam nitoris imponit,
' debet ſecundum conditiones mariti, veſte, comitatu
' augeri: quibus non quidem augetur dignitas, orna-
' natur tamen, & inſtitutum (10). - - - - But being to be
' married to a man of diſtinction, Nonius Celer, whoſe
' civil employments lay him under a neceſſity of making
' ſome figure, ſhe ought to have cloaths and ſervants en-
' ſwerable to the dignity of her huſband: theſe things do
' not, indeed, add to a man's worth, but they ſet it off,
' and adorn it.' It might be ſaid, that the father of that maid is not our Quintilian; for, it ſeems, that Pliny would have mentioned the advantage of having been his diſciple, if he had writ to his profeſſor. Beſides, it might be ſaid, that Quintilian having loſt his wife, and two ſons, repreſents himſelf as a man whom the gods had deprived of all his family (11). Nay, he ſays that his wife died at nineteen years of age, and left him two ſons (12). Would he have expreſſed himſelf thus, if he had alſo a daughter by her? But theſe reaſons are not demonſtrative. Perhaps Quintilian married a ſecond wife, and had by her the daughter that Pliny ſpeaks of. Perhaps his eſtate decreaſed after the VIIth ſatire of Juvenal. Beſides, that Poet might look upon him as a rich man, if compared with the other Rhetors; and Pliny might think that he had but an indifferent eſtate with reſpect to the family, into which young Quintiliana was going to be married. Note, that it is certain he had been one of Quintilian's ſcholars (13), but he might very well write to him without mentioning ſuch a thing.

(8) Te porro animo beatiſſimum modicum facultatibus ſcio. Plin. Epiſt. XXXII, lib. vi, pag. m. 400.

(9) Tanquam parens alter puellæ noſtræ confero quinquaginta millia nummûm. Ibid.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Quintil. Præfat. lib. vi, Inſtitut. Orat.

(12) Nondum expleto ætatis undevicteſimo anno duos enixa filios. Ibid.

(13) Plin. Epiſt. XIV, lib. ii, & Epiſt. VI, lib. vi.

[D] He was preceptor to the grand-ſons of Domitian's ſiſter.] He ſays ſo himſelf; Cum mibi Domitianus Auguſtus ſororis ſuæ nepotum delegaverit curam, non ſatis bonorem judiciorum cæleſtium intelligam, niſi ex hoc quoque oneris magnitudinem metiar (14). Moreri does not tranſlate theſe words right, when he ſays that Domitian intruſted Quintilian with the education of his nephews. Barthius would be guilty of the ſame fault, if by the word nepotes he did not underſtand grand-ſons, as it is very likely he does (15). Nevertheleſs he is miſtaken. He, who wrote the contents of the chapters of Quintilian, ſays that this Rhetorician taught the ſons of Domitian's ſiſter; which is pretending to know more of the matter than Quintilian himſelf: but, will ſome ſay, where ſhall we find thoſe grand-ſons of Domitian's ſiſter? I anſwer, that it is very likely they were the two ſons of Flavius Clemens, couſin german to that prince. He deſigned them publickly to be his ſucceſſors from their infancy, and gave one of them the name of Veſpaſian, and the other that of Domitian (16). It is therefore probable, that he gave them the beſt maſter that was then at Rome, I mean Quintilian. If it be objected to me, that Flavius Clemens marrried Domitian's ſiſter, and conſequently that his ſons were not the grand-ſons of that emperor's ſiſter: if Philoſtratus be alledged againſt me, who ſays that the wife of Flavius Clemens was Domitian's ſiſter (17): I anſwer, that Philoſtratus is leſs to be credited than Dion, who only ſays, that ſhe was related to that prince. Τὸν φάσκοντα Κλήμεντα ὑπατεύοντα κατὰ ἀνεψιὸν ὄντα καὶ γυναῖκα καὶ αὐτὴν συγγενῆ ἑαυτῷ φλαβίαν Δομιτίλλαν ἔχοντα κατέσφαξεν ὁ Δομιτιανός. Fabium Clementem conſulem (etſi patruelis ejus erat & Flaviam Domitillam Domitiani conſanguineam uxorem habebat) morte affecit (18). - - - - He put to death Fabius Clement the conſul, tho' he was related to him, and had married Flavia Domitilla, ſiſter of Domitian. Moreover, I ſay that Domitilla, Domitian's ſiſter, was not alive when Flavius Clemens was put to death; and yet Philoſtratus tells us, that the wife of that Flavius was baniſhed after the death of her huſband. He is therefore miſtaken, when he ſays ſhe was Domitian's ſiſter. We read in Suetonius that Veſpaſian had but three children by his wife Flavia Domitilla, viz. Titus Domitian and Domitilla, and that he loſt his wife and daughter before he was emperor (19). I ſuppoſe that Domitilla, Veſpaſian's daughter, left a daughter who was married to Flavius Clemens. According to this ſuppoſition, the ſons of Flavius Clemens, who had Quintilian for their tutor, are the grand-ſons of Domitian's ſiſter, as Quintilian ſays in expreſs words. The time that paſſed between the death of Domitilla, and the empire of Domitian, was long enough to maintain, that the grand-ſons of Domitilla were of a ſufficient age to be taught by Quintilian under that reign; for I may very well be allowed to ſay, that Veſpaſian loſt his daughter a long time before he came to be an emperor, which happened when he was ſixty years of age. The inſcription, Flavia Domitilla Imp. Cæſaris Neptis (20) ought to be underſtood

(14) Quintilian. Præfat. lib. vi, Inſtitut. Orat.

(15) Sic Domitianum adulator Quintilianus cum Nepotum ejus admotus. Barthius, in Statium, Tom. iii, pag. 1592.

(16) Sueton. in Domit. cap. xv.

(17) Ἕτερος μὲν γὰρ Κλήμαντα ἀνεψιὸν ὄντα αὐτοῦ καὶ γυναῖκα ἔχειν Δομιτίλλαν τὴν ἀδελφὴν τοῦ Δομιτιανοῦ. Cum Clementem . . . cui ſororem ſuam nuptum dederat occidiſſet. Philoſtr. in Vita Apollonii, lib. viii.

(18) Xiphil. in Domitiano, pag. m. 236.

(19) Sueton. in Veſpaſ. cap. . .

(20) It is in Gruterus, p. 355.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

whether he was the ſon, or the grand-ſon of the Orator mentioned by Seneca the father [E]. Several Critics aſcribe to this Orator the declamations publiſhed by Ugolinus Parmenſis, and afterwards by Petrus Pithœus [F]; but the Inſtitutiones Oratoriæ are by every body looked upon as a work of our Quintilian. Poggius found out the manuſcript in a manner that is worth relating [G]. It would have been a great loſs to the commonwealth ſtood, as Triſtan obſerves, not of a daughter of Veſpaſian, but of a daughter of Domitilla, Titus's ſiſter. Laſtly, I ſay that he, who beſtowed the conſulſhip upon Quintilian, was called Clemens: but he did it to reward Quintilian for his tutor-ſhip, which appears from Auſonius's deſign in mentioning this. Therefore either the father of Quintilian's pupils, or one of thoſe pupils, muſt needs have beſtowed that reward upon him; from whence I conclude, that the pupils of that Rhetorician were the ſons of Flavius Clemens, and conſequently that this Flavius was married to a daughter of Domitian's ſiſter. I wonder that neither Caſaubon (21), nor Marcilius (22), who criticized him, took any notice of Philoſtratus's miſtake; both of them approve what he ſays, that the wife of Flavius Clemens was Veſpaſian's daughter, and that ſhe was alive when that Flavius was killed. This is plainly contradicted by Suetonius (23).

(21) Caſaub. in Sueton. Domit. cap. xv.

(22) Theodorus Marcilius, in Sueton. ibid.

(23) In Veſpaſiano, cap. iii.

[E] It is not certainly known whether he was the ſon or the grand-ſon of the Orator mentioned by Seneca.] That Orator muſt have lived under Auguſtus; for Seneca, the father, ſpeaks of him as of a man, who was already dead, and whoſe reputation was extinct (24). But Quintilian was very young, when Domitius Afer, who died under Nero, was already an old man (25): It is therefore an unreaſonable thing to make him the ſon of a man, who flouriſhed in the reign of Auguſtus. It were better to ſay, that he was his grand-ſon; but perhaps it might be objected, that he has mentioned his father as an Orator (26), without ever ſpeaking one word of his grand-father. There are ſome good critics (27), who do not aſcribe the declamations publiſhed by Pithœus to the grand-father of Quintilian, nor to his father. Thoſe declamations, ſay they, do not ſavour of the age of Auguſtus; and it is not at all likely, that the productions of Quintilian, mentioned by Seneca, ſhould be ſtill extant, when other works of the ſame time, and much more elaborate, have been loſt. They obſerve that, according to Seneca, the reputation of the Orator Quintilian died with him (28). If they infer from thence, that he publiſhed no books, they do not argue right; for there are many authors, whoſe glory dies before them, or, at leaſt, with them. I muſt not forget to make this following obſervation: Quintilian's father pleaded ſome cauſes, and therefore he lived at Rome, ſay ſome; why then is it ſaid in Euſebius's chronicle, that Galba brought him to Rome from Spain? Was it an uſual thing for a man ſettled at Rome to leave his children in a province? Mr de Tillemont (29) ſhews, that this is not a convincing objection; but, nevertheleſs, he acknowledges the miſtake of Euſebius's chronicle. He ſhews, that it is not true, that Galba brought Quintilian to Rome in the year 69, and he alledges this reaſon for it, viz. that Quintilian heard Domitius Afer at Rome, who died in the year 59. Note, that Mr de Tillemont's argument is not very good; for he quotes a paſſage, which imports, not that Quintilian heard Domitius Afer plead, but that a certain plea of that Orator was very much eſteemed (30). He ſhould have quoted another paſſage (31). He will not have Martial's omiſſion to be urged, and I confeſs it cannot be looked upon as a demonſtrative proof; however, it affords a very ſtrong objection againſt thoſe, who ſay, that Quintilian was a Spaniard. Martial took great delight in mentioning the illuſtrious men of Spain, and in obſerving that they were born in Spain. Would he have forgot to make the ſame obſervation concerning ſo famous a man as Quintilian was? Would he have expreſſed himſelf ſo as to make one believe that Quintilian was born at Rome, rather than that he was not?

(24) Seneca, Controv. lib. v, in Præf.

(25) Domitio Afro quem adoleſcentulus ſenem colui. Quintil. lib. v, cap. vii, pag. 212.

(26) Ibid. lib. ix, cap. iii, pag. 432.

(27) See Faber's Notes on Seneca's Controverſies, ubi ſupra.

(28) Quorum fama cum ipſis extincta eſt. Seneca, ubi ſupra.

(29) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. ii, pag. 873, 874, Edit. of Bruſſels.

(30) He quotes the firſt chapter of the 10th book of Quintilian, where theſe words are to be found, 'Nobis pueris inſignes pro Voluſeno Catulo Domitii Afri, Criſpi Paſſieni, Decimi Lælii orationes ferebantur.

(31) That which I have recited above, citation (25).

(32) Martial. Epigr. XC, lib. ii.

Quintiliane vagæ moderator ſumme juventæ,
Gloria Romanæ Quintiliane togæ (32).

Quintilian, youths ſupreme director grown,
Quintilian, glory of the Roman gown.

Let the readers judge of it: but I muſt obſerve, that this paſſage of Martial does not prove that Quintilian was a native of Rome; and that thoſe, who inferred from a paſſage of Trebellius Pollio that he was a citizen of Rome (33), reaſoned wrong: 'Fuit autem, 'viz. Poſthumius the younger, (quod ſolum memoratu 'dignum eſt) ita in declamationibus diſertus, ut ejus 'controverſiæ Quintiliano dicantur inſertæ, quem de- 'clamatorem Romani generis acutiſſimum, vel unius 'capitis lectio prima ſtatim fronte demonſtrat. (34) - - 'He was ſo eloquent an Orator (which alone deſerves to be 'remembered) that his controverſies are ſaid to have been in- 'ſerted by Quintilian, who was the moſt ſubtle declaimer 'of all the Romans, as the reading of one ſingle chapter 'preſently demonſtrates.' Theſe words of Trebellius Pollio ſignify only, that Quintilian was a Latin Rhetor. He is there mentioned not in oppoſition to the provincial writers, but to the Greeks. As in theſe words of Pliny: 'Rationem quidem defectus utriuſ- 'que (Solis ac Lunæ) primus Romani generis in- 'vulgus extulit Sulpicius Gallus. . . . . Apud Græcos 'autem inveſtigavit primus omnium Thales (35). - - - 'Sulpicius Gallus was the firſt among the Romans, who 'explained the reaſon of the eclipſes both of the Sun and 'Moon. . . . . Thales was the firſt among the Greeks, who 'diſcovered it.'

(33) Catanæus, in Plinium, Epiſt. XIV, lib. ii, pag. m. 120, 121, is one of them.

(34) Trebellius Pollio, in Poſth. juniore, pag. 260, Tom. ii, Hiſtor. Auguſt. Scriptor.

(35) Plin. cap. xii, lib. ii.

[F] The declamations publiſhed by Ugolinus Parmenſis, and afterwards by Petrus Pithœus.] He only publiſhed one hundred thirty-ſix. Pithœus made a new edition of them in 1580, that was more correct, to which he added nine declamations, which had not been printed before. Voſſius obſerves this in one of his books (36); but in another he makes no diſtinction at all (37); cujus declamationes CXLV à Tideo Ugolino primùm editas, ex veteri codici reſtituit P. Pythæus (38). Moreri tranſcribes the wrong paſſage of Voſſius. For the reſt, I muſt not forget to ſay, that Voſſius is to blame for not taking notice of the time wherein Ugolinus Parmenſis lived (39), and for omitting that Peter Ayrault publiſhed (40) Quintilian's declamations, before they were publiſhed by Petrus Pithœus. He boaſts of it in his treatiſe concerning the Paternal Power. Quintilian, ſays he (41), whom I have firſt publiſhed, and the learned Pithœus after me.

(36) Voſſius, in Inſtitut. Orat. lib. i, cap. xi, pag. m. 198, 199.

(37) Idem, de Rhetorices natura, pag. 105.

(38) It ſhould be Pithœus.

(39) He lived in the XVth century. Philelphus ſpeaks of him. See Reineſius, Epiſt. LXIII, ad Daumium, pag. 167.

(40) At Paris in the year 1563.

(41) Ayrault, pag. m. 271. See alſo his Diſſertation de la nature & mutation des Loix, pag. m. 189.

[G] Poggius found out the manuſcript in a manner that is worth relating.] It was in the abbey of St Gall, during the council of Conſtance. The copy of Quintilian's works, which they had in Italy, was horribly mangled: Ita lacerum, ita circumciſum, ut nulla forma, nullus habitus hominis in eo recognoſceretur. You may judge, that the news of this diſcovery occaſioned a great joy. Poggius gave immediately notice of it: the letter that he writ on that occaſion was never printed; it is at the end of a manuſcript of Quintilian, in the library of Milan, as we are informed by Father Mabillon, who has given us this curious fragment of that letter. 'Fortuna quæ- 'dam fuit, cum ſua, tum maxime noſtra, ut cum 'eſſemus Conſtantiæ otioſi, cupido inceſſerit viſendi 'ejus loci, quo ille recluſus tenebatur. Eſt autem 'monaſterium ſancti Galli, prope urbem hanc mil- 'libus paſſuum viginti. Itaque nonnulli animi laxandi, '& ſimul perquirendorum librorum, quorum nume- 'rus maximus ibi eſſe dicebatur, gratia eo perrexi- 'mus. Ibi inter confertiſſimam librorum copiam, 'quos longum eſſet recenſere, Quintilianum reperi- 'mus adhuc ſalvum & incolumem, plenum tamen ſitu, '& pulvere refertum. Erant enim in bibliotheca li- 'bri illi, non ut eorum dignitas poſtulabat, ſed in 'teterrimo quodam & obſcuro carcere, fundo ſcilicet 'unius turris, quo ne vita quidem damnati detrude- 'rentur. . . . . Reperimus præterea libros tres primos '& dimidiatum quarti C. Valerii Flacci Argonautica'n; '& expoſitiones, tamquam thema quoddam, ſuper 'octo Ciceronis orationibus Q. Aſconii Pediani elo- 'quentiſſimi viri, de quibus ipſe meminit Quintilianus. 'Hæc mea manu tranſcripſi, & quidem velociter, ut 'ea mitterem ad Leonardum Aretinum & Nicolaum 'Florentinum; qui cum à me hujus theſauri adinven- 'tionem

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

monwealth of learning, if Quintilian's works had been loſt, for he is an excellent author; and it were to be wiſhed, that all thoſe who write books, would firſt of all read him with great attention. I am ſorry I have been too late ſenſible of the uſefulneſs of ſuch a reading. Mr de la Fontaine, who was a very good judge, eſteemed that Rhetorician very much. See, in his poſthumous works (g), the verſes he ſent to the biſhop of Avranches, when he preſented him with Quintilian's works tranſlated by Horatio Toſcanella. Mr Nicolle the father, and the abbot de Pure, have given us a French tranſlation of that author. The moſt correct edition of Quintilian is that of Mr Obrecht [H]. The dialogue de cauſis corruptæ Eloquentiæ is to be found in it, as in all the other editions, though all the Critics do not believe that Quintilian is the author of it; many aſcribe it to Tacitus, and it is commonly printed with the works of that Hiſtorian. That which is certain is, that our author wrote a book de cauſis corruptæ Eloquentiæ (b). I think it is loſt, and I make no doubt that it was as excellent in its kind, as the other pieces of Quintilian that are extant. I have not given a full account of his merit. I muſt further add, that he appears by his works to have been a very honeſt man, and that there is a great deal of good morality in them. Some blame him for praiſing the emperor Domitian too much, and though he did it only by the by, and very nicely (i), they will not forgive him that fault, which ſeems, without doubt, to be very great to thoſe, who have read the Hiſtory of that wicked prince. Had I had Mr Dodwell's Annales Quintilianei (k), this article might have been better; but through a misfortune of which I ſo often complain, I mean that I am deprived of the moſt neceſſary books, I have not been able to peruſe that work.

(g) Pag. 52, of the Dutch edition.

(b) Quintilianus, Inſtitutiones, lib. vi, init. & lib. viii, in fine.

(i) Ibid. lib. x, cap. i.

(k) Printed at Oxford in the year 1698.

(42) Mabillon, in Muſeo Italico, Tom. i, Part i, pag. 211.

'tionem cognoviſſent, multis à me verbis Quintilianum 'per ſuas litteras quam primum ad eos mitti contende-'runt (42). - - - - It was his good fortune, but eſpecially 'ours, that being at Conſtance, and having nothing to 'do, we had a deſire to ſee the place, in which he was 'ſhut up. It is the monaſtery of St Gall, twenty miles 'from this city. Therefore ſome of us, to divert our-'ſelves, and at the ſame time to ſearch after books, of 'which there was a great number there, went thi-'ther. There we found Quintilian amidſt a heap of 'books, which it would be tedious to reckon up, ſtill 'ſafe and ſound, but covered with dirt and duſt. For 'the books in the library were not placed in a manner 'ſuitable to their merit, but lodged in a naſty and ob-'ſcure priſon, at the bottom of a tower, in which a 'condemned perſon would hardly be confined. . . . . We 'found alſo the three firſt books, and half the fourth, of 'Valerius Flaccus's Argonautics, and the Expoſitions on 'eight Orations of Cicero, by Quintus Aſconius Pedia-'nus, a moſt eloquent man, which Quintilian himſelf 'mentions. Theſe I tranſcribed with my own hand, and 'as faſt as I could, that I might ſend them to Leonard 'Aretinus, and Nicolas Florentinus, who hearing that 'I had found this treaſure, earneſtly preſſed me that I 'would ſend Quintilian to them as ſoon as poſſible.' For the reſt, to know the bad condition the Quintilian they had before that diſcovery, was in, we need only read one of Petrarch's letters (43). One Gaſparinus of Bergamo, who taught Philological learning at Milan, was very much to be pitied; for he took a great deal of pains about that wretched manuſcript, before a better could be found out (44). I muſt take notice of a miſtake in Varillas. 'Poggio, ſays he (45), had 'the good fortune to light upon the Inſtitutions, and 'the nineteen firſt declamations of Quintilian, as he 'was ſearching in a ſhop of a German Grocer, who 'was going to tear them to fold up his wares (46). 'They who know that it was the only copy extant, 'will be for ever indebted to Poggio for that diſco-'very.' Mr de Larroque has made it appear, that it is not true that this was the only copy extant. Theſe are his words; 'How great ſoever that loſs 'might have been (47), it would not have been ir-'recoverable. A fine manuſcript of that Roman 'Rhetor, above five hundred years old, which is to 'be found in the noble library of Oxford, would 'have made up that loſs to the public, as well as 'ſeveral others of a conſiderable antiquity, that are at 'Cologne, and at Berne, as I have been lately in-'formed by the learned Mr Grævius; and ſuppoſe 'thoſe had met likewiſe with an unmerciful Grocer, 'that loſs might have been ſupplied ſtill by thoſe 'that are to be found in the library of the moſt 'Chriſtian King; there are fourteen or fifteen of them, 'if the catalogue I have ſeen is true (48).'

(43) That which he writes to Quintilian.

(44) Volaterran. lib. xxi, pag. m. 772, 773.

(45) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, pag. 163.

(46) Paul. Jovius, in Elog. cap. x, pag. 30, ſays only ita ut & ei quoque (Pogio) Quintilianum in falſis mentani taberna repertum debere fateamur. Paul Jovius is miſtaken, and Mr Varillas more ſtill. Quintilian was found in the abbey of St Gall.

(47) That of the manuſcript which the German Grocer was going to tear.

(48) Larroque's Preface to the Nouvelles Accuſations contre Mr Varillas, folio 4 verſo.

[H] The moſt correct edition . . . . is that of Mr Obrecht.] It was publiſhed in two volumes in 4to, at Straſbourg, in the year 1698. He has mended the text in many places with the help of manuſcripts, or by his own conjectures (49). He has not done like other critics, who place in their notes, or at the end of the book, the various readings which they like beſt, and leave in the text thoſe which they believe to be falſe; but he gives the text as he thinks it ought to be read. Mr Salo, in the year 1665, adviſed thoſe who publiſh the ancient authors, to do the ſame. See his Journal des Savans of the ſixteenth of May, 1665 (50).

(49) See the Acta Eruditorum, Dec. 1698, pag. 546, & ſeq.

(50) Pag. 222.

QUINTIN (JOHN) profeſſor of the Canon Law at Paris in the XVIth century, was a native of Autun. He neither wanted learning nor genius. At firſt he liked the new opinions, as they were called, and declared his mind, in an oration, ſo plainly about it, that he was forced to remove from Poitiers [A]; but his faith which was only temporary [B] was not proof againſt a long perſecution. He quickly accepted of a good benefice,

[A] To remove from Poitiers.] Preſident la Place informs us of it in this manner: 'Several having heard 'the harangue of the ſaid Quintin, were amazed at 'it, expecting no ſuch thing from him, becauſe he 'had been formerly ſuſpected, and even proſecuted on 'account of religion, and forced to retire from Poi-'tiers, for having made a ſpeech in public quite dif-'ferent from that which he then made (1).' Beza ſays the ſame thing (2).

(1) La Place, de l'eſtat de la Religion & Republique, livr. iv, fol. 151, verſo.

(2) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Tom. i, pag. 436.

(3) Ib. p. 63.

[B] His faith was only temporary.] Beza (3) ſpeaks of him thus: 'Some years before, another ſcholar, whoſe 'name was Quintin, a native of Autun, had likewiſe 'entred the liſts; but being forced to retire, he was 'ſo far from perſevering, that, on the contrary, he in-'tirely fell off: and, at laſt, being a famous doctor of 'the Canon Law in the univerſity of Paris, and hav-'ing got a ſubſtantial benefice from the order of the 'knights of Rhodes, he became a perſecutor as far 'as he was able.' That Hiſtorian mentions ſeveral other perſons whom he looked upon as men, who had received the ſeed into ſtony ground (4), and among the thorns: they had heard the word, and anon with joy received it; but they had no root in themſelves, they laſted but for a time, ſo that tribulation or perſecution ariſing becauſe of the word, by and by they were offended; the care of this world, and the deceitfulneſs of riches, choaked the word, and they became unfruitful.

(4) Matth. xiii. 20.

[C] To

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

benefice, that was given him by the order of the knights of Malta (a); and when he returned from that iſland, where he had been a domeſtic to the Great Maſter, he was made profeſſor of the Canon Law at Paris in the year 1536. That which made him moſt ſpoken of, was the harangue he made in the name of the clergy during the aſſembly of the ſtates at Orleans in December 1560. He demanded that thoſe of the new religion ſhould be proceeded againſt with the utmoſt ſeverity; which would be more ſurprizing, if it had not been a thing practiſed for many ages: but though that bloody ſpirit had prevailed never ſo long, many could not forbear wondering that a clergyman ſhould have taken upon himſelf to ſollicit ſuch a thing [C]. Quintin did not foreſee, that the chief men of the Proteſtants would ſhew a great deal of vigour in that aſſembly; much leſs did he foreſee, that he would be extremely affected with the animadverſions that ſhould be made upon his harangue. Had he foreſeen thoſe things, he would without doubt have kept at Paris, and had rather choſen to explain ſome decretals to his ſcholars, than to give leſſons of cruelty to the king, his maſter, in the preſence of the three Eſtates of the kingdom. Admiral Chatillon complained ſo openly of Quintin's ſpeech [D], that the king, and the queen-mother, ſent for that Orator, to call him to an account for what he had ſaid. His anſwer was, that he had only followed the orders and memoirs of the body, whoſe ſpokeſman he had been. The Proteſtants were not ſatisfied with that anſwer (b); he was obliged to declare before the aſſembly of the Eſtates, that he did not deſign to reflect on admiral Chatillon: but he was much more vexed at the railleries and cenſures, that were diſperſed againſt his declamation [E]. He could not bear that mortification, and his affliction

(a) Douiat. Præn. Canonic. lib. v, cap. viii, pag. 620.

(b) Commentaires de l'état de la Relig. & Republ. livr. iv, folio 152. Thuanus, lib. xxvii.

[C] To ſollicit ſuch a thing.] Quintin having demanded that all the inhabitants of the kingdom ſhould be obliged to be Catholics; that the Non-Chriſtians, that is, the Heretics, ſhould not be admitted into the converſation and company of the Chriſtian ſubjects (5); and that for the time to come, all Heretics ſhould be forbidden to deal in any commodity (whether it were books, or any other thing) (6), added theſe dreadful words (7). 'And therefore our requeſt is juſt, 'reaſonable, holy, and catholic, and grounded upon 'the expreſs command of GOD, who injoins you, Sire, 'to grant it us, repeating the ſaid command in ſeveral 'places, and at ſeveral times. He ſpeaks of the idolaters and Gentiles, ſtrangers to the law: Heretics 'among Chriſtians are accounted to be ſuch. Theſe 'are the words of the ſaid law of GOD; be ſure not 'to contract any friendſhip, confederacy, or marriage, 'with them; do not ſuffer them to inhabit the country; take no pity on them, beat them, deſtroy them 'to a man. And then follows the reaſon of that 'command, leſt they ſhould make thee ſin againſt me, 'if thou believeſt their opinions; which will be an 'offence and a ſcandal, that will raiſe my fury againſt 'thee, and ſoon after I ſhall deſtroy thee. Sire, and 'you Madam, avoid thoſe horrible and dreadful threatnings, for the ſalvation of your ſouls, and the preſervation of your ſceptre. This is, Sire, what your 'clergy of France propoſe, and repreſent to your majeſty in all ſimplicity, obedience, humility, and ſubmiſſion, concerning the honour and ſervice of GOD 'in your kingdom, and for the extirpation and abolition of what is contrary to it, namely, of ſects and 'hereſies. The whole matter is more fully and particularly diſcuſſed and handled in their memorial, 'to which we expect an anſwer.' Quintin's ſpeech is to be found entire in the Hiſtory of preſident la Place. It is plain, that the moſt humble and devout Orators of the clergy (8) were for ſhedding blood, if it was neceſſary, ſince they re-minded the king of Moſes's order and threatnings; beſides, Quintin had already ſaid in expreſs words, that his majeſty being ſtrong, and armed with the ſword, ought to oppoſe the Heretics, that in order to it, and for no other end, GOD had put the ſword into his hands, to protect the good, and puniſh the wicked; and that none can deny that a Heretic is capitally wicked, and conſequently ought to be puniſhed capitally, and be ſubject to the ſword of the magiſtrate (9).

(5) La Place, ubi ſupra, fol. 139, verſo.

(6) Ib. p. 140.

(7) Ib. p. 141.

(8) They are Quintin's words, ibid. fol. 139.

(9) Ibid. fol. 134, verſo.

The French clergy acted more artfully one hundred and twenty-five years after; for in a ſpeech they made to the king ſome months before the revocation of the edict of Nantes, they declared that they did not deſire his majeſty ſhould make uſe of his power for the extirpation of the Heretics. This artifice, after all, is no very deep one, and I do not know whether the too ingenuous plainneſs of the year 1560, ought not to be preferred to the diſſimulation of the year 1685. Read theſe words of Mr Claude. '(10) Whilſt the thing 'was only preparing, the true authors of the perſecution did not conceal themſelves, but uſed their 'endeavours to make the king appear in it. . . . . '(11). When things came to the laſt extremity, and 'to open force, they concealed themſelves as much as 'they could, and made the king appear alone. There 'was nothing to be heard then, but this ſort of diſcourſes, The king will have it ſo, the king is reſolved 'upon it, the king goes farther than the clergy deſire. 'By theſe two means they have been ſo cunning, as 'to aſcribe to themſelves the leaſt violent part of that 'perſecution, and to charge the king with the moſt 'odious part.'

(10) Plaintes des Proteſtans, p. 130.

(11) Ib. p. 131.

[D] Admiral Chatillon complained openly of Quintin's harangue.] He had been ſo plainly pointed at in ſome paſſages of that harangue, that every body caſt their eyes upon him: beſides, he had been deſcribed in a very offenſive manner; and it was plain enough, that there was a deſign to load him with infamy, and to undo him. Here is one of thoſe paſſages. '(12) In 'the firſt place, we beſeech you, Sire, that if any 'broacher of old hereſies now dead and buried, would 'impiouſly bring in and renew any ſect already condemned (as are in univerſum all thoſe of this deplorable and ſeditious time,) and in order to it petition for a church, and permiſſion of inhabiting this 'kingdom, (as ſome of your provinces have lately 'done, with great impudence, in their particular aſſemblies,) that ſuch a petitioner be accounted and 'declared a Heretic, as being a favourer of Heretics; 'and that he be proceeded againſt as ſuch, according 'to the rigour of the canonical and civil conſtitutions, 'ut auferatur malum de medio noſtri.' Here is another paſſage, '(13) Gainas, captain-general of the empe- 'ror Arcadius's forces, both foot and horſe, in the year '410, or 412, plotting againſt the crown of his king, 'and deſigning to dethrone him, found no better way 'to conceal his ill will, and to hide his treaſon, than 'to demand of him a church in the city of Conſtantinople, to pray, as he ſaid, and to ſing with his brethren, who were all Heretics, as are now-a-days thoſe 'petitioners for churches.'

(12) La Place, ubi ſupra, folio 135, verſo.

(13) Ibid. folio 136, verſo.

[E] Railleries and cenſures were diſperſed againſt his declamation.] The author of the commentaries De ſtatu Religionis & Reipublicæ in regno Galliæ, does not poſitively ſay, that thoſe railleries, and the paſquinades that were poſted up in ſeveral places againſt Quintin, occaſioned his death; he makes an alternative between that and the uneaſineſs of his conſcience (14). Preſident la Place and Varillas uſe no alternative, and the former has not omitted the reaſons that were alledged in Quintin's vindication. Theſe are his words: 'Some ſaid, that thoſe who blamed him upon that account, did not conſider that his leſſon was written 'down for him, which he read all along, without any 'geſtures or motions uſual to thoſe who make orations; and that the chief prelates, ſome cardinals, 'and others, were witneſſes and comptrollers of what 'he read. However he died a few days after, being 'vexed to ſee ſeveral pieces publiſhed againſt him (15).'

(14) Paſſim vero in eum dicteria jactari, libellos affigi: ille denique palam irriderі: tandemque ſeu contumeliarum illarum impatiens, ſeu malè geſtæ rei conſcientia in morbum delapſus, vitam cum morte commutavit. Folio 87.

(15) La Place, ubi ſupra, folio 151, verſo.

Now,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google affliction was so great, that he fell sick, and died of grief about the beginning of April, 1561. He was buried at Paris in the choir of the church of St John of Lateran [F]. I shall mention the books of his which we have [G]. Peter Ramus chose him to be one of the judges of his disputation against Govea in the year 1543. But Quintin, and the other judge (c) chosen by Ramus, would not concern themselves in that affair, when they were to give the sentence (d).

(c) A doctor of Physic, whose name was John de Beaumont.

(d) See John de Launoi, De varia Aristotelis fortuna, cap. xiii, pag. m. 52; and the remark [D], of the article RAMUS.

Now, let us hear Varillas. 'The zealous Calvinists, 'says he (16), were not so moderate; for they pub- 'lished such a bloody libel against Quintin, divided 'into three parts; the first of which contained the 'gross ignorances, the second the manifest calumnies, 'and the third the malicious omissions of that speech; 'that the doctor being more touchy than he should 'have been, took his bed after he had read that li- 'bel, and rose no more.' If Varillas had taken the trouble to read that libel, he would not have called it a bloody one: It is a piece, containing three pages, by way of remonstrance to the queen, which was not presented to her, and which came but into few hands. It is to be seen at length in Beza's History of the reformed churches (17), and it does not at all look like a libel or a satire, but rather like a writing belonging to a process, that is brought before the judges, according to the usual style and formalities. There is scarce any thing in it besides the heads of the complaints, and these words were added under the calumnies that were cited: We desire that these accusations should be proved against us, being ready to undergo punishment, upon condition that the accusers, for want of proof, shall be punished according to the heinousness of the crimes falsly imputed to us. It is very likely, that the mortal grief of that author proceeded from some other writings. Thuanus uses the plural number, and observes that Quintin was otherwise a good man, and had formerly been zealous for the Reformation of the church (18). There was no meddling then with the Protestants; they had too many good writers on their side. Here is a man, who lost his life for having prepostorously declaimed against them. He may be added to those whom I have mentioned in the article of HIPPONAX (19).

(16) Varillas, Charles IX, Tom. i, pag. 28, Dutch Edit.

(17) Tom. i, p. 437.

(18) Sane ob id mordacibus libellis ac dicteriis petitus tantum dolorem cepit, ut contracto inde morbo paulo post decesserit, homo alioqui minime malus, sed Decretalis Juris quam rerum agendarum peritia clarior, & qui serio de emendanda Ecclesia aliquando cogitaverat. Thuanus, lib. xxviii.

(19) Remark [F].

[F] He was buried at Paris in the choir of the church of St John of Lateran.] His epitaph is to be seen there in these words (20):

Quintinus Doctor, librorumque Helluo summus,
Dum nulla dapis alterius tentatur orexi,
Dumque fidem pro qua calamo pugnavit & ore
Fortiter, affligi videt, acrius & dolet, ex hoc
Orbe, invitis, non invitus, migrat amicis.
Obiit nona Aprilis 1561.

(20) Vide Doujat. Præn. Canonic. lib. v, cap. viii, pag. 620.

Quintin, whose eager appetite desir'd
Cart loads of books, nor other food requir'd,
Seeing the faith, for which he spoke and writ,
Oppress'd, in grief resolv'd the world to quit.
Willing he died; not so each weeping friend;
For all lament the learned Quintin's end.
He died the 9th of April 1561.

Observe, that whereas others ascribe his death to the grief he conceived for the abusive reflexions that were made upon him; the author of his epitaph ascribes it to his being sensibly affected with the affliction of the church. This is a subterfuge which bigots for a long time have used on all occasions.

[G] The books we have of him.] Melitæ Insulæ descriptio. Tractatus de ventis, & nautica buxula ventorum indice. Scholia in Tertulliani librum de præscriptionibus hæreticorum (21). Repetitæ Prælectiones Capituli de multa providentia, de præbendis & dignitatibus, & Cap. novit. de judiciis. The plurality of benefices, and the aristocracy of the Christian religion, are the subject of this last book. Octoginta quinque Regulæ seu Canones Apostolorum, cum vetustis Joannis Monachi Zonaræ scholiis Latine modo versis. Speculum Sacerdotii. Synodus Gangrensis explicata commentariolis ex Gratiani distinctione trigesima. Hæreticorum Catalogus & Historia ex Gratiano. He translated into Latin the Syntagma Canonum Græcorum, written by Matthew Blastares, a Monk. That translation was never printed, it is in the library of the king of France (22).

(21) Epit. Bibl. Gesneri.

(22) Doujat. ubi supra.

QUINTUS (CALABER) a Greek Poet, lived in the Vth century, if we may rely on the conjectures of some learned men [A]. He composed a large supplement to the Iliad, which contains the History of the Trojan war from Hector's death,

[A] He lived in the Vth century, if we may rely upon the conjectures of some learned men.] Rhodomannus (1) is in the right to say, that he did not live before the great conquests of the Roman people; for he brings in the sooth-sayer Calchas, foretelling that Æneas should reign in Italy, and that his posterity should extend their empire from the east to the west.

(1) Laurent. Rhodomanus, in Præfat. ad Cointum Smyrnæum.

---- Ἐκ τῆ δὲ γένηϖ μετόπισθεν ἀνάξειν,
Ἀχαιὸς ἐπ' ἀντολίην τε καὶ ἀκάμα]τον δύσιν ἔλθῃ.

---- Ejusque exinde progenies regnet,
Donec ad ortum & occasum insuperabilem imperii fines extendat (2).

(2) Cointus Smyrnæus, lib. xiii, ver. 340, pag. m. 650.

Besides he mentions (3) the exercises of the Circus, as they were used under the Roman emperors. One may therefore conclude, that he did not live before the first Cæsars: But this being too general to satisfy an inquisitive person, a more limited conjecture has been drawn from his style: Rhodomannus thinks, that the character of his muse is so like that of Tryphiodorus, Coluthus, &c. that it is very likely they lived at the same time. '(4) Character ipse carminis γεαμμα- 'τικώτερον elaboratus ostendit, eum Coluthi (qui ad 'quintum Christi nati seculum poëma lepidissimum de 'Helenes raptu conscripsit) aliorumque illa ætate vi- 'gentium, æqualem aut vicinum fuisse. Enimvero si 'dictionem Cointi, Coluthi, Tryphiodori, Musæi, '(illum dico, qui Leandri Herusque amores cecinit) '& Nonni, ad examen Criticum vocâris, simillimam '& ferè eandem sermonis ideam structuræque ratio- 'nem deprehendes: unde ætate quoque propinquos 'inter se fuisse ratiocineris. --- His elaborate verses 'shew, that he was either cotemporary with or lived 'near the time of Coluthus (who in the Vth century 'after Christ wrote a most witty poem on the rape of 'Helen) and other writers of that age. For if you 'critically examine the style of Cointus, Coluthus, Tryphiodorus, Musæus, (him I mean, who sung the loves 'of Leander and Hero) and Nonnus, you will find an 'exact resemblance between his and their manner of 'writing; from whence you may reasonably suppose they 'lived about the same time.' What Rhodomannus adds, that the name Cointus, of a Latin original, shews, that this Poet was made a Roman citizen, is but a weak confirmation of what he had said before; for, though this Greek Poet had lived before Cicero, he might have been honoured with the freedom of Rome. Reinesius (5) has good reason to laugh at those, who pretend that he lived under one of the emperors of the family Julia. They ground their opinion on the oracle of Calchas, and they pretend that Nero being the last of the family of the first Cæsar, that Poet must have lived at farthest under the empire of Nero. This is a wrong way of drawing consequences. At this very day our Poets might bring in Calchas, foretelling such a thing, though the Roman empire has been dismembred long since.

(3) Lib. vi.

(4) Rhodomanus, ibid. folio †† verso.

(5) Thom. Reinesius, Epist. LXVII, ad Rupert. pag. 593.

Cointus

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google death, 'till the deſtruction of Troy. Cardinal Beſſarion was the firſt who made that poem known [B]. He found it in the church of St Nicolas near Otranto in Calabria; and this is the reaſon why the author was called Quintus Calaber. Others being more exact, call him Quintus, or rather Cointus Smyrnæus; for they think he was of Smyrna. Thoſe, who ſay he taught youth there [C], ſeem to me to have no good grounds

Cointus needed not conſider the emperors, who pretended to be deſcended from Æneas: It was enough for him, that the city built by Romulus, who was deſcended from Æneas, did rule or had ruled from eaſt to weſt.

[B] Cardinal Beſſarion is the firſt who made that Poem known.] Here is a paſſage of Conſtantine Laſcaris. 'Poeſis autem Homericiſſimi Quinti jam multo 'tempore omnibus ignota fuit, & tanquam extincta: 'ſed propius Beſſarion Nicæas Cardinalis Tuſculani, 'ille ſane quam bonus & vere doctus, & ut Homericè 'dixerim, ſimilis Deo vir, aliaque plurima in nos, '& hanc ex Apulia cum ſervaſſet, volentibus tradi- (6) Conſtant. Laſcaris, in Grammatica, apud Lorenzo Criſſo, Iſtoria de' Poëti Greci, pag. 436. 'dit, quam & ipſe olim deſiderabam (6). - - - The 'Poem of Quintus Calaber, a writer very like Homer, 'lay a long time buried in obſcurity: but Cardinal Beſ- 'ſarion, that good, learned, and, to ſpeak like Homer, 'that godlike man having reſcued it from oblivion in 'Apulia, gave it to me who had long deſired to have it.' Very few authors had mentioned that Poem (7): And therefore we ought the leſs to be ſurprized that Quintus Curtius has not been mentioned for ſo many ages. The firſt edition of our Cointus is that of Aldus Manutius: It was full of faults (8).

(7) Hujus præter unum atque alterum è Græcis, & quidem recentioribus, nemo in ſcriptis ſuis mentionem facit. Rhodomanus, in Præfat.

(8) Geſner, in Bibl. folio 575.

[C] That he taught youth at Smyrna.] Here is Rhodomannus's argument. Since our Cointus ſays, that he fed the Muſes ſheep in the fine garden of Smyrna, it ought to be inferred from it, that he was maſter of a famous ſchool on that coaſt of Ionia. It was no mean ſchool; for he ſays that his ſcholars were illuſtrious: He was therefore one of thoſe Profeſſors of Philoſophy and Eloquence, who were called Sophiſts. This is the ſubſtance of Rhodomannus's argument. I ſhall give you his own words at length. 'Ex indicio 'iſto, quod de ſe ipſe facit, Muſarum oves in libe- 'rali Smyrnæ horto ſe paviſſe teſtatus, ſcholam in 'Ioniæ littore iſto nec infrequentem nec incelebrem 'habuiſſe Poëtam noſtrum, colligere eſt. Nec tri- 'viale magiſterium id fuiſſe apparet inde, quod oves 'ſuas, id eſt diſcipulos, nobiles ſeu fama illuſtres, '(περίκλυτα) epitheto ſatis emphatico, appellat, 'unde ſi divinare licet, id tandem elicimus, Cointum 'fuiſſe ex profeſſione illorum, quos Sophiſtas, id eſt 'philoſophiæ & eloquentiæ magiſtros, Grammaticos, 'qui Poëtarum interpretes erant, & juventutis ſchola- 'ſticæ doctores; florens adhuc Græcia indigitabat. 'Quid enim aliud per Muſarum hortum & oves, præ- 'ter quam ſcholam, & diſcipulos in ea doctrinæ & 'eloquentiæ ſtudiis addictos, intelligi exiſtimemus (9)? (9) Rhodomanus, ubi ſupra, folio †† 2, verſo. '- - - From the diſcovery he makes concerning himſelf, 'by ſaying that he fed the Muſes ſheep in the fruitful gar- 'den of Smyrna, we may gather that our Poet kept a 'numerous and famous ſchool on the coaſt of Ionia. And 'that it was not a petty kind of a ſchool is evident 'from the emphatical title of noble or illuſtrious, which 'he gives his ſheep, that is, his ſcholars: and there- 'fore, if I may be allowed to gueſs, I infer that Coin- 'tus was of the profeſſion of thoſe, who in the flouriſh- 'ing times of Greece were called Sophiſts, that is, the 'maſters of Philoſophy and Eloquence, or Grammarians, 'who did interpret the Poets and inſtruct the youth: For 'what elſe can we ſuppoſe to be meant by the garden 'and ſheep of the Muſes, but a ſchool and ſcholars train- 'ed up in the ſtudies of Philoſophy and Eloquence.' He had ſaid a little before: '(10) Cum tota ejus vita (10) Ib. p. 2. 'ignorantiæ tenebris involuta ſit, patria tamen ſola 'vindiciis inde aſſerta eſt. Nam libro XIV & hanc '& vitæ quodam modo genus exprimit; ubi ſe Mu- 'ſarum ovibus paſcendis Smyrnæ operam dediſſe pro- 'fitetur. - - - Though his whole life be unknown to us, 'yet his native country has been preſerved from oblivion. 'For in the XIVth book he expreſsly mentions it, and in 'ſome ſort the manner of life he led: he there declares 'that he imployed himſelf in feeding the Muſes ſheep at 'Smyrna.' Here follows a ſurprizing inſtance of a rambling imagination. I muſt firſt recite the Greek words of Cointus: They are not in the XIVth book, as Rhodomannus ſays, but in the XIIth; and they contain an invocation of the Muſes, occaſioned by the enumeration of thoſe, who were ſo courageous as to get into the wooden horſe.

Τίς μοι νῦν καθ' ἕκαστον ἀνηρεμένῳ σάφα μῦσαι
Ἕσπεθ', ὅσοι κατέβησαν ἔσω πολυχανδὲς ἵππου
Τμεῖς γὰρ πᾶσαν μοι ἐνὶ φρεσὶ θῆκατ' ἀοιδὴν,
Πρίν μοι ἀμφὶ παρειᾷ κατασκίδνασθαι ἴουλον,
Σμύρνης ἐν δαπέδοισι πεπειλυτὰ μῆλα νέμοντι.

Quos mihi nunc ſingulatim exquirenti, Muſæ perſpicuè
Recenſete, quotquot in multicapacem equum conſcenderunt.
Nam vos omnigenum animo meo carmen indidiſtis,
Antequam mihi circa genas lanugo ſpargeretur,
In campis Smyrnæ inclytas oves paſcenti (11).

(11) Cointus Smyrnæus, lib. xii, ver. 302, pag. 610.

Relate my muſe (to thee the truth's reveal'd)
How many Greeks the wooden horſe conceal'd.
Thou taught'ſt me verſe, e're the firſt down began
To cloath my youthful chin, and promiſe man,
When all my ſkill extended but to keep,
In Smyrna's fertile plains a flock of ſheep.

It is plain, the author tells the Muſes that they made him a Poet, when, being as yet beardleſs, he kept ſheep in the fields of Smyrna. How can this ſignify, that he taught the youth, that he had a famous ſchool, and illuſtrious ſcholars? How could a boy, who had as yet no beard, exerciſe ſuch a profeſſion? How could Rhodomannus be ſo heedleſs, though he ſpent many years upon that Poem, though he tranſlated it into Latin, and made an abridgment of it in Greek and Latin verſe? Where did he find that Cointus boaſts of having fed the Muſes ſheep (12)? Now let us ſee the lazineſs of another learned man. 'Nunc (12) Se Muſarum ovibus paſcendis Smyrnæ operam dediſſe profitetur. Rhodom. ubi ſupra. 'veriſimilius Smyrnæum nuncupant: quia ipſe lib. 'XIV. dicat, ſe περικλυτοῖς five illuſtribus Muſarum 'ovibus Smyrnæ paſcendis operam dediſſe: ex quo ſi 'de patria haud certo colligitur, ſaltem videmus 'ſcholam non infrequentem præſtantium diſcipulorum 'habuiſſe Smyrnæ (13). - - - Now he is ſaid to be of 'Smyrna, which is more probable; becauſe in the XIVth 'book he himſelf ſays that he had been employed in feed- 'ing the noble or illuſtrious ſheep of the Muſes at Smyr- 'na; from whence, if we cannot certainly determine 'which was his native country, at leaſt we ſee that he 'had a large ſchool of eminent ſcholars at Smyrna.' (13) Voſſius, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 81. Voſſius, without taking the pains to conſult Cointus, tranſcribed what he found in Rhodomannus's preface: He took from it the falſe quotation of the XIVth book, and the falſe gloſs of the Muſes ſheep, with the whole conſequence which that tranſlator drew from it. He, and other learned men, have done the like a thouſand times. I wonder that Reineſius ſhould approve ſuch an explication of thoſe verſes of Cointus: He will have it alſo, that it appears from them that this Poet was a ſchool-maſter at Smyrna. 'Convenit autem, ſays he (14), ut quod maximè, (14) Thom. Reineſius, ubi ſupra. 'Grammatico, qualis fuit Corintus, ludimagiſtri of- 'ficio fungi & docere pueros, quod noſter de ſe pro- 'fitetur l. II (15), verſibus dulciſſimis: neque falſi 'ſunt viri docti imprimis Parrhaſius, & diligentiſſimus (15) It ſhould be l. xii. 'ejus recenſitor ac interpres Laur. Rhodomannus, qui 'eos de inſtitutione ſcholaſtica apud Smyrnenſes inter- 'pretati ſunt. - - - But it agrees very well with the 'character of a Grammarian, as Corintus was, to do 'the office of a ſchool-maſter, and to teach youth, which 'our Poet declares concerning himſelf l. II, in very fine 'verſes: and learned men, eſpecially Parrhaſius, and his 'moſt accurate reviſer and interpreter Laur. Rhodoman- 'nus, are not miſtaken in explaining them to relate to 'his teaching a ſchool at Smyrna.' What he ſays in the next words is better grounded: He rejects the opinion of thoſe, who pretend that Cointus deſigned only, by thoſe verſes, to boaſt of his following Homer. 'Dubitoque igitur quenquam ita ſimplicem eſſe, qui 'Smyrnæ oves paſcere idem eſſe ac Homerum ſequi, quem 'bona pars Smyrnæum cenſuit, credere velit, aut ita 'perſpicacem qui duo iſta eadem eſſe videre poſſit. 'Mihi quidem tam beato eſſe nondum contigit, & 'habeo

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google grounds for it. The learned Reineſius pretends he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from a Grammarian called Corintus [D], of whom there is a book concerning the dialects. The beſt edition of Quintus Calaber's Poem is that of Rhodomannus [E]. Some Critics admire Cointus; others ſpeak of him with great contempt. See the Paſſages quoted by Lorenzo Craſſo (a), and Mr Baillet's Jugemens des Savans (b). One Udenus Niſielus praiſes him for ſome things, and blames him for ſome others. See his Progymnaſmata; it is an Italian book.

(a) Lor. Craſſo, Iſtoria de' Poëti Greci, p. 436, & ſeq.

(b) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, Tom. ii, num. 1195.

' habeo pro violenta & à ſenſu Poëtæ alieniſſima eam ' expoſitionem (16). - - - And therefore I queſtion whe- ' ther any can be ſo ſimple as to believe, that feeding ' ſheep at Smyrna is the ſame thing as following Ho- ' mer, or ſo quick ſighted as to be able to ſee thoſe ' two things to be the ſame. As for my part I have ' not been hitherto ſo fortunate, and I look upon that in- ' terpretation to be forced, and contrary to the meaning ' of the Poet.' As for me, I believe the whole myſtery lies in an imitation of Heſiod. Read theſe words of Tanaquillus Faber. Heſiod became a Poet, as he was feeding his ſheep: I hope you will believe him; for he ſays ſo himſelf: And thoſe, who ſaid it after him, ſaid it only upon the credit of that Poet, or upon the authority of the ſhepherds of Bœotia, to whom that adventure appeared ſo wonderful, that they made a ſong upon it, which is loſt (17). Our Cointus, if I am not miſtaken, meant that the Muſes had done him the ſame favour, as they had done to Heſiod (18). For the reſt, I ſhall obſerve, that Volaterran, and ſome others, make him a Roman, without any ſhew of reaſon; and that Geſner (19) was in the wrong to fancy that Volaterran does not ſpeak of the ſame Poet, whoſe XIV books derelictorum ab Homero were publiſhed by Aldus. This fault has not been mended by thoſe, who abridged Geſner's Bibliotheque: Like him, they made two articles of Quintus Poëta Romanus, mentioned by Volaterran, and of Quintus Calaber, printed by Aldus.

(16) Reineſius, ubi ſupra.

(17) Le Fevre, Vie des Poëtes Grecs, p. m. 10.

(18) Conſer quæ ſupra, in the article ÆSCHYLUS, remark [C].

(19) In Biblioth. fol. 575, where he recites Volaterran's words.

[D] Reineſius pretends he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from a Grammarian called Corintus.] Theſe are Reineſius's words: ' Fuit Corintus Grammaticus, cu- ' jus libellum de dialectis ad Studioſum quendam juve- ' nem ſcriptum habemus editum cum appendice H. ' Stephani, eumque citat Joh. Petrus Nunneſ. not. ad ' Phrynichum Sylburg. ſpicil. ad Herod. Betuleius not. ' ad Lact. l. 1. c. 6. Joh. Talenton. l. 2. rer. recon- ' dit. cap. 19. è cujus vero nomine Κόϊντος amiſſa ' una literula vel præterviſa à primo deſcriptore exiit ' Κοΐντος (20). - - - Corintus was a Grammarian, ' whoſe book concerning the Dialects written to a certain ' ſtudious youth, we find publiſhed with an appendix of ' Henry Stephens, and is cited by Nunneſius Sylburgius. ' Betuleius and Talentonus, whoſe true name Corintus ' was changed into Cointus, through overſight or the ' omiſſion of one letter by the firſt tranſcriber.' It muſt be confeſſed, that the word Κόϊντος might eaſily have been changed into Κόϊντος; and that a Grammatical genius does very much appear in this author's Poem (21). Reineſius does fully prove it. He obſerves, that the Grammarian Corintus lived after John Philoponus, in the VIth or VIIth century; and that he cannot be later, ſince he is quoted by Tzetzes. I am amazed at this; for there is a vaſt ſpace of time between the VIIth century, and that wherein Tzetzes lived (22). ' Fuit autem poſt Johannem Gramm. ' Alexandrinum, d. Philoponum, teſte ipſo in proœm. ' l. de dial. inter mediæ ætatis Græcos ſeculo ſexto ' ſeptimove, quibus Græcia etſi à politia degeneraſſet ' plurimùm, viros tamen doctos & memorandos ali- ' quos aluit. . . . . Pauci ſunt, quos nominare poſſu- ' mus iſtorum temporum: Johannes Stobæus, Georgius ' Piſides, Theophyl. Simocates, Thomas & Coprogenius ' magiſtri, Euphronius, Moſchopulus, Chœroboſcus, De- ' metrius Triclinius, Georg. Syncellus, Euſtathius, & ' extremo octavi Photius, & qui ex ejus doctiſſimis ' epiſtolis noti ſunt: prioribus inter memoratos etiam ' adcenſeri debet Corintus iſte. Fuiſſe in æſtimio & ' non inferiorem tempore quàm determinavi inde ap- ' paret, quod laudantur à γραμματικωτάτῳ Tzetze ' in Chiliad. & comm. ad Lycophr. ubi de Machaone (23). ' - - - But he lived after John Philoponus, a Gramma- ' rian of Alexandria, as he himſelf teſtifies in the pre- ' face to his book concerning the Dialects, in the VIth or ' VIIth century amongſt the Greeks of the middle age, at ' which time though Greece was very much degenerated ' in politeneſs, yet it produced ſeveral learned and fa- ' mous men. . . . . A few whom we may reckon of thoſe ' times are, Johannes Stobæus, Georgius Piſides, Theophyl. Simocates, Thomas and Coprogenius, Euphronius, Moſchopulus, Chœroboſcus, Demetrius Triclinius, Georgius Syncellus, Euſtathius, and at the ' latter end of the VIIIth century Photius, and thoſe who ' are known by his learned epiſtles: amongſt the firſt, ' Corintus ought likewiſe to be numbered. That he was ' in eſteem and not later than the time I have mention- ' ed, appears from his being commended by that learned ' Grammarian Tzetzes in Chiliad. and on Lycophron, ' where he ſpeaks of Machaon.'

(20) Reineſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 591.

(21) Non autem niſi Τρίβωνα quendam Grammaticum & conſummatæ peritiæ literatorem iſta Paraleipomena ſcripſiſſe patet inprimis ex accurata & curioſa valde locorum deſcriptione, quæ diligentius multo enarrat, quam aliquis de vulgo Poëta faceret, ut cum, &c. Reineſius, ibid.

(22) Tzetzes lived at the end of the XIIth century. See Nicolas Gerbelius's Preface upon Tzetzes.

(23) Reineſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 592.

[E] The beſt edition . . . . is that of Rhodomannus.] I have not that of Hanaw 1604, mentioned in the catalogue of the Bodleian library; but I have that of 1614, ex Officina Aubriana. It contains the whole performance of Rhodomannus upon that author, and Claudius Dauſquejus's notes in Quintum Calabrum, Tryphiodorum & Coluthum. One Jodocus Valaræus made a tranſlation of Cointus in proſe, which was printed at Lyons in 1541 (§ a). Bernardin Baldus made another.

[(§ a) There is an edition before that in 12mo at Antwerp, apud Johannem Steelſum 1539. The title ſays, editio prima, and the epiſtle dedicatory is dated the XIth of the Kalends of Auguſt the ſame year. REM. CRIT.]

QUIQUERAN (a) (PETER DE) biſhop of Senez in the XVIth century, was the ſon of Antony de Quiqueran Lord and Baron of Beaujeu (b) in Provence. He ſtudied Rhetoric and Poetry at Paris under James Lewis Strebe, after which he went into Italy where he eagerly followed the ſtudy of Muſic. Being returned to Paris he applied himſelf to the Mathematics, and wrote a book in Latin on the praiſes of Provence his native country. He died at Paris whilſt it was in the preſs, the eighteenth of Auguſt 1550, at twenty-four years of age. His mother and ſiſter got the impreſſion of this work finiſhed (c). It is a ſmall volume in folio conſiſting of eighty-nine leaves, printed at Paris by Lambert Dodu in the year 1551. There are added to it an hundred Latin Hexameter verſes which Quiqueran had written on the arrival of Hannibal at Arles. There is a great deal of curious learning in the work of this writer who would certainly have become one of the moſt learned perſons of his age if he had enjoyed a long life. He deſerved the fine elogies beſtowed on him in the epitaphs which you will ſee below [A]. Any one who conſiders that he was not yet arrived at (a) Almoſt all thoſe who quote him miſcal him Quinqueran, or Quinqueranus.

(b) This is the reaſon why he ſirnames himſelf Bellojocanus.

(c) Taken from the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the book de Laudibus Provinciæ, written by Amandus Cabaſſius.

[A] The epitaphs which you will ſee below.] I take them from the antiquities of Paris collected by Corrozet. In another chapel of the church of the Auguſtins at Paris, in the nave, is the effigies of a biſhop on his knees, raiſed on high, and underneath two epitaphs, between which on the ſide, is the image of Fame, in demi-relief, ſitting on a globe, leaning on a lute: ſhe holds in one hand a trumpet, and under her feet lie ſome

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google at the age of performing the episcopal functions, will not be surprised that the particular account which he gives of some of his diversions make him appear very far from practising the true duties of a bishop [B]. The great abuse of giving bishoprics to children prevailed at that time.

some books, about her is a sphere, a pair of compasses, and other instruments of the liberal arts. The first epitaph is written in letters of gold.

Epitaphium domini Petri Quiquerani Episcopi Senecensis.

Dum Juvenilis honos, prima lanugine malas
Vestit, & in calido pectore fervet amor,
Me rapuit, quæ cuncta rapit, mors invida doctis:
Hei mihi, cur vitæ tam brevis hora fuit?
Cur brevis hora fuit? rerum sic volvitur ordo,
Alternatque suas tempus & hora vices.
Si fera longævæ tribuissent fata senectæ
Tempora, venturis poma dedisset ager.
Flos periit, periere simul cum cortice fructus,
Aridaque ante suos poma fuere dies.
Nemo tamen lachrymis nec tristia funera fletu
Fœdet, cur? volito docta per ora virum.

Why was I snatch'd so soon, and why my date
Of life so short? Such are the laws of fate.
If to old age Heav'n had prolong'd my years,
A fruitful crop had bless'd my studious cares.
But, since the flow'r is cropp'd before its time,
The fruit's decay'd and wither'd in its prime.
Let none lament with tears my death, or blame
My loss: I live in an immortal name.

The other epitaph.

'Hic jacet nobilis vir reverendus in Christo pater 'dominus Petrus Quiqueranus Episcopus Senecensis 'filius domini Anthonii Quiquerani equitis & Baronis 'Bellojocani illustrissimi in Provincia: cujus libri tres 'de Laudibus Provinciæ extant disciplinarum ac re-'rum cognitione efflorescentes, obiit anno domini '1550 Kalen. Septembris 15 annos natus 24 (1). - - - 'Here lies the reverend Father in Christ Peter Qui-'queran, bishop of Senez, son of Antony Quiqueran, 'knight and baron of Beaujeu in Provence: who left 'behind him three books on the praises of Provence full 'of learning and knowledge: he died in the year 1550 'the 18*th of August in the twenty-fourth year of his* 'age.' Peter de St Romuald (2) was very much in the wrong to quote the first of these epitaphs as a piece in which it is said that Quiqueran . . . . was a great Orator, a great Poet, and a great Divine. Every one sees that the epitaph does not say this. This author observes that he died, as it is thought, before he was consecrated.

[B] The particular account he gives of some of his diversions make him appear far from practising the true duties of a bishop.] The ornaments of his epitaph are infinitely better suited to a man passionately fond of the polite arts than to a bishop; but if you read the book de Laudibus Provinciæ, you can no longer doubt that our bishop of Senez employed himself in quite another thing than the government of his diocese. He did not study the diseases of the soul and the methods of curing them. His curiosity led him to inquire into the properties of plants, minerals, and animals. He fed a great number of beasts, he was a great hunter, he was extremely fond of cock-fighting. Camerarius often quotes him (3); but it is only in relation to such things. He particularly quotes the passage in which the author confesses that his occupations were condemned. 'Johannes Pierius Valerianus '* relates that the boldest cocks are found in the 'island of Rhodes, and says he had seen a proof of 'it in some of them, brought from thence to Rome, 'which were of an extraordinary size and wonder-'fully fierce. Peter Quinqueran confirms this, say-'ing †, I had a young cock presented to me, brought 'from Rhodes, which I purchased at a very dear rate. 'Though it was not more than six months old, it 'was so courageous and ready to fight, that a dog 'could not come into my court-yard, without be-'ing briskly pecked at: as to other common cocks 'that came near it, it killed them all. I often made 'it fight, to my great diversion, with a large Turkey-'cock that I had, as weighty as a fat sheep. The 'Turkey-cocks are extremely choleric, and raise 'themselves up fiercely, witness the swelling of their 'neck, and their cry: though otherwise their voice 'is whining and ridiculous. As to my game-cock of 'Rhodes, after a great number of battles, he fell 'sick, and, notwithstanding all the remedies applied 'to cure him, died: of which the History of pre-'ceeding battles, as well as those of others, gave me 'sufficient warning. But reading the pastime taken 'in such exercises by the Delians, Athenians, Greeks, 'Asiatics, even Roman emperors, and the inhabi-'tants of Italy where they wagered all they were 'worth that such or such a cock would be victorious 'in the battle, I was desirous to taste something of 'this pleasure. Neither the judgment of the ancients 'nor my own inclination deceived me, and I have 'often contemplated such battles without being dis-'pleased, from whence certain enemies, whom I had 'formerly disgusted, not knowing on which side to 'attack me, took occasion, as often as they could, 'to say that I spent my whole time in cock-fighting. 'They carried the matter so far, that one day, men, 'women, children, and old men, came in crouds to 'my episcopal house, and then gave out that I was 'too much addicted to such pastime. Do you ask 'whether I despised, or laughed at their folly? Truly 'I cannot say. Perhaps I should have acquiesced in 'their judgment, if I had not known that they are 'persons who have no judgment (4).

Note that in the Latin of Quiqueran it is not said that they came in crouds to his episcopal house: These are his words, Tandem viri, fœminæ, juvenesque, se-nesque certatim exiliunt, proclamant, in libellis proscribunt me studiosorem gallinaceæ pugnæ (5). Camerarius has corrected some errors of the press which were in the original; but his Printers have committed others more considerable (6). Simon Goulart has not always well translated it. You will easily judge of it if you compare with his translation these words of Quiqueran: mox paulo nequicquam tentatis omnifariis remediis periit, ejus solatii ex Gallorum pugnis, hystoria me admonuerat. Quippe eas cùm legerem quàm frequenter celebrassent Delii, quàm Athenienses . . . . decrevi ego quoque ejus voluptatis particeps fieri. Goulart supposes that the author intended to say, that the History of the foregoing battles of cocks, and those of others, had sufficiently warned him that his Rhodian cock would fall sick, and could not be cured by any remedy, but that nevertheless the reading of the diversions which the ancients took in these battles, had given him a desire to take the same pleasure. This sense is wrong and absurd. Quiqueran only says that History had informed him of the pleasure that might be taken in cock-fighting.

Custom might in some measure excuse our prelate for diverting himself in hunting, for it was an exercise which several bishops gave themselves at that time, not remembering that the Canons forbid it. See the extravagant de Clerico venatore. One of the Monks, who wrote against the bishop of Bellei, insinuates that the bishop had been at a great expence in hawks and hounds (7). He wrote about the year 1644.

(1) Antiquitez de Paris, par Gilles Corrozet, folio 89, Edit. of Paris 1586, in 8vo.

(2) In his Chronological Journal, Tom. ii, pag. 183, under the 17th of August. He should have placed the death of Quiqueran on the 18th, and not on the 17th.

(3) In the second volume of his Historical Meditations. See there the pages marked in the Index of the authors cited under the word Peter Quinqueran, in Simon Goulart's French translation.

* In his Hieroglph.

† In the second book de Laudibus Provinciæ.

(4) Camerarius, Historical Meditations, Tom. ii, book v, ch. ix, pag. m. 365.

(5) Quiqueranus, de Laudibus Provinciæ, lib. ii, fol. 39.

(6) In the edition of Francfort 1638.

(7) See the Antibasilik of Mr Camus, bishop of Bellei, pag. 550, 551.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

QUIRINUS (PUBLIUS SULPICIUS), conſul in the year of Rome 742 (a), was born at Lanuvium, and was not of the Patrician family Sulpicia (b). The ſervices he did Auguſtus with great zeal and application, eſpecially in the war, were the only cauſe of his advancement. After his conſulſhip he had the command of an army in Cilicia (c), in order to ſubdue a nation (d), which was accounted the moſt unconquerable of that country (e). He overcame them by famine (f), for which he had the honour of a triumph (g). Some place this in the time wherein our Saviour was born, and believe, that though there was then another governor in Syria, yet Auguſtus, in conſideration of the glory which Quirinus had acquired, gave him a ſpecial commiſſion for the taxation mentioned by St Luke (h), for no body doubts but, that he who is called Cyrenius in the Scripture (i), is the ſame with our Quirinus. The eſteem Auguſtus had for him, did eminently appear when he made him governor to Caius Cæſar, his grandſon, after the death of Lollius, who had been in that poſt. We have ſeen in another place (k) what difference Tiberius made between thoſe two governors of Caius Cæſar. Quirinus's marriage with Æmilia Lepida, is a very good proof of the conſideration he was in; for ſhe was at firſt deſigned for Lucius Cæſar, Auguſtus's grandſon (l). She was unfortunate in her marriage with Quirinus; he divorced her, and ſome years after he accuſed her of ſeveral crimes [A] for which ſhe was condemned to baniſhment. This proceeding of Quirinus appeared ſo ſtrange, that people begun to pity Lepida, though ſhe was infamous and guilty [B]. The victory he obtained over her was publickly abhorred, and they did not fail, on that occaſion, to compare his mean birth with the noble extraction of that lady. He had alſo rendered himſelf odious by his ſordid way of ſpending his old age in the midſt of a plentiful eſtate. He died in the year of Rome 774; and, at Tiberius's deſire, they made him a public funeral (m). If any one deſires to know whether he ought to be called Quirinus, or Quirinius (n), he needs

(a) Dio, lib. lvi, p. m. 619.

(b) Tacit. Ann. lib. iii, cap. xlviii.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Called Homonadenſes.

(e) Strabo, lib. xii, pag. 392.

(f) Ibid.

(g) Tacit. ubi ſupra.

(h) In the ſecond chapter.

(i) Ib. ver. 2.

(k) In the remark [B], of the article LOLLIUS.

(l) Tacit. Annal. lib. iii, cap. xxiii.

(m) Ex eod. Tacito, ibid. & cap. xlviii.

(n) He is ſo called in moſt editions of Tacitus.

[A] He divorced his wife, and ſome years after he accuſed her of ſeveral crimes.] He accuſed her of having falſly pretended that ſhe had had a child by him. There might be ſtrong motives to ſuch a pretence; for he was very rich, and had no children. The other accuſations were about adultery, poiſoning, and conſulting the Diviners concerning the Imperial family. ‘ At Romæ Lepida, cui ſuper Æmiliorum decus ‘ L. Sulla ac Cn. Pompeius proavi erant, defertur ‘ ſimulaviſſe partum ex P. Quirino divite, atque orbo. ‘ adjiciebantur adulteria, venena, quæſitumque per ‘ Chaldæos in domum Cæſaris, defendente ream Manio ‘ Lepido fratre. Quirinus poſt dictum repudium adhuc infenſus, quamvis infami ac nocenti miſerationem addiderat (1). - - - - But Lepida, who beſides ‘ the honour of being deſcended of the Æmilian family ‘ was great grand-daughter to L. Sulla and Cn. Pompeius, was accuſed at Rome of having falſely pretended ‘ to have a child by P. Quirinus, who was rich and ‘ had no children. She was moreover arraigned for ‘ adultery, poiſoning, and conſulting Diviners concerning the family of Cæſar, her brother Manius Lepidus being counſel for her. Quirinus, continuing ſtill ‘ to proſecute her after he had divorced her, excited the ‘ compaſſion of the people towards her, though ſhe was ‘ infamous and guilty,’ It appears from the beginning of this paſſage, that Æmilia Lepida was great-granddaughter of Sylla and Pompey. She was not the better for it. I wonder that Suetonius, who wrote after Tacitus, ſhould reduce the accuſation to one ſingle head: He only ſays, that Lepida was accuſed of attempting to poiſon her huſband. ‘ Condemnatam & ‘ generoſiſſimam fœminam Lepidam, in gratiam Quirini conſularis prædivitis, & orbi, qui dimiſſam eam ‘ è matrimonio poſt vigeſimum annum veneni olim ‘ in ſe comparati arguebat (2). - - - The moſt noble ‘ lady Lepida was alſo condemned upon the account of ‘ Quirinus, a man of conſular dignity, very rich and ‘ without children, who twenty years after he had di- ‘ vorced her, accuſed her of having formerly attempted ‘ to poiſon him.’ This omiſſion of Suetonius is attended with another fault; for he ſays, that ſhe was condemned twenty years after ſhe had been divorced. He is not exact in his Chronology. I prove it thus: That lady was condemned in the year 773. There had been a deſign to marry her to Lucius Cæſar, Auguſtus's grand-ſon, and therefore it muſt be ſaid, that ſhe did not marry Quirinus till after the death of that young prince. But he died in the year 755, according to the calculation of archbiſhop Uſher and Father Noris (3); or in the year 756, according to Petavius; or in the year 757, according to Valeſius (4). It is not likely that Quirinus ſhould have divorced her before he had lived a year with her; and therefore it is not true, that in 773 ſhe had been divorced twenty years. The commentators on Suetonius take no notice of this difficulty, though it deſerved to be cleared. Father Noris (5) had reaſon to find fault with archbiſhop Uſher for ſaying, on the one hand, that Lucius Cæſar died in the year 755; and on the other, that Lepida was married to Quirinus in the year 753. Theſe two things are inconſiſtent, ſince it is undeniable that Quirinus married after the death of Lucius Cæſar: Will any body ſay, that there was a deſign to marry a woman to the emperor's grand-ſon, who had been left, or put away by Quirinus? The learned Uſher fell into this miſtake, becauſe he truſted Suetonius, that is, becauſe he thought Suetonius had exactly computed the years between Lepida's divorce, and her trial. He ſhould not have had ſo good an opinion of him. I muſt not forget, that Tiberius, after the condemnation of that woman, declared at laſt that he was certainly informed by Quirinus's ſervants, that ſhe had endeavoured to poiſon her huſband. ‘ Dein ‘ tormentis ſervorum patefacta ſunt flagitia, itumque ‘ in ſententiam Rubellii Blandi, à quo aqua atque ‘ igni arcebatur: huic Druſus adſenſit, quamquam alii ‘ mitius cenſuiſſent, mox Scauro qui filiam ex ea genuerat, datum, ne bona publicarentur. Tum demum aperuit Tiberius, compertum ſibi etiam ex P. ‘ Quirini ſervis, venено eum à Lepida petitum (6). - - - ‘ Afterwards the ſervants being put to the torture diſ- ‘ covered her crimes, and the opinion of Rubellius Blan- ‘ dus, by which ſhe was baniſhed, was agreed to: ‘ Druſus aſſented to it, though others had voted more ‘ favourably; and ſoon after Scaurus, who had had a ‘ daughter by her, obtained that her eſtate ſhould not be ‘ confiſcated. At laſt Tiberius declared that he had ‘ been certainly informed by P. Quirinus's ſervants, ‘ that Lepida had endeavoured to poiſon him.’ We ſhall preſently ſee, that in all likelihood Lepida was juſtly condemned.

(1) Tacit. Annal. lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(2) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. xlix.

(3) See Father Noris's Cenotaphia Piſana, p. 258, & 260.

(4) In Notis ad Excerpta Dionis, pag. 90. See Noris, ibid. p. 259.

(5) Noris, ibid. pag. 258.

(6) Tacit. Ann. lib. iii, cap. xxiii.

[B] People began to pity Lepida, though ſhe was infamous and guilty.] If it cannot be ſaid, that Tacitus reflected too much upon Tiberius, much leſs can it be affirmed, that he was willing to ſpare him. Seeing therefore he acknowledges, that Lepida was guilty, and had loſt her reputation (7), we may very well believe that the thing was notorious. He does not deny, that Tiberius made ſome ſteps during that trial, whereby it appeared, that he was deſirous that Lepida ſhould be puniſhed; but he owns, that one might ſuſpect from ſome other ſteps, that he had a mind ſhe ſhould go unpuniſhed. ‘ Haud facile quis diſpexerit ‘ illa in cognitione mentem Principis, adeo vertit ac ‘ miſcuit iræ & clementiæ ſigna (8). - - - It was not ‘ eaſy

(7) Quirini infami ac nocenti. Ib. cap. xxii.

(8) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google needs only read Ryckius's Notes on Tacitus's Annals, pag. 37. Joſephus calls him Κυρήνιος, Cyrenius, and ſays, that he was a man, who had gone thro' all employments, and one of the moſt illuſtrious of thoſe times (o).

(o) Joſeph. Antiquitat. Judaicar. lib. xviii, cap. i, pag. 616.

'eaſy to find out the intention of the emperor in that 'tryal, he ſo mixed and blended the marks of his anger 'and clemency.' The worſt that can be ſaid is, That Tiberius promoted under hand the verification of the crimes of which Lepida was accuſed. This cannot be called an oppreſſion of innocence, an injuſtice, a tyranny, &c. Let us conclude, that the lady deſerved the puniſhment ſhe ſuffered. Nevertheleſs the people expreſſed their indignation againſt the authors of the trial, and openly complained, with horrid imprecations, that ſo illuſtrious a lady was ſacrificed to Quirinus. She had moved the people with the complaints ſhe made during the celebration of the public games; and beſides, Quirinus had rendered himſelf odious. This was the great point; for they who draw upon themſelves the hatred of the people, prompt them to favour and cheriſh the perſons whom they attack, though they have no merit, and even though they be very guilty. 'Quirinus quam-
(9) Ibid. 'vis infami ac nocenti miſerationem addiderat (9).
'.... Lepida ludorum diebus, qui cognitionem in-
'tervenerant, theatrum cum claris feminis ingreſſa,
'lamentatione flebili majores ſuos ciens, ipſumque Pom-
'peium, cujus ea monumenta, & adſtantes imagines
'viſebantur, tantum miſericordiæ permovit, ut effuſi
'in lacrymas, ſæva & deteſtanda Quirino clamarent,
'cujus ſenectæ atque orbitati, & obſcuriſſimæ domui,
'deſtinata quondam uxor L. Cæſari, ac divo Auguſto
'nurus, dederetur (10). - - - Quirinus had excited pity
'towards her, though ſhe was infamous and guilty. ....
'At the celebration of the public games, which happened
'during the trial; ſhe entered the theatre with ſome
'ladies of quality, and with tears and lamentations in-
'voking her anceſtors, and particularly Pompey, whoſe
'monuments and images were then preſent and ſeen by the 'people, ſhe ſo moved their compaſſion, that, ſhedding a
'flood of tears, they imprecated horrid curſes upon Qui-
'rinus, to whom being old, childleſs, and of a very 'obſcure family, ſhe was ſacrificed, though ſhe had 'been formerly deſigned for the wife of L. Cæſar,
'and for the daughter-in-law of the divine Auguſtus.'
The puniſhment inflicted upon Lepida did but increaſe the hatred of the people againſt Quirinus (11). Compare this with what is ſaid above (12).

(10) Ibid. cap. xxiii.

(11) Sed ceteris haud læta memoria Quirini erat, ob intenta, ut memoravi, Lepidæ pericula ſordidamque & præpotentem ſenectam. Ibid. cap. xlviii.

(12) The article MARILLAC (LEWIS DE), remark [A], citation (1).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

R.

RACAN (HONORAT DE BEUIL, MARQUIS DE) the ſon of a knight of the orders of St Michael and the Holy Ghoſt; was born at la Roche Racan in Touraine (a) in the year 1589 (b). He was page to the king in the year 1605 (c), and as he began then to make verſes, he got acquainted with Malherbe, of whom he learned whatever he knew of the French poetry. . . . . This acquaintance and friendſhip with Malherbe laſted till he died, which happened in 1628 (d). He was admitted into the French Academy, when it was founded, in which he cauſed a diſcourſe againſt the ſciences to be read the ninth of July 1635 (e). If he had been at Paris, he would have ſpoken it himſelf; but he was then in his province. He publiſhed that diſcourſe with ſome of his poems (f). He died in the year 1670, and was ſucceeded in the Academy by Mr de la Chambre, rector of St Bartholomew. He happened one day to make a Quatrain exactly like that of a Poet whom he thought he had never read [A]. I ſhall ſay in another place (g), that he was very fond of the favours of the ladies.

(a) Pelliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Académie Franç. pag. m. 344.

(b) I ſhall ſay in the remark that he was nineteen years of age in the year 1608.

(c) Vie de Malherbe, pag. 5.

(d) Ib. p. 6.

(e) Pelliſſon, uti ſupra, pag. 102, 103.

(f) Ibid.

(g) In the remark [F], of the article TIRESIAS.

[A] He made a Quatrain exactly like that of a Poet, whom he thought he had never read.] Mr Menage tells us a great many particulars, which deſerve to be ſet down in this place. ‘ (1) I have often heard Mr Chapelain ſay, that he and Mr d'Andilli had made that ſame verſe (2), without knowing that it was Malherbe's. And whilſt I am writing this remark, I underſtand by Mr Furetiere, that the ſame thing has happened to him. I have often heard likewiſe Mr Corneille ſay, that he had made, in his Polyeucte, thoſe two famous verſes concerning Fortune,

Et comme elle a l'éclat du verre,
Elle en a la fragilité;

That is,

Fortune, reſembling glaſs in ev'ry tittle,
Like glaſs is ſhining, and like glaſs is brittle.

‘ without knowing that they were Mr Godeau's; for they were made firſt of all by Mr Godeau, biſhop of Vence, in his ode to cardinal Richelieu, fifteen years before Mr Corneille made them in his Polyeucte. It is no uncommon thing thus to hit on the thoughts and expreſſions of others. Porphyrius, in a fragment of his book concerning Philology, quoted by Euſebius in the third chapter of the tenth book of his Præparatio Evangelica, mentions one Aretades, who had written a whole treatiſe of ſuch fortuitous hits. . . . . I ſay, it is a pretty common thing thus to hit upon the ſame thought and expreſſion of another man; eſpecially when one has formerly ſeen the ſame thought, and the ſame expreſſion, as Mr d'Andilli, Mr Chapelain, and Mr Furetiere, had certainly ſeen that verſe of Malherbe, and Mr Corneille, thoſe two verſes of Mr Godeau; for it often falls out, that a thing remains in our mind, when the author of it is forgotten. But what happened to Mr de Racan is very extraordinary. In the year 1608, being in garriſon at Calais, he made theſe four verſes at nineteen years of age:

Eſtime qui voudra la mort épouventable,
Et la face l'horreur de tous les animaux;
Quant à moye je la tiens pour le poinct deſirable
Où commencent nos biens, & finiſſent nos maux.

Let death be dreadful to both mean and great,
Let every creature fear the ſtroke of fate;
Not ſuch my thought; I count the moment bleſt
Which ends our trouble, and begins our reſt.

‘ ſome time after being at Paris, and repeating thoſe verſes as his own to his friend Ivrante, his friend told him, that he muſt not think to impoſe upon him; that he knew very well thoſe verſes were the firſt Quatrain of Mathieu's book, intituled, Les Tablettes de la vie & de la mort. Mr de Racan, who had never ſeen that book, denied obſtinately, and for a conſiderable time, that Mathieu had made thoſe verſes, and would not yield till Ivrante brought Mathieu's book, and ſhewed him the verſes; at which Mr de Racan was not a little amazed. I do not queſtion the truth of this ſtory, being fully perſuaded that Mr de Racan, who told it me very often, and in the preſence of ſeveral people, is a very ſincere man. But I doubt very much of the truth of what Leonardo Salviati ſays, in the firſt book of his Avertimenti della Lingua Italiana, that a Poet of his time, who had never ſeen cardinal Bembo's ſounets, had made ſome exactly like them.' You ſee that Mr Menage makes a great difference between Racan's adventure, and thoſe of the other Poets, whom he named. He finds ſomething in the firſt that is more extraordinary. I ſhould judge otherwiſe of it, if I was to ſay what I think of it. Few people are ignorant, that well educated children are taught ſome moral and pious maxims; and that care is taken, even before they can read, to make them get by heart ſome ſententious ſtaves of verſes. The Proteſtants pitched upon ſome paſſages of David's Pſalms; or, as the Catholics do, upon ſome Quatrains of Pibrac, or of another Poet of the ſame nature (3), which are never wanting in any country. Without doubt little Racan, when he was but five or ſix years of age, heard his governeſs, or his mother, repeat ſome of thoſe fine Quatrains, or ſome of Mathieu's, which are generally bound up with Pibrac. The traces that were imprinted on his brain, were ſtopped up, and remained ſo ſeveral years; afterwards they opened again, and ſeemed to him an object entirely new, without calling to remembrance the author, or the book, which had occaſioned them. He therefore thought himſelf to be the author of thoſe four verſes, though in truth they were only an imperfect remembrance. If a man would carefully examine himſelf, he would find, upon a thouſand occaſions, that what he takes to be his own invention, is a thing that he has heard or read; but he did not remember that circumſtance. Here follow ſome verſes of Moliere, which confirm what I have ſaid concerning the education of children:

(1) Menage, Obſervations ſur Malherbe, pag. 254, & ſeq. He has inſerted all this in the Anti-Baillet, ch. cxxviii.

(2) That is, d'arbitres de la paix, de foudres de la guerre, which is in Malherbe's Paraphraſe upon the CXLVth Pſalm.

(3) There is a book intituled, Le miroir de vertu & le threſor de bien vivre. It is a collection of Chriſtian and Moral Quatrains by Peter Habert, conſeller and ſecretary to the king.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dren: it is a cenſure of a coquet: a father ſpeaks to his daughter:

That is,

Voilà, voilà le fruit de ces empreſſemens,
Qu'on vous voit nuit & jour à lire vos Romans:
De colibets d'amour vôtre tête eſt remplie,
Et vous parlez de Dieu bien moins que de Clelie.
Jettez moi dans le feu tous ces méchans écrits,
Qui gâtent tous les jours tant de jeunes eſprits:
Liſez moi comme il faut, au lieu de ces ſornettes,
Les Quatrains de Pibrac, & les doctes Tablettes
Du Conſeiller Matthieu, ouvrage de valeur,
Et plein de beaux dictons à reciter par cœur:
La guide des pécheurs eſt encor un bon livre,
C'eſt là qu'en peu de tems on apprend à bien vivre,
Et ſi vous n'aviez leu que ces moralitez,
Vous ſçauriez un peu mieux ſuivre mes volontez (4).

See, ſee the conſequence of that delight
With which you read romances day and night!
Your head is fill'd with love's fantaſtic toys;
And Clelia more than GOD your ſpeech employs.
Then to the flames commit each impious page,
The bane of youth, and poiſon of the age:
And let to theſe deſtructive tales ſucceed,
The learn'd Matthieu, or virtuous Pibrac read,
In them you will the nobleſt maxims find:
They'll form the heart, and cultivate the mind.
Let theſe, and let the Sinner's Guide be thine;
There will you learn to lead a life divine,
And had not other books your youth betray'd,
A father's will, had now been more obey'd.

(4) Moliere, Sganarelle ou le Cocu imaginaire, Scene I.

RADULPHUS (a) archbiſhop of Bourges, was ſon of Radulphus, count and lord of Turenne, lay-abbot of Tulle, count of Quercy, and of Agana, his wife. His birth was very illuſtrious, being of the Blood-Royal of France, and of the ſame ſtock and branch as Wifridus count of Bourges (b), whom the acts of St James the Hermit, and thoſe of St Genulfus affirm to be ſprung from the kings of France (c).

(a) See the advertiſement concerning the 2d edition of this Dictionary.

Radulphus was from his youth deſigned for the church, and committed to the care of Bertrand abbot of Solignac, in Limoſin (d). He was afterwards abbot of Fleury (e), and then archbiſhop of Bourges in the year 839 (f). He was concerned in all the great affairs of his time (g). It was he that crowned king of Aquitain, at Limoges, in 855, the young Charles, ſon to Charles the Bald (h). He was with the ſame Charles the Bald at the council held at Savonieres near Toul, in the year 859. The manner in which the fathers of the council treated him, and the great ſubmiſſion and deference which they paid him (i) make it appear, that he was in the higheſt eſtimation, both with the court and with the clergy. He was one of the archbiſhops that were choſen by this council to judge of the complaints that Charles the Bald brought againſt Wenillon archbiſhop of Sens (k). He had before aſſiſted in the year 855, at the council of Meaux (l), as he did afterwards at that of Tuſei in 860 (m), and at the aſſemblies held at Piſtes in the preſence of Charles the Bald, in the years 862, and 864 (n). With his patrimony he built ſeveral abbies, to wit, that of Devra in Berry, ſince transferred to Vierzon (o); that of Beaulieu in Limoſin; the abbey of Vegennes in the ſame country; and the abbey of Saraſac in Quercy. Theſe two laſt are ruined (p).

(b) Mabillon, Act. SS. Benedict. Sæc. IV, Tom. ii, pag. 156. Ibid. pag. 151: Robertus ſiquidem Saxiaci vici, & circumjacentis Regionis Dominus, vir potens, & nobilis, ex Regum Francorum genere ortus erat, & quod optabilius eſt Chriſtianâ pietate inſignis: cui affectu & origine reſpondebat uxor ejus nomine Agana, ex patre Wicfrido Comite quondam Bituricenſi, Regali Proſapiâ exorto, & Matrona Oda nomine, filia, & hi omnes ex Regio Francorum Sanguine traxerant originem.

He likewiſe re-built Chateau-Gourdon in Saiſſeau. This town was part of his patrimony: he brought thither the body of St Satirus, from whence they gave it the name of St Satur which it bears to this day (q). It is ſituated near Sancerre, which was the chief place of the other part of Saiſſeau, poſſeſſed by Wifridus count of Bourges, and which his daughter Agana brought in marriage to Robert, brother of Ingeltrude, wife of Pepin I, king of Aquitain (r). This Robert is the ſame as Robert the Strong.

(c) Ibid. pag. 226. Vitæ Sti. Genulphi: Wifredus hic ex illâ Nobiliſſimâ Scarrâ quam glorioſus Rex Pipinus præfati Auguſti Ludovici avus, in urbe Bituricâ ad Quaïfarii Ducis Aquitaniæ partes expugnandas reliquerat, originem trahens Regali quoque Proſapiâ oriundus.

An antient author (s) informs us, that St Radulphus governed the people that were under his care with ſo much prudence and greatneſs of ſoul, that he was by all the grandees of Aquitain juſtly ſtiled the father of his country (t). He took particular care of all his clergy, and it was for their inſtruction and edification that he compoſed fifteen canons, or ordinances, which Baluzius has printed. He compoſed ſome other canons alſo which the ſame Baluzius promiſes to publiſh. He was the firſt archbiſhop of Bourges which we know for certain to have been patriarch and primate of the provinces of Aquitain and Narbonne (u). It was on this ſubject that Pope Nicolas I. wrote to him a long letter, by which we learn that primates ought not to take immediate cognizance of the affairs of the clergy of other dioceſes ſubject to their primacy, but only in the way of appeal (x).

He died the twentieth day of June, in the year 866, and was canonized (y).

He, his brothers, and their poſterity, were all attached to Robert the Strong, and his deſcendants.

Two of his brothers, GODFREY and ROBERT left children behind them. The poſterity of Robert ended in AIMAR, viſcount of lower Limoſin, a lay-abbot and (d) Ibid. pag. 157. (e) Ibid. (f) Ibid. & Gall. Chriſt. à Sammarthanis, Tom. i, pag. 151, & 152. Patriarch. Bituricen. cap. xlvii, in Biblioth. Labb. Tom. ii, pag. 66. (g) La Thaumaſſiere, Hiſt. du Berri, pag. 294. (h) Beſli, Hiſt. des Comtes de Poictou, & Annal. Bertini, ad ann. 855. (i) Sirm. Concil. Gall. Tom. iii, cap. xi, pag. 141. (k) Ibid. pag. 144. (l) Sæc. Benedict. IV, Tom. ii, pag. 165. (m) Sirm. ubi ſupra, pag. 160. (n) Ibid. (o) Cron. Vierzon. in Biblioth. Labb. Tom. ii, Act. SS. Benedict. Sæc. IV, Tom. ii, pag. 158, & ſeq. (p) Ibid. (q) Hiſt. de St Martial, Part iii, pag. 315. (r) Dominici, Anſberti Familia redviva. Du Bouchet, Veritab. Orig. de la Maiſon de France. Labbe, Tableaux Généalogiques. (s) Fragmentum Vit. Sti. Jacobi Eremitæ, relatum in Patriarch. Bituricenſi, cap. lxvii, Labb. Biblioth. Tom. i. (t) Interea vir Domini Jacobus inter tot præclara bonorum operum exercitia illuſtratus gratiâ divinâ prædixit obitum præſtantiſſimi Pontificis Rodulphi, qui inſitâ ſibi prudentiâ, animi quoque nobilitate, ſuâ tempeſtate plebem ſibi creditam optimè regens, meritò Pater patriæ à cunctis Aquitaniæ Gentis Primoribus dici poterat. Idem refertur in Vitâ Sti. Jacobi Eremitæ, apud Mabillonium, Sæc. Benedict. IV, Tom. ii, pag. 256, in Elog. Hiſtorico Sancti. Rodulp. Archi. Bituric. (u) Gall. Chriſt. à Sammarth. Tom. i, pag. 151, & 152. (x) Nicolai I Papæ, Epiſt. xxxix. (y) Sæc. Bened. IV, Tom. ii, pag. 164.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and reſtorer of the abbey of Tulle. He reſtored to the Friars of this houſe the dignity of abbot, and the revenues of the abbey, which were in his family from the time of his great-great-grand-father, who had obtained a grant of them from our kings (z).

(z) Appendix ad Canones Rheginonis à Stephano Baluſio, p. 528. Juſtel, Preuves de l'Hiſt. de Turenne, p. 15.

Count Godfrey fought againſt the Normans, at the battle of Brieſerthe, with Robert the Strong who was ſlain there (a a). He left two ſons, count GODFREY, of whom St Eudes, abbot of Cluny, ſays, that he endeavoured to oblige St Gerald, count of Aurillac, to become his vaſſal (b b). RANULPH, younger brother of Godfrey, carried on the line; the eldeſt branch of his deſcendants ended in SULPITIUS, who by marriage brought Turenne into the houſe of Comborn (c c). The younger branch which took the name of Soüillac, when ſirnames became hereditary, is ſtill remaining, and continues the line of the princes, counts, and lords of Turenne, ſprung from the ſame ſtock as Wicfridus count of Bourges.

(a a) Annal. Bertin. ad ann. 866.

(b b) Bibl. Cluniac. pag. 84.

(c c) Juſtel, ubi ſupra, pag. 18.

RADULPHUS, or Ralph, a Benedictin Monk, ſirnamed Flaviacenſis, or Flaicenſis, becauſe he was of the convent of St Germer de Flaix, in the dioceſe of Beauvais, flouriſhed in the year 1157, as Albericus affirms (a) upon the teſtimony of Helinand (b). Several famous writers have erroneouſly placed him in the year 910 (c): ſome call him Ralph the Black (d). The commentary which he wrote on Leviticus is ſtill extant; it has been inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and printed ſeparately at Cologne in the year 1536. They (e) have reſtored to him a commentary on the Song of Songs, which formerly was aſcribed to St Gregory. The partizans of the hiſtory of Pope Joan have numbred him among their evidences, but this happened thro' a great miſtake [A].

(a) Albericus trium Fontium Monachus, in Chronic. See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. ii, pag. 274.

(d) Mr du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. ix, pag. 185, is one of them.

(e) Father Hommey, in the Supplement. Patrum in the year 1684.

(b) A Monk of Fromond in the dioceſe of Beauvais, about the end of the XIIth, and beginning of the XIIIth century. See Father Labbe, ubi ſupra, pag. 275. (c) Labbe, ibid. pag. 273.

[A] The partizans of the hiſtory of Pope Joan have numbred him among their evidences, but this happened through a great miſtake.] This aroſe from confounding him with a Benedictin Monk, named Ralph Higden, an Engliſhman, who died in the year 1363; Father Labbe thinks that Conrad Decker was the firſt ſource of this blunder. 'Auctor primus illius apud Blondellum erroris atque in Mareſio malæ fidei fuit homo furioſus Conradus Deckerus in libro, cui titulum fecit de Papa Romano & Papiſſa Romana, quod Joannes Octavus fuerit mulier & puerpera, Oppenheimii ad Rhenum in 8 anno 1612; ſic enim loquitur pagina 430. Deſcripſit Radulphus hanc Hiſtoriam in ſuo Polychronico libri V, cap. 32, teſtis locupletiſſimus & omni exceptione major, utpote in quo veritatis Hiſtoricæ nulla deſiderantur κριτήρια: & vixit juxta Trithemium anno circiter 930. ita ut Papale hoc puerperium ab iis accipere potuerit, qui illud viderunt. Atque ex illo cœnoſo fonte promanavit in cæteros error (1.) - - - - The firſt author of that error in Blondel, and diſingenuity in Mareſius was Conrad Decker, a violent man, in a book which he intituled, de Papa Romano, & Papiſſa Romana affirming, that John VIII was a woman, and had been brought to bed of a child (the book was printed at Oppenheim upon the Rhine, in 1612, in 8vo), for thus he writes in the 430*th page. Radulphus related this ſtory in his Polychronicon. He is a moſt ſubſtantial witneſs, and above all exception, there being no mark of a true Hiſtorian which does not appear in him. Beſides, he lived, according to Trithemius, about the year* 930, ſo that he might have received this account of the delivery of Pope Joan from thoſe who had ſeen it. From this polluted fountain the error ſpread itſelf among others.' But it is certain Vignier had committed this error two years before Conrad Decker's work was printed. I ſhall quote what he publiſhed in the year 1610. 'What Baronius and Bellarmin ſay, that Marianus Scotus, was the firſt author of this ſtory is falſe, as may be ſeen by the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the deceaſed Nicolas Vignier, my father, in which he produces the teſtimony of Radulphus in his Polychronicon, who was a Monk of the order of St Benedict, and lived about the year 930, according to Trithemius (2).' A Capuchin who wrote againſt Vignier in the year 1611, did not know how to make uſe of the advantages he had, he did not ſufficiently underſtand books and authors. He knew not that the author of the Polychronicon, which his adverſary had quoted, did not live in the Xth century, but in the XIVth: let us ſee the anſwer which he made. Read your father over again, you will find in the hiſtorical library on the ſame ſubject, firſt, that he is guilty of a falſhood, when he ſays, That all thoſe who have written the hiſtory of Popes, except Anaſtaſius, agree, that your Pope Joan ſucceeded Leo IV, as he might have learned from Onuphrius, whom he cites there. Secondly, That he ſpeaks doubtfully, and timerouſly of this affair, as well as others, who were miſtaken concerning it. Thirdly, It will appear from his text, well conſidered, that he alledges Marianus as the oldeſt author of this ſtory. Fourthly, That he does not in this place make the leaſt mention of your Arnulphus, but quotes Johannis Lucidus; but if you have a mind to make but one of theſe two, know further, that we give very little credit, not to ſay none at all, to the allegations of your ſaid father (3). This was not home to the point, nor going to the bottom of the cauſe. Vignier furniſhed advantages againſt himſelf, in giving the title of Ranulphus's work. It is owing to this title, that Father Labbe (4) diſcovered by a paſſage of Decker, the ſource of this miſtake. The learned Blondel had taken no notice of this title: and from hence it came that he was prevailed upon to believe, that Radulphus Flaviacenſis had written concerning Pope Joan (5). It is true, that he has not followed the error of thoſe, who place him either in the year 910, or in the year 930. He hath placed his death in the year 1157; and he founds this on the teſtimony of Albericus; but he ought to have remembered that Albericus does not place the death of our Radulphus in this year, but the moſt proſperous time of his life: they were not very fortunate, when they repreſented to him that Radulphus Flaviacenſis was more ancient than he had made him, that he was an evidence of Pope Joan, prior to Marianus; and, in ſhort, that he was a man that might have ſeen Pope Joan with his own eyes (6). 'Hic (Radulphus Flaviacenſis) inter teſtes veritatis malè tertius ponitur à Mariano: Nec enim Radulphus Flaviacenſis mortuus eſt denuò anno 1157, niſi eum multò longæviorem faciamus Johanne de Temporibus; cùm floruerit ipſo nono Chriſti ſæculo, pluſquam 100. annis antequam Marianus naſceretur, adeo ut ipſam Joannam vidiſſe potuerit: Etenim Bellarminus de Scriptor. Eccl. Radulphum ait floruiſſe anno Chriſti 910 (7). - - - - - Radulphus Flaviacenſis is erroneouſly put in the third place after Marianus among the witneſſes of the truth, for Radulphus did not die in the 1157, unleſs we can ſuppoſe that he lived longer than Johannes de Temporibus, ſince he flouriſhed in the IXth century after Chriſt, above an hundred years before Marianus was born, ſo that he might have ſeen Joan herſelf; for Bellarmin, in his account of Eccleſiaſtical writers, ſays, that Radulphus flouriſhed in the year of Chriſt 910.' He who talked thus made ſeveral miſtakes, which Father Labbe expoſed with dreadful ſeverity (8).

(1) Labbe, in Cenotaphio everſo, ad calcem, Tom. i, de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 986, 987.

(2) Nicolas Vignier, Theatre de l'Antechriſt, Part ii, cap. xxvii, pag. m. 1055.

(3) Silveſtre de l'Aval, Prédicateur Capucin, les juſtes Grandeurs de l'Egliſe Romaine, liv. iii, pag. 78.

(4) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. i, p. 987.

(5) Blondel, in Examine Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, pag. m. 5.

(6) They pretend ſhe came to be Pope after Leo IV, who died an. 855.

(7) Samuel Mareſius, in Joannæ Papiſſa reſtituta, p. 5.

(8) See the ſecond Tome of Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 274, 795 & ſeq.

Had Mr Hartnac known this, when he publiſhed a new edition of Micrelius's Syntagma Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ, he would, no doubt, have informed his readers, that theſe words, 'Nobile indignari, Aventine, Onuphri, Raymunde (9), Bellarmine, Baroni, Bini, Florimunde, quod veſtram audaciam in negando muliebri hoc pontificatu nihil curans, veritatem rei profero

(9) He ſhould not have been diſtinguiſhed from Florimund, who comes afterwards, for they have made two authors of one.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' profero ex Rudolpho Flaviacenſi, monacho Bene-
' dictino qui vixit circa annum IↃCCCXX. ex Ma-
' riano Scoto, qui natus, &c (10).' - - - - Now vent
' your noble rage, Aventinus, Onuphrius, Raymundus,
' Bellarmin, Baronius, Binius, Florimundus, becauſe
' without having the leaſt regard to your impudence in
' denying the ſtory of the female Pontiff, I demonſtrate
' the truth of it, from Rodulphus Flaviacenſis, a Bene-
' dictine Monk, who lived about the year 820, and out
' of Marianus Scotus, who was born, &c." are erroneous: and that the words ex Rudolpho Flaviacenſi muſt be ſtruck out. Here we ſee how much it concerns writers of controverſy, not to ſtop at the authors of their own party, but to carry their enquires through all the replies of the adverſe party. Should a man content himſelf to conſult only Mareſius, he would repeat his citations, but were he to conſult the author, who has confuted him (11), he would then be able to diſtinguiſh the good from the bad. Let us here occaſionally obſerve, that Mr Hartnac has put in the margin, the names of ſeveral Proteſtant authors, who have maintained the hiſtory of Pope Joan, and of whom the moſt part have written ſince Florimond de Remond (12). He cites, among others, the famous Gerhard, and Whitaker, and Andrew Willet.

(10) Micrælius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. iii, §. i, de Papis, pag. 508, Edit. 1699.

(11) That is to ſay, Father Labbe.

(12) Confer the remark [F], of the article POPE (JOAN).

RADZIWIL (NICOLAS), the fourth of that name [A], Palatin of Vilna, Great Marſhal and Chancellor of Lithuania in the XVIth century, was a very illuſtrious man. He travelled almoſt all over Europe in his youth, and was ſo expert in bodily exerciſes, that no gentleman of his age equalled him therein. He had a great ſhare in the love and eſteem of king Sigiſmund Auguſtus; he was made captain of his guards, and commanded his armies three times in Livonia, where he obtained a ſignal victory over the Germans, whereby they loſt that province, which was ſubjected to Poland. He brought the archbiſhop of Riga, and the Great Maſter of the knights of Livonia to the king, and delivered to him in a full ſenate the ſeal of that order, and the croſs which the Great Maſter wore about his neck. This noble expedition crowned him with glory. When he was ſent ambaſſador to the court of Charles V, and of Ferdinand king of the Romans, he ſtood godfather to the archduke Erneſtus. He died in the year 1567, and was carried to his grave upon the ſhoulders of his four ſons (a) [B]. I muſt not forget that he embraced the Proteſtant religion, and that he cauſed the Bible to be printed in the Poliſh language [C]. He made a very ſevere reply to Lippoman, the Apoſtolical

(a) Taken from Simon Staroviolcius, in Sarmatiæ Bellatoribus, pag. 172, 173.

[A] Fourth of that name.] Jagello being converted to Chriſtianity, and having united Lithuania, his own country, to the crown of Poland, which had been conferred upon him, created a lord, called Radziwil, palatin of Vilna, who, after his example, was become a Chriſtian. This palatin took the name of NICOLAS at his baptiſm, and ordered that, for time to come, all the eldeſt ſons of his family ſhould be called Nicolas. He lived above a hundred years (1). NICOLAS II, his only ſon, palatin of Vilna, ſerved the Republic with great glory under ſix kings ſucceſſively. He died being ninety-nine years old (2). NICOLAS III, the eldeſt of his four ſons, palatin of Vilna, was made a prince of the empire, by the emperor Maximilian I, and died full of glory, being above ſeventy years of age (3). GEORGE RADZIWIL, his brother, palatin of Kiovia, marſhal of the court, caſtellan of Vilna, and great general of Lithuania, was the father of Barbara Radziwil, the ſecond wife of king Sigiſmund Auguſtus. He died in the year 1565 (4). JOHN RADZIWIL, his brother, the youngeſt of the four ſons of Nicolas II, was made a ſenator of the kingdom by king Sigiſmund I. He was afterwards caſtellan of Troci, and at laſt great marſhal of Lithuania. He took a journey to Rome under the Pontificate of Julius II (5). He left an only ſon, who is NICOLAS RADZIWIL, fourth of that name (6), who makes the ſubject of this article.

(1) Simon Staroviolcius, in Sarmatiæ Bellatoribus, pag. 163, 164.

(2) Ibid. pag. 165, 166.

(3) Ibid. pag. 167, & ſeq.

(4) Ibid. pag. 169, 170.

(5) Ibid. pag. 171, 172.

(6) Ibid.

[B] He was carried to his grave upon the ſhoulders of his four ſons (7).] You will ſee their names and dignities in theſe Latin words: ' Quatuor filios, itidem
' bello inclytos, nec deteriores ingeniis (qui, ut inquit
' Valerius Maximus patriæ rem non ſuam augere pro-
' perabant) reliquit. Nicolaum Hieroſolymitana pere-
' grinatione clarum; Georgium, Vilnenſem primò,
' deinde Cracovienſem Epiſcopum, & S. R. E. Cardi-
' nalem; Albertum ſupremum M. D. L. Marſcalcum;
' & Staniſlaum Samogitiæ Toparcham: qui cum pluri-
' mis lachrymis, patre pro concione laudato funeratoque
' ampliſſime, propriis manibus Urnam Mauſoleo in-
' ferre non erubuerunt (8). - - He left four ſons of great
' fame in the field, and of no leſs reputation in the cabi-
' net, who, as Valerius Maximus ſays, made it their
' buſineſs to increaſe their country's wealth, and not their
' own; Nicolas, famous for his travels to Jeruſalem;
' George, biſhop of Vilna, and afterwards of Cracow,
' and cardinal; Albertus, grand marſhal of the great
' duchy of Lithuania; and Staniſlaus, chief governor of
' Samogitia; who, with many tears, having heard a
' funeral ſermon preached over their father, and ſeen all
' the other ceremonies of a magnificent burial performed,
' were not aſhamed to carry his body to the grave with
' their own hands.' Thuanus (9) obſerves, that thoſe four ſons returned into the communion of the church of Rome, and that Albert married a daughter of the duke of Courland. He places the death of Nicolas Radziwil on the 28th of May, 1565. Bucholcerus does the ſame in his Index Chronologicus. Note, That David Chytræus (10) ſays the ſame things as Thuanus. The paſſage which I have quoted out of Simon Staroviolcius, informs us, that Nicolas Radziwil, the eldeſt ſon of our Nicolas Radziwil, made himſelf famous by his voyage to Jeruſalem: which obliges me to ſay, that the ſame author obſerves, in another book (11), that Thomas Treterus, a canon of Warmia, tranſlated into Latin the relation of NICOLAS CHRISTOPHER RADZIWIL's voyage to Jeruſalem (12). That voyage was made in the year 1584. This Nicolas Chriſtopher Radziwil gave a relation of it in four lettters in the Poliſh language. I have ſeen the Latin tranſlation, printed at Antwerp in the year 1614, in folio. The Epiſtle Dedicatory of Treterus the tranſlator is dated in the year 1601. He who made that journey, died in the month of February 1616, and was buried in a pilgrim's habit in the college of the Jeſuit at Nieſwiez (13). He was made a prince of the empire, and left four ſons (14), from one of which, if I am not miſtaken, prince STANISLAUS ALBERT RADZIWIL deſcended, who was duke of Olyka and Nieſwiez, chancellor of the great duchy of Lithuania (15), and the author of a panegyric upon our Lady of Czeſtochovia. He flouriſhed at the time when Mr le Laboureur publiſhed a relation of a journey into Poland, that is, in the year 1647.

(7) Filiorum humeris elatus fuit. Ibid. pag. 174.

(8) Ibid. pag. 173.

(9) Thuan. lib. xxxviii, pag. 769.

(10) David Chytræus, in Saxonia, lib. xxi, ad ann. 1565, pag. 538, Edit. Lipſ. 1602.

(11) Staroviolc. in centum Polonorum Elogiis, pag. 70, 71.

(12) This is the ſame with the eldeſt ſon of our Radziwil.

(13) Staroviolc. in Bellator. Sarmatiæ, p. 176.

(14) Ibid.

(15) Le Laboureur, Relation de Pologne, Part iii, pag. 25.

[C] He cauſed the Bible to be printed in the Poliſh language.] Nicolas Oleſnicki, as I have ſaid elſewhere (16), eſtabliſhed the Reformed religion in Pinczovia at the inſtigation of Stancarus. A ſchool was likewiſe ſet up in the ſame place. which proved a nurſery of learned men. John Laſcus, George Blandrata, Francis Liſmaninus, Martin Grovicius, Peter Statorius, George Schoman, Gregory Pauli, Brelius, Triceſſius, and ſome others, made it flouriſh to ſuch a degree, that Pinczovia was looked upon as the Athens of Poland (17). There it was that thoſe learned men tranſlated all the Bible into the vulgar tongue. Their tranſlation was printed at Breſt in Lithuania, at the charges of our Nicolas Radziwil. He was governor of that royal city, and ſet up a Printing-houſe in it. The Pſalms of David, a collection of Canticles, and ſome other works of the ſame kind, were printed in that town, and contributed very much to the converſion of the people. Here are the words of my author: ' Ibi (Pinczoviæ) à Viris illis piis & doctis
' univerſa Biblia Sacra in Linguam vernaculam tranſla-
' ta, ſumptibus Nicolai Radzivilii Palatini Vilnenſis

(16) In the article STANCARUS.

(17) Ita ut tunc Pinczovia velut Athenæ Sarmaticæ celebraretur. Staniſl. Lubieniecius, Hiſt. Reform. Polon. lib. i, cap. v, pag. 33.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Apoſtolical Nuncio, who had given him ſome very reproachful words [D]. The clergy of Vilna being not willing to permit the miniſters to preach in the churches, he made them preach in the court of his houſe, over againſt St John's church (b). The firſt ſynod of the Reformed was held under his protection at Vilna in December 1557 (c). He had a wife (d), who was no leſs zealous than he to ſettle the Reformation (e). There was at that time one CHRISTOPHER RADZIWIL, who embraced the Proteſtant religion; and it is ſaid, that the diſcovery of ſome monkiſh impoſtures occaſioned his change [E]. Others call him Nicolas (f), and ſay he was couſin-german to him,

(b) David Chytræus, in Saxonia, lib. xv, pag. m. 393.

(c) Regenſvolſc. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Sclavonicar. pag. 142.

(d) Called Elizabeth Sidlowieckî.

(e) David Chytræus, ubi ſupra.

(f) See the remark [E] at the end.

' Principis Magnificentiſſimi & Fortiſſimi renaſcentis ' veritatis vindicis impreſſa ſunt Breſtiæ Lithuanorum. ' Huic enim urbi Regiæ Præfectus datus erat, in qua ' comparatam privato ære officinam typographicam ' conſiderat, & illi Wojewodæ Cracoviâ evocato com- ' miſerat. Ibidem exſcriptus fuit liber Pſalmorum & ' hymnorum aliique ejus notæ, quorum lectione popu- ' lus à Romanis ſuperſtitionibus ad veram Dei colendi ' rationem revocabatur (18). --- There (at Pinczovia) ' the whole Bible was tranſlated by theſe pious and learned ' men, into the vulgar tongue; and at the charge of Nicolas ' Radziwil, Palatine of Vilna, a prince of great muni- ' ficence, and a moſt valiant defender of the truth then ' reſtored; it was printed at Breſte: of which royal city ' being made a governor, he did, at his own expence, build ' there a Printing-houſe, and committed it to the care of ' Weiwood, who was ſent for from Cracow. There the ' book of Pſalms and Hymns, and many other ſuch like, ' were printed: by the reading of which, the people were ' turned from the Romiſh ſuperſtitions, to the knowledge of ' the true worſhip of God.' That author obſerves (19) that this impreſſion of the Bible was finiſhed in the year 1563, and that it was the firſt Poliſh tranſlation of the Scripture. He adds, that it was firſt followed by another tranſlation, in the year 1572, made by Simon Budnæus; and that a verſion of the New Teſtament by Martin Czechovicius was printed five years after. Note, that if we believe John Lætus (20), the tranſlators of the Bible, printed at Nicolas Radziwil's charges (21), were but five, viz. Orſacius, Zazius, Triceſius, James Lubelſcius, and Statorius.

(18) Ibid.

(19) Ibid. lib. vii, cap. i, pag. 170.

(20) Jo. Lætus, in Compend. Hiſtor. Univerſ. pag. m. 412. He quotes Laſicius, lib. v, Chytræus, in Sax. ad ann. 65.

(21) He ſpent ten thouſand florins upon it. Jo. Lætus, ubi infra.

[D] He made a very ſevere reply to Lippoman, the Apoſtolical Nuncio, who had given him ſome very reproachful words.] I am ſure my readers will be glad to find here part of that anſwer. ' Apoſtaſia cum ei ' non ſine conviciis à Lippomano Pontificis Legato ex- ' probraretur, eidem docta Apologia reſpondit, fidei ' ſuæ rationem dedit, inter alia vero: Certum tibi eſſe ' volo, ſic me nunc doctiſſimorum virorum videndorum ' deſiderio teneri, ut ſi ſcirem me eos, aut alios etiam ex ' præcipuis illis qui ſunt in Germania, Melanchthones, ' Brentios, poſſe in mea poſtulata aliquomodo pertrahere, ' in eo vel præcipuè, non ſervitoris tantum mittendi la- ' borem conferendum, ſed etiam omnes opes facultateſque ' meas eſſe mihi experiendas putarem quos quia per in- ' ſignem malitiam hæreticos appellas, omnium Hæretico- ' rum, quos orbis terrarum habet, maxime Hæreticus ' es (22). --- When he was upbaided with apoſtacy ' in a ſcurrilous manner by Lippomanus, the Pope's ' Nuntio, he anſwered him by a very learned apology, ' in which he gave the reaſon of his faith, and among ' other things ſaid: I would have you to be aſſured, ' that I have ſo ardent a deſire of converſing with the ' moſt learned men, that if I knew it was in my power ' to induce them, or others, ſo renowned in Germany, the ' Melanchthons and Brentiis, to comply with my propoſals; ' in that caſe, I ſhould think it my duty not only to ſend a ' ſervant, but even to beſtow all my wealth, and employ ' all my abilities with theſe men whom you, from the depth ' of malice, call heretics; but in ſo doing you prove your ' ſelf to be of all heretics, the greateſt heretic.' The letter he received from Lippoman, and his anſwer to it, were printed at Koningſberg, in the year 1556 (23).

(22) Ibid. pag. 390, 391.

(23) Regenſvolſcius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Sclavonicar. pag. 142.

[E] It is ſaid, that the diſcovery of ſome monkiſh impoſtures occaſioned the change of Chriſtopher Radziwil.] When the Reformation began to be eſtabliſhed in Lithuania, this Chriſtopher Radziwil being very ſorry that a prince of his houſe had embraced it, went to Rome, and paid all imaginable honours to the Pope. The Pope being likewiſe willing to gratify him, preſented him with a box full of relics when he went away. Being returned home, and the news of thoſe relics being ſpread abroad, certain monks came to him, ſome months after, and told him that there was a man poſſeſſed with the Devil, that the wicked ſpirit had been exorciſed in vain, and that hitherto all the exorciſms had proved ineffectual. They begged of him that he would lend the precious relics he had brought from Rome, for the relief of that poor man. The prince readily granted their requeſt. The relics were carried into the church with a ſolemn pomp, and a proceſſion of all the monks. At laſt they were placed upon the altar, and on the day appointed an innumerable multitude of people crowded in to ſee the ſhow, and after the uſual exorciſms the relics were made uſe of. At that very moment the pretended devil went out of the body of the man, with the uſual geſtures and grimaces. Every body cried out, a Miracle; and the prince lifted up his hands and eyes to Heaven, to return thanks that he had brought a thing ſo holy, and which could do ſuch miracles. But ſome few days after, as he was full of admiration, and tranſported with joy, extolling the virtue of his relics, he perceived that a young gentleman of his houſe, who had the keeping of that rich treaſure, ſmiled, and made ſome geſtures, whereby it appeared that he derided his diſcourſe (24). The prince grew angry, and would know the reaſon of his deriſion. The gentleman being aſſured that no harm ſhould come to him, told the prince in private, ' That upon his return from Rome, ' he loſt the box of relics, which he had the keep- ' ing of, and that not daring to ſpeak of it, for ' fear of being puniſhed, he got one like it, and ' filled it with little bones of beaſts, and ſuch trifles ' as he could get that were like the relics which ' he had loſt. So that ſeeing ſo much honour paid ' to that vile heap of filth, and even that they aſcribed ' to it the virtue of driving away the Devil, he had ' good reaſon to wonder at it. The prince gave cre- ' dit to what he ſaid, but being willing to be more ' particularly informed of the cheat, he ſent for the ' monks the next day, and defired them to enquire, ' whether there was any other Demoniac, who wanted ' the aſſiſtance of his relics. Some few days after ' they brought him another man poſſeſſed with the ' Devil, who acted the ſame part with the firſt. The ' prince ordered him to be exorciſed in his preſence; ' but becauſe all the exorciſms, that are commonly ' made uſe of on ſuch an occaſion, proved ineffe- ' ctual, he told the monks, that he would have the ' man to ſtay in his palace till the next day, and ' that they ſhould retire. After they were gone, ' he put the pretended Demoniac into the hands ' of his Tartarian grooms; who at firſt exhorted ' him to confeſs the cheat, as they were ordered to ' do: but becauſe he obſtinately perſiſted in it, with ' horrid and furious geſtures, ſix of them laid on him ' with whips and ſcourges, and put him into ſuch ' condition, that he was forced to implore the prince's ' mercy, who forgave him as ſoon as he had con- ' feſſed the truth. When the night was over, the ' prince ſent for the monks, in whoſe preſence the ' poor fellow flung himſelf at his feet, and proteſted ' that he neither was, nor ever had been poſſeſſed ' with the Devil; but that thoſe monks had per- ' ſuaded him to counterfeit a Demoniac. Immediately ' the monks defired the prince not to believe what he ' ſaid, and told him that it was a trick of the Devil, ' who ſpoke through that man's mouth. But the ' prince anſwered, that if his Tartars had been able ' to force the Devil to tell the truth, they would be ' able to extort it from the mouth of the monks. So ' that the monks finding themſelves preſſed ſo hard, ' confeſſed the impoſture, and ſaid that they had done ' it with a good intention, and to prevent the ' progreſs of hereſy. But the prince thanked God ' with all his heart, that he had been graciouſly ' pleaſed to diſcover ſuch an impoſture to him, and ' ſuſpecting a religion, that was ſupported with ſuch ' diabolical devices, tho' they went by the name of ' pious frauds, he declared, that he would no longer ' depend upon any body for his ſalvation, and betook ' himſelf to the reading of the Holy Scriptures with ' a wonderful aſſiduity; and having ſpent half a year ' in

(24) Dreſincourt, Reponſe au Prince Erneſt Landgrave de Heſſe, pag. 357.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him, who makes the ſubject of this article, and brother of Barbara Radziwil, who was married to Sigiſmund Auguſtus, king of Poland, and who died the twelfth of May 1551. They obſerve, that the church which he cauſed to be built for the Reformed in the city of Vilna, of which he was Palatin, was honoured with a fine privilege by king Stephen Battori in the year 1579, and that he died the twenty-ſeventh of April 1584, that Nicolas and Chriſtopher RADZIWIL, his two ſons, perſevered in the religion in which he had bred them up, and that their poſterity carefully preſerved that ſacred depoſitum (g) [F].

(g) Ex eodem Regenvolſc. ubi ſupra, p. 144, 145.

' in reading and praying, he made a wonderful pro-
' greſs in piety, and in the knowledge of the my-
' ſteries of the Goſpel: and then he and all his fami' ly made an open profeſſion of our religion, in the
(25) Ibid. pag. 359, & ſeq. ' year 1564 (25).' Theſe are the words of Mr Drelincourt, miniſter of the church of Paris, in the anſwer he publiſhed in the year 1663, to the letter which prince Erneſt, landgrave of Heſſe, had writ to the five miniſters of Paris. Mr Drelincourt adds (26), Your Highneſs may believe it, if you pleaſe; but I proteſt, as if I was before the throne of God, that this ſtory was told me in this manner by the miniſter of prince Januſius Radziwil: nay, he gave me in writing part of what he told me, and explained to me viva voce.

(26) Ibid. pag. 362.

(27) Regenvolſc. ubi ſupra, pag. 145.

Regenvolſcius (27) calls him Nicolas Radziwil, whom the diſcovery of a monkiſh impoſture fully determined to forſake the Popiſh religion in the year 1564; but he ſays nothing either of the journey to Rome, or of the relics. He only ſays, that the monks of Czenſtochovia (28) had ſuborned a pretended Demoniac, whilſt Nicolas Radziwil was on his pilgrimage, which he had vowed after a great victory obtained over the Muſcovites.

(28) See le Laboureur's Relation of Poland, Part iii, pag. 28, & ſeq. concerning the miraculous image of the holy Virgin, which is honoured in that place.

[F] Their poſterity carefully preſerved that ſacred depoſitum.] NICOLAS RADZIWIL, palatin of Novogrod, was the father of GEORGE, who died caſtellan of Troki, in the year 1614, and left no children. CHRISTOPHER RADZIWIL, brother to this Nicolas, was palatin of Vilna, and died in the year 1604. He left two ſons, JANUSSIUS, and CHRISTOPHER. Januſius, duke of Bierze, and caſtellan of Vilna, died in the year 1621, being forty-two years of age. He left by his wife, who was the Elector of Brandenburg's daughter, a ſon called BOGESLAUS. His brother Chriſtopher, palatin of Vilna, and great marſhal of Lithuania, died the nineteenth of September 1640, at fifty-five years of age, and left an only ſon, whoſe name was JANUSSIUS, and who was Great Chamberlain of Lithuania. This Bogeſlaus, and this Januſius RADZIWIL, firſt-couſins, were both alive, and made profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion, when the author, whom I quote (29), was writing this book, about the year 1650. The Gazettes, in the beginning of the year 1681, told us, that the princeſs LUDOVICA RADZIWIL, at fourteen years of age, married prince Lewis, ſecond ſon of the Elector of Brandenburg, at Koningſberg, the ſeventh of January, 1681; that ſhe was the only daughter of the late prince Bogeſlaus, and that ſhe was poſſeſſed of a duchy in Lithuania, which contains above forty leagues on the frontiers of Livonia, and two ſtrong caſtles. She was a Proteſtant, but after the death of prince Lewis of Brandenburg, ſhe married again in 1688, to a ſon of the Elector Palatine, and turned a Roman Catholic. There had been ſome diſcourſe of marrying her to prince James, ſon of John Sobieſki, king of Poland.

(29) Regenvolſc. ubi ſupra, pag. 145, 146.

RAIMARUS (NICOLAS) an Aſtronomer of the XVIth century. See URSUS.

RAYNAUD (THEOPHILUS), one of the moſt famous and learned Jeſuits of the XVIIth century, was born at Soſpello (a), in the county of Nice; but having lived in France the moſt part of his time, he paſſed for a Frenchman [A]. His life was very long, and attended with ſeveral diſgraces; yet he could never be perſuaded to leave his ſociety [B], and to aſſociate himſelf with another community, tho' he was offered great advantages elſewhere. He was extremely laborious, and loſt but little time, either in eating, or hearing devout women [C]. His great pleaſure was to write books, and carefully to perform the functions of his character. He compoſed a prodigious number of books: ſome of them were cenſured by the Inquiſition [D]; which ſenſibly afflicted him.

(a) From hence comes the title Ceſpitellenſis, that is given him to denote his native country.

[A] He paſſed for a Frenchman.] Alegambe ſays poſitively, that he was a Frenchman; Natione Gallus, patria Ceſpitellenſis (1). Theſe Latin words contain what is called in the ſchools contradictio in adjecto; for Ceſpitellum or Soſpitellum is undeniably in Italy. See Baudrand on thoſe two words. Father Oldoini cenſures Alegambe for this fault, and places our Theophilus among the writers born in Liguria. Soprani places him amongſt them likewiſe (2). They are more in the right than Southwell, who expreſſes himſelf doubtfully. Natione Gallus, ſays he (3), an potius Italus? patria Ceſpitellenſis in Comitatu Niceenſi.

(1) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 431.

(2) Oldoinus and Soprani have publiſhed the catalogue of the writers of that part of Italy.

(3) Natan. Sotuel, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 757.

[B] His life .... was attended with ſeveral diſgraces; yet he could never be perſuaded to leave his ſociety.] Here follow Southwell's words: ' Vocationis
' ſuæ religioſæ tenaciſſimus; quamvis & utilia & honó-
' rifica extra ſocietatem ei promitterentur à Primori-
' bus, ſi hanc inter aſpera quæ ſubinde patiebatur, dè-
' ſere vellet, nunquam eos auſcultare voluit (4). - - -
' He was moſt immovably attached to his religious vocà-
' tion; altho' great advantages and honours were pro-
' miſed to him elſewhere by men of the firſt rank, pro-
' vided he would quit the ſociety of the Jeſuits in the ' middle of thoſe hardſhips which he was every now and
' then obliged to ſuffer, he would never conſent to it.'
See below (5) the paſſage of Moncony's, and that of a Janſeniſt (6).

(4) Ibid. pag. 758.

(5) In the remark [L].

(6) In the remark [K].

[C] He loſt but little time either in eating, or hearing devout women.] He was a very ſober man, and did not ſit at table above a quarter of an hour; and when, by reaſon of his great age, he might have converſed with women, without any danger and ſuſpicion, he would not ſpeak with them but in caſes of neceſſity, and told them in a few words what he had to ſay. I here only tranſlate Southwell's words. In victu valde abſtinens, ſays he (7), paucis & communibus ſemper uſus cibis, vix amplius uno quadrante dabat menſæ. Puritatis amator ſummus, mulierum colloquia cum erant neceſſaria, etiam ſenex, paucis verbis definiebat. He wiſhed that all other Eccleſiaſtics would imitate him in that, as he teſtifies in his book De ſobria alterius ſexus frequentatione. But, generally ſpeaking, the directors of conſciences do not like that morality; they are ſeldom weary of the company of devout women, if one may judge of it by their long and frequent converſations with them.

(7) Sotuel, ubi ſupra.

[D] He publiſhed ſome books which were cenſured by the Inquiſition.] He took ſo much pains to have the cenſure taken off, that he at laſt obtained leave to reprint them, provided that he corrected them (8). The Inquiſition cenſured three of his treatiſes, viz. De Martyrio per peſtem; de Communione pro mortuis; and de Confixione Librorum (9). As men have different notions of things, it is no wonder that this Jeſuit took ſuch a diſgrace to heart, tho' other writers are ſo little afraid of it, that ſometimes they are glad to hear that their works have been put into the Index, or that the Inquiſitors are diſpleaſed with them. It is very often a ſign

(8) Poſtea ab auctore emendata, ab eadem ſacra congregatione anno 1659 recudi permiſſa ſunt & libere diſtrahi. Ibid. p. 759.

(9) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him. He discharged his anger upon the Dominicans, in a book (b) wherein he collected a vast number of passages out of their writings, which had not been censured, tho' they deserved it. The quarrels he had with some Dominicans, and other people, produced many injurious and satirical pieces; for it cannot be denied that he had a very sarcastical wit. The Jesuits themselves confess something of it [E]. He died of an apoplexy (c) at Lyons, the last day of October 1663. The Bibliographers of the Jesuits do not agree about his age [F]; and therefore I shall not determine whether he lived seventy-nine years, as Mr Gallois asserts, in a work that will afford me some passages concerning the genius and spirit of this Jesuit [G]. He was very much esteemed by Dr Patin [H], and some are of opinion that he praises him too much, and that, with a sign that a book is good. See what an ingenious man (10) hath lately said upon occasion of the censure passed upon the Acta Sanctorum.

(b) Intituled, De immunitate Cyriacorum à censuris.

(c) Ictus apoplexia migravit ad Dominum. Sotuel, Bibliotheca Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 758. This does not seem to agree with the passage of Monconys, below, remark [L].

(10) The author of the Lettres Historiques, March 1696, p. 245.

[E] The Jesuits themselves confess something of it.] They say he was impatient, and that he did not spare Father Bollandus, his Fellow-Jesuit, and his good friend, who had done him great services, and had displeased him only by maintaining a different opinion from his concerning a bishop of Lyons. If all the angry and passionate expressions of our Theophilus had not been suppressed, Bollandus would have been very ill treated in the second edition of the Inditulus Sanctorum Lugdunensium. Father Papebroch has revealed this little mystery. Ita factus erat Theophilus, says he (11), ut neminem contradicentem sibi patienter ferret, & nisi præsentes adfuissemus, cum prælo iterum pararetur Indiculus Sanctorum Lugdunensium, nosque mature aliquis admonuisset, inveniretur ibi acriter perstrictus P. Joannes Bollandus in S. Anemundo Lugdunensi Episcopo, sub regimine S. Bathildis occiso, quia ad 26 Januarii eundem statuerat cum S. Delfino contra Theophili sententiam, cui alias Bollandus amicissimus erat, & in curanda operum ipsius impressione Antverpiæ meritus de illo optime.

(11) Papebroch. Elucidat. Hist. Actorum in Controv. Carmelitica, cap. vii, in fine, p. 110.

[F] The Bibliographers of the Jesuits do not agree about his age.] Alegambe (12) says, that Father Theophilus was admitted into their order in the year 1602, at sixteen years of age; but, according to Father Southwell (13), it was in 1592, and at the same age. And therefore, since he died in 1663, he lived seventy-seven years, according to Father Alegambe, and eighty-seven according to Father Southwell. But if he had lived eighty-seven years, this expression of Father Southwell would be wrong, Octogenario major . . . . migravit ad Dominum: it is only proper for those, whose life did not much exceed eighty years. Mr Gallois seems to be more credible than those two Jesuits, when he says (14), that Father Theophilus lived seventy-nine years. It is a strange thing that the Jesuits themselves, who made it their business to write elogies upon the writers of their society, should not be able to tell us how long one of the most famous of them lived.

(12) Alegambe, ubi supra.

(13) Sotuel, ubi supra, p. 757.

(14) Gallois, Journal des Sçavans, March 14, 1667, pag. m. 127.

[G] Concerning the genius of this Jesuit.] It was not possible to speak more pertinently of the edition of all the works of that author, than the abbot Gallois has done in the Journal des Savans, of the fourteenth of March, 1667. That edition consists of nineteen volumes in folio, and it came out at Lyons in the year 1665. That ingenious journalist having shewn, in a few words, the contents of each volume, gives his judgment on them in the following manner. 'It appears by the works of this author, that he was bold 'and peremptory, and that he had a lively imagination, and a prodigious memory. These natural 'endowments, together with an indefatigable application to study from his younger years, till he was 'seventy-nine years old, at which age he died, had made 'him one of the most learned men of his time. But 'he was too severe and satirical; for which reason 'many people hated him. His stile, tho' otherwise 'very neat, seems to be obscure, because he affects to 'use hard words and terms taken from the Greek. 'He has also sometimes some odd thoughts, as when 'being to treat of the goodness of our Saviour in a 'chapter of the second volume, he intitles it, Christus 'bonus, bona, bonum. His great reading furnishing 'him with an infinite variety of matter on all subjects, 'he often rambles from the subject in hand; as in his 'treatise de Rosa benedicta, a considerable part of 'which is taken up in examining after what manner Lent was kept in the primitive church. One 'may also observe that he did not give a free scope to 'his genius, being contented to mention what he had 'read in the antient authors, and often using their 'own words to express what he might perhaps have 'said better than they. Nevertheless, his works are 'worthy of esteem, and very useful to those who apply themselves to Divinity and Preaching (15).' The following words of the same abbot particularly concern the fifteenth and sixteenth volumes, intituled, Heteroclita Spiritualia. 'This author treats there of 'several suspected customs, which, thro' an excessive 'zeal, or thro' remissness, have been introduced 'into the worship of GOD, and of the saints, into the 'good works that are done to relieve the souls in purgatory, into the use of the sacraments, and into all 'other pious exercises. He examines all those doubtful acts of devotion with great severity: he condemns some, and approves others; and what he 'says is supported by many learned observations taken 'from Ecclesiastical History and the Fathers. He 'did particularly excel in treating such matters; for, 'being sharp and satirical, he never had better success than when he exercised his critical wit (16).' Let us further see what he says concerning the pieces that have not been inserted in the nineteen volumes. They have left out, of that collection, for some particular reasons, the Apologies against Hurtado, which he intituled Depilationes, because that monk belongs to an order, called in Italy Pelosi: and the book, wherein he enquires whether a man may confess his sins by letters; and that which is intituled Hipparchus, wherein he examines whether it be lawful for monks to trade. They have also left out the treatise de Immunitate Cyriacorum à censuris, against the Jacobins; and that which is intituled, Religio Bellarum, wherein the predetermination of the Thomists is confuted, and another written against Father Combefis. There are some other treatises of this author wanting in this collection, which may easily be known by the catalogue of his works, which he printed several times: he designed to make one volume of all those pieces, and intitle it Apopompæus, a name which the Jews gave to the victim which they loaded with curses, and sent into the wilderness, but death prevented his design (17). Father Southwell says, that the twentieth volume, intituled, Apopompæus, was actually printed after the author's death (18).

(15) Gallois, ibid.

(16) Ibid. pag. m. 122, 123.

(17) Ibid. pag. 124, 125.

(18) Tertium ex, quem Apopompæum vocant editorum adpost obitum The xiii, fine apparebit tione superiorum Societatis, unde hæc illum tanquam partum legitimum non agnoscit. Sotuel, ubi supra, p. 759. I have a copy of that Apopompæus, and there is in the title page, Tomus vigesimus & posthumus per Anonymum diversos, nunc primum in lucem prodit. Cracovie sumptibus Andreæ Sonerovic. Andreæ Sonerovic bibliopolæ 1669.

I must further add another passage of the abbot Gallois (19). The most remarkable pieces of the seventh volume, intituled, Marialia (20), is the second treatise, wherein the author vindicates the devotion of the Scapulary; and the fifth, which is sufficient to shew his great learning, and the fruitfulness of his wit. For being to preach upon the seven solemn anthems, which the church sings before Christmas, and which begin with the letter O; he took only that letter for the subject of his sermons; and that subject, tho' never so barren, afforded him a thousand fine things, of which that treatise is made up.

(19) Gallois, ubi supra, pag. 118, 119.

(20) Beside all the treatises contains, concern the perfection of the worship of the Virgin. Ibid. pag. 118.

[H] He was very much esteemed by Dr Patin.] 'Martinus Schookius, who has writ many books . . . 'is as learned as those ancient Sophists, who used to 'write and dispute about every thing that can be 'known. He and Coringius in Germany are the most 'learned men in Europe in that sort of learning and 'composure. Father Theophilus Raynaud exceeded 'them both; for he was a Jesuit, and understood his 'Romish and Loyolitical Theology perfectly well; 'but had it not been for that, and the respect he had 'for his superiors, he would have broke loose, and 'might have done more than three others, upon any 'subject whatsoever: for besides his great learning 'and wonderful memory, he gave to all his works 'such a perfection, as none but a great master could 'give (21).' Here is another passage. If you see Father

(21) Guy Patin, Letter cxxxvii. pag. 602. of the second Tome.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

with regard to his ſtile; he cenſures him unjuſtly [I]; for it is not true that he imitated Juſtus

Father Theophilus, pray give my ſervices to him, and aſk him when we ſhall ſee his anſwer to a book printed againſt him at Amſterdam, in 8vo, and intituled, Antidotus duplex contra duplex venenum, &c. 8vo. Hiſpali, 1637. The Printer has ſuppreſſed or diſguiſed the name of the town; for it has been printed in Holland, and not at Seville. I have ſent him a copy of it, for which he thanked me, and informed me that he would quickly anſwer it. I have ſeveral letters of that honeſt Father, and am one of his friends, and I am proud of it; for he is a very learned man, in genere multiplici, in ſeveral matters. I wiſh that he would publiſh many pieces that he has by him: there is a great deal of learning in all his books (22). Theſe praiſes are the more conſiderable, becauſe they are beſtowed by a man, who was more inclined to cenſure than commend, and who ſpoke freely of the faults which he thought he had found in the writings of that Jeſuit. I muſt quote him again. The author of the Sanctus Georgius Cappadox is an extraordinary and moſt learned man; only he ſets up for a Fiſhmonger on Eaſter-Eve, and affects to write in a manner that is out of uſe: nevertheleſs all his books are good, eſt enim vir multijugæ eruditionis ac infinitæ lectionis; - - - He is a man of great erudition, and infinite reading, as Grotius ſaid of the late Salmaſius. Father Raynaud's ſtile, redolet Lipſianum, quo tamen eſt multo deterior, - - - reſembles that of Lipſius, but is much worſe: there is no body now that writes ſo, except it be Dr Blondel, our Dean; who, tho' one of the moſt learned men in the world, affects that kind of barbariſm, ' & eadem ſcabie laborat cum Tertulliano, ' Lipſianus ſeu Lipſiomimus vel Lipſio minus, qualis ' aliquando fuit Erycius Puteanus, Petrus Gruterus, ' Theophylus Raynaudus, & pauci alii quos fama ' obſcura recondit (23). - - - and has the ſame fault as ' Tertullian, for he imitates Lipſius too much, as did ' heretofore Erycius Puteanus, Peter Gruterus, Theophilus ' Raynaud, and ſome others, whoſe names are buried in ' oblivion.' I confeſs I cannot apprehend upon what grounds Patin taxes that Jeſuit with affecting a broken and obſcure ſtile, and uſing many of thoſe obſolete expreſſions called Archaiſms. I have read ſeveral of his books, and I find that his ſtile is rather prolix than ſhort, and that it is free from the faults that are obſerved in Lipſius's ſtile, and in that of his imitators. It is true, that Father Raynaud does not write politely; but if his ſtile is rough and barbarous, it is not becauſe he affects old Latin phraſes, like thoſe of Plautus, or Greciſms (24), which are the delight of ſome learned men; it is rather becauſe he uſes a great many words borrowed from the ſchoolmen. Nay, I obſerve that he blamed one of his adverſaries for having uſed ſome Greek words: he was anſwered, that it was not for him to ſpeak of Greek, ſince he was ignorant of that language. ' Mira hominis Buccafœtidi audacia, ' cæcus cum ſit, vult de coloribus judicare, & cum ' prorſus idiota ſit Græci idiomatis, judicare de voci- ' bus Græcis . . . . quid vis apparere ferularius Mag. ' in utraque lingua? etſi enim Latinam bene calleas, ' at Græcam prorſus ignoras (25). - - - - It is a ſtrange ' piece of impudence for a blind man to pretend to judge ' of colours, and for one that is totally ignorant of the ' Greek tongue, to ſet up for a critic in Greek words; . . . ' What, would you ſet up for a Pedagogue in both lan- ' guages? Tho' you underſtand Latin very well, you are ' quite ignorant of the Greek.' His antagoniſt confeſſes that he underſtands the Latin tongue very well; but ſuch a confeſſion is of no great weight (26), ſince it was made by a man who was guilty of ſoleciſms in every page (27). Barbararum lexeon, & ſolœciſmorum tanta ubertas eſt in Hurtadi opere, ut ſi tenui diligentia adhibita, notare grammaticas ejus ſtribiligines liberet, totum pene ejus volumen eſſet exſcribendum. Vix tres lineas exarat, quin ſolœciſmis adeo pinguibus contaminet, ut miſerationem moveat (28). Thomas Hurtado . . . . vix unquam emiſit periodum qui non ſordeat ſtribiligine aliqua grammatica, & indigna colaphizatione Priſciani. Four examples of it are to be found in the ſame page. Deus expaveſcit nos (29): opus bene executum: debet populus magis exhortari ad communionem: agendum eſſe de tactis (30). There is at the end of the book (31) a liſt of his ſoleciſms and other faults againſt Grammar. Father Raynaud's adverſary made but a weak anſwer. I imitate the Fathers, ſaid he (32), Nonne in multis patribus inveniuntur ſimiles non ita vigoroſæ in latinitate locutiones? And he ſays (33), that John Buſæus drew up a liſt of above 250 barbariſms of Petrus Bleſenſis.

[I] Some are of opinion that Dr Patin praiſes him too much, and that, with regard to his ſtile, he cenſures him unjuſtly.] ' Theophilus Raynaud gave to all his ' works ſuch perfection, as none but great maſters can ' give. This judgment of Dr Patin is not altogether ' true. The character of perfection, which none but ' great maſters, ſuch as Petavius and Sirmondus, can ' give, was wanting in Theophilus Raynaud. His de- ' ſigns were odd, his learning without choice, and his ' ſtile, though good in it ſelf, was often ſpoiled with ' childiſh affectations. Beſides, the author was an unpo- ' lite man, and had no urbanity (34).'

I have already (35) refuted Dr Patin's opinion of Father Raynaud's ſtile; but I have ſomething elſe to ſay upon this ſubject. That Jeſuit obſerves that few people complained of the coarſeneſs of his ſtile. The only cenſurer he names is one Camerarius, who blamed him for uſing a harſh and bombaſtic ſtile, intermixed with barbarous words, and imitating Petronius and Apuleius rather than the Ciceronians. Non defuit, qui mei ſtyli ſqualorem opponeret. Arguebat ſanè Gulielmus Camerarius præfatione ad ſuam (ut inſcripſit) Antiquitatis de novitate victoriam, quod ſtylus ſcriptionum mearum ſcaber eſſet ac tumens: quod voces paſſim barbaras, & à nitore & lenitate Tulli alienas adhibèrem: Et quod Petronio potius ac Apulejo, tumidis & inflatis ſcriptoribus, quam probatæ latinitatis, ſtylique puri ac nativi Magiſtris, inter ſcribendum inhæſerim (36). I ſhall not mention what he anſwered in his vindication, but only name the book which he wrote in his defence. Diſſertatio hujus & aliarum Camerarii calumniarum depulſoria, edita eſt hoc titulo, Non cauſa, ut cauſa, ſubjuncta vera cauſa; Elenchus ſophiſmatis Gulielmi Camerarii Scoti (37). Ea lucubratione à pag. 16. quam ridicula ſit hæc criminatio, & quam abſurdum ſit voces è Nizolij Ciceroniana pinacotheca anxiè ſublegere, in Didacticis præſertim ſcriptionibus, (cujuſmodi ferè ſunt omnes noſtræ, eaque nominatim, adverſus quam Camerarii æſtus inferbuit,) plenè & accuratè demonſtratur. I add, that he continues to refute his adverſary in the ſame place, out of which I have taken this paſſage. His main argument conſiſts in the quotations from ſeveral Fathers of the church, who did not much trouble themſelves about the elegancy of the ſtile. He ſays (38), that St Auguſtin was very careleſs of it, and he refers us to Bernard Vindincus's Prolegomena ad Criticum Auguſtinianum caſtigatum, where there is a chapter concerning St Auguſtin's ſoleciſms and barbariſms. After all he does not own that Camerarius's cenſure is well grounded, and leaves it to the judgment of unprejudiced readers. Videor vaniſſimam & ineptiſſimam criminationem obtriviſſe multo pluribus quam neceſſitas poſtulabat. An verò Stylus Scriptionum mearum, adeò vel jaceat, vel horreat, quam ſibi fingit Camerarius cujus fuit hæc criminatio, pronuncient alii, affectu quo ille ducebatur liberi (39). If any one ſhould ſay that I have unjuſtly cenſured Dr Patin, I appeal likewiſe to all the readers duly qualified, who will peruſe the works of this Jeſuit with an unprejudiced mind. If they look into them, and read ſome pages here and there, I am ſure they will not ſay that he imitated Lipſius, and that he may be compared with Peter Gruterus, and Erycius Puteanus, as Patin will have it. I believe they will ſay that his ſtile is neither exact, polite, nor agreeable; but they will deny that it is conciſe, full of dark ellipſes, and obſolete phraſes, and very much affected. Any reader well ſkilled in the critical art, will eaſily perceive that the author I ſpeak of wrote haſtily, that he was very careleſs of his ſtile, that he did not correct his works, and conſequently that his printed words and phraſes may be looked upon as a faithful copy of his minutes; and that the firſt effuſions of his pen were alſo the firſt effuſions of his mind: ſo that his bad Latin, whether it be too ancient or too new, ought not to be accounted an affectation, or an artifice, but a natural production. He was a man of a vaſt memory; he had read in his youth the claſſic authors, and afterwards, with greater application, the Eccleſiaſtical writers, the Philoſophers, and the modern Divines. His memory being full of the phraſes of all thoſe authors, readily ſupplied his pen; ſo that

(22) Ibid. Letter CCIX, pag. 230, of the ſame volume. See alſo Letter CCXLV, pag. 372, of the ſame volume.

(23) Ibid. Letter 173, pag. 65, of the ſame volume.

(24) Mr Gallois, above, citation (18), taxes him with affecting to uſe words derived from the Greek.

(25) Thomas Hurtado, in duplici Antidoto, pag. 453.

(26) See Hurtado, ibid. pag. 10.

(27) Leodeg. Quintinus, apud Hurtado, Antid. pag. 437.

(28) Idem, apud eundem, pag. 10.

(29) Makes us afraid.

(30) Of the touches.

(31) See Hurtado, ubi ſupra, pag. 437.

(32) Ibid. pag. 439.

(33) Ibid.

(34) Vigneul Marville, Melanges d'Hiſtoire, Tom. ii, pag. 303, Rotterdam Edit. 1700.

(35) In the foregoing remark.

(36) Theoph. Raynaud. Syntagm. de Libris propriis, pag. 6. Apopompæi, col. 2.

(37) Ibid.

(38) Ibid. pag. 8, col. 2.

(39) Ibid. pag. 10, col. 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Juſtus Lipſius, that he hunted after old words, and that he was fond of obſcure and antiquated phraſes, which has been the fault of ſome authors, for which they have been juſtly that without much thinking, ſometimes a word of Plautus came out, or an expreſſion of Lucretius, Petronius, Aulus Gellius, Apuleius, or Macrobius; ſometimes an expreſſion of Tertullian, Arnobius, St Hilary, or Sidonius Apollinaris; ſometimes an expreſſion of St Bernard, or of the commentators upon Lombard, or of the Angelical Doctor, &c. But the common and moſt uſual words offered themſelves more frequently, and he took what came out firſt: and conſequently, his ſtile is not affected; old words and barbarous expreſſions came into it naturally, but not in great numbers, and the author took no care to correct and poliſh his ſtile: he left it ſuch as he found it, when he read his writings over again. But if I was miſtaken in this, at leaſt the main part of my criticiſm would be unqueſtionable; for there were never two authors more unlike in point of ſtile, than Theophilus Raynaud and Juſtus Lipſius. The latter affected to end his periods at every line, and to leave out ſeveral words, which the reader was to ſupply and gueſs at. But the Jeſuit is rather diffuſe than conciſe, and not at all obſcure for want of words: his periods are long and full.

A CENSURE upon thoſe who affect to make uſe of old words.

It is ſtill a greater piece of injuſtice to compare him to Peter Gruterus; for this Gruterus was not an author who now and then dropped obſolete words; but he heaped them up upon one another with a ridiculous affectation, and took as much pains to gather thoſe old rags as Bembus and Manutius did to write politely. I cannot tell whether ſuch an affectation betrays more vanity or want of judgment; but it is certain, that thoſe who affect ſuch a ſtile, fancy that their readers will have a great opinion of their learning, and that being under a continual neceſſity to conſult a good Dictionary they will admire them the more for it. Men of ſenſe have always condemned this humour. The raillery which Phavorinus made uſe of againſt a young man, who was a great lover of old faſhioned words, is admirable. If you deſign not to be underſtood, ſaid he to him, why do not you hold your tongue? And if you love antiquity, pleaſe yourſelf by living a good life as our anceſtors did; but ſpeak as men do now. ‘ Favorinus philoſophus adoleſcenti veterum verborum ‘ cupidiſſimo, & pleraſque voces nimis priſcas & igno- ‘ tiſſimas in quotidianis communibuſque ſermonibus ‘ expromenti, Curius, inquit, & Fabricius, & Coruncanius antiquiſſimi viri noſtri, & his antiquiores ‘ Horatii illi trigemini, planè ac dulicidè cum ſuis ‘ fabulati ſunt: neque Auruncorum, aut Sicanorum, ‘ aut Pelaſgorum, qui primi incoluiſſe Italiam dicuntur, ſed ætatis ſuæ verbis locuti ſunt, tu autem, proinde quaſi cum matre Evandri nunc loquare, ſermone abhinc multis annis jam deſito uteris, quod ſcire atque intelligere neminem vis, quæ dicas. Nonne, homo inepte, ut quod vis abunde conſequaris, taceres? ſed antiquitatem tibi placere ais, quod honeſta & bona & ſobria & modeſta ſit, vive ergo moribus præteritis; loquere verbis præſentibus (40). Favorinus the Philoſopher, obſerving a young man to be very fond of uſing obſolete and unknown words in common diſcourſe; Curius, ſaid he, Fabricius, and Coruncanius, theſe very old Romans, and the three Horaces who lived before them, diſcourſed to their cotemporaries in the moſt eaſy and plain language. They uſed not the words of the Aurunci, the Sicani, or the Pelaſgi, who are ſaid to have been the firſt inhabitants of Italy, but ſpoke the language then in uſe: but you, as if you were converſing with Evander's mother, make uſe of a language diſguiſed for many years, becauſe you would have no body underſtand what you ſay. Fool that you are, that you may gain your end more compleatly, would it not be better for you to hold your tongue altogether? But you ſay that the Antients pleaſe you, becauſe they were virtuous, diſcreet, and modeſt; live then as the Antients did, and ſpeak as the Moderns do.' He concludes with referring him to a precept of Julius Cæſar, that obſolete words ought to be ſhunned as a rock (41). The emperor Auguſtus was much of the ſame mind; he could not bear that Tiberius ſhould uſe any old words (42), and he called Marc Antony a mad man becauſe he affected to be rather admired than underſtood (43). We read in Aulus Gellius, that an advocate of his time was hiſſed at becauſe he uſed unintelligible words (44). There aroſe in the XVIth century a certain faction of Grammarian Antiquarians, whom the moſt learned men oppoſed with all their might, to prevent their growth, and the corruption of the Latin tongue. Paſſeratius made a ſpeech on purpoſe againſt that faction. ‘ Exorti ſunt, ſays he (45), ‘ his annis viginti proximis, non diſſimili laborantes ‘ inſania, novi quidam Antonii, utinam minus multi, ‘ quorum cauſſa, ne quid diſſimulem, hanc præfati- ‘ unculam inſtitui. Si quidem me facturum operæ ‘ pretium putavi, ſi iſtum animi morbum vel arte ali- ‘ qua perſanarem, quod in iis difficillimum eſt, qui ſic ‘ ægrotare malunt quàm valere, vel aliqua ex parte ‘ imminuerem: idque ſaltem aſſequerer ne hæc apud ‘ noſtros latius ſerpat contagio. - - - - Within the laſt twenty years there have appeared ſome new Antonius's, with almoſt the ſame turn of madneſs, (I wiſh indeed their number had been leſs) for whoſe ſake, to tell the truth, I have written this ſhort preface. I ſhall think my pains well rewarded, if by any method I can either remedy the diſeaſe of the underſtanding, which I am ſure muſt be extreamly difficult to do, in perſons who are pleaſed with their diſtemper, and chuſe it; or in any degree diminiſh it: at leaſt, if I can be ſo happy as to prevent the infection from ſpreading any farther among us.' Afterwards he ſays, that nothing appeared too much antiquated to thoſe, whom he had a mind to reclaim; and they endeavoured to find out ſome words older than the verſes of the Salii. ‘ Sordent ‘ nobis Tullius, Cæſar, Terentius: Valerii Antiatis, ‘ Cincii, Cælii, Piſonis, Fabii Pictoris, Quadriga- ‘ rii, Siſennæ annales requirimus. Unde tam delica- ‘ tum faſtidium? Cato, & Varro, vix ad ſtomachum ‘ faciunt: vix aviditatem noſtram explent primi Conſulum faſces, & faſtorum incunabula: Decemvirales ‘ tabulas, leges regias, Saliare carmen, icta cum ‘ Sabinis fœdera, Fecialium jura formulaſque tranſcendimus, ut penetremus in fermonem Abori- ‘ ginum, tanquam ſimus cum Egeria Numæ, aut ‘ cum Evandri Carmenta loquuturi (46). - - - We deſpiſe Tully, and Ceſar, and Terence, and want the annals of Valerius Antias, Cincius, Cælius, Piſo, Fabius Pictor, Quadrigarius, Siſenna. Whence this delicate loathing? Cato and Varro can ſcarce go down with us: the times of the firſt conſuls, and the beginnings of the Roman calendars will hardly ſatisfy us; we go beyond the tables of the Decem Viri, the laws of the kings, the verſes of the Salii, the leagues made with the Sabines, and the rites and forms of the Heralds, that we may penetrate to the language of the Aborigines; as if we were to talk with Numa's Egeria or Evander's Carmenta.' Thoſe men had willingly blotted out a Ciceronian phraſe in their compoſures, to put in the room of it an expreſſion taken from Pacuvius's fragments, or found in

Verſibu' quas olim Faunus vateſque canebant,
Cum neque Muſarum ſcopulos quiſquam ſuperarat
Nec dicti ſtudioſus erat (47).

Such verſes bards in antient ages ſung,
As Faunus wrote, when Poetry was young,
E're man the Muſes high abodes cou'd trace,
Or words were weigh'd to give the numbers grace.

They deſerved to be called mortuaria gloſſaria (48). Horace complained of ſuch a depravity; which I obſerve in order to ſhew, that the ſame depravations of taſte revive from time to time.

Sic fautor veterum, ut tabulas peccare vetantes,
Quas bis quinque viri ſanxerunt: fœdera regum
Vel Gabiis, vel cum rigidis æquata Sabinis:
Pontificum libros: annoſa volumina vatum,
Dictitet Albano Muſas in monte locutas (49).

Thus old-loves do admire the ancient laws,
The Sabines Leagues have their deſerv'd applauſe;
On muſty leaves at awful diſtance look,
Age makes it rev'rend, and exalts the book:

Give

(40) Aulus Gellius, lib. i, cap. x.

(41) Id quod à C. Cæſare excellentis ingenii ac prudentiæ viro, in primo de Analogia libro, ſcriptum eſt, habe ſemper in memoria atque in pectore, ut tamquam ſcopulum, ſic fugias inſolens verbum. Ibid.

(42) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. lxxxvi.

(43) M. quidem Antonium ut inſanum increpat; quaſi ea ſcribentem quæ mirentur potius homines quam intelligant. Ibid.

(44) Aulus Gellius, lib. x, cap. xv.

(45) Paſſerat. Præfat. in Cicer. Epiſt. ad Hirtium & Cæſarem, pag. m. 171.

(46) Ibid. pag. 175.

(47) Ennius, apud Ciceronem de Oratore, fol. 125, D; & in Bruto, fol. 103, C.

(48) Mera eſtis, ut M. Cato ait, mortuaria gloſſaria. Nam qui colligitis ſcitula, res tetras & inanes & frivolas, tamquam mulierum voces præficarum. Aul. Gell. lib. xviii, cap. viii.

(49) Horat. Epiſt. I, Lib. ii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google justly censured by men of judgment. I give some instances of it (d). He abused the Jansenists, and they did not spare him in their turn [K]. His enemies spread strange reports

(d) In the remark [I].

Give him the bards old songs, oh rare! divine!
I swear 'tis good, a Muse sang ev'ry line.
CREECH.

Passeratius was not the only man who exclaimed against those false Antiquarians: I have metioned in another place in this Dictionary (50) a satirical piece, wherein they were ridiculed, and their condemnation may be found in Father Caussin's Rhetoric (51). I could name several other learned men (52), who could not bear that fondness for old words, and who revived the complaints made against Sallust. If they did not spare that ancient Historian, they must needs have been more incensed against the Moderns. 'Quid, quod è quibusdam Sallustianis verbis tanta sollicitudine inter prisci sermonis maceriem & ruinas conquisitis, & in illa ipsa tam laudata compositione nonnulla prolatu & intellectu sunt nova, quædam putidiuscula & pumicata, quædam ita scrupea, ut in ea vox impingat se tanquam in saxea fragmina vetustatis (53). - - - What shall we say of this, that even in that celebrated composition of Sallust, among the words which he has picked up with so much care from amidst the barrenness and ruins of the old language, some are new, both with respect to their pronunciation and sense, some too affected, and smooth, and some so rugged that the voice dashes upon them, as if it were upon the rocky fragments of antiquity.' These are the words of a very polite writer. He had before declared that words grown out of date ought to be avoided. (54) 'Pertimescunt (verba humilis dicendi generis) sociari verbis rubiginosis, spinosis, nimium reconditis & abstrusis, tum intermortuis & conclamatis;

(50) Remark [F], of the article ACCURSIUS (MARIANGELUS.)

(51) Vide Caussinum de Eloquentia sacra & humana, lib. ii, cap. x, & xxii, pag. m. 95, 121.

(52) See Philip Pareus, in Vita Davidis Parei, pag. m. 18.

(53) Carolus Paschalius, de optimo genere Elocutionis, pag. 153.

(54) Ibid. pag. 129.

Quæ priscis memorata Catonibus, atque Cethegis
Nunc situs informis premit, & deserta vetustas *.

* Horat. lib. ii, Epist. II, ver. 117.

'These (he means words of a low stile) will not bear to be joined with rusty and harsh sounding words, nor with such as are abstruse and unintelligible, or in a manner dead and buried.

Us'd by the Antients, tho' consum'd by rage
Of eating time, and grown deform'd with age.
CREECH.

But take notice that this polite author is too rigid a censurer of the Historian Sallust, and trust rather to Passeratius, who has very well distinguished the excessive affectation of the Moderns from the liberty that Sallust took (55). I am not ignorant that Asinius Pollio found fault with Sallust for using too many old words (56), but perhaps, instead of being so severe a critic, he should have thanked him for the pains he had been at to revive some words, and prevent their loss in the Roman language. We have reason to wish that our great authors would do the same office to many French words which they suffer to be lost. If they vouchsafed to make use of them, they would put a stop to prescription, young writers would be encouraged to use them, and it would preserve the copiousness of the language. Virgil did so, and Horace advised to do the same.

Obscurata diu populo bonus eruet atque
Proferet in lucem speciosa vocabula rerum
Quæ priscis memorata Catonibus (57).

Good words, now grown obscure, bring gently forth,
Relieve them from the dark, and shew their worth,
Us'd by the Antients, - - - - - - -

That is, 'he will revive some words that have been dead long ago among the people, and will bring into light again those expressive and energical terms that were in use in the time of Cethegus and Cato, and which lie at present buried under the ruins of antiquity.' See the margin (58).

(55) Passerat. Præf. in Catilinam Sallustii, pag. 181.

(56) Asinius Pollio in libro quo Sallustii scripta reprehendit, ut nimis priscorum verborum affectatione oblita. Sueton. de illustr. Gram. cap. x.

(57) Horat. Epist. II, lib. ii, ver. 115. See, above, citat. *.

(58) Propriis (verbis) dignitatem dat antiquitas, namque & sanctiorem & magis admirabilem faciunt orationem quibus non quilibet fuerat usurus: eoque ornamento acerrimi judicii P. Virgilius unicè est usus . . . sed utendum modo in ex ultimis tenebris repetenda. Quintil. lib. viii, cap. iii, pag. m. 364, 365.

I do not believe, that there are now many people in France like those whom Passeratius had a mind to reclaim. However, I have read the following words in a book printed in the year 1685. 'There is a 'sort of learned men, whom I should suspect, as those 'who intervened in the petition of the late Dr Blondel. Those men spend their lives upon Seneca and 'Plautus, to find out some Archaisms, in order to 'make fine theses, very moral and impenetrable, and 'proof against all vocabularies (59).' This Dr Blondel is one of the authors whom Dr Patin compared with Theophilus Raynaud, which is an unjust comparison; for the books of that Jesuit may be very well understood without being obliged every moment to consult Nonius Marcellus, or Laurenbergius's Antiquarius, or even Calepinus. Neither is it true, that he stuffed his books with Greek words. It was an usual thing among the most learned Philologers. Casaubon is an instance of it in his letters. Balzac did not approve that custom (60).

(59) Factum pour Maître Nicolas Postel, ou Dissertation sur les Peripneumonies, p. 203. See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Jan. 1686, pag. 34.

(60) See his Latin Letters, pag. 170, & seq.

[K] The Jansenists did not spare him in their turn.] His eighteenth volume contains the pieces which he wrote against Father Gibieuf, Mr Arnauld, Mr de Launoi, and some others. It cannot be denied that he often expressed too much bitterness against them. Wherefore it is said, that he had resolved to leave out many things in those works, if death had not prevented it (61). These last words of the Journalist are only an officious lie; for it is not at all likely, that the last edition of Father Raynaud's works should not be conformable to his intention. Read the following passage of a Jansenist, who observes that our Jesuit died without giving any satisfaction to those whom he had so much abused. 'Father Theophilus Raynaud was a Savoyard (62), 'who having been admitted into the society of the Je'suits at sixteen years of age, died in their society, 'being above eighty years old. He was once about 'to leave them, because he had been very ill used by 'them; inter aspera quæ subinde patiebatur, &c. say 'the Jesuits themselves in the catalogue of their 'writers. He could not expect it could be otherwise, 'since he had written several books against the bad 'morals of the society, such as that which is intituled, 'Theophili Eugenii Protocatastasis seuprima Societatis Jesu institutio restauranda, wherein he gives the plan of 'a reformation he wishes would be made to restore the 'order to it's first purity; and another intituled, 'Hipparchus, of the Religious Merchant, against the 'trafficking which prevailed every where in the society. 'They disown likewise a treatise, de Exsolutione à votis, which, say they, was not approved by his 'superiors, and contains something concerning St Ignatius, which is not true; as also what he wrote 'in his book against Julius Clemens Scotus, an Italian, who had left the order of the Jesuits, that the 'declarations upon the constitutions of the Jesuits were 'not made by St Ignatius, but by Father Lainez, 'the second general. It was probably one of the two 'first books which occasioned his being imprisoned 'by the Jesuits for a considerable time. He was free 'and bold in his opinions, biting and satirical in his 'way of writing, and had a great conceit of himself; 'as it appears from what he said, when he mentioned 'the commendation that an heretical writer had given 'him, That it was the only truth that man had ever 'spoke. What he did the year of his jubilee, in the 'society, is also a singular thing. He celebrated a 'very pompous mass, and a Jesuit getting into the 'pulpit, made his panegyric in his presence. This 'Father was certainly a man of prodigious reading. 'Twenty volumes in folio of his printed works shew 'with what ease he could write. It were to be wished 'he had writ also with judgment, prudence, modesty, 'and charity, and only out of love for truth. The 'world then had not seen so many books full of invectives and extravagant calumnies against many 'private persons, such as the infamous libel, intituled, 'Arnauld of Bresse, revived in Arnauld of Paris, 'nor the book full of falsities and bitterness, which 'he published against the whole order of St Dominic, with this title, De immunitate Autorum Cyriacorum à Censura: Diatribæ Petri à Valle clausa 'S. T. D. This work was condemned at Rome, as 'well

(61) Journal des Sçavans, ubi supra, pag. 124.

(62) This is not exact; he was born a subject of the duke of Savoy, but not in Savoy.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ports concerning the manner of his death; which are mentioned and refuted by Monconys [L]. I have something to say against Moreri [M]. For the rest, Father Theophilus Raynaud has often disguised his name in the titles of his books [N].

The

'well as several others like these, De Communione pro Mortuis: De Martyrio per pestem: De censura bonorum & malorum librorum; and the twentieth volume, which his friends printed after his death. . . . . This Father died at Lyons of an Apoplexy the last day of October, 1663, without ever giving any satisfaction for the slanders, injurious words, and calumnies that are so frequent in many of his books (63).'

[L] His enemies spread abroad strange reports . . . . . which are . . . . refuted by Monconys.] The following passage is somewhat long; but it is no matter: there are some things in it which perhaps the relator did not believe. 'When I told him (64) that I was a native of Lyons, he immediately asked me some news about the death of Father Theophilus Raynaud. I told him that I happened to be at Lyons when he died, and that my brother, who was come from Paris, when he was cut for the stone, had often discoursed with me about him. He then shewed me a letter of Father Henschenius, whose library I had seen at Antwerp, wherein he acquainted him, that the Jacobins had spread a report in Flanders, and at Rome, that Father Theophilus died mad; that the Jesuits had deprived him of the sacraments; that he run up and down their convent of Lyons, crying out like a damned man, Philistini super me, - - - The Philistines are upon me; and that having been buried Sepultura Asini, - - - like an ass, he had been found unburied the next day, his body being livid all over, because the devils had beat him all night. I told him that it was a gross calumny, and a ridiculous report; for the good man had left off saying mass for a fortnight out of weakness, and communicated every day. He had made three general confessions to Father du Lieu the week that he died. Nay, the very morning of the day that he departed this life, which happened last year on All-Saints eve, having had several warnings of it, he took his leave thrice of the brother who helped him to dress himself, assuring him that he should give him no more trouble; and returning from the chapel where he had heard mass, and communicated, he told a brother, whom he met, that he had begged of God that he might be in Heaven on All-Saints day; and presently after, about half an hour after the communion, as he was going into his chamber, he expired in the arms of another good brother. Thus he fulfilled his prophecy, that he should die in his cassock, and in his chamber, both which he loved so well, that no persecution could bring him off from the state of life he had pitched upon in his younger years, having never left the solitude of his cell for the space of sixty years, but to do some acts of charity; as for instance, to confess the meanest peasant at any time. I told him that the church of Lyons had performed a solemn service for him in St Justus's chapel, where a council was held; that the Carmelites and Carthusians had done the like at Lyons, and so had all the order, and that the congregation of the gentlemen of Lyons had said the office in their chapel, and had assisted at his obsequies in a body. I told him, that my brother himself, who did not easily believe revelations, had often told me, that when Father Theophilus was in great trouble at Avignon, on account of his book de Negotiatore Religioso, a barefooted Carmelite having recommended him to the prayers of a Carmelite nun, who is accounted a holy woman at Avignon, without telling her his name; that nun answered him, that the person for whom he desired her prayers, was one of the most learned men of the church, and very acceptable to God; but that in order to exercise his virtue, and increase his merit, our Lord had mortified him in that very thing, to which he was most attached, viz. in his books, whereof the whole glory and reward were reserved for him after his death; and that then all the provinces of the world would eagerly seek for them. As I perceived that he heard me with a great deal of pleasure, I added what the Prior Jugeact of Lyons had told me of Father Theophilus's modesty, which his adversaries should imitate, viz. that he had refused the bishopric of Geneva, after the death of the nephew of the blessed (Francis de Sales); that Don Felix of Savoy, and the whole senate of Chambery, having obtained the consent of duke Charles Emanuel, Father Theophilus was the only man that opposed it, which he did so earnestly, that they were forced to desist. This the said Prior told me he was certainly informed of; and that he himself was a witness of an act of yet a more heroic virtue; for having orders from the late archbishop of Bourdeaux, and some others, to offer some benefices, and a yearly pension of two thousand livres to Father Theophilus, during the time of his adversity, with a city-security at Lyons, if he would but write in favour of a certain doctrine; Father Theophilus kissing his cassock, answered Mr Jugeact in these fine words, that he had rather die under persecution in that habit, than live an easy life, and deficient in the fidelity he had vowed to God (65).' If the monks do not scruple to spread such reports against a Jesuit, it is no wonder if they have published so many false stories concerning the death of Luther, Calvin, &c.

(63) Addition à la III Lettre du Prince de Conti au Pere de Champs, pag. 69, Cologne 1689.

(64) That is, a Jesuit of Landsberg in Bavaria.

(65) Monconys, Voyages, Part II, pag. 386, & seq. Lyon 1665, ad ann. 1664.

[M] I have something to say against Moreri.] I. The best part of what he says being taken word for word from the Journal des Savans (66), he should have acquainted the readers with it. It is an omission for which he deserves to be called a Plagiary, and these words of Pliny may be applied to him: 'Obnoxii profecto animi & infelicis ingenii est deprehendi in furto malle, quam mutuum reddere (67). - - - - It is a sign of a bad mind, and of an unlucky genius, to chuse rather to be caught stealing, than to return what one has borrowed.' II. It is not true that Father Theophilus intended to intitle the collection of his books Apopompæus, which is the name the Jews gave to the victim, that they loaded with curses, and sent into the wilderness; but it was not thought proper to make use of such a title. The title Apopompæus was only intended for the collection of some pieces, which the author did not insert in his nineteen volumes. We have seen, above, Mr Gallois's words, which are so plain that I cannot apprehend how Moreri could mistake the sense of them. Must not this Jesuit have been out of his wits, if he had chosen to give this title to all his works? He kept that title for some forbidden pieces, as Father Southwell informs us; which shews that Moreri is guilty of another omission. III. The works of Theophilus Raynaud were not printed in the year 1667, the edition of them was finished in 1665. Moreri fell into this mistake, because that collection is mentioned in the Journal des Sçavans of the 14th of March 1667. This should oblige the Journalists always to insert the year of the impression. They did not do it at first, especially when they were afraid of discovering thereby that they spoke of a book which had lost the grace of novelty. IV. It is not true, that our Jesuit lived in the XVIth century. This fault is only to be found in the second edition of Holland.

(66) The Journal of the 14th of March 1667, which I have quoted above, remark [G].

(67) Plin. in Præfat.

[N] He often disguised his name in the title of his books.] This will afford matter to Mr Baillet in the fine collection we expect from him, concerning authors who have appeared in print under false names. He doubts (68) whether our Jesuit took the name of Anselmus Solerius in the book de pileo, ceterisque capitis tegminibus; but since that book is to be found in the 13th volume of the works of this Father (69), we may be sure that he is the author of it. Placcius (70) is in the wrong to believe that it came out at first without any name, in the Lyons edition, in the year 1655, in 4to, dedicated ad Petrum de Macerat; but that in the Amsterdam edition 1671, in 12mo, it was printed with the name of Anselmus Solerius Cimmelienſis. It is certain that in the Lyons edition of the year 1655, the author called himself Anselmus Solerius Cemelienſis, dedicating his book ad Petrum de Maridat. So that it appears that Placcius was ignorant of several things upon this head: he did not know the names that appeared in the first edition: Macerat is a meer chimera; Maridat is the true name of a counsellor in the great

(68) In the list placed at the end of his book, intituled, Autarii deguisæ.

(69) See Sorel, ubi supra, pag. 758.

(70) Placcius, de Anonymis, num. 602, pag. 130.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The Carmelites praiſe him very much, and paid funeral honours to him, in all the convents of their order, in the year 1663 (e), on account of the book he had written concerning the Scapulary, which one of them publiſhed with many alterations [O]. He publiſhed a catalogue of his works, which was very acceptable to the curious. It is a very good piece in its kind: it was printed by itſelf; but it was ſince prefixed to the 20th volume of his works, which is intituled, Apopompæus. One may find in that catalogue the occaſion and ſubject of each book of that writer, and the names of thoſe who wrote againſt them, what was replied by the author, and ſuch like particulars, very pleaſing to thoſe who love the hiſtory of books and authors. It were to be wiſhed that a chronological order had been more carefully obſerved in it, which is a matter of no little importance. We find in that catalogue, that ſuch a book is the firſt that the author publiſhed; another the ſecond, the third, and ſo on; but neither the year, nor the place of the impreſſion, nor the number, nor the dates of the ſeveral editions, appear in it. Thoſe, who thought that the Bookſeller, who undertook to print all the works of that Jeſuit in twenty volumes in folio, would be ruined by it, were very much miſtaken [P].

(e) Papebroch. Réponſ. ad Exhibit. Error. p. 117.

(71) Note, that this word ſignifies a native of Cemelia. It was an epiſcopal city, which has been ruined long ago. The epiſcopal ſee has been united to that of Nice. See Theophilus Raynaud, de Libris propriis, pag. m. 29.

(72) A Spaniſh monk of the order of Citeaux. He publiſhed this chronicle of Flavius Dexter with a commentary at Lyons, in 1627.

(73) Placcius, in Pſeudonymorum Catalogo, num. 294, pag. 185.

(74) Theoph. Raynaudus, de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 220, pag. m. 139.

(75) Ibid. num. 296, pag. 164.

(76) See the article BARNES, remark [D].

(77) Printed at Dijon in 4to, in the year 1655.

(78) Above, citation (22).

(79) See the preface of the Duplex Antidotus, Article I.

great council: Anſelmus Solerius Cemelienſis (71) was a falſe name under which our Theophilus concealed himſelf. The ſame Placcius charges him, without any reaſon, with a kind of contradiction (this I obſerve by the by) about the Chronicle of Flavius Dexter. Illud (Chronicon) ab ipſo BIVARIO (72), vel VIVARIO confictum credidere Gabriel Pennóttus & Matthæus Raderus, contra quos ipſe tamen Apologiis ſeſe binis defendit quas approbant Carolus Viſch Bibl. Ciſtercienſis p. 114. & Th. Raynaud. de mal. & bon. lib. pag. 139. ſibi fere contrarius pag. 164 (73). They are Placcius's words: he pretends that our Jeſuit having approved, pag. 139, the Apologies of the Spaniſh Monk, diſapproves them, pag 164. But there is no ſuch thing: he deſpiſes them plainly enough, pag. 164, and more clearly ſtill, pag. 139. 'Flavii Dextri Chronicon 'nuper vulgatum, ſuppoſitum fuiſſe Dextro, latè contendit Gabriel Pennotus in Canonicorum Regularium 'Hiſtoria. Quamvis enim, ipſo S. Hieronymo teſte, 'ratum ſit, Flavium Dextrum ſcripſiſſe Chronicon 'quod eidem D. Hieronymo inſcripſerit; tamen hoc 'Chronicon nuper vulgatum, illud ipſum eſſe genui- 'num, cujus S. Hieronymus meminit, multa ſunt quæ 'diſſuadent Nec quæ adversùs libri illius ſuppoſi- 'tionem proferunt Bivarius commentator ac defenſor, '& Melchior Inchofer lib. pro epiſtola Deiparæ ad Meſ- 'ſanenſes à cap. 42. ad 46. explent revera legentis ani- 'mum (74). - - - - Gabriel Pennotus, in his hiſtory of 'the regular canons, ſtrongly contends, that the Chronicon 'of Flavius Dexter, newly publiſhed, was falſly aſcribed 'to Dexter. For although, on the teſtimony of St Jerom 'himſelf, it was evident that Flavius Dexter had writ- 'ten a Chronicle, which he had dedicated to this ſaint; 'yet there were many reaſons for believing that the Chro- 'nicle then newly publiſhed was not the genuine one which 'St Jerom mentions, nor do thoſe arguments that have 'been brought by Bivarius his commentator and defender, 'and by Melchior Inchofer, to prove this book genuine, 'throughly ſatisfy the mind of the reader.' This is what he ſays, pag. 139; and the following words are to be found, pag 164. 'Flavii Dextri Chronicon quod 'nuper prodiit, magna excitavit diſſidia. Aliquod 'Chronicon verè fuiſſe à Dextro conſcriptum, conſtat, 'cùm S. Hieronymus ejus ſibi à Dextro inſcripti me- 'minerit; ſed an id quod nuper prodiit, ſit verum 'illud Dextri Chronicon, controverſia eſt. Multi hoc 'Chronicon eſſe ſuppoſitum ab aliquo, cui honor gen- 'tis ſuæ cordi eſſet, contendunt, & acriter Pennotus 'in Canonicorum Regularium hiſtoria (75). - - - - The 'Chronicle of Flavius Dexter, lately publiſhed, has been 'the occaſion of great diſputes. It is plain, that there 'was a Chronicle written by Dexter, ſince St Jerom 'makes mention of it's being dedicated to him by Dexter 'himſelf; but whether that which was lately publiſhed, 'is the real Chronicle of Dexter, is ſtill a matter of con- 'troverſy. There are many who contend that this Chro- 'nicle has been the ſuppoſititious work of ſome perſon who 'had it at heart to advance the honour of his country, 'and Pennotus has ſtrenuouſly defended this opinion.*' This Jeſuit took the name of Stephanus Emonerius when he wrote againſt Barnes in favour of equivocations (76); and that of J. Heribertus Cemelienſis in his Latin treatiſe concerning eunuchs (77); and that of Leodegarius Quintinus Hæduus writing againſt Hurtado, &c. This Hurtado was a Spaniſh monk, who got the book that is mentioned by Patin, printed at Amſterdam (78): there is ſome (79) raillery in it upon the titles that Father Raynaud gave to his books. But, by his favour, thoſe titles were ſometimes ingenious: Who would not read a work, intituled Heteroclita Spiritualia, & Anomala pietatis? which is the title of the 15th and 16th volumes of the works of that Jeſuit. Well! will ſome ſay, there are heteroclites in Religion as well as in Grammar? and anomalies in it as well as in the Moon?

Some have been of opinion that Amadæus Guimenius, whoſe works have made ſo great a noiſe on account of their looſe morality, was no other than Father Theophilus. Father Baron went upon that ſuppoſition in all the ſecond part of his Manuductio ad moralem Theologiam (80); but having ſince found that the book of Amadæus, which he refuted, was written by a Spaniſh author, he retracted it in his preface. And certainly, adds Mr Gallois, Guimenius's book has but little affinity with the ſtile and manner of Father Raynaud. Note, that by other means it came to be known that this piece was written by the Jeſuit Moya, confeſſor to the queen of Spain; the difference of ſtile, which is one way of deceiving, did not prevent Father Raynaud from being publickly charged with it, nor did it juſtify him.

(80) Gallois, Journal des Sçavans, April 12, 1666, pag. m. 39.

[O] A Carmelite publiſhed one of Raynaud's books, with many alterations.] Poor poſthumous works! and you manuſcripts that come from remote countries: How can we be ſure that nothing has been added to or cut off from you, ſince a manuſcript of Father Raynaud was ſo much altered by a Carmelite during the author's life, and almoſt at his door? This Jeſuit had diſplayed all his learning to maintain the Scapulary of Simon Stock; but the chief of thoſe concerned, were not ſatisfied with his performance: for which reaſon they mangled ſome parts of his book moſt wretchedly, and made ſome additions to it. He expreſſed his indignation for it in the following words: 'Hoc opuſculum (Scapulare Stochianum illuſtratum & 'defenſum) quale Pariſiis è meo M. S. prodiit anno '1654, apud Antonium Padelore, abjudico tamquam 'ſpurium & alienum; Irruit enim in illud Leo, à quo 'miſerè deformatum eſt, dicam diſcerptum & lacera- 'tum. Reciſa pleriſque locis, me inconſulto, multa; 'addita ex mente interpolatoris alia, quæ planè im- 'probo. Titulus ipſe libri, (ut ab ipſo limine fieret 'perverſionis exordium) immutatus eſt; ita ut quod 'Hincmarus ſenior juniori exprobrabat, admiſſa in 'ipſo aditu ceſpitatione, non potuerit expectari pro- 'greſſio felicior. Hiat paſſim oratio, ob prætermiſ- 'ſionem vel reciſionem unius aut alterius voculæ, men- 'da ubique denſa. Sic reperitur gratia (81)? - - - - 'This work, as it was printed from my manuſcript at 'Paris, in the year 1654, by Antony Padelore, I entirely 'reject and diſown as ſpurious and falſe; for the paw 'of the lion has been upon it, and has wretchedly de- 'faced and mangled it, I may ſay, has quite torn it to 'pieces. Many paſſages have been eraſed, without con- 'ſulting me, and many others have been added from the 'interpolator's own fancy, which I abſolutely diſapprove 'of. And that they might begin their ruinous work at the 'very threſhold, the title it ſelf has been changed; ſo 'that I may reproach him as Hincmarus the elder re- 'proached the younger, ſince they ſtumbled at the firſt ſet- 'ting out, it was not to be expected that their journey 'would be more proſperous. The ſenſe is frequently imper- 'fect, by one or more words being left out, or cut off, and 'the faults are every way numerous. Is my kindneſs thus 'repaid?'

(81) Theoph. Raynaudus, in Syntagm. de Libris propriis, num. 72, pag. m. 70, 71.

[P] Thoſe who believed that the Bookſeller . . . would be ruined by it, were very much miſtaken.] This edition ſold very well, and when it is to be found compleat

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in the auctions of Holland and Germany, they commonly bid high for it. So that the Printer did not deserve to be placed in a certain list mentioned by Mr Catherinot. As I was ending this article, says he (82), 'the reverend Father de Fourcroy, a Paris 'Jesuit, but an inhabitant of Bourges, where he has 'been near fifty years teaching, and writing books, 'told me that one might make a pretty large volume 'of the catalogue of those, who have entirely ruined 'their Booksellers by their books. I shall speak of 'this another time.' Which puts me in mind of this passage of Stephen Pasquier (83). 'I cannot for-'bear complaining at this time of the calamity of 'this age which has produced such a plenty of reputed 'or untimely authors. Any pitiful scribler will have 'his first thoughts to come to light; lest, being too 'long shut up, they should grow musty. Good God! 'how apposite are these verses of Jodelle, (82) Catherinot, l'Art d'Imprimer, pag. 11. It is a piece of twelve pages in 4to, dated from Bourges the tenth of March 1685.

(83) Pasquiere's Letters, book x, Tom. i, pag. m. 638.

Et tant ceux d'aujourd'huy me fascheat,
Qui dés lors que leurs plumes laschent
Quelque-trait soit mauvais ou bon,
En lumiere le vont produire,
Pour souvent avec leur renom,
Les pauvres Imprimeurs destruire.

That is,

This scribbling crew wou'd make one's vitals bleed,
They write such trash, no mortal e'er will read;
Yet they will publish, they must have a name:
So Printers starve, to get their authors fame.

RAMUS (PETER), in French de la Ramée, was one of the most famous professors of the XVIth century. He was born in a village of Vermandois in Picardy, in the year 1515 (a). His grandfather retired into those parts, having lost all he had, when the place of his birth was burnt, in the territory of Liege [A], by the last duke of Burgundy. He was forced to make and sell charcoal all the rest of his life, in order to get a subsistence. He left a son, who got his living by being a husbandman (b), and who was the father of our Ramus: a man who proved the sport of fortune; for his life was a perpetual alternative of rising and falling. Being but eight years of age he went to Paris (c) from a desire to learn, and being forced to leave that city by reason of his poverty, he went thither again as soon as he could; and finding no way to subsist, he left it a second time: but his passion for study was so great, that, tho' he had been unfortunate in those two journies, he went a third time to Paris with a design to look for a place. He was maintained there for some months by one of his uncles; after which he was forced to be a servant in the college of Navarre [B]. He served his masters

(a) Theoph. Banosius, in Vita Petri Rami, pag. 2.

(b) Ex eodem, ibid.

(c) Ibid. pag. 3.

[A] The place of his birth was burnt in the territory of Liege.] This neither agrees with Moreri, nor with Mr Teissier. The first says, that Ramus's grandfather had been forced to leave Burgundy during the wars, and that he retired into the Vermandois. The latter says (1), that Peter Ramus was descended from a noble family, originally of the city of Evreux; for his grandfather being expelled from his country, and deprived of his estate by the Burgundians, fled into the Vermandois. Thus, according to Moreri, Ramus's grandfather was a Burgundian; but, according to Mr Teissier, he was a Norman. I am sure he was neither of them; he was of the country of Liege. Here is the proof of it: 'Parentes Rami agricolæ fuerunt pauperrimi. Avus 'certe, ut ipse commemorat in Præfatione Regiæ suæ 'professionis, in Eburonum gente familia in primis 'illustri fuit: sed patria à Carolo Burgundionum duce 'capta, & incensa, in Veromanduorum agrum profu-'gus, ob paupertatem carbonariam artem exercuit (2). 'The parents of Ramus followed Husbandry, and were 'extreamly poor. His grandfather was undoubtedly of 'a most illustrious family in Liege, as he himself relates, 'but his own country being seized, and burnt, by Charles 'duke of Burgundy, he fled into the Vermandois, where 'he was reduced to the necessity of labouring as a Col-'lier for his subsistence.' All good Geographers will tell you that the Eburones, and the inhabitants of the county of Liege are the same people.

(1) Teissier's Additions to Thuanus, Tom. i, pag. 371, Edit. 1696.

(2) Theoph. Banosius, in Vita Petri Rami, pag. 2.

[B] He was forced to be a servant in the college of Navarre. I follow the account of Banosius, and not that of Joseph Scaliger. The latter says, that Ramus was a servant when he went to Paris (3). 'Ramus 'ad annum usque decimum nonum, ne quidem primas 'notas didicerat, inserviebatque Dom. de la Brosse (4). 'Lutetiam deductus tantum famulus profecit maximo 'discendi desiderio percitus, ut quamvis repugnante 'ingenio tardo, rudi & stupido, repugnante, quod 'majus est, institutione sera, labore & diligentia in id 'litterarum decus pervenerit, quò perveniisse vix credi-'bile sit, ita ut anno trigesimo contra Aristotelem 'scripserit meliori stylo quam posterioribus annis. - - - 'Ramus was nineteen years of age before he had learned 'even his letters, and was servant to Mr de la Brosse. 'Altho' he came to Paris only in the quality of a servant, 'he was seized with such a prodigious thirst after learn-'ing, that notwithstanding he was of a dull and heavy 'genius, and what is still a greater obstacle, notwith-'standing his late application to study, yet, by the dint 'of labour and industry, he arrived to such perfection in 'literature as is scarcely to be believed, insomuch that 'in his thirtieth year he wrote against Aristotle in a 'better stile, than in his advanced years.' I can scarce believe what the great Scaliger tells us here: It is not at all likely that Ramus was nineteen years of age before he learned to read, nor that he had a dull and heavy wit. However it be, it is not true that he was thirty years old when he began to write against Aristotle; for his book was condemned, after many contests, the tenth of May, 1543. He was then but twenty-eight years of age; and therefore I am more inclined to believe Banosius, who says that Ramus being eight years of age, took a journey to Paris of his own accord, &c. 'Anno ætatis suæ circiter octavo sponte 'Lutetiam venit, & inde bis abductus violentia tem-'poris, bis eodem tamen, quam sibet reflantib. ventis 'reversus, & ardenti discendi studio incensus, ab Ho-'norato Carpenterio avunculo victum per aliquot men-'ses perexiguum accepit, ut artes addisceret: dein-'ceps necessitate coactus multos annos duram servitu-'tem in collegio Navarræ servivit. Sed quum in-'terdiu dominis suis fidelem operam præstitisset, nocte, 'Cleanthis Philosophi exemplo non dissimili, oleo & 'lucerna disciplinarum lumen brevi tempore tantum 'sibi comparavit, ut artium liberalium laurea fit dona-'tus (6). - - - In the eighth year of his age he came to 'Paris of his own accord, from whence he was twice 'driven by the violence of the times; yet he returned 'thither, tho' fortune seemed every way his enemy, and 'being inflamed with a most ardent desire of learning, 'that he might attain the liberal arts, he contented him-'self with a very slender sustenance for several months, 'which he received from Honoratus Charpentier his 'uncle: he was afterwards reduced by necessity to 'undergo a hard service for many years in the col-'lege of Navarre. Nevertheless, as he discharged his 'duty faithfully to his masters in the day-time, so in the 'night, after the example of the Philosopher Cleanthes, 'by the help of his oil and his lamp, he, in a short time, 'acquired such knowledge and light in the Sciences, that he 'was graduated.' But here is a strong proof against Banosius, which I take from Ramus's own words, as they are related by John Freigius: 'Confiteor vitam mihi 'totam acerbissimis fluctibus jactatam esse. Puer vix 'è cunis egressus duplici peste laboravi: juvenis invita 'modisque omnibus repugnante fortuna Lutetiam ad 'capessendas artes ingenuas veni, inde bis abductus 'violentia temporis, bis eodem tamen quamliber re-'flantibus ventis reversus, atque eò ardentiore dis-'cendi

(3) Scaligerana prima, pag. 127.

(4) Mr Teissier, ubi supra, thinks that Scaliger speaks of a lady: but Dom. is as well the beginning of Domini, as of Dominæ.

(5) Mr Teissier, ibid. quoting Scaligerana 1, says only nine years.

(6) Banosius, ubi supra, pag. 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google masters in the day-time, and spent the greatest part of the night in his study (d); and the progress he made in it was so considerable, that when he took his degree of Master of Arts, he engaged to maintain a doctrine quite contrary to Aristotle, about any thing that should be objected to him (e) [C]. But I must observe, that before this he had gone through a course of Philosophy in the schools, which lasted three years and a half (f). He very well answered the objections that were made against him for a whole day: which success made him resolve to examine Aristotle's doctrine more narrowly, and to oppose it more vigorously. But the perfecting of Logic was almost the only thing he applied himself to: he made his reading, and even his lectures of Eloquence, subservient to it (g). The two first books he published, viz. his Institutiones Dialecticæ, and his Aristotelicæ Animadversiones, occasioned great troubles in the university of Paris [D]. It

(d) Ex eodem, ibid.

(e) Jo. Thomas Freigius, in Vita Petri Rami, pag. m. 10.

(f) Ibid.

(g) Ibid. pag. 10, 11.

'cendi studio incensus, quò vehementius prohibebar (7). - - - I confess that my whole life has been the sport of adverse fortune. I was scarce out of my infancy when I was afflicted with a two-fold plague: when I was a young man, I came to Paris to acquire the Liberal Sciences, with fortune entirely my foe. I twice was driven from thence by the violence of the times, and twice I returned thither in spight of all difficulties, for the more vehemently I was opposed, the more ardent was I in my pursuit after learning.' If Ramus had been but eight years of age, when he went to Paris; would he have used the word juvenis? ought he not to have said puer! And would he have failed in it?

(7) Johannes Thomas Freigius, in Vita Petri Rami, p. 7, ex Schecklano epilogo Rami.

[C] He engaged to maintain a doctrine quite contrary to Aristotle, about any thing that should be objected against him.] Tassoni looks upon it as an intolerable piece of boldness. Ma più audace, says he (8), fù la prova di Pietro Ramo, autore per altro poco degno d'essere nominato. Questo dovendo secondo l'uso di Parigi sostener conclusioni prima che fosse creato Maestro, per bizzarria d'ingegno propose questa sola a qualunque volesse argumentare, dando libero campo à tutti. Quæcunque ab Aristotele dicta sint, falsa, & commenticia esse. La quale havendo eccitati contra di lui tutti gl'ingegni, tutte le professioni, tutte le scuole; egli nondimeno con tanta prontezza, e sottiglieuza di risposte la difese, che fe rimaner confusa e stupita la Città di Parigi: e ben ne' suoi libri apparisconо ancora i segni della sua audacia. The best of all this is, that he owns that the respondent maintained his assertion with so great subtilty, that every body was amazed at it. Let us see how Freigius relates the matter. 'Lutetiæ magisterii titulum susscepturus, pro more & consuetudine scholarum liberam disputandi copiam examinatoribus facere cogebatur. Problema igitur sumpsit: Quæcunque ab Aristotele dicta essent, commenticia esse. Attoniti novitate & insolentia problematis Magistri nostri, cùm authoritatem Aristotelis (quæ tanquam scuto, sese ad omnes insultus munire consueverunt) sibi ereptam viderent, irrito conatu per diem integrum, Magistrandum (ut barbari barbarè vocant) oppugnarunt. Ex hoc fortuito successu ansam deinceps ferò & libere in Aristotelem animadvertendi & inquirendi arripuit (9). - - - When he was about to take the degree of master of arts at Paris, according to the custom of the schools, he was obliged to give the examiners, or professors, an opportunity to dispute with him. He therefore advanced this problem, That all that Aristotle had laid down was false. The professors being astonished at the novelty and insolence of such a problem, that was to deprive them of the authority of Aristotle, with which, as with a shield, they had been used to defend themselves against all attacks; they, for a whole day, opposed his being made a master, without success. It was from this accidental victory that he was afterwards induced to engage in a more serious and full enquiry concerning the opinions of Aristotle.'

(8) Alessandro Tassoni, Pensieri diversi, lib. x, cap. iii, pag. 375.

(9) Freigius, ubi supra, pag. 9, 10.

[D] His two first books . . . . occasioned great troubles in the university of Paris.] The professors of Paris, who admired Aristotle, should have refuted Ramus's books in their writings and lectures; but instead of keeping within the bounds of an accademical war, they prosecuted that Anti-peripatetic before the civil magistrate, as a man who undermined the foundations of religion. They raised so many clamours, that the cause was brought before the parliament of Paris; but as soon as they perceived that it would be examined equitably, and according to the usual forms, they got it removed from that tribunal by their intrigues, and brought it before the king's council. 'Vix Aristotelicæ animadversiones lectæ erant, cum Petrus Ramus repente non 'ad humanam aliquam, & literis usitatam disputationem 'ab Academia vocatur, sed ad Prætorii tribunalis ca'pitalem contentionem per certos homines falso Aca'demiæ nomine rapitur, novique & ante hunc diem 'inauditi criminis accusatur, quòd Aristoteli repugnan'do Theologiam & artes enervaret. Hac enim ora'tione Aristotelea actio instituta est. Hinc Aristote'leorum clamoribus agitatus ad summum Parisiensis 'Curiæ concilium traducitur: deinde cum legitimo 'judicii more res agi, atque apertiùs iniquissimæ frau'dis invidia percipi videretur, novis artibus à Senatu 'Parisiensi ad regiam cognitionem disjicitur (10). - - - Scarce had his animadversions upon Aristotle been read over, when Peter Ramus was sent for, not by the university, that the matter might be argued in a civil way, and such as was usual in affairs of learning, but by some men who falsly called themselves the university, he was suddenly dragged before the tribunal of the Judge, as if it had been for a capital crime. He was accused of a new, and, till that day, unheard of crime, viz. that, by opposing Aristotle, he undermined Theology and the Liberal Arts; for with this speech did the Aristotelian plea begin. It was afterwards brought by the clamours of the partizans of Aristotle, before the parliament of Paris, but perceiving that it was likely to be determined there in a regular and legal manner, and that their envies and frauds were more and more discovered, by new stratagems, they got it removed from the parliament of Paris, to the king's own determination.' The king ordered that Antony Govea, who had offered to impugn and refute the said books, and the said Ramus, who maintained and defended them, should chuse and nominate on both sides, two worthy men well skilled in the Greek and Latin tongues, and in Philosophy (11). Pursuant to this ordinance, Govea and Ramus chose each of them two persons: Peter Danes and Francis Vicomercat were chose by Govea; and John Quintin, Doctor of the Canon-Law, and John de Beaumont, Doctor of Physic, were chosen by Peter Ramus. The king chose a fifth, viz. John de Saligniac, Doctor of Divinity. Here follow the contents of 'the Letters-patents. 'Before whom (12) the said 'Govea and Ramus have been heard in their disputes 'and debates, till the said Ramus, in order to put a 'stop to the business, entered an appeal; which we 'being informed of, issued out our letters to our 'provost of Paris, or his lieutenant, to compel the 'said Govea and Ramus to end their disputes, that 'the said information might be given us by the said 'censors, notwithstanding the said appeal, or any 'other whatsoever. Pursuant to which letters the said 'Govea and Ramus have appeared again before the 'said censors, and the said Ramus perceiving that he 'could not defend the said books, declared he would 'dispute no longer, and submitted to the censure of 'the above mentioned Judges; but when they would 'have proceeded in it, the said Quintin and Beaumont 'declared that they would be no longer concerned in 'the matter. Whereupon the said Ramus was summoned and required to chuse and name two others, 'which he refused to do, and wholly submitted to 'the three others; who having examined and con'sidered the whole matter, were of opinion that the 'said Ramus was a rash, arrogant, and impudent, 'man, for rejecting and condemning the Logic re'ceived by all nations, which he himself was ignorant 'of, and that his ignorance plainly appeared from 'his censuring Aristotle in his animadversions. More'over they added, that he had an ill intention, since 'he blamed Aristotle for many things which that 'Philosopher never thought of. In short, the said 'animadversions

(10) Audomarus Talæus, in sua ad Carolum Lotharingium Cardinalem Academia, apud Launoium, de Varia Aristotelis fortuna, pag. 57, 58, Edit. Paris. 1653.

(11) They are the words of the king's Letters Patents, dated the tenth of May 1543. See Launoi, de Varia Aristotelis fortuna, pag. m. 52. Those Letters are to be found in the Bibliotheque Françoise, of du Verdier Vau-Privas, at the word Pierre de la Ramée.

(12) That is, before the five judges, viz. he whom the king nominated, and those who were chosen by the parties.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It was neceſſary that Francis I. ſhould concern himſelf with it, bringing the cauſe before himſelf, which was depending in the parliament of Paris, between Ramus and Antony Govea. Some judges were aſſigned to the parties to pronounce ſentence in the difference between them, after they had heard them diſpute. Govea had all the advantage he could deſire: the books of Ramus were prohibited throughout the kingdom, and the author was forbidden any more to teach Philoſophy. His enemies expreſſed an extraordinary joy for it [E]. This happened in the year 1543. The year following the Plague raged at Paris, and occaſioned the diſperſion of the ſcholars of the college of Prele:

' animadverſions were full of lies and ſlanders; ſo that ' the good of learning required, that the ſaid book ' ſhould be wholly ſuppreſſed; and likewiſe the other ' above-mentioned book, intituled, Dialecticæ Inſti- ' tutiones, as containing in like manner many falſities ' and things foreign to the matter.' Here follows the king's order upon it. ' We declare, that having ' ſeen the ſaid advice, and had other advices and deli- ' berations about it with many learned and notable ' men, we have condemned, ſuppreſſed, and aboliſhed, ' and do condemn, ſuppreſs, and aboliſh, the afore- ' ſaid two books; the one, intituled, Inſtitutiones Dia- ' lecticæ, the other Ariſtotelicæ Animadverſiones, and ' we have forbidden, and do forbid all Printers and ' Bookſellers of our kingdom, countries, territories, ' and lordſhips, and all our other ſubjects, whatever ' condition they may be of, to print the ſaid books, ' or cauſe them to be printed, to publiſh, ſell, or diſ- ' perſe them in our ſaid kingdom, countries, territo- ' ries, and lordſhips, upon pain of forfeiting the ſaid ' books, and of corporal puniſhment, whether they ' be printed in our ſaid kingdom, countries, territo- ' ries, and lordſhips, or in any other place not being ' under our dominion. We likewiſe forbid the ſaid ' Ramus to read the ſaid books, and to get them writ- ' ten or tranſcribed, publiſhed or diſperſed in any man- ' ner whatſoever, or to read any lectures Logic or Phi- ' loſophy without expreſs leave from us; as alſo not to ' uſe ſuch ſlanders and invectives againſt Ariſtotle, or ' any other antient author commonly received and ap- ' proved, or againſt our ſaid daughter the univerſity; ' and the members thereof, upon the above-mentioned ' pains; and therefore we order and command, &c(13).'

(13) See Launoi, ubi ſupra.

He who hears but one ſide, hears nothing; and therefore it will not be improper to hear the account which a friend of Ramus publiſhed of the whole proceeding. Ramus, to obey the king's command, appeared before the five judges, tho' three of them were his great enemies. The diſpute laſted two days. He maintained that the Logic of Ariſtotle was imperfect, ſince it contained neither definition nor diviſion. The two judges he had choſen declared the firſt day in writing, that definition is neceſſary in every regular diſputation (14); the three others declared in writing, that Logic may be perfect without definition (15). The next day they acknowledged in writing, that diviſion is neceſſary in Logic; but when they ſaw that Ramus inferred from thence that he was in the right to condemn Ariſtotle's Logic, becauſe it was not divided, they put off the buſineſs till another time; and perceiving that they had ſo intangled themſelves, that they could not come off with honour, they declared that the diſputation ought to be renewed, and that what had been done there thoſe two days, ſhould be looked upon as nothing. Ne non damnaretur Ramus, novum conſilium initur ut ab initio tota diſputatio retexatur, & adhuc injudicata induceretur, proque nihilo haberetur (16). Ramus made great complaints of ſuch a proceeding, wherein the judges not only made it appear that they intended to condemn him, but alſo diſannulled their own judgment; he excepted againſt them, and entered an appeal, which was declared null by Francis I, who ordered the five judges ſhould give a definitive ſentence in that cauſe. The two judges choſen by Ramus retired, being unwilling to be preſent at the judgment, as meer witneſſes to the injuſtice intended againſt him (17). The three others gave ſentence as they were led by their paſſions, and care was taken ſo to prepoſſeſs the king with falſe reports, that he confirmed their judgment. ' Hæc omnia Regis, ' licet omnium Regum & humaniſſimi & literarum ' amantiſſimi, tamen per falſas & improbiſſimè con- ' fictas calumnias inducti, auctoritate confirmantur (18). ' Notwithſtanding that no king was of a more humane ' diſpoſition, or a greater lover of learning than Francis I, ' yet all theſe judgments were confirmed by his authority, ' which they had obtained by moſt falſe and wickedly ' deviſed calumnies.' Note, that the king declared in his letters-patents, that Ramus did wholly ſubmit to thoſe three judges, after the other two had deſiſted: which is falſe, if we may believe the author whom I quote; for having ſaid that the two judges gave over the proceedings, he adds that Ramus did the ſame, and that the three others condemned him without hearing him.. ' Idemque Ramus ipſe non ſine ſto- ' macho, cùm à tribus illis contumelioſe illuderetur, fecit & ſe tempora ſperare dixit, quibus tales ' judices de ſuo facto nequaquam parem eſſent volup- ' tatem percepturi. Ita vi victa, vel certe hominum ' quorumcunque opinione ad tempus oppreſſa cauſa eſt. ' Condemnantur igitur triumvirali ſententia, non modò ' indicta, ſed incognita planè cauſa, animadverſiones ' Ariſtotelicæ (19). - - - Ramus could not bear, without ' great reſentment, to ſee himſelf ſo ſhamefully abuſed by ' the three, who determined againſt him; and ſaid, ' that he hoped, he ſhould ſee the time, when ſuch judges ' would not reap the ſame pleaſure from what they had ' done. He was obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior force, or ' at leaſt to the opinion of ſome men, by which it was for ' a time trampled upon: the animadverſions upon Ari- ' ſtotle were condemned by the judgment of a triumvirate, ' not only without any cauſe being ſhown, but without ' any cauſe being known.' Take notice that the thing is thus related, not in an anonymous book, but in a piece which Audomarus Talæus dedicated to the cardinal of Lorrain. If we give credit to it, we muſt look upon what is ſaid by Peter Gallandius as a meer fable. He tells us, that Francis I. being informed of the continual invectives of a certain ſophiſt againſt Ariſtotle, Cicero, and Quintilian, was reſolved to ſend him to the gallies, but that Caſtellanus adviſed him to uſe another ſort of puniſhment; which was to engage that ſophiſt in a diſpute, wherein the ſilence he would be reduced to, would plainly diſcover his folly. The king approved that expedient, and when he heard of the confuſion that man had been in, he was contented with that puniſhment. It is Ramus, whom Peter Gallandius means; but we muſt remember that he was his great enemy. Cùm in hac ſchola ante annos octo Sophiſta famoſus Muſis iratis natus, gloriæ popularis ſiti inexplebili præceps, Ariſtotele, Ciceronе & Quintiliano petulanter & ignoranter vexatis, nullum finem in quemvis auctorem claſſicum debacchandi facturus videretur, priuſquam præſentem literarum ſtatum labefactaſſet, & ad ſuam libidinem pervertiſſet, permulti doctrina & virtute conſpicui homines audaciam tam prodigioſam indigniſſime tulerunt. Cumque de eo apud regem ita conqueſti eſſent, ut ille, pro ſua perpetua in literas & literarum Profeſſores benevolentia, hunc indignabundus ad remum damnatum triremibus addicere ſtatueret, Regis animum facti leporis ſuavitate emollitum, ad mitiorem ſententiam traduxit. Sophiſtam nugantem & inepte philoſophantem ab humaniſſimo Rege nullo capitali ſupplicio puniendum eſſe. Verum cum doctis hominibus coram gravibus diſceptatoribus in diſputationis certamen commiſſum, argumentis convincendum, & ratione aliqua leviore ad ſanitatem reducendum. Quorum ſententia cum illum Rex inſcitiæ, impudentiæ & temeritatis damnatum, ſilentiique pœna multatum vidiſſet, facile acquievit, neque acerbius quicquam in eum ſtatuit (20).

(19) Ibid.

(14) Omnem diſputationem quæ via & ratione procederet definitione proficiſci debere. Audom. Talæus, ubi ſupra, apud Lauvoium, ibid. pag. 58.

(15) Ad Dialecticæ artis perfectionem definitione nihil opus eſſe. Ibid.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Ex eo autem confeſſu ſe diſcedere quia ſe non ſocios conſilii, ſed injuriæ quæ Ramo fieret adhibitos teſtes intelligerent. Ibid.

(18) Ib. p. 59.

[E] His enemies expreſſed an extraordinary joy for it.] They made a greater noiſe about it in proportion, than the moſt vain-glorious princes for the taking of a great town, or the obtaining a moſt important victory. The ſentence of the three judges was publiſhed in Latin and French in all the ſtreets of Paris, and in all the parts of Europe whither they could ſend it. Some plays were acted with great pomp, wherein Ramus was abuſed a thouſand ways among the acclamations and applauſes of the Ariſtotelians (21). Triumphus de tam nobili victoria mirificus agitur, triſtis illa & bor-

(20) Petrus Gallandius, in Vita Petri Caſtellani, num. 45, pag. 75, 76.

(21) Idem, Talæus, ibid. See alſo Ramus's Life by John Thomas Freigius, pag. 17.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Prele: but Ramus being perſuaded by his friends to teach there, had quickly a great many hearers (b). The Sorbonne endeavoured to have him expelled from that college, but could not ſucceed in it: he was maintained in his place of Principal by a decree of the parliament (i). The cardinal of Lorrain proved ſo good a patron to him, that he obtained from Henry II the liberty of writing and ſpeaking in the year 1547, and the royal profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy and Eloquence in July 1551 (k). The parliament of Paris had before this maintained him in the liberty of adding philoſophical lectures to thoſe of Eloquence (l). That decree had put an end to many perſecutions, which Ramus and his ſcholars had been expoſed to. They had been vexed and proſecuted ſeveral ways [F], both before the academical and the civil judges (m), during the winter of the year 1551 (n). He was no ſooner made Regius Profeſſor, but he ſhewed a new deſire of perfecting the ſciences, and went about it with more eagerneſs, notwithſtanding the hatred of his reſtleſs enemies, who were ſo malicious as to pretend, that the manner after which he and his colleagues pronounced the letter Q, was an innovation for which he deſerved to be proſecuted [G]. They carried their attempts ſo far, that he was (b) Theoph. Banoſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 7.

(i) Ibid.

(k) See the remark [L].

(l) Theoph. Banoſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 7, & 8.

(m) Jo. Thomas Freigius, ubi ſupra, pag. 18, & ſeq.

(n) Ramus, in Oratione habita anno 1551, pag. m. 9.

renda Triumvirûm ſententia impreſſis & Latina & Gallica oratione libellis, non modò per hujus urbis compita, ſed per orbis terrarum loca omnia, quò expectari potuit (22), promulgatur. Ludi magno apparatu celebrantur, ubi ſpectantibus & plaudentibus Ariſtoteleis, omni ludibrii & convitii genere Ramus afficitur.

(22) Thus we read in Mr de Launoi, de Varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, pag. 60. But Freigius, in Vita Rami, pag. 17, citing the ſame paſſage of Talæus, ſays, quo exportari potuit.

[F] They had been vexed and proſecuted ſeveral ways.] I do not give the particulars of thoſe perſecutions, which you may read in Freigius (23): I ſhall only ſay, that when Ramus's enemies came to perceive that the other complaints made no great impreſſion, they accuſed him of perverting the youth with the ſeeds of Hereſy and Scepticiſm. 'Unius primum accuſationem graviſſimam audivit, Ramum Academicum nominantis, & inaudita calumnia deſcribentis, humanarum divinarumque rerum hoſtem & inimicum, qui de humanis diviniſque legibus addubitaret, deque iis dubitare diſcipulos ſuos doceret: qui lubricos Divi Auguſtini locos ſuis auditoribus ad effrænatam & impiam libertatem proponeret, qui (quò facilius incautis animis abuteretur) omnes Logicas diſputationes tolleret (24). - - - - - He firſt heard, what was the heavieſt charge of all, the accuſation of one perſon, who, venting unheard of calumnies, and calling Ramus a Sceptic, deſcribed him as a foe to all goodneſs, and the enemy of all knowledge, divine and human, who not only doubted himſelf of the laws of God and man, but alſo taught his diſciples to doubt thereof; who made uſe of ſome licentious paſſages of St Auguſtin to recommend to his hearers an unbridled and impious liberty, and who, that he might the more eaſily deceive unwary ſouls, was for taking away all Logical diſputations.'

(23) Freigius, in Vita Rami, pag. 18, & ſeq.

(24) Ibid. pag. 20. This is taken from Ramus's inaugüral ſpeech made in the year 1551.

[G] The manner after which he and his colleagues pronounced the letter Q.] Amongſt other abuſes, the royal profeſſors mended that, which had crept into the pronunciation of the Latin. Some Eccleſiaſtics complied with that reformation, tho' the Sorboniſts were diſpleaſed with that innovation. But a beneficed man was very ill uſed by them upon that account; for they got him deprived of his revenues. He made his application to the parliament; and the royal profeſſors being afraid that he would ſink under the credit of the faculty of Divinity, for being ſo bold as to pronounce the Latin tongue according to their reformation, thought themſelves obliged to aſſiſt him: they went to the court, and repreſented in ſo lively a manner the ſhamefulneſs of ſuch a trial, that the accuſed perſon was acquitted. 'Quas nòvas turbas innovata pronunciatio peperit? Sub annum milleſimum quingenteſimum quinquageſimum, cùm Profeſſores regii ſinceriorem Latinæ linguæ pronunciationem ſenſim introducere cœpiſſent, moleſtè ferebant cùm alii, tum præſertim Sorbonici, inveteratam loquendi conſuetudinem Gallorum improbari, ut quæ pueri didiciſſent, ſenes perdenda fateri cogerentur: in primis verò de ſono ipſius literæ Q. ambigebatur: regiis ſic, uti debet, cum ſequente u pronunciantibus, Quiſquis, Quanquam: Sorbonicis verò conſuetudine vernacula, Kiſkis, Kankam. Jam cum ſacris addictum hominem ob genuinam pronunciationem ampliſſimis proventibus Sorbonici ſpoliandum curaſſent, & lite coram Senatu Pariſienſi conteſtata, ne miſer illa ob grammaticam hæreſin (ut illi vocabant) theologicis fructibus jure excideret, periculum eſſet: profeſſores regii, & inter hos Petrus Ramus facto agmine in Curiam convolant, & judicii inſolentiam præfati, quod Jureconſulti de legibus regiis diſputare ſoliti, ad grammaticorum leges judicandas ſeſe dimiſiſſent, judices ita commoverunt, ut ſententiis ſuis non modo ſacerdotem abſolverent, ſed & impunitatem de Grammatica pronunciatione diſputandi tacito aſſenſu in perpetuum ſtabilirent. Ergo Kis & Kalis, & Kantus, & Miki, & ſimiles Gottiſmi & barbariſmi erant in Pariſienſi Academia ante regios profeſſores uſitati: quos barbariſmos ſi collega aliquis imitari nollet, acerbè & contumeliosè accipiebatur, quod collegii conſuetudinem violare diceretur. E ſchola regia tum primum Quis, Qualis, Quantus, Mihi, Latinè & Romanè ſonuerunt, & pudor fuit regiis Profeſſoribus tanquam regis ipſius voci palàm reclamare (25). - - - What new diſturbances did an innovation in pronunciation produce? In the year 1550, the Royal Profeſſors having begun to introduce a purer pronunciation of the Latin tongue, there were other profeſſors, eſpecially thoſe of the Sorbonne, who took it highly amiſs, that the pronunciation, anciently made uſe of by the French, ſhould be diſapproved of, and could not bear to be obliged to unlearn when they were old men what they had learned when they were boys. The firſt diſpute of this kind was about the ſound of the letter Q. The Royal Profeſſors pronounced it as it ought to be, with the following vowel u, Quiſquis, Quanquam: but the Sorbonne adhered to the cuſtom then in uſe, Kiſkis, Kankam. The members of the Sorbonne had endeavoured to deprive a Clergyman of very ample revenues, for making uſe of the genuine pronunciation: the conteſt was brought before the parliament of Paris, and there was great danger that the unfortunate man would be deprived of the benefits of his Theological ſtudies, for a Grammatical Hereſy, as they called it. But the Royal Profeſſors, and amongſt them Peter Ramus, aſſembling themſelves together in a body, flew to the court, and having expoſed the ſtrangeneſs of their proceedings, that Lawyers, whoſe buſineſs it was to diſpute about the king's laws, ſhould debaſe themſelves into Critics on the laws of Grammar, they ſo prevailed upon the Judges, that they not only acquitted the Divine, but by a tacit aſſent eſtabliſhed for ever an impunity to all controverſies about Grammatical pronunciation. Kis, and Kalis, and Kantus, and Miki, and ſuch like Gothiſms and barbariſms were uſed in the academy of Paris in the preſence of the Royal Profeſſors: and if any of them refuſed to make uſe of theſe barbariſms, he was very ill treated, as one who took upon him to infringe the cuſtoms of the college. Quis, Qualis, Quantus, and Mihi, were then firſt reſtored to the genuine Roman pronunciation in the Royal ſchool, and people were aſhamed to contradict openly the Royal Profeſſors, who were in a manner conſidered as the voice of the king himſelf.' This is ſuch a ſtrange and incredible thing, that I did not think fit to omit any one word of the author who relates it. He maintains another immediately after, which I am more amazed at, and I would fain ſee the monuments of it in the archives; otherwiſe I would not adviſe any body to give an intire credit to it, any more than to the trial about Kankan and Kiſkis. The thing is this: The public authority was made uſe of to force many doctors of Paris to renounce this aſſertion, which they obſtinately maintained: Ego amat is as good a phraſe as Ego amo. I will quote Freigius for it. 'Incredibile propè dictu eſt, ſed tamen verum & editis libris proditum, in Pariſienſi Academia Doctores extitiſſe, qui mordicus tuerentur ac defenderent, Ego amat, tam commodam

(25) Freigius, in Vita Rami, pag. 24.

 'orationem

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

was obliged to abſcond. He went to Fontainebleau, with the king's leave, where he concealed himſelf (o) [H], and continued his Geometrical and Aſtronomical ſtudies by the help of the books he found in the king's library. But when it came to be known that he was there, he did not think himſelf ſafe, and was forced to abſcond in ſeveral other places (p). In the mean time his library was plundered in the college of Prele. But the peace being concluded between Charles IX, and the Proteſtants, in the year 1563, he was reſtored to his place, wherein he maintained himſelf with great vigour, and endeavoured chiefly to make mathematical learning flouriſh; which he did till the ſecond civil war in the year 1567. He was then obliged to leave Paris, and to put himſelf under the protection of the Huguenots (q). He was in their army at the battle of St Denys. The peace was made ſome months after, and he was again eſtabliſhed in his profeſſorſhip; but foreſeeing that the war would ſoon break out again, and being unwilling to be expoſed to a new ſtorm, he aſked the king's leave to go and ſee the German univerſities, which was granted him. He made that journey in the year 1568, and received great honours wherever he came (r). He returned into France after the third war, in the year 1571 (s), and periſhed in the maſſacre at Paris on St Bartholomew's day, as may be ſeen in the paſſage which Moreri has tranſcribed from Thuanus. He was, without doubt, a great Orator [I], a man of univerſal learning, and endowed with excellent moral qualities; free from avarice, ſober, chaſt [K], fearing God, and zealous

(o) Freigius, ibid. pag. 26.

(p) Idem, pag. 23.

(q) Idem, pag. 30.

(r) Idem, & pag. ſeq.

(s) This is founded upon what is ſaid that he made a ſpeech at Baſil in the year 1571.

'orationem eſſe, quàm Ego amo; ad eamque perti-
'naciam comprimendam conſilio publico opus fuiſſe
'(26) (§ α). - - - - It is almoſt incredible to tell, but
'nevertheleſs true, and alſo in print, that there were
'Doctors in the academy of Paris, who aſſerted and
'maintained moſt obſtinately, that Ego amat was as pro-
'per ſpeech, and as good Grammar as Ego amo, and
'they were forced to have the aſſiſtance of public autho-
'rity before they could overcome their obſtinacy.' Notwithſtanding my incredulity, I ſhall obſerve that there happened many things in the XVIth century in the faculty of Theology at Paris, at which they bluſh now when they think of them. They were laughed at for it to ſome purpoſe.

(26) Ibid.

[(§ α) Taken from Agrippa de Vanitate Scientiarum, Cap. III. de Grammatica: ſee Mr Le Duchat's Notes upon Rabelais, note eighth of the nineteenth chapter of the firſt book. REM. CRIT.]

[H] He went to Fontainebleau with the king's leave, where he concealed himſelf.] I wiſh Freigius had not omitted the circumſtances of Ramus's retreat; I wiſh particularly he had mentioned the time: but perhaps if he had ventured to ſet down the year, he would not have been more ſucceſsful, than when he ſaid (27) that Ramus's Animadverſiones were condemned in the year 1545; and that the author was forbidden to meddle with Philoſophy; but that Ramus being re-inſtated by king Henry (28), at the ſollicitation of the Cardinal of Lorrain, made a ſpeech in the year 1546, De ſtudiis Philoſophiæ & Eloquentiæ conjungendis. - - - Concerning the uniting the ſtudies of Philoſophy and Eloquence. However it be, he clearly intimates that the king not daring to protect Ramus openly, ſent him to Fountainebleau to ſecure him from the fury of his enemies. 'Paucis
'menſibus per reliqua Geometriæ myſteria pervaſiſſet,
'niſi curſus induſtriæ per fatalem quandam calamita-
'tem abruptus fuiſſet. Acceptis igitur à rege literis,
'ad regiam Fontiſbellaquei bibliothecam profectus,
'mathematicas ſuperiorum temporum prælectiones ab
'initio plenius & uberius retractavit & conſidera-
'vit (29). . . . . Hæc meditantem ſolitudo cervorum
'ac ſylva diutius occulere non potuit. In Italiam
'tum cogitavit, quò ipſum Bononia honorificè invita-
'rat. In Germaniam noſtram ipſius illis mathematum
'amoribus chariſſimam ſæpe reſpexit, ſed viis omni-
'bus terror mortis intentus ac pavor, rumor etiam
'Prælei ſui indignis modis direpti, tum bibliothecæ
'chariſſimis quibuſque rebus ſpoliatæ ac depopulatæ,
'ad regiam Vincennarum propius urbem revocarunt:
'quin alia vis etiam gravior accidit, ut è Vincennis
'per invia itinera profugiendum eſſet, & ſubinde va-
'riis in locis deliteſcendum: in fuga tamen & late-
'bris otium lucemque reperit (30). - - - He would have
'gone through the other myſteries of Geometry in a few 'months, if his career had not been ſtopped by a fa.'
'calamity, having then obtained the king's letters, he re-
'tired to the royal library at Fontainebleau, where he
'more fully reviſed and examined, from the beginning,
'the Mathematical lectures which he had formerly read.
'. . . . Neither woods, nor the ſolitude of ſtags could no
'longer conceal him in the purſuit of theſe ſtudies. He
'then thought of going to Italy, whither Bologna had 'given him a moſt honourable invitation. He often
'turned his eyes towards Germany, that was moſt dear
'to him from the love that he bore to Mathematical ſtu-
'dies. But on every hand nothing ſurrounded him but
'terrors and the apprehenſions of death; the intelligence
'he received, that the college of Prele was cruelly ſacked,
'and that his library was plundered and ſtripped of
'every thing that was precious in it, brought him back
'to the caſtle of Vincennes, nearer the town: another ac- 'cident happened ſtill more afflicting, and which obliged
'him to fly from thence by unknown ways, and to hide
'himſelf in divers places: nevertheleſs, in the midſt of
'his flight, and in his hiding-places, he found leiſure to
'improve his knowledge.' Banoſius informs us that Ramus retired to Fontainebleau during the firſt religious war, that is, in the year 1562 (31).

(27) Ibid. pag. 14.

(28) Henry II did not begin his reign till the year 1547. Ramus was deprived in 1543.

(29) Freigius, ubi ſupra, pag. 26.

(30) Ibid. pag. 28.

(31) Banoſius, in Vita Rami, pag. 20.

A letter of Languet's (32), dated from Paris, February the firſt, 1562, informs us, that Ramus put himſelf at the head of ſome members of the univerſity (33), who let Catherine de Medicis know that they had no concern in the petition which the Rector had preſented to the parliament in the name of the whole univerſity, to prevent the publication of the edict of January; on the contrary, that they demanded the publication of it. It is certain that the Rector had never adviſed about it with thoſe that he knew to be favourers of the reformed religion (34).

(32) The 68th of the ſecond book, Edit. of Hal 1699.

(33) Eorum qui Rectorem remiſit dex eſt Petrus Ramus. Languet. Epiſt. LXVIII, lib. II, pag. 201.

[I] He was a great Orator.] I deſire no other proof for it than this teſtimony of Brantome, which contains a particular not be found any where elſe. Here are his words, wherein he mentions the learned men maintained by Henry II. 'Galandius Torti-
'colis was a great Orator; but Ramus, his enemy, ex-
'ceeded him. Ramus was a moſt eloquent Orator,
'and there have been few like him; for his eloquence
'was attended with an extraordinary graceful delivery.
'Having turned Huguenot ſome years after, and 'being in the Prince of Condé and the Admiral's re-
'tinue, in their journey to Lorrain, and the Reiſters,
'whom they had ſent for, refuſing to go into France,
'unleſs they had ſome money given them; the Hu-
'guenots made a gathering for them, and Ramus a
'ſpeech, which affected them ſo much, that they 'were prevailed upon to go into the heart of France,
'where they did great miſchief (35).'

(34) Ibid.

(35) Brantome, Mémoires des Hommes illuſtres, Tom. II, pag. 55.

[K] He was . . . . free from avarice, ſober, chaſt.] He refuſed ſome profeſſorſhips, which might have been very profitable to him, and choſe rather to be a teacher in the college of Prele, where he had no public ſalary (36). He would not accept the preſents that his pupils were willing to make him (37), and he maintained ſome ſcholars at his own charge. 'Sole-
'bat in patriam proficiſcens bonæ indolis juvenes pau-
'peres ſuis ſumptibus fovere, eoſque in Academia
'Prælea bonis informabat diſciplinis: ex quorum nu-
'mero plerique ſuperſunt viri doctiſſimi (38). - - - When- 'ever he went into his own country, he uſed, at his own
'expence, to aſſiſt ſuch poor children as appeared to him of
'a promiſing genius. He afterwards placed them in the 'college of Prele, where he inſtructed them in all good
'diſcipline: moſt of them are ſtill alive, and are men of
'great learning.' He refuſed to go into Poland, tho' he was promiſed to be well rewarded for the encomiums he ſhould beſtow upon the duke of Anjou. His anſwer

(36) Tho. Freigius, ubi ſupra, pag. 55.

(37) Ibid.

(38) Banoſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 14.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google zealous for the Reformed religion: but he was somewhat obstinate, and given to contradiction; and some will have it that he robbed Vives of his inventions (t). He shewed a great firmness in his misfortunes [L]. He was not well beloved by the ministers; for he made himself in some sort the head of a party to alter the discipline of the Reformed churches. His design was frustrated, and even defeated in a national synod [M]. I could answer was, that Eloquence ought not to be a mercenary thing, and that an Orator ought to be a man of probity. Inter cætera referam quod cuidam respondit, qui in Poloniam legatus, Ramo, ut secum proficisceretur ad Henrici, qui nunc est, Galliarum regis laudes decantandas, magno pretio persuadere conatus est. At vero, ait, oportet Oratorem non tantum dicendi peritum, sed virum bonum esse: nec viri boni lingua venalis esse debet (39). We learn from these words a particular very remarkable, viz. that Monluc was desirous to make use of Ramus's eloquence, in order to dazzle the Polish nobility, that they might be the more willing to elect the duke of Anjou for their king; for it is not to be questioned, that he who made the above-mentioned proposal to Ramus, was the same Monluc, bishop of Valence, who did so well succeed in his negotiations about the election of Henry III, and who, amongst other means, made use of the eloquence of some persons, who, in their verses and harangues, extolled to the skies the qualities of the duke of Anjou. He took care to avoid the snare mentioned in a maxim of Horace (40).

(t) See Keckerman, in Præcognitis Logicis, Tract. ii, cap. v.

(39) Ibid. pag. 23.

(40) Multa fidem promissa levant, ubi plenius æquo
Laudat venales qui vult extrudere merces. Horat. Epist. II, lib. ii, ver. 10.

Ramus was a man of an exemplary temperance; he was contented with boiled meat, and eat but little at dinner; he was twenty years without drinking wine, and began to drink it only by the prescription of the Physicians; he lay upon straw, and rose very early (41); he studied all day (42); he lived a single life that was not so much as suspected of the least impurity, and took great care to avoid obscene conversations. Cælebs vixit honestissime, ab scortationis non tantum crimine, sed etiam suspicione semper immunis: colloquia obscæna, utpote quæ bonos mores corrumpunt, tanquam toxicum fugiebat (43).

(41) Banosius, ibid. pag. 12.

(42) Ibid.

(43) Ibid.

[L] He shewed a great firmness in his misfortunes.] Any body but he would have retired from Paris after the thundring decree of Francis I, which his adversaries did so insultingly boast of; but he kept still in the college of Prele, and let them bawl as much as they would. He answered none of the pieces that were published against him. If it be said that he durst not do it, because the king ordered him to be silent about matters relating to Philosophy; I answer, that if he had not been master of his passions, he would have gone out of the kingdom, to enjoy the liberty of vindicating himself. Of all things in the world silence is perhaps the most difficult for an author who is attacked and slandered by every body; and yet this is a thing which Ramus was capable of. Here follow the words of an author who has very well expressed it. 'Adversus contumelias Doctorum quamlibet & eruditorum hominum, perpetuum silentium juraverat. 'Nil Goveano, Gallandio, Perionio, Turnebo respondit: nil ingenii & doctrinæ per universam Germaniam principi Melanchthoni respondit: nil aliis 'Germanis, nil Italis nonnullis respondit. Cumque 'divulgatis per orbem terrarum Gallica & Latina lingua probris esset notatus, publicis ludis ignominiosissime traductus: constricta lingua, vinctis manibus 'prohibitus quicquam de philosophia vel publice, vel 'privatim dicere, scribere, cogitare etiam (si menti 'tantùm potuisset imperari) prohibitus esset: adversus 'tantas tot acerbitatum plagas, unicum patientiæ remedium adhibuit, in animoque semper illud habuit: Grata superveniet, quæ non sperabitur hora (44). 'He had sworn to observe a perpetual silence with regard 'to the slanders of his adversaries, tho' they were men of 'ever so much learning or knowledge. He made no answer 'to Goveanus, Gallandius, Perionius, and Turnebus: nor 'would he make any reply to Melanchthon himself, the 'most famed for wit and learning throughout all Germany: there were other Germans, and some Italians, 'to whom he gave no answer. And when in the Latin 'and French tongue calumnies were every where published 'against him, when he was in the most ignominious man'ner abused on the public stage, when his tongue was 'tied and his hands too, and he was prohibited from 'either publickly or privately speaking, or writing, or 'even thinking, about Philosophy, if it had been possible 'to have controlled the mind so far; yet amidst this de'luge of ills he made use of no other remedy than pa'tience; and that he was always possessed of: and 'always hop'd for better times.' That author has forgot a circumstance, which would have very much set off Ramus's triumph, I mean the power he had over himself to be silent. This Professor, four years after, recovered the liberty of writing and speaking about Philosophy. He says so himself in the first oration he made after he had been chosen Regius-Professor: 'Misero Rex Henricus, Hercules videlicet 'Gallicus, adfuit, meque quarto abhinc anno ad po'stulationem Caroli Lotharingi Cardinalis, & mani'bus & lingua solvit, solutoque Eloquentiæ & Philo'sophiæ docendæ, exercendæ, illustrandæ potestatem 'fecit (45): --- King Henry, the Hercules of France, 'relieved me from my distress, when four years since, at 'the request of Charles, Cardinal of Lorrain, he set 'free both my tongue, and my hands, and restored to me 'the power of teaching, practising, and explaining Elo'quence and Philosophy.' Here are some other proofs of his constancy. The first time he explained his Logic in the college of Cambray, the emissaries of his enemies left no stone unturned to vex him to the highest degree, and to force him to leave off reading his lecture: they hissed and hooted at him; they clapped their hands, and stamped with their feet. But all was in vain; he was not put out of countenance; he stopped now and then till the hooting was over, and made an end of his lecture in the interval of their outcries. They were astonished at his unconcernedness, and proved afterwards less insolent. Anno 1552, cùm in Cameracensi schola frequentissimo auditorio suam dialecticam auspicaretur, ab æmulis clamores, strepitus, sibili ingentes per summam petulantiam excitari cæpêre. Hac insolentia nihil ipse permotus, eum se oratorem præstitit, at multum diuque licet obnitentibus adversariis, per intervalla tamen clamorum, incredibili constantia, nec minori cum gloria perorarit. Qua ejus virtute consternati inimici, in posterum minus ei fuêre molesti (46). He was insulted in the like manner at Heidelberg, and with no better success, whilst he read lectures there in the year 1568 (47). Which shews that he had made himself odious to several people in Germany as well as in France, for having been so bold as to write against Aristotle. It must be confessed that he had done it a little too haughtily, and that he had shewed too great an affectation of depriving that Philosopher of all his glory: he took from him, as much as ever he could, the works that are ascribed to him; and when he acknowledged him to be the author of some of them, he condemned the doctrine contained in them, and went so far as to inveigh against his person, by an odious description of his vices and actions (48). See the two speeches which Perionius published in the year 1544.

(44) Freigius, ubi supra, pag. 34.

(45) Ramus, in Oratione habita anno 1551, pag. m. 7.

(46) Freigius, ubi supra.

(47) Proinde minus debet mirum videri, si dum libera legatione regis permissu, tertiò civili bello ardente Gallia fungitur, in Heidelbergensi Academia principali autoritate ad profitendum adductus, consimiles æmulorum clamores invicto animo pertulit, tanta quidem constantia ut adversarios suæ petulantiæ pudere meritò debuerit. Ibid.

(48) See Keckerman, in Præcognitis Logicis, pag. m. 95, 96.

[M] His design was . . . . defeated in a national synod.] He designed to introduce a democratical government into the church: he pretended that the power of the keys, conferred by Jesus Christ upon the people, ought only to be committed to the consistories, that they should first of all deliberate about the things in question, and give their judgment about them; which should afterwards be proposed to the people, and should not be enacted into a law, unless it were confirmed by the votes of the heads of the families. He said that this was the only way to preserve the church from Oligarchy and Tyranny. His opinion was examined in a national synod (49), who rejected it. Beza used his utmost endeavours to have that Ecclesiastical Democracy condemned, which in truth would occasion a world of confusion, and a meer Anarchy. He was afraid that if Peter Ramus should refuse to acquiesce in the judgment of the synod, it would cause many broils; for he looked upon him as a pragmatical fellow. Here follow his words: Pseudodialecticus ille, quem ὄζον ἀρηῶ jampridem docti multi cognominarunt, contentionem non parvam excitavit do tota Ecclesiastica ευταξία, quam inquit Democraticam esse oportere, non Aristocraticam, sola πρεσβυλεύματα

(49) Held at Nimes in May, 1572.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google could mention many other things relating to him, were it not that I avoid repeating what may be found in Moreri's Dictionary, and in the large collections of Mr Teiſſier: beſides, I have not been able to conſult a book (u) which I formerly was poſſeſſed of, and which contains a great many particulars of his life. I ſhall make ſome ſhort obſervations upon the narratives of thoſe two authors [N], wherein the reader will find ſome matters of fact cleared. He publiſhed many books; you may ſee the catalogue of them in (u) The Life of Peter Ramus, written by Nancelius. Mr Teiſſier ſays nothing of it in his Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum.

προβλεύματα preſbyterio relinquens. Synodus ob eam cauſam Nemauſi ineunte Majo coacta, cui etiam interfui, dogma iſtud plane, meo judicio, abſurdum & perniciosum, refutatis contrariis omnibus argumentis damnavit, cui ſi cum ſuis pauculis ille obſequatur, bene erit: ſin minus, certe turbas dabit homo ad turbanda optima quæque comparatus (50). Ramus was not ſo imprudent as to require that the diſcipline ſhould be aboliſhed; he only oppoſed the juriſdiction of the conſiſtories and ſynods; he pretended that the people had a right to judge of the doctrine, chuſe their miniſters, excommunicate, and abſolve (51). Some ſuſpect that he inſiſted upon this, to introduce into the church the power of the demagogues of Athens, or of the tribunes of Rome; for, being a very eloquent man, he might have excited in the aſſembly of the people ſuch paſſions as he would have had them poſſeſſed with. Ille neſcio quem adeò Chriſtianum populum ſomnians ut ſemper à Spiritu ſancto regatur, ſolaque προβλεύματα preſbyterio relinquens, nihil vult ratum haberi, niſi quod præſens populus rogatis expreſſiſque ſuffragiis decreverit, quod ni fiat, clamitat Oligarchiam ac Tyrannidem invehi in Eccleſiam, nihil interea Ochlocratiam reformidans, in qua nimirum ipſe, & ejus ſimiles dominentur. Contendunt iidem quibuſvis etiam ἰδιώταις prophetandi partes in Eccleſia concedendas, huc detorto Pauli loco ex cap. prioris ad Cor. xiv (52).

(50) Theodor. Beza, Epiſt. LXVII. It is dated July 1, 1572.

(51) Contendebat non adverſus diſciplinam, ſed penes quos eſſet eccleſiaſtica gubernatio: volebat enim non penes paucos, ſed penes univerſam Eccleſiam eſſe judicium doctrinæ, electionem & abjectionem miniſtrorum, excommunicationem, & abſolutionem. Simler. in Vita Bullinger. fol. 45.

[N] I ſhall make ſome ſhort obſervations upon the narratives of Moreri and Mr Teiſſier.] I. I have already obſerved (53), their miſtake concerning the country of Ramus's grandfather. II. They take notice of a fault of Thuanus without mending it. That great man ſuppoſes (54) that Peter Ramus having taught Philological learning, Philoſophy, and the Mathematics in the college of Prele, and afterwards in the Royal College, forged at laſt a falſe Philoſophy in oppoſition to Ariſtotle (55). He is miſtaken; Ramus began firſt of all to attack Ariſtotle, as has been ſaid above (56). III. What they ſay of the foundation of a profeſſorſhip for the Mathematics is true; but their narrative would make one think, that Ramus paid five hundred livres every year during his life, to him who filled the mathematical chair. I do not believe it. It is likely his intention was, that after his death that ſum ſhould be taken from his revenue, to be paid to the Profeſſor, who ſhould be choſen according to the terms he had preſcribed. His laſt will was publiſhed by Banoſius (57): he made it the firſt (58) of Auguſt 1568, being ready to travel in order to viſit the foreign univerſities. He ordered by that will, that out of the yearly rent of ſeven hundred livres which he had in the townhouſe of Paris, five hundred ſhould be applied for the ſalary of a Profeſſor, who ſhould teach, for the ſpace of three years, Arithmetic, Muſic, Geometry, Optics, Mechanics, Aſtronomy, and Geography, in the Royal College; and he appointed Frederic Reiſnerus to be the firſt Profeſſor who ſhould have that ſalary. Paſquier, in his Recherches, has committed ſo childiſh a fault about this very thing, that I dare not but take notice of it. That learned man, ſays he, after forty-five years labour, had got five hundred livres a year, by his good huſbandry, which he received from the town-houſe of Paris, out of which he left a hundred livres to his uncle by the mother's ſide, a hundred more to a nephew the ſon of his uterine ſiſter, and the five hundred livres that remained to him who ſhould be judged the fitteſt man for the mathematical chair (59). Here is an inſtance of thoſe abſences of mind, which I have mentioned in another place (60): this is worſe than if one ſhould ſay, in caſting up an account, three times ſeven make twenty-two. Paſquier has before his eyes a ſum of five hundred livres; he takes from it one hundred on the one ſide, and one hundred on the other, and yet he finds ſtill five hundred livres: he reads this over and over again without perceiving his miſtake. If he did not commit this error, it muſt be imputed to the corrector of the Preſs. I muſt further obſerve, that Ramus was but fifty-three years of age, when he made his will; where then ſhall we find the forty-five years of his labour and good huſbandry? Father du Breul (61) ſays, that Ramus left only fifty livres by his will for the mathematical Profeſſor. IV. Moreri is in the right, when he ſays, that we read in Beza's letters, that Ramus had a mind to retire to Geneva, where he deſired to be Profeſſor of Philoſophy. The two letters Beza wrote to him are remarkable, and plainly ſhew that there was no great friendſhip between them. The firſt is dated the 30th of September 1569. Beza anſwers the complaints of Ramus, and at the ſame time declares to him, that he condemned his Logic, and his inveterate diſeaſe of cenſuring the greateſt men, and that his adverſaries were approved of. 'Illud ego multis ſæpe dixi, & ad teipſum ſcripſi non 'temere, ut tu putas, neque vel εἰρευόμενος, vel 'ullo, ita me bene Deus amet, maledicendi ſtudio, 'ſed quoniam tuum iſtud in ſummis omnibus & extra 'omnem judicioram aleam poſitis ſcriptoribus repre'hendendis cacoëthes probare nunquam potui, ac ne 'nunc quidem poſſum. . . . . Miror autem à me re'quiri quod tam multi doctiſſimi viri tam accurate & 'verbis & ſcriptis præſtiterunt, quibus ſummo con'ſenſu tuas in Ariſtotelem animadverſiones prorſus 'diſplicuiſſe non ignoras. Cum iſtis ſi ferre non po'tes ut à te diſſentiam, tuo ſane judicio fruere (62). 'I have ſaid ſo very often to many, and have writ the 'ſame thing to you, not, as you ſuppoſe, in banter, or 'with any deſign to rail at you: but I did never approve 'of that cuſtom of your's in cenſuring the beſt and moſt ju'dicious authors; neither do I now. . . . . I wonder that 'you ſhould expect from me what ſo many learned men 'have ſo accurately performed both in words and writ'ing, to whom you know your remarks on Ariſtotle were 'altogether diſagreeable. If you cannot bear that I 'ſhould with them diſſent from you, follow your own judg'ment.' Theſe are the ſweet things that Beza writ to him. He complains in the other letter that Ramus did not acquaint him with his deſign of being Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the Academy of Geneva, and he takes it for a ſign of diſtruſt (63). He gueſſed right; for certainly Ramus did not expect that Beza would favour him, and he had no reaſon to expect it. However, Beza made him ſome compliments, and writ to him in a civil manner; but after all, he told him that there was no profeſſorſhip for him at Geneva; all the places were filled; the funds appointed for the ſalaries of the Profeſſors could not be augmented, and the Academy was reſolved to admit no other ſyſtem but that of Ariſtotle. Duo tantùm obſtant quo minus quod optas, & noſtrum collegium alioqui vehementer cuperet, commodè nunc confici poſſe videatur. Unum, quòd nullus nunc ſit in ſchola vacuus locus, noſtrorum verò tenues adeò ac pene nullæ ſint facultates, ut nec augere poſſint profeſſorum numerum, nec conſtitutis antea ſtipendiis, quæ ſanè perexigua ſunt, quicquam adjicere: alterum, quòd nobis certum ac conſtitutum ſit & in ipſis tradendis Logicis, & in cæteris explicandis diſciplinis, ab Ariſtotelis ſententia ne tantillum quidem deflectere. Hæc ad te ingenuè ſcribo ex vetere formula. Inter bonos bene agier opportet (64). Here is a remarkable thing. When Ramus might have had an honourable employment out of the kingdom, he refuſed it ſeveral times; and when he was deſirous to have one at Geneva, he could not get it. V. Mr Teiſſier tells us this concerning the invitations this Philoſopher refuſed. After the death of Romulus Amaſæus, the city of Bologna offered him a thouſand ducats, if he would ſucceed him in his place. The king of Poland endeavoured to have him at Cracow. John, king of Hungary, ſent him word that he would give him the management of the univerſity of Weiſemburg (65). Thoſe words of Mr Teiſſier anſwer the Latin words of Banoſius. 'Nulla eſt Chriſtiani orbis natio quæ Rami ſapientiam 'non amaverit, & præmio laudando redimere ſtudu'erit. Amiſſo enim Romulo Amaſæo, qui mille du'catorum ſtipendiis in celeberrima Bononienſi Acade'mia docuerat, Angelus Papius totius Academiæ con'ſenſu illum in demortui locum evocavit. Ab An'drea Duditio Imperatoris legato Cracoviam eſt invi'tatus. Joannes Rex Pannoniæ Albæ Juliæ admini'ſtrandæ magna propoſita mercede præficere voluit, & chirographo

(52) Theodor. Beza, Epiſt. LXVIII, of the ſame date as the other.

(53) In the remark [A].

(54) Thuan. lib. lii, pag. 1078, ad ann. 1572. Spondanus has committed the ſame fault, ad ann. 1572, num. 15.

(55) Poſtremo erroneam in Philoſophicis doctrinam invexit, Ariſtotelem voce & ſcriptis importune oppugnans. Idem, Thuanus, ibid.

(56) In the remark [D].

(57) In Vita Rami, pag. 15, & ſeq.

(58) And not the 8th, as Paſquier ſays, Recherches de la France, lib. ix, cap. xix, pag. m. 835.

(59) Paſquier, ibid.

(60) In the article CAETIUS, remark [C].

(61) Antiquitez de Paris, pag. 568. Paris Edit. 1639, in 4*to.*

(62) Beza, Epiſt. XXXIV.

(63) Mallem ex te ipſo tuam hoc de ornanda noſtra ſchola conſilium, quam ex amicis intelligere, minimè id quidem quòd ab te vel quoquam alio rogari velim, ut homines ambitioſi ſolent, ſed quòd inde conjicium te nonnihil de meo in te animo dubitare cerpiſſe. Id. Epiſt. XXXVI, It is dated December 1, 1570.

(64) Beza, Epiſt. XXXVI.

(65) Teiſſier, Addit. to the Elogies, Tom. 1, pag. 373, 374.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in Mr Teiſſier. His hand-writing was ſcarce legible, and gave a great deal of trouble to the Printers (). His ſect flouriſhed for ſome time [O]. I ſhall make a remark againſt () Scriptitans tam miſere pingeret, ut in legendis ipſius ſcriptis typographus inſudaret. Petrus à S. Romualdo, Fulienſis, in continuatione Chronici Ademari, pag. 344.

(66) Banoſius, in Vita Petri Rami, pag. 9. See alſo Freigius, in Vita ejuſdem, pag. 36, & 41.

'chirographo Regio obſignavit (66). - - - There is no part of the Chriſtian world that does not admire the wiſdom of Ramus, and ſtudy to purchaſe it at the greateſt expence. For Romulus Amaſius being dead, whoſe ſalary for teaching in the famous univerſity of Bologna was a thouſand crowns, Angelus Papius, by the common conſent of that univerſity, invited him to fill the place of the deceaſed. He was called to Cracow by Andrew Duditius the emperor's ambaſſador. John, king of Hungary, offered him the management of the univerſity of Weiſemburg, promiſing him a very large ſalary, which promiſe he confirmed with his royal ſignet.' The following cenſure does not therefore concern Mr Teiſſier, but Banoſius. Romulus Amaſæus died in the year 1558, many years after Pope Paul III had removed him from his profeſſorſhip at Bologna. Ramus was not therefore invited to come and fill the place that was vacant by the death of Romulus; Banoſius ſhould have ſaid that this profeſſorſhip was offered him, when Amaſæus left it to go to Rome in order to teach the grand-ſon of Pope Paul III. But if it was not offered him till after the death of Amaſæus, it ſhould have been ſaid only, that he was offered a very honourable and profitable employment at Bologna, the very ſame that Amaſæus had formerly poſſeſſed. The reader is deceived, when he is told that Ramus refuſed the chair vacant by the death of Romulus Amaſæus; for he is induced to believe, that Romulus Amaſæus died a Profeſſor at Bologna, which is falſe. VI. Mr Moreri is miſtaken, when he ſays that Ramus was baniſhed by virtue of the judgment which the commiſſioners of Francis I. gave againſt him. He was only forbidden to concern himſelf with Philoſophy; and immediately he betook himſelf to teach claſſical learning in the college of Prele. I fancy theſe Latin words of Audomarus Talæus deceived Moreri, or the authors whom he copied. 'Auctori Animadverſionum & Inſtitutionum toto Philoſophiæ regno velut aqua & igni, gravi etiam pœna addita, interdicitur, ne unquam vel ſcribendo, vel docendo in ullam Philoſophiæ partem ingrederetur (67). - - - The author of the Animadverſions and Inſtitutions was forbidden, under pain of baniſhment, and a great penalty, ever to meddle with any part of Philoſophy, either by writing or teaching.' Some body fancied, for want of attention, that Ramus was baniſhed from the whole kingdom of France, without minding that he was only baniſhed from the whole empire of Philoſophy, toto Philoſophiæ regno. VII. Moreri adds, that he was accuſed of Hereſy, on account of a book intituled de Religione Chriſtiana, which was printed at Francfort ſome time after his death. That book was not known during the author's life; the original was preſerved, when his library was plundered (68), and it was ſent into Germany, where Banoſius got it printed in 1576 (69). I think we may challenge all the friends of Moreri, to prove that Ramus did ever ſuffer any perſecution on account of that book. Ramus's enemies had other proofs enough of his being a Proteſtant: a public oration, an action of his which favoured of an Iconoclaſt (70), and the anſwer he made to one, who aſked him, why he went ſo ſeldom to maſs, were ſufficient to convict him. 'Hujus zelo 'inflammatus, publica concione Pariſienſis ſcholæ monachos graviter admonuit, ut puriorem Theologiam 'ex Evangelio, relictis Sophiſtarum lacunis, diſcerent. 'Idola gymnaſii Prælei amoveri & recondi juſſit ne 'conſpicerentur. Miſſæ autem raro intererat. Interrogatus vero hac de re à viro graviſſimo, ſtrenue reſpondit, E toto Vetere Novoque Teſtamento nihil 'quidquam magis à noviſſimis Chriſtianis depravatum '& corruptum eſſe, quàm ſecundum mandatum Legis '& Cœnæ Sacramentum, ut homo in utroque per ſpeciem religionis in exſecrabilem idololatriam labere'tur (71). - - - Fired with this zeal, he ſolemnly admoniſhed the Monks of the ſchool of Paris in a public Oration, that, laying aſide Sophiſtry, they ſhould learn a purer Divinity from the goſpel, he commanded the images of the college of Prele to be removed and hid, that they might not be ſeen. He was ſeldom at Maſs. Being aſked the reaſon of it by a grave perſon, he boldly anſwered, that nothing in all the Old and New Teſtament was more depraved and corrupted by the modern Chriſtians, than the ſecond commandment and the Euchariſt, whereby a perſon in both, under pretence of religion, fell into the moſt execrable idolatry.' He abſconded during the firſt Civil war; he followed the prince of Condé in the ſecond, and made an open profeſſion of Calvin's doctrine in Germany during the third. He received the communion at Heidelberg with the Reformed (72). He ſaid among other things in a public Oration at Baſil, that he had been ſo happy as to compoſe it in the ſame place where Calvin wrote his Inſtitution. 'Inter Academiæ Baſilienſis 'hoſpites Joannes Calvinus præcipue commemorandus 'eſt lumen Galliæ, lumen Chriſtianæ per orbem ter'rarum Eccleſiæ, lumen in hoc (in quo hæc meditor 'commentorque) hoſpitio præcipue perſpectum: hic 'enim tanti luminis faces (ut Catharina Petita lectiſ'ſima matrona ſanctitate ſingularis ingenii mirifice 'capta tum Calvini, modò etiam Rami hoſpita ſæpe ac 'jucunde mihi narravit) primùm ſunt incenſæ: hic 'illuſtres illæ Chriſtianæ inſtitutionis cœleſteſque vi'giliæ ſunt exaratæ & elaboratæ (73). - - - Among all the ſtrangers at the univerſity of Baſil, the moſt remarkable was John Calvin, the light of France, the light of the whole Chriſtian Church, and a light that particularly diſcovered itſelf in theſe very lodgings (where in I am now meditating and compoſing this Oration): here was that great light firſt kindled (as I have been often told in a pleaſant manner by Catherine Petit, a woman of great worth, who being prodigiouſly charmed with Calvin's extraordinary ſanctity and parts, was at that time his, as ſhe was ſoon after Ramus's, landlady): in this place were his famous Inſtitutions and his heavenly lucubrations compoſed and finiſhed.' Laſtly, Being returned into France after the firſt peace, he obtained from Charles IX a ſpecial permiſſion to profeſs the new religion, with a conſiderable ſalary. Impetrat ergo à Rege ſtipendia perampla, ut non tantum privato ſtudio artes meditando ſcribendoque illuſtraret, ſed etiam ut, ſublatis impedimentis, reformatæ Religionis ſanctiſſimis exercitiis in poſtremum liberius frueretur (74). VIII. Mr Teiſſier ſays that Ramus learned Philoſophy of himſelf, and without a maſter (75). But Ramus himſelf acquainted the public, that he had gone through a courſe of Philoſophy in the colleges, which laſted three years and a half according to cuſtom. 'Cùm tres annos ſexque menſes, inquit, in Philoſophia 'ſcholaſtica ex Academiæ noſtræ legibus poſuiſſem: 'Logicis Organi libris cognoſcendis, diſputandis, me'ditandis (ex omnibus enim Ariſtotelicis libris, Lo'gici præcipue toto triennii tempore clamantur & re'clamantur) cùm, inquam, tempus illud ita tradu'xiſſem, & jam ut abſolutus artium ſcilicet magiſter, 'philoſophica laurea donatus eſſem: ſubducta ætatis 'meæ ratione, &c (76). - - - When I had ſpent three years and an half, ſays he, in the ſtudy of ſchool Phi'loſophy, according to the laws of our univerſity, in 'learning, diſputing, and meditating upon books of Logic, '(for of all Ariſtotle's books his Logic is chiefly minded 'during the whole three years) when I had ſpent that 'time, I ſay, in this manner, and was now made a 'Maſter of Arts, being crowned with the philoſophical 'laurel; without conſidering my age, &c.' IX. See number IV of this remark, and then you may judge whether it appears by two letters that Beza wrote to him in 1570, that he intended to retire to Geneva, and that Beza teſtified great regard for him (77).

[O] His ſect flouriſhed for ſome time.] It was unknown in Spain and Italy, and it made but a ſmall progreſs in France; but it proſpered very much in England and Scotland, and ſtill more in Germany; which appears from the many books that ſeveral German peripatetic Philoſophers publiſhed againſt the Ramiſts. Nay, ſome of them thought themſelves obliged to mention the reaſons of the growth of that ſect, for they could not bear that its progreſs ſhould be alledged as a proof of its truth. Et miramur adhuc quid rei ſit, cur . . . . ea (contra quam ſcribimus) philoſophandi ratio locum inveniat hoc ſeculo in pleriſque Germaniæ provinciis, etiam in iis, de quibus id nunquam quiſquam vel metuere vel ſperare potuiſſet? Non eſt ſane cauſa hujus per

(67) Audomar. Talæus, in Academia, apud Launcium, de Varia Ariſtotelis fortuna, pag. 59.

(68) Banoſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 28.

(69) The edition I uſe is of Francfort 1594; but Ramus's Life prefixed to it, which ſerves for an Epiſtle Dedicatory, to Sir Philip Sidney, is dated the firſt of January 1576.

(70) He removed all the images from the college of Prele, and hid them. See the following quotation.

(71) Banoſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 19, 20.

(72) Cum Heidelbergæ una apud Immanuelem Tremellium anno ſeptuageſimo viveremus, Gallicis concionibus ſemper interfuit, & ſacræ Cœnæ, edita primum fidei ſuæ confeſſione, cum magno Dei timore & cultus divini reverentia non ſemel communicavit. Ibid. pag. 25.

(73) Ramus, in Baſilea, pag. m. 58.

(74) Banoſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 24.

(75) Teiſſier, ubi ſupra, pag. 372.

(76) Freigius, ubi ſupra, pag. 10, quoting Ramus, in Epilogo libri quinti ſcholarum Dialecticarum.

(77) Teiſſier, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

againſt Paſquier [P], in which you will ſee ſomething concerning Mercerus.

per Germaniam & Angliam etiam ac Scotiam incrementi (nam in Italia, Hiſpania & Gallia etiam ipſa planè obſcura eſt philoſophiæ Rameæ fama) ſed hæc cauſa eſt, quod cauſam optimam commodè non agimus (78). Thoſe words are taken from a chapter of Keckerman, wherein he judiciouſly cenſures the method of the Ramiſts (79). That author (80) very much commends a piece which David Pareus publiſhed againſt them in 1589. I have ſaid in another place (81) that this excellent Divine had no great eſteem for their founder. Keckerman complains very much of the Ramiſt Henningus Rennemannus, who furiouſly inveighed againſt Beza and Zacharias Urſinus on Ramus's account. He mentions likewiſe another Ramiſt, a haughty and paſſionate writer, whoſe name was Caſpar Pfaffradius. ' (82) Scimus ' Philoſophos Rameos quodam eloquentiæ faſtu plerunque in alios (magiſtri ſui indole) deſpumare : exempla ſunt in luce : ex quibus unum illud proferam, ' quod & recens eſt, & præ reliquis inſigne, M. Henningi Rennemanni Saxonis, qui pro Ramea Philoſophia ' Diſſertationem ante annos circiter tres (83) ſcribere ' non potuit, quin maledicam linguam ſtringeret non ' tantum in Clariſſimum Philoſophum Philippum Scherbium, ſed & eos viros, qui Eccleſiam Chriſti adverſus ' Papatus furores, & Heterodoxorum ſophiſmata tot, ' tantis, tam tota Europa ſuſpiciendis ſcriptis juverunt. . . . . (84) Clariſſimum dico Theodorum Bezam, cujus ille Epiſtolas de P. Ramo ſcriptas, velut ' anathematicas lividè exagitat ; & item ſummum illum ' atque admirabilem æque Philoſophum ac Theologum ' Dominum Zachariam Urſinum, piæ memoriæ, cujus ' de P. Rami Dialectica & Rhetorica ſcriptum ad voluntatem Frideric III. Electoris Palatini Principis, ' merito certe, ſi quiſquam unquam Princeps, cognomentum Pii adepti, judicium, furentem vocat Rami ' exercitationem. - - - It is very well known that the ' Philoſophers who follow Ramus do with a certain pomp ' of Eloquence (after the manner of their maſter) bitterly ' carp at others, of which there are ſeveral inſtances. ' I ſhall mention one, which is both a late one, and like- ' wiſe remarkable above the reſt. I ſpeak of Henningus ' Renneman, the Saxon, who could not write a diſſerta- ' tion for the Ramean Philoſophy about three years ago, ' without railing in a ſcurrilous manner, not only at the ' moſt famous Philoſopher Philip Scherbius, but alſo at ' thoſe men who defended the Church of Chriſt againſt the ' fury of the Papiſts and ſophiſtry of the Heterodox by ' books that have been univerſally eſteemed. . . . . I mean ' the moſt famous Theodore Beza, whoſe epiſtles concern- ' ing Peter Ramus he ſpitefully takes to pieces, as if they ' were anathematized, and likewiſe that great and ad- ' mirable Philoſopher, as well as Divine, Mr Zacharias ' Urſinus, whoſe judgment on Ramus's Logic and Rhetoric, ' written at the deſire of Frederic III Elector Palatine ' (deſervedly firnamed the Pious, if ever any prince was ' ſo) he calls a furious invective againſt Ramus.' Paſquier ſays (85), Ariſtotle's Philoſophy has been baniſhed from the univerſities that are in the dominions of the landgrave of Hain (86), and they have embraced that of Ramus, and thoſe who ſtudy Logic call themſelves Ramiſts. Theſe words of Scaliger ſhall be my laſt proof, Ramus was a learned man, but he is too much valued. . . . . Ramus magnus fuit vir, ſed magni nimis fit (87). Ramiſm had been introduced into the univerſities of Holland, if Scaliger and ſome others had not prevented it. Cujus (Ramiſticæ Philoſophiæ) introductioni in Academias Belgii cordatiores & intelligentiores fortiter obſtiterunt, quos inter Joſephus Scaliger ſui ſæculi Phœnix emicuit (88). I find in a letter of Iſaac Pontanus, written in 1629 (89), that the Profeſſors of Harderwic adviſed the univerſity of Leyden to permit that Ramus's Logic, or that of du Moulin, ſhould be indifferently taught.

I have been informed (90) that Ramiſm flouriſhes in Swiſſerland to this day, and is countenanced by the magiſtrates of Bern ; ſo that the Profeſſors of Philoſophy at Bern, and at Lauſanne, are obliged to teach no other Logic but that of Ramus ; and if they dictate any thing taken from Claubergius, or from the Art of Thinking, they do it only under Ramus's auſpices, and, as it were, to explain his doctrine.

[P] I ſhall make a remark againſt Paſquier.] He obſerves (91) that la Fon complains (92), that one Ramus and Mercerus, who had gone aſtray from the antient religion, were at the head of the cabal, which obliged the parliament of Paris, in 1564, to refuſe the requeſts of the Jeſuits. His anſwer is, that neither Ramus nor Mercerus were particularly concerned in it, and that they only joined with the other royal Profeſſors. He adds (93), that Mercerus was ſo far from being a caballing man, that he underſtood nothing but Hebrew books, upon which he pored continually ; being a great man in the knowledge of that language, in which he ſurpaſſed the Jews in the opinion of the moſt learned, but a perfect ſtranger to the affairs of the world. Afterwards he goes on thus : The Jeſuits cauſed Verſoris's plea to be printed in the year 1595. *That man intending * to render the univerſity odious, gives out, not that Mercerus, but that Ramus and Gallandius had made themſelves ſollicitors of that cauſe ; but this appeared ſo unlikely, that it was looked upon as an incredible thing, by reaſon of the open enmity which had been between them all along, and which laſted till they died. An enmity, which Rabelais, the Lucian of our age, in the preface to his third book, and after him, that ingenious Poet Joachim du Bellay, in one of his moſt celebrated poems, jeſted upon in ſome places that are thought to be the fineſt pieces of their works. Beſides, Gallandius was all along a Roman Catholic.* Paſquier forgot the beſt way of refuting that plea, which is, that Gallandius, Ramus's adverſary, had been dead five years, when Verſoris pleaded the cauſe of the Jeſuits (94). Rabelais is not well quoted ; Paſquier ſhould have quoted the preface to the fourth book.

(78) Keckermann. in Præcogn. Logicis, Tract. ii, cap. iv, pag. m. 133.

(79) See alſo the preface to that book of Keckerman.

(80) Ibid. cap. vi, pag. 187.

(81) In the article PAREUS (DAVID), remark [H], at the end.

(82) Idem, Keckermann. ibid. cap. v, ſub fin. pag. 169.

(83) That book of Keckerman was printed in 1599.

(84) Ibid. pag. 170.

(85) Paſquier, ubi ſupra, cap. xviii, pag. 834.

(86) He ſhould have ſaid Heſſe.

(87) Scaligerana 2, pag. 201.

(88) Sam. Maresius, in Præfat. Indiculi præcurſor. Controverſiar. Theologic. adverſus Wittich.

(89) Printed in Matthæus's collection in 1695. It is the 99th.

(90) By Mr Des Maizeaux, the ſame of whom Mr Bernard has publiſhed a Memoir in his Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Nov. 1700, Art. I.

(91) Paſquier, Catechiſme des Jeſuites, book i, ch. v, pag. m. 43.

(92) See René de la Fon's Anſwer for the Religious of the Society of Jeſus, to Simon Marion's plea, pag. 28.

(93) Paſquier, ibid. pag. 46.

* In the 24th and 32d leaves of Verſoris's plea.

(94) Du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, pag. m. 661, ſays, that Peter Gilland, Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue, died the 31ſt of Auguſt 1559.

RANGOUZE, a French author in the reign of Lewis XIV, whoſe good qualities are unknown to me : for ſuch a name cannot be given to the induſtry, wherewith an author knows how to make his Epiſtles Dedicatory, and his flatteries turn to a good account. Not but that ſuch an induſtry, though very bad, morally ſpeaking, may hold a conſiderable rank among thoſe qualities which are ſaid to be good, whether they be natural or acquired [A]. Rangouze was endowed with

[A] Among thoſe qualities, which are ſaid to be good, whether they be natural or acquired.] All languages may be ſaid to be more or leſs barren ; which does particularly appear with reſpect to ſuch things as are deprived of the perfection that belongs to them. If that perfection be a moral virtue, thoſe things are ſaid to be bad ; if it be a phyſical virtue, they are alſo accounted bad. On the other hand, thoſe things are indifferently called good, that have the moral virtue of their kind, and the phyſical virtue that belongs to them. An unjuſt judge is called a bad judge ; and an ignorant Painter is called a bad Painter ; a wiſe and equitable judge is ſaid to be a good judge ; and he who can make fine pictures is ſaid to be a good painter. Here we are ſenſible, that we want words (1), ſince we are obliged to make uſe of the words good and bad, to denote a thouſand things of a very different nature. It is therefore no wonder, that I ſhould place the induſtry of the Sieur Rangouze in the number of good things, tho' I do not allow it to be a moral virtue. It is a good thing in the ſame ſenſe, as we ſay a good memory, good ſight, good ears, a good noſe, &c. when thoſe faculties have the perfection which nature intended for them. Every ſcience, without excepting that of tricking and cheating, is a kind of perfection : a ſubtle wit is a natural advantage, as ſtupidity and fooliſhneſs are great imperfections. Morally ſpeaking, the ſcience of cheating is neither good nor bad ; but Phyſically ſpeaking it is a very good quality, an advantage, a perfection. The ſimplicity of a man, who can neither cheat others, nor avoid being cheated, is, Phyſically ſpeaking, an imperfection, and a bad quality. If the art of cheating be reduced into practice, it becomes, morally ſpeaking,

(1) Obſerve, that the lazineſs of men, and the caprice of uſe, are alſo one cauſe of it ; for we might find out, if we pleaſed, other words to denote a Painter, who underſtands, or does not underſtand his art.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google with it in an eminent degree [B], as it will appear by my remarks.

ſpeaking, a very ill thing, and a crime fit to be puniſhed; but when ſome robbers are broke upon the wheel, whoſe induſtry, and other natural qualities, had attained to the higheſt degree of perfection in their kind, we admire for all that the Phyſical good that was in them; and we abhor only the ill uſe they made of it. We may therefore ſay in general, that the art of growing rich, either in the finances, or by trading, is a good thing, and a natural advantage, which deſerves to be eſteemed, when ſeparated from the ill uſe men may make of it. The ſame ought to be ſaid of a man's induſtry, who grows rich by the productions of his pen, and by the art of dealing in epiſtles dedicatory and books, which he ſends up and down. It cannot be denied that ſuch a man has a ſort of wit, and a kind of ſagacity and diſcerning, which is a natural perfection, that may be admired in ſome reſpects, though it ought to be deſpiſed and condemned, by reaſon of it's abuſes and it's ill conſequences. Equitable men do not equally cenſure that ſort of authors; they do not pour all the ſatirical ſtrokes, which Furetiere collected in his Somme Dedicatoire (z), upon thoſe, who having a great family, and no eſtate, or penſion from the public, cannot maintain themſelves any other way than with the help of their pen. This ſerves to excuſe the multitude of their dedications, and it is not ſo much a wonder that their works ſhould be divided into many tomes dedicated to ſo many different perſons, and that the ſecond editions ſhould be dedicated to new Mæcenas's, as it is that they ſhould be able to maintain honourably their wives and children with their pen, and that the ſubſiſtence of a large family ſhould depend altogether upon it. A very ingenious man has laid down a rule in vindication of thoſe, who apply themſelves to trifling things, which reaches the authors whom I am ſpeaking of. Theſe are his words: Beſides, it is well known that we have ſometimes very ſolid reaſons to apply our ſelves to ſome works that do not appear to be ſolid, and that a private and unknown duty prevails often without any injuſtice upon a public and notorious one. That man whom you blame, has, perhaps, good reaſon to believe, that in order to recover his health, which is very much impaired, to ſecure himſelf from poverty, to maintain his family, whoſe only ſupport he is, it is better for him to compoſe ſongs than moral and political treatiſes. If it be ſo, I make bold to ſay that he is obliged to write ſongs out of a moral and political principle, and it is a great piece of injuſtice to blame the occupations of other men, without knowing their motives and circumſtances (3).

(z) It is printed at the end of the Roman Bourgeois. You will find a kind of a Latin tranſlation of it in the preface to the third tome, Obſervationum ſelectarum ad Rem Literariam ſpectantium, printed at Hall in 1701.

(3) Pelliſſon, Diſcours ſur les Oeuvres de Mr Sarrazin, pag. m. 39, & 40.

[B] Rangouze was endowed with it in an eminent degree.] Coſtar ſupplies me with the proof of it. 'I 'am far from intending to make a compariſon with 'the Sieur de Rangouze, whoſe eloquence has pro- 'cured him fifteen or ſixteen hundred piſtoles within 'theſe eight months, and who may be ſtiled the Che- 'rilus of our age in proſe. Cherilus inculti qui ver- 'ſibus & male natis Retulit acceptos regale numiſma Phi- 'lippos. According to the Goſpel . . . . a tree is good 'that bears ſo good fruit. The tree of the garden of 'the Heſperides, ſo much talked of by the Poets, 'was not ſo valuable, ſince, according to a Greek 'ſcholiaſt of great authority, it bore golden apples 'only in it's ſeaſon, and not all the year (4).' Here is another witneſs, to wit, Madam de Scuderi. She ſpeaks of an author, who had three dedicatory epiſtles ready made for the ſame book, for three perſons very different in quality and merit; being reſolved to uſe that which would turn to the beſt account, and employing a third perſon to manage the buſineſs: and accordingly he dedicated the book to him who paid moſt for it, tho' he was a man of leſs merit than the other two. She ſays afterwards, that an author, who is dead, having prepared an epiſtle, which might be looked upon as a great panegyric, ſuppreſſed it, when he heard that the perſon, to whom he intended to dedicate his book, was out of favour. She adds, that a man of Dauphiné having made a panegyric upon Cardinal Richelieu, and finding him dead at his arrival, turned it into a panegyric upon the queen-mother, Anne of Auſtria. I have alſo been informed, that an author, who had very much, and very juſtly praiſed a man that was alive, deprived him of all the praiſes he had beſtowed upon him, tho' that man had done nothing that deſerved it; only he died without being able to reward that author according to his expectation. All theſe inſtances are very ſingular. But I have been told a pleaſant ſtory of one Rangouze, who made a collection of letters, and cauſed them to be printed, without numbring the pages. So that the Bookbinder placed at the beginning of the book ſuch a letter as the author thought fit; and by that means, all thoſe whom he preſented with his book, finding their names at the beginning of it, thought themſelves the more obliged to him for it. This ſeems to be a very odd thing, and that man was as fond of dedicating books as an eminent Phyſician of Italy, who having writ upon the aphoriſms of Hippocrates, dedicated each book of his Commentaries to one of his friends, and the Index to another (5). Now let us ſee what Sorel ſays: Rangouze's letters may very well be called golden letters, 'ſince he boaſted to write 'none for leſs than twenty or thirty piſtoles; for 'he ſeldom made any but for perſons of the higheſt 'quality, and who were able to pay well for them. 'They were all a kind of ſhort encomium upon 'thoſe to whom they were directed, containing an 'account of their beſt qualities and moſt remarkable 'actions, and ſeveral compliments for thoſe who af- 'forded him but little matter to enlarge upon. We 'have ſeen ſome ingenious people wonder how that 'man, who was no ſcholar, had been able to write 'ſo many different letters upon praiſes that were almoſt 'alike. I do not ſcruple to take notice of him; becauſe 'his books may, however, ſerve to inform thoſe, 'who are ignorant of the characters and fortunes of 'the great men of the kingdom (6).'

(4) Coſtar, Letter L, Part ii, pag. 115.

(5) Madam de Scuderi, Converſations ſur divers Sujets, Tom. i, in the dialogue that is at the beginning.

(6) Sorel, Bibl. Franç. pag. m. 119.

RAPHELENGIUS (Francis), born (a) in Flanders the twenty-ſeventh of February 1539, made himſelf famous for his great knowledge of the Oriental tongues. After he had begun his ſtudies at Ghent (b), he loſt his father; and his mother obliged him to betake himſelf to trade: but his maſters having ſent him to Nuremberg, and thoſe in whoſe houſe he lived allowing him time enough to ſatisfy his inclination for learning, he applied again to ſtudy. Being returned into Flanders he found an opportunity to go to Paris, where he made a great progreſs in the Greek and Hebrew languages. The civil wars forced him to retire from Paris, and he went into England, and taught Greek for ſome time in the univerſity of Cambridge. He returned afterwards into the Low-Countries, and was corrector of the preſs at Antwerp, in the houſe of the famous Chriſtopher Plantin; who was ſo well pleaſed with his learning and honeſty, that he made him his ſon-in-law in the year 1565 (c). Raphelengius did him great ſervices as to his Printing, eſpecially with reſpect to the edition of the famous Bible, called the Antwerp Bible [A]. Plantin being removed to Leyden, to be farther from (a) At Lanoi, near Liſle.

(b) And not at Louvain, as Moreri ſays.

(c) And not in the year 1555, as Moreri ſays.

[A] With reſpect to the edition of the famous Bible, called, the Antwerp Bible.] I ſhall uſe the words of Meurſius, to ſhew how far Raphelengius contributed to it: 'In horum editione incredibile quan- 'tos labores Raphelengius ſuſtinuerit, dum accuratiſ- 'ſime ſingula recognoſcit; Annotationibus, ubi opus 'erat, illuſtrat; verſionem interlinearem adornat; 'Grammaticam Hebræam, ex optimis quibuſque 'Grammaticis, cum judicio & cura collectam, addit; 'Epitomen Theſauri linguæ Hebrææ Santis Pagnini 'infinitis vocibus auget, & innumeris locis emendat; 'quod ſatis teſtimonio Benedicti Ariæ Montani, inter 'Prolegomena

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google from the troubles, left his Printing-presses under the direction of his son-in-law; but when he returned to Antwerp, in 1585, Raphelengius, on the contrary, went to Leyden with all his family. He took care of the Printing-house that his father-in-law had there; and made himself so agreeable to the curators of the university that they conferred upon him the Hebrew professorship. He discharged the duties of it to his honour, and spent part of his time in the study of the Arabic tongue, and even composed a Dictionary in that language (d). He had scarce made an end of it when he died, the 20th of July 1597. He had been wishing for death three years before; for he struggled with two domestic enemies [B], that were very troublesome to him; one was his grief for the loss of his wife, and the other a Palsy (e).

(d) It was printed with Erpenius's notes in 1613.

(e) Taken from Meurſius, in Athenis Batavis, pag. 140, & ſeq.

'Prolegomena præmiſſo, patet. Multa iiſdem annis 'ad ornamenta librorum, quos ſocer excudebat, præ- 'cipue in linguis Orientalibus, corrigendo, illuſtran- 'doque, præſtitit; quamvis raro nomen ſuum adſcribi 'pateretur (1). - - - It is incredible how much pains Ra- 'phelengius took in the edition of theſe books, while he 'examined every part of them with the greateſt accuracy, 'illuſtrated them with annotations wherſoever there 'was occaſion, improved the interlineary tranſlation, 'added a Hebrew Grammar, collected with care and 'judgment from all the beſt Grammarians, augmented 'Pagninus's Epitome Theſauri Linguæ Hebrææ, with 'an infinite number of words, and corrected it in a vaſt 'many places; all which appears plain enough from the 'teſtimony of Benedictus Arias Montanus, inſerted among 'the Prolegomena. In the ſame years he was of 'great ſervice to his father-in-law, in correcting and 'illuſtrating the books which he was then printing, 'particularly thoſe written in the Oriental languages; 'tho' he would rarely ſuffer his name to be put to 'them.'

(1) Meurſius, Athen. Bat. p. 140.

[B] He ſtruggled with two domeſtic enemies.] Moreri is here guilty of the ſophiſm called, à non ſufficienti enumeratione partium; which is the leaſt thing that he can be reproached with; for it might be ſaid, that he has neither wholly nor partly expreſſed the thought of the author quoted by him. Let us compare his words with thoſe of Meurſius. He died, ſays he, of grief for the loſs of his wife. Thus he renders theſe Latin words; Mors quam toto triennio præ tædio amiſſæ uxoris & paralyſi afflictatus ſæpe optaverat, virum optimum humanis exemit (2). It does not appear by this paſſage that the loſs of Raphelengius's wife created ſuch a grief in him as occaſioned his death; it appears only that the grief he conceived for her loſs, together with a Palſy, made him often wiſh for death for the ſpace of three years. If it be ſaid, in Moreri's vindication, that this grief might have occaſioned a Palſy, and that therefore he might very well reduce the two cauſes mentioned by Meurſius into one; I anſwer, that a Copiſt ought never to give his own thoughts and conjectures as matters of fact that are to be found in the authors to which he refers us. But not to dwell on theſe trifles, I proceed to a more important obſervation. Raphelengius regretted the loſs of his wife, and thought himſelf an unhappy man in ſurviving her; which ſhews that he loved her, and that his marriage had been very comfortable to him: It was therefore a very happy marriage. Now let us conſider the conſequences of this happy marrige, to wit, three years under a kind of deſpair. What muſt we think therefore of an unhappy marriage, ſince a happy one is attended with ſuch conſequences? But let us not argue in this manner according to the law of contraries. Let us rather ſay, that an unhappy marriage is attended with great advantages. The perſon that ſurvives the other is not afflicted in the leaſt; his widowhood is a ſtate of tranquillity and pleaſure. So that, inſtead of conſidering only the miſeries of this life, we muſt conſider the mixture of good and evil, which is allotted to man. We muſt remember the two caſks of Homer, of which I ſpeak in another place (3). It ought to be ſaid, that what comes down upon earth is a mixt liquor; but in ſuch a manner, that the good and bad drink ſucceed the one to the other. If you begin with the one, you will end with the other. If you have been happy when married, you are unhappy being a widower; but if you have been unhappy in your marriage, your widowhood will be a ſtate of happineſs to you. I do not deny, that in ſome reſpects the two liquors are mixed and confounded together as to their inſenſible parts, ſince there is ſcarce any pleaſure but what is immediately attended with ſome trouble; but it is certain, that in other reſpects the fate of man is in a glaſs, wherein the good and bad liquor are placed as it were in ſeveral ſtories. I have enquired in another place (4), whether the quantity of the bad liquor exceeds the quantity of the good. I ſhall ſay no more of it; but however I muſt obſerve, that that thoſe who alledge the marriage of Raphelengius, to ſhew that good exceeds evil, might be miſtaken in their calculation. He enjoyed the company of his wife twenty-nine years, and felt the miſery of widowhood only three. He had therefore, will you ſay, a greater ſhare of happineſs than of miſery. This conſequence will be denied. A man, who for the ſpace of three years is ſo tormented with pains and ſorrows, that he often wiſhes death would come to his deliverance, ſwallows a greater quantity of the bad liquor, than he had ſwallowed of the good for the ſpace of thirty years. For you muſt not fancy, that the marriage of this man was wine without any mixture during twenty-nine years. Not to mention the croſſes and ſorrows that proceeded from other cauſes, let us conſider only the ill ſide of his marriage. Thoſe who are extreamly afflicted for the death of their wives, did not always live with them without ſome miſunderſtanding. Beſides, the more they love them, the more they are afraid when they fall ſick. Do not tell me, that at this rate it were better for them to hate their wives; for I ſhall anſwer, that their unconcernedneſs at their wives being in danger of death, does not equal the dreadful evils of conjugal hatred. Nay, it might be ſaid, that if on the one ſide they are not afraid that they will die, they are afraid on the other ſide that they will not die. Now that fear is ſufficient to counter-balance that good. I wonder we do not find in the works of the Antients a dilemma expreſſed differently from that of Bias (5), for inſtance, in this manner: either you will love your wife, or you will not love her: if you love her, you will be always afraid of loſing her; if you do not love her, you will be always afraid that ſhe will not die. This dilemma is not better than that of Bias; for, without examining the other faults, it would be ſufficient to ſay, that, according to the uſual courſe of all ages, conjugal love and hatred are not carried ſo far. Some few inſtances ought not to make one afraid of having an uneaſy fondneſs, or a vexing antipathy. One may very well hope to enjoy the preſent time, as moſt huſbands do, without making one's ſelf uneaſy about the time to come.

(2) Meurſius, ibid.

A REFLEXION on the conſequences of marriage.

(3) In the article MANICHEES, remark [C], about the middle.

(4) In the article XENOPHANES, remark [D].

(5) See the article BION, remark [G].

RAPIN (NICOLAS), was Provoſt-marſhal and a Poet, two things that are ſeldom to be found in one and the ſame perſon. He committed but few faults as a Poet; but he committed ſome in the adminiſtration of Juſtice, which were ſo enormous, that had it not been for the credit of his patrons, he would have been puniſhed with death [A]. He was a man of parts, and did not ſuffer himſelf to be corrupted by the Leaguers.

[A] Had it not been for the credit of his patrons, he would have been puniſhed with death.] I have but one authority for it; the reader may think of it as he pleaſes. 'All the people of Fontenai are naught, 'and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Leaguers. He followed Henry III when that prince fled from Paris, and wrote several satirical verses against the faction of the Sixteen (a). He had a great share in the ingenious satire called the Catholicon d'Espagne [B]. After the death of his son, upon whom he had bestowed all his employments (b), he retired to Fontenai-le-Comte, the place of his nativity, and died in the year 1609 [C]. I shall mention some circumstances of his death, which seem to me to be very curious [D]. He was buried without any pomp; but, some say, it was not according to his last intention [E]. He had been a great

(b) Ibid.

(a) Sequutus est Henricum III cum fœderati eum Lutetia pellerent, & Cæsaroduni Turonum multa egregia carmina in monstrum Parisiense, quod sedecim capitibus constabat, vulgavit. Continuat. Thuani, lib. ii, sub fin.

'and so is Mr Rapin, whose life I have saved, which 'he confesses: he is the son of a priest. He was mayor 'of Fontenai, and caused some Protestants to be massa- 'cred; so that at the time of the extraordinary sessions, 'he was prosecuted by all the inhabitants of his town, 'both Catholics and Protestants, and by all the nobi- 'lity of the lower Poitou, I was the only one who 'opposed it; he had corrupted me by his verses, and 'he knew very well that I was a man of great inte- 'rest. He is beholden to me for his life, next to 'President du Harlay, so that he now loves the 'Protestants (1).'

(1) Scaliger, in Scaligerana, voce Rapin, p. m. 201.

[B] He had a great share . . . . in the Catholicon d'Espagne.] We find in Mr du Puy's notes, which were published with that satire, in 1677, that the speech of the archbishop of Lyons, that of Roze, and that which d'Engoulevent was to deliver, were made by Rapin. If it be so, d'Aubigné should not have gone about to undeceive those, who ascribed the whole satire Menippée to that fine wit; to tell us afterwards that he made only some verses that are in it *: perhaps he said so, because in the works of Rapin, printed in 4to at Paris, in the year 1610, there are but three Latin epigrams that make part of the Catholicon (2). This reflexion of the author of the Notes is a solid one.

* D'Aubigné, Tom. iii, lib. iii, cap. xiii.

(2) Notes on the Catholicon, pag. 385, Edit. 1696.

Mr de Vigneul Marville, who has collected many curious things concerning the Catholicon d'Espagne, observes that Pasquier and Rapin made the verses of the second part, which was intituled, Abregé des Etats de la ligue convoquez à Paris au dixième Fevrier; that the same Rapin made the speech of the archbishop of Lyons, and that of Dr Rose; and that he made a collection of all the other speeches, which he added to the Catholicon d'Espagne (3), under the title of Satire Menipée; and that it is upon this account that many have ascribed the whole Catholicon to him (4).

(3) It is the title of the first part of the work written by Mr le Roy, a canon of Rouën.

(4) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Histoire & de Litérature, Tom. i, p. 201, Rouën 1699.

[C] He died in the year 1609.] Botereius (5), the French Mercury (6), and the Continuator of Thuanus (7), mention his death in that year. Father Garasse, whom I shall quote by and by, says, that in the month of December, 1608, he was present at Mr Rapin's death, who had been for some weeks in a languishing condition. Now because Moreri says, that Rapin died the fifteenth of February, 1608, I fancy Garasse meant, that this brave man fell sick in December 1608, and died some weeks after. If this be his meaning, what he says is a confutation of Moreri, not as to the day, but as to the year of Rapin's death. However it be, I am of their opinion who place his death in the year 1609. Nevertheless, I see that several exact writers follow Moreri (8).

(5) Rodolph. Botereius, de Rebus in Gallia Gestis Commentar. lib. xvi, p. 567, 568.

(6) Tom. i, p. 408.

(7) Lib. ii, in fine.

(8) Baillet, Jugem. sur les Poëtes, num. 1376. The author of the Notes upon the Catholicon, ubi supra.

[D] Some circumstances of his death . . . . . very curious.] Here is a long passage of Father Garasse. The reader may judge of it as he thinks fit. 'In the 'month of December 1608, I happened to be pre- 'sent in Poitiers (9) at Mr Rapin's death, who having 'lived a pretty loose life for the space of seventy-four 'years, indulging his youthful passions, and follow- 'ing the humours of the times, whereby he got into 'dangerous acquaintance, died in the hands of four 'Fathers of our society, after he had been for some 'weeks in a languishing condition; expressing a won- 'derful joy, because he was so happy as to depart 'this life in the presence of those whom he had 'persecuted all his life-time, without knowing them. 'After he had confessed, which he did with a very 'lively sense of his sins, before he received the holy 'sacrament, the room wherein he died being full of 'the most eminent persons of the town, he made 'the general confession of his past life in three ar- 'ticles: 1. That he had never been a Huguenot, 'and had never wavered in his belief, tho' he had 'familiarly conversed with the Huguenots, and very 'much hated the Jesuits. 2. That he had lived a very 'licentious life, and did not belive that God could 'have found him better disposed at any other mo- 'ment of his life. 3. That the only good thing he 'remembered to have done from his younger days, 'was, his preventing the teaching of Atheism at 'Paris, in a public manner; and then turning him- 'self towards the Fathers, there present, he told them 'the story in short. He said there was in his time a 'miscreant at Paris, a stranger, of a subtile and fa- 'ctious spirit (§ α), who having got himself familiarly 'acquainted with those seven fine wits, that made up 'the set, or Pleiad, of the Poets, of which Ronsard 'was the chief, began to spread some pernicious and 'abominable maxims against the Deity, which had 'already staggered some of those wits, forasmuch as 'our souls are more susceptible of evil, than of good 'impressions. When I perceived, said Rapin, that 'some were charmed with the novelty of that do- 'ctrine, four of us stood up against that impious 'man, and settled the wavering minds of the other 'three, and of several others whom that wretched 'fellow had spoiled by his conversation. Ronsard 'was the first, said he, who siding with me, ex- 'claimed against him, and wrote that fine poem 'against the Atheists, which begins thus:

O ciel, ô terre, ô mer, ô Dieu Pere commun, &c.

'Turnebus made a fine speech against him, and Sam- 'marthanus, an excellent poem in Iambic verse, in- 'tuled, IN MEZENTIUM, without naming him, 'because he was a profligate wretch, whose name 'would have profaned one's writings. We did not 'give over, said Rapin, till we had got that infamous 'man condemned to death by a decree of parlia- 'ment; and accordingly he was hanged and burnt at 'the Greve. Had it not been for us, said he, per- 'haps France would have been a sink of Atheism at this 'present time; especially if he had been countenanced 'by us to introduce his maxims. Such were the last 'last words of Rapin (10).'

(10) Garasse, Doctrine Curieuse, book ii, pag. 124, & seq.

[(§ α) He probably means Geoffry Vallée of Orleans, who was hanged and burnt at the Greve for Atheism, February the ninth, 1573 *. Concerning the three Poets of the Pleiad, who, according to Garasse, had been seduced by that wretch, see the Memoirs of the State of France, &c. Tom. 1. fol. 278, verso of edit. 1579. REM. CRIT.]

* New Menagiana, Tom. iii, pag. 311.

[E] Some say it was not according to his last intention.] I shall quote again Father Garasse. The late Scævola Sammarthanus, says he (11), 'made a glo- 'rious, and true encomium upon Mr Rapin, his good 'friend, in which he says, that Delatus est Fon- 'tenaïum, & modico funeris apparatu, quemadmo- 'dum Testamento præscripserat, sepultus. - - - - He 'was carried to Fontenai, and was buried there at 'a small expence, as he desired by his last will; 'but it is necessary for Rapin's honour to know 'the story exactly, as it happened, and I have 'been an eye-witness of it. It is therefore true, that 'the late Mr Nicolas Rapin, being upon his death- 'bed, in the extraordinary cold winter of the year '1608, had made his will, before he confessed to 'Father James de Moucy, wherein he ordered, that 'his body should be carried from Poitiers to Fontenai, 'in the same manner as that of Budæus was carried 'from St Avoye-street, to the convent of the Ce- 'lestins, viz. without torches, without any pomp, 'and without any company, upon a waggon covered 'with black cloth, only with a boy walking before 'it with a bell, and a lanthorn in his hand. But 'having been told that such a burial might be ill 'construed, and would confirm several people in the 'opinion they had entertained of his being a liber- 'tine in point of religion, he changed his mind, 'and made a codicil, wherein he revoked his first 'intention,

(11) Garasse, ubi supra, book vii, pag. 622, 623.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google great enemy to the Proteſtants [F], and afterwards to the Jeſuits (c). His friends beſtowed this elogy upon him, that he was the moſt learned ſoldier, and the moſt valiant counſellor, in the world (d). You will find ſome other things concerning him in Moreri.

(c) See the remark [D].

(d) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 122.

' intention, and inſtead of his cook, whom he had ' appointed the executor of his will, he deſired Father ' Francis Solier, who was preſent, and who was to ' preach all the Lent at Fontenai, in the year 1609, ' to order matters ſo that he might have a decent ' burial, as it is practiſed among the Catholics, with ' the uſual prayers, in which he ſeemed to put great ' truſt. It is true, that by the fault of his heirs, ' his codicil was not exactly executed according to ' his deſires; but his death, his confeſſion, his tears, ' and the ſtory which I have related in the ſecond ' book, ſhewed that he died a very good Ca- ' tholic.

[F] He had been a great enemy to the Proteſtants.] We have already ſeen what Joſeph Scaliger ſays of it: but the following words contain a more formal proof; for we find there that the Proteſtants having made themſelves maſters of Fontenai, in the year 1570, refuſed to comprehend the mayor Rapin in the capitulation: however they ſuffered him to make his eſcape. The beſieged ' being ſummoned to ſur- ' render, had no ſooner demanded that their lives ' ſhould be ſaved, and they ſhould come out with ' arms and baggage; but it was granted them by ' Soubize, who commanded in the abſence of la Noue, ' till they ſhould know what was reſolved in the ' council of Rochelle; and the capitulation was ' faithfully obſerved by the Proteſtants, who per- ' mitted them to go to Niort, whither they ' brought the news of the ſurrender, which happened ' the 28th of June, without conſulting the mayor ' Rapin. He was ſo much hated by the Proteſtants, ' either becauſe he had formerly declared againſt ' them, or becauſe at his perſuaſion Landereau had ' ſided with the contrary party, that he was dili- ' gently ſought for that they might put him to ' death. When the town had ſurrendered, and his ' friends were going out of it, (and that the Pro- ' teſtants would not ſuffer him to be comprehended ' in the capitulation) he diſguiſed himſelf in the habit ' of a ſervant, and concealed himſelf in the houſe of ' a poor woman; from thence he ſent to Creſſon- ' niere, and deſired of him that he might be ſet at ' liberty. Creſſonniere got him ſafely conducted out ' of town, and then he, with the other Catholics, re- ' tired to Niort (12).'

(12) La Vraie & entiere Hiſtoire des Troubles, livr. xxv, fol. 387, Edit. of Rochelle, 1573.

RAPIN (RENATUS) a famous Jeſuit, who profeſſed the fourth vow, was born at Tours in the year 1621, and was admitted into the ſociety in the year 1639. He taught the Belles Lettres for the ſpace of nine years (a). He had in a particular manner made it his ſtudy, and ſhewed by ſome Latin pieces [A], that he was able to treat the moſt curious ſubjects with a great deal of art and eloquence. He excelled in Latin poetry [B]; and having at laſt ventured to write in French, he ſucceeded in it to admiration. He compoſed in that language ſeveral treatiſes of Literature, and ſeveral pious books, which met with a good reception. The treatiſes of Literature having been publiſhed at ſeveral times, were collected together, and printed at Paris in 1684, in two volumes in 4to, and at Amſterdam in two volumes in 12mo, in the year 1686. There are very long extracts of them in the firſt tome of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, and in the Acta Eruditorum (b). The pious treatiſes were moſt of them printed together at Amſterdam in 1695 (c). Some are of opinion that he is too peremptory, for a man who ſeems to have more judgment and delicacy than learning (d). He died at Paris the twenty-ſeventh of October 1687. His elogy came out the month following (e): it is ſhort and well turned, and it was written by Father Bouhours. He is repreſented there as being endowed with all the beſt qualifications that an honeſt man and a good Chriſtian can have. We find there, among other things, that his zeal for religion, and for the honour of his ſociety, prompted him above twenty years ago to undertake a great work, to which he applied himſelf conſtantly, though he could not expect to ſee it publiſhed, and that God enabled him to finiſh it before he died. This great work is the Hiſtory of Janſeniſm. Father Rapin was one of the moſt dangerous adverſaries of that party: he attacked them on their weak ſide in a Latin book which he publiſhed in 1658 [C]. The Janſeniſts raiſed

(a) Ex Nathanaele Sotuello, Biblioth. Script. Societ. pag. 717.

(b) Pag. 192, & 263, & ſeq. ann. 1686.

(c) See the Journal of Leipſic 1695, pag. 387.

(d) See the paſſage of the Menagiana, in the remark [F].

(e) His article in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary is taken from thence. See an extract of this elogy in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, November 1687, p. 413. See alſo Rabutin's 31ſt and 32d Letters of the 2d part, and the 125th Letter of the 3d part.

[A] By ſome Latin pieces.] Theſe are the titles of ſome of them: Sereniſſimæ Reipublicæ Venetæ trophæum ob debellatum Turcam & reſtitutam Societatem Jeſu, Paris 1657, in fol. Trophæum famæ Eminentiſſimo Cardinali Mazarino, ibid. 1657, in fol. Lacrymæ in alumni ſui Alphonſi Mancini tumulum nepotis ejuſdem Cardinalis (1), ibid. 1658, in fol. Pacis triumphalia ad Em. Cardinalem Mazarinum, ibid. 1659, in fol. Pax Themidis cum Muſis, ibid. 1659, in fol. Paciſor Delphinus, ibid. in fol. To which may be added, his Elogium Francifci Foucquet defuncti, ibid. 1669.

(1) Father Rapin had been director of the ſtudies to the nephew of cardinal Mazarin.

[B] He excelled in Latin poetry.] Beſides the pieces mentioned in the foregoing remark, ſee his Eclogæ Sacræ cum diſſertatione de carmine paſtorali. printed at Paris 1659, in 4to, and his Chriſtus patiens carmine heroico, printed in the ſame place, in 1674, in 12mo. But above all, ſee his Hortorum libri IV, quibus addita eſt diſputatio de univerſa hortenſis culturæ diſciplina. This work printed in 4to at Paris in 1665 (2), was reprinted there in 12mo, in 1666. It was very much commended in the Journal des Savans (3). Conſult Mr Baillet (4), who has collected a great many curious remarks relating to Father Rapin, conſidered as a Poet, moſt of which are to the honour of that Jeſuit. See alſo the ninth Journal des Savans, of the year 1682, which mentions the collections of all the poems of Father Rapin (5).

(2) And not in 1661, as Southwel affirms, in Biblioth. Script. pag. 717.

(3) See the Journal of the ninth of February 1665; and that of the tenth of May 1666.

(4) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, num. 1537.

(5) Printed at Paris in two volumes in 12mo, in the year 1682.

There are ſome people, who ſay that he has been too much flattered in Mr Baillet's Jugemens, and that the Jeſuits pretend that his Latin Verſes do not come up to the delicacy and purity of thoſe of Father Commire, nor to the loftineſs and majeſty of thoſe of Father de la Rue, nor to the eaſineſs and neatneſs of thoſe of Father Coſſart, to ſay nothing of thoſe of Father Hoſchius and Father Vallius; and that his Gardens are the beſt of his Poems, after which he never advanced his reputation. They were reprinted at Naples, and tranſlated into Engliſh by J. Evelyn: which tranſlation was dedicated to Lord Arlington, and printed at London in 8vo, in the year 1673.

[C] He attacked the Janſeniſts on their weak ſide (6) in a Latin book he publiſhed in the year 1658.] His book (7) is intituled Diſſertatio de nova doctrina, ſeu Evangelium Janſeniſtarum. I confeſs I have not read it, and I think the moſt learned men in foreign countries may ſay the ſame; but a man of parts told me the turn which Father Rapin had given it. He ſuppoſes a Janſeniſt, who goes into the country of the Infidels to preach the goſpel to them, and who does ſincerely teach his ſyſtem concerning Grace, viz. that the greateſt part of mankind have been predeſtinated to everlaſting puniſhments from all eternity, and the reſt to the joys of Heaven; that God, the author of this abſolute Predeſtination, being not willing to want ſome

(6) Note, that I do not mean that the doctrine of Grace is the weak ſide of Janſeniſm: I mean, that the weak ſide of that doctrine is the occaſion it gives to declaim againſt it, by reaſon of the injuſtice of the puniſhments, &c.

(7) Printed at Paris in 8vo, 1658.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

raiſed many clamours againſt an anonymous letter which he publiſhed [D] ſince the peace of the church, as they call it. It is pleaſant enough to find that Jeſuit placed among the Phyſicians in ſome Biographers [E]. In the Menagiana the circumſtances of his quarrel with his fellow Jeſuit, Francis Vavaſſeur, have not been well related [F]. His enemies endeavoured to expoſe him to the indignation of the late Prince of Condé, by the malicious turn they gave to his treatiſe on the Sublime (f).

(f) You will find ſomething in his vindication in the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lett. March 1686, p. 356. This work had been mentioned in the Nouvelles of February 1686, p. 237.

ſome pretences to colour his decrees of damnation, declares to men that it is in their power to obtain ſalvation; that in order to it they need only obey his commands: he threatens them, he exhorts them; but at the ſame time he knows very well that it is impoſſible for them to do what he commands, that they cannot obey him for want of that efficacious grace, which he refuſes to all men, excepting his elect, and without which they cannot mend their lives, nor even have a good thought. Father Rapin ſuppoſes that the Infidels hearing ſuch a goſpel, are ſtrangely ſurprized at ſuch a deſcription of GOD, and ask why he ſends Preachers to thoſe, whom he knows to be uncapable of being converted, unleſs he beſtows upon them a grace, which he is obliged to refuſe them, by reaſon of his eternal decrees. Father Rapin's Janſeniſt anſwers, that God uſes ſuch a method, to render men more inexcuſable, and more obnoxious to Hell torments. It is replied, that ſuch a motive is not worthy of the Being infinitely good, and that this is not a proper way to make men inexcuſable before the throne of GOD; that it may be pleaded, that none is bound to do an impoſſibility, and that never any lawgiver inflicts puniſhments, but upon ſuppoſition that the tranſgreſſors of the laws had it in their power to have obſerved them: For which reaſon Lunatics are never puniſhed. One may eaſily gueſs what a Moliniſt, who knows how to make the beſt of his argument, may ſay pro and con, having entered upon the diſcourſe as I have related it. But beſides many other good anſwers, he might be told, that if a Janſeniſt was to preach to the Infidels of Japan or China for the firſt time, he would not be ſuch a fool as to begin with the doctrine that denies man's free will, or with that of abſolute Predeſtination. He would preach as the Pelagians do, and as is recommended by one of our moſt rigid Predeſtinarians (8), and he would lay aſide his Janſeniſm, and conceal it until his young diſciples ſtand no longer in need of milk, and are capable of ſolid nouriſhment. They are myſteries which ought to be diſcovered to none but thoſe that are initiated.

(8) See Mr Jurieu's book, intituled, Jugemens ſur les Méthodes d'expliquer la Grace.

[D] The Janſeniſts have exclaimed very much againſt an anonymous letter which he publiſhed.] It is written to Cardinal Cibo, and dated in July 1680 (9). A French tranſlation of it came out in Holland, in 1684 dated the 30th of Auguſt 1683. See what the author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres ſaid of it (10). As to the complaints of the Janſeniſts againſt that little book, ſee among other works the eighth volume of the Morale pratique. You will find there alſo (11) that Father Eſtrix, a Flemiſh Jeſuit, is the author of the book intituled, De fraudibus Hæreticorum, which came out under the falſe name of Francis Simonis; and that Father Rapin is ſo well pleaſed with that book, that he has tranſlated it into French, and that, to give it more authority, he has dedicated it to the archbiſhops and biſhops of France, with a preface, wherein he acknowledges that the works of Francis Simonis, written in Latin, and printed at Cologne, had occaſioned his book, and furniſhed him with memoirs for the compoſing of it (12). That work of Father Rapin is intituled, Artifices des Heretiques: it was printed at Paris in 1681, and reprinted the ſame year in the Low-Countries. See the Critique generale (13) de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme (14).

(9) See the Morale pratique des Jeſuites, Tom. viii, pag. 97.

(10) In January 1686, pag. 97, & ſeq.

(11) Pag. 50.

(12) Ibid. pag. 51.

(13) Letter iii, pag. 302, of the third edition.

(14) That is, the Hiſtory of Calviniſm, by Mr Maimbourg.

[E] We ſee this Jeſuit placed among the Phyſicians by ſome Biographers.] He is not numbered among Phyſicians in the new edition of Vander Linden's de Scriptis Medicis (15); but his Hortorum libri, are placed there, and then all his works in general, Opera omnia, Lugduni Batavorum, 1672, in 12mo. I ſhall ſay nothing of Bartholinus, who has inſerted that Jeſuit in his catalogue of ſuch Phyſicians as have been Poets (16); for he does not ſay that he was not a Jeſuit: but I cannot paſs over in ſilence what has been already obſerved by Mr Baillet. Theſe are his words: 'Mr Koni-'gius .... divides Father Rapin into two, and ſays, '1. Henricus Rapinus quatuor libros hortorum, anno '1671 edi curavit. Afterwards he ſpeaks of Nicolas 'Rapin of Poitou, the great provoſt of the conſtable's 'juriſdiction, whom I have mentioned in another 'place; and then he adds, 2. Renatus Rapinus Medicus anno 1659 claruit. Opera ejus Medica prodierunt anno 1672. Extant ejuſdem Eclogæ ſacræ, item, Hortus Epigrammatum. See the 678th page. What 'he calls books of Phyſic, is nothing elſe but the four 'books about Gardens, whoſe title he had only ſeen 'in the Utrecht edition, that came out in the year he 'mentions. One may eaſily find out the cauſe of his 'other miſtakes. Some other foreign authors, as Mr 'Beughem in Holland, and Mr Lipenius in Germany, 'have alſo placed Father Rapin among the Phyſicians. 'But they cannot be taxed with any error, as long as 'they are not miſtaken about the name, the perſon, 'and the work of the author, and do not explain 'themſelves about his profeſſion. My intent was not 'to cenſure Mr Konigius for want of exactneſs; he 'has done nothing on this occaſion, but what is uſual 'with the writers of Bibliotheques, who ſpeak of foreign books which they have not ſeen. On the 'contrary, I deſigned to ſhew by this inſtance, that 'thoſe, who undertake ſuch works, are very excuſable, becauſe they cannot avoid falling into ſuch like 'miſtakes (17).'

(15) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 938. It is ſaid there that the Hortorum libri have been printed in 4to, at Paris in 1661, and 1666, and at Leyden in 12mo, in 1666, and 1668, and at Utrecht in 12mo, in 1672.

(16) Thom. Bartholin. de Medicis Poëtis, pag. 136.

(17) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, num. 1537.

[F] In the Menagiana the circumſtances of his quarrel with .... Vavaſſeur, have not been well related.] I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage of the Menagiana, becauſe it confirms what I have already touched upon in the text of this article. 'Father Rapin was not 'ſufficiently qualified to draw a parallel between Virgil and Homer. Tanaquillus Faber, whom he intended to convert at that time, ſupplied him with 'the Greek paſſages quoted by him. After he had 'read his parallel between Ariſtotle and Plato, at the 'firſt preſident de la Moignon's, I told him I had 'found but one fault in it, to wit, that ſpeaking of 'the Colophonian woman, whom Plato loved, he had 'ſaid that ſhe was young; whereas it is ſaid in the 'Greek epigram, wherein mention is made of her, 'that the God of Love had placed himſelf in her 'wrinkles. Whereupon the abbot Tallemant ſaid, 'That the Father was very excuſable, becauſe he did 'not believe that ſo wiſe a man as Plato would have 'been in love with an old woman. Father Rapin 'made very good Latin verſes, but he had no great 'learning. He had a great quarrel with Father Va-'vaſſeur, and bought off the whole impreſſion of that 'Father's book de Epigrammate, by the authority of 'the firſt preſident, in order to ſuppreſs it, ſo that it 'is grown very ſcarce (18).' What is ſaid here of Vavaſſeur's book de Epigrammate is falſe, and has been rectified in the ſecond edition, thus: He quarrelled with Father Vavaſſeur on account of his Reflexions on Ariſtotle's Poetics, which he cauſed to be printed by Muguet, without putting his name to that book. Father Vavaſſeur, who was not well pleaſed with him, publiſhed ſoon after ſome Remarks upon thoſe Reflexions, in which he treats very ill the author of the reflexions, pretending not to know him. Father Rapin made a great noiſe about it, and openly complained of the proceeding of his fellow Jeſuit; who anſwered that it was his own fault, and that if he had declared himſelf to be the author of the Reflexions, he had never writ againſt him. The expedient, found to reconcile thoſe Fathers, was to ſuppreſs the Remarks of Father Vavaſſeur, which was done by the authority of the firſt preſident de la Moignon; ſo that this book, which was printed by Billaine in 1675, and which contains but 141 pages, is grown very ſcarce (19). See the Critique generale of Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (20), where you will find ſomething about that conteſt, and about another quarrel of Father Rapin (21). I ſhall further obſerve two things. (22) As Father Vavaſſeur had made two large books of Epigrams (23), he was not well pleaſed with theſe words of Father Rapin in his reflexions upon Ariſtotle's Poetics, that it is ſo rare a thing to make very good epigrams, that it is enough to have made ſome few in one's lifetime (24); and this is it which prompted him to write againſt that book of Father Rapin. I learned this particular from himſelf. They are Mr Menage's words. The

(18) Menagiana, pag. 60, 61, of the firſt Dutch Edit.

(19) Menagiana, pag. 83, of the 2d Dutch Edit.

(20) In the 4th letter.

(21) That which he had with Father Maimbourg.

(22) Menage, Anti-Baillet, ch. lxxxiv.

(23) You will find at the end of the book de Epigrammate, of the Paris Edit. 1672, three pretty ſmall books of Vavaſſeur's epigrams. He publiſhed, in 1675, an appendix to the third book, and the fourth book ſome time after.

(24) Theſe words are to be found in the Anti-Baillet, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The second thing I am to observe is, that Father Rapin in the new edition of his Reflexions, did not correct all the faults censured by his fellow Jesuit: he was contented to correct some few, and retained some that are not to be maintained. He affirms in the first edition, that Homer never said any impious thing (25); he affirms it still in the other editions, tho' his censurer had proved to him that Homer has written several profane falsities, and several infamous impostures against the respect and veneration he owed to his gods (26). Nay, he had quoted Father Rapin himself, as witnessing the same (27). I shall observe, by the by, that the Critic did not take notice of all the faults that are to be found in the reflexions on Aristotle's Poetics, and that if he had been willing to criticise the other works of that writer, he would have found many things in them that were liable to censure. See the remarks [A] and [T] of the article ARISTOTLE.

(25) Rapin, Réflex. sur la Poétique en général, num. 9, pag. 20.

(26) Varillas, Remarques sur les nouvelles Réflex. p. 21, & seq.

(27) See Rapin, ibid. num. 2.

RASARIO (JOHN BAPTIST) an Italian Physician, was born in the territory of Novara [A], in the year 1517 (a). He taught the Belles Lettres (b) at Venice twenty-two years, with great reputation (c); his eloquence was admired on many occasions, and particularly in the oration which he made upon the victory at Lepanto, in the year 1571 [B]. He went afterwards to Rome, where Pope Pius IV offered him very handsome appointments; but it was not agreeable to him to stay in that city, and he chose rather to accept of an employ which was offered him by the senate of Milan (d): it was to teach the Belles Lettres in the university of Pavia; where he died in the year 1578 (e), and not in the year 1573, as it is said in Lindenius Renovatus. His Latin version of some of the works of Galen was printed in the year 1545 (f). Neither Ghilini, Teissier, nor Moreri, make any mention of this version in the catalogue they have given of his works. What Moreri has said of Rasario is taken from Mr Teissier. The reader will do well to have recourse to the latter, and also to look into the original of Thuanus; but he will there find some mistakes that want to be rectified [C].

(a) Lindenius renovatus, p. 537.

(b) According to Ghilini he was Greek professor at Venice; and according to Thuanus he was professor of Eloquence there.

(c) Thuan. lib. lxv, sub fin.

(d) Ghilini, Tom. ii, p. 142.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Linden. renovatus, p. 537.

[A] He was born in the territory of Novara.] I speak thus in general of the place of his birth, because Thuanus and Ghilini are not agreed upon the name of it. The one calls it Borgo di Sesia (1): the other makes use of a phrase that I do not understand, and which is very ungrammatical in my edition; oppido quod à valle Uziæ in Novariensi diœcesi sito nomen retinet familia nobili natus (2). These words have been translated by Mr Teissier in the following manner, he was descended from a noble family of Valdugia in the Novarese (3). Moreri adds, that Valdugia is a town of the Novarese. Paul Freherus (4), quoting the Thuanus enucleatus of Gerard de Stocken, has it in vallo Uziæ, and not à valle Uziæ. But this far from lessening the difficulty, makes it still the greater.

(1) Ghilini, Part ii, p. 142.

(2) Thuan. lib. lxv, sub fin. p. 233, Edit. Franc. 1625.

(3) Teissier, Elog. Tom. i, p. 486, Edit. 1696.

(4) In Theatro, pag. 1277.

[B] The Oration that he made upon the victory at Lepanto in the year 1571.] After Te Deum had been sung in the church of St Marc, Rasario received an order from the Doge to make an Oration to the people, on occasion of this famous victory, which he accordingly performed three days after in the same church, and acquitted himself to the admiration of all that heard him, Princeps Joanni Baptistæ Rasario viro doctiss. mandatum eodem die dedit, ut de hac victoria orationem ad populum haberet. Quam rem ille die tertio, cum eodem in templo expediret, Senatum, populum, peregrinos, adeoque infinitam prope auditorum multitudinem eloquentiæ fuæ admiratione attonitam reddidit (5). This Oration has passed several impressions.

(5) Jo. Petrus Contarenus, de Bello Venetis à Selimo II illato, pag. ult.

[C] We must rectify some mistakes in Thuanus.] What he says of the esteem that Philip II had for Rasario was unknown to Ghilini, and I am very much surprized at it. This prince first became acquainted with the merit of Rasario, when he passed through Milan in his way to Germany in the year 1548 (6). Thuanus adds, that he offered him great advantages to draw him into Portugal, and to induce him to accept a Professorship in the Academy of Coimbra, but Rasario excused himself on account of his age: he could not however deny his request to go and teach Eloquence in Pavia, being obliged to him for his brother's liberty, and the restitution of his goods which had been confiscated. Thuanus is mistaken in what he says of the Professorship at Coimbra; for Philip II did not make himself master of Portugal till the year 1580, and Rasario died in the year 1578, after having taught in the university of Pavia four years (7). This great Historian attending chiefly to those matters which were most essential to his work, did not examine with exactness into the lives of the learned, but those who have collected together what he has said of them, and published it separately, should have added thereto the necessary corrections.

(6) Thuan. lib. lxv, p. 233.

(7) Thuan. ibid.

RATALLER (GEORGE), in Latin Ratallerus (a), descended from an antient and noble family of Friesland, was born at Leeuwarden about the year 1518. He studied first at Utrecht under George Macropedius (b), afterwards at Louvain, and in the universities of France and Italy (c). On his return to the Low-Countries he was made one of the council of the province of Artois, and afterwards of the great council at Mechlin, and Master of the Requests (d). The duchess of Parma sent him to Denmark upon a negotiation; and having discharged that office well, he was made president of the council of Utrecht. He died suddenly in an assembly of that council on the first of October 1580, if we believe Sweertius (e), or on the sixth of October 1581, if we credit Valerias Andreas (f). He was a man of merit, and was greatly esteemed for his virtue, knowledge, and politeness (g). He was a good Latin Poet, as appears by his works, and particularly by his version of Sophocles [A]. John Lallemant, who likewise

(a) And not Rotallerus, as in the Abridgment of Gesner.

(b) Val. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 266.

(c) Sweert. Athenæ Belgic. p. 275.

(d) Val. Andr. ubi supra, pag. 269.

(e) Sweert. ubi supra.

(f) Val. Andr. ubi supra, pag. 266.

(g) Ibid.

[A] By his works, and particularly by his version of Sophocles.] His translation of Hesiod (1) into Hexameter and Pentameter verse was printed at Francfort in the year 1546, in 8vo, together with one book of his epigrams (2). He had translated in various kinds of Latin verse pretty much resembling the original the seven tragedies that we have left of Sophocles; but he could not be prevailed upon to consent that this version should be printed; his friends however who had got copies of it did not regard his scruples; they caused to be printed at Lyons by Gryphius in the year 1550 the Ajax (3), the Electra, and the Antigone. At last the author himself was prevailed upon; he put the finishing hand to these three tragedies and to the other four, and published them altogether at Antwerp ex Officina Gulielmi Silvii, Typographi Regii, in the year 1570, in 8vo. Valerias Andreas knew nothing of this work. To this sin of omission he has joined one of commission: for he says that Ratallerus translated into Latin verse three tragedies of Sophocles, viz. the Phenician women, Hippolytus, and Andromache, with those fragments of the ancient Poets that are to be met with in

(1) That is, the Opera & Dies of Hesiod.

(2) Val. Andr. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 266.

(3) And not the Alexandra, as in the Abridgment of Gesner.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

likewiſe made a verſion of Sophocles, borrowed ſeveral of his verſes from Rataller without acknowledging from whence he took them (b); ſo that he may juſtly be numbered among the Plagiaries.

(b) Præfat. Sophoclis à Ratallero metricè verſi.

in Stobeus. He did not know that theſe three were the tragedies of Euripides and not of Sophocles. They were printed together with thoſe fragments at Antwerp in the year 1581 in 16mo, as Sweertius informs us (4). He has been more exact in this particular than Valerius Andreas; but he was not exact when having told us that Rataller had tranſlated into Latin verſe all the tragedies of Sophocles, he adds, ejuſdem (Sophoclis) Fabulas III carmine quoque Latino tranſtulit, that is, he hath alſo tranſlated into Latin verſe three fables of Sophocles. It would betray great ignorance to ſuppoſe that Tragœdiæ Sophoclis, and Fabulæ Sophoclis are not the ſame.

(4) Sweert. Athen. Belgic. pag. 276.

A Phyſician (5) of Autun in Burgundy publiſhed a Latin verſion of the ſeven tragedies of Sophocles at Paris in the year 1557, and ſtole ſeveral paſſages from Rataller. Hic multos verſus & paginas . . . . . in the print as far as the word evicerit (6) inclu-ſively.

(5) Called Joannes Lalemantius, or Lalamantius.

(6) Adrian. Myſius, Præfat. Sophoclis Ratalleri.

The epiſtle dedicatory of Rataller's Sophocles is very well worth reading. He dedicates that work to Frederic Perenot, brother to the cardinal of Granvelle, and repreſents to him in a very noble manner the great advantages which men in the higheſt ſtation of life may reap from tragedy, when they are capable of profiting by the examples and maxims which the ſtage ſets before their eyes.

RAUBER (a) (ANDREW EBERHARD) of Talberg and Weineek [A], lord of the fortreſs of Petronel, a German knight, and one of the council of war to the emperor Maximilian II (b). He was very famous, not only for his great ſtrength and high ſtature, but alſo for his beard which was of an extraordinary length. He was deſcended from the very antient and noble houſe of Rauber, in the duchy of Carniola, which the emperor Maximilian I. promoted to the dignity of Barons [B]. Our Andrew Eberhard Rauber was in the ſervice of Maximilian II from his youth, he travelled with him into foreign countries, he was always in the favour of that emperor, who made him one of his council of war, and gave him for his firſt wife Helena Scharſeginn [C], his natural daughter, but he was firſt obliged to purchaſe her by a combat with his rival, which was pleaſant enough, and without loſs of blood. On this occaſion he gave moſt remarkable proofs of his ſtrength [D]. He had no children by her; but his ſecond wife [E] made him ample recompence for this defect; for ſhe brought eight twins into the world, one ſon whom he named Andrew Eberhard, and ſeven daughters, of which one died unmarried. The others were all married into illuſtrious families. Rauber's ſtrength was ſo great that he could break in pieces the ſtrongeſt horſe-ſhoe. He once took by the beard a Jew that had been baptized, and ſtriking upon it with his right hand, both the beard and the jaw-bone of the Jew came off into his hand [F]. His beard

(a) This article was communicated by Mr de Breſſer.

(b) Valvaſor, la Gloire du Duché de Carniole, livr. xi.

[A] Weineek.] This Weineek is a caſtle in the country of Carniola, called in the language of that country Kraviek. It is ſituate upon an eminence in the innermoſt part of Carniola, four leagues from Laybach the capital of the country. From this caſtle came the family of the lords of Weineek, but their race is long ſince extinct, as is that of Hardegi de Pettau, governor of Carniola, who was in poſſeſſion of the ſame caſtle in the year 1530. At laſt, after count Herman de Cilly had ruined this caſtle, he gave it in the year 1433 to Frederic Rauber, and it has ever ſince been poſſeſſed by the family of Rauber (1).

(1) Valvaſor, la Gloire du Duché de Carniole, pag. 631, & 635.

[B] Promoted to the dignity of Barons.] This promotion was made on the 24th of December 1516, in the town of Hagenau, and that dignity was conferred on Leonard Rauber grand-marſhal to the court of the emperor, and on Nicolas Rauber, his brother, with the title of baron of Planckhenſtein and Carlſtetten. But this title was for ſome time dormant, and was revived by the preſent emperor on the 12th of April 1651 (2).

(2) Ibid. pag. 637, 638.

[C] Helena Scharſeginn.] The emperor Maximilian II, before he was married, fell in love with the daughter of the count of Eaſt-Frieſland, who was eſteemed the greateſt beauty of her time. The love and familiarity between them was ſo great, that he had by her a daughter named Helena Scharſeginn, not inferior to her mother in beauty, ſo that ſhe drew the affection of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction (3).

(3) Ibid. pag. 634.

[D] Proofs of his ſtrength.] We have here a very diverting method of gaining a lady, and ſo very uncommon, that I dare ſay it is not to be found in any romance. The writers of ſuch books do indeed tell us, that heroes uſed formerly to gain their miſtreſſes by tournaments, duels, combats with giants and dragons, and a thouſand other fancies of this ſort, but the method that Rauber uſed was never known to any of them. When he aſked the emperor's daughter in marriage, he found at court a Spaniſh gentleman of great quality, who alſo endeavoured to become the emperor's ſon-in-law. The reputation of the valour of the Spaniard, as well as the height of his ſtature which exceeded Rauber's, recommended him very much. The emperor, being unwilling to give either of them the mortification of a denial, agreed that they ſhould decide the affair by a trial of ſtrength. He then cauſed to be given to each of them a ſack, that was ſufficient to contain his antagoniſt, and promiſed that he who ſhould put the other perſon into the ſack ſhould have his daughter. The two lovers engaged in the preſence of the emperor, and in the ſtruggle exerted their utmoſt ſtrength, which, on this occaſion, was redoubled by love. Each of them, fired with an ardent deſire of marrying the emperor's daughter, with all his might ſtrove to put his rival into the ſack. Rauber at length carried the day, the ſtrength and valour of the German thruſt the bravery of the proud Spaniard into the ſack: by this means Rauber attained the poſſeſſion of his fair Helena, and the Spaniard after ſo terrible a diſgrace left the court (4).

(4) Ibid.

[E] His ſecond wife.] She was an Hungarian named Urſula de Tſchillack in Niemptſchitz.

She was loſt at the taking of Niemptſchitz going out of that place ſecretly, but was afterwards found by a German captain, who, commiſerating her caſe, kept her at his own houſe for ſome time. He afterwards preſented her to the emperor Maximilian II, who cauſed her to be lodged among his women in their apartment, and when ſhe was grown up he married her to Rauber (5).

(5) Ibid.

[F] Came off in his hand.] This happened at Gratz upon the requeſt of archduke Charles, at whoſe court was a Jew that had been baptized, who for ſtature and ſtrength might well be compared to a giant, the archduke Charles being deſirous to know whether the Jew was ſtronger than Rauber, in order to try their ſtrength, obliged each of them to receive from the other one blow with the fiſt, they were nevertheleſs allowed to decide by lot who ſhould ſtrike the firſt, which chanced to be the Jew. He gave Rauber ſo violent a blow, that he was obliged to keep his bed eight days, and his chamber many more. When he was recovered it was Rauber's turn to give the Jew a blow, which he did in the following manner. He took

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google beard was a real prodigy, and of ſo extraordinary a length that it reached down to his feet, and then turned up quite to his girdle [G]. Beyond all doubt it ſurpaſſed in length all the beards of the Lombards [H]. Rauber died in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, at his caſtle of Petronel [I], in the year 1575 (c). There alſo he lies interred between his two wives.

(c) Ibid. pag. 635.

took hold of the long beard of the Jew, and twiſting it twice round his left hand, with his right he ſtruck upon it with ſuch prodigious force, that not only the beard, but the under jaw-bone came off into his hand, which ſoon after coſt the Jew his life (6).

(6) Ibid. pag. 34.

[G] Quite to his girdle.] It was yet longer, for beſides this he wound it about his ſtaff. He gloried ſo much in it, that he very ſeldom went to court either in a coach or horſeback, but almoſt always on foot, that his long beard might be ſeen, which he carried like a ſtreamer waving with the wind. When he died it was cut into two tufts.

[H] It ſurpaſſed in length the beards of the Lombards.] The name Lombard has been commonly derived from Long-beard, but it is a miſtake; this name rather taking its original from the old German word Borde or Boerde, which ſignifies a large ſpace or extent of country: and that extent of country which reaches along the Elbe, from Torgau in Miſnia, and through Magdeburg, quite to Lunenburg, was formerly called Long-Boerde, that is, the long extent of country, or the long ſpace, and the inhabitants were called Long-bards.

[I] Petronel.] The caſtle of Petronel is not far from Preſburg; it is at preſent poſſeſſed by count de Thum, and is built with great magnificence.

RECKHEIM, a county, a fief, and an immediate or ſoveraign ſtate of the empire, has the right of voting in the college of the princes both in the general and circular diets. It belongs to the circle of Weſtphalia, and contains a town and ſeveral villages. Its ſoil is very fruitful, and it is pleaſantly ſituated in a fine and well inhabited country upon the Maëſe, two leagues from Maeſtricht, between the territories of Juliers, Liege, and Fauquemont. It receives toll-money upon the Maëſe, and they coin gold, ſilver, and copper-money. The caſtle, which is the reſidence of the counts, is one of the fineſt, largeſt, and moſt magnificent in Germany. Thoſe, who are now in poſſeſſion of it, belong to the houſe of Aſpermont (a) Linden, a very illuſtrious and antient houſe, and are deſcended from the counts of Aſpermont in Lorrain, whoſe county conſiſted of almoſt three hundred villages. I ſhall give a ſhort account of their Genealogy, and of the preſent ſtate of the family of the counts of Reckheim [A].

(a) The French writers ſay Aſpremont, which is a corruption of the true orthography.

[A] A ſhort account of their Genealogy, and of the preſent ſtate of the family of the counts of Reckheim.] The name of the firſt count of Aſpermont was SIGISFRIDT; he lived in the year 660. He deſcended from the princes of Eſte in Italy, A younger brother of that family, deſcended from that Sigisfridt, and whoſe name was ARNOLD, ſettled in Holland in the year 1:20, and poſſeſſed there the lordſhip of Linden, which his deſcendants enjoyed a long time. One of them, called HERMAN, purchaſed the county of Reckheim, about the year 1550. He was general of the troops of Erneſtus of Bavaria, elector of Cologne, and father of ERNESTUS, count of Aſpermont and Reckheim who was born in the year 1583, and was chamberlain and colonel under the emperors Matthias and Ferdinand II. He married Anne Antoinette, daughter of Henry marquis de Gouffier-Bonnivet, by whom he had a ſon named FERDINAND. This Ferdinand was born in 1611, and married Elizabeth, daughter of Egon, count of Furſtemberg, and of Anne Mary, princeſs of Hohenzolleren, and had by her four ſons, and eight daughters, viz.

FRANCIS GOBERT count of Reckheim, biſhop of Cheur (1), and canon of the metropolitan churches of Cologne and Saltzburg, and of the cathedral of Straſburg (2).

FERDINAND, general of the armies of his Imperial majeſty, who by his firſt marriage with Charlotte, daughter of Lewis George, prince of Naſſau Dilembourg, and of Anne Auguſta princeſs of Brunſwic, had but one daughter named CHARLOTTE GOBERTINE canoneſs of Munſterbilſen, whoſe eight deſcents are Aſpermont Reckheim, Gouffier, Furſtemberg, Hohenzolleren, Naſſau, Sayn, Brunſwic, and Denmark. He married a ſecond wife named Juliana, daughter of Francis Rakoczi, prince of Tranſylvania, and grand-daughter of George the younger, George the elder, and Sigiſmund, all princes of Tranſylvania. He has a ſon by her, whoſe name is JOSEPH GOBERT.

CHARLES canon of the metropolitan church of Cologne, and of the cathedrals of Straſbourg and Liege.

FREDERIC, Great-Croſs of the order of Malta, and commander of Tobel, Steinfurt and Munſter.

ANNE MARY, the wife of count Wenceſlaus of Althann, counſellor to his Imperial majeſty, and chief judge of Moravia, governor of the province of Glatz, and ambaſſador extraordinary in Sweden and Poland.

ELEONORA, princeſs abbeſs of Munſterbilſen.

ANNE SALOME, the wife of Lewis count de Souches, major-general of the armies of his Imperial majeſty, and counſellor of ſtate.

ERNESTINA who was married firſt to John-George count of Collonitſch, chamberlain to his Imperial majeſty, and afterwards to Octavius count of Curiani, the emperor's chamberlain, and counſellor of ſtate.

ANNE ANTOINETTE, the wife of Claudius count de Tilly, lieutenant-general of the army of the United Provinces.

MARY FRANCES, the wife of Charles count of Aſpermont-Linden, counſellor of ſtate to the country of Liege, and governor of the marquiſate of Franchimont.

ALEXANDRINA and PETRONILLA, firſt canoneſſes at Remiremont, and afterwards Urſuline nuns at Metz.

The counts of Aſpermont-Reckheim bear quarterly, in the 1ſt and 4th Gules with a Croſs Or, which is Aſpermont-Linden; in the 2d and 3d Or, with a Lion Gules, which is Reckheim; and over all Azure with an Eagle Argent, which is the ancient Aſpermont or Eſte (3).

(1) Or Choire: the French write and pronounce it Coire. It is a biſhopric in the country of the Griſons, and ſuffragan to the archbiſhopric of Mayenne. The biſhop is allied to the Swiſſes. But nevertheleſs he has his vote and ſeat in the college of the princes of the empire. See the Hiſtory of the Empire, by Mr Heiſs, Tom. ii, pag. 265, Hague Edit. 1685.

(2) See the article TILLI.

(3) Taken from a Memoir communicated to the author. Which muſt be likewiſe underſtood of the text of this article.

REFUGE (DU) a French gentleman, author of a book that has undergone ſeveral editions [A], intituled, A Treatiſe on the Court, or Inſtructions for Courtiers, was well verſed in ſtate-affairs, both in theory and practice; he had read a great deal, and had a large and long experience of courts, and of the affairs of kings, princes, ſtates, and republics, in which the kings of France had employed him with great advantage, and wherein he behaved with ſo much wiſdom, and had ſo good ſucceſs, that never any thing

[A] Author of a book that has undergone ſeveral editions.] The firſt edition is of Holland, and the ſecond of Paris. Theſe were followed by another which was publiſhed at Paris in the year 1618, in 8vo, after the death of the author, and from his laſt corrections. This third edition is enlarged, and divided into chapter.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google thing could be objected to his prudent conduct. He died in the reign of Lewis XIII, and there were found in his closet several state-tracts that he had composed, and which his relations gave hopes should be published. This is what we read in a short preface to the third edition of his treatise on the Court. This edition was printed at Paris in the year 1618.

ters, with summaries and sections, but they have left out the marginal notes and citations, with which the other editions had been curiously enriched (1). They have restored them since. I find them in the edition I make use of, which is that of Paris 1658, in 12mo, by Stephen Loyson. The name of the author is in this edition, and it is also found in the Leyden edition 1649, in 12mo, but it was not in the edition of 1618; there was only at the end of the book the letters D. R. after some verses of Seneca which are not in the edition of 1658. There are in this work abundance of excellent things; it was printed in English at London in the year 1622, in 8vo.

(1) Taken from the advertisement to the reader before the Paris edition 1618.

REGIUS (URBAN) was a learned man of the XVIth century. He was born at Langenargen, upon the lake of Constance, and began his studies at Lindaw; from whence he went to Friburg in Brisgaw, where he continued them the more successfully, because he lodged in the house of the famous Zazius, and was very much beloved by him [A]. He went afterwards to the university of Basil, and then to that of Ingolstad, whither many scholars resorted, by reason of the great reputation of John Eccius. He read private lectures there, and appeared so well qualified for the direction of the youth, that many gentlemen intrusted him with the whole conduct of their sons, without excepting the care of what concerned their expence. It proved an impossible thing for him to regulate it: those young men ran into debt in the taverns and shops (a), and because he was security for them, and did not receive from their parents the money that he asked for, he turned, in a manner, Bankrupt. Being pressed by the creditors, and having not wherewithal to satisfy them, he thought of withdrawing clandestinely; but some officers being come to Ingolstad at that time to raise men, he delivered up his books and all his things, and listed himself. The new raised men were mustered, and the professor Eccius, who was present at the review, knew Regius among the soldiers: he went to him, and being informed of the reason which had moved him to list himself, he promised to serve him, and did it so effectually, that he reconciled him to the Muses. He threatened those indebted scholars with the prince's indignation, if they did not disengage him. Regius went on in his studies, and made so great a progress in the sciences, that he received at Ingolstad the oratorial and poetical crowns from the very hands of the emperor Maximilian. Some time after he was promoted to the professorships of Rhetoric and Poetry in the same university. While he was a professor he wrote in the year 1516, some letters (b) by the duke of Bavaria's order, to invite Erasmus to Ingolstad; which did not succeed. Having applied himself to the study of Divinity, he was so charmed with it that he made it his only business. He thereby acquired some dispositions for Lutheranism; but he found himself embarrassed, when Eccius, his master and benefactor, came to have a quarrel with Luther. Upon this he resolved to leave Ingolstad, and to retire to Augsburg, where he proved an useful man against Popery. He founded a Reformed church there, and spread from thence into Suabia the new opinions, as they were called. He sided with Zuinglius for some time; but afterwards he professed himself a good Lutheran [B]. Eccius went to him at Augsburg, and conferred

(a) Modum in vestitu & victu ubique excedere. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. p. 22.

(b) See the 17th and 18th letters of the 2d book of Erasmus's letters. Erasmus thanked and praised him. See the 19th letter of the 2d book, and the 35th of the 18th book.

[A] He lodged in the house of the famous Zazius, and was much beloved by him (1).] He did chuse in Zazius's library all the books which he thought proper for the improvement of his studies, and transcribed all the marginal notes which that learned Professor had written upon them. Thus that young scholar spent a great part of the night. Zazius, who slept but little, and got up sometimes to walk, and thereby to allay the trouble of his want of sleep, surprized him as he was transcribing those notes, and told him in a loving manner, you are stealing the fruits of my studies: Lucubrantem invenit in describendis illis scholiis, Urbanum: cujus auriculam Zasius blandiusculè vellicans, arte & scientia sua se ab ipso defraudari jocatus est (2). Sometimes he found him asleep, and then he would lay huge volumes on his shoulders until he waked. Aut si quando somno ad candelam oppressum & inclinato in mensam capite dormitantem offendisset: juris volumen grande unum atque alterum humeris impositum reliquit, donec excitaretur (3). I mention these little things, because I know that several people are extreamly well pleased to see such marks of the kindness of a professor, or of the diligence of a scholar.

(1) Amavit eum Zasius ut filium. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 71.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Ibid.

[B] He sided with Zuinglius . . . . but afterwards he professed himself a good Lutheran.] Here is what Zuinglius writ to him in the year 1526. 'In Eucharistiæ re gratulor vobis, te nostrum esse factum. Verum gratiam meretur novitas: brevi enim spero omnes qui adhuc obstrepunt tropum, qui nullo negotio videri vobis debebat, visuros esse ac sententiæ nostræ simplicitatem ac claritatem (4). - - - - I congratulate you on your embracing our sentiments touching the Eucharist. But the newness of the thing deserves our thanks: for I expect that all those who still exclaim against the figure, which you must have had no difficulty in comprehending, will, in a short time, come to see the simplicity and clearness of our opinion.' They conferred together about Original Sin in the same year, and we have still (5) the letter which Zuinglius wrote to Regius on that point. Luther knew that those two men had the same opinions, and was very sorry for it. 'Dolet mihi valde nobilissimum virum Oecolampadium tam ludicris & nihili cogitationibus in hoc barathrum prolapsum; pulsat eum sathanas: Dominus eripiat eum. Urbanus regius in idem malum vel inclinat, vel jam cecidit: Dominus servet suos (6). - - - I am vastly concerned that the great Oecolampadius should have stumbled into this pit from such idle and ridiculous imaginations: he is pushed on by satan; out of whose hands I pray God to deliver him. Regius Urban either inclines to the same evil way, or is already fallen into it. May the Lord preserve his own people.' Luther says, in another letter, that he had been informed, that Regius designed to write against him. 'Præterea Urbanus Regius minari dicitur in me scripta, scilicet Oecolampadium & Zuinglium tantos viros (ut sentit) non vult offendere: sic mutatus est ab illo (7). - - - It is likewise said, that Regius Urban threatens to write against me, forsooth, he is unwilling to offend such great men as Oecolampadius

(4) Zuinglius, Epist. lib. i, p. 82, apud Melch. Adamum, ibid. pag. 73.

(5) Pag. 251, of Zuinglius's letters.

(6) Lutherus, Tom. ii, Epist. pag. 326, anno 1527, apud Melch. Adam. ubi supra.

(7) Idem, Lutherus, ibid. pag. 330, apud Melch. Adam. ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ferred with him to bring him back to the church of Rome; but he did not ſucceed in it. Nay, there aroſe a paper-war betwixt them, which Regius maintained vigorouſly, though his antagoniſt might have reproached him with ingratitude. The new party did not always prevail in the city of Augſburg; there was a time when Regius was forced to leave it, and to abſcond in ſeveral places; but he was glorioufly recalled, and married into a good family there. His diſpute with a woman that was an Anabaptiſt, had ſomething very remarkable in it [C]. He lived in that city till the year 1530, when a diet

'padius and Zuinglius are, in his opinion: ſo much is 'he changed from what he was.' We learn from this paſſage, that Regius appeared at firſt what he appeared to be at laſt, that is, a good Lutheran. He forſook Zuinglianiſm in the year 1528. See the letter (8) wherein Luther expreſſes a great joy for it, and recommends him to the Margrave of Brandenburg. The converſation he had with Regius at Coburg in the year 1530, made a great impreſſion upon him. It filled Regius with admiration of Luther, which he thus expreſſed in a letter. 'Cum Saxo-'niam peterem Coburgi integrum diem ſolus cum 'Luthero, viro Dei, tranſegeram: quo die nullus 'mihi in vita fuit jucundior. Talis enim ac tantus 'Theologus Lutherus, ut nulla ſecula habuerint ſimi-'lem. Hoc magis execror ſtultitiam & arrogantiam 'Caroloſtadianorum, qui ſibi placent, quaſi Luthero 'queant conferri, cujus umbram non aſſequuntur, 'cum omni eruditione quam jactant. Semper mihi 'magnus fuit Lutherus: at jam mihi maximus eſt. 'Vidi enim præſens & audivi, quæ nullo calamo tradi 'poſſunt abſentibus (9). - - - In my way to Saxony I 'I paſſed a whole day at Coburg, with that eminent 'man of God, Luther. There was only he and I toge-'ther; and, in my life, I never ſpent a day more agree-'ably. For ſuch, and ſo great a Divine is Luther, 'that no age did ever produce his equal. I have there-'fore no patience with the folly and arrogance of the 'Caroloſtadian Divines, who flatter themſelves, as if 'they were to be compared with Luther, of whom they 'do not reach the very ſhadow, with all their boaſted 'learning. Luther was always a great man, in my 'opinion; but he is now much greater than ever. For 'I have ſeen and heard, while I was with him, ſuch 'things as no pen can communicate and deſcribe to 'others.' Luther alſo, on his part, was very well pleaſed with that converſation, and Regius's learning, whoſe converſion ſeemed to him a piece of ſuch good news, that he ought to impart it to his friends. He writ the following words to Wenceſlaus Lincus: 'Urbanum Regium quoque reſipuiſſe, credo te noſſe, '& contra hoſtes Sacramentarios ſtrenue nobiſcum 'certare (10). - - - - I ſuppoſe that you have already 'heard of the converſion of Urban Regius, and of his 'being ſtrenuouſly engaged on our ſide againſt our adver-'ſaries the Sacramentarians.'

(8) It is in Seckendorf, Hiſtor. Luther. lib. ii, pag. 122, num. 5.

(9) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 78.

(10) Lutherus, Tom. ii, Epiſt. pag. 311, apud Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 78.

[C] His diſpute with a woman that was an Anabaptiſt, had ſomething very remarkable in it.] The magiſtrates of Augſburg put in execution the laws againſt the Anabaptiſts, which ſectaries are forbidden to meet in conventicles, and to perform the exerciſe of their religion; they were baniſhed, or impriſoned. There was a woman of a good family, who boaſted in priſon, that if ſhe had a conference with Regius, ſhe would prove to him, that the cauſe of the Anabaptiſts was very good; ſhe was therefore ſent for to diſpute with him in a full ſenate. She appeared there with the equipage of a priſoner, that is, with her hands fettered, and her feet in irons but Regius took his place among the ſenators: ſhe alledged abundance of paſſages out of the Holy Scripture, to maintain her opinions. Regius anſwered her, and clearly ſhewed the true ſenſe of thoſe paſſages. But he could not undeceive her; ſhe perſiſted in her errors, and ſpoke to the Miniſter thus: Here is, without doubt, brother Urban, a very ſtrange way of diſputing. You ſit upon a ſoft cuſhion among the Burgomaſters, and you ſpeak like an Oracle, and as it were from Apollo's tripod. But as for me, I am proſtrated upon the ground, and forced to plead my cauſe in irons. Siſter, replied Regius, there is nothing in it but what you deſerve, ſince after you have been freed from the ſlavery of the Devil through JESUS CHRIST, you have been willing to undergo that infamous yoak again. An extravagant ſpirit makes you appear with ſuch acccoutrements, for an example to others. This woman was at laſt baniſhed from the town (11). If any perſon doubts my tranſlation, here are the Latin words. Ipſa tantùm abeſt, ut monitis locum dederit: ut pervicaciter etiam Urbanum hiſce fuerit adorta: Egregia enim verò, Urbane frater, hæc diſputandi ratio eſt inter me & te. Tu in molli culcitra ad latera Conſulum adſidens, quaſi ex Apollinis tripode proloqueris: ego miſera humi proſtrata, ex duris vinculis cauſam dicere cogor. Ad hæc Urbanus: Nec verò, inquit, injuria, ſoror: ut quæ ſemel è ſervitute diaboli per Chriſtum in libertatem aſſerta, tua ſponte iterum cervicem turpi jugo ſubmiſiſti; & iſtis te ornamentis veſanus oſtentat genius, aliis in exemplum. Senatus itaque, cum laterem ſe lavare videret; contagium illud exilio mulctavit, urbeque expulit (12).

(11) Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 73.

(12) Ibid.

This woman did not want wit: ſhe made a very judicious reflexion, and ſeaſoned it with a great deal of ſalt; but ſhe had too great a confidence, or rather ſhe was too raſh. She believed, that if ſhe ſhould diſpute with a Miniſter of the prevailing religion, and before the Judges, who had already condemned Anabaptiſm, and impriſoned thoſe who taught it, ſhe might perſuade them of the juſtice of her cauſe. To expect ſuch a thing, it is not enough to be in the right, one muſt alſo hope for an extraordinary aſſiſtance of the divine ſpirit; for, according to the uſual courſe of things, it does not appear that a priſoner for religion can confound ſuch adverſaries as ſpeak to him with authority, and who have on their ſide an outward pomp, and all the company prepoſſeſſed for them. I know very well, that this woman had not a good cauſe to maintain, but I believe, that if ſhe had maintained as good, or even a better doctrine than that of Regius, ſhe would have been caſt in ſuch circumſtances as ſhe was in. The match was not even; the arms were too unequal. Regius ſat in an honourable place, and was ſurrounded with marks of favour: he ſpoke for a cauſe protected by the magiſtrate, and againſt a cauſe perſecuted by the magiſtrate. His antagoniſt was a woman loaded with chains, and in the poſture of a criminal already condemned. A very good reaſon alledged by that woman in ſuch circumſtances would not have balanced a very indifferent one alledged by Regius, with all the weight and emphaſis of a man ſitting on the bench of the Burgomaſters, and on a kind of tribunal. Shall I quote Euripides, who ſays, that the words of a man in favour have a greater force than if they were ſpoken by an unhappy and miſerable man?

Τὸ δ' ἀξίωμα κἂν κακῶς λέγῃ τὸ σὸν,
Πείσει· λόγῳ γὰρ ἓν τ' ἀνδοξένων ἰὼν,
Κἄκ τῶν δοκούν]των αὐτὸς, ὁ τανῦ]ν σθένει (13).

(13) Hecuba ad Ulyſſem apud Euripidem, in Hecuba, ver. 293, pag. m. 20.

That is, according to Ennius's tranſlation (14).

Hæc tu etſi perversè dices, facile Achivos flexeris.
Nam quum opulenti loquuntur pariter atque ignobiles,
Eadem dicta, eademque oratio æqua non æque valet.

(14) Apud Aulum Gellium. lib. x, cap. 26. pag. m. 586.

Such is your privilege, that tho' you ſpeak
Amiſs; yet ſhall your arguments prevail:
For the ſame words with equal force expreſs'd,
By men that are in high repute, and ſuch
As are accounted infamous and vile,
Have not the ſame effect. - - -

Shall I quote theſe verſes of Plautus?

Centum doctum hominum conſilia ſola hæc devincit dea,
Fortuna, atque hoc verum'ſt proinde ut quiſque fortuna utitur,
Ita præcellet, atque exinde ſapere eum omnes dicimus (15).

(15) Plautus, in Pœnulo, Act. II, Sc. III, ver. 12.

Fortune has in herſelf alone more weight and power than the counſels of a hundred learned men; and this is moſt

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google diet was held there. He then entered into the ſervice of the duke of Brunſwic, who made him ſuperintendant of the churches of the country of Lunenburg, and had a very great eſteem for him [D]. He exerciſed his talents for the good of the cauſe in ſeveral ſynods, and wrote ſeveral books [E]. He died at Zell in May 1541, in the ſame manner as he had often wiſhed [F], that is, almoſt ſuddenly (c). I muſt not forget that his wife underſtood the Hebrew tongue very well (d). He publiſhed a converſation which he had with her about the characters of the Meſſias applied to JESUS CHRIST. He had thirteen children by her (e). I ſhall make a remark upon the names of that miniſter [G].

(c) Taken from Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 70, & ſeq.

(d) Micrælius, in Syntagm. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. pag. m. 778.

(e) Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 74.

We

true, that, according to the degree of favour in which every one ſtands with that goddeſs, ſo ſhall he be reckoned to excel, and by that do we all meaſure the dimenſions of his underſtanding.

Shall I quote theſe fine words of Pliny the younger? 'Quàm multum intereſt, quid à quoque fiat, eadem 'enim facta claritate vel obſcuritate facientium, aut 'tolluntur altiſſime, aut humillime deprimuntur (16). '--- It is of great conſequence who the perſon is that 'does a thing, ſince the very ſame actions are exceed-'ingly cried up, or run down, according to the fame 'or obſcurity of the doers.' Shall I quote an hundred other authorities of the ſame force? No; I omit all thoſe common topics, and ſhall only obſerve, that if Regius had diſputed againſt a Prieſt at Ingolſtad, in quite different circumſtances from the diſpute of Augſburg; if he had been in chains, &c. and if the Prieſt had ſat on a cuſhion among the Senators, &c. this affair would have ended with Regius's baniſhment, or ſomething worſe. He had been looked upon as a caviller, who wreſted the Holy Scriptures; and the Prieſt had been admired as a faithful interpreter of the word of God.

(16) Plin. Epiſt. XXIV, lib. vi.

[D] The duke of Brunſwic had a very great eſteem for him.] Being aſked, whether he had bought at Augſburg any thing of great value, and of a new faſhion, as the other princes had done, he anſwered, I have brought an incomparable treaſure, which will be of great uſe to my ſtates, and which I prefer to all delights (17). He meant Regius. And when, in the year 1535, the city of Augſburg requeſted of him that he would reſtore them that Divine, he declared that he would as ſoon part with his eyes as with him (18). He gave him large penſions, and the ſuperintendency of all the churches in his territories (19).

(17) Allatum eſſe à ſe theſaurum toti Ducatui incomparabilem quem omnibus anteponat deliciis. Melch. Adam. ibid. p. 78.

(18) Perinde ut oculos ita & Urbanum ſe amittere nolle. Ibid.

(19) Ibid. pag. 79.

[E] He wrote ſeveral books.] They have been collected into three volumes; the two firſt contain what he publiſhed in Latin, and the other what he wrote in High-Dutch (20). This laſt has been tranſlated into Latin, if I am not miſtaken, for I find in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, Vita & Opera (Urbani Regii) Latine reddita per Erneſt. Regium. Norib. 1562. Melchior Adam obſerves, that ERNESTUS REGIUS, the author's ſon, collected all thoſe works, and publiſhed them at Nuremberg, divided into ſeveral volumes. He mentions particularly the book, in which our Urban had collected the harſh phraſes, and thoſe that are polite. The firſt are only proper to ſow diſcord, and the latter to promote piety and concord. Prince Erneſt of Brunſwic put him upon making that collection, which was an inſtance of his prudence and piety; for blunt and ſharp expreſſions are like the teeth of Cadmus's dragon, a ſeed of war among brethren. This is Melchior Adam's reflexion. Exſtat inter alia liber ejus in quo annotatæ ſunt horridiores formæ loquendi: & monſtrantur propriæ ac concinnæ, utiles pietati ac concordiæ. Has admoniones ſcribi princeps Erneſtus Lunæburgicus voluit: qua in re ſapientiam & pietatem ejus agnoſcimus. Ut enim ex dentibus draconis, in Cadmæa hiſtoria, nata eſt ſoboles armatorum inter ſe dimicantium: ſic ex improprio ſermone diſſidia opinionum in docentibus & in populo naſcuntur (21). This is little minded by the compoſers of Formularies, when they are more devout than judicious, or more paſſionate and vain than truly devout, they are perfect ſtrangers to prudence and moderation, they applaud themſelves for their ſeverity (22). Note, That John Freder, of Pomerania, publiſhed a work of Regius, after his death, intituled, Loci Theologici ex Patribus & Scholaſticis neotericiſque collecti (23).

(20) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 778.

(21) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 79, 80.

(22) But note, that general terms, and ſuch as are uſed out of condeſcenſion, are ſometimes uſeleſs. See, above, remark [G], of the article MUSCULUS.

(23) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 80.

[F] He died.... in the ſame manner as he had often wiſhed.] He was not ſick above three hours, and he had all along wiſhed not to die of a long ſickneſs (24). Nactus eſt genus mortis, quale ſæpè in votis habuit; citum & placidum; cum ſemper deprecaretur diuturnos languores & longas morborum periodos (25). He is not the only man, who has wiſhed for ſuch a death, and to whom it has happened according to his wiſhes (26).

(24) Ibid. pag. 79.

(25) Ibid.

(26) See the article VALLA (GEORGE).

[G] A remark upon the names of that Miniſter.] The name of his family was King; but finding it too lofty, and knowing that it would occaſion ſeveral jeſts, he changed it into that of Regius (27). As for the name Urban, it was given him when he was chriſtened, becauſe the women, who carried him to church, could not tell the name his mother had a mind he ſhould have. She deſired he ſhould be chriſtened by the name of the ſaint that was marked in the calendar on the day he was born. The good women forgot it as they went: the curate finding they were uncertain about it, told them that St Urban's day was near: which was the reaſon why he was called Urban. I ſhall obſerve occaſionally, that among all nations there are many families, who bear the name of a dignity as king, prince, duke, marquis, count, baron, &c. They ſeldom think of changing it, tho' it affords continually matter for ſilly jeſts and childiſh alluſions. But I believe our Lutheran Doctor is not the only one, who diſguiſed his name, to avoid ſuch an inconveniency. There are ſome men every where, whoſe name is Regis or Regius; a diſguiſed name, if I am not miſtaken, for the reaſon I have mentioned. I have ſaid, in another place (28), that I wonder that thoſe families who have an odious or ridiculous name, did not leave it: and I add here, that there are ſome who have not now the obſcene name which they had formerly. Read theſe words of Menage (29): 'HAUTECLAIR. The name of a 'family. That name was given in Henry the ſecond's 'time to a Maſter of the Requeſts, named Couillard, 'upon a pleaſant occaſion. That Maſter of the Re-'queſts went often to the Louvre. One day, as he 'was knocking at the door of the king's or queen's 'cloſet, the uſhers aſked him his name, but he durſt 'not tell it plainly, becauſe of it's obſcenity. The 'uſhers not underſtanding him, or pretending not 'to underſtand him, bad him tell his name haut & 'clair (plainly and clearly) which occaſioned his be-'ing called afterwards Hauteclair. I have this ſtory 'from Mr du Puy, he had it from Thuanus, who, in 'the eighth book of his hiſtory, pag. 262, of the 'Geneva edition, mentions that change of name, 'only by the by. Negotium datum P. Alloclaro, Li-'bellorum Supplicum Magiſtro, qui pudendo alio cognomine 'indigetabatur, ut negotium Regium, &c.' He ſaid, in his firſt edition of his Origines, that the Beauharnois of Orleans have alſo changed their name of Beauvit, becauſe of it's obſcenity into that of Beaubarnois; but in the ſecond edition he ſays it is a meer ſtory.

(27) Majores ejus Regum cognomine inſignes fuerunt: ſed cum id ſublime & jocis aptum eſt rege regius factus eſt ut ipſe dictitare ſolitus. Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 70.

(28) In the article FEUARDENTIUS, remark [A].

(29) Menage, Origines de la Langue Françoiſe, pag. 395, Edit. 1694.

I foreſee, that thoſe, who ſhall remember a remark of Mr de Vigneul Marville, when they come to read what I have ſaid in the article of the friar Feuardentius, will object to me that I ſhould not have wondered that people do not leave their ridiculous or odious names. They will maintain that they have not the liberty to do it, and they will alledge theſe words of the Mélange de Hiſtoire & de Literature (30): As for what Mr de la Roque ſays, that ſince the ordinance of Amboiſe of the twenty-ſixth of March, 1555, none is allowed to change his name, without the king's permiſſion; it ought to be obſerved, that a long time before that ordinance no body changed his name without being authorized for it. Mr de Vigneul Marville proves by the example of the Barber of Lewis XI, and ſets down the words of that prince's patent, whereby he commands that Oliver le Mauvais (the wicked) who was his Barber, and his poſterity be, for the time to come, ſir-

EXAMINATION of an objection drawn from the prohibition of changing family names.

(30) Vigneul Marville, Mélang. Tom. i, pag. 259, of the firſt edition of Rouën.

named

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We cannot doubt, after having well examined ſeveral places (f) of his books, that he was of opinion we ſhould pray for the dead.

(f) They may be ſeen in the Calvino Turciſmus, lib. iv, cap. viii, pag. m. 840, & ſeq.

named le Dain . . . . and that it ſhall not be lawful for any body whatſoever to call them by the ſaid ſirname le Mauvais ; which name we have taken from them and aboliſhed, and do actually take away and aboliſh by theſe preſents. This patent is dated in October 1474, and was regiſtred in the parliament of Paris the 30th of January 1474 (31). If thoſe who make this objection againſt me, think it ſolid, they do not know how to judge well of things. I anſwer in the firſt place, that the expreſſion I made uſe of ought to be underſtood as this, I wonder that looſe and debauched people are not afraid of the prejudice they do to their health and reputation. Theſe words, tho' ſpoken in the preſent tenſe, do nevertheleſs take in paſt ages as well as that in which they are ſpoken ; and therefore my way of expreſſing myſelf to ſhew that I wonder that peo[illegible]le did not part with odious or ridiculous names, concerns no leſs the time which preceded the ordinances mentioned by Mr de la Roque (32), than the time that followed it. Now it is certain that before that ordinance was made, ſome people parted with their names, or changed and diſguiſed them. Mr de la Roque (33), quotes Mr Menage, who ſays, that William le Rat, being diſpleaſed, as it is thought, with his name, which is that of a noxious animal, ſirnamed himſelf Lefrat ; and that John Dorat, Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue, changed his name of Diſnemandy . . . which was the ancient name of his family, into that of Dorat or Daurat. It were an abſurd thing to pretend that they had the king's permiſſion for it. Mr de Vigneul Marville does not ſay ſo. I am apt to believe, ſays he, (34), that before the ordinance of Amboiſe, ſeveral perſons took upon themſelves to change their names, without having recourſe to the king, and perhaps the Phyſician named Sanſmalice (without malice) changed his name into that of Akakia, without a patent from Francis I ; but then it was a mere tranſlation of a French word into a Greek one. Thus the ſame author, whom they would alledge againſt me, acknowledges that people changed their names, notwithſtanding the patent of Lewis XI ; and indeed we ought to believe that it was drawn up for his Barber, not that he might be permitted to change the name of his family, but that people ſhould not continue to call him by that name. He was very much hated in the kingdom, and conſequently people would have taken pleaſure in croſſing his deſign of parting with a name that he was aſhamed of. This was the motive of that patent : it did not therefore ſerve as a rule in many other caſes, in which the public was not concerned. Now if under pretence of a Greek tranſlation, one might, without any danger, ſubſtitute the name Akakia to that of Sanſmalice ; much more was it lawful to ſubſtitute one name in the room of another, when the difference between thoſe two names conſiſted only in the inſertion, tranſpoſition, or omiſſion, of ſome letters. 2. I ſay, that experience is on my ſide, ſince many famous authors have taken a new name, without being authorized by the prince to do it (35). 3. I add that it is likely the ordinance of the 26th of March before Eaſter 1555, intended only to prevent the uſurpations of the nobility, or ſome other fraud, and therefore when a man had no other deſign than that of Regius, he was not reſtrained by that ordinance. 4. I further ſay, that probably it was not better obſerved, than that of the ſtates of Blois, in the year 1579, whereby all gentlemen were forbidden to ſign any act and contract with any other name but that of their family, upon the penalty of being made void. . . . . That article has not proved ſo effectual as it was expected ; for many people, inſtead of obſerving it, have formally acted againſt it ; which I have obſerved in the authentic and public acts, ſays Mr de la Roque (36). 5. And laſtly, I anſwer, that if the ordinance of Amboiſe was well obſerved, one might nevertheleſs wonder that people do not part with their odious or ridiculous names, becauſe they may obtain the king's permiſſion (37), if they will aſk for it ; and we find among other inſtances in Mr de la Roque's book, that James Miette [Crumb] a mean and comical name, and ſuch as may occaſion many ſilly jeſts, had a patent from Henry IV, in March 1603 . . . which permitted him to change his name into that of Lauberie (38). See the Bigarrures of des Accords, Lib. IV. cap. ii. and Baillet, Auteurs deguiſez, chap. V and VI ; we are told in the Menagiana that Father Commire's name was Commere [Goſſip].

(31) If Mr de Vigneul Marville had remembred that the year began then at Eaſter, he would not have ſaid, ubi ſupra, pag. 260, that the date is faulty, theſe letters of October 1474, not having been regiſtred till the year following.

(32) Gilles Andrew de la Roque, Sieur de la Lontiere, Traité de l'origine des Noms, pag. 182.

(33) Ibid. pag. 96.

(34) Vigneul Marville, ubi ſupra, pag. 260.

(35) See the ſpeech of Majoragius, cited above, in the remark [E] of his article. See alſo the remark [A], of the article PAREUS (David).

(36) La Roque's Diſcourſe on the origin of Names.

(37) La Roque, ibid. pag. 182.

(38) Ibid.

REIHING (James), profeſſor of Divinity at Tubingen, was born at Augſburg in the year 1579, of one of thoſe ancient families called Patrician. He performed his ſtudies at Ingolſtad, and his maſters were very much pleaſed with the progreſs he made in them (a). Having attained the age in which the ancient Romans had the Toga Virilis given them, he made a vow to take the habit of a Jeſuit, if he ſhould recover of a dangerous ſickneſs that he laboured under. He recovered, and performed his vow, though his mother oppoſed it (b). He made his noviciate at Landſberg (c), and became afterwards very famous in his order. He taught claſſical learning at Inſpruc, and Philoſophy and Divinity at Ingolſtad ; which he did with ſo good ſucceſs, that the General Aquaviva thought him worthy to be made Doctor of Divinity. He was promoted to this degree at Dillingen (d) ; and from that time he found himſelf poſſeſſed with a new zeal for the defence of the church of Rome : ſo that his ſuperiors appointed him Aulic preacher to Wolfgang-William duke of Newburg, who had then forſaken the Proteſtant religion [A], and they charged him to write againſt that religion. He ſtudied night and day

(a) He ſtudied in the college of the Jeſuits.

(b) Taken from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris, pag. 93, 94.

(c) Rauſcherus, in Laud. funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. pag. 897.

(d) Ibid. pag. 898.

[A] The duke of Newburg who had then forſaken the Proteſtant religion.] Martin Rauſcherus, who made Reihing's funeral oration, ſays nothing that may induce us to believe that this Jeſuit contributed to make the duke of Newburg change his religion. Theophilus Spizelius (1), and Father Alegambe (2), are alſo ſilent about it. Thoſe three authors only ſay, that ſoon after this prince had changed his religion, Father Reihing was made his preacher. Nevertheleſs ſome writers affirm, that this Jeſuit was the converter of the duke of Newburg, and prevailed with him by worldly intereſts. Here are the words of a Journaliſt in the extract of one of Mr Leti's books (3). ‘ The ‘ princes of the houſe of Newburg were formerly Pro‘ teſtants ; but a Jeſuit, whoſe name was James Rei‘ hing found the way to make one of them change ‘ his religion, by ſome weighty political reaſons, ‘ which may be ſeen in the author *. But what is ſur‘ prizing, the converter himſelf embraced afterwards ‘ the Proteſtant religion, to repair in ſome meaſure ‘ the breach he had made in it, by ſeparating the ‘ duke of Newburg from its body. The abbot Paci‘ chelli, and Baccati, ſecretary to the then Pope's ‘ nuncio at Cologne, who are quoted by our author, ‘ aſcribe this change to an occulto giudicio di Dio ; --- ‘ a ſecret judgment from God ; but the Proteſtants may ‘ eaſily apprehend, that a man who ſtudies contro‘ verſy, may change his opinions, and believe that ‘ the Proteſtants are in the right ; as a prince from a ‘ Proteſtant turns Catholic out of intereſt. The one is ‘ not more miraculous than the other ; and there is ‘ no reaſon to ſay on this occaſion as one in the Filli di Sciro :

(1) In Elogio Reihingii, in Templo Honoris referato.

(2) In Biblioth. Script. Societ. pag. 209.

(3) Biblioth. Univerſ. Tom. xiv, pag. 24, in the extract of the 2d part of the Ritratti hiſtorici, overo hiſtoria dell' Imperio Romano in Germania, ſcritta da Gregorio Leti.

* P.g. 168.

Le

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google day for arguments to overthrow the confeſſion of the Lutherans; but becauſe his adverſaries alledged continually the Scripture againſt him, he thought himſelf obliged to conſult that holy book, and to keep to it, in order to draw from thence, if poſſible, ſuch arms as he wanted to maintain that combat. This ſtudy made him ſenſible that he defended an ill cauſe, and therefore he quitted his employment, and retired to the court of Wirtemberg [B], where he embraced Lutheraniſm. He was made profeſſor of Divinity at Tubingen, preacher in ordinary, and director of a college. He diſcharged the duties of thoſe places with great capacity, and publiſhed ſome books that met with a good reception. The Jeſuits made uſe of promiſes and allurements of every ſort to bring him back again [C], but all was in vain; he deſpiſed their flatteries, as well as the ſlanders which

Le vie de gli Dei
Sono oſcure & ritorte:
Ch'il crederebbe? in ſomma
E il cielo un Laberinto, in cui ſi perde
Chiunque va per iſpiarne i fati.

The ways of God are dark and intricate:
Strange thing indeed! which ne'ertheleſs is true.
Heav'n is in ſhort a labyrinth where he,
Who ſeeks to ſcan the myſteries of fate,
Is puzzled and bewilder'd. - - - -

[B] He retired to the court of Wirtemberg.] Spizelius is guilty of a great omiſſion; for he does not mention the year of his retreat. This fault has not been committed in Reihing's funeral oration; but the Printers of the Sieur Witte have ſo much falſified that date, that it can be of no uſe to me. They ſay, that Reihing having made his eſcape from the duke of Newburg's court, came to that of Wirtemberg in the beginning of the year 1601 (4). They left out, without doubt, vigeſimi; for I find in another author (5) that he privately withdrew from the duke of Newburg the 5th of January 1620, and went to that prince's mother at Hochſtett, and from thence to Ulm, and then to Stutgard, and at laſt to Tubingen, where he abjured Popery, and preached about the motives of his converſion the ſecond of January 1621. I find here ſome confuſion, when I compare Paul Freherus's narrative with that of Rauſcherus; for according to the latter, the new comer was examined a whole week, and then was ſent to Tubingen, where his name was regiſtered in the book of the rector of the univerſity. If he arrived at Stutgard in the beginning of January, and if he underwent there an examination that laſted a week, before he ſet out for Tubingen, as Rauſcherus affirms, he did not preach at Tubingen on the motives of his converſion on the 2d of January, as Freherus affirms. I believe there are two errors of the Preſs in Freherus's account; and that in order to rectify them, it muſt be ſaid that Reihing left the court of the duke of Newburg the 5th of January 1621, and preached at Tubingen the 22d of January in the ſame year. Do not wonder at the long examination he was obliged to undergo. The Proteſtants miſtruſt a Jeſuit very much, and the condition they were in at that time in Germany, made ſuch a miſtruſt neceſſary. Beſides, it is a very rare thing to ſee a famous Jeſuit quit his order to turn Proteſtant; and therefore ſuch a rarity is looked upon as a kind of prodigy, and is thought to deſerve a careful examination, to diſcover whether it be a good preſage, or the forerunner of ſome evil. The duke of Wirtemberg being informed that Father Reihing was come to change his religion, convened his Divines, and ordered them to examine him well. They perſonated the Catholics, and for a whole week propoſed to that Father the difficulties that are objected againſt the Proteſtants. He anſwered them in ſuch a manner as ſhewed that he had very carefully compared the two religions. Juro vobis Auditores: toto illo, quo res ſerio utrinque acta eſt, octiduo, ea in omnibus, & quidem cardinalibus fidei noſtræ articulis deprompſit & exhibuit fundamenta, ut neminem non in admirationem ſui converteret: Sacræ etiam Scripturæ teſtimonia, quibus noſtrorum ſententia firmari ſolet, ita in numerato habebat, ita illi præcipui textus erant in mundo (6), ac ſi totam ætatem in ſcholis noſtris inſumpſiſſet. Quæ profectò non rudem & novitium, ſed aliquem in hac militia veteranum arguebant (7). After he had undergone ſuch a trial, he was thought worthy of adoption, and they ſpoke to him the word of Priamus to Sinon (8). ' Soluto conventu lætum ex aula carmen accipit.

(4) Venerat ſub auſpicium ineuntis anni ſupra milleſimum ſexcenteſimum primi in aulam. Martinus Rauſcherus, in Laudat. funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theolog. p. 903.

(5) Paul. Freherus, in Theatr. Virorum illuſtr. pag. 431.

(6) A phraſe of Plautus, of the ſame import, with in numerato, or in promptu.

(7) Martinus Rauſcherus, ubi ſupra, pag. 903.

(8) Virgil. Æneid. lib. ii, ver. 148.

Quiſquis es, amiſſos hinc jam obliviſcere Graios:
Noſter eris (9). - - -

(9) Rauſcherus, ibid. pag. 905.

' When the meeting was ended, the court ſaluted him ' with this joyful ſong;

- - - - - - - Diſmiſs thy fears,
Forget the Greeks, be mine as thou wert theirs.

[C] The Jeſuits made uſe of promiſes and allurements of every ſort to bring him back again.] The more the Proteſtants gloried in the converſion of ſo famous a man, the more the Jeſuits were ſorry for the loſs of him. He had acquired the eſteem of the ſociety by his good life, eloquence, and learning (10); and therefore the whole order was afflicted at his change of religion, and they left no ſtone unturned to regain him. Father Keller promiſed him all ſorts of advantages, and a full liberty of returning to the Jeſuits, or of being a Canon, or of living a ſecular life. He gave him a carte blanche, and engaged his word that his ſuperiors would ratify whatever he ſhould promiſe him. Quam lautas ille (Kellerus) fecit pollicitationes? quam pingues conditiones & propter quas vel vadimonium deſeri poſſet, Reibingo obtulit? videlicet optionem illi permiſerat, utrum in Lojolæ familia manere, an verò in Canonicum aut Laicum ſe componere eligeret: dummodo ad ſinum Romanæ Eccleſiæ rediret. Proferebat hanc in rem chartam puram, quam Itali biancam vocant, cui inſcriberet, quicquid animo collibitum eſſet ſuo: nec de approbatione Superiorum dubitaret (11). Conrad Reihing, a Jeſuit, who was rector of a college at Augſburg, and brother to our Reihing, wrote to him continually, and exhorted him to return into the boſom of the church (12); ſeveral other Jeſuits did the ſame. Chriſtopher Grenzing, his provincial, was the firſt who endeavoured to bring him back; he promiſed him that the ſociety would be merciful to him. Quid dicam de literis Chriſtophori Grenzing Provincialis, qui primus ex omnibus à fuga illum retrahere tentavit cum hoc monito: quod Societas redeunti viſcera miſerationis & benignitatis recludat (13)? Even Mutius Vitelleſchi, general of the Jeſuits, took care to let him know, with a thouſand proteſtations of ſincerity, that he would be received with open arms, and that he would not be dealt with as Marc Antony de Dominis had been, but in a moſt cordial manner. Reihing did not truſt to thoſe promiſes, or rather he was ſo fully perſuaded that the church of Rome was not a good church, that he perſevered conſtantly in the Proteſtant religion. The Jeſuit, George Stengelius, confeſſed in ſome printed pieces, that the loſs of ſuch a man was very prejudicial to the ſociety. Nec diſſimulavit hoc ipſum Georgius Stengelius, qui in ſcriptis ſuis hactenus publicatis, non uno loco conqueritur, ingens diſceſſione Reihingi Societati ſuæ vulnus eſſe inflictum (14). There is ſcarce any religious order that has afforded fewer proſelytes to the Proteſtants, than that which Reihing quitted: This conſideration increaſed the ſorrow of the Jeſuits inſtead of leſſening it. The following words will ſhew you how much the Proteſtants triumphed on account of ſuch a ſingularity. ' (15) Quod quidem factum, ' quàm illuſtre, quàm admirabile, quàm inſperatum ' rarumque nobis acciderit ne commonere quidem vos ' opus eſt. Clericum Regularem, & Societatis Ignatianæ Patrem ad caſtra tranſire Evangelicorum, contra quos hactenus omni impetu ſteterat: ſive ut latinè dicam, Jeſuitam fieri Lutheranum, res eſt immemorabilis, & in tabulas æternitatis referenda

(10) See the fragment of a letter of the Jeſuit John Agricola, chaplain to the count de Tilli in the army: I ſay, ſee that fragment in Oratione funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theolog. pag. 898, 899.

(11) Rauſcherus, ibid. apud Witte, pag. 912.

(12) Ibid. pag. 913.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Ibid. pag. 899.

(15) Ibid. pag. 904.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which they ſpread againſt him [D]. He fell ſick of a Dropſy in the fixth year of his converſion,

'renda. Res, cujus prædicatio, multorum adhuc ſeculorum ingenia, ipſamque poſteritatis memoriam fatigabit. Res, quam nemo hodie (16) aut fando acceperit, aut oculorum fide fuerit arbitratus. - - - I need not tell you how great and admirable, nor how ſingular and unexpected this event is. That a regular Prieſt, a Father of the Ignatian ſociety, ſhould retire to the camp of the Evangelicans, whom he had hitherto oppoſed with all his might: or, to ſpeak in plainer language, that a Jeſuit ſhould turn Lutheran, is a thing highly remarkable and worthy of eternal record: a thing, the praiſe of which ſhall fatigue the genius's of many ages to come, and even tire the remembrance of poſterity: a thing which never any man had either heard or ſeen before.' France has afforded very few ſuch examples: there was one in the year 1647, when Jarrige turned Proteſtant.

(16) This author had, without doubt, forgot the converſion of Haſenmullerus: I have mentioned it in the article JARRIGE, remark [E].

[D] He deſpiſed . . . . the ſlanders that were ſpread againſt him.] They publiſhed ſome verſes againſt him in the German language, wherein he was horribly defamed, and ſome letters were diſperſed in the towns and courts of Germany, to repreſent him as a profligate man. They called him a paraſite, who had preferred good chear and good wine to a pious and ſolitary life: they charged him with having been a great courtier to the ladies, and they pretended he had been ſo much in love with a maid, that he debauched and got her with child: they added, that the ſwelling of her belly having diſcovered her crime, he ran away to avoid infamy and puniſhment. Circumvolitarunt vernacula lingua infames rythmi, & calumnioſæ literæ, aulas, urbes, oppida pernicioſiſſime pererrarunt. Narrarunt aulæ Palatinæ paraſitum: gynæcei aſſeclam: argenteos orbes, exquiſita fercula, & liquorem illius Dei, qui olim Indos expugnavit, præ lectione, præ oratione, præ ſolitudine amaſſe: vitæ cœlibis quietem deliciis prætuliſſe: Floræ & Veneris, non Societatis Sacerdotem fuiſſe: ſalacitatis libidine pruriiſſe: ſpecioſam puellam impudice deperiiſſe: inclinaſſe virginem, & infami compreſſu gravidaſſe: cumque illa uteri bulgam plus æquo intumeſcentem celare non poſſet, deſerto vadimonio, mali facinoris infamiam, & pœnas metuentem erupiſſe (17). Reihing confuted thoſe ſlanders by a fine apology, which he ſent to the court of Wirtemberg (18). There happened a thing which proclaimed his innocence. The duke of Bavaria ſent three deputies to that court, to wit, Henry de Stein, the Civilian Faber, and Father Keller, a Jeſuit and Rector of the college of Munich. They had orders to demand that this deſerter ſhould be delivered up to them, and they enumerated all the crimes that were laid to his charge. The duke of Wirtemberg anſwered them, that if Reihing was guilty of thoſe crimes, they might juridically proceed againſt him, and that he would appoint ſome upright judges to try him without any partiality; but that if the proſelyte was innocent, juſtice and equity required that he ſhould be allowed to live quietly in the profeſſion of that religion, which ſeemed the beſt to him (19). If it ſhould happen, added the duke, that my two preachers ſhould quit their religion, I would not ſtir out of my chamber upon ſuch an account. 'Subjunxit hoc mantiſſæ loco generoſiſſimus Princeps. 'Quod ſi fors hodie eveniret, utrumque Aulæ meæ 'Concionatorem à Religione ſua deficere: eorum cauſa, ne pedem quidem unicum extra limen promoverem (20).' Father Keller had at that time a conference with Reihing, and reproached him with thoſe irregularities, which had occaſioned ſo many ſongs and ſatirical letters. Reihing vindicated himſelf upon all thoſe heads, and even took an oath for his juſtification in the preſence of the three deputies of the duke of Bavaria. ' (21) Memores reſponſi iſtius, quod tibi com'itibuſque tuis, in præſentia virorum honoratiſſimorum, 'manu pectori admota, & ſublatis in cœlum oculis 'catapultæ inſtar retorſit. Ego, inquiebat ille, in conſpectu Cæleſtis illius Arbitri hic conſiſto, qui quæ nos 'gerimus, auditque & videt. Coram divina ejus Majeſtate agnoſco me peccatorum non infimum; ſed hunc teſtem invoco, vacare me culpa omnium, quæ imputantur, 'probrorum: fallentem vindicet, qui nunquam fallitur. '- - - Bearing in mind that anſwer which like an engine 'he darted back upon you and your companions in the preſence of a very honourable company, laying his hand upon his breaſt, and lifting his eyes towards heaven. I

(17) Rauſcherus, ubi ſupra, pag. 905.

(18) Ib. p. 906.

(19) Si hæc crimina, quorum reum poſtularent, deferrentque, veritate niterentur: fas eſſe, & poteſtatem ipſis in Aula adverſus eum lege ac judicio experiri: habituros judicem neutri parti obnoxium, ſed ex æquo & bono jus dicentem. Sin autem, &c. Ibid. p. 908.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Ib. p. 906. This is an apoſtrophe of the Orator to Father Keller.

ſtand, ſaid he, in the ſight of that Heavenly Judge, 'who both hears and ſees what we do. Before him 'I acknowledge that I am none of the leaſt of ſinners: but I call the ſame GOD to witneſs that I am 'intirely innocent of all thoſe crimes which are laid 'to my charge; and may he, who never is deceived, 'puniſh me if I tell a lie.' Keller having not been able to prevail with his old fellow Jeſuit, retired and told him, Eve has been the occaſion of your fall. His meaning was, that the deſire of marrying had induced Reihing to renounce his order and Popery. All the accuſations were at laſt reduced to this; the other vaniſhed away; but they obſtinately maintained that love was the only motive that had made him embrace the Proteſtant religion. They added, that after he had married, and got many children, he found himſelf ſo clogged, that he wanted courage to return into the boſom of the church, and departed this world to go into hell. This is what Alegambe reproaches him with. Prolapſus in turpes amores, ordinem, fidemque tranſfuga deſeruit, factus errorum magiſter: ducta dein domum pellice pro uxore, ſuſceptis compluribus liberis, ita miſer implicatus eſt, ut ad veritatis confeſſionem redire non ſuſtineret. Sic in æternam mortem occubuit (22). This is a common place ſo trivial and ſo much worn out, that I wonder people are not weary of making uſe of it. It has been turned a thouſand different ways, and ſome paſſionate men have choſen to alledge it againſt the Proteſtants in general, rather than againſt the Proſelytes. They ſay, that the firſt thing the Proteſtants do in favour of a Monk or Prieſt, who embraces their religion, is to procure him a wife; it is the cement wherewith they incorporate him into their ſect, and make him conſtantly adhere to it (23). They know that ſuch birds of prey cannot be better allured or tamed, than by ſuch a bit of fleſh. What a groſs fancy is this! I only mention it as an inſtance of the brutiſhneſs of ſome controverſiſts. Quinetiam aufim dicere eos ſtudioſius multò laborare in quærenda quamprimùm, & fucati conjugii glutino alligandâ unicuique tranſfugæ concubina, quàm in indaganda vitæ præteritæ ratione ac moribus. Illud quippe certò credunt non poſſe id genus accipitres vel efficacius accerſiri, vel melius cicurari, quàm ſi ejuſmodi carnis illicio ineſcentur (24). Father Reihing had without doubt foreſeen that things would be brought to that paſs, and that he would be expoſed to ſuch railleries, if he ſhould marry; but he overcame that fear, and had a greater regard for the doctrine of the apoſtle of the Gentiles, who will have the biſhop to marry, and who reckons the prohibition of marriage among the doctrines of the Devil. He therefore married the next year, and choſe in his native country a wife whom he had never ſeen (25). She was a choice woman, and of a very good family, handſome, ſober, and adorned with all virtues. Altero, poſtquam in hanc urbem venit, anno, cùm Tarſenſis Apoſtoli mandatum animo ſecum verſaret, quo EPISCOPUM unius Uxoris Virum eſſe juſſit, & quo nomine ipſe ille Gentium Doctor doctrinam matrimonio interdicentium appellaret, animum ad conjugium appulit, exemplaque ſuo vetus illud Euripidis comprobavit: Fatalem viro fœminæque torum eſſe (26).

(22) Alegambe, ubi ſupra. Note, that Southwell has wholly ſuppreſſed the article of James Reihing.

(23) Compare with this the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calvinism, p. 497, 498.

(24) Jacobus Gualterius, Tabuli Chronographici, Sec. XI, cap. vi, p. m. 636.

(25) Her name was Mary Felſer, and ſhe was the daughter of Felix Felſer. Morum & virtutum & formæ ornamentis conſpicua lectiſſimaque Virgo. Rauſcherus, ubi ſupra, p. 909.

(26) Ibid.

Obſerve, that Reihing and the author of his funeral oration, explain the words of St Paul as a precept: they pretend that the Apoſtle commands the Miniſters of the Goſpel to marry, and to take but one wife. This would be certainly the meaning of St Paul's words, if they were underſtood literally, that is, according to the rules of Grammar; for the terms, which denote the marriage of the biſhop with one wife, are as much governed by the word muſt (27), as thoſe that denote the biſhop's blameleſs life, ſobriety, prudence, gravity, modeſty, equity, moderation, and uninterreſtedneſs. As therefore it were abſurd to pretend that St Paul leaves it to the liberty of the Miniſters to be ſober, modeſt, blameleſs, &c. or not; ſo it is abſurd to pretend that he leaves it to their choice to marry a wife, or to marry none; I ſay, this is abſurd, if we ſtick to the literal ſenſe, and if we ſuppoſe that St Paul did actually obſerve Grammatical rules. I do not mean a rigorous exactneſs, ſuch as is obſerved in the articles of a Treaty of Peace, wherein all the expreſſions are narrowly conſidered, to prevent the abuſes that might ariſe from an equivocation, or the omiſſion of

A REFLEXION on St Paul's words, wherein he ſeems to command the biſhops to marry.

(27) Δεῖ οὖν τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεπίλημπτον εἶναι, γυναικὸς ἑνὸς ἄνδρα, νηφάλεον, σώφρονα, &c. Oportet ergo Epiſcopum irreprehenſibilem eſſe, unius uxoris virum, ſobrium, prudentem, &c. I. ad Timoth. cap. iii, ver. 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google conversion, and was suffocated by a catarrh some time after (e) [E]. New lies were spread concerning his death [F]. I shall give you the catalogue of his writings [G].

(e) Taken from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referato, pag. 95, & seq.

of a particle. Neither do I mean the rigid exactness of those scrupulous pedantic Grammarians, who had rather spend three hours in mending a period, than let it pass with some carelessness. I mean a method of explaining ones self clearly and distinctly, as a man of sense would do in a letter to a tutor, containing some directions. If he should write to him, I will have my children to say their prayers twice a day, to go to church twice a week, to forbear swearing and quarrelling, to be dutiful to their mother, and to go every Monday to the play-house, he would take all these several things as so many injunctions; he would not think that it is left to his discretion to carry his pupils every Monday to the play-house, or not: For in such a case, he must suppose that there is no connexion between these words, I will, and to go to the play-house; and that the father of his pupils made use of another verb, as to this last thing, and said for instance, and I give you leave to carry them to the play-house every Monday. It must be therefore granted, that if a Sophist should obstinately maintain, that whatever St Paul says concerning the qualifications of a bishop is obligatory, it would be no easy thing to confute him; and that one would be obliged to beg of him not to take it ill, that one should depart from the Grammatical strictness (28): since it is not likely that the Apostle designed to exclude from episcopacy, those who would live a single life, though they were endowed with all the talents requisite for the performance of episcopacy. Which shews, that too scrupulous an adherence to the literal sense of the Scripture, would very often prove the cause of many illusions, and that there are many cases in which the interpreters ought to remember the axiom, summum jus summa injuria. This shews at the same time, that we ought to do, not what the Apostles command, according to the Grammatical sense, but what common sense teaches us they intended to command. St Paul, according to the Grammatical rules, commands the bishops to marry; but reason shews us, that he intended only to forbid them Polygamy. We must therefore stick to this. Reihing and others are in the wrong to find in St Paul's words an injunction to marry; they contain only a permission: but their mistake is much more excusable than the intolerable boldness of forbidding Clergymen to marry. The Christian people will never be able to justify before God, the base compliance wherewith they have permitted that the laws of St Paul should be abrogated, though never so plain, clear, and intelligible. They have been severely punished for it, by the overflowing loudness wherewith their families have been polluted, and they are not yet free from it. I must observe by the by, that the Holy Scripture has been handled by the Christians much after the same manner as Justinian's Code. They are well pleased when the common-law agrees with the written-law; but if the common-law serves their turn better than the written-law, they can very well dispense with the want of conformity. Christianity has not been for many ages a country governed by the written-law.

(28) Here one must apply the following rule, Grammaticæ leges plerumque Ecclesia spernit.

(29) Rauscherus, ubi supra, pag. 916. Micræus, Syntagm. Histor. Eccles. p. m. 778, places his death wrong in the year 1624.

[E] He was suffocated by a catarrh some time after.] Here is a new omission of Spizelius: he neither sets down the day nor the year of Reihing's death. To supply that omission, I shall observe that he departed this life the fifth of May, 1628 (29). He used to bathe according to the Physician's prescription, and having lain down to take some rest, he fell asleep, and never awaked again. His panegyrist calls it a happy death (30), such as Augustus wished for himself and his friends. Ultimum maximumque mortalium votorum nactus, εὐθανασίαν, quam ille orbis Regnator Augustus olim sibi suisque exoptavit (31).

(30) Compare this with remark [F], of the article REGIUS.

(31) Rauscherus, ubi supra.

[F] News lies were spread about his death.] His death was reported before it happened; his dropsy was said to be an effect of the Divine vengeance; his dying without receiving the communion, occasioned several malicious reflexions; they maintained, that at the approach of his last hour he was cruelly tormented by the remorses of his conscience (32): lastly, they gave out, that upon the point of death he had made a recantation in the presence of his neighbours. It is expedient to observe these things, because they shew the blindness and fury of human passions, which are the fruits of credulity and false zeal, and the plague and destruction of reason. ‘ Vidimus volantes ‘ è vicinia chartas, immò ab Allobrogibus usque in ‘ manus nostras pervenerunt literæ, quæ eum in su- ‘ prema vitæ meta positum, Evangelium ejerasse, & ‘ in præsentia Vicinorum, ipsiusque D. PREGIT- ‘ ZERI palinodiam cecinisse loquerentur. O linguæ! ‘ ó calami! ó animorum effrons nequitia! Pudor & ‘ verecundia quò recessistis? Aliter tu loqueris Reve- ‘ rende Pregitzere (33). - - - - - - We have seen papers ‘ dispersed from the neighbourhood; nay letters from the ‘ south of France have reached to us; all of them af- ‘ firming that in his last hours he had abjured the Lu- ‘ theran religion, and made a formal recantation before ‘ his neighbours, and in the presence of PREGIT- ‘ ZER himself. O tongues! O pens! O brazen ‘ wickedness! Shame and modesty whither are ye fled? ‘ You, O reverend Pregitzer, will give a quite different ‘ account of things.’

(32) Horrentis conscientiæ morsibus mortalitatis lineæ jam vicinus infestari cœpit. Ibid. pag. 917.

(33) Ibid.

[G] The catalogue of his writings.] His first book was printed at Cologne in the year 1615, it was intituled Muri civitatis sanctæ, hoc est Fundamenta XII Religionis Catholicæ quibus infistens Serenissimus Princeps Neoburgicus, Lutheranismo abdicato in Ecclesiam pedem intulit. He was then a violent Papist. Balthazar Meisnerus, Frabricius Bassecourt, and Matthias Hoë wrote against him. Meisnerus è thesibus scalam centum & quadraginta gradus altam fabricavit, qua MUROS BABYLONIS ROMANÆ, ET CONFICTA PAPISTICÆ RELIGIONIS FUNDAMENTA demoliebatur. Bassecourtus TUBA DEI armatus, AD SUBVERTENDOS MUROS Ecclesiæ Romanæ progressus, eos velut illa Hierichuntis mœnia uno clangore diffiare & solo æquare est aggressus. Ultimus Matthias Hoë Enchiridion oppositi, in quo Romanæ fidei nebulæ clarissima Scripturarum luce discutiebantur (34). He published a reply to the two first, printed at Newburg in 1617. Here is the title of it: Excubiæ Angelicæ Civitatis Sanctæ pro defensione XII Fundamentorum Catholicorum Balthasari Meisnero præconi Lutherano, & Fabricio Bassecourt, Tibicini Calviniano oppositæ. His reply to Matthias Hoë was only published in the German language: here is the title of it expressed in Latin, Enchiridium Catholicum Manuali D. Hoë oppositum. Let us see the titles of the books he published, after he had embraced the confession of Augsburg. Laquei Pontificii contriti; quibus, adjuvante DOMINO, liberatus, Liberatori suo Ter Opt. Max. libenter meritò publicas gratias in Academia Tubingensi dicere voluit. Tubingæ 1622 in 4to. Germanicè, ibidem eodem anno in 4to. Dissertatio de vera Christi in terris Ecclesia, adversus larvatum Jesuitam Dillinganum: ibid. 1622 in 4to. Araneorum operæ, quas contra laqueos Pontificios contritos, texturam improbam suspenderunt Georgius Stengelius, Simon Schaitenreisser, & Laur. Forerus, Stilo Reibingi dejectæ: ibid. 1623 in 4to. Apologeticus pro Dissertatione sua, de Ecclesia Christi: ibid. 1624 in 4to. He published in the German language (35) a retractation of the book he had written against Matthias Hoë.

(34) Ibid. pag. 900.

(35) At Tubingen, in the year 1623.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

REINESIUS (THOMAS) one of the moſt learned men of the XVIIth century, was born at Gotha (a), a town of Thuringia in Germany, the thirteenth of December 1587 [A]. He was a Phyſician by profeſſion, but he applied himſelf very much to the ſtudy of the Belles Lettres, wherein he excelled moſt. He had already practiſed Phyſic in ſome other places (b), when he ſettled at Altenburg, to be the Phyſician of that town. He lived there ſeveral years, and was made Burgomaſter. At laſt, having been honoured with the dignity of Counſellor of State to the elector of Saxony, he went to reſide at Leipſic, where he died the fourteenth of February (c) 1667 (d). He had often refuſed to be a profeſſor, becauſe he was afraid his colleagues would prove intolerable [B], and it is very likely that if he had accepted of any ſuch employment, he would have had many quarrels; for he could not avoid falling out with a profeſſor of Leipſic,

(a) And not at Altenburg, as it is ſaid in Moreri's Dictionary.

(b) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1667. See the remark [B], citation (10).

(c) And not 1657, as in Konig's Bibliotheque, in Moreri, and elſewhere.

(d) Ex Witte, ubi ſupra.

[A] He was born . . . . the thirteenth of December, 1587.] Tho' I had ſeen this date in large letters under Reineſius's cut prefixed to one of his books (1); yet I did a little ſuſpect it, conſidering that the Journaliſts of Leipſic ſay he died the fourteenth of February, 1667, being ſeventy years old (2). Thoſe gentlemen are very exact, and no body could be better informed of the true age of that learned man. Beſides, I ſaw that Andreas Carolus abbot of St George, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, obſerves, that he lived above ſeventy years, obiit Thomas Reineſius ſeptuagenario major (3). We do not ſpeak in this manner of a man, who dies in his eightieth year. But I was no longer uncertain about it, when I read the letter wherein Reineſius ſays, that his maſters had adviſed him, above ſeventy years ago, to make frequent uſe of Dictionaries (4). This he writ the tenth of February, 1665; which is a good confirmation of the date that is under his print.

(1) His letters ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, printed at Leipſic in the year 1660.

(2) Acta Erudit. Lipſ. 1682, p. 92.

(3) Andreas Carolus, Memorab. Eccleſ. lib. vii, ad ann. 1667, pag. 409.

(4) Reineſ. Epiſt. XXIX, ad Joannem Voſſium, pag. 61.

(5) It is dated from Altemburg the tenth of October 1638.

[B] He often refuſed to be made a profeſſor, becauſe he was afraid his colleagues would prove intolerable.] I find this particular in his firſt letter (5) to Gaſpar Hoffman, Profeſſor of Phyſic at Altorf. That profeſſor had writ to him that he had been expoſed for the ſpace of thirty years, to the clamours and ſlanders of envious men, and obliged to maintain ſome violent aſſaults (6). Reineſius anſwered him, that he was likewiſe perſecuted by ſome croſs-grained jealous men, and that there was ſo little true friendſhip left in the world, and ſo little equity and order in the commonwealth of learning, that he had concealed himſelf the greateſt part of his life to avoid the ſtorm. Me quoque circumſtrepunt & adfligunt turbæ æmulorum, invidorum ſuſurri, ſemidoctorum impudentia judicia. His enim heu! execrandis moribus hodiè vivitur, ut de Bonis judicent peſſimi, de artibus imperiti, in literis dominentur thraſones; omnia ſint fucata, & genuinarum amicitiarum nihil ferè reſtet; quas intemperies ſerìò deploravi ſemper, & ut declinarem iſta paſſiva, βιώσας maximam partem λέληθα (7). He goes on, and ſays, I have often refuſed the profeſſorſhips that were offered me, becauſe I thought I could not bear the ill humour of ſome perſons with whom I muſt have lived, and I have rather choſen to ſtay here, though I do not live a very eaſy life. He was then Phyſician of the town of Altenburg. Nominatus toties ab Academicis, vocatuſque a Principibus ad munus docendi publicum; repugnavi, ſocio uno alteroque è noſtratibus (non enim ſum πολυφιλῶν) conſilii, voluntatibus utrorumque, quòd mores incommodos nonnullorum, cum quibus vivendum eſſet, tolerare poſſe non conſiderem, & manſi in ſtatione, nec ipſa ſatis commodâ (8). Here is part of the inconveniencies which he does enumerate. My mentioning of them is not needleſs on this occaſion; for they are things that belong to the Hiſtory of his Life.

(6) See Reineſius's Letters, ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, p. 2.

(7) Ibid. pag. 6.

(8) Ibid.

‘ (9) Quid enim hoc decennio Altenburgi (Curienſia ‘ & Gerana (10) tranſmittam, etſi & illic ſat fuerit ‘ nubilorum) non expertus ſum, in quo non tentatus? ‘ Poſt triſte ſpectaculum expilatæ domûs amiſi intra ‘ ſemeſtre tres jucundiſſ. filios, ſuaviſſimam conjugem, ‘ incomparabilem fœminam; ſolùm animus Deo ‘ nixus & invictus mihi ſupereſt, cum tantillo boni ‘ nominis, & quantum ſatis eſt frugali opum. Λιτῶς ‘ μὲν ἀλλ' ἐν ἐλευθερίᾳ. Trinâ vice, me Phyſico, ‘ τὸ λοιμῶδες ἐπιδήμιον hanc urbem adflavit . . . ‘ Conjugium, quod ante triennium ſecundum inivi, ‘ eſt incommodius, quàm ſperaveram, & multis rei ‘ familiaris tricis, quas tamen deprecatus fui, me involvit, &, quod caput eſt, ſterile; quò malo triſtius ‘ nihil obvenire poterat antè liberis orbato, καὶ ὄλῳ ‘ ἀπερισάτῳ. - - - - What inconveniency is there that ‘ I have not felt for thoſe ten years paſt at Altenburg ‘ (I ſhall ſay nothing of my ſufferings during the time ‘ that I practiſed at Haff and Gera, tho' there too I ‘ had troubles enough) what trial is there that I have ‘ not undergone? After the melancholy accident of ſeeing ‘ my houſe robbed, I had the misfortune to loſe in leſs ‘ than ſix months time, three charming boys, together ‘ with a moſt ſweet and incomparable wife. I have ‘ nothing left now but a mind, which, putting its truſt ‘ in GOD, cannot be overcome, a little reputation, and ‘ juſt as much wealth as is neceſſary for a frugal man. ‘ Plainly but freely, is my motto. Three times has ‘ this town been afflicted with the plague, ſince I practiſed ‘ here . . . . my ſecond marriage, which I contracted ‘ about three years ago, has proved more inconvenient ‘ than I thought it would; for it has involved me in ‘ a great many little domeſtic cares to which I had a ‘ ſtrong averſion. But above all it is barren; which ‘ is the greateſt misfortune that can poſſibly happen to a ‘ man that has been deprived of his former children, and ‘ is in a manner wholly deſtitute.’ It ought to be obſerved that ſome ill affected perſons had ſent to Hoffman ſeveral ſheets of Reineſius's Variæ lectiones, whilſt they were printing, in hopes that Hoffman would write againſt that work: but the event proved contrary to their expectation; for Hoffman finding himſelf praiſed in that part of the book (11) that was ſent to him, laid aſide the reſentment he had conceived againſt Reineſius, by whom he had thought himſelf offended, and wrote a very obliging letter to him (12). I think I may ſay, that the ſharpeſt quarrel Reineſius ever had, was that which he had with Rivinus, profeſſor at Leipſic. Reineſius declares he had not been the aggreſſor, and had only anſwered the injurious words of that critic. Nevertheleſs the latter made his complaints to the magiſtrates, and left no ſtone unturned to prevent the printing of Reineſius's anſwer. Can any thing be more unjuſt? ‘ Nunquam odio habui hominem; ſed calumniatorem & ‘ projectiſſimæ proterviæ accuſatorem ferre non debui ‘ tamen. Etiamnum hodie crepant nutantque ſubſellia ‘ Judicum apud Nos, ad quos me, ſtulte querens de ‘ injuriis quas Ipſe prior intuliſſet, deferebat, neque ‘ ſuæ famæ ſatis cavens, dum meam maculare intenderet μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας καὶ ὑπληγορίας. ‘ . . . . . Defenſionem meam, quam à provocantis impoſita mihi neceſſitas excuſat, in amicorum ſinu depoſui (13) . . . . Dixit, quæ voluit; æquum eſt ut audiat quæ nolet. . . . . Ex eo vero, quod apologiam meam tot adhibitis machinis, mendaciis etiam ſupprimere annifus fuit, malam cauſam fovere judicatus eſt dudum, & deſignaſſe facinus, quod æternam nomini ejus inuſſit notam. Voluit nimirum ut ipſe de me cenſor ſedere poſſet, ſed ἀνυπεύθυνος; voluit ut liceret ſibi in me quidvis; mihi ne quidem hiſcere contra (14). - - - - I never hated the man; but I did not think myſelf obliged to bear with a calumniator and a moſt inſolent accuſer. Even at this day our courts of judicature, reſound with his fooliſh complaints againſt me, whom he ſummoned to anſwer for thoſe very injuries which himſelf had offered firſt. Thus he does not ſpare his own reputation, provided he can but fix a blot upon mine, with his fantaſtical inſinuations and high-flown words . . . . . I have depoſited my defence; which the impudence of this aggreſſor, made neceſſary and excuſable, in the hands of my friends. . . . . He ſaid what he pleaſed; it is therefore fit he ſhould hear what will not pleaſe him . . . . . But from his ſcandalous endeavours to ſuppreſs my apology by ſo many tricks, and even lies, it has been long ago concluded that he maintained a bad cauſe, and that his deſign was villanous, which has fixed an everlaſting brand upon his name. He wanted forſooth

(9) Ibid. pag. 7.

(10) He means by Curienſia, his being Phyſician to the town of Hoff (in Latin Curia) in Voigtland; and by Gerana the like employment at Gera, a town in the ſame country, which belongs to the lords of Plaven, whoſe family name is Reuſſen, in Latin Rutheni.

(11) Reineſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 5.

(12) Ibid. pag. 1.

(13) Reineſius, Epiſt. XLIV, ad Dammium, pag. 122.

(14) Ibid. pag. 123.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Leipsic, though they lived at a considerable distance from one another. It was at first a quarrel about some points of Literature, which turned afterwards into a law-suit (e). I cannot tell whether Reinesius left any children behind him; but I know that in 1638, he complained that he had lost his first wife, and all the children he had by her; and that his second wife, to whom he had been married three years, was barren (f). This was the greatest, but not the only inconveniency of his second marriage. He had a share in the liberality of Lewis XIV, to the most famous learned men in Europe. The sum that was sent him, was attended with a very obliging letter of Mr Colbert, for which he expressed his acknowledgment, by dedicating to him his observations on the fragment of Petronius, in the year 1666. They who can judge of a point of Literature, have no sooner read some pages of his writings, but they place him above those Philologers, who have only a good memory, and reckon him among those Critics, who go beyond their reading, and know more things than books have taught them. The penetration of their wit makes them draw consequences, and affords them conjectures, which lead them to the discovery of hidden treasures. By that means they clear the darkest parts of erudition, and extend the bounds of the knowledge of antiquity. Reinesius was one of those Critics, and made it his chief business to find out what others had not said. If his supplements to Vossius's treatise de Historicis Græcis are ever printed, the reader will wonder how Vossius, who made so fine and so large a collection, could omit so many things. It appears from Reinesius's printed letters, that he was consulted like an Oracle; and that he answered very learnedly the questions that were proposed to him, and that he was very well versed in the knowledge of the antient families of Rome, and in the study of inscriptions. There is a very fine elogy upon his merit, and his learned and political works in the Epistle Dedicatory (g) of the second edition of Casaubon's Letters. Some Divines have laid to his charge, that he had a particular religion made up of such things as seemed to him best in other religions [C]. I shall set down the

(e) See the remark [B].

(f) See the same remark.

(g) Written by Mr Grævius, and dated from Amsterdam the 31st of August 1655. It is quoted in Moreri's Dictionary, and nothing else is quoted in it, though that Epistle does scarce mention any of the particulars related in this article.

'to sit as a privileged censor upon my actions, without 'being called to an account for it; he wanted to take all 'manner of liberties with me, at the same time that I 'should not so much as dare to open my mouth against 'him.' The apology of Reinesius was printed, notwithstanding the aggressor's opposition. This I find in a letter written the seventh of August, 1653. See also the letter which Reinesius wrote to Bosius the eighteenth of January, in the same year (15).

(15) Epist. Thomæ Reinesii, & Joan. Andr. Bosii, p. 23.

A REFLEXION upon the faults of men of letters, and upon the difficulty of acquiring tranquillity of mind.

What I have said of the misfortunes that Reinesius complained of, seems to be the common fate of learned men. The history of their lives and their letters do commonly shew that they have been engaged in troublesome quarrels, attended with jealousy, calumny, virulency, satire, factious spirit, fraud, and a thousand other shameful passions. One would think, that of all men scholars are most apt to make themselves and others uneasy. Which must needs create a contempt and hatred for learning, or at least make one lose the good opinion one might entertain of it. Ignorant people fancy, that if they had spent all their time in reading, they would have learned to moderate their passions, and to cure themselves of several faults, which incline them to behave themselves unjustly toward their neighbour. But they would have other thoughts, if they knew that the most learned men abuse and persecute one another, and complain of their sad destiny. From thence we may draw this conclusion, that there is nothing so difficult to be acquired as the tranquillity and uprightness of the mind. A continual study of good books seems to be a most proper means to acquire that treasure; and yet it seldom procures it, but very often produces a quite contrary effect. Horace had a very wrong notion, when he spoke these words: It is enough for me to beg of God that he would preserve my life, and bestow riches upon me; and then I shall know how to procure to myself tranquillity of mind.

Quid sentire putas? quid credis, amice, precari?
Sit mihi, quod nunc est, etiam minus: ut mihi vivam
Quod superest ævi, si quid superesse volunt Dî:
Sit bona librorum & provisæ frugis in annum
Copia: ne fluitem dubiæ spe pendulus horæ.
Sed satis est orare Jovem, qui donat, & aufert,
Det vitam, det opes: æquum mî animum ipse parabo (16).

(16) Horat. Epist. XVIII, lib. i, in fine.

For what do you imagine that I care?
What think, what make the subject of my pray'r?
Let me have what I have, or somewhat less,
'Twill still be great enough for happiness;
And that I may, if Heav'n more years will give,
Live to myself the time I have to live:
Estate in books, and food to serve a year,
Lest I should wav'ring hang 'twixt hope and fear.
And this is all for which mankind should pray,
And beg of Jove who gives and takes away;
Let him but life and mod'rate plenty find,
And I'll provide myself an happy mind.

CREECH.

He was grosly mistaken: the thing, for which he thought he stood in no need of God's assistance, was what he could least expect from his own ability, and the first he should have besought Jupiter to bestow upon him; for it is much more easy to get riches and honours by one's industry, than a quiet and contented mind. If it be said, that riches and honours depend upon a thousand things which we cannot dispose of at pleasure, and that therefore it is necessary to pray to God that he would turn them to our advantage; I answer, that the silence of the passions, and the tranquillity of the mind depend upon a thousand things, which are not under our jurisdiction. The stomach, the spleen, the lymphatic vessels, the fibres of the brain, and a hundred other organs, whose seat and figure are yet unknown to the Anatomists, produce in us many uneasinesses, jealousies, and vexations. Can we alter those organs? Are they in our power (17)?

(17) These words of Horace, Epist. i, lib. i, ver. ult. Præcipue sanus (he speaks of the wise man of the Stoics) nisi cum pituita molesta est, may be very well applied to the mind, supposing that sanus signifies the tranquillity of the mind.

[C] Some Divines have laid to his charge, that he had a particular religion made up of such things as seemed to him best in other religions.] A Divine of Wirtemberg, whom I have quoted above, affirms that Reinesius, who went to the Lutheran churches, and communicated with the Lutherans, spoke so ill of their Divines, and of their doctrine, and liturgies, that he was worse than a professed adversary: from whence he concludes, either that he was of the religion of prudent men, or that he favoured it: for he openly declared that he followed a certain religion in certain points, and another religion in other points. Tam sinistrè sensit, tam scabiosè locutus est, de Doctoribus & Professoribus harum (Lutheranarum) partium, imò de ipsa doctrina, de symbolicis libris, de dogmatibus in iisdem contentis, ut vix quisquam ex manifestis adversariis taliter fecerit. Probari hæc possunt ex Epistolis, quas an. 1654. vel circiter, Coloniæ Brandenburgicæ publicavit, ubi contemptim Formularios vocat Theologas F. C. amplexos; D. Majorem Seniorem, Grandionem, qui applausores nullos in N. habeat: alios nominat Archiperecidas, & ita conseq. Religioni Prudentum procul ambiguo addictus erat Sycophanta, vel eidem certè favebat, apertè fassus, hoc se in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the titles of moſt of his books [D].

una Religione, aliud in alia ſequi (18). That Divine had explained, in another place, what he meant by the religion of prudent men. Here is the ſubſtance of his diſcourſe. A Dutchman ſaid one day, that the religion of Grotius was that of learned men. Being aſked what religion it was; he anſwered, to believe what they pleaſe (19). Hulſeman (20) aſked, whether Grotius meant, that one ought to follow the opinions of prudent men, and he believes this is the religion of prudent men, which is known but to few perſons, and very much boaſted of in France, and more particularly in Holland. Hereupon Mullerus, a Divine of Hamburgh (21), and Kromaier, a Divine of Leipſic (22), held it for a certain thing, that Grotius had followed the religion of prudent men, which is a mixture of ſeveral religions, and which takes ſometimes from one and ſometimes from another what it thinks fit, and ſuits to it's intereſt. It is called the religion of prudent men, becauſe the wiſe men of this world pitch upon it with great prudence, as they think, and keep it as long as they pleaſe; it is alſo called the Political and Philoſophical religion. It goes by the firſt of thoſe two names, becauſe the Politicians make choice of it; for they are men who will be free in that point, and who turn themſelves all manner of ways. It is ſtiled Philoſophical, becauſe it frees a man from the obligation of believing; and it is well known that a Philoſopher ſubmits to no human authority, and will not ſwear to the words of any maſter, Liber homo Philoſophus nullius addictus jurare in verba Magiſtri. The author mentions two other epithets; he ſays, that this religion of prudent men is called Eclectic, or Eclogiſtic (23). I wonder he ſaid nothing of the ſect of the Eclectic Philoſophers founded by Potamon of Alexandria, who lived in the time of Auguſtus. Thoſe men were neither Platoniſts, nor Stoics, nor Peripatetics, nor of any other particular ſect; but they took out of every one of them what they liked beſt, and left the reſt. Such is the notion of the religion aſcribed to Reineſius. It was a religion of choice, a Moſaic work, a work made up of in-laid pieces. There are more people than is commonly believed, who form ſuch a religion to themſelves, and do not boaſt of it. They might be called in Latin Miſcelliones (24).

(18) Andreas Carolus, Memorab. Eccleſ. Sæc. XVII, lib. vi, cap. xxxii, pag. 97.

(19) Ibid. lib. v, cap. liii, p. 1088. He quotes Burgold. Not. rer. Imp. Part ii, xi.

(20) In Diatr. Schol. de Auxil. Grat. pag. 479.

(21) Atheiſ. devict. pag. 459.

(22) Loc. Antiſyncret. pag. 271, & ſeq.

(23) Andreas Carolus, lib. vi, cap. xxxii, pag. 97.

(24) Miſcelliones appellantur qui non certæ ſunt ſententiæ, ſed variorum mixtorumque judiciorum. Feſtus Pompeius.

[D] I ſhall inſert the titles of moſt of his books.] Here are ſome concerning Phyſic. De vaſis umbilicalibus eorumque ruptura obſervatio ſingularis, at Leipſic, 1624, in 4to. Chimiatria, hoc eſt Medicina nobili & neceſſaria ſui parte, Chimiâ, inſtructa & exornata, at Gera in Voigtland, 1624, in 4to. The following books concern Literature: De Deo Endovellico, Altemburg, 1637. Ἰσορύμενα linguæ Punicæ contra Vitum Wolfrum, Altemburg, 1637. Variarum lectionum libri tres, ibid. 1640, 4to. Defenſio variarum lectionum, Roſtoch, 1653, in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Caſparum Hoffmannum, & Chriſt. Ad. Rupertum, Leipſic, 1660, in 4to. They have printed, after his death, Epiſtolæ ad Johannem Voſtium, at Coln in Brandenburg, 1667, in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Neſteros patrem & filium, Leipſic, 1670, in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Chriſtianum Daumium, Iena, 1670, in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Jo. Andream Boſium, Iena, 1700, in 12mo. Syntagma inſcriptionum antiquarum cumprimis Romæ Veteris quarum omiſſa eſt recenſio in vaſto Jani Gruteri opere, cujus iſthoc dici poſſit ſupplementum, cum commentariis abſolutiſſimis (25), Leipſic, 1682, in folio. Diſſertatio Critica de Sibyllinis Oraculis (26), Iena, 1685, in 4to. I can ſay nothing certain about ſome other books which Mr Konig aſcribes to him. I am afraid he confounds thoſe that have been printed, with thoſe that have not been publiſhed. He aſcribes to him Gloſſarium vocum barbaricarum: cenſuram nonnullorum in Salmaſii exercitationibus Plinianis. Commentarium in Inſcriptiones Gruteri. Variarum Lectionum libros ſex. Ἰσορύμενα Medicinæ, vel ſucceſſiones & vitæ Medicorum, and ſeveral other works. Moreri pretends, that Reineſius made himſelf known by his ſix books of Variæ Lectiones, that he has alſo written a cenſure upon Salmaſius's Exercitationes on Pliny or Solinus, and ſome commentaries on Gruterus's Inſcriptions (27). I cannot agree with him in this; for there are only three books of Variæ Lectiones printed; and I know nothing of Reineſius's book, intituled, Cenſura exercitationum Plinarum Salmaſii. I do not find it mentioned in the preface to his poſthumous works. I do not queſtion but that he was well qualified to write ſuch a book, and to cut out as much work for Salmaſius, as for Barthius (28); but I do not know whether he had ſuch a deſign; and if he had, I dare ſay the performance of it has not been made public. The inſcriptions commented upon by Reineſius are different from thoſe of Gruterus. Laſtly, Moreri ſays nothing of ſeveral books that have been publiſhed. If his article of Reineſius was corrected, there would remain but two or three words of his.

(25) See the Acta Eruditorum 1682, pag. 89, & ſeq.

(26) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, July 1685, Art. V.

(27) Confer the Jugemens des Sçavans, tom. 525.

(28) See the remark [R], of the article RAPHELENGIUS.

I muſt deſire the readers to take notice that the Bookſellers have prefixed Reineſius's name to a book, of which he did not write one line. Mr Witte mentions this, leſt Reineſius ſhould be looked upon as a Plagiary: Exiit quoque Lipſiæ an. 1679, ſub ejus nomine, Schola Jure-Conſultorum Medica, Relationum libris aliquot comprehenſa, quibus principia Medicinæ in jus tranſſumta ex profeſſo examinantur. Verus autem Auctor & titulus iſte eſt: Fortunati Fidelis de Relationibus Medicorum libri IV. in quibus ea omnia, quæ in forenſibus ac publicis cauſis Medici referre ſolent, pleniſſimè traduntur, ſtudiò D. Pauli Ammanni, Lipſiæ 1674. Hoc indicare volui, ne Vir CL. præter meritum Plagiariis adſcribatur (29). Mr Witte has forgot a material circumſtance, viz. that the book, intituled, Fortunati Fidelis, &c. was printed at Palermo in the year 1602, in 4to (30). That edition is quoted in Lindenius Renovatus, pag. 275, under the name of Fortunatus Fidelis; but the author did not know that the Schola Juriſconſultorum, &c. printed at Leipſic in the year 1679, is the ſame with that of Fortunatus Fidelis, for he aſcribes it to Reineſius, pag. 1023. I fancy the Leipſic edition, 1674, differs from that of 1679, as to the title; and that Reineſius's name was put to it, to make it ſell the better (31).

(29) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1667, fum Yyy 3.

(30) I have been informed of this by a letter of Mr Bourdelet, firſt Phyſician to the dutcheſs of Burgundy.

(31) Compare this with citation (3), of the article PINEAU.

REMOND (a) (FLORIMOND DE) counſellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux, towards the end of the XVIth century, ſignalized himſelf by ſome violent books againſt the Proteſtants [A]. He had been a Huguenot in his younger days; but if we may believe him, he was reſcued from the jaws of Hereſy (b) by a miracle, of which he was an eye-witneſs in the year 1566. Moreri, who mentions it, knew not the place where that comedy was acted: he ſays, that a woman called Nicole Obri, a native of Vervins, was exorciſed at Loudun (c). He is miſtaken, it was at Laon: I have ſaid in another place (d), that Father Labbe has committed the ſame fault. There is ſome reaſon to believe that Florimond de Remond ſtudied under Peter Ramus, in the college of Prele

(a) He ſpelt his name Ræmond, but he calls himſelf Ræmound in ſome of his books.

(b) Florimond de Ræmond, Hiſt. de la naiſſance & progrès de l'Hereſie, liv. II, ch. XII, pag. 204.

(c) Moreri, at the word Florimond de Raymond.

(d) In the article LOUDUN, remark [C].

[A] He ſignalized himſelf by ſome violent books againſt the Proteſtants.] He publiſhed a book, intituled, Erreur populaire de la Papeſſe Jeanne. I have the Bourdeaux edition 1594; the author puts his name to it, which ſhews that it is not the firſt; for the firſt came out without his name. As it was never my deſign, they are Florimond de Remond's words (1), to get reputation by thoſe inconſiderable productions of my brain, (it were to pretend to build a ſolid glory upon a ſandy foundation) ſo I have endeavoured to avoid ſhame. Which moved me to ſuppreſs my name, becauſe it could not keep a rank among ſo many learned men, wherewith France abounds. But ſince that author has put a quite contrary interpretation upon the laudable fear that reſtrained me, I have been willing to open the curtain, and appear in public; and yet I will, out of kindneſs to him, ſuppreſs his name, ſince he has ſo weakly anſwered my arguments. This he ſays concerning a Miniſter of Bern (2), who had writ ſomething

(1) Pag. 303, of his Erreur populaire, Edit. of Bourdeaux 1594.

(2) He denotes him only by theſe two letters R. T.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Prele at Paris: which I obſerve only to have an opportunity to mention what he ſays concerning the book de Tribus Impoſtoribus [B]. Botereius places his death in the year 1602 (e), and Moreri in the year 1600. Some will have it that he is not the author of the books that are aſcribed to him [C], whereof the moſt conſiderable is The Hiſtory of the Birth, Progreſs, and Declenſion of the Hereſy of this Age. He was the unfitteſt man in the world to ſucceed in ſuch an undertaking [D], conſidering the hatred he had conceived ſomething againſt the anonymous book of the popular error concerning Pope Joan: which was the reaſon why the author publiſhed a ſecond edition of it well reviſed, and undertook a longer and more ſerious work; it was that concerning Anti-Chriſt. Vignier ſays that he made uſe of the ſecond edition of the Anti-Chriſt, and of the Anti-Pope Joan, reviſed, corrected, and enlarged by the author, and printed at Paris, by Abel l'Angelier, 1599 (3). He is miſtaken as to the Anti-Pope Joan; for the Paris edition 1599, was at leaſt the fourth; for there was one printed at Lyons by Bennet Rigaut, in 8vo, in the year 1595 (4). Cooke is ſtill more miſtaken, for he ſays that book was firſt written in French in the year 1602 (5). Saggittarius mentions only the French edition of Bourdeaux of the ſame year (6). The third book of Remond did not come out till after his death; it is intituled, The Hiſtory of the Birth, Progreſs, and Decay of Hereſy in this age, divided into eight books. The ſixth book was to contain an account of the ſchiſm of England; they found only the title of it among the papers of the author: he compoſed firſt the ſeventh and the eighth, which were more neceſſary, becauſe they contained the hiſtory of what had happened in France (7). Francis de Remond, his ſon, who took care of the impreſſion of that book, and dedicated it to Paul V, ſupplied the ſixth book (8). Sagittarius obſerves, that Florimond de Remond, or rather the Jeſuit Richeome, writ the Hiſtory of the Birth, Progreſs, and Decay of Hereſy, in three volumes; he quotes the French edition of Paris 1605, and that of 1624 (9). This account is not exact; for the edition of 1605, contains only one volume, and it is the only one that was written by Remond; the other two were compoſed by Claudius Mallingre, Hiſtoriographer of France, and printed at Paris in 1624. That work of Remond, and Mallingre's continuation, have been reprinted ſeveral times (10), ſometimes in French, and ſometimes in Latin. The two other works of Remond have been likewiſe tranſlated into Latin. Note, that he publiſhed at Bourdeaux in 1594, the French tranſlation he had made of Tertullian's treatiſe de Corona Militis, and of the ſame Father's diſcourſe ad Martyres. Note alſo, that Baronius, and ſome other writers of the ſame party, do very much commend his books of controverſy.

(e) Rodolph. Botereius, Commentar. de Rebus in Gallia geſtis, lib. ix, pag. 91.

(3) Vignier, Théatre de l'Antechriſt, in the table of the authors.

(4) Blondel made uſe of this in his Examen Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, where he takes notice of the errors of Florimond de Remond.

(5) Cooke, upon Pope Joan, pag. m. 2.

(6) Sagittar. Introduct. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 683.

(7) See the preface to the Hiſtoire de la naiſſance, &c. de l'Hereſie.

(8) I was forced to work hard, and to write in haſte, that I might publiſh it as ſoon as ever I could. Ibid.

(9) Sagitt. ibid. pag. 820.

(10) I make uſe of the Roan edition 1648.

[B] What he ſays concerning the book de Tribus Impoſtoribus.] 'Have we not ſeen a deteſtable 'book forged in Germany, tho' printed in another 'country, at the very ſame time that hereſy acted 'it's part, which ſowed this doctrine with this horrid title, Of the three Impoſtors, &c. ridiculing the 'three prevailing religions, which alone acknowledge 'the true God, viz. the Jewiſh, the Chriſtian, and 'the Mahometan. That title alone ſhewed that it 'was a production of Hell; and what an age it muſt 'be which could bring forth ſo terrible a monſter. 'I would not have mentioned it, if Hoſius and Genebrard had not ſpoken of it before me. I remember, that when I was a little boy, I ſaw a copy of 'it in the college de Prele in Ramus's hands, who 'was an eminent man for his learning, and who 'confounded himſelf with his enquiries into the myſteries of religion, which he coupled with Philoſophy. That wicked book was handed about among 'the moſt learned, who were deſirous to ſee it (11).' Theſe are Remond's words. If he had known, that this wicked book was talked of under the empire of Frederic II (12), would he have been ſo bold as to aſcribe the production of ſuch a monſter to the XVIth century? Perhaps he would, for his only deſign was to render Lutheraniſm odious per fas & nefas. Moſt people father the pretended book de tribus Impoſtoribus upon Aretin (13), they put it therefore upon Italy, and not upon Germany.

(11) Remond. Hiſt. de la naiſſance de l'Hereſie, livr. ii, ch. xvi, pag. m. 236.

(12) See the article ARETIN (PETER), remark [G].

(13) See the ſame remark.

[C] Some will have it, that he is not the author of the books that are aſcribed to him.] Let us go back a little. Mr Sagittarius ſupplies me with the two following paſſages in a book printed in 1694. Florimundus Ræmundus, Vaſco, ſenator parliamenti Burdegalenſis, ſub cujus nomine Ludovicus Richeomus, Jeſuitici Sodalitii Theologus, Gallice ſcripſit Errorem popularem de Johanna Pſeudo-pontifice, dicta Papiſſa, Latine poſtea verſum (14). This he ſays, pag. 683. Let us ſee what he ſays, pag. 820. Florimundus Ræmundus, five potius cujus ſtylo uſus eſt, Ludovicus Richeomius Soc. J. qui de ortu, progreſſu & interitu hæreticorum hujus temporis Tomis III. commentatus eſt. I proceed to a book printed in 1688. 'It is very much doubted, 'whether Florimond was really the author of thoſe 'books that paſs under his name. For many have 'ſaid, that Father Richeome, a Jeſuit, wrote them, 'and borrowed the name of a counſellor of the parliament of Bourdeaux, to give his work the more 'credit. Perhaps it was thought neceſſary to ſet a 'writer of ſome name in oppoſition to Thuanus, 'whoſe hiſtory was written with too much ſincerity to 'be acceptable to the Jeſuits. Peter Matthieu in his 'hiſtory ſays poſitively, that it was believed Father Richeome was the author of the books that went under 'the name of Florimond de Raymond. Vignier in his 'Theatre of Anti-Chriſt, and Rivetus in his Anſwer to 'the Jeſuit, ſay the ſame thing; and theſe were the men 'that wrote ſoon after Florimond's book appeared. Blondel was alſo of the ſame opinion (15).' Theſe are the words of a doctor, which is now an illuſtrious Prelate in England. It is certain, that theſe following words are to be found in a work of Vignier: Matthieu the king's Hiſtoriographer ſays in his Hiſtory of the King, that he does not think that the book concerning Anti-Chriſt was written by the ſaid Remond, but by the Jeſuit Richeome (16). It is no leſs certain, that Rivetus having mentioned what Florimond de Remond acknowledges to Calvin's honour in his Hiſtory of the birth of Hereſy, adds this (17): I have been willing to inſert here the words of an enemy, and perhaps of the Jeſuit Richeome, to whom Peter Matthieu aſcribes Ræmond's Anti-Chriſt. I have found the paſſage of Peter Matthieu; here it is: 'The aſſembly began with declaring that the biſhop 'of Rome was the Anti-Chriſt, foretold in the word of 'GOD. It is a long time ſince the miniſters have 'taught this doctrine in their writings, and in their 'ſermons, and the Catholics have taught the contrary. 'Florimond de Ræmond, or, as I think, Richeome a 'Jeſuit under that name, has more enlarged upon that 'ſubject than any body elſe, and collected by way of 'Antitheſis whatever belongs to the true Anti-Chriſt, 'and to the pretended one (18).' I leave it to the readers to judge whether this is a ſufficient ground to lay down as a certain matter of fact, that all the controverſial books that have been publiſhed under the name of Florimond de Remond, had been written by Richeome. But here is another teſtimony of one of the authors, who confuted Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm. I cannot give any credit, ſays he (19), to Florimond de Remond, having been told by a counſellor of the parliament of Bourdeaux, called Lewis le Maſſip, (an honeſt man, with whom I have been intimately acquainted, having lodged at his houſe at Bourdeaux in 1650, where I attended the court, and having kept correſpondence with him for ſome years by letters) that it was a conſtant tradition in that country, that Remond, who was a member of their parliament, had three conſiderable advantages: 1. To grow old without being gray-haired: 2. To build without money: 3. To write without learning; becauſe the Jeſuits ſupplied him with whatever is to be found in his Hiſtory of the beginning and declenſion of Hereſy.

(14) Sagittarius, ubi ſupra, pag. 683.

(15) Burnet's Defence of the Reflexions on Varillas, pag. 26.

(16) Nicolas Vignier, Théatre de l'Antechriſt, in the table of the authors. I make uſe of the Geneva edition 1613, in 8vo, which was preceded by the edition in folio, 1610.

(17) Rivet, Sommaire des Controverſes (it is An Anſwer to the Controverſial Catechiſm, publiſhed by the Jeſuit William Baile), pag. 16, of the 2d edition, which is that of Geneva 1609, in 8vo.

(18) Matthieu, Hiſtoire de Henri IV, lib. vi, Narration V, p. m. 628, ſpeaking of the National Synod of Gap.

(19) John Baptiſte de Rocolles, Hiſtoire veritable du Calviniſme, pag. 283.

[D] He was the unfitteſt man in the world to ſucceed in ſuch an undertaking.] Hiſtory, generally ſpeaking, is the moſt difficult compoſure that an author can undertake, or one of the moſt difficult. It requires a great judgment, a noble, clear and conciſe ſtile, a good conſcience, a perfect probity, many excellent materials, and the art of placing them in good order, and above all things the power of reſiſting the inſtinct of a religious zeal, which prompts one to cry down what he thinks to be falſe, and to adorn and embelliſh what he thinks to be true. From this ſhort and very juſt deſcription of the talents, that make up the character of a good Hiſtorian, one may eaſily perceive, that

QUALIFICATIONS requiſite for a good Hiſtorian.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google conceived againſt the party wherein he had been brought up, which a miracle, as he Florimond de Remond could not ſucceed in his deſign of writing the Hiſtory of the beginning and progreſs of Lutheraniſm and Calviniſm. It was a great ſubject, one of the greateſt revolutions that have appeared in the Chriſtian world. Reaſons of ſtate had crept into it, and were combined with the intereſts of religion; which made up a mixture that increaſed the Hiſtorian's labour, and required great application, and a mind wholly free from prejudices. I do not examine whether our Remond had learning, judgment, and wit enough, and a good ſtile to treat well ſo important a ſubject, and I am willing to ſuppoſe, that in that reſpect he was far leſs contemptible than he is repreſented to be by his adverſaries; but had he had no other faults than thoſe, which his zeal for the Catholic religion, and his hatred againſt the Proteſtants produced in him, he ſhould have acknowledged that he undertook a work which was ſuperior to his ſtrength. He ſtumbled in his preliminaries; he did like thoſe who go about to build a houſe, before they caſt up the expence they muſt be at, to know whether they are able to ſpend ſo much (20). He neglected the precept which the moſt ſkillful maſters have ſo wiſely recommended, to wit, to pitch upon a ſubject adapted to one's capacity, and to make a long trial of one's ability:

(20) See St Luke's Goſpel, chap. xiv, ver. 28.

Sumite materiam veſtris, qui ſcribitis, æquam
Viribus, & verſate diu, quid ferre recuſent,
Quid valeant humeri (21).

(21) Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 38.

You writers try the vigour of your muſe,
And what her ſtrength will bear and what refuſe,
And after that an equal ſubject chuſe.

CREECH.

The chief thing he ſhould have done, was to examine his conſcience, but in all probability it was what he neglected moſt: He did not think of ſounding his heart, and aſking himſelf very ſeriouſly, Can I publiſh ſuch truths as would be diſadvantageous to the Catholics, and advantageous to the Huguenots? They hate me, and I hate them; they have abuſed me, and I have abuſed them. I have publiſhed ſome controverſial books, which they have refuted, and I have replied; can I be ſure that I ſhall not be overcome in the leaſt by my paſſion, my zeal, and my reſentment, and that I ſhall never tell a lie in favour of my cauſe (22)? They, who have read his Hiſtory with ſome attention, may ſay without any raſhneſs, that he did not conſult himſelf about thoſe things, or that he did not follow the dictates of his conſcience. He repreſents the Proteſtants as guilty of all ſorts of injuſtice, and the Catholics as very wiſe and innocent men; and he ſeldom relates any thing without uſing injurious epithets, and outrageous words againſt Hereſy and the Heretics. His quotations ſignify but little; for he alledges either men of his party, and who, moſt of them, had ſome perſonal diſputes (23) with the miniſters, or ſome Proteſtants, as he found them quoted in the writings of thoſe men. Such an Hiſtorian muſt neceſſarily be a ſlave to pious frauds, or deluded by himſelf, and conſequently the unfitteſt man in the world to write the Hiſtory of the beginning and growth of the Proteſtant religion, and the fitteſt to tranſgreſs againſt the two great laws of his profeſſion (24); for there are ſome falſities he does not ſcruple to publiſh, and there are ſome truths he dare not publiſh. An Hiſtorian, who deſigns to write ſuch a Hiſtory, ſhould be told, as Phaëton was,

(22) See the remark [L], of the article TIMÆUS.

(23) That is, diſputes by word or writing.

(24) Quis neſcit primam eſſe hiſtoriæ legem, ne quid falſi dicere audeat, deinde ne quid veri non audeat, ne qua ſuſpicio gratiæ ſit in ſcribendo, ne qua ſimultatis? Cicero, de Orat. lib. ii, fol. m. 74, A.

Magna petis, Phaëton, & quæ non viribus iſtis
Munera conveniunt, nec tam puerilibus annis (25).

Too vaſt and hazardous the taſk appears,
Not ſuited to thy ſtrength, nor to thy years.

ADDISON.

(25) Ovid. Metam. lib. ii, ver. 54.

I know ſome perſons, who could wiſh we had ſome Hiſtories of that important Revolution written neither by a Roman Catholic, nor by a Proteſtant. They fancy that party-intereſt, zeal for one's cauſe, and, much more, hatred of the contrary religion, engage a writer to exaggerate, or to ſuppreſs, or extenuate, or to diſguiſe things according as they may ſerve, or prejudice the honour of his party. They wiſh therefore, that a Thucydides, or a Livy, might have given us the Hiſtory of the events, which Florimond de Remond promiſes us in the title of his work. They wiſh thoſe illuſtrious authors might have done it, not ſo much on account of their eloquence and great judgment, as becauſe they were Heathens, and might have been neuters between the ſeveral ſects of Chriſtianity; ſo that they would have related without any prejudice or partiality, what was to be praiſed or blamed in the conduct of the Papiſts, Lutherans, and Calviniſts. But I do not know whether they might have kept an exact neutrality; for Popery being more agreeable to Paganiſm than the Proteſtant religion, they might have been prepoſſeſſed againſt Luther and Calvin. An Hiſtorian can never ſtand too much upon his guard; and it is almoſt impoſſible for him to be altogether free from prejudices. There are ſome forms of government, and ſome moral and political maxims, which he likes or diſlikes. This moves him to favour one party rather than another, even when he writes the Hiſtory of an ancient nation, or of a remote country. Suppoſe a man writes in our days the Hiſtory of an Indian king, who died two or three hundred years ago, after he had been dethroned, you will be apt to believe that no intereſt can hinder him from being a ſincere writer; and yet if he is an enemy to monarchy, and approves the rebellion of ſubjects, he will uſe a thouſand ſhifts and diſguiſes to render the memory of that monarch odious, and to juſtify the Civil wars which pulled him down from the throne. An Hiſtorian, who is an enemy to rebellion, would take a quite contrary courſe. Which is the reaſon why there are ſo few Hiſtories wherein the naked truth appears, and that are free from ſome marks of the Hiſtorian's anger or diſcontent, or from his ſatirical ſtrokes againſt ſome living perſons. He meets with them in his way, whilſt he writes the Hiſtory of the Indies. All readers cannot gueſs whom he means; but ſome gueſs at it, and he knows very well that ſome will. You may judge whether we can truſt the modern Hiſtorians, ſince Livy himſelf could not be altogether impartial between the Proteſtants and the Catholics, by reaſon of a certain general conformity. The beſt advice that could have been given to Florimond de Remond, had been to tell him that he ſhould continue to write controverſial books, wherein an author may be allowed to appear paſſionate; and not to ſet up for an Hiſtorian, it being an employment that does not agree with a zealous Catholic as he was, and which he ſhould have left to lukewarm and indifferent men. I am likewiſe of opinion, that a zealous Huguenot ſhould be adviſed not to write the Hiſtory of Calviniſm, or Lutheraniſm, or that of the edict of Nantes, or any ſuch like. They ſhould tell him, You are exaſperated, you have conceived a great hatred againſt the perſecutors, you are full of an ardent zeal for your cauſe, you would give us not a Hiſtory, but a piece like an advocate's plea; you would only blame the contrary party, and praiſe or juſtify your's; this you could not do without omitting ſeveral things, and publiſhing many falſities. Write therefore ſome other book, if you deſign to do ſomething that way for the public good.

But here is another reaſon why ſo few men can write a good Hiſtory. They who are able to overcome all prejudices, and reject all the tricks of art, could not appear altogether impartial without expoſing themſelves to the indignation of the people; (the word people has a large extent, and takes in a great many perſons of rank and title) they would be looked upon as falſe brethren, prevaricators, and perfidious men. Was not la Popeliniere like to be cruſhed to pieces, for having related ſome things in his Hiſtory of the Troubles under Charles IX, otherwiſe than he ſhould have done in the opinion of many? I ſhall ſpeak of it in his article in the Supplement to this Dictionary. Several people could wiſh that an Hiſtorian of their party would imitate thoſe that play at Piquet, who keep only good cards, and lay out the bad ones.

WHY I ſaid that probity ought to be an ingredient of the character of an Hiſtorian.

Perhaps ſome will wonder that I ſhould aſſert that an upright conſcience, and a perfect probity, are neceſſary to an Hiſtorian; and it will be ſaid that an ingenious

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he pretended, had obliged him to forſake. But that Hiſtory, though never ſo bad, has been quoted by a great many writers (f), and it is a ſurpriſing thing to find in many books ſeveral matters of fact very conſiderable, and of great conſequence, for which the reader is referred not to any authentic pieces, but to Florimond de Remond's teſtimony. Some ſay he did very ill diſcharge the duties of his office in the parliament of Bourdeaux [E]. The Proteſtants taxed him with a very great partiality againſt them (g). Varillas was a little mortified when he was obliged to confeſs he had tranſcribed that author [F].

(f) See the remark [Y], of the article OCHINUS.

(g) See the remark [E].

genious man may write a good Hiſtory as well as a good ſpeech, and a good tragedy, without thoſe qualifications; I ſhall therefore prove my aſſertion: in order to it, I obſerve that truth being the ſoul of Hiſtory, it is an eſſential thing for an hiſtorical compoſition to be free from lies; ſo that though it ſhould have all other perfections, it will not be a Hiſtory, but a meer fable and romance, if it wants truth. It is not ſo with a poetical or rhetorical piece. From whence I conclude, that none can be well qualified to write a good Hiſtory, unleſs he be ſuch an enemy to lying, that his conſcience does not permit him to tell lies even to the advantage of his religion, and deareſt friends, nor to the diſadvantage of an impious ſect, and of his moſt implacable perſecutors. I underſtand by lying, not only the invention of a falſe thing, but alſo the ſuppreſſion or addition of certain circumſtances, that may ſerve to juſtify others, or to lay ſomething to their charge. Thoſe, who have not ſuch an upright conſcience, and ſuch a perfect probity, will be guilty of a fraud in writing Hiſtories, ſometimes to pleaſe thoſe from whom they expect good offices, and ſometimes for fear of diſobliging ſome perſons, who might hinder them from obtaining penſions. What has been ſaid (26) of the Orator, is ſtill more neceſſary to an Hiſtorian: he ought to be defined, Vir bonus narrandi peritus, an honeſt man, who knows how to relate things. And yet you ſhall ſeldom hear any body enquire, whether the author of an Hiſtory is an honeſt man. The uſual queſtion is, Whether he be a man of wit and judgment? Whether he has a fine ſtyle? Whether he pleaſes the reader? And according as the anſwer is, people will either buy his book or not buy it. They ſhould at leaſt imitate thoſe, who in their enquiries about the character of witneſſes, begun with their riches, and ended with their honeſty (27).

(26) See, above, citation (203), of the article PERICLES.

(27) It is commonly ſaid, to denote a covetous age, that a father, who deſigns to marry his ſon, inquires firſt whether ſuch a maid is rich; ſecondly, whether ſhe is handſome; and laſtly, whether ſhe is honeſt.

Protinus ad cenſum, de moribus ultima fiet
Quæſtio: quot paſcit ſervos, quot poſſidet agri
Jugera, quam multa magnaque paropſide cœnat (28)?

The queſtion is not put how far extends
His piety, but what he yearly ſpends:
Quick, to the buſineſs; how he lives and eats;
How largely gives; how ſplendidly he treats:
How many thouſand acres feed his ſheep,
What are his rents, what ſervants does he keep.

DRYDEN.

(28) Juven. Sat. III, ver. 140.

It ought to be enquired whether the author is an honeſt man. Mr * begins with ſuch a queſtion, when they ſhew him in a Bookſeller's ſhop the Relation of a Voyage, the Memoirs of ſuch a one, &c. Here is a book, ſay they to him, very well written, very curious, and that ſells well. But, ſays he, do you know the author of it? Is he a vain and ambitious man? Does he love pleaſure? Could he appear in a good dreſs, without getting three or four hundred crowns from the Bookſeller that he made uſe of? I ſhould be glad to know that before all things; for the writer of a relation, if he be a vain man, and deſigns to be well paid for his copy, will not ſcruple to foiſt into it all the lies that may pleaſe the reader, and ſet off the author.

[E] Some ſay that he diſcharged very ill the duties of his office in the parliament of Bourdeaux.] Conſult Dr Burnet in his Defence of the Reflexions on Varillas, where you will find theſe words: Florimond de Remond was as little eſteemed in the quality of a Judge, as he deſerves to be for his writings; for the character that was given of him, was no leſs ſevere than pleaſant: Judicat ſine conſcientia, libros ſcribit ſine ſcientia, & ædificat ſine pecunia: - - - He judges without conſcience, he writes books without knowledge, and builds without money (29).' If you read the laſt pages of the French edition, you will find an extract of a letter (§ a) with a preamble, that deſerve to be tranſcribed. Here they are: So many complaints were made about his malignity and injuſtice towards the Proteſtants, in his life-time, that no credit can be given to his teſtimony againſt them. It is an eaſy thing for an unjuſt Judge to become a paſſionate Hiſtorian; nay, one muſt be more hard-hearted to commit an injuſtice as a Judge, than to write a falſhood as an Hiſtorian. But here is the extract I have mentioned (30). ' There is a book intituled, Plaintes des Egliſes Réformées au Roi, ſur pluſieurs injuſtices qui leur ſont faites. - - - The complaint of the Reformed Churches to the king concerning ſeveral injuſtices they have ſuffered. It was printed in 1597, without the author's name. They complain, among others, of Florimond de Raymond, who, during the troubles of 1572, having been taken in a journey by a party of the Proteſtants, who made him pay a ranſom of one thouſand livres, never loſt any occaſion to get himſelf re-imburſed, and had that ſum paid him ten or twelve times, as he himſelf boaſted. Afterwards, being appointed to report the caſe of a Proteſtant widow, whoſe huſband had been killed in cold blood by a Roman Catholic, he helped the criminal off, ſo that the murder remained unpuniſhed. We find alſo at the end of the ſame book, that a Proteſtant maid having been buried in the churchyard of the Catholics at Bourdeaux, there came out a decree, at Remond's ſollicitation, by which it was ordered, that the body of that maid ſhould be taken up, and denied burial, together with all the bodies of the Proteſtants that had been buried there for the ſpace of ten years (31).'

(29) Burnet, ubi ſupra, pag. 27, 28.

(30) Pag. 146, 147, of the French edition.

(31) See the Notes on the Confeſſion de Sancy, pag. 444, where you will find that the extract, tranſmitted to Dr Burnet, was not altogether exact.

[(§ a) The letter was addreſſed to Mr Jurieu, and writ by the author of the Notes on the Confeſſion of Sanci from Paris in 1688. Some time after he ſent him the book itſelf, to rectify by it ſome inaccuracies that had ſlipped into his letter, for want of having the piece before him when he writ. See the remarks on the Confeſſion of Sanci, page 443, of the ſecond edition. REM. CRIT.]

[F] Mr Varillas was a little mortified, when he was obliged to confeſs that he had tranſcribed that author.] Dr Burnet criticized him (32) for having denied that the marriage of the prince of Wales (33) with the Infanta of Spain had been conſummated, and repreſented to him, that he might have more eaſily impoſed on his readers, if he had ſet over againſt this, on the margin, ſome citations of a letter, or recital, which would have coſt him nothing, and have been full as true as his other citations are. His anſwer contains this among other things, that ſuppoſing he had poſitively affirmed that this marriage was not conſummated, it would not be a fiction of his own, and that he could alledge a good authority for it (34), meaning Florimond de Remond. He declares, that conſidering how partially the Engliſh, German, Italian, and Spaniſh, writers had writ about the ſchiſm of Henry VIII, he had been obliged to pitch upon a French author, and that he caſt his eyes upon Florimond de Raimond. He was counſellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux; he had a wife and children; he had no particular reaſon to diſguiſe the truth: The Calviniſts were in his time in the heighth of their power; he had no occaſion to be diſpleaſed with them; and he ſpent ſo much time upon his Hiſtory of the birth, progreſs, and declenſion of Hereſy, that he died before it was made public. His children took care to get it printed: it met with a very good reception; there have been ſeveral editions of it, and ſince not one Proteſtant has undertaken to confute it within theſe fourſcore years, no more than the books concerning Anti-Chriſt and Pope Joan, written by the ſame author; I had ſome reaſon to believe that if they did not approve of it, it was at leaſt indifferent to them (35). Dr Burnet did eaſily run down the authority of ſuch a voucher: he ſhewed that Florimond de Remond lived far from England, and from the knowledge of Engliſh affairs (36); and that a man ſees in every period of his Hiſtory, ſo much of a malignant ſpirit againſt the Reformation, that this gives a juſt prejudice againſt all that

(32) Burnet's Reflexions on the ninth book of Varillas, pag. 41.

(33) Arthur ſon of Henry VII.

(34) Varillas, Réponſe à la Critique de Dr Burnet, pag. m. 97.

(35) Ibid. pag. 98.

(36) Burnet's Defence of the Reflexions, pag. 24.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that he ſays . . . . . and beſides, that this part of his Hiſtory, which relates to the affairs of England, is not ſo much as pretended to be writ by him (37): For the contrary is expreſsly intimated in the preface, and his ſon ſeems to claim the honour of that to himſelf. Nay, it is very much doubted whether he was at all the author of thoſe books that paſſed under his name; for many have aſcribed them to Father Richeome. He adds (38), that Florimond de Remond never paſſed in France among Hiſtorians for an author of any note, either for judgment or ſincerity; and that he was accounted an unjuſt judge. The Doctor goes on, and ſays, Mr Varillas, who, perhaps a year ago, would have reſented it, as the greateſt indignity that could have been done him, if it had been ſaid that he did nothing but copy ſo bad an author, and that he was only his eccho, is now glad to fly to ſo poor a ſhift; for which he is, as I hear, ſo much cenſured in Paris, that it is perhaps too great a cruelty in me to urge this matter any further. He jeers him for having obſerved that Remond had a wife and children. It is not eaſy, ſays the Doctor (39), to find out the force of this argument: but a man muſt riſe above the vulgar, as much as Mr Varillas, to comprehend his lofty ſtrains. If to have a wife and children makes a man a good writer, one may conclude without any further inquiry, that Mr Varillas has neither. Here is alſo a new argument for the marriage of the Clergy, that has never been yet thought on; yet an ordinary capacity ſuch as mine cannot comprehend why this ſhould have made Florimond de Remond a good writer, and why it had not the ſame effect on Thuanus. At the end of the book this Critic tells him that the Proteſtants publiſhed their complaints againſt the furious animoſity which Remond expreſſed againſt them (40): this was ſufficient to prepoſſeſs him when he went about to write their Hiſtory; but beſides, he had not forgot that he had been their priſoner, and paid his ranſom to them. Is it not therefore a ſhameful thing for Varillas to maintain that he had no occaſion to be diſpleaſed with them? But if any Hiſtorian ſhould bluſh to alledge nothing elſe but the authority of ſuch a voucher as Remond, in giving an account of the ſchiſm of England; it is a moſt ſhameful thing for Varillas in particular to do ſo, ſince he ſet up for a writer, well furniſhed with rare, authentic, private, and unknown manuſcripts.

I muſt obſerve that there is a falſity in Varillas, that was not taken notice of. He pretends that the books concerning Anti-Chriſt and Pope Joan, written by Florimond de Remond, have not been refuted. If he had caſt his eyes upon the title page of the Theatre of Anti-Chriſt (41), and upon Alexander Cooke's Dialogue (42), he might have ſeen the contrary. I muſt alſo obſerve that the reaſon he alledges, grounded upon his Hiſtorian, being a married man, is not a contemptible one; for it is more natural to believe that a Layman was free from prejudices in writing the hiſtory of the enemies of his church, than it is natural to expect ſuch a thing from a Clergyman. And therefore Varillas might be perſuaded that Florimond de Remond was leſs to be ſuſpected than a Monk, or a Prieſt. I confeſs this reaſon is as good for Thuanus; but ſince he writ nothing about Henry the eighth's ſchiſm, how could Varillas make uſe of him? He might therefore have defended himſelf as to this particular.

(37) Ibid. pag. 25, 26.

(38) Ibid. pag. 28.

(39) Ibid. pag. 29.

(40) That paſſage of Dr Burnet is to be ſeen above, citation (31).

(41) Written by Nicolas Vignier, a minister, and printed in 1610. There came out alſo a book intitled, L'Antechriſt Romain, in anſwer to our Remond.

(42) It was tranſlated out of Engliſh into French by John de la Montagne.

RENOU (JOHN DE), in Latin Renodæus, Counſellor and Phyſician to the king at Paris, towards the beginning of the XVIIth century, was a Norman (a). He chiefly excelled in Pharmacy, as appears by the tracts which he compoſed in Latin [A], and which were tranſlated into French by Lewis de Serres. This tranſlator (b) affirmed in his praiſe, that in this part of Phyſic he as far ſurpaſſed Fernelius and Sylvius, and all others who had meddled with the ſame ſubject before, as Fernelius and Sylvius ſurpaſs Mirepſus and Præpoſitus. It is eaſy to obſerve that he was no great friend to Riverius, Phyſician to Henry IV. He even treats him as a Mountebank (c). I have taken notice that he rejects an infinite number of popular errors, touching the virtues of plants and minerals, &c. but he ſometimes ſpares traditions that are very childiſh [B]. He cenſured ſomewhat in Bauderon's Diſpenſatory (d), which gave occaſion to his being accuſed of Plagiariſm; for that author's ſon maintained that John de Renou had enriched his Antidotary with an infinite number of thefts taken from the Diſpenſatory of his deceaſed father, Bauderon (e). Renou anſwered, that the charge was equally falſe and ridiculous (f).

(a) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the French tranſlation of his Works.

(b) See his preface.

(c) Renou, book iii, of his Materia Medica, ch. xxxiv, pag. m. 465.

(d) Idem, book vi, of his Antidotarium, chap. iv, pag. 739.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid.

[A] The tracts which he compoſed in Latin.] The title of them runs thus; Diſpenſatorium Galeno-Chymicum continens Inſtitutionum Pharmaceuticarum libros V; De Materia Medica libros III; & Antidotarium varium & abſolutiſſimum. The Lindenius renovatus (1) mentions the editions of Paris in 1608, and 1623, in 4to; that of Frankfort, 1609, in 8vo; that of Hanau, 1631, in 4to; and that of Geneva, reviſed by Peter Uffenback, and enlarged with ſome new pieces, 1631, in 8vo. They have forgot the edition of Frankfort, 1615, from which Lewis de Serres had made his firſt tranſlation. He was afterwards informed that the author had enlarged this work by one third part in the Paris edition, 1623; and likewiſe tranſlated this ſupplement, and added it to the ſecond edition of his verſion. This ſecond edition is of Lyons, 1626, printed for Antony Chard. The copy which I have ſeen, ſhews in the title page that it is printed at Lyons, for Nicholas Gay, in the year 1637. The work is in folio, and contains fourteen books; five for the Inſtitutiones Pharmaceuticæ, three for the Materia Medica, and ſix for the Antidotarium: there are innumerable typographical errors in it. Lewis de Serres was of Dauphiné, and Fellow of the college of Phyſicians at Lyons. Mr Allard has not given him a place in his Bibliotheque de Dauphiné.

(1) At page 666, of the edition of 1686.

B] Sometimes he ſpares traditions that are very childiſh.] I ſhall give but one inſtance of it. They ſay the virtue of the Emerald is ſo great, that it not only preſerves from the falling-ſickneſs all thoſe that wear it ſet in gold on their fingers, but alſo ſtrengthens the memory, and powerfully reſiſts the efforts of carnal concupiſcence. For they tell us, that the king of Hungary being hotly engaged with his wife, perceived that a fine emerald, which he wore upon his finger, broke into three pieces during their amorous conflict; ſuch a friend is that ſtone to chaſtity. This being ſo, I find that the interpreter of Meſue was in the right to ſubſtitute the emerald in the room of the turcoiſe, &c (2).

(2) Renou, book ii, of his Materia Medica, c. i, pag. 400.

RESENIUS (PETER), Counſellor and Profeſſor at Copenhagen, was born there the ſeventh of June 1625. His father, and his two grandfathers by his mother's and father's ſide, had been biſhops of Sealand. He was made Sub-principal of the college of Copenhagen in 1646; and having reſigned that employment the year following, he travelled into foreign countries. He ſtudied the Belles Lettres, and the Civil-Law, for the ſpace of four years, in the univerſity of Leyden, and then he went into France, Spain, and Italy. He was a whole year at Padua, where he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of the Civil-Law. He was elected Counſellor of the German nation there, and Vice-Syndic of the univerſity, and in that quality he made an harangue in the ſenate of Venice, and obtained a privilege for that univerſity. If he had pleaſed he might have

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google have been made a knight of St Mark. He left Padua after he had taken his degree of Doctor of Law the eleventh of September 1653. He returned into Denmark by the way of Germany, and married the eighth of July 1655. He was made Profeſſor of Moral Philoſophy, in the univerſity of Copenhagen, the twenty-fifth of November 1657, and then Conſul of the ſame city, and counſellor in the ſupreme council, and at laſt Preſident of Copenhagen, and counſellor of juſtice. He had a grant of nobility the eighth of January 1680, and was made counſellor of ſtate the ſixth of May 1684. He had a very fine library, which he beſtowed upon the univerſity of Copenhagen: the catalogue of it was printed (a) in 1685. He alſo publiſhed ſeveral books (b) [A].

(a) At Copenhagen, in 4to.

(b) Taken from the Journal of his Life, written by himſelf, and prefixed to the catalogue of his library.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Here is the liſt of them; Edda Snorronis Sturleſonii triplici linguâ Iſlandicâ & Latinâ: quarum Iſlandica primitiva eſt, reliquæ autem interpretationes. Præfixa etiam prolegomena de triplici ratione docendi Ethicam: Item de Eddæ Scriptoribus partibus & aliis ſimilibus. Impreſſum eſt hoc opus in quarto quam appellant forma, Anno MDCLXV. Eddæ Sæmundianæ pars dicta HAVAMAAL, complexa Ethicam Odini: eſtque & Iſlandicè & Latinè impreſſa, in quarto, ut vocant, anno MDCLXV. Eddæ Sæmundianæ VOLUSPA, continens Philoſophiam Danorum, Norvegorumque antiquiſſimam: eſtque impreſſa in quarto, anno MDCLXV. item anno MDCLXXIII. additis Gudmundi Andreæ Iſlandi annotationibus. Inſcriptiones Havnienſes, Amagrienſes & Uraniburgicæ, Latinæ, Danicæ & Germanicæ; una cum addita narratione de Tychone Brahco diverſiſque ipſius & ſororis ipſius Sophiæ Brabeæ epiſtolis, editæ in quarto, anno MDCLXVIII. Jus aulicum vetus Regum Norvegorum, dictum HIRDSKRAA: Item jus aulicum vetus Regum Danorum dictum VITHERLAGSRET, linguâ triplici, originali Iſlandica, interpretibus Danica, atque Latina, additæ quoque annotationes, Impreſſio facta Havniæ anno MDCLXXIII. Havniæ delineatio topographica in æra expreſſa, unà cum brevi partium & locorum enarratione, Danicè & Germanicè impreſſa Havniæ, anno MDCLXXIV. Samoſæ deſcriptio & delineatio cum figuris. in folio, Havniæ anno MDCLXXV. Friderici II. Hiſt. Danicè in folio cum figuris, Haf. an. MDCLXXV. Lexicon Iſlandicum Gudmundi Andreæ Iſlandi, cum præfatione de ejuſdem vita: in forma quarta Havniæ, anno MDCLXXXIII. Leges Cimbricæ Valdemari ſecundi Regis Danici, Germanicè, interprete Erico Krabbio, equite Danico. In præfatione addita eſt narratio de ordine equeſtri Dannebrogico: item de novo corpore Juris Danici: nec non de genealogia ejuſdem Erici Krabbii. Havniæ in quarto, anno MDCLXXXIV. Leges civiles & eccleſiaſticæ Chriſtiani Secundi in quarto, Havniæ anno MDCLXXXIV. Havniæ & Riparum jus urbicum. In 12*mo Havniæ, eod. an. MDCLXXXIV* (1).

(1) Vita Riſenii, folio D ij verſo.

REVEREND-DE-BOUGY (JOHN), marquis de Bougy, and lieutenant-general in the French armies, under the reign of Lewis XIV, diſtinguiſhed himſelf upon many occaſions by his great courage and ability, and by a conſtant adherence to the ſervice of his king, when ſo many others joined with the rebels in the laſt civil war (a). He was a Proteſtant, and of an antient and noble family in the Lower Normandy [A], and the youngeſt of ſixteen brothers or ſiſters (b). He got into the regiment of guards as a cadet at twelve years of age, and afterwards he raiſed himſelf by degrees; for he was ſucceſſively a cornet, captain of the light-horſe, colonel of horſe, &c (c). He was cornet of the Gendarmes of marſhal de Gaſſion (d), who conceived ſo great an affection and eſteem for him [B], that this very thing is enough to convince us of his bravery, and other military accompliſhments. He proved very thankful; for he eſpouſed the intereſts of that marſhal ſo zealouſly, that cardinal Mazarin could never bring him off. His Eminence was very preſſing upon him on that account, when he went to court in order to mend what the marſhal's vivacity and boldneſs had ſpoiled (e). The cardinal was more ſucceſsful in his endeavours to gain Mr de Bougy after Gaſſion's death [C]. He performed great and important ſervices during the civil war, and (a) In 1649, and the following years.

(b) A Memoir imparted to the author.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

[A] He was . . . . of an antient and noble family in the Lower Normandy.] He was the ſon of MICHAEL REVEREND-DE-BOUGY, and grandſon of OLIVER REVEREND-DE-BOUGY, and great-grandſon of MICHAEL REVEREND-DE-BOUGY. The two latter are mentioned in Mezerai's hiſtory, as we ſhall ſee by and by. The printed books ſay nothing of their predeceſſors; but the writings of the family go higher, tho' they are ſomewhat imperfect, the houſe having been plundered once, and burnt another time, during the civil wars of the XVIth century (1). Mezerai reckons one Bougy (2) among the lords that joined at Caën the duke of Montpenſier, whom Henry III had ſent into Normandy, to prevent the deſign of the Leaguers upon that province. This Bougy was the father of Oliver Reverend-de-Bougy, whom the ſame Hiſtorian mentions in theſe terms: 'Caën had been loſt, if the reſolution and good conduct of Oliver Reverend-de-Bougy, a gentleman of that country, who happened to be there, had not put a ſtop to that irruption. He goes courageouſly into the ſtreet, ſends for his friends, ſtirs up the inhabitants, and in the mean time foreſeeing that the enemies intended to ſhut the gate of the bridge, he immediately orders one of his men to go and nail a piece of wood to it. So that whilſt the enemies endeavour to ſhut it, and the more haſte they make, the leſs they perceive the hindrance, he arrives thereupon with fifteen or twenty men animated by his example. They are ſurprized and troubled at his coming; and becauſe they cannot ſhut the gate cloſe, one of thoſe who attended him, called la Riviere-Renouf, thruſting himſelf with no leſs hardineſs than courage into the gap, ſhoots la Motte-Corbiniere in the head with a piſtol, and by his death cauſes his deſign to miſcarry. The town grew more ſenſible of the danger they were in, when it was over; and the king gave this character of Bougy, that his fidelity, of which he had already given many proofs, had ſaved, on this occaſion, all the Lower Normandy (3).'

(1) Memoir imparted to me.

(2) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. iii, pag. 776, Edit. 1685.

(3) Idem, in the Life of Henry IV, pag. 1097, 1098.

[B] The Marſhal de Gaſſion conceived ſo great an affection and eſteem for him.] It is well known that he died of the wound he had received at the ſiege of Lens, as he was ſhaking one of the ſtakes of a palliſado (4). He received a muſket-ſhot in the head, which ſtruck him down, but he was immediately taken up by his couſin Gaſſion, and by the marquis de Bougy, the only perſons who had followed him. They carried him back into the trenches. He got himſelf carried to Arras. Mr de Bougy accompanied him thither (5). The Marſhal gave him his ſword, as he was dying (6), telling him, that he thought he was the man in France beſt qualified to wear it after him. The Marſhal's regiment was divided between his couſin Mr de Gaſſion, and the marquis de Bougy.

(4) The Abbot de Pure, Vie du Maréchal de Gaſſion, Tom. iv, pag. 309, ad ann. 1647.

(5) The ſame Memoir.

(6) It is kept in the family to this day.

[C] The Cardinal was more ſucceſsful in his endeavours to gain Mr de Bougy after Gaſſion's death.] Having ſent for him to court, as ſoon as he heard of the Marſhal's death, he told him; I offer you a friend in the room of him, whom you have loſt: I have been ſo well pleaſed with your conſtant fidelity to that marſhal, that I deſire you would ſhew the ſame to me, and I promiſe to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and his good conduct and fidelity were so well known, that he was chosen to command in chief the troops that should remain with the king; which he did so successfully, that after he had beat the rebels, who undertook to prevent his passing the Loire at la Charité, and being entered into Berri, he forced their commander to abandon the city of Bourges, where the king was received soon after (f). He had before commanded in chief at the siege of Chateau-Portien; which engaged the king after the taking of that place to make him governor of it. . . . He signalized himself by the taking of Mas d'Agenois . . . . and at the retreat of St Andras, and on several other occasions; in one of which, being lieutenant-general, after he had fought with great valour to the last extremity, he was taken prisoner (g) in the year 1653. He was permitted to go to court upon his parole (h), and having been exchanged he returned into Guienne, where he married in 1654 Mary de la Chausade de Callonge, a very rich heiress, by whom he left but one son [D]. The queen-mother and cardinal Mazarin, concerned themselves very obligingly in that marriage [E], and did not forget to mention the good services of the lady's father [F]. He served in Catalonia the same year, under the Prince of Conti, and the years following till 1657, when he was obliged to ask leave to go to Montpellier, that he might be cured of a defluxion upon his lungs. He got that illness by staying a whole night upon the mountains, where he was covered with snow in his sleep. He found no ease at Montpellier, and finding as little at Bourdeaux, he went to his country-seat at Callonge, where he died in the year 1658, being forty years of age. He was regretted by every body. The king, the queen, and cardinal Mazarin, did his widow the honour to write to her letters of consolation. He would have made a greater fortune, if he had been a Roman Catholic: he received several letters from the queen, and from the cardinal, wherein they exhorted him to change his religion, and to remove by that means the obstacle to his advancement: they offered him a marshal's staff, and a government that would be left to his choice, provided he would be a convert. His answer was, that if he could resolve to betray his GOD for a marshal's staff, he might betray his king for a lesser advantage, and that he could do neither of them, being contented to see that his services were acceptable, and that his religion was the only reason why he was not rewarded for them (i). The king had erected the lordship of Bougy, situate in the Lower Normandy, into a marquisate; but because it is held of several lords, so many oppositions were formed against the registring of the letters-patent, that they proved ineffectual: which was the reason why that erection was transferred to the barony of Callonge; which holds immediately of the king. The patent was drawn up in November 1667, and registred in the Chamber of Accounts the ninth of September 1669. I have read it, and I found in it a large account of the services which the marquis de Bougy did the king. They consisted not only in warlike actions, but also in negotiations (k). You will find, below, some of the most glorious passages of his life [G]. He received among other wounds five musket-shots (l).

(f) The king's patent for the erection of the marquisate of Bougy.

(g) Ibid.

(h) Imparted Memoir.

(i) Taken from the abovementioned Memoir.

(k) Here are the words of the patent, During all that time, having as great an opinion of his prudence, as of his valour, we employed him likewise in several important negotiations, particularly with the duke of Modena, when he declared for us, and joined his army with ours in 1648.

(l) The patent for the erection.

to be your friend. Mr de Bougy returned such an answer as the Cardinal desired, and proved so faithful to him, that when his Eminence went out of France, he accompanied him to the frontiers. I will come again, and will make your fortune, said the Cardinal to him; but when he returned, he told him that his being a Protestant was an obstacle to it (7).

(7) Taken from the same Memoir.

[D] By whom he left but one son.] To wit, JOHN JAMES REVEREND-DE-BOUGY, who was born in 1655, and nine years commanded the regiment as colonel. He left the service on account of his religion, and retired into Holland. He lives at the Hague, where he is very much respected; and indeed he deserves it. He lost his only son since he left France. He has only two daughters left by Elizabeth de Bar de Camparnau, whom he married in 1674. She is descended by the mother's side from that famous Reniers, whose quarrel with Veisins was attended with very remarkable circumstances. They are to be found in Thuanus (8) and Mezerai (9). This last Historian observes that he was Lieutenant of the Princes in Querci. The family of Bar de Camparnau is a very noble one. It is mentioned in several books, especially in the History of the Siege of Montauban (10).

(8) Thuan. lib. hi, pag. 1079, ad ann. 1572.

(9) Mezerai, ubi supra, pag. 259.

(10) The abovequoted Memoir.

[E] The Queen-mother and Cardinal Mazarin concerned themselves very obligingly in that marriage.] The Marquis de Bougy was the bearer of a letter which that queen writ to Mademoiselle de Callonge, to desire her to receive him as one that came from her. She added, The services of your deceased father engage me to see you settled: I do not think I can help you to a better match (11).

(11) Ibid.

[F] The good services of the lady's father.] It was James de la Chausade baron of Callonge. He had been governor of Montpellier during the wars of the duke of Rohan, to whom he was nearly related. It was he, who spoke in the name of the Reformed, when the peace was concluded before Montpellier. See du Pleix's History, Girard in his Life of the duke of Epernon, Bassompierre's Memoirs, the Life of the duke of Montmorenci, and several other authors. The king's patent for erecting the barony of Callonge into a marquisate, imports, that this James de la Chausade had been colonel of a regiment of foot for the king's service in Holland, that he had made himself considerable by his valour and experience in military affairs, and by many glorious actions, especially at the time of the commotions in Guienne, under the duke of Epernon's government, during which he brought to that duke at two several times considerable succours of gentlemen volunteers, which did not a little contribute to keep up his majesty's authority, and to curb the factions, that at the battle of Avein he took the enemy's canon, after he had broke through and routed them with his regiment, consisting of twenty companies, and that, left his glory should be confined within the frontiers of this kingdom, he followed the duke of Candale into Turkey, to fight the enemies of the Christian name, where he blew up the gate of Aglıman with a petard, and was one of the first who entered that place sword in hand, after having signalized himself on several other occasions (12). Mrs de Callonge, his other daughter, died at the Hague some months ago (13), in a very advanced age. She had never been married. She was a person of an exemplary piety and virtue, and understood Hebrew very well (14): she left France on account of her religion when the edict of Nantes was revoked. Mezerai mentions one Callonge among the Protestant lords of the province of Guienne, who took up arms in Charles the ninth's reign (15).

(12) Taken from the patent.

(13) I write this in April 1701.

(14) See Colomesius, pag. 201, of the Gallia Orientalis.

(15) Mezerai, Tom. iii, pag. 93.

[G] You will find . . . some of the most glorious passages of his life.] At the battle of Rocroi he commanded the company of Gassion's Gendarmes, and tho' he had a foot bruised with a musket-shot, he broke through a battalion of the enemies, where his horse was killed under him

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him with ſeveral puſhes of pikes and ſwords (16). They are the very words of the king's letters-patent abovementioned. In the year 1650. He threw himſelf into the town of St Quintin with five hundred horſe, and by that means diſappointed the Spaniards deſign upon that place, which was in great danger. Afterwards, when they beſieged the town of Guiſe, the advice he gave to place 1200 muſketeers in the wood, to cut off the paſſage of the proviſions for the beſiegers and the great ability wherewith he himſelf executed that bold enterprize, was one of the cauſes why that ſiege was raiſed (17). The court having reſolved to quit Paris in 1651, when the prince of Condé had diſcovered his ill deſigns, the queen ſent immediately for Mr de Bougy, who was in Flanders, and when ſhe ſaw him come into her chamber with his boots on, ſhe cryed out, Here is Bougy, my fear is over; and then ſhe told him, that ſhe had ſent for him to intruſt him with the king's perſon, and herſelf. Accordingly he carried them to Fontainebleau. Take notice he was then but a Marſhal de Camp, and that there were many officers at court in higher poſts (18), but the queen did not truſt every body, or rather ſhe miſtruſted almoſt every body. Mr de Bougy (19) at his ſetting out from Flanders had ordered a detachment of horſe to follow him, and then went poſt. As ſoon as he had conducted the court to Fontainebleau, he was informed, that the prince's troops were marching towards Gien, to poſſeſs themſelves of it. Whereupon he diſpatched a courier to the troops of Flanders, who had been ordered to follow him, and deſired them to make all the haſte they poſſibly could. The courier met them as they were taking their quarters. After they had ſeen the order, they only baited, and then they remounted and continued their march. They were no ſooner arrived, but Mr de Bougy put himſelf at the head of them, and being entered into Gien, he ordered the gate on the ſide of the prince's troops to be opened, and charged them ſo briſkly, that he routed them, and took three general officers priſoners. As he was purſuing the flying enemy, he perceived a boy who was frighted, and aſked him what was his name; and being told that he was the ſon of one of the chief magiſtrates of Bourges, Will you, ſaid he to him, carry a letter to your father; the queen looks upon him as one of her moſt faithful ſervants. The boy promiſed to deliver it, and immediately Mr de Bougy acquainted that magiſtrate that he had juſt now beat the prince's troops, and was marching to Bourges. In the mean while the prince of Conti had got into that town, and aſſembled the magiſtrates to oblige them to declare for him. The boy arrives, the prince of Conti laughs at the letter, and takes it for a ſtratagem, and ſteps into another room, to draw up the anſwer he would have them return to Mr de Bougy's letter. While he was writing it, ſome wounded ſoldiers arrive, who confirm the truth of that news; whereupon the magiſtrates declared to him that he muſt retire; and that they will remain faithful (20). The prince retired to Mouron, and from thence into Guienne (21). Mr de Bougy was ordered to purſue him under the conduct of the count de Harcourt, who having permitted him to go with five hundred horſe over the river Né in Xaintonge, and over a very large and dangerous moraſs, behind which the rebellious troops lay to the number of four thouſand horſe, and five thouſand foot, he took two of their beſt quarters, and brought with him near five hundred troopers or officers priſoners. At the ſiege of Capdequiers, in Catalonia, where he was lieutenant-general for the day the troops that gave the aſſault, having been repulſed from the breach, he took a halberd from a ſerjeant, mounted the breach firſt, and animated the ſoldiers by his example. He was wounded there with a muſket-ſhot, and notwithſtanding his wound he held out till the town was taken. He had the government of it given him, tho' ſuch a way of rewarding Huguenot officers was not in faſhion at that time (22).

(16) The patent.

(17) Ibid.

(18) In the abovementioned Memoir.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Taken from the ſaid Memoir.

(21) Letters Patents.

(22) From the ſaid Memoir.

REYNIER (PETER DE) knight of the order of St John of Jeruſalem, was of the illuſtrious family of the Reyniers of Toulouſe. He was killed in the year 1311, in the iſland of Rhodes, which Othman, king of the Turks, beſieged that year: this lord ſignalized himſelf in that ſiege by an uncommon bravery. This family has produced perſons of diſtinguiſhed merit, among others ELIAS DE REYNIER, counſellor of the parliament of Languedoc in the year 1523, who gained eſteem by his great attachment to his prince, and whoſe ſon, who was likewiſe a counſellor of the parliament, married Martha de Minut, daughter of Meſſire James de Minut, firſt preſident of the ſame parliament; FRANCIS DE REYNIER, ſeneſchal of Lauragois; JOHN DE REYNIER, camp-maſter. There remains at preſent of this family, CHARLES DE REYNIER, knight of the order of St Lewis, the king's lieutenant, and commandant of the town and government of Brouage (a), who has a brother a counſellor in the parliament of Toulouſe (b).

(a) He died in the month of December 1706. See the Mercure Galant, of the month of January 1706, pag. 223, 224.

(b) Etat de la France.

REZ (ANTONY DE) Eſq; advocate in the parliament of Paris, was the ſon of ANTONY DE REZ, Counſellor Secretary to the King, and born at Paris in the year 1650. His merit will beſt appear by two elogies that have been ſent to me (a). I make no doubt that all diſcerning men will own they are ſo well written, that they may ſerve as a model. The firſt is larger, and contains more particulars [A]. The ſecond

(a) By Mr Marais, advocate in the parliament of Paris.

[A] The firſt elogy is larger, and contains more particulars.] Here it is ſuch as it came to my hands; I thought I could neither alter nor curtail it without ſpoiling it. 'Antony de Rez betook himſelf to the 'bar from his younger years, and pleaded his firſt 'cauſe at ſixteen years of age. After he had been 'ſome time in the inferior courts to learn their way 'of proceeding, he appeared in the parliament with 'great glory, being ſtill very young. He ſoon diſ'covered all the noble talents, whereby he was ſo 'glorioufly diſtinguiſhed afterwards; a ready, quick, 'and penetrating wit; a noble, plain and natural elo'quence; a polite and charming delivery; a Cicero'nian raillery; a certain way of inſinuating himſelf, 'which gained him the love of every body; a 'ſincerity which appeared in his look, and in all 'the features of his face before he ſpoke; a probity, 'that was proof againſt the moſt ſeducing temptations; 'an agreeable and ſolid erudition grounded upon rea'ſon, juſtice and humanity, more than upon books; 'in a word, all the fine qualities of an honeſt and 'great man. All ſorts of people reſorted to him; the 'men of quality were pleaſed with his good mien, 'affability and gentleman-like behaviour: thoſe of the 'meaner ſort were alſo deſirous to have him for their 'advocate, becauſe they knew he was a man of honour, 'obliging, and ready to hear every body. He diſchar'ged his duty moſt faithfully, and with the greateſt 'exactneſs, even in the leaſt things. The magiſtrates 'of all ranks, being perſuaded that nothing but truth 'could come out of his mouth, heard him with plea'ſure, loved to ſee him, and honoured him with 'a particular affection. Tho' he was full of buſineſs, 'his great order enabled him to go through it. He 'was concerned in all the moſt conſiderable cauſes; 'he defended moſt eloquently that of the princes of 'Lorrain, relating to the donation of Madam de Guiſe, 'and afterwards he maintained the validity of her laſt 'will. All his combats were attended with ſo many 'victories; if a client wanted an advocate, the court 'nominated him by a ſuperior order, and intruſted 'him with ſuch cauſes as were given over. The great affairs

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſecond is of great weight; for it is taken from a ſpeech ſpoken in the parliament of Paris by an advocate-general [B].

' affairs increaſed, and became eaſy in his hands, the ' moſt knotty difficulties vaniſhed away as ſoon as he ' handled them, and the judges, being put in a ſafe ' way by him, gave their judgment without any fear ' of being miſtaken. We have ſeen what he was at the ' bar: he was yet more amiable in converſation. ' There was never a more affectionate, ſincere, and of- ' ficious friend, a better father, and a better huſband. ' He lived an innocent and virtuous life, attended with ' briſkneſs and gayety: his wit ſupplied him imme- ' diately with a thouſand ingenious inventions to di- ' vert himſelf after his great labours: he was never ' weary of himſelf, and thoſe, who happened to be ' with him, were never weary of his company: he ' was that univerſal man, whom Mr Peliſſon deſcribes ' to us in his preface to Sarrazin, an excellent Orator ' at the bar, a judicious chamber-counſellor, a kind ' father, and a kind huſband in his family, a pleaſant ' and uſeful friend: in ſhort, he was adorned with all ' the natural and acquired knowledge, that can ſatisfy ' the mind of man. The only thing wanting to him ' was a longer life: but he died of a malignant fever, ' in the middle of a moſt glorious career, and the ' faireſt hopes, being forty-three years of age, the ' ſeventh of February, 1694, after a ſickneſs that laſt- ' ed ſeven days. He left two children, a ſon and a ' daughter, by Magdalen du Four his wife.'

[B] The ſecond elogy . . . . . is taken from a ſpeech ſpoken in the parliament of Paris by an advocate-general.] Here is the continuation of the words you have read in the foregoing remark: ' Mr de Harlay, who was ' then advocate-general, and ſpokeſman, at the open- ' ing of the parliament in the ſame year, did remem- ' ber him ten months after his death, and propoſed ' him as a model to all his brethren in theſe words ' which are very glorious to his memory. * *To mo- ' derate the true liberty of your profeſſion we muſt tell ' you again, that it is not an eaſy undertaking, and a thing ' that requires no great labour: it is the fruit of a con- ' tinual ſtudy, or rather of a continual attention upon ' ourſelves, and of an exact practice of many virtues. ' Thus one of your brethren, whom an untimely death has ' lately taken away from us, acquired the eſteem of the ' public, and the love of all thoſe who knew him, and ' attained in an age not far advanced to the reputation ' and practice of the moſt conſummate advocates. Adorned ' with thoſe outward advantages, which none but nature ' can give, he ſhewed in his countenance the character ' of probity and modeſty, which appeared in his whole ' conduct. You have ſeen him from his firſt beginning ' bear glorioufly the weight of the greateſt actions and de- ' fend the moſt difficult cauſes with no leſs politeneſs than ' ſobriety. Attentive to all his duties, zealous for his ' clients, civil to his brethren, reſpectful to the magi- ' ſtrates, he made it appear by ſignal proofs, that if ' ſometimes the neceſſity of your miniſtry, or the expreſs ' orders of your ſuperiors, oblige you to ſpeak for im- ' poſture and calumny, you may be the defenders of ' a crime without acting againſt your honour and ' your conſcience, and even uſe the hardeſt words, ' without tranſgreſſing the moſt exact rules of deco- ' rum and civility. But it is not enough to pay inward- ' ly this melancholy duty to his memory, nor to hear with ' pleaſure the praiſes he ſo juſtly deſerved; his exam- ' ple ought to excite you to imitate his virtues, and to lay ' upon us by your conduct a contiual obligation to ſpend ' theſe ſolemn days in publiſhing your praiſes, without ' being forced to cenſure the faults contrary to the duties ' of your profeſſion, and which are ſo rare among you to ' our great ſatisfaction.'

* Diſcours prononcé à la St Martin 1644, ſur la Liberté.

RHODOMAN (LAURENCE), was born in the year 1546, in the village of Saſſowerf (a) belonging to the counts of Stolberg in the Upper Saxony. Thoſe counts perceiving in him a great diſpoſition for learning, maintained him in the college of Ilfeld (b). He was there ſix years, and made ſo great a progreſs under Michael Neander (c), that he appeared afterwards well qualified to be the chief teacher in the beſt colleges, and famous univerſities [A]. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf particularly by his great ſkill in the Greek tongue. The beſt judges admired his Greek verſes (d). Scaliger did not like his Latin poetry [B]. He ſucceeded very well in his Latin tranſlation of Diodorus Siculus. At laſt he was made profeſſor of Hiſtory in the univerſity of Wirtemberg, where he died the eighth of January 1606. You will find, below, the catalogue of his principal works [C]. He obtained the honour of Poet-Laureat. NICOLAS RHODOMAN, his ſon, has publiſhed ſomething (e).

(a) Rhodomanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Quinti Smyrnæi, Quænſtedt, de Patriis Illuſtr. pag. 219.

(b) Their anceſtors had founded it in the monaſtery of that name by the advice of Luther and Melanchthon. See Rhodoman's Epiſtle Dedicatory, prefixed to Quintus Calaber.

(c) See the ſame Epiſtle Dedicatory, and the preface to his tranſlation of Diodorus Siculus.

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) Konig. Bibl. pag. 689.

[A] He was qualified to be the chief teacher in the beſt colleges, and famous univerſities.] Here is what he himſelf ſays: ' (1) Eoſque in his, σὺν θεῷ καὶ ' μάσαις, progreſſus feci, ut nobilium inde puerorum, ' & illuſtriſſ. principum informationi neque immatu- ' re neque infructuoſe applicarer; Scholarum etiam ' bene conſtitutarum adminiſtrationi dehinc præficerer. ' - - - - I made ſuch progreſs in theſe ſtudies by the help ' of God and the Muſes, that from that time I was em- ' ployed (neither unſeaſonably nor unſucceſsfully) in teach- ' ing young noblemen and illuſtrious princes. I came ' likewiſe to be truſted with the chief management of ' ſome well regulated ſchools.' The places, where he taught, are thus mentioned in his funeral Programma; Docuit Walcerodi, docuit Ienæ, docuit Straleſundi, docuit denique Wittebergæ, atque ita docuit ut eruditione, ſedulitate ac dexteritate ſecundus haberi nemini debeat (2). He was profeſſor of the Greek tongue at Iena, for the ſpace of ſeven years, and profeſſor of Hiſtory at Wittemberg, for the ſpace of four years (3).

(1) In Epiſtola dedicatoria Quinti Calabri.

(2) Daniel Sennertus, in Programmate, apud Henningum Witte, Memor. Philoſoph. pag. 24.

(3) Ib. p. 25.

[B] Scaliger did not like his Latin poetry.] He ſpoke of them thus in converſation: Rhodomanus doctiſſimus in Poëſi Græca, ſed in Latina imperitus & infelix. . . . Bonum Diodorum Siculum edidit; a pretty man, qui latuit, as Leopardus, who was a good Grecian. I have writ ſo many letters about Rhodomanus into Germany, that they have been ſhown to the duke of Saxony, who ſent for him from a trivial ſchool in Pomerania to Wittemberg: he is a very ugly and clowniſh man. . . . . He is a Poet and a good Grecian; he has publiſhed a Chronology, wherein he makes it his buſineſs to contradict all the world, and me too. There are very fooliſh things in his book. Chronologers have committed abundance of miſtakes; Rhodomanus dotes in his old days: he pronounces as Vulcanius does. Rhodomanus carmina Latina non bene ſcribit, ſed Græca bona; bonus eſt Græcus in Poetis (4).

(4) Scaligerana, voce Rhodomanus, pag. m. 204.

Note, That Scaliger has confounded our Laurence Rhodoman with one Laurence Codoman (5), who is the author of four books of Chronology, which he added to his Annals of the Holy Scripture, printed at Wittemberg in 1581. It is a very common thing for the moſt learned men to make ſuch miſtakes in converſation, and when the names of authors differ only in ſome letters, ſuch a miſtake may be eaſily committed. This is the caſe of Scaliger.

(5) See Mr Moller, pag. 716, of his Hemerographia.

[C] The catalogue of his principal works.] He tranſlated into Latin the Greek Poem of Cointus Smyrnæus, or Quintus Calaber, concerning the taking of Troy, and added ſome corrections to it. As for the commentaries he made upon that author, I do not believe they have been printed; Moreri and others ſay, without any ground for it, that they are very much eſteemed. I make uſe of an edition of that work (6), in which there are two Greek and Latin Poems of Rhodoman: the one is intituled ΙΛΙΑΣ ΜΙΚΡΑ, and contains an abridgment of the Iliads, and of Quintus Calaber: the other, intituled ΤΡΟΙΚΑ, contains an epitome of the Trojan war, ex variis auctoribus decerpta - - - Taken from ſeveral authors. There is alſo the oration, in which Dion Chryſoſtom maintains that Troy was not taken, with Rhodoman's Latin tranſlation, and ſome Scholia. Here are the titles of ſome other books (7). Hiſtoria vitæ & doctrinæ Martini Lutheri

(6) It is that of 1614.

(7) Witte, ubi ſupra, pag. 28.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(8) Ibid. pag. 27.

theri carmine heroïco deſcripta. (8) Deſcriptio Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiæ ſive populi Dei Politiæ ejuſdem & rerum præcipuarum, quæ in illo populo acciderunt, Græco carmine, cum verſione Latina è regione textus Græci, Francof. 1581, in 8vo. Poëſis Chriſtiana, id eſt, Paleſtinæ ſeu Hiſtoriæ ſacræ Græco-Latinæ libri IX, Marpurgi 1589. Francof. 1590, 1630. in 4to. Argonautica, Thebaica, Ilias parva: Lipſ. 1588, in 8vo. Tabulæ Etymologiæ Græcæ: ibid. 1590, in 8vo. Memnonis Hiſtoria de Republica Heraclienſium, & rebus Ponticis Eclogæ: ſeu excerptæ & abbreviatæ narrationes in Sermonem Latinum tranſlatæ: Helmſtadii 1591, in 4to. Epithalamia ſacra: Ienæ 1594, in 4to. Ex Memnone, de Tyrannis Heracleæ Ponticæ Cteſia & Agatharchide excerptæ Hiſtoriæ Græcè & Latinè partim ex Laur. Rhodomani interpretatione: Genevæ 1593, in 8vo. Theologiæ Chriſtianæ tyrocinia, carmine Heroico Græco-Latino in V libros digeſta: Lipſiæ 1597, in 8vo. His Germanis was not printed when he died: it is very much commended in his funeral Programma. Imprimis opus illud auro contra æſtimandum, quod de origine, moribus ac rebus geſtis veterum Germanorum Græcè ſcripſit, & Germanidem inſcripſit. Quod opus unicum tale eſt, ut animum atque ingenium hominis excellentem, charitateque patriæ inſigniter flagrantem, abundè oſtendat (9). Witte (10) reckons it among the printed books of Rhodoman, but does not ſay in what year it was publiſhed at Wittemberg.

(9) Sennertus, ubi ſupra, apud Witte, pag. 24.

(10) Ubi ſupra.

RHODOPE, a famous courtezan, cotemporary with Æſop, and his fellow-ſlave, was born in Thrace (a). Xanthus, the Samian, carried her into Egypt, where Charaxus, a Merchant of Mitylene (b), and brother to Sappho, became ſo much in love with her, that he bought her for a great ſum of money. By that means ſhe was made free; and becauſe ſhe was very beautiful, and the town of Naucratis, where ſhe ſettled, was full of rich and voluptuous men, ſhe got a great eſtate by being a courtezan (c). However, we muſt not believe that ſhe got ſo much by it, as to be able to build one of thoſe pyramids [A], that have been reckoned among the ſeven wonders of the world. Herodotus calls it a fabulous ſtory. What is ſaid of her ſhoe is not better grounded [B]. Athenæus is of opinion, that the courtezan Dorica, miſtreſs to Sappho's brother, has been confounded with Rhodope by Herodotus (d).

(a) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. cxxxiv.

(b) A town in the iſle of Leſbos.

(c) Taken from Herodotus, ibid. cap. cxxxv.

(d) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 596.

[A] To build one of thoſe pyramids.] Pliny does not ſeem to doubt of it; but perhaps he believed nothing of it, and expreſſed himſelf as he did, only that he might have an occaſion to ſet forth ſome ſubtilties. He ſays, that the heighth and magnificent ſtructure of the pyramids is not that which ought to be moſt admired in that wonder of the world; the greateſt miracle (adds he) lies in this, that a courtezan ſhould have got ſo much wealth, as was ſufficient to raiſe that pyramid which is moſt eſteemed. Hæc ſunt pyramidum miracula: ſupremumque illud, ne quis regum opus, miretur minimam ex his, ſed laudatiſſimam, à Rhodope meretricula factam. Æſopi fabularum Philoſophi conſerva quondam & contubernalis hæc fuit, majore miraculo tantas opes meretricio eſſe conquiſitas quæſtu (1). That tradition was but a romantic ſtory of the Greeks. Herodotus, though a credulous author, rejects it. He maintains (2), that the pyramid, the building of which was aſcribed to Rhodope, was built many years before the reign of Amaſis, in which that courtezan lived. He adds (3), that though ſhe had got a great eſtate, ſhe would not have been able to ſuſtain the immenſe charges of that building. He proves it by a very good reaſon. We know, ſays he, what the riches of that woman amounted to; for the iron ſpits, which ſhe conſecrated in the temple of Apollo at Delphi, and for which ſhe ſpent the tenth part of her eſtate, are to be ſeen there ſtill. Thoſe ſpits were deſigned for the roaſting of oxen. The Heathen prieſts were not very nice; the ſmell of gain was very acceptable to them, though the cauſe of it was never ſo ſtinking: and Veſpaſian might have learned of them this maxim, Lucri bonus eſt odor ex re qualibet (4). They heartily received the offerings of courtezans, and conſecrated them among the moſt celebrated monuments of the devotion of people; whereby they immortalized the crimes of thoſe courtezans, according to their deſires. Rhodope gave away the tenth part of her booty for the making of ſpits, that ſhe might raiſe to herſelf an eternal monument in Greece. Ἐπεθύμησε γὰρ Ῥοδῶπις μνημεῖόν αὑτῆς ἐν τῇ Ἑλλάδι καταλιπέσθαι, ποίημα ποιησαμένη τοῦτο, τὸ μὴ τυγχάνει ἄλλῳ ἐξευρημένον, καὶ ἀνακείμενον ἐν ἱρῷ, τοῦτο ἀναθεῖναι ἐς Δελφοὺς μνημόσυνον ἑωυτῆς. τῆς ὧν δεκάτης τῶν χρημάτων ποιησαμένη ὀβελοὺς βυτῖρας πολλοὺς σιδηρέους, ὅσον ἐνεχώρεε ἡ δεκάτη οἱ, ἀπέπεμπε ἐς Δελφούς. οἳ καὶ νῦν ἔτι συννενέαται, ὄπισθε μὲν τῷ βωμῷ τὸν Χῖοι ἀνέθεσαν, ἀντίον δὲ αὐτῷ τοῦ νηοῦ. Quum enim optaret memoriam ſui in Græcia relinquere, fecit opus quod ab alio excogitatum non eſt neque donatum, idque donavit in templo Delphico monumentum ſui. E decima enim ſuarum opum tot è ferro verua ad boves torrendos fecit, ad quot facienda ſufficeret decima ipſa: quæ Delphos miſit: quæ nunc quoque poſita ſunt è regione templi, poſt aram quam Chii donaverunt (5). - - - Rhodope, being deſirous that a monument of her ſhould be left in Greece, reſolved to make ſuch a preſent to the temple at Delphos as had never been thought of nor made before. For this reaſon ſhe provided as many iron ſpits to roaſt oxen as the tenth of her ſubſtance was ſufficient to buy, and ſent them to Delphos. Theſe are ſtill preſerved behind the altar which the Chians raiſed, and over-againſt the temple itſelf. The law of the Jews did not allow of ſuch an impurity (6).

(1) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. xii, pag. m. 302.

(2) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. cxxxiv.

(3) Ibid. cap. cxxxv.

(4) Juven. Sat. XIV, ver. 204. See Suetonius, in Veſpaſiano, cap. xxiii.

(5) Herodotus, ibid.

(6) Non inferes mercedem meretricis, aut pretium canis in domum Dei tui in quocunque voto, quia abominatio eſt utrunque apud Dominum Deum tuum. Deuteron. cap. xxiii, ver. 18.

[B] What is ſaid of her ſhoe.] One day as ſhe was bathing, and her maids took care of her cloaths, an eagle came down, ſeized one of her ſhoes, and carried it away to Memphis, and let it fall upon Pſammitichus's lap. That prince was then ſitting upon his tribunal, to adminiſter juſtice. He admired the beauty of that ſhoe, and the conduct of that eagle, and ordered that the lady, who had been robbed of her ſhoe, ſhould be looked for all over Egypt. They found her, and brought her to him, and he married her (7). I do not believe it, though fortune is ſometimes pleaſed with ſuch ſports: ἢ τὰ παράδοξα καὶ τὰ ἀδόκητα φιλοῦσα ἐργάζεσθαι τύχη, inopinatorum atque inexpectatorum amans fortuna (8). Rhodope, Æſop's fellow-ſlave, would have been well contented to marry that monſtrous man. What a wonderful alteration! She would have been the wife of a great monarch, and one of thoſe,

(7) Taken from Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. xiii, cap. xxxiii. See alſo Strabo, lib. xvii, pag. 556.

(8) Ælian. ibid.

Quales ex humili magna ad faſtigia rerum
Extollit, quoties voluit fortuna jocari (9).

(9) Juven. Sat. III, ver. 39.

Whom fortune does in merriment advance,
And places topmoſt on the wheel of chance.

Obſerve, by the by, that wit may prevent the ill effects of uglineſs, with reſpect to a fine woman. Æſop, though the ugliеſt of all men, moved Rhodope's heart (10).

(10) Herodot. ubi ſupra, cap. xxxiv.

RICCI (MICHAEL ANGELO) made a cardinal by Pope Innocent XI, the firſt day of September 1681, was born at Rome in the year 1619. He was a lover of the Mathematics, and made a great progreſs in that ſcience, as appears by his treatiſe De maximis & minimis, which has been reprinted twice or thrice. He wrote two diſſertations, one of which is inſerted in the works of Cardinal Brancaccio, and the other in Carlo Dati's epiſtle ad Philalethos. He applied himſelf afterwards very earneſtly to the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſtudy of Divinity. He has been praiſed by ſome very famous authors, as Gaſſendus, Renatus Francis Sluſius, cardinal Pallavicini, Fabretti, &c. He had a very conſiderable library (a). He went through ſeveral employments, before he was made a Cardinal; and, amongſt others, through that of Secretary of the congregation of indulgences and relics, and that of Conſultor of the Holy Office. He was poſſeſſed of thoſe employments in 1678, when he approved the book of the biſhop of Condom, I mean his Expoſition de la Doctrine Catholique.

(a) Taken from Profp. Mandofius, Bibl. Rom. Cent. V, pag. 344, 345.

RICHER, or RICHIER (PETER), a Carmelite, and a Doctor of Paris (a), embraced the Proteſtant religion, and retired to Geneva, where he was admitted into the miniſtry in the year 1556, to be ſent to the Sieur Villegagnon, in America (b). He was then above fifty years of age (c). He embarked at Honfleur, the nineteenth of November, in the ſame year, with another miniſter, whoſe name was Chartier, and with ſome other perſons, whom the church of Geneva judged to be proper for Villegagnon's deſign (d): he arrived at the iſle of Coligni the tenth of March 1557 (e), and preached there the very ſame day before Villegagnon, who all the time joined his hands, lifted up his eyes to Heaven, fetched great ſighs, and the like (f), which filled the whole aſſembly with admiration. Some few days after they adminiſtred the Lord's-Supper, and John Cointa, formerly a Doctor of the Sorbonne, made an abjuration of Popery (g). Villegagnon made admirable prayers, and received the bread and the wine from the miniſter's hand upon his knees (h). The hopes grounded on thoſe expreſſions of zeal did ſoon vaniſh away, for he and Cointa began to diſpute ſoon after with Richer and Chartier about the Euchariſt (i). The latter was ſent back to Geneva, to acquaint Calvin with that diſpute, to whoſe judgment Villegagnon declared he would ſubmit (k). But he pulled off the maſk before the coming of Calvin's anſwer (l): he declared himſelf a Papiſt ſoon after the communion of Whitſunday (m); and, if he had been able, he would have dealt roughly with Peter Richer, and the other Genevois (n): but he was contented to command them to retire, which they did. I ſpeak of this more largely in another place (o). They embarked the fourth of January 1558 (p), and after having been reduced to very great ſtreights (q), they arrived at laſt in the harbour of Blavet in Bretagne, the twenty-ſixth of May following (r). Richer was afterwards made miniſter of the church of Rochelle [A], and publiſhed a piece againſt Villegagnon [B]. Nothing can be more ridiculous than to make him the head of the ſect of the Richerians, and to ſay that this pretended ſect was tainted with Neſtorianiſm: and yet a famous Jeſuit has been ſo bold as to affirm it [C]. He adds, that Richer infected the inhabitants of (b) John de Leri, Hiſt. d'un Voiage de l'Amérique, ch. i, pag. m. 6.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ibid. ch. ii, pag. 8.

(e) Ibid. ch. vi, pag. 55.

(f) Ibid. pag. 56.

(g) Ibid. pag. 59.

(h) Ibid. pag. 66.

(i) Ibid. pag. 67.

(k) Ibid. pag. 68.

(l) Ibid. pag. 76.

(m) Ibid. See alſo Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. ii, pag. 160.

(n) Leri, ibid. pag. 83.

(o) In the article VILLEGAGNON.

(p) Leri, chap. xxi, pag. 341.

(q) Jean de Leri, one of them, has deſcribed them. Ibid. ch. xxi, xxii.

(r) Ibid. pag. 373.

[A] Richer was made afterwards miniſter of the church of Rochelle.] 'At that time Peter Richer being returned from America, where he had ſuffered 'very much under the tyranny of Villegagnon, a moſt 'wicked and wretched apoſtate, came to Rochelle, 'where he found about fifty perſons, who had been 'gathered together in the LORD by the miniſtry of la 'Fontaine and la Place, whom I have mentioned in 'the Hiſtory of the preceding year. He did ſo much 'encourage and ſtrengthen that ſmall flock in a little 'time, that a conſiſtory and the whole diſcipline were 'eſtabliſhed there; and GOD was pleaſed to favour 'that firſt beginning, ſo that in a little time a great 'part of the town joined themſelves to the Church of 'the LORD, forſaking the ſuperſtitions of the Church 'of Rome. From that time the LORD prepared that 'place to make it ſuſtain hereafter the moſt violent 'aſſaults of its adverſaries (1).' He was ſtill living when John de Leri printed his relation, that is, in the year 1577. For in the deſcription of the miſeries of their voyage, he ſpeaks thus: 'As to Mr Peter 'Richer, now a miniſter of the church of Rochelle, 'he will tell you that he lay all along in his cabbin, 'and was ſo weak that he could not lift up his head 'to pray to GOD; but he invoked him with great 'ardour in that condition (2).' Note, That Moreri is miſtaken, when he ſays that Richer was miniſter at Geneva after his return from America. Note alſo, That Mr Vincent (3), who ſets down Beza's words, and who adds, that they *gave Poupeliniere * occaſion to call Richer the Father of the church of Rochelle*, has obſerved that what Beza ſays of the eſtabliſhment of a conſiſtory in that year 1558, may be juſtified by the regiſters of that church; but he is ſo far from ſaying that Richer was made miniſter of that place, that he declares (4) that the miniſter appointed there, when the firſt conſiſtory was ſettled, was called Fayet. It is true, he ſays that in the year 1561, that church had two Paſtors, to wit, Fayet and de l'Iſle. The latter is our Richer (5).

(1) Theod. Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. ii, pag. 139, 140. ad ann. 1558.

(2) Leri, Hiſt. du Voiage de l'Amerique, ch. xxii, pag. m. 368.

(3) Vincent, Recherches ſur les commencemens & les prémiers progrès de la Réformation de la Ville de la Rochelle, pag. 27, 28.

* Poupel. lib. v, in the beginning.

(4) Vincent, ubi ſupra, pag. 44.

(5) Peter Richer, Sieur de l'Iſle. Ibid. pag. 27.

[B] He publiſhed a piece againſt Villegagnon.] The book intituled, A refutation of the lies and fooliſh ſtories of Nicolas Durand, called the Chevalier de Villegagnon, and printed in 1562, in 8vo, was not written by James Spifame under Peter Richer's name, as du Verdier Vau-Privas affirms (6); it was written by the author, whoſe name is prefixed to it. We find this title in the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque. Petri Richerii Apologetici libri duo, contra Nicolaum Durandum qui ſe Villagagnonem vocat, quibus illius in pios Americanos tyrannidem exponit, & negotium Sacramentarium tractat. Genevæ 1561, in 4*to* (7). To which you may add theſe words of John de Leri. 'But becauſe, when 'Villegagnon returned into France, not only Peter 'Richer painted him in his true colours, but alſo 'ſome others curried and bruſhed † him ſo well, I 'ſhall ſay no more of him, for fear of tiring the 'readers (8).' If you deſire to have a proof of Moreri's taking little care to examine what he advanced; you need only conſider that after he has given us a good character of Villegagnon, he refers us (9) to his life, written by Richer, a work wherein Villegagnon muſt needs be repreſented as a wicked man.

(6) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 620.

(7) Epitome Biblioth. Geſn. pag. m. 682.

† The Currycomb and Bruſh are two ſmall books printed againſt Villegagnon.

(8) Leri, ubi ſupra, ch. xv, pag. 74.

[C] A famous Jeſuit has been ſo bold as to affirm it.] Conſult the tables of Father Gaultier, where you will find that the 63d chapter of the XVIth century, is intituled DE RICHERIANIS, DUCE Petro Richerio. He ſays (10) that Peter Richer taught in America, before Villegagnon, that CHRIST, as a man, ought not to be worſhipped. This is one of the proofs alledged by that Jeſuit, when he maintains that the Calviniſts renew the impious doctrines of Neſtorius. 'Calvini 'veſtigiis, ſays he (11), inſiſtit Petrus Richerius in 'Americam ab eo miſſus anno 1557. quùm & præ'ſente Domino Villagagnono prædicat, & coram No'tario publico Franciſco Alberico mordicus tuetur Je'ſum Chriſtum in carne humana non eſſe adorandum. 'Tuetur, inquam, dum reſpondet ad interpellationem 'ſibi per eum factam ejuſdem D. Villagagnoni no'mine, utpote cauſam exigentis cur Jeſum Chriſtum 'adorare nolit. Horum nobis omnium fidem facit 'tum epiſtola ejuſdem Villagagnoni ad Eccleſiam Chri'ſtianam

(9) Moreri, at the word Villegagnon.

(10) Gaultierus, Tab. Chron. p. 802.

(11) Ibid. pag. 376, col. 2. See alſo Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, liv. ii, p. 103. Hiſtory of Heresies.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of Annonai in Vivarez with his errors [D]. I have mentioned in another place (1), a letter which that minister wrote from America.

(1) In the remark [A], of the article LERI.

'stianam data, tum ea quam octavo Julii anno 1560. 'ad Magistratum Genevensem scripsit, tum annexa 'ejusdem Notarii testificatio, quam diei decimæ quar- 'tæ Maii anni 1559. nota obsignavit; tum altera te- 'stificatio die octavo Junii 1558. data subscriptaque à 'D. Petro à Falcilla, quem D. Villagagnonus ad Mi- 'nistrum Richerium 27 Decembris 1557 miserat, 'rationem ejusmodi doctrinæ scisciturum: ubi asse- 'rit se, dum à Ministro Richerio quæreret, cur inter 'orandum non diceret, Gloria Patri & Filio & Spi- 'ritui sancto, &c. responsum planè nullum accepisse: 'dum autem denuntiaret conqueri D. Villagagnonum, 'quòd nullam unquam ad Jesum Christum precationem 'dirigeret, hoc se à Ministro responsum habuisse, hæ- 'reticum illum arbitrandum esse, qui necesse duxerit 'orare Jesum Christum †. Nùm hac loquendi for- 'mula uti potuisset Minister Richerius, si credidisset 'in carne humana Jesu Christi aliam non esse hyposta- 'sim, subsistentiam aut personam, nisi Verbi Divini? '--- Peter Richer follows the footsteps of Calvin, by 'whom he was sent to America in the year 1557; since 'he preaches up in the presence of Villegagnon, and stiffly 'maintains before Francis Albericus a Public Notary, that 'Jesus Christ as man is not to be worshipped. I say, 'he maintained this doctrine in his answer to the Notary, 'who interrupted him, and, in the name of Villegagnon, 'demanded to know the reason why he refused to wor- 'ship Jesus Christ. The truth of all this appears from 'Villegagnon's letter to the Church of Christ, and from 'his letter to the magistrates of Geneva, dated 8 July '1560; as likewise from the declaration of the said 'Notary, which is annexed to it, and dated 14 May '1559; and from another declaration dated 8 June '1558, and signed by Peter à Falcilla, whom Villegag- 'non sent to Richer on the 27*th of December* 1557, to 'ask the reasons of his doctrine. He there affirms that 'when he put the question to Richer, why in his prayers 'he did not say, Glory to the Father, and to the 'Son, and to the Holy Ghost, &c. he received no an- 'swer; but when he told him that Villegagnon was of- 'fended at his not directing any prayer to Christ, his 'answer was, that whoever maintained the necessity of 'praying to Jesus Christ, ought to be looked upon as an 'Heretic. Could Richer have uttered these words, if 'he had believed that in the human nature of Christ 'there was no other hypostasis, subsistence, or person, 'but that of the Word only.' You may apply to the pretended sect of the Richerians what I have said in the article BEZANITES. Spondanus says, that some of the followers of Richer were so impious as to deny the resurrection (12). But when I consider that Mr Vincent, in the above quoted book, does scarce mention Peter Richer, I cannot forbear laughing at the boldness of those, who represent as the head of a sect a man, who made so little a figure. As for the rest, many Divines among the Calvinists are of opinion that the humanity of CHRIST in abstracto, ought not to be worshipped (13). If Peter Richer maintained nothing else, he needed not fear to be accounted a Heretic among those of his sect.

† Extant hæc omnia inter controversias Villagagnoni.

(12) Spondanus, ad ann. 1555, num. 15.

(13) See Mr Saurin, in his Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu, p. 738, & seq.

Note, That Varillas goes farther than Spondanus; for he affirms that Peter Richer taught, that eternal life is only promised to the souls of Christians, and that they shall be happy only with respect to their souls, and that therefore the LORD's Supper having not been instituted to supply their wants, there was no need to use it frequently (14). I fancy he only taught, that the Sacrament of the Eucharist being not appointed for the use of the body, it was not necessary that the flesh of CHRIST should be contained in it. This was his opinion, which his enemies altered and misrepresented.

(14) Varillas, Hist. de l'Hérésie, livr. xxi, pag. 18, 19.

[D] ..... He adds that Richer infected the inhabitants of Annonai in Vivarez with his errors.] He does not mention the time: It was doubtless before the voyage into America. 'Probè novi hunc Petrum 'Richerium fuisse illum ipsum, qui urbi Annonæensi 'in Vivariensi provincia malorum plurimorum author 'fuit. Cum enim in eam, se Catholicum simulans, 'esset ingressus, imò & menses aliquot in concionibus 'ea simulatione usus, tandem ubi se in præcipuorum 'civium, qui illum sæpe convivio exceperant, amici- 'tiam insinuatum vidit, cordis sui pestem aperuit; 'primùm quidem privatim, deinde verò è pulpito 'pleno ore in Sacramenta invectus, ac nominatim in 'Realitatem Eucharisticam. Quod ubi animadvertunt 'Magistratus, dum in eum inquirunt, ecce evanescit 'homo nequam, majorem tamen urbis partem errori- 'bus illaqueatam relinquens (15). --- I know very 'well that this Peter Richer is the man who did so 'much mischief to the town of Annonai in Vivarez. 'For having introduced himself there as a Roman Catho- 'lic, and preached some months under that disguise, at 'last when he found that he was closely riveted in the 'favour of the principal inhabitants, who had often 'feasted him in their houses, he disclosed the venom of 'his heart; first indeed privately, but afterwards loud- 'ly in the pulpit, inveighing against the sacraments, 'and particularly against the real presence in the Eucha- 'rist. The magistrates had no sooner perceived this, 'and begun to inquire into the matter, but all of a sud- 'den the knave disappeared. Nevertheless he left the 'greatest part of the city infected with his errors.' I have mentioned that passage, as being part of Richer's life.

(15) Gaulterius, ubi supra, pag. 802, col. 1.

RICIUS (PAUL) a converted Jew, was a German, and flourished in the XVIth century. He was professor of Philosophy at Pavia, and acquired a great reputation by it, and the esteem of several learned men, who recommended him so effectually to the emperor Maximilian, that he was sent for into Germany by that prince, and made one of his Physicians. He published several books against the Jews, and concerning some other matters [A]. He is very much praised for his sincerity, honesty, moderation, and learning (a). See his elogy in a letter of Erasmus [B], which I shall quote in the

(a) Taken from Melch. Adam. in Vitis Medicor. pag. 9, 10.

[A] He published several books against the Jews, and concerning some other matters.] Here are the titles of some of them. Philosophica, prophetica ac thalmudistica pro Christiana veritate tuenda, cum juniori Hebræorum Synagoga disputatio. De sexcentis & tredecim Mosaicæ sanctionis seu pentateuchi edictis. Farrago ex Thalmudæorum codice excerpta, ad petitionem Maximiliani Cæsaris. Isagoge in Cabalistarum seu allegorizantium eruditionem cum epistola contra Stephani Presbyteri Cabalæ obtrectatoris epistolam: De modo orandi in nomine tetragrammato. De novem doctrinarum ordinibus, & totius peripatetici dogmatis nexu compendium. Statera prudentum. Conclusiones quibus Aristotelem triplicem doctrinæ ordinem exercuisse, & totius ejus dogmatis nexum dijudicare poteris. He did not forget the common subject for the declamations of that time; for he made an oration to excite the Germans to engage in a war against the Turks in virulentam immanissimamque Turcarum rabiem, ad principes, magistratus, populosque Germaniæ oratio (1).

(1) Taken from Gesner's Epitome, pag. 659.

[B] See his elogy in a letter of Erasmus.] It is the last of the first book, and is dated the tenth of March, 1516. In which are these words: 'Paulus Ricius 'sic me proximo colloquio rapuit, ut mira quædam 'me sitis habeat, cum homine sæpius ac familiarius 'conferendi sermonem. Præter Hebrææ linguæ pe- 'ritiam, quantum ille tenet philosophiæ, quantum 'Theologiæ: tum quæ animi puritas, qui discendi 'ardor, qui docendi candor, quæ disputandi modestia? 'Mihi sanè vir ille primo statim gustu placuit olim 'Papiæ; cum illic philosophiam profiteretur: nunc 'propiùs intuito magis etiam placet. Is demùm verè 'mihi videtur Israelitam agere, fuoque cognomini 'pulchrè respondere: cujus omnis voluptas, omnis 'cura, omne otium ac negotium, in divinis est lite- 'ris.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the remarks. The famous John Eckius was one of his adverſaries: the ſubject of their diſpute was this queſtion, viz. Whether the Heavens are animated. Ricius maintained the affirmative, and advanced ſome opinions that were looked upon as paradoxical [C].

(2) Eraſm. Epiſt. ult. lib. i, pag. 88.

'ris. Dignus nimirum animus cui otium contingat 'quàm maximè honorificum (2). - - - Pauli Ricius ſo 'charmed in a late converſation which I had with him, 'that I am very deſirous of enjoying the ſame in a more 'frequent and familiar manner. Beſides his knowledge 'in the Hebrew tongue, how great is his ſtock of Phi-'loſophy and Divinity, how remarkable his integrity, 'how keen his deſire to learn, and how great his candour 'in teaching, and his modeſty in diſputes! I was pleaſed 'with the man the firſt time I ſaw him, a great while 'ago, when he was profeſſor of Philoſophy at Pavia, 'but now that I have the opportunity of viewing him 'nearer, he pleaſes me ſtill more. In ſhort, I take him 'for an Iſraelite indeed, who anſwers his name well, 'ſince his whole pleaſure and ſtudy, his buſy and his idle 'hours are beſtowed upon the Holy Scripture. He ſhews 'a mind that is worthy of the moſt honourable eaſe.' Ricius ſent him his treatiſe concerning the Cabala, and the thanks he received for it are very glorious to him: for it appears by it that this proſelyte had defended the cauſe of one of his friends cruelly ſlandered, and had kept at the ſame time within the bounds of moderation, and abſtained from injurious words. 'Arriſit 'animus iſte Gratiis & amicitiæ natus, qui tanto ſtudio 'tuetur hominis eruditiſſimi innocentiam, adverſus 'impudentiſſimos ſycophantas. Arriſit denique te, 'hoc eſt abſoluto veroque philoſopho, digna modera-'tio: quâ ſic fortiter patrocinaris amico, ut à con-'vitiis in adverſarium temperes, magis reputans quid 'te, quàm quid illo dignum eſſet (3). - - - - I was 'charmed with that generous and friendly ſpirit, which 'ſo zealouſly defends the innocence of a very learned man 'againſt his moſt audacious calumniators. Laſt of all I 'was charmed with your moderation, ſo worthy of your 'ſelf, that is, of a true and perfect Philoſopher: for 'while you ſtrongly maintain the cauſe of your friend, 'you forbear reviling his adverſary; and conſider more 'what is fit for you to ſay, than what he deſerves to 'hear.'

(3) Idem, Epiſt. XXXIX, lib. xiii, pag. 642: it was written in the year 1520.

[C] Whether the Heavens are animated. Ricius maintained that they are, and advanced ſomething paradoxical.] A Proteſtant Divine obſerves that the opinions of Ricius favoured the principles of Magic, and yet that his books de Cœleſti Agricultura had been approved and praiſed by the Divines of Bologna, Padua, Ferrara, and Pavia. Paulus Ritius dum cælorum animationem & Cabaliſticam ſuam Arithmantiam per decem enumerationes tradit, magiæ principia non parum promovet in commentariis ſuis ad librum R. Joſeph Caſtilienſis qui porta lucis dicitur, & tamen libros illos de cœleſti agricultura magnifico elogio approbarunt Academiæ Theologicæ Bononienſis, &c. (4) John Eckius did not follow the ſteps of thoſe Italian Divines; for he maintained that the doctrine, which teaches that the Heavens are animated, is ridiculous, execrable, and contrary to faith (5). Claudius Eſpencæus, of whom I learn this, knew not upon what reaſons that cenſure was grounded; for he had not ſeen John Eckius's book, and knew no more of it than what he had found in Ricius's confutation of it, of which he gives us a ſhort analyſis. He ſays (6) that author maintained three things. 1. That the doctrine, which teaches that the Heavens are animated, does not concern our faith; for it can neither be proved nor confuted by the principles of religion: hence it is that Divines are divided on that problem. 2. That this opinion agrees better with the words of the Prophets, than the contrary doctrine. 3. That reaſon leads us to believe that the Heavens are not inanimate beings (7). Eſpencæus examines Ricius's proofs, and criticiſes them, and at laſt declares that it is more ſafe to deny than to affirm that the Heavens have a ſoul. The reader will not be diſpleaſed to know upon what occaſion he publiſhed his book de Cœlorum Animatione (8). They had a mind to print at Paris an edition of all the works of cardinal Contarinus; but the Divine, who was to give his approbation, ſcrupled to do it, becauſe he finds that the author affirms that the Heavens were animated (9). He conſulted Claudius Eſpencæus, who anſwered him, that he looked upon it as an inconſiderable difficulty, and ſoon after remembring that he had collected ſeveral things on that queſtion, he put them together and publiſhed them (10).

(4) Giſb. Voëtius, deſperata Cauſa Papatus, lib. i, ſect. IV, pag. 36. He cites him in compend. de anima cœli, & cœleſti agricultura, lib. 10.

(5) Joannes Eckius profitetur hanc luciferam prorſus & exoſicam, execrabilem, & à fide exorbitantem eſſe conſuit in tractatu de prædeſtinatione. Claudius Eſpenſæus, in Tractatu de cælorum animatione, cap. 2, pag. m. 49.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. cap. viii, pag. 70.

(8) It was printed at Paris in the year 1571.

(9) In the firſt book of Contarinus, de animæ immortalitate, printed at Venice in 1585.

Obſerve that among the School-Divines and Philoſophers, the queſtion is only to know, whether the immediate mover of the celeſtial ſpheres is a ſoul properly ſo called, and forma informans. It is the opinion of ſome, and it is commonly rejected; but as for the opinion of thoſe, who admit of moving intelligences, as aſſiſting forms, it is almoſt generally received; and truly I do not ſee how one can be without them; and I fancy the Copernicans will fall into it ſooner or later in relation to their Planets. Father Daniel (11), and Mr le Clerc (12) have objected ſome difficulties againſt their ſyſtem, which puzzle them very much. Sir Iſaac Newton, and others, have ſo ſtrongly aſſaulted the hypotheſis of the Vortices, that the general laws of motion are not ſufficient to account for the phænomena. A particular direction of an intelligent Being would come in very ſeaſonably.

(10) See the preface of that treatiſe of Claudius Eſpencæus.

(11) In his Voyage de Monſieur Des Cartes.

(12) In his Phyſics.

RYER (ANDREW DU), Sieur de Malezair, gentleman in ordinary of the king's chamber, and knight of the holy ſepulchre, lived in the XVIIth century. He made a conſiderable ſtay at Conſtantinople for the king's ſervice, and afterwards he was conſul of the French nation in Egypt. He got a great knowledge of the Turkiſh and Arabic languages, as it appears by his writings [A]. He was born at Marcigni (a), a little town on the Loire in the frontiers of Forez (b).

(a) Marciniacenſis. See Colomiés, Gallia Orient. p. 163.

(b) See Baudrand, voce Marciniacum.

I ſhould not omit that his tranſlation of the Alcoran has appeared worthy of cenſure to ſome Critics [B].

[A] He underſtood the Turkiſh and Arabic languages very well, as appears by his writings.] He printed at Paris in 1630, a Turkiſh Grammar. Four years after he publiſhed in the ſame city his French tranſlation of the Guliſtan, or the Empire of the Roſes, written by Sadi the prince of the Turkiſh and Perſian Poets. But his chief tranſlation is that of the Alcoran, which has been tranſlated ſeveral times. He publiſhed it after he had been conſul for the French nation in Egypt; which appears by the honourable teſtimonial which the conſuls of Marſeilles gave him the 12th of February, 1633, and which may be ſeen at the end of that tranſlation.

[B] His tranſlation of the Alcoran has appeared worthy of cenſure to ſome Critics.] The learned Windet accuſes him of having tranſpoſed, added to, and retrenched, ſeveral things: hunc locum male reddidit Gallus interpres Sieur du Ryer; & ſolet nimium licenter interpretari, vertere, addere, ac demere. Verſio autem Anglica, ex Gallica ejus facta, itidem male habet (1).

(1) Jo. Windet, de vitâ functorum ſtatu, Sect. IX. pag. 223, Edit. Lond. 1677.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

RYER (PETER) a Parisian, was admitted into the French Academy in Faret's room, the twenty-first of November 1646 (a). He is the author of several French translations, and some dramatic pieces (b). Most of the authors translated by him are Greek or Latin: as for the Greek, he only put the old translations into new French (c), or at most followed the Latin translations: and as for the antient Latin authors, he often mistook their sense. This he did also sometimes in his translation of the modern authors [A], I mean of Thuanus and Strada. It is thought his translations would be better, if he had been better paid by the Booksellers [B]; but because they gave him but a small matter for every sheet, he was forced to make all the haste he could, that he might be able to maintain his family. He died in the year 1656 (d). There is something about him in the Menagiana [C]: you will find it in the remarks.

(a) Pellisson, Hist. de l'Academie Françoise, pag. m. 229.

(b) See the list of them in the History of the French Academy, pag. 356, 357, and in Mr Baillet's Jugemens sur les Poëtes, num. 1486.

(c) See Baillet's Jugemens des Sçavans, Tom. iv, num. 949, who refers unto the Parnas. Reform. pag. m. 20, & seq.

(d) And not in 1658, as Moreri says. St Romuald places his death, not on the fifth of November 1658 (as Moreri does), but on the twenty-first. Journal Chronologique, Tom. ii, pag. 570.

[A] He often mistook the sense of the antient authors. This he did also sometimes in his translations of the Moderns.] (1) The least faulty of his translations, in the judgment of several persons, is that of Cicero's works, tho' he omitted many passages which he did not understand, especially in the orations, though in order to come off, and to fill up the chasms, he put in the room of them several insignificant and nonsensical things, that are only fit to dazzle and perplex young readers (2). These words in the Hexameron rustique are levelled at him, if I am not mistaken: 'He, who translated Cicero's fine treatise de Amicitia into French, has not been more lucky 'in his translation of these words, Agrigentinum dotum quendam virum, which he renders thus, a learned man called Agrigentinus, without minding 'that Cicero speaks of Empedocles Agrigentinus, 'whom he denotes by the name of Agrigentum, or 'Agragas, a town of Sicily, where he was born. Besides there never was a man of letters, whose proper name was Agrigentinus. The same writer in 'his translation of Valerius Maximus, chap. 1, 'example 4, pag. 6, renders vitio tabernaculum captum, 'thus, the tabernacle had been touched by chance, instead of saying, they had been wanting in the ceremonies that are to be observed, when they take the place of the Augurs, called the Tabernacle. For want of 'understanding these words, Tabernaculum captum, as 'they ought to be understood in that place, and for want 'of knowing the practice of the Augurs, he thought 'this ought to be expounded according to the custom 'of the Jews, amongst whom none but the Levites 'were allowed to come near the tabernacle (3).' To this I shall add a passage out of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (4): 'Mr Teissier takes notice of 'some faults in Mr du Rier's translation: here is one 'amongst others. Thuanus speaking of John Rivius, 'who died in the year 1553, said annos cum seculo 'numerabat; which signifies that Rivius died at fifty-'three years of age. Mr du Rier says on the contrary, that he died a hundred years old. If he committed such faults in his translating a modern author, 'whose meaning may be more easily understood, than 'that of the Antients; one may very well believe, 'that he is sometimes mistaken in his translation of 'Cicero: and indeed Father l'Escalopier in his commentary on the books de Natura Deorum, continually 'censures poor Mr du Rier's translation (5).' I have observed another fault which Mr Teissier takes notice of. Thuanus says, Hulrico Huteno equiti Franco . . . . quadam tenus comparandas. (6) Du Ryer renders these words thus; He may be compared in some manner with Ulric Huten a French knight; and Mr Teissier says upon it, Hutten was a German born in Franconia, and not a Frenchman, as Mr du Ryer says, who did not understand the true signification of the Latin word Francus. (7) Mr Teissier has overlooked such a like mistake in the article of Duaren. Eaque (Duareni Opera) Cujacius ipse plurimi semper fecit, cùm ex quatuor Francisis qui eadem ætate eandem scientiam profitebantur, unum Duarenum sibi placere, ceteros jus tantum deligurire diceret (8). Those words of Thuanus have been rendered by du Ryer in this manner. Nay, Cujas himself very much valued Duaren's works, and said, that of the four French Professors, who taught the same science at the same time, he liked none but Duaren. What a mistake to fancy that Franciscus is the name of a nation, and not a proper name. Thuanus's meaning is this: there were at the same time four Professors of the Civil Law, whose proper names were Francis, and Duaren was the only one of the four whom Cujas esteemed. The three others were Francis Baudouin, Francis Hotman, and Francis Roaldes. I have found many other faults in his version of Thuanus. Here follows an oversight which Colomesius observed. These are his words (9). 'Mr du Ryer . . . has very much obliged pious souls, 'by translating those Psalms (10) into our language 'with so much politeness. Only there is one place, 'wherein I wish he had minded the Latin a little 'better. It is in page 17, & seq. of the second edition, where Mr du Ryer's translation runs thus; and 'as if I was still a child at a hundred years of age, 'though never so old and broken, I do still the actions of 'a child. He should have rendered the Latin words 'thus; and as if I was a hundred years old, I do at 'the age I am all the actions of a child. If those 'Psalms were composed by Antony, king of Portugal, 'Mr du Ryer's mistake cannot be excused; for it is 'certain, that poor prince was not sixty-four years old 'when he died.'

[B] It is thought his translations would have been better, if he had been better paid by the Booksellers.] You will find the following words next to those I have set down out of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (11): 'Which should teach several mean authors, 'who know no more Latin than what they learned at 'School, not to venture upon translations. It requires more capacity than one would think, and 'men that do it not to get a livelihood. This, I say, 'without alluding to this passage of Richelet's Dictionary, page 110 of the second part (12). The late 'du Rier wrote to get bread, that is, only to maintain 'himself.' Here are two passages of Mr Baillet. And therefore it is believed that his learning and skill in languages were but inconsiderable; and that the Booksellers, who maintained him, did not allow him time enough to perfect any thing (13). This is the first passage: the second is still more diverting. '(14) Such writers 'who are resolved never to go back, or who by their 'choice, or by reason of the ill circumstances they are 'in, find themselves necessitated to go forward, whatever obstacle they meet with, would think themselves maimed if they should cut off any thing from 'their writings. And particularly those whose subsistence depends upon the weight and measure of 'their writings, would be afraid of losing a penny, 'if they should strike a needless or ill-placed word 'out of their works. This was the reason why 'William Xylander, Lewis Dolce, John Baudoin, 'Peter du Ryer, and many other mercenary writers, 'and such as receive a salary from Booksellers, thought 'themselves obliged to lengthen and enlarge their 'writings as much as ever they could; so that to preserve their lives they were willing to spoil their 'reputation, some by translating for half a crown, or 'a crown, a sheet, and others by making verses at 'four livres a hundred when they were long, and 'forty pence when they were short, as Mr Furetiere 'says *.' See what I have said of Cardan (15).

[C] There is something about him in the Menagiana.] 'I think Mr du Ryer was a native of Paris. He was 'like Xylander, qui fami magis quam famæ inservichat '. . . a man that studied more to fill his belly, than gain 'reputation. He translated to get money, and died before he had made an end of the translation of Thuanus's history. To avoid expences, he lived out of 'Paris farther than the Piquepuces, where he lodged 'with his wife and children. I went once to see him 'with some friends. He treated us with cherries gathered in a little garden he had. He made a tragedy, intituled, Alcyonée, which is an admirable piece, and 'may be compared with the best pieces of Corneille. 'There are some wonderful verses in it, and it is very well

(1) Baillet, Jugemens des Sçavans, num. 949.

(2) The author adds, that Father l'Escalopier does often complain of the faults he committed throughout his whole translation of Cicero.

(3) Hexameron rustique, pag. 27, 28.

(4) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, October 1684, Art. ii, pag. 774, in the extract of the Elogies taken from Thuanus, published and commented by Mr Teissier.

(5) Note, that l'Escalopier criticizes only the translation of the books de Natura Deorum.

(6) Thuan. lib. xiii, pag. 271, ad ann. 1554.

(7) Teissier, Addit. to the Elogies, Tom. i, pag. 91.

(8) Thuan. lib. xxiii, pag. 471, ad ann. 1559.

(9) Colomies, Biblioth. Choise, pag. 145.

(10) That is, Psalmi confessionales inventi in scrinio Antonii Portugalliæ Regis, Lutetiæ 1595, 16.

(11) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, ubi supra, pag. 775.

(12) According to the Geneva edition 1680; but in favour of those, who have not that edition, I must say, that this is to be found under the word Pain [Bread].

(13) Baillet, Jugemens sur les Traducteurs, num. 949.

(14) Baillet, Prejugez de la grosseur & petitesse des Livres, ch. x, Part ii, pag. 445, 446.

* Nouvell. Allegor. pag. 161, des Troubles du R. d'Elog.

(15) In his article, remark [Y].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' well modelled. Mondofy acted his part very well ' in it (16).'

(16) Menagiana, pag. 366, of the firſt Dutch Edit.

Mr de Vigneul Marville, page 196, of the firſt volume of his Mélanges, mentions a viſit that he and ſome others paid to du Ryer, and ſays, that the collation they had, which conſiſted of milk, cherries, freſh water and brown bread, made them lament the fate of that excellent man.

RIGORISTS. So they call in the Spaniſh Netherlands the Janſeniſts, the Fathers of the Oratory, and, in general, thoſe whoſe maxims are moſt oppoſite to looſe morality (a). A man of Prateolus's character might make a ſect of thoſe Caſuiſts, to inſult the church of Rome about her diviſions. They are falſly accuſed of commanding their penitents to eat hay, and young maids to put on wet ſhifts [A], which, as it is ſaid, occaſions the death of ſome of them (b).

(a) The way of thoſe gentlemen is called Rigoriſm.

(b) See the Difficulties propoſed to Mr Steyaert, Part 1, pag. 31.

[A] They have been accuſed of commanding . . . . maids to put on wet ſhifts.] I do not think that any Caſuiſt, who is a man of ſenſe, tho' never ſo ſevere, preſcribes ſuch a penance to a young woman, tho' it were neceſſary to ſuppreſs a violent temptation to leudneſs; but there are ſome men whoſe rigid morals ſpoil their judgment to ſuch a degree, that it is not unlikely ſome young woman, who revealed too many frailties at a confeſſion, has had ſuch a remedy preſcribed her; and ſince Francis of Aſſiſi thought it expedient for him to get a wife of ſnow (1), he might have very well preſcribed a wet ſhirt to others.

(1) See, above, remark [B], of the article FRANCIS of Aſſiſi.

I have read a memorial printed at Delft in 1696, and containing a ſhort anſwer to the three accuſations of Janſeniſm, Rigoriſm, and Innovation. The author having laid down in it the maxims of JESUS CHRIST goes on thus: ' (2) If thoſe that are called Rigoriſts, ' have more rigorous maxims, a conduct harder to ' fleſh and blood, and a ſeverity which exceeds that ' wholeſome ſeverity, they deſerve to be puniſhed. ' But if it be true, on the contrary, as it is certain ' and evident, that the ſoftneſs of moſt Chriſtians ' forces them to be contented with much leſs, and to ' comply with humane frailty in the application of ' thoſe holy rules; it is a great injuſtice and a ' puniſhable calumny to cry them down as men, ' whoſe maxims are cruel and exceſſively ſevere; ' and it is more certain ſtill, that they who oppoſe ' what they call Rigoriſm, oppoſe the Goſpel . . . . ' It is therefore true, that Rigoriſm is a meer phantom, wherewith they ſcare people to undo good ' men, and the true ſervants of JESUS CHRIST. ' Mr Steyaert acknowledges it himſelf in his theſes ' on the rituals publiſhed within theſe few years. ' His teſtimony cannot be ſuſpected; he ſays there, ' that thoſe who endeavour to obſerve the Rules of the ' church in the direction of ſouls, are thoſe who are ' called Rigoriſts, and that he knows no other. . . . . (3) ' It is certain, on the contrary, that the looſeneſs ' oppoſite to that Rigoriſm, is but too real. (4) ' Mr Steyaert acknowledges it in his theſis of ' Moral Divinity amended. For after having proved ' it by the words of Pope Alexander VII, which ' I have recited he adds; what would certain men ' do, or rather what would they not do, if they ' could alledge any ſuch thing againſt Rigoriſm; ' whereas, in order to prove it, they have nothing ' to produce but ſome idle ſtories as hay, and ' wet ſhifts, preſcribed for a penance?'

(2) Memorial printed at Delft 1696, in 4to, pag. 11.

(3) Ib. p. 14.

(4) Ibid.

RIMINI (GREGORY OF), in Latin Gregorius Ariminenſis, is known by that name, becauſe he was born at Rimini, (Ariminum) a town of Italy. He taught in the univerſity of Paris with great applauſe (a). He was one of the moſt ſubtile ſchool-men of the XIVth century, and the ſubtilty of his wit prompted him to addict himſelf much more to the party of the Nominaliſts than to that of the Realiſts (b). He was an Auguſtin Monk, and was made general of his order at Montpellier in the month of May 1357. He had been the chief profeſſor of the Auguſtins in the convent of Rimini, in the year 1351. He died at Vienna in Auſtria in 1358. His chief works are ſome commentaries on the Maſter of the Sentences, and on St Paul's epiſtles. He was no leſs recommendable for the holineſs of his life, than for his learning and great parts, and he is reckoned among thoſe that have been canonized (c): I muſt ſay ſomething of his opinions. He vigorouſly oppoſed the Divines, who aſſert that by the almighty power of GOD two contrary propoſitions concerning one and the ſame thing may be true at the ſame time (d). I do not apprehend how he durſt queſtion ſuch a doctrine as this, which is an unavoidable conſequence of the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation. He came much nearer the orthodox doctrine of St Auguſtin as to Free-will, than moſt Divines of his time (e); nay, he maintained that an invincible ignorance does not juſtify a man [A]. But he taught a thing, which was objected to Des Cartes, and which would be (a) Elſſius, in Encomiaſtico Auguſtiniano, pag. 247.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Ex eodem, ibid.

(d) See Fonſeca, on Ariſtotle's Metaphyſics, lib. iv, cap. iii, p. m. 651.

(e) See the Scholaſticus Orthodoxus of Paul Ferri, p. 304, 447.

[A] He maintained that an invincible ignorance does not juſtify a man.] Mr Arnauld makes this obſervation in the ninth part of the Difficulties propoſed to Mr Steyaert. It is upon occaſion of a decree of Pope Alexander VIII, which condemns thirty-one propoſitions; the ſecond whereof is this: Tametſi detur ignorantia invincibilis juris naturæ: hæc in ſtatu naturæ lapſæ operantem ex ipſa non excuſat à peccato formali: that is to ſay, ' though there is an ignorance of the law of nature, that is invincible, yet ' in the ſtate of corrupt nature that ignorance does ' not excuſe from a formal ſin thoſe who do what ' is forbidden by the Law of nature.' (1) Mr Arnauld afterwards mentions three opinions. The firſt is that a humane action is not a formal ſin, if he who does it, does not know that he commits a ſin (2). He aſcribes this opinion to the Jeſuits, and affirms that they pretend to ſay nothing but what is reaſonable; becauſe it is agreed on all hands, as they ſuppoſe, that an invincible ignorance juſtifies a man, and that he is reputed to be invincibly ignorant of the ſinfulneſs of what he does, when he has no ſuch thought in the doing it. (3) The ſecond opinion is, that of ' ſeveral Divines, who, ' leſt thoſe falſe ſubtleties ſhould overthrow this ' important maxim, that the ignorance of the law of ' nature does not juſtify a man, which has been ' acknowledged by the Heathens themſelves, and is ' laid down in the Canon-law in theſe words, Ignorantia juris omnibus adultis damnabilis eſt: . . . . . ' Ignorance of the law in all adult perſons is damnable: ' maintain that it ought not to be looked upon as ' invincible, abſolutely ſpeaking, becauſe that law is ' ſuch, that man was made capable to know it, and ' would have known it, if he had continued in the ' ſtate wherein God had placed him; that in the ' ſtate he is in, it is one of the conſequences of original ſin that he knows only the firſt principles of it, ' and is ignorant of the reſt, which he may however know with the aſſiſtance of grace: which, ' according to St Thomas, is ſufficient to oblige men ' to do what they cannot do without grace; though ' that grace, without which they cannot do it, be ' given to ſome out of mercy, and be denied to ' others out of juſtice, as a puniſhment of a preceding ' ſin,

(1) Difficultez propoſées à Mr Steyaërt, Part ix, pag. 234.

(2) Ib. p. 235.

(3) Ib. p. 236.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

be very ſcandalous, if a favourable interpretation was not put upon it; for he taught that GOD can lie or deceive us [B]. They made a great noiſe in Holland againſt a miniſter,

' ſin, if it were but original ſin. Nothing can be ' more expreſs than what this Angelical Doctor teaches ' upon that ſubject, 2. 2. qu. 2. art. 5 (4).' According to this ſecond opinion, which has been entertained by moſt of the ancient Divines, the ignorance of the law of nature did never juſtify any body, becauſe it could not be looked upon as invincible (5). ' The third opinion ' is that of Gregorius Arminenſis, of Eſtius, and ' other Divines, who taking the word invincible in ' another ſenſe, do not ſcruple to aſſert that the ignorance of the law of nature does not juſtify a man, ' even when it might be looked upon as invincible. ' For, ſay they, it may be called invincible with ' reſpect to human means, ſuch as inſtruction, of ' which many people have been deprived, eſpecially ' among the infidels (6). . . . . Thoſe, who, taking ' the word invincible in this ſenſe, have acknowledged ' that a vaſt number of Heathens have been invincibly ignorant of many duties of the law of nature, ' ſhould neceſſarily have ſaid, that the ignorance of ' the law of nature does not clear men from ſin, ' even when it may be called invincible, with reſpect to the want of human, and even divine ' means, when God does not afford thoſe, that ' would be immediately neceſſary to overcome that ' ignorance. We have ſtill ſome theſes publickly ' aſſerted in our days at Rome in the ſchool of the ' Auguſtins, wherein this propoſition is to be found: ' Ignorantia invincibilis juris naturalis non excuſat à peccato. Ex Gregorio in 2. Sent. diſp. 29. qu. 1. art. 2. in reſp. ad arg. ubi ait. Ad probationem: Secundùm omnes Doctores non imputantur homini quæ ex ignorantia ſimpliciter invincibili committuntur: dico quod illud eſt intelligendum de ignorantia quæ non eſt peccatum nec pœna peccati, cujus ille ſit vel fuerit reus. Quod probat ex S Aug. in Ep. ad Sixtum. Ignorantia enim invincibilis eſt pœna peccati Originalis, cujus omnis homo naſcitur reus. So that it is not very ' long ſince they publickly aſſerted at Rome, that an ' invincible ignorance does not clear men from ſin, ' and no body was offended at it; nor was it ' believed that they who aſcribed that opinion to ' St Auguſtin, and to Gregorius Arminenſis, one of ' his moſt faithful diſciples among the ſchool-men, ' impoſed upon that Father. Eſtius did alſo teach the ' ſame doctrine in expreſs words (7).' Mr Arnauld adds (8) that the difference between the two laſt opinions is but a diſpute about words, and that at the bottom each of them does perfectly agree with the general maxim of the Canon-law, and the doctrine of St Auguſtin againſt the Pelagians, and that of St Bernard againſt Abelard; that whatever is done againſt the law of nature is a ſin, in whatever manner one may be ignorant of it, becauſe it is always a puniſhment of ſome ſin, as St Auguſtin ſays in his letter to Sixtus. But the firſt opinion, which is that of the Jeſuits, does totally overthrow the maxim of the Canon-law, and the doctrine of holy men, by generally aſſerting on one hand that an invincible ignorance does always juſtify men; and on the other by ſtretching ſo far the word invincible whenever they pleaſe that if they would ſpeak ſincerely, they ſhould ſay that the ſins of ignorance are never formal ſins, but only material.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Ib. p. 241.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ib. p. 242.

(8) Ib. p. 243, 244.

I thought fit to mention all theſe things, not only becauſe they afford us a ſhort and uſeful inſtruction about a very difficult and important ſubject; but alſo becauſe they diſcover to us that our Gregorius Arminenſis did not uſe any evaſion and ſubterfuge. He dived into the bottom of a doctrine, he perceived the moſt natural conſequences of a principle, and owned them boldly, without ſeeking any equivocal or mitigated expreſſions. I do not ſay this, to condemn thoſe who endeavour to ſoften what they think might offend the readers. They may have a good deſign, and ſome matters are ſo difficult and intricate, that we may very well excuſe thoſe, who uſe ſometimes a different method to explain them. The queſtion about ſins of ignorance is one of that kind: it is ſurrounded with precipices on all ſides. It is therefore no wonder, if thoſe, who walk in ſuch a way, do ſometimes turn aſide, or go back. They grant one thing, and then they oppoſe it: they give with one hand, what they take away with the other. They will grant, that an invincible ignorance excuſes men both in fact and right (9), and then they will alledge a great many examples taken from the holy Scripture, to ſhew that the ſins of ignorance do not excuſe men; and the neceſſary reſult of thoſe quotations muſt be, either that the ignorance of moral duties was never invincible, or that though it be invincible, it does not excuſe a ſinner. If you conſider narrowly all their arguments, you will find that after they have ſuppoſed that ignorance of right or of fact is never a ſin, but when it is not invincible (10); they leave, properly ſpeaking, no caſe, wherein that ignorance is invincible (11); for, they ſay, it may be overcome with reſpect to the paſſion of JESUS CHRIST (12), even when it has never been heard of. They pretend, that if a ſavage of America is ignorant of the matters of fact contained in the New Teſtament, it is his fault, becauſe he has not put himſelf in a diſpoſition that may move God to reveal to him the myſteries of ſalvation, and has made himſelf unworthy of that heavenly favour. Aſk them this queſtion; Could he have that good diſpoſition that you ſpeak of? Could he make a good uſe of the light of nature? They will anſwer you, That he could if he would. If you aſk them whether he could have ſuch a will? I think they will anſwer you that he could not, but that it was only a moral impotency, which is nothing elſe but the ill diſpoſition of his will (13), and a conſequence of the corruption wherewith the children of Adam are born. This is at the bottom the ſame doctrine with that of our Gregory, and I think it were better to ſay plainly, as he does, that an invincible ignorance can be no excuſe, when it proceeds from original ſin, and is a puniſhment for it. It is true, that this doctrine is liable to ſome inconveniences; for it ſeems to lead one by degrees to this aſſertion, frenzy and madneſs can be no excuſe, ſince they ought not to be excluded from the number of evils which have been introduced by ſin, and which ſerve as a puniſhment for ſin. But is not the firſt opinion, mentioned by Mr Arnauld, alſo liable to many inconveniencies (14)? The queſtion is not to chuſe between an opinion free from all intricacies, and one that is very intricate. But the queſtion is to chuſe between two extreams, whereof one is contrary to Philoſophical notions, and the other to the Theological ſyſtems.

(9) See the preface of the Supplement to the Philoſophical Commentary upon theſe words, Compel them to come in, folio  4, verſo, & ſeq.

(10) See Mr Saurin's Reflexions ſur les Droits de la Conſcience, pag. 16.

(11) That is, as to the doctrines and facts that concern religion.

(12) Saurin, ibid. p. 15.

(13) Ib. p. 16.

(14) See the Difficultez propoſées à Mr Steyaërt, ubi ſupra, pag. 244, & ſeq.

[B] He taught that God can lie or deceive us.] Des Cartes laid down, as the only foundation of human knowledge, the perſuaſion we ought to have that God can neither be deceived, nor deceive others. They objected againſt him (15), that, according to Gregory Arminenſis, and ſome other ſchoolmen, God may ſay ſome things that are contrary to his thoughts and decrees, as when he commanded Jonas to preach in Nineveh, that it would be deſtroyed in forty days. If he hardened and blinded Pharaoh, if he ſent a lying ſpirit into ſome prophets, how do you know, ſaid they to Des Cartes, that he cannot ſeduce us? May he not deal with us as a Phyſician deals with ſick perſons, and as a father deals with children? They are often deceived wiſely, and for their good. Could we bear to look upon truth, if God preſented it to us naked? Si Deus puram nobis oſtenderet veritatem quis eam oculus, quæ mentis acies ſuſtinere valeat (16)? Des Cartes anſwered (17), that we muſt diſtinguiſh between God's way of ſpeaking, accommodated to man's capacity, and to the truths that have a relation to mankind, and the way of ſpeaking that relates to abſolute truths. The firſt way of ſpeaking is very frequent in the Scripture; but the laſt ought to be that of Philoſophers. Pharaoh's hardneſs of heart, and ſuch like things, do not denote a poſitive action of God; it was only a privation of grace. It is plain, ſays he, that I did not mean ſuch lies as conſiſt in words, but the inward and formal malice that is to be found in deceit. The decree againſt Nineveh was only comminatory, and depended upon a condition. However, I do not blame continued he (18), thoſe who ſay, that God may, by the miniſtry of his prophets, declare ſome lies free from all manner of malicious

(15) See the ſecond objections againſt Des Cartes's Meditations, p. m. 66.

(16) Object. ſecundæ contra Meditat. Carteſii, p. m. 66.

(17) See Des Cartes's Anſwer to the ſecond Objections, p. m. 75, 76.

(18) Nolim tamen reprehendere illos qui concedunt Deum per Prophetas verbale aliquod mendacium (qualia ſunt illa medicorum, quibus ægrotos decipiunt ut ipſos curent, hoc eſt in quo deſit omnis malitia deceptionis) proferre poſſe. Quinimo etiam, quod majus eſt, ab ipſo naturali inſtinctu, qui nobis à Deo tributus eſt, interdum nos realiter falli videmus, ut cum hydropicus ſitit, &c. Carteſius, ibid. p. 76. Note, that Mr Vogelſang, Neceſſaria Reſponſio ad Præfat. Ludovici Wolzogii, cap. ii, p. 59, & ſeq. does mightily exclaim againſt that paſſage of Des Cartes, as if it overthrew the Scripture, and even the whole Carteſian ſyſtem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

nister, who had said the same thing, but with some restrictions that corrected it [C].

malicious deceit, and like those of Physicians, who, to cure their patients, make them believe some things that are false. Moreover, I confess, that the natural instinct, which God has given us, does sometimes deceive us really; for the nature, which God has given us for the preservation of our body, actually moves the hydropics to do a thing that is prejudicial to them, that is, to drink: but I have shewn in my sixth meditation how this can be reconciled with God's goodness and veracity.

I must observe, by the by, that the objection remains, notwithstanding this answer; for when a man is forced to confess that a general maxim, which he had laid down as the foundation of a certain and demonstrative doctrine, admits of many exceptions, he shakes it to that degree, that it can no longer fix our uncertainties, and there is no case wherein a Sceptic may not use Des Cartes's distinction. If I was deceived, will he say, by the ideas, which represent to me matter as an extended substance, it would be a deceit free from all manner of malice, and perhaps it would be useful to me in the state I am in, which in some respects is a true state of infancy or sickness, whilst my soul is united to my body. A verbal lie is not better than a ideal lie, and cannot be separated from it; for men speak only to excite some ideas in the minds of those who hear them; and may I not suppose that all sorts of ideas relate, not to absolute truths, but to such truths as have a relation to mankind?

I must also observe, by the by, that there are certain things and certain expressions in the Scripture, that will always confound the deepest Metaphysicians. We have here an instance of it. See how Des Cartes was run down by the hypothesis which Gregorius Arminensis pretended to ground on the Scripture. One may easily guess that he was strangely surprised, when he saw that the thundering arguments that fell upon him, came from a place from which he expected it least. He thought he had built upon a rock, for he had built upon the infallibility of God. He expected, without doubt, to have the approbation of Divines as to that fundamental part of his hypothesis, and he was sure at least that no passages of the Scripture would be alledged against him: and yet the storm fell upon him from that very quarter; and it was so violent that he was forced to yield. So vain are the thoughts and hopes of men! But, on the other side, we may very well wonder that Des Cartes made so weak a resistance. His quick surrender is a sign that he was not at all acquainted with books of Divinity. If he had been versed in that reading, he might have known a great many explications and solutions of those Scripture passages that Gregory Arminensis built upon, and they might have afforded him a method of disputing, whereby he might have come off. It is likely some will say that I am mistaken, and that he could not well make use of that method; for he was only for evident reasons, and always preferred what is clearer to what is less clear. Now the passages that were objected against him out of the Holy Scripture, are infinitely clearer than the explanations and glosses of the commentators; which is the reason why he surrendred so soon. I can answer this objection, and I say before hand, that this great Philosopher should at least have insisted more than he did on the nature of the expressions made use of by the holy writers, to accommodate themselves to the capacity of the people. Vulgar minds being not able to raise themselves to the most perfect being, it was necessary that the Prophets should bring down God to man, and make him stammer with us, as a nurse stammers with a child, whom she suckles. Hence it is that there are so many expressions in the Scripture, importing that God repents, that he is angry, that he will inquire whether a thing has happened, that he will alter his mind if men obey, or do not obey him, and a thousand such things, that are inconsistent with infinite perfection. Des Cartes did not fail to shew what difference there is between those expressions, and those of a true Metaphysician; but he touched too slightly upon it, and lost all the advantage he might have drawn from it; for he yielded notwithstanding, to the pretension of Gregory Arminensis. He should not have done it, he should have affirmed constantly, that the passages of the Scripture, wherein it is said that God does sometimes deceive, ought never to be literally understood, and ought to be expounded, as those that say that he repents, and which ascribe to him some other human frailty. He should have shewn at large, that a Philosopher ought not to have a regard to those passages of the word of God, when the greatness of the Supreme Being is to be represented. Mr Regis was very sensible of this: I will lay down as a maxim, says he (19), 'That 'whenever I design to speak of God exactly, I must 'not consult myself, nor speak according to custom, 'but raise my mind above all creatures, to consult the 'vast and immense idea of the most perfect being: 'although I may be allowed to say in a moral treatise, 'that God has repented, that he is angry, &c. Yet 'those and such like expressions cannot be allowed 'me in a treatise purely Metaphysical, in which one 'must speak exactly.'

(19) Regis, Systême de Philosophie, Tom. i. pag. 168, Edit. of Lyons 1691, in 12mo.

Let us remember, that if the Scripture does often represent God under popular, and consequently very false, notions, to accommodate itself to the capacity of those, for whom God designed the revelation; it affords us in other places the corrective that we want, I mean the description of the Infinite Being in his immutable and most perfect majesty.

[C] They made a great noise in Holland against a minister, who had said the same thing, but with some restrictions that corrected it.] I mean Mr de Wolzogue. He was professor and minister of the Walloon church at Utrecht, in the year 1666, when a book came out, intituled, Philosophia S. Scripturæ interpres, Exercitatio paradoxa. It appeared a very pernicious piece to the orthodox Divines, and worse than a Socinian book. Mr de Wolzogue was one of those who confuted it; but he was so unlucky in his performance, that they made as much or more noise against his confutation (20), than against the book he had confuted. Here is one of the things that gave the greatest offence. '(21) I am to prove in the third place, 'that God will not deceive any body: though I need 'not take much pains to prove it. When God says 'a thing, it is sufficient to make us apprehend that 'he will not deceive men. I say, that he will not 'deceive, lest one should think that he cannot do it, 'if he would. For as any one, who goes about to 'deceive another, is reputed to be in some measure 'above him in that respect, and to surpass him either 'in address, or strength, or in some other faculty 'whatever it be; and because God's wisdom, and 'power, and all his other attributes are infinite; it 'is plain that creatures, even the most perfect of them, 'because they are finite, as being creatures, may be 'led into error by the infinite Creator. But I deny 'that he will do it. For we can scarce think of an 'intention to deceive, without believing that there is 'some malice in it, whereby we endeavour to impose 'upon the person, whom we dare not assault without 'cunning and deceit; or that there is a weakness of 'mind, which makes one doubt of a good success without it. Each of those two things betrays a great 'imperfection: they must not be therefore ascribed in 'the least to him, whom we look upon as a most 'perfect Being (22). They, who wrote against Mr de Wolzogue (23), complained very much of this proposition, God might deceive, if he would. It is certain that it sounds ill, and tho' the explanation the author added to it, reduced it to the common opinion of the orthodox Divines, that it is impossible God should deceive any body, yet it had been better for him to abstain from those offensive words, which at the bottom were of no use to the question in hand, and were a meer needless parenthesis. It seems to me that men in cold blood would not have carried their censure farther; only they might have added to it, that an author, who appears so much addicted to Des Cartes, ought not to use a great compass of words in order to say that God cannot deceive. He ought to say it in one word, and not in circumlocutions that require explanation. They who express themselves thus, the reprobate might love God, if they would, but their corruption is so great, that they cannot be willing to love him, say at the bottom the same thing with those, who affirm roundly, that it is impossible the reprobate should love God. This last proposition being shorter, is

(20) It is intitled, De scripturarum interpretæ adversus Exercitatorem paradoxum libri duo, and was printed in 1667.

(21) It is pag. 24, of the 1st Edit. and pag. 11, of the 2d Edit. of De Script. interpr. &c.

(22) Wolzogen, Apologie pour le Synode de Naerden, Part iv, pag. 160.

(23) See Mr Vander Wayen, pag. 19, of his book pro vera & genuina Reformatorum sententia præliminia in negotio de interprete Scripturæ. Mr Vigelius, in the 2d chapter of the necessary responso ad paradoxum Ludovici Wolzogii. Jake Brewer, a Scotch minister, pag. 61, of his Wolzogius cum prodit. and p. 1 of the other.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

is preferable to the other. In like manner, ſince it is a ſhorter expreſſion to ſay, God cannot deceive, than to ſay, He might deceive, if he would; but he is ſo holy, that he cannot have the will to deceive; why did Mr de Wolzogue uſe ſo many windings and turnings in his diſcourſe? However it be, there is more reaſon to wonder that the cenſure was not wholly confined within thoſe bounds, than to ſee that the Sieur de Labadie, who, in the name of the Walloon church of Middleburg, proſecuted Mr de Wolzogue in the Walloon ſynod, durſt accuſe him of Heterodoxy for ſaying that God cannot have the will to deceive us. 'Mr de 'Labadie objects againſt me, in his Latin book, as 'an error contrary to the Scripture; but what I ſaid 'that God might deceive if he would, but what I added to it, that God cannot have the will to deceive. 'He pretends, that I have not ſaid enough, and aſſerts that God will and can deceive. He objects the 'Scripture againſt me, and aſks, What will Wolzogue 'ſay to the Hiſtory related in the 22d chapter of the '1ſt book of Kings, and eſpecially to the words of the '22d verſe? And the Lord ſaid, Thou ſhalt perſwade him, and prevail alſo: go forth, and do ſo. Now 'therefore behold, the LORD hath put a lying 'ſpirit in the mouth of all theſe thy prophets, and 'the LORD hath ſpoken evil concerning thee. 'When God willed and commanded that Ahab ſhould be 'ſeduced and put a lying ſpirit (for ſo Junius and Tremellius ſpeak) muſt he be charged with weakneſs of mind or 'malice (24)?' See the margin (25). I ſhall ſet down another paſſage, whereby it will appear that the adverſaries of Mr de Wolzogue were not offended at Labadie's temerity. It is a very long paſſage; but ſince it contains a doctrine, whereby the cenſured propoſition is cleared and explained in a ſolid manner, the reader will not think it ſtrange to find it in this place. Here are therefore Mr de Wolzogue's words in the preface to a collection of Judgments, which he publiſhed in 1669 (26).

'(27) The principal objection, and which makes 'the greateſt noiſe, is what I have ſaid, that God can 'deceive, if he will. For it ſeems my meaning is, 'that God can deceive. But I think there is nothing 'more harmleſs than what I have ſaid, and that it 'will be found to be very Orthodox, if it be carefully examined. For if there be any thing to be ſaid 'againſt it, it muſt be in the ſenſe, or in the words. 'As for the ſenſe, I lay down that it is impoſſible 'God ſhould ever deceive any body, as it is impoſſible he ſhould lie or deny himſelf; this I have ſaid 'in expreſs words in ſeveral places of my book; I 'made it the foundation of my whole diſpute, and I 'think it is ſo important a truth, that I believe we 'can have no aſſurance of any thing in the world, nor 'of our ſalvation without it. Nevertheleſs, in order 'to explain the nature of deceit, I diſtinguiſh the will 'of deceiving from the qualifications neceſſary to perform that deceit. The will of deceiving is always 'ſinful, and contains properly the imperfection that 'is in deceit; but the qualifications that might ſerve 'to put that deceit in execution are good, and contain 'always ſome perfection (28). Let us conſider two 'men, one of which is ſtupid and malicious, and the 'other a virtuous and able man: it may be ſaid of the 'firſt, that he is deſirous to deceive ſome body, but 'that he has not wit enough for it; it is not for 'want of will, but for want of power. On the contrary, it will be ſaid of the ſecond, that he has all 'the wit that is requiſite to impoſe upon ſimple peo'ple, but that he is too honeſt to do it. Now if we 'apply this to God, it is moſt certain that he will 'not deceive, he cannot have ſuch a will, he is too 'perfect for it, being perfection it ſelf; but as for the 'qualities requiſite for the execution of a deceit, ſuch 'as wiſdom and power, without doubt God is endowed with them; not that he can at any time 'make uſe of his wiſdom and power to perform a 'deceit, for this ſtill ſuppoſes a will to deceive; but 'he has however the wiſdom and power requiſite for 'the execution of a deceit; and it is in this ſenſe, I 'ſay, that God can deceive if he will, but that he 'cannot will it; that is God cannot deceive, not for 'want of wiſdom or power; but by reaſon of the 'perfection of his will. So that theſe words, God can 'deceive if he will, ought to be paraphraſed thus, God 'has all the qualifications neceſſary for the execution of 'deceit; he is wiſe, powerful, and conſtant; he has 'whatever might ſerve for the performance of a de'ceitful deſign, if he was willing to deceive; but it 'is impoſſible for him to have ſuch a will; it is alſo 'impoſſible that he ſhould uſe his power for the execution of a deceit; from whence I conclude, that 'it is impoſſible he ſhould deceive. The meaning of 'which is, that God is moſt wiſe and powerful. Who 'will deny it? But perhaps it will be ſaid that there 'is ſome harſhneſs in the words. Suppoſe there was; 'is it ſuch a crime as deſerves all the noiſe that is 'made about it? If all harſh and offenſive words were 'ſtruck out of the books of our Divines, there would 'be many razures in them. Calvin himſelf would 'not be free from cenſure concerning the doctrine of 'Predeſtination. But as for the doctrine in queſtion, 'I maintain that the Scripture ſays more of it than 'I do. It ſays, 1 Kings xxii. that the Lord has put 'a lying ſpirit in the mouth of the falſe prophets. In the 'twentieth chapter of Jeremiah, ver. 7. O Lord, 'thou haſt deceived me, and I was deceived. For ſo 'it is tranſlated in the Engliſh Bible, and does not 'our verſion ſay in Ezekiel xiv. 9. If the prophet be 'deceived when he hath ſpoken a thing, I the Lord have 'deceived that prophet. Did I advance any thing that 'ſeems at firſt ſo ſtrange as this? I am not ignorant 'of the ſenſe that is put upon thoſe paſſages; but I 'wiſh they would likewiſe have admitted that which 'I put upon my aſſertion, without charging me 'with the appearance of harſhneſs that is to be found 'in the words. That which is ſurprizing, is, that 'Mr de Labadie maintains that God can and will 'deceive, and that he has deceived: he finds fault 'with me becauſe I ſaid only that God can deceive if he 'will, but that he cannot will it; and yet none of 'our zealots reprove him for it.'

Mr de Wolzogue's adverſaries were not ſatisfied with this explication. Mr Vogelſang confuted it with great contempt and indignation, and obſerved, among other things, that it is likely Des Cartes took from the ſchoolmen his diſtinction between the power and the will to deceive; as if that power was a kind of perfection, whereas the will to deceive is an imperfection. He will have it that Des Cartes hunted after the glory of invention, by digging up the ordures of the ſchoolmen (29); and he quotes a paſſage of the fifth chapter of the fourth book of Ariſtotle's Topics, where it is ſaid that the faculty of doing moral evil is in God, and in a good man. He alledges alſo theſe words of Thomas Aquinas, which explain that paſſage of Ariſtotle. 'Deus peccare non poteſt, quia eſt 'omnipotens. Quamvis Philoſophus dicat in quarto 'Topicorum, quod poteſt Deus & ſtudioſus (vir probus) prava agere. Sed hoc intelligitur vel ſub con'ditione, cujus antecedens ſit impoſſibile, ut puta, ſi 'dicamus quod poteſt Deus prava agere ſi velit. Nihil 'enim prohibet conditionalem eſſe veram, cujus ante'cedens & conſequens eſt impoſſibile; ſicut ſi dicatur, 'ſi homo eſt aſinus, habet quatuor pedes. Vel, ut 'intelligatur, quod Deus poteſt aliqua agere, quæ 'nunc prava videntur, quæ tamen, ſi ageret, bona 'eſſent. Vel loquitur ſecundum communem opinionem 'gentilium, qui homines dicebant transferri in Deos, 'ut Jovem & Mercurium (30). - - - - God cannot ſin, 'becauſe he is omnipotent: tho' Ariſtotle ſays in his fourth 'book of Topics, that the faculty of doing moral evil, is 'in God and in good men. But this is underſtood either 'under a condition, the antecedent of which is impoſſible, 'as if we ſhould ſay that God can do evil if he will. 'For nothing hinders a conditional propoſition from being 'true, tho' both the antecedent and conſequent part of it 'be impoſſible: for example we may ſay, if a man be 'an aſs, he has four feet. Or Ariſtotle means that 'God can do ſome things which now ſeem evil, but 'would nevertheleſs be good if he ſhould do them. Or 'laſtly he ſpeaks according to the common opinion of the 'Gentiles, who ſaid that men were changed into gods, as 'Jupiter and Mercury.' He maintains that Thomas Aquinas made himſelf ridiculous, by pretending to juſtify that opinion of Ariſtotle. He is very ſevere upon him: I ſhall only mention what he ſays upon the laſt point. 'Quod ultimo loco hariolatur, Ariſtotelem forte ſic locutum fuiſſe juxta communem 'opinionem Gentilium, qui homines dicebant transferri in 'Deos, ut Jovem & Mercurium; quam hoc plane frivolum eſt? Etenim, juxta communem Gentilium 'opinionem, Dii non modo facultatem habebant mala vel turpiſſima perpetrandi, ſed & promptam ſane 'voluntatem. Quapropter eorum poëtæ furta Numinum & impoſturas, & rixas, & pugnas, & mu'tuorum

(24) Wolzogue, ubi ſupra, pag. 154, 155.

(25) Note, that Mr de Wolzogue obſerves afterwards, that he gave Mr de Ladadie notice of that overſight in the ſynod of Naërden, and ſince that time, adds he, he has mended his opinion, having obſerved that it was an impiety to ſay that God will and does effectively deceive men.

(26) That is, Jugemens de pluſieurs Profeſſeurs & Docteurs en Theologie qui prononcent Orthodoxe le Livre de Louys de Wolzogue de l'Interprete de l'Ecriture.

(27) Wolzogue, Avant propos des Jugemens, &c.

(28) Compare with this what I have ſaid in the remark [A], of the article RANGOUZE.

(29) Solet Carteſius è putidiſſimis antiquorum philoſophorum atque Scholaſticorum liberalius ineptientium ſordibus excrementa præcipue fœdiora ſæpenumero deligere, uti de placitis obſoletis, & meritis ſepultis oblivione, ſubtilitatis inſolitæ miſer gloriolam ſubripiat. Reinerus Vogelſangius, Viatenſis V. D. M. & S. S. Theologiæ Profeſſor in Eccleſia & Gymnaſio Sylvaducenſi, ad Præfat. Lud. Wolzogii neceſſaria reſponſ. pag. 49.

(30) Thomas Aquinas, XXV Quæſt. Art. III, apud Vogelſang. ibid. p. 51.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'tuorum odiorum rancores, & libidines & adulteria 'vulgo decantavere. Quod plane contra Philosophi 'scopum & mentem est, qui mala perpetrandi vo- 'luntatem Deo penitus abrogat, etsi facultatem pra- 'va faciendi concesserit (31). - - - - As to his last con- 'jecture, viz. that perhaps Aristotle spoke according to 'the common opinion of the Gentiles who said that 'men were changed into gods, &c. how frivolous is 'it? For according to the common opinion of the Gentiles 'the Gods had not only the power, but also the will 'to commit the basest actions.' Hence it was that their 'Poets chose for their ordinary themes, the thefts of the 'gods, their frauds and contentions, their battles and 'mutual animosities, their lusts and adulteries. But this 'plainly contradicts the scope and meaning of the Philoso- 'pher, who takes from God the will at the same time 'that he leaves him the power to do evil.' He adds (32) some other passages of the Scripture to those that were quoted by Mr de Wolzogue, and shews how they are to be understood. See the margin (33).

(31) Vogelsang. ibid. pag. 52.

(32) Ib. p. 64.

(33) Note, That the Walloon synod declared Wolzogue's book to be orthodox.

RINUCCINI (OTTAVIO), a gentleman of Florence (a), followed, into France, Mary de Medicis, with whom he was in love [A], and gained the esteem of Henry IV, who made him gentleman of his bed-chamber (b). He was a man of wit, and a handsome person, polite, eloquent, and a very good Poet, and, with the advantage of these good qualities, he applied himself very much to make his court to the ladies (c). His inventions considerably enriched the Italian poetry; for he was the first who made verses after the manner of Anacreon, and composed pieces which were set to Music, and acted on the stage (d) [B]. It is true, every one does not agree that he was (a) Crescimbeni, l'Istoria della volgar Poëfia, pag. 149.

(b) Fu Gentiluomo della Camera del Re Christianissimo. Jacobo Rilli, Notizie Letterarie ed Istoriche intorno a gli Uomini illustri dell' Accad. Fiorent. Part i, p. 258.

(c) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. I, pag. 61, 62.

(d) Crescimbeni, ubi supra.

[A] He followed into France Mary de Medicis with whom he was in love.] Nicius Erythræus tells us this particular. Mariam Medicæam, says he (1), Galliæ Reginam, non majori ambitione quam vanitate adamavit: quam etiam honoris gratia, prosecutus est euntem in Galliam. Sed postea reversus in Italiam, omissis amatoriis nugis, ad quas erat mirè propensus, tandem ad se rediit, quæque ratione non perspexerat, satietate abjecit, experiendo contempsit, totumque ad pietatis amorem & studium animum contulit: in quo demum Florentiæ diem obiit extremum. Here is the paraphrase made by Mr Baillet on these Latin words, 'Ottavio Rinuccini . . . . . 'was known in France under the most disadvantage- 'ous character in the world, because he had the folly 'and indiscretion to discover the motives which had 'induced him to put himself in the retinue of queen 'Mary de Medicis (2). . . . . I must add for his repu- 'tation, that he changed his life and practice to- 'wards the end of his days, that the virtue and wis- 'dom of our queen, which had very much mortified 'his inclination, opened his eyes, and that returning 'into Italy with a sincere repentance and salutary 'shame, he applied himself to exercises of piety 'which he never forsook till his death (3).'

(1) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. I, pag. 62.

(2) Baillet, Jugem. sur les Poëtes, num. 1375.

(3) Ibid.

[B] He was the first who . . . . composed pieces which were set to Music and acted on the stage.] Nicius Erythræus ascribes to him four Operas, that of Daphne (4), that of Eurydice, that of Arethusa, and that of Ariadne (5); but Mr Rilli makes no mention of Arethusa, tho' he had made great enquiries after what related to this great Poet. He tells us (6) that the Daphne, represented before the Grand Duchess by James Corsi, was printed at Florence in the year 1600, in 4to. That the Eurydice, acted at the marriage of Mary de Medicis with Henry IV, was printed at the same place in the year 1600, in 4to. That the Ariadne, acted at the marriage of the prince of Mantua with the Infanta of Savoy, was printed at the same place in the year 1608, in 4to. That the Mascherata dell' Ingrate, a ballet danced at the marriage of the same prince of Mantua, was printed at Mantua in the year 1608, in 4to. That the Versi Sacri cantati nella Cappella della Sereniffima Arcbiduchessa d' Austria Granduchessa di Toscana, and the Ode in lode de' Giuocatori di pallone, were printed at Florence in the year 1622, in 4to, by the care of Peter Francis Rinuccini the author's son. That there were others printed in single sheets, besides sonnets, songs, &c. inserted among the works of other authors, and that there are a great many pieces in manuscript that deserve to be published. He cites (7) a passage of Peter Francis Rinuccini (8), which tells us, that Ottavio Rinuccini deserved great commendation for the Versi Sciolti in his panegyric on the birth of Lewis XIII, and that he had designed to translate the six books of St Catherine into that kind of verse; but that he had only translated the first, which they were resolved to publish, tho' the author had not put the finishing hand to it. This is what Mr Rilli tells us concerning the works of our Ottavio. Could he be ignorant of what relates to the opera of Arethusa which Erythræus mentions (9)?

(4) It is Daphium instead of Daphnem, in the printed book of Nicius Erythræus.

(5) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. I, pag. 101.

(6) Jacobo Rilli, Notizie intorno a gli Uomini illustri dell' Accademia Fiorentina, Part i, pag. 258, 260.

(7) Ibid. pag. 259.

(8) Taken from a letter to the academy de gli Alterati.

(9) Note, that at pag. 145, of Pinacotheca tertia, he mentions the three others, but not Arethusa.

But to come to the point, let us copy a long passage of the epistle dedicatory to the Eurydice (10). It will inform us, that Rinuccini thought that he was the first among the moderns that had attempted to introduce Music on the stage; but he was mistaken, and knew not what I mention in another place (11). We shall also see there that James Peri (12) was the person that composed the Music for the pastoral of Daphne, and afterward for the opera of Eurydice. 'E' stata 'openione di molti, Christianissima Regina, che gli 'antichi Greci e Romani cantassero sulle Scene le Tra- 'gedie intiere; ma sì nobile maniera di recitare, non 'che rinnovata, ma nè pur che io sappia fin qui è 'stata tentata da alcuno; & ciò mi credev' io per di- 'fetto della Musica moderna, di gran lunga all' antica 'inferiore; ma pensiero sì fatto mi tolse interamente 'dall' animo Mes. Jacobo Peri, quando udito l'inten- 'zione del Sig. Jacopo Corsi, e mia, mise con tanta 'grazia sotto le note la Favola di Dafne, composta da 'me, solo per fare una semplice prova di quello, che 'potesse il Canto nell' età nostra, che incredibilmente 'piacque a que' pochi che l'udirono; onde preso ani- 'mo, e data miglior forma alla stessa Favola, e di 'nuovo rappresentandola in Casa il Sig. Jacopo, fu 'ella non solo dalla Nobiltà di tutta questa Patria fa- 'vorita, ma dalla Sereniss. Granduchessa, e dagl' il- 'lustrissimi Cardinali dal Monte e Montalto, udita, e 'commendata; ma molto maggior favore, e fortuna 'ha sortito l'Euridice messa in Musica dal medesimo 'Peri, con arte mirabile, e da altri non più usata, 'havendo meritato dalla benignità e magnificenza del 'Sereniss. Granduca d'essere rappresentata in nobilis- 'sima Scena, alla presenza di V. M. del Cardinal Le- 'gato, e di tanti Principi, e Signori d'Italia e di 'Francia; la onde cominciando io a conoscere quanto 'simili Rappresentazioni in Musica fiano gradite, ho 'voluto recare in luce queste due, perchè altri di me 'piu intendenti s'ingegnino di accrescere, e migliorare 'sì fatte Poesie di maniera, che non abbiamo invidia 'a quelle antiche tanto celebrate da' Nobili Scrittori '(13). - - - It has been the opinion of many persons, Most 'Christian Queen, that the antient Greeks and Romans 'sung their tragedies throughout on the stage; but so 'noble a manner of reciting has not been revived, nor 'that I know of so much as attempted by any one till 'now; and this I thought was owing to the defect of 'the modern Music, which is far inferior to the ancient. 'But Mr Jacob Peri made me intirely alter my opinion, 'when upon hearing the intention of Mr Jacob Corsi and 'my self, he so beautifully set to Music the pastoral of 'Daphne which I had composed, meerly to make a trial 'what song could do in our age. It pleased to an in- 'credible degree, those few that heard it. From this I 'took courage. The same piece being put into better form, 'and represented anew in the house of Mr Peri, was not 'only favoured by all the nobility of the country, but 'heard and commended by the most serene Grand Duchess, 'and the most illustrious cardinals dal Monte and Mon- 'talto. But the Eurydice has met with more favour and 'success, being set to Music by the same Peri with won- 'derful art, that is not used by any other, and having 'been thought worthy to be represented on the stage, by 'the bounty and magnificence of the most serene Grand Duke, 'in the presence of your majesty, the cardinal Legate, and 'so many princes and gentlemen of Italy and France; from 'whence beginning to know how well the like musical 'representations were relished, I resolved to publish these 'two,

(10) To Mary de Medicis, queen of France.

(11) In the remark, of the article SULPITIUS (John).

(12) Nicius Erythræus, Pinac. I, pag. 61, calls him Jacobus Peru; but at pag. 144, of the Pinacotheca tertia, he calls him Jacobus Peritius.

(13) Ottavio Rinuccini, apud Jacobum Rilli, ubi supra, pag. 258, 259.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was the inventer of these two things. Some say that Gabriel Chiabrera gave birth to the Anacreontic songs (e), and that Emilio Caveleri, a gentleman of Rome, wrote Operas before our Rinuccini (f). However that be, it cannot be denied that the dramatic pieces of the latter, in the pomp of machinery, the decorations of the scenes, and the ability of the Actors, excelled all that had been done before of that kind (g). I do not believe that he had reason to say that he first introduced ballets in France [C]. After his return to Florence, he grew weary of the follies of love to which he formerly had a very singular propensity (h). What reason had not been able do, satiety and experience did, giving him a disgust to those things, which had too much possessed his mind. He turned his thoughts inward upon himself, and applied himself wholly to piety, and so he died at Florence (i). Several of his Poems were printed there after his death, by the care of PETER FRANCIS RINUCCINI, his son, who dedicated them to Lewis XIII in the year 1624.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. I, pag. 62.

(g) Ibid.

(h) See the remark [A].

(i) Nic. Erythræus, ubi supra.

'two, to the end that others of greater abilities than 'my self may be induced to carry on and improve this 'kind of poetry in such manner, that we may have no 'occasion to envy those antient pieces which are so much 'celebrated by noble writers.' Let us add to this a curious passage of Father Menestrier: 'These dramatic 'pieces of Music were preserved in carousals and in 'ballets, the overtures of which were almost constant-'ly made in dialogues and recitals of Musicians, who 'sung either in carts or other machines. At last Ot-'tavio Rinuccini, a Florentine Poet, having a particu-'lar talent at expressing in his verses all kind of pas-'sions, found means to adapt Music and singing to 'them so well, that they neither destroyed any part 'of the beauty of the verses, nor marred the distinct 'understanding of the words, which are often in a 'manner lost by the windings, turns, and quivers, of 'the voice. He consulted in this Jacob Corsi, a 'gentleman of Florence, who understood Music, and 'delighted in fine things, and both calling in Gia-'como Cleri (14), and Giulio Caccini, excellent masters 'in Music, they together contrived a piece which was 'represented in the house of Mr Corsi in the presence 'of the grand duke, and grand duchess of Tuscany, 'and the cardinals Monti and Montalto, with so much 'success, that this piece which was the Loves of Apol-'lo and Daphne served for a model to the Eurydice, 'which was represented a little after at the same place. 'Claudio de Monteverde, an excellent Musician, com-'posed the Ariane (15) on the model of these two; 'and being made master of the Music at St Mark's in 'Venice, he introduced these kind of representations 'which are become so famous by the magnificence of 'the theatres and dress, by the delicacy of voices, 'harmony of concerts, and the learned compositions 'of this Monteverde, Soriano, Giovanelli, Teofilo, 'and several other great masters (16).'

(14) I think Cleri is an error of the press for Peri.

(15) I do not know whether it should not have been said that Claudius de Monteverde composed not the Ariane, but the Music of the Ariadne of Rinuccini. However, this last piece deserved to be mentioned as well as Daphne and Eurydice.

(16) Menestrier, Représentat. en Musique, pag. 263, & seq.

These are citations which will be read with pleasure by those who love to know the origin and progress of every thing. Observe that Rinuccini was not a comedian (17).

(17) He was a Comedian in great repute at Florence. Baillet, Jugem. sur les Poëtes, num. 1375.

[C] I do not believe that they are in the right to say that he first introduced ballets into France.] His son gives him this praise: 'Qual fu, says he (18), ne' 'suoi Versi la facilità, quale la dolcezza veramente 'nata all' armoniosa melodia? Quindi nacque, che i 'Balli, quali egli ancora primiero condusse in Francia, 'accompagnati dalla Musica piacquero mirabilmente. '--- How easy was the stile of his verses, and what 'a sweetness truly calculated for a melodious harmony? Hence it was that the ballets, which he also first introduced into France, being accompanied with Music, 'were wonderfully liked.' He came into France with Mary de Medicis in the year 1600. Now we know that ballets were in use before that time: I will bring a proof of it which will be very agreeable to those that are pleased with the History of Inventions. 'Beau-'joyeux was an Italian named Balthasarini, one of the 'best violins in Europe: the marshal de Brissac when 'he governed Piedmont, sent him to the queen (19) 'with all the band of violins under his direction. 'The queen made him her valet de chambre, and 'this Balthasarini taking the name Beaujoyeux, be-'came so famous at court for his inventions of bal-'lets, concerts, entertainments, and representations, 'that he was the only person talked of. It was he 'who made the ballet for the marriage of the duke 'de Joyeuse with Madam de Vaudemont sister to the 'queen. This ballet was published under the title of 'Ballet comique de la Reine, fait aux Noces de Monsieur 'le Duc de Joyeuse & Mademoiselle de Vaudemont sa 'Sœur, par Balthasar de Beaujoyeux Valet de Chambre 'du Roi & de la Reine sa Mere. One of the court 'Poets wrote these verses in his praise.

(18) In his letter to the academy de gli Alterati, apud Rilli, ubi supra, pag. 259.

(19) Viz. Catherine de Medicis.

Beaujoyeux qui premier des cendres de la Grece
Fais retourner au jour le dessein & l'addresse
Du Balet compassé en son tour mesuré
Qui d'un esprit Divin toy-méme te devance,
Geometre inventif, unique en ta science;
Si rien d'honneur s'acquiert le tien est assuré.

Great Beaujoyeux, who first from Greece's urn
Do'st teach the sprightly ballet to return,
Contriv'd with judgment and proportion'd well;
Thou who divinely do'st thy self excel,
Whose fancy geometrical and fine
Displays a science that is wholly thine,
If endless honour can at all be got,
Then rest assur'd that it shall be thy lot.

(20) Menestr'er, ubi supra, pag. 272, 273.

'Beaulieu and Salmon masters of the king's Music as-'sisted him in the composition of the recitativos and 'airs in the ballet. La Chesnaye the king's Almoner 'made part of the verses, and James Patin the king's 'painter served him in the decorations (20).' This ballet was danced in the year 1582 (21). See in Father Menestrier (22) the description of the machine with which it was introduced.

(21) See the remark [C], of the article GOUDIMEL.

(22) In his Traitté des Ballets anciens & modernes, pag. 267, 268.

RITIUS (MICHAEL), in Italian Riccio, a Civilian of Naples, and author of several books [A], flourished in the beginning of the XVIth century. He was banished by the faction that opposed France, and retired to the court of Lewis XII, who honoured him with the place of counsellor in the parliament of Paris (a). La Croix du Maine calls him Michael de Ris, and affirms that he was counsellor to the king in his great council, and in the parliament of Paris in 1505, and that he was commonly called the advocate of Naples (b). When the Cardinal d'Amboise entered Milan, after Lewis Sforza had been made

(a) Baudier, Hist. du Cardinal d'Amboise, pag. 44.

(b) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. p. 331.

(1) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. p. 331. Note, that du Verdier Vau-Privas has not mentioned this book.

[A] He is the author of several books.] He composed at Blois in the year 1505, A treatise of the duty of soldiers and their privileges, which was printed at Paris the same year, and dedicated to Lewis XII (1). He wrote three books de Regibus Francorum, three de Regibus Hispaniæ, one de Regibus Hierosolymarum, four de Regibus Neapolis & Siciliæ, two de Regibus Hungariæ, which were printed by John Frobenius at Basil in the year 1517 in 4to. We find there a preface by the author written at Rome in the year 1505, and another preface by James Parrhasius, who affirms that the stile of the work is pure, free, and natural, purus,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google made prisoner, he appointed Michael Ritius to answer the harangue made by the Milanese to obtain pardon for their disobedience (c). Lewis XII sent the same Ritius to Genoa, in the year 1506, to offer an amnesty to the revolted inhabitants (d). The remonstrances of this Orator were of no effect.

(c) See Gaguin in his 11th book of the History of France, fol. m. 308 verso.

(d) Gaguin, lib. xi, fol. m. 192.

purus, candidus, illaboratus (2). Ludovicus Vives says that there are abundance of faults in the proper names in these Histories of Ritius. Michael Ritius Reges aliquot Christianos collegit, in quo opere multa sunt locorum, hominum, & familiarum corrupta nomina, vitio credo describentium (3). His History of the kings of France reaches from Pharamond to Lewis XII, and was printed at Rome in the year 1505, and dedicated to Guy de Rochefort chancellor of France (4). That of the kings of Spain begins with Gargoris, and ends with Philip I, father of Charles V (5).

(2) Taken from Gesner, Biblioth. fol. 513.

(3) Lud. Vives, de tradendis Disciplinis, lib. v, pag. 359, Edit. Lugd. 1551, in 8*vo.*

(4) Vossius, de Histor. Lat. pag. 667.

(5) Valæus, Chron. Hisp. cap. iv, pag. 21, Edit. Colon. 1577, in 8*vo.*

RITTANGELIUS (JOHN STEPHEN), a converted Jew, was of Bamberg in Germany, and lived in the XVIIth century. He was professor of the Oriental languages in the university of Konigsberg, and published some books [A], which shew that he was zealous for the Christian religion, and a learned man. He designed to publish some other books, and in order to it he made a voyage to Amsterdam; but his manuscripts were torn to pieces by privateers, who took the ship in which he had embarked. He himself relates this adventure in the Epistle Dedicatory of his Jezirah. Some say he was born a Jew. The Journalists of Utrecht affirm it positively (a), but others say, that being a Roman Catholic he turned a Jew, and afterwards Protestant. They are the words of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, in August 1699, pag. 212. But some are of opinion that he never professed Judaism [B]. He was still living the thirty-first

(a) Biblioth. Librorum novorum, Mens. Sept. & Oct. 1698, pag. 674.

[A] He published some books.] He had said in his notes upon the book Jezirah (1), that the Chaldaic paraphrase on the Scripture affords very good arguments against the Jews and the Anti-Trinitarians. Whereupon a Socinian fell upon him in a book he published under the name of Irenopolita. Rittangelius answered it, and intituled his answer Libra veritatis, and dedicated it to John Casimir, king of Poland. Mr Vander Wayen (2) caused it to be reprinted at Franeker in 1698, with another treatise of the same author concerning the ceremonies of the Passover. He reprinted also in the same place, in the year 1699, Rittangelius's book de Veritate Religionis Christianæ. It contains a large collection of passages, which shew that the ancient Jewish church believed the mystery of the Trinity, and the eternal Divinity of the Messias (3). Mr Wagenseil (4) has published some letters, which Rittangelius wrote to a Jew, and which seem to him to be excellent. Mr du Voisin, who refuted the book of the pretended Irenopolita, has not been so successful in it as the Christian proselyte: it is the opinion of Mr Vander Wayen (5). I must add that some of those, who do not like Rittangelius's principles, did no sooner hear that there was a new edition of his Libra veritatis, but they published a manuscript written long before, and intituled Bilibra veritatis & rationis, &c. To which they added the dissertation de Verbo Dei, which had occasioned Rittangelius's answer. Consult the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (6).

(1) It is a book, which the Jews ascribe to the patriarch Abraham. Others ascribe it to Rabbi Akiba. Rittangelius made a translation of it with some notes, which was printed at Amsterdam in 1642.

(2) Professor of Divinity at Franeker.

(3) See Mr Vander Wayen's preface to the Libra veritatis.

(4) In Lipmanni confutatione. See the same preface.

(5) See the same preface.

(6) August 1699, pag. 214.

Rittangelius published at Koningsberg in 1652, his German translation of the prayers, which the Jews make in their synagogues on the first day of every year, and dedicated it to the Elector of Brandenburg. We read in the epistle dedicatory, dated the 31st of May 1652, that he had been sick about a year, and that he had little hopes of recovering; that he had often desired to have some choice disciples committed to his care, that the talent he had received of GOD might not die with him, but be transmitted to others; that he could not obtain this favour, and therefore notwithstanding his great illness, he had translated some Jewish prayers into the German language. He takes notice in his preface of several faults committed by Kircher, Capel, Scaliger, Vechner, Vorstius, Constantinus l'Empereur, Slevogtius, and Schickardus, in translating some Hebrew passages (7). The Journal, which I have quoted, informs us of his infatuation. In eo merito à cordatioribus Theologis reprehendendus, quod ubique fere jactat, ne apicem quidem ullum vel literam in Novo Testamento reperiri, quem non ex Hebræorum antiquitatibus desumtum demonstrare ipse possit, & quidem, ut ipse loquitur, non opinionibus, (quia opinio versatur circa illa, quæ se aliter habere possunt) sed auctoritatibus omnium seculorum, tam Judaicæ, quam Christianæ Ecclesiæ & Antiquitatis (8). He said there is not a jot in the New Testament, but what is taken from the Jewish antiquities.

(7) Taken from the Journal of Utrecht, Sept. & Octob. 1698, pag. 675, 677.

(8) Ibid. pag. 678.

[B] Some are of opinion that he never professed Judaism.] A manuscript letter dated the 10th of September 1701, has been imparted to me, out of which I shall extract some passages that will doubtless please the curious.

The author of the letter was particularly acquainted with our Rittangelius. He observes, I. That Hornius, Wagenseil, and several other writers affirm that he had been a Jew, and was perhaps born of Jewish parents. II. That the anonymous author of the Bilibra veritatis affirms †, That Rittangelius having been bred up in the Church of Rome, embraced the religion of the Jews, who, as it is said, circumcised him at Hamburgh; and that afterwards he was baptized at Dantzic by Mr Nigrinus, and professed himself a Christian. III. That Christopher Hartknoch, Professor at Thorn, says ‡, That Rittangelius being born a Christian, as it is said, and being initiated into the Christian religion by Baptism, embraced Judaism, and was circumcised at Hamburgh; that afterwards he turned Papist, and then Calvinist, and at last Lutheran; that, contrary to custom, he was made Professor extraordinary of the Hebrew tongue, in the university of Konigsberg, without any preliminary disputation for it; that he was favoured therein by the Great Marshal, and that a quarrel arising between Latterman and Misenta, he sided with Latterman.

† Pag. 69.

‡ In his Ecclesiastical History of Prussia, pag. 641, Edit. 1686.

The author of the letter makes in the first place a remark upon the uncertainty that may be observed in those writers, and upon their various accounts; from whence it follows, that if some of them are not mistaken, the others must needs relate some falsities. Afterwards he gives an abstract of a letter, which a senator of Dantzic writ to him the twenty-second of April, 1700. That abstract imports, that Mr Hartknoch, speaking without doubt of the same Nigrinus, to whom he ascribes the baptizing of Rittangelius, says ‡ that Nigrinus, being a Lutheran, turned Calvinist, and was a preacher at Dantzic, and then turned Papist at the suggestion of the Capuchin Valerian Magni; and that before that time he had said several things agreeable to the principles of the Socinians concerning the birth of JESUS CHRIST. That senator was desired to inquire whether there was any monument of the pretended baptism conferred upon Rittangelius by Nigrinus at Dantzic; and he was told, that such a ceremony would have been performed with great pomp, and in a particular manner registred in the archives of the church, considering the merit and learning of that new Christian. His answer was, that Nigrinus was invited, in 1630, to be pastor of the Reformed in St Peter's church at Dantzic; and that the office of baptizing being appropriated

‡ Ib. p. 634.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google thirty-first of May, 1652, for it is the date of the Epistle Dedicatory prefixed to one of his books (b).

(b) See the remark [A], towards the end.

appropriated to the deacons in that city, exclusively of the pastors, Nigrinus could not have baptized Rittangelius. He had no time to inquire, whether he contributed to the conversion of that proselyte. From all these things the author of the letter concludes, that Rittangelius was neither baptized nor re-baptized at Dantzic: which proves, says he, that those are mistaken, who say he was born a Jew, or became a proselyte to Judaism. I wonder, continues he, that so many famous writers have neglected to inquire into the truth of the matter; which had been no difficult thing for them during Rittangelius's life, who, as he had many friends, had also many enemies. They have been contented to transcribe one another, and to publish a loose report, without giving themselves the trouble to examine whether it was well grounded, or not.

He says, that being in Prussia in the year 1649, and the two following years, and having lodged for some months in the house of Mr Ahasuerus Brand, great marshal, and one of the four counsellers of the regency, he had an opportunity to know Rittangelius, and to contract a very strict friendship with him. The great marshal was his patron, and used to invite him to dinner. He and several other persons of honour and probity told the author of the letter, that Rittangelius was born a Roman Catholic in the fortress of Forcheim in Franconia, in the diocese of Bamberg; that having studied classical learning, he went to Constantinople, where he conversed very much with the Rabbins for the space of twelve years; that at his return, he embraced the reformed religion, and then removed to Konigsberg, where the Elector of Brandenburg made him professor extraordinary of the Hebrew tongue, none but the Lutherans being at that time allowed to be professors in ordinary in that university; that no body believed he was born a Jew, but that some suspected he had been one.

The same author of the letter says, that one day the baron of Eulenburg, son-in-law to the great marshal, bantered Rittangelius about circumcision, being at table at his father-in-law's, who was sorry for it; that Rittangelius, being very much ashamed, excused himself modestly, and complained that they had such thoughts of him contrary to all truth. After dinner the author of the letter expressed to him his concern for the affront he had received. Rittangelius melting in tears, and fetching very deep sighs, protested to him that it was not true that he had been circumcised. The same author affirms, that a minister of Elbing, venerable for his probity and learning, gave him a good proof of it, that pastor had taken all imaginable pains to restore peace and concord in the house of Rittangelius. This unfortunate man was married to a woman, who abused him (9), and was supported in her humours by her relations, who lived at Elbing. That minister used his utmost endeavours to make them friends, and was a witness of the violent passion of the wife, from which he drew a good argument against the common opinion of her husband's being circumcised; for he argued thus: that woman, during her passion, vented impudently whatever might contribute to the dishonour of her husband; but she never reproached him with being circumcised; therefore he is not circumcised.

(9) The author of the letter told me, that the cause of that woman's ill humour, was, that Rittangelius, either by his constitution, or by reason of his age, had the gift of continency more than was agreeable to his wife.

The author of the letter adds another reason. It does not appear, says he, that any of Rittangelius's adversaries upbraided him with such a thing in any of their books during his life. Yet they were many; and some of them shewed a great deal of spite. He did not spare them, and briskly attacked several famous authors in his writings; and, among others, Misenta (10), the pillar of Lutheranism at Konigsberg, and the Buxtorfs, whom he charged with a gross ignorance of the Hebrew tongue.

(10) A Doctor of Divinity.

Lastly, the author of the letter thinks, that several people entertained such suspicions of Rittangelius, because he only conversed with the Jews during his stay at Constantinople, and because he looked like a true Rabbi. But this does not prove that he embraced Judaism. Perhaps he made the Jews believe, he would do it, to make them the more willing to teach him their learning, and then he went away without keeping his word (11).

(11) Taken from a letter scripta à Medico Germano T L. K. ad Medicum Hollandicum P. B.

ROBERT (JOHN) professor of the Civil-Law in the university of Orleans, the place of his birth, in the XVIth century, was esteemed for his works [A]. ANNE (a) ROBERT, his son, advocate in the parliament of Paris, published some books relating to the Civil-Law, that are allowed to be good [B]. See the letter which Pasquier writ

(a) And not Andrew, as Konig says.

[A] He was esteemed for his works.] He published Sententiarum Juris libri IV, Paris 1557. Receptæ Juris civilis Lectiones libri II, Orleans 1567. Animadversionum Juris civilis libri III, Paris 1580. Cujas wrote against this last book, under the name of Mercator, Robert made a reply, intituled, Notarum libri III, ad Jacobi Cujacii Mercatoris notarum libros III, printed at Orleans in 1583. He writ also a book against a minister called Robert Masson. That work being translated into French, was printed at Paris in 1569. See Du Verdier's Bibliotheque Françoise (1).

(1) Pag. 753.

[B] Anne Robert . . . . . published some books relating to the Civil-law, that are allowed to be good.] His four books Rerum judicatarum are very much esteemed. It is a collection of the decrees of the parliament of Paris, or of the great council, &c. in remarkable cases. The reasons of the advocates are mentioned at large, and learnedly. It is a continued series of learned and choice quotations. I would say no more of it, were it not that I remember that among those, who say, that the passages of Tagereau, which I have quoted in the article QUELLENEC, give some offence; some go upon this false supposition, that this writer was a man of no authority, and an unknown person; and that he is the only author, who has been so rash as to write in such a manner. I hope they will be no longer offended, if I shew them, that this scandal is grounded on a mistake about a matter of fact; which was one of the reasons that moved me to make it appear in the second edition of the article QUELLENEC, 1. That Tagereau's discourse is not an unknown piece (2). 2. That another advocate of the parliament of Paris (3) was as free in his expressions as he. I add here, with the same intent, that is, for the edification of those offended persons, that Anne Robert, one of the most famous advocates of that same parliament, went beyond those two, and even in a book dedicated to the great Achilles de Harlai, first president of that august senate The tenth chapter of his fourth book Rerum judicatarum is upon a process concerning impotency brought to the parliament of Paris by way of appeal. That parliament confirmed by a decree (4) the sentence of the Ecclesiastical judges, who had ordered a search and a congress; which the husband not liking, had appealed to the parliament. His advocate represented the abomination of such proceedings. He did, in some measure, what happens in great revolutions of state, when the laws are overturned for a little time, in order to make them last a very long time (5). He dispensed with the rules of modesty, for the sake of modesty. He made an impudent description of a search, in order to make us abhor it, and endeavour the extirpation of a most impudent abuse. Tagereau was animated with the same spirit; but Robert gave himself a freer scope, because he wrote in Latin. Vultis ad prepetuam rei detestationem, quam à foro & judiciis explodi convenit, visitationem (spectaculum odio publico dignum) verbis repræsentari? Parcite pudicæ aures, si quid in re obscœna

(2) It was inserted in the Bibliotheque du Droits François; a book reprinted at Paris in the year 1667.

(3) Sebastian Roulliard.

(4) The 20th of January 1587.

(5) Leges semper ut essent, aliquando non fuerunt, said an ancient Roman.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google writ to him (b). LEWIS ROBERT, his ſon, advocate in the ſame parliament, died very young, and had already acquired a great reputation. See James Gutherius's Choartius major, vel de orbitate toleranda. This treatiſe is to be found at the end of the book de Jure Manium: the author addreſſed it to Anne Robert, and comforted him as well as he could. I have mentioned in another place (c) PETER ROBERT, one of the moſt illuſtrious advocates of the parliament of Paris, in the reign of Henry II, and I ſhall ſpeak of him again in the remark [C]. I do not know whether the profeſſor of Orleans and he were of the ſame family.

His ſon Anne had a daughter named Anne who was married to a brother of Andrew du Laurens the Phyſician (d); his family ſtill ſubſiſts at Paris and makes a very good figure. Mr ROBERT, the king's attorney at the Chatelet, is deſcended from it. He has a ſon preſident in the chamber of accounts, and a brother grand vicar of the dioceſe of Niſmes, and another brother who, quitting the intendency of Canada, was made intendant of the navy at Breſt, in the month of January 1703. The late Mr Robert, canon and grand penitentiary of Notre Dame at Paris, was their brother (e).

(b) It is in the 19th book, pag. 522, &c. of the 3d tome.

(c) Citat. (10), of the article MARILLAC (CHARLES DE).

(d) See the remark [E], of the article LAURENS (ANDREW).

(e) Taken from the Mercure Galant, for the month of January 1703, pag. 271.

obſcæna labatur verecundi ſermonis modeſtia. Puella reſupina jacet cruribus hinc inde diſtentis. Proſtant pudendæ corporis partes, quas natura ad delicias generis humani velavit. Has & matronæ (quæ obſtetrices annus ſunt) & Medici inſpiciunt, pretractant, diducunt: Magiſtratus vultu compoſito riſum diſſimulat: Matronæ præſentes venerem dudum oblitam refricant: Medici pro ætatis diſcrimine, hic vires priſtinas reminiſcitur, ille animo æſtuante inanis ludicri ſpectaculo paſcitur: Chirurgus aut ferramento fabrefacto (id ſpeculum matricis vocari ſolet) aut cereo & fictitio Priapo aditus Venereos tentat, aperit, reſerat: Puella jacens titillatione veſana prurit: Ut etiam ſi virgo viſitaris cæperit, inde tamen non incorrupta recedat (6). Modeſty, continues he, does not allow me to ſay more of it (7). Afterwards he obſerves, that ſuch a practice might be tolerated, notwithſtanding its ſhamefulneſs, if it was a good way to find out the truth of the matter; but he maintains, that it is a deceitful way, and thereupon he heaps up many obſcene things. The whole chapter is full of ſuch thoughts and expreſſions; and nothing can be more laſcivious, than the paſſage wherein the wife's advocate exhorts the poor Huſband to a love-combat, and deſcribes to him the ſweets that one may enjoy in the field of battle. There had been ſuch a cauſe in the parliament of Paris ſome years before: which I obſerve only to acquaint the reader, that Antony Hotman, brother to the famous Francis Hotman, declared againſt the congreſs, and was extreamly free in his expreſſions (8). The book he publiſhed upon that ſubject in intituled, Traité de la diſſolution du Mariage par froideur de l'homme ou de la femme - - - - - A treatiſe concerning the diſſolution of marriage, by reaſon of the huſband's or the wife's frigidity; and was printed ſeveral times. I think the firſt edition came out in the year 1581 (9); and that it was in the ſame year that one of his kinſmen was proſecuted with a view to get the marriage diſſolved, under pretence of impotency. It is certain that Roulliard (10) ſays, that Antony Hotman compoſed that treatiſe only to favour one of his relations, who was impotent. Take notice, that this brother of Francis Hotman made a great figure among the advocates, and was preferred, by the Leaguers, to the office of advocate-general in the parliament of Paris. Let no body think therefore that Tagereau is the only author, whom I could have quoted; for I might have alledged the moſt celebrated advocates. I muſt not forget that the work of Anne Robert has been tranſlated and publiſhed in French by an advocate (11). I have not that tranſlation; but I think that the above-quoted Latin paſſage, and ſeveral others, are not expreſſed in it ſo nakedly, as in the original, and yet that they are very obſcene.

I have read, in Theodore Beza's Hiſtory of the reformed churches of France, that an advocate's wife, in whoſe houſe the Proteſtants had ſeveral meetings at Paris, made her ſelf a priſoner in the Chatelet, with her two daughters, to convince the world of the falſity of the report, that had been ſpread about the leudneſs of thoſe Aſſemblies (12). 'The court . . . . . cauſed the two daughters to 'be ſearched by ſeveral ſurgeons and midwives, 'and at ſeveral times. But all the ſearchers, except 'an old matron, declared them to be virgins; 'nor did that matron poſitively affirm, that they 'had been corrupted by the approach of a man; 'and, at laſt, ſhe begged their pardon, after they 'had been ſet at liberty, declaring how, and by 'whom, ſhe had been bribed (13).' Beza does not ſeem to condemn the trial which they ſubmitted to; and indeed, they found themſelves in ſuch circumſtances as might excuſe them for expoſing themſelves to a ſearch notwithſtanding modeſty, and the danger they ran, becauſe the ſearchers might well be ſuſpected of unfair dealing. I ſhall ſay nothing of the uncertainties of ſuch a proceeding; but after all, if thoſe gentlewomen had refuſed to be ſearched, they had confirmed thereby the depoſitions of the falſe witneſſes. The point was to confute the informations which the preſident Saint André had cauſed to be drawn up, wherein two witneſſes affirmed, that in an aſſembly, upon Thurſday in the Holy Week, compoſed of a great number of men, women, and maids, about twelve a clock at night . . . . . after they had preached, and eat a pig inſtead of the paſchal lamb; and after they had put out the lamp that gave them light, every man coupled to his woman, and that among other women, they (the two witneſſes) ſaw the ſaid advocate's wife, and her two young and handſome daughters, one of which happening to meet one of them (one of the witneſſes) he knew her two or three times for his ſhare (14). Thoſe informations made a great noiſe, and were ſhewn to the queen-mother (15).

[C] And I ſhall ſpeak of him again.] This Peter Robert was a Pariſian (16). Loiſel ſpeaks of him thus. 'He was more eſteemed than the others 'abovementioned, not that he was more learned 'than they, for I believe he was inferior to 'them in that reſpect; but he had a noble pre-'ſence, a good voice, and a fine delivery, and was 'more valued for his natural parts, than for his 'ſtudy. He made himſelf famous particularly by 'two pleadings: the firſt was that which he made 'for preſident d'Oppede, concerning the inhabitants 'of Cabrieres and Merindol; the thing is ſo well 'deſcribed by Thuanus, that I need not dwell upon 'it. The late Mr Clement du Puy had been firſt 'intruſted with that cauſe; but falling ſick of the 'ſickneſs of which he died, preſident d'Oppede ap-'plied himſelf to Robert, whom he daily informed 'of what he ſhould ſay. The other reaſon of 'Robert's advancement, was, that turning Proteſtant, 'he was employed by the prince of Condé, grand-'father of this preſent prince, to declare his in-'nocence: from that time he was always made 'uſe of by thoſe of that religion; which coſt him 'his life, for he was murdered on St Bartholomew's 'day (17).'

(6) Annæus Robertus, Rerum judicatarum, lib. iv, cap. x, pag. 786, Edit. Genev. 1620, in 8vo.

(7) Plura dicere vetat pudor. Ibid.

(8) See the remark [H], of the article QUELLENEC.

(9) See du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 891.

(10) In the capitulary quoted above, remark [F], of the article QUELLENEC, at the beginning.

(11) Called Tourer. I have this from Mr Marais, whom I mention above, citat. (88), of the article HENRY III, and elſewhere, with ſome other particulars.

(12) Bezа, Hiſt. of the Reformed churches of France, book iii, pag. 238, ad ann. 1560.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Taken from Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 235.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Loiſel, Dialogues des Avocats, pag. 517, 518.

(17) Ib. p. 519.

ROBERVAL, profeſſor of Mathematics at Paris, cotemporary with Des Cartes, and his great enemy. See the Sorberiana, and Mr Baillet (a).

(a) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. i, pag. 304, where he ſays that there are two faults in the laſt volume of Moreri. See alſo his Traité des Auteurs déguiſés, Part ii, cap. vi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ROCABERTI (JOHN THOMAS DE) archbiſhop of Valencia in the XVIIth century was an ornament to the order of the Dominicans. He was profeſſor of Divinity at Valencia, provincial of the Dominicans in the province of Aragon, and afterwards general of the order, twice vice-roy of Valencia, and at laſt inquiſitor-general of Spain. He exerted himſelf with great zeal in maintaining the Pope's authority; and not content with writing ſeveral volumes on that ſubject againſt the deciſions of the clergy of France, he employed his time and money in collecting into one body the treatiſes that had been publiſhed by others on the ſame argument. This collection printed at Rome under the title of Bibliotheca Maxima Pontificia is in twenty volumes in folio. Rocaberti died on the thirteenth of January 1699, being ſeventy-four years of age.

ROCCO (GIROLAMO) was ſo great a maſter in the art of writing, that he deſerves to be mentioned. He was a Venetian, and lived in the beginning of the XVIIth century. The duke of Savoy expreſſed a great eſteem for him, as we ſhall ſee below [A].

[A] The duke of Savoy expreſſed a great eſteem for him.] The following paſſage is to be found in a book, intituled, La ſage & delectable Folie, written by J. Marcel. 'I ſhould be too tedious, ſhould I name all 'the princes who have been liberal and kind to the 'Virtuoſi; and therefore I ſhall only mention what 'concerns Rocco Girolami of Venice, a very good 'Arithmetician, and ſo excellent a writer, that I do 'not think any man in his time exceeded him. He 'dedicated a book, engraven upon copper-plates, to 'his highneſs of Savoy, in the year 1603, adorned 'with ſeveral ſorts of characters, cyphers, and ex'cellent ſtriking. That great prince having ſeen it, 'rewarded the induſtry of the author, by putting, 'with his own hands, a gold chain worth 125 'crowns, about his neck (1).' The author mentions the ſame reward in another place of his book, viz. in the chapter, intituled, La folie des eſcrivains (2) Perhaps the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here the names of ſome perſons, who, as he ſays, excelled in that art. 'We have ſeen, (ſays) he (3) many fine 'writers who have publiſhed books of ſeveral ſorts of 'characters, as in France, le Gagneur, Lucas, Joſſe'rand, and others; in Italy, D. Auguſtin of Sienna, 'M. Martin of Romagna, Camillo Buonadio of Pia'cenza, Creſei a Milaneſe, Curione a Roman, Pala'tin, Veruue, and others, with M. Antonio a Ge'noeſe, who, in the year 1606, wrote a book con'taining ſeveral ſorts of letters and characters, de'dicated to the prince of Mantua and Mont'ferrat.'

See La Croix du Maine, pag. 424 and 425 of his Bibliotheque Françoiſe.

(1) Marcel, ſage & delectable folie, liv. i, pag. 106. It appears by the approbation of the doctors, and the king's licence, that this book was printed in 1628. I make uſe of the Lyons edition 1650, in 8vo.

(2) It is the 61ſt of the 2d book.

(3) Ibid. book ii, pag. 80.

ROCHEFOUCAUD (ALEXANDER DE LA) abbot of St Martin (a) brother to the count de Randan, who was killed at the battel of Iſſoire, and to Francis biſhop of Clermont, who was ſince cardinal, engaged unluckily in the impoſture of Martha Broſſier, who pretended to be poſſeſſed by the Devil. I have ſaid, in the article of this Martha, that the parliament of Paris having ordered her to be carried to Romorantin by the provoſt, forbad her father to let her go out of that place without leave from the judge. Notwithſtanding that prohibition, the father and his daughter went with our abbot into Auvergne, and then to Avignon. Though the parliament of Paris ſummoned the abbot twice, and ordered at laſt that the revenues of his benefices ſhould be ſeized for contempt of the court (b), this crew proceeded in their journey, and went to Rome, thinking that the woman poſſeſſed by the Devil would act her part much better on that great ſtage, and find more credulous people in that place, which is the fountain of belief (c). The biſhop of Clermont was ſo much ſuſpected of having ſuggeſted this fooliſh deſign to his brother, that he was likewiſe deprived of his Eccleſiaſtical revenues (d). Henry IV being well informed of the wicked deſigns that were brooding, ordered Mr de Sillery, his ambaſſador, and cardinal d'Oſſat, to diſcover the plot, and to prepoſſeſs the Pope againſt that crew, before they ſhould act their part. They carefully executed his order; beſides, cardinal d'Oſſat prevailed with the Jeſuits to ſide with him [A]; ſo that the abbot of St Martin, at his arrival at Rome, found himſelf deprived of the chief aſſiſtance he relied upon. The Jeſuits forſook him, and the Pope, who had been forewarned, did nothing contrary to the ſentence given by the parliament of Paris againſt that pretended demoniac. The abbot was obliged to implore Henry the fourth's clemency for himſelf and his brother. Not long after he fell ſick, and it was ſaid that he died of grief, for having undertaken ſo long a journey to make himſelf deſpiſed. Martha and her father, being forſaken by everybody, took ſanctuary in the hoſpitals (e).

(a) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. ad ann. 1599, pag. m. 205, 206.

(b) Thuanus, lib. cxxiii, circa init.

(c) Mezerai, ubi ſupra, pag. 206.

(d) Thuanus, ubi ſupra.

(e) Mezerai, ubi ſupra. Thuanus ſpeaks of it thus; Ita fabula de Martha à Spiritu obſeſſa omnino evanuit, ipſo Sammartino qui ſpe ſua falſus in aula illa deſpectus eſſe cœperat, ex mœrore mox mortuo, & Martha patreque ejus ex xenodochiorum ſtipe miſeram vitam vix tolerantibus.

[A] Cardinal d'Oſſat prevailed with the Jeſuits to ſide with him.] He ſpoke particularly to Father Sirmond, ſecretary to their general (1); and having ſhewed him the king's orders, he repreſented to him, that it was to be feared the attempt of the abbot would prove an obſtacle to the recalling of the Jeſuits, becauſe he and the biſhop of Clermont had ſtudied amongſt them. Afterwards he repreſented to him the raſhneſs of ſuch an undertaking, and how prejudicial it would be to the church, if the ſupreme courts of the kingdom ſhould quarrel again with the Pope. Thoſe reaſons had a very good effect.

(1) His name was Aquaviva.

RODON (DAVID DE) or rather DERODON (DAVID) profeſſor of Philoſophy, firſt at Die, and then at Orange, and at laſt at Nimes, was a native of Dauphiné. He was one of the moſt ſubtile Logicians in France, and few Spaniſh or Iriſh ſchoolmen exceeded him in what concerns the Univerſals, Entia Rationis, and the airy and abſtracted ſpeculations of the categories, and the dependencies of the ſyllogiſtical form. But if he equalled in this the moſt refined Logicians of the ſchools, he far exceeded them in his Phyſics; for he embraced the opinion of the Moderns and the hypotheſis of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of atoms, to explain, as Gaſſendus did, ſeveral natural effects by mechanical principles. His body of Philoſophy ſold very well, and the Printer got a great deal by it, eſpecially by the abridgment of it; for the long ſcholaſtic diſputes contained in his large work, diſcouraged the readers. Derodon wrote a book de Suppoſito, wherein he openly declared for Neſtorius, againſt St Cyril; not by admitting two perſons, but by maintaining that Neſtorius did not admit of them, and that St Cyril confounded the two natures of JESUS CHRIST. Herein he only followed the footſteps of a gentleman of Provence [A], whom doubtleſs he had been accquainted with, and who forſook the church of Rome to turn Proteſtant. This opinion of Derodon is an incident, or epiſode, of the famous diſpute between two miniſters of Holland [B], and which is not ended yet (a). I ſhall

(a) I ſaid this in the year 1696, when I was about the firſt edition of this work; but I muſt ſay now, that this controverſy was ended ſoon after.

[A] Herein he only followed the footſteps of a gentleman of Provence.] His name was Giles Gaillard. He turned Proteſtant about the year 1630, and retired to Orange, where he made a panegyric upon prince Frederic-Henry. He took care to publiſh the motives of his converſion. See the book he intituled Le Proſelyte Evangelique. The following paſſage, concerning his book de Suppoſito, is to be found in a letter of Sorbiere to Voſſius, written in the year 1646, when he ſent him the copy he had been preſented with by the author. 'Illi (Ægidio Gaillardo nobili Gallo) nuper 'venit in mentem neſcio quid circa Neſtorium, quaſi 'perperam in Epheſiana Synodo fuerit livore Cyrilli 'hæreſeos inſimulatus damnatuſque; eaque de re edidit 'librum, cui titulus eſt De Suppoſito (1). - - - - This 'Giles Gaillard, a French gentleman, had a ſtrange 'fancy concerning Neſtorius, as if he had been wrongfully 'accuſed and declared guilty of hereſy in the Council of 'Epheſus. He writ a book on that ſubject with this 'title, De Suppoſito.' The poſtſcript to this letter is remarkable; for it informs us, that one of the moſt learned miniſters was of the ſame opinion (2).

(1) See the 432d letter, among thoſe that were written to Voſſius, pag. 285.

(2) Audio Joh. Croium in eadem eſſe ſententia in qua Gaillardus moſter.

[B] His opinion . . . is an incident, or epiſode, of a famous diſpute between two miniſters of Holland.] This will appear by a long paſſage of Mr Saurin, one of thoſe two diſputants. 'Mr Jurieu is a wonderful man! An error 'will be purified by going through his channel, and 'what is hereſy in another man, is an orthodox do'ctrine in him, by virtue of his violent, and perſe'cuting zeal. In his firſt apology which he publiſhed 'after the ſynod of Leyden, he gives the hiſtory of the 'riſe and growth of that pernicious cabal of Heretics, 'Socinians, or men inclined to Socinianiſm, to whom 'all religions are indifferent, and who are half atheiſts, 'in which he involves all thoſe whom he has a 'mind to ſacrifice to the hatred of the public. He 'relates ſeveral particulars concerning that cabal, to 'have a fair pretence of enumerating his virtues and 'noble exploits. Among the characters of Hereſy, 'which he has diſcovered in ſome Divines, he 'reckons their approbation of Derodon's book, 'intituled, De Suppoſito, which he ſtiles, twice in 'half a page, the wretched book De Suppoſito. He in'forms us that this wretched book was burnt at Tou'louſe: a great ſign of reprobation in a book! I con'feſs that author had been ſuſpected of ſome errors: 'perhaps he gave occaſion to thoſe ſuſpicions, by de'parting from the opinions commonly received, and 'and carrying his Philoſophical liberty a little too 'far. He was ſometimes brought into trouble for 'his doctrine; but he came off with honour. I ſaw 'him at Geneva in the year 1664, where he was 'a refugee, after he had been baniſhed from France, 'or having writ a book, intituled, Le Tombeau de 'la Meſſe. I have often diſcourſed with him about 'ſeveral matters, and always found him very ortho'dox. He died at Geneva in the ſame year 1664, 'if I am not miſtaken, not long after I ſet out from 'thence for Holland. I was informed that his death 'had been very edifying, and that he had made a 'confeſſion of faith that was approved. But what'ever the private opinions of that Philoſopher might 'be, or whatever he might have ſaid in converſa'tion, or writ in other books, his treatiſe De Sup'poſito is not anſwerable for them, but only for the 'errors contained in it. When a man is ſuſpected, 'he ought to be narrowly obſerved, and all his 'words ought to be ſcanned, ne lateat anguis in her'ba; but his orthodox opinions muſt not be changed 'into errors, nor all his errors into hereſies. The 'deſign of this reflexion is not fully to juſtify the 'treatiſe De Suppoſito; but to excuſe it from being 'condemned by a man who himſelf ſtands in need of 'excuſe and pardon. One can hardly gueſs what Mr Ju'rieu finds fault with in that book, unleſs it be the ſame 'liberty of condemning the title of Mother of GOD, 'beſtowed upon the Holy Virgin, which he himſelf 'takes in one of his Paſtoral Letters. That Philo'ſopher explains the word Suppoſitum in a very ortho'dox manner, both with reſpect to divine and human 'perſons. In his explication of the perſon of Chriſt 'after his Incarnation, he pitches upon the opinion 'that is the moſt commonly received, and leaſt liable 'to ill conſequences, and the cavils of Heretics. It is 'true, that he ſides with Neſtorius, againſt Cyril 'and the Fathers of the council of Epheſus, from 'whom he thinks Eutyches had his hereſy. But if 'this be an error, it is only in a matter of fact; and a 'book cannot be accounted pernicious upon ſuch an 'account. What poiſon is there then in that unfor'tunate book? It lies only in the author's averſion 'for the title of Θεοτόκος, Mother of GOD, and 'his reflecting upon Cyril, and the Divines of his 'party, whom he looks upon as the Patriarchs of 'idolatry (3). The cenſurer of this Philoſopher is 'not ſo ſevere in his judgment of them, but his opi'nion is the ſame as to the doctrine. He ſpares 'thoſe, who have introduced the word in queſtion 'into the church; but he uſes that word without 'any mercy. In his opinion Cyril was no idolater, 'and his fault lies only in a wrong zeal; but this fatal 'word Θεοτόκος has occaſioned idolatry, and even 'the Neſtorian Hereſy. I muſt ſet down once more 'the very words of our Divine ſo zealous for Ortho'doxy, and particularly for the Anti-Neſtorian Or'thodoxy (4).'

(3) See in the remark [M], of the article NESTORIUS, whether it be true, that the words Mother of God, have occaſioned the worſhip paid to the holy Virgin.

(4) Saurin, Extrait de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 182, & ſeq.

The author inſerts in this place a large extract of the Paſtoral Letters of his adverſary, wherein the title of the Mother of God is condemned as the ſource of idolatry, and then he goes on thus. '(5) The 'author of the book, intituled De Suppoſito, ſays 'nothing at the bottom that goes beyond this. For 'if Mr Jurieu pretends that this Philoſopher abſo'lutely refuſed to call the Holy Virgin Mother of 'God, it will be ſaid that he did it in the ſame ſenſe 'that Mr Jurieu himſelf does it. The contrary 'cannot be proved by his book. And ſince that 'author acknowledges one only perſon as well as two 'natures in Chriſt, and according to the principles of 'his Philoſophy, actiones & paſſiones ſunt Suppoſitorum, 'a maxim which he often repeats; there is reaſon to 'believe that he did not deny that the Holy Virgin 'was the mother of him, who is God, and a divine 'perſon. Accordingly he calls her the Mother of 'Chriſt, having acknowledged that Chriſt is but one 'perſon, both God and man, and even a divine 'perſon, whoſe perſonality does properly reſide in the 'word. What great difference is there then between 'the niceneſs of this Philoſopher, and that of our 'Divine? Why is the former an Heretic, and the 'later Orthodox, when they think and ſpeak the 'ſame thing about the ſame matter? . . . . As for me, 'I have openly declared againſt the niceneſs of the 'Philoſopher, and of the Divine. I perſiſt in this 'declaration; I do not approve their boldneſs and 'the ſingularity of their opinions; I condemn their er'rors; I blame them both, but I anathematize neither 'of them. . . . . I have ſometimes admired Derodon's 'zeal, a Proteſtant, Anti-Papiſt, and Anti-idolatrous 'zeal. He calls all the reformed miniſters angels of 'Laodicea, and lukewarm Paſtors, becauſe we are 'not willing to excommunicate Cyril, and the Fathers 'of the council of Epheſus. This is a very extraor'dinary zeal for a Philoſopher; but Mr Jurieu is too 'indulgent, for he excuſes Cyril and the Fathers of 'the council of Epheſus, who introduced idolatry.

(5) Ib. p. 870.

Derodon's

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I ſhall ſay ſomething of it in the remarks; and I will not omit the ſpecious accuſation of great ignorance, in matters relating to Eccleſiaſtical antiquity [C], brought in againſt

'Derodon's ſyſtem is more conſiſtent than that of 'Mr Jurieu. Derodon places Cyril, and the Fathers 'of the council of Epheſus, among the idolaters, 'whoſe fathers they are. Mr Jurieu diſtinguiſhed 'the fathers from the children, tho' he charges the 'former with being the cauſe of the crime of the lat-'ter. All the difference between Derodon and 'Mr Jurieu conſiſts in this: according to Derodon, 'Cyril, and the Fathers of the council of Epheſus 'acted and argued conſequentially, they were idola-'ters, and eſtabliſhed idolatry; whereas, according to 'Mr Jurieu, thoſe Fathers who compoſed an œcu-'menical council, introduced the greateſt of all idola-'tries, without being idolaters.'

Mr Jurieu's reply is very long, and made up of many pieces. I ſhall only ſet down ſome paſſages out of it, that concern Derodon. '(6) Derodon's 'book De Suppoſito is ſcarce, and I had not ſeen it, 'when I publiſhed a looſe ſheet with this title, Idée 'des Sentimens de Mr Saurin; and therefore what 'I have ſaid of it in that ſmall piece ought not to be 'minded. Derodon's book has been ſince imparted 'to me by an illuſtrious friend: having peruſed it, I 'have not found any formal Hereſy in it, but a pro-'digious raſhneſs, and a violent deſire of making 'Cyril odious, and defaming the council of Epheſus. 'Beſides, his quotations are unfaithful, his explica-'tions unfair, and his proofs ſophiſtical: and there-'fore I believe that book deſerved to be burnt, as 'it was by a decree of the parliament of Toulouſe; 'for to cry down as Heretics thoſe who maintained 'the holy myſteries, is an infallible way of bringing 'thoſe myſteries into contempt. The author was one 'of thoſe Latitudinarians, who appeared above forty 'years ago in the ſouthern provinces; and it ſeems, 'that Petit, profeſſor of Divinity at Nimes, favoured 'them. At leaſt, one may infer it from the extracts 'produced out of him by Mr d'Huiſſeau, a great Lati-'tudinarian, in vindication of his book, intituled, 'De la Reunion du Chriſtianiſme. Derodon, in order 'to promote the common intereſt of his ſect, makes 'it his buſineſs to render the Antients odious and 'contemptible. .... (7) Derodon, the greateſt, and 'perhaps the firſt enemy of Cyril among the Mo-'derns (8), was a ſilly Sophiſt, ignorant of Antiquity: 'he was profeſſor of Philoſophy, and took a great 'pride in his ſubtilty. But learned and wiſe men 'know what a man is who is ſubtile in the peripa-'tetic way: ſuch a one is a Sophiſt; which was alſo 'Dorodon's character. He had a mind to diſtinguiſh 'and immortalize himſelf by ſetting up againſt Cyril, 'and the council of Epheſus. He writ his book de-'ſignedly, to ſhew that he was an Eutychian, that 'is, that he confounded the two natures, and out of 'the two made but one; and to prove, on the con-'trary, that Neſtorius was a very orthodox man. 'This work is mightily cried up by our Latitudinarians. 'The firſt time I ſaw it, was in Mr Pajon's hands, 'who praiſed it as an excellent book. Mr Saurin has 'often beſtowed the ſame encomium upon it in my 'preſence; which ſhews, that thoſe two men are 'thoroughly unacquainted with Antiquity. Derodon 'was a man of the ſame character, and undertook to 'write upon a ſubject that he was ignorant of. He 'took, or ſtole, what he ſays againſt Cyril, from a 'friend whom he often mentions, and who had writ 'a compleat hiſtory of the diſputes of Cyril and Ne-'ſtorius, which was to be publiſhed: this he does 'not ſcruple to confeſs..... Beſides his ignorance, 'he was guilty of malignity; for nothing can be 'more malicious and unfair than that man's diſpute 'againſt Cyril (9).'

I ſhall make no reflexions upon this; for it is likely Mr Saurin's reply will come out before I make an end of this work; and the readers will find in that reply (10) the raſh judgments and other faults of Mr Jurieu fully laid open. I ſhall only ſay, that it is not at all likely that Derodon intended to favour the pretended faction of the Latitudinarians; for he maintains Neſtorius's cauſe, not by looking upon him as the defender of the moral union of the Word with the human nature (11), but by conſidering him as an orthodox man, with reſpect to the hypoſtatical union; and he impugns Cyril, only becauſe he looks upon him as the author of the Eutychian confuſion of the two natures. Without doubt he only deſigned to vex the Papiſts, and make them aſhamed of their oppreſſing the memory of innocent men, while they extol to the ſky a Heretic, who had the ſecular power, the emperor's favour, and the prevailing cabal of a council on his ſide. Nay, if one had a mind to carry charity ſomething farther, one might affirm, that his only deſign was to protect innocence, by making it appear that Neſtorius is wrongfully accounted an Heretic. A man who impugns St Cyril, cannot be ſaid to be a malicious man; no ſuch thing can be neceſſarily inferred from it. Perhaps no party-leader did ever leſs deſerve to be tenderly uſed: he behaved himſelf with ſo much violence and fury, that he deſerves no thanks for having maintained the truth, ſuppoſing he maintained it; if he found it, it was only by chance and accidentally. An unruly horſe, running away with the bit in his teeth, that eſcapes breaking his head againſt the walls of a ſtable, only becauſe his fury runs him againſt a door, which by good luck is half open, is a faithful picture of ſome Divines who light upon Orthodoxy, notwithſtanding a thouſand violent paſſions which tranſport them, and make them violate all rules of equity and juſtice. All the common places alledged by Mr Jurieu to juſtify St Cyril, and to condemn Neſtorius, may ſerve to juſtify the latter, and condemn the former. I could eaſily give a ſpecimen of it.

[C] The ſpecious accuſation ..... of ignorance in matters relating to Eccleſiaſtical antiquity.] 'It is high-'ly probable, that he had not ſeen the acts of the 'council of Epheſus; the bare title of his book is 'ſufficient to make one ſenſible of it. Diſputatio de 'ſuppoſito: in quâ plurima hactenus inaudita de Neſtorio 'tanquam Orthodoxo, & de Cyrillo Alexandrino, aliiſ-'que Epiſcopis in Synodum Epheſi coactis tanquam hære-'ticis: and in the 71ſt page of his book he ſays, Rem 'novam & hactenus inauditam jam demonſtrandam ſuſ-'cipimus, &c. Scilicet Cyrillum Alexandrinum & alios 'Epiſcopos qui tertio Concilio Oecumenico interfuerunt 'fuiſſe hæreticos, & Authores hæreſis Eutychianæ. 'What a prodigious ignorance and boldneſs is this! 'if this man had but caſt his eyes upon the authors 'of the Vth century, eſpecially upon the acts of the 'council of Epheſus, would he have ſaid, that the ac-'cuſation brought againſt Cyril, of being the author 'of the Eutychian Hereſy, which confounds the two 'natures, is a thing unheard of? He was reproached 'with it by all the Neſtorians, and many others who 'were not Neſtorians; by John biſhop of Antioch, 'who excommunicated Cyril as confounding the two 'natures, and aſcribing to the divine nature all the 'infirmities that belong only to the human nature of 'Chriſt (12).' The author alledges ſeveral other ſuch proofs, whereby it appears that St Cyril was accuſed of that Hereſy, and concludes with theſe words, And therefore his telling us that his accuſation againſt Cyril is a new diſcovery, and a thing unheard of, betrays a great ignorance, and an intolerable vanity. We might give ſeveral other proofs of Derodon's ignorance in this matter (13).

If I had Derodon's book, I would give my opinion upon this particular; but ſince I have it not, I ſhall only ſay, that the words quoted out of it by his cenſurer do not prove what he brings them for. They ſhew that Derodon undertook to prove, as a thing unheard of, not that St Cyril was accuſed of being the author of Eutyches's errors; but that St Cyril, and the other Fathers of the third Oecumenical council, were Heretics, and brought in Eutychianiſm. This weakens the arguments alledged for the ignorance of that Philoſopher (14), and ſhews that his cenſurer perverts, or does not underſtand, the ſtate of the queſtion. If it be a miſtake, it ought to be excuſed, conſidering the perplexity he muſt needs have been in, when he was to act the part of an apologiſt for thoſe very men, whom he had ſeverely cenſured. Conſider, that this man being to anſwer the biſhop of Meaux, gave a hideous deſcription of the primitive Fathers, and being to anſwer Mr Saurin, was obliged to commend thoſe ſame Fathers. How can ſuch a man know what he is about, or be maſter of his thoughts? Can an author, beaten at his own weapon, and who cannot defend

(6) Jurieu, Religion du Latitudinaire, p. 270.

(7) Ib. p. 278.

(8) If Mr Jurieu had known what concerns Giles Gaillard (ſee the remark [A],) he would not have ſaid this.

(9) Jurieu, ibid. pag. 281, 282.

(10) It came out in 1697, with this title, Juſtification de la doctrine du Sieur Saurin ... contre deux libelles de Mr Jurieu l'un intitulé Idée des ſentimens, &c. & l'autre La religion du Latitudinaire. See chap. xiii, pag. 342, & ſeq.

(11) Note, That Mr Jurieu declares, pag. 277, that the hatred of the Latitudinarians againſt St Cyril, proceeds from his cauſing to be condemned the moral union of the Word which they are ſo fond of.

(12) Jurieu, ubi ſupra, p. 279.

(13) Ibid. pag. 281.

(14) There is a very great difference between maintaining that a whole council is heretical; and maintaining, that a private man was formerly accuſed of Hereſy. The firſt aſſertion may be advanced as a thing unheard-of, without pretending that the charge laid upon that private man is a matter of fact not known before.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google against that Philoſopher. He ſet up for a controverſiſt, and ſo exaſperated his adverſaries, that they obtained a decree from the king, whereby he was baniſhed the kingdom in the year 1663 (b). He retired to Geneva, where he died two years after, or thereabouts. Thoſe of his party were not always pleaſed with his doctrine, and he was brought into trouble upon that account, but he came off with honour (c). I do not know whether the ſynods or conſiſtories were offended at his denying, that the conſervation of the creatures is a continual creation [D].

(b) It was for having publiſhed a book intituled, Tombeau de la Meſſe. See the hiſtory of the edict of Nantes, Tom. iii, p. 563. He publiſhed ſomething on the Euchariſt at Geneva, in the year 1655, in 8vo.

(c) See the remark [B].

He had been a Roman Catholic; which is the reaſon why Theophilus Raynaud calls him a deſerter of the faith, for it is he that is meant in the paſſage I quote out of his Hoplotheca [E].

ſend himſelf but by confuting and contradicting himſelf in a moſt wretched manner; I ſay, can ſuch an author be anſwerable for an overſight? Neceſſity has no law; this is what he may plead for himſelf: but ſuch an apology will not ſatisfy the juſt complaints of the public; all the readers may very well tell him, Whom do you take us for? Muſt we be ſo ſhamefully impoſed upon? When you cannot anſwer an adverſary but by ſuppoſing that the Fathers were heretical, you charge them with Hereſy; and becauſe at a year's end it is neceſſary for you that they ſhould be Orthodox, in order to get rid of another adverſary, you make them ſound in their doctrine: is it not a very unfair and ſhameful thing (15).

(15) Compare this with the remark [B], of the article PETAVIUS.

Here follows Mr Saurin's anſwer, to clear Derodon of the ignorance charged upon him. 'Mr Jurieu 'makes it appear, that he has not ſeen Derodon's 'treatiſe de Suppoſito, or that he hopes no body will 'ſee it; for the author has collected many teſtimonies 'and hiſtorical facts, to confirm his accuſation againſt 'Cyril and the council of Epheſus. He quotes Ibas 'biſhop of Edeſſa, Gennadius patriarch of Conſtan'tinople, Theodoret biſhop of Cyrus, John archbi'ſhop of Antioch, and above forty eaſtern biſhops, 'who charged Cyril with the Hereſy of Apollinaris, 'and objected to him that he made the divine nature 'of Chriſt paſſible, by confounding it with his human 'nature. The author therefore was not ignorant of 'this, and when he ſpeaks of Cyril's Hereſy, and Ne'ſtorius's Orthodoxy, as of a thing unheard of, it is 'with reſpect to the latter ages, and not with reſpect 'to the age that Cyril and Neſtorius lived in: Nay, 'he mentioned as a thing unheard of, not the que'ſtion, which of thoſe two patriarchs was a Heretic, 'or an orthodox man, but the anſwer he makes to 'it, by juſtifying Neſtorius, and condemning Cy'ril (16).'

(16) Saurin, Juſtification de ſa doctrine contre deux libelles de Mr Jurieu, pag. 346.

[D] He denied that the conſervation of the creatures, is a continual creation.] This was denying a doctrine, which tho' very common among the Spaniſh and Iriſh ſchoolmen, is very evident. We muſt reject the cleareſt notions, or acknowledge that a Being made out of nothing by the infinite power of the Creator, cannot have any cauſe of its exiſtence in itſelf; and therefore it cannot continue to exiſt but by the ſame power that produced it at firſt: it is therefore created in each moment of its duration, that is, it exiſts in each moment, only becauſe GOD continues to have the ſame will that he had, when that Being began to exiſt.

This act of the divine will cannot ceaſe to create whilſt it ſubſiſts, ſince it did create in the firſt moment that creatures began to exiſt. Derodon's objections may be eaſily confuted; they are much the ſame with thoſe propoſed by Bernier (17). A Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the Academy of Puylaurens (18) wrote a treatiſe againſt Derodon upon that ſubject, and ſolidly confuted him. That Profeſſor had ſeveral quarrels with him at Nimes, and I have heard ſay, that he had a hand in a book intituled, L'impieté decouverte, which was publiſhed againſt Derodon. I have alſo been told, that Mr Claude, who was then miniſter of Nimes, lent a helping hand to the enemies of that Philoſopher, by writing, or at leaſt correcting, that work. It is an abſurd thing to ſay, with Gaſſendus and Derodon, that GOD contributes to the preſervation of creatures by preventing their deſtruction. Could any thing deſtroy them, ſince there are but two ſorts of Beings in the univerſe, viz. GOD and the creatures? Such a care would be as needleſs as the watchfulneſs of a ſhepherd againſt wolves in a country where there are no wolves, and even where there could be none. It were in vain to ſay that a body deſtroys another body, that fire deſtroys wood, that a man kills another man, &c. for this is not a deſtruction of creatures, but only a change of modifications: modes or accidents are not accounted the ſubject of creation, but the ſubſtances in which they reſide.

(17) See Bernier's book, printed at Amſterdam in 1685, and intituled, Traité du libre & du volontaire.

(18) He was a Phyſician, called John Bon; his Body of Philoſophy has been printed.

[E] It is he that is meant by Theophilus Raynaud in the paſſage I quote out of his Hoplotheca.] Having ſaid that the ſubtile Scotus is falſely accuſed of admitting a kind of real diſtinction between the Divine Eſſence and its attributes; he adds, that he had lately diſcourſed at Orange with an apoſtate, who alledged the authority of Scotus to maintain a new blaſphemy. Placuit hanc crambem obiter hic recoquere, quia his ipſis diebus Arauſicæ, murcus FIDEI DESERTOR blaſphemiam novam Scoti autoritate tegere eſt auſus (19). That blaſphemy was, that the three perſonalities of the Trinity are modes of the Divine Eſſence properly ſo called. He obſerves, that this innovator, who quoted Scotus in his preſence, had not made uſe of his authority in his diſputation de Suppoſito. It is a ſign he meant Derodon. Here is another proof of it: 'Perperam tam craſſus 'error, ſimplicitatem divinam & puriſſimam actuali'tatem exſcindens tanti viri (Scoti) ſuffragio calum'niosè captato munitus eſt ab eo, quem retuli ſpurco 'fidei deſertore male Rotundo (20). - - - It is without 'reaſon that ſuch a groſs error as this, which deſtroys 'the ſimplicity of the divine nature, and the purity of his 'eſſence, is ſaid to be warranted by the authority of ſo 'great a man as* Scotus. This, I ſay, is falſely ſug'geſted by that dirty apoſtate whom I mentioned before as 'a man who only in an evil ſenſe is round.' This laſt word is a manifeſt alluſion to Derodon's name. Three years after he made uſe of the ſame quibble in another book, wherein he refuted Derodon, who maintained that the work intituled Theſaurus, and aſcribed to St Cyril, was not that Father's. 'Eidem 'S. Cyrillo ſuppoſitum eſſe opus quod inſcribitur The'ſaurus contendit ſpurcus hæreticus, autor diſputationis 'de ſuppoſito, quam nuperrime ementito nomine loci 'ſuoque ſuppreſſo, homo male teres atque ROTUNDUS 'edidit Arauſicæ. In ea diſputatione, quæ eſt una 'jugis hæreſeon & atrociſſimarum calumniarum lepra, 'nebulo qui in S. Cyrillum maxime rabit, abjudicat 'ei opus Theſauri (21). - - - - - That dirty Heretic 'the author of the diſputation de Suppoſito, which 'he lately publiſhed at Orange, giving the falſe name 'of a place, and ſuppreſſing his own, maintains that the 'work intituled* Theſaurus is without reaſon aſcribed to 'St Cyril. In that diſputation, which is one continued 'ſcab of Hereſies and enormous ſlanders, the knave, who 'rails at St Cyril in the moſt furious manner, will not 'allow him to have writ the* Theſaurus.'

(19) Theoph. Raynaud, Hoplotheca. Sect. ii, Sera i, cap. ult, pag. 89. That book was printed at Lyons in the year 1650.

(20) Ib. p. 90.

(21) Idem, Eremet. de multis ac bonis Libris, num. 209, pag. m. 134. See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. i, p. 343.

ROHAN (RENATA DE) daughter of Lewis de Rohan the fourth of that name, lord de Guemené (a), was the accidental cauſe of a murder, which had like to have occaſioned many diſorders at the court of France, ſoon after the death of Francis II [A]. She

(a) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 536.

[A] Soon after the death of Francis II.] Varillas ſays (1), that it was three days after the death of that prince; but he is miſtaken, having not carefully conſidered Thuanus's words. Triduo poſt de Vicedomini Carnutum morte allatum eſt . . . . . in idem tempus incidit Buellii . . . . . cædes (2). If he had minded what goes before, he might have ſeen that this triduo refers to the 21ſt of December (3), on which day a reſolution was formed, the ſubſtance whereof was given juſt before by that Hiſtorian. According to this account,

(1) In the two editions of the Life of Charles IX.

(2) Thuanus, lib. xxv, pag. 525.

(3) XII Kalend. Januar.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

She was the widow of Francis de Rohan, lord de Gié, and courted by the count de Laval (b). The baſtard de Bueil, ſon to the count de Sancerré, and one of the moſt renowned bravoes of the duke of Guiſe, deſigning to oppoſe that courtſhip, was not contented to become the count's rival, but alſo inſolently gave out that this widow, after a promiſe of marriage, written and ſigned with her own hand, had granted him the laſt favours. Perhaps he only intended to give Laval and his other rivals, a diſguſt to that lady; but Laval was of opinion, that is was an affront which required ſhedding of blood [B]; and becauſe his eſteem for the baſtard was not great enough to do him the honour to fight him, he took an opportunity to kill him at Orleans (c). The conſtable Montmorency approved that murther, and ſollicited a pardon for Laval (d): on the contrary, the houſe of Guiſe urged that the murderer ſhould be puniſhed; and their credit did ſo prevail in the council, that the king of Navarre, in whoſe palace Laval had taken ſanctuary, was obliged to procure his eſcape in the night. Afterwards his eſtate was confiſcated (e). Thoſe, who ſay that the Conſtable protected the murtherer, becauſe he was of his family, are not miſtaken [C]. Our Renata was married to Renatus de Laval (f); and John de Laval, marquis de Neſle, was her third huſband.

(b) Renatus de Laval, lord de Loüé.

(c) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. i, pag. 8.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Father Anſelme, ubi ſupra.

count, the news of the Vidame's death came to Orleans the 24th of December. But Francis II died the fifth of the ſame month, and therefore there had been more than three days between the king's death, and the baſtard's murder. Tho' I take notice of this fault, I am not ignorant that it is very inconſiderable; but it is fit the readers ſhould know what leads a writer into an error. I do not pretend that the Vidame of Chartres died fifteen or ſixteen days after the king; I only mean, that if we keep to Thuanus's account, we muſt judge of it in that manner: but I would adviſe no body to give credit to that Hiſtorian in this particular. My reaſon is, that Thuanus follows preſident de la Place, whoſe Chronology is not at all exact upon this head. For the account he gives runs thus: Francis II dies the 5th of December 1560; the king of Navarre reſigns the regency to the Queen-mother; a regulation is agreed upon the 21ſt of December; three days after the death of the Vidame of Chartres is heard of; the greateſt difficulties being removed by that regulation, the holding of the ſtates is reſolved upon, notwithſtanding the proteſtations of part of the deputies; cardinal de Lorrain endeavours to get a commiſſion to harangue the three eſtates of the kingdom; he does not obtain it; in the mean while the baſtard of Sancerre is killed; laſtly, the eſtates meet on the 13th of December. This is the model that Thuanus goes by, which is of no uſe to fix the day on which the Vidame died, nor that on which the baſtard was killed.

[B] That it was an affront which required ſhedding of blood.] According to the unhappy maxims of the point of honour, men cannot judge otherwiſe, conſidering how indulgent the judges are to thoſe who ſtain a woman's reputation by their ſlanders. If you proſecute a downright calumniator, or an indiſcreet bragging fool upon ſuch an account, they will come off with a denial or a retractation, which does not put an end to the ſuſpicions and reflexions. This is what induces a dueliſt to right himſelf. The baſtard of Sancerre expected it, and without doubt truſted to his courage and ſkill, more than to the juſtice of his cauſe (4); for can any one ſay with any juſtice, even without telling a lie, that he has obtained ſuch favours? But he was attacked in ſuch a manner, that he could not defend himſelf.

(4) Buellius, qui earum (nuptiarum) ſpe ſe dejectum dolebat, ut impedimentum afferret à Renata ſibi data fidem dicere, & ut erat pugnacitatis fama arrogans, parum honeſtè de illuſtri fœmina loqueretur. Thuanus, ubi ſupra.

[C] Thoſe, who ſay . . . . are not miſtaken.] Preſident de la Place is one of them (5); Loüé, ſays he, was ſupported by the Conſtable, becauſe the ſaid Lady was grand-niece to the ſaid Conſtable, and the ſaid Loüé was deſcended in a direct male line from the Conſtable Matthew Montmorency, as well as the ſaid Conſtable. Thuanus makes the ſame obſervation concerning Renatus de Laval: 'Unde magna rurſus irarum ſeges 'inter Guiſianos & Momorantios orta eſt, cum illi 'Sancerræ Comiti adeſſent, hi Lavallum uti ex Mat- 'thæi Momorantii Equitum Magiſtri ſtirpe profectum 'tutarentur (6). - - - This produced another great quar- 'rel between the houſes of Guiſe and Montmorency; while 'the firſt ſtood up for the count de Sancerre, and the other 'defended Laval as being deſcended from the Conſtable 'Matthew Montmorency.' I cannot apprehend why Varillas, who had ſaid in the firſt edition of his life of Charles IX (7), That the count de Laval was of the houſe of Montmorency, ſtruck it out in the ſecond. I eaſily apprehend why he left out, that this count was brother-in-law to the Chatillons; for it is a plain falſity: but the other fact agrees with the Genealogy of the houſe of Montmorency, publiſhed by du Cheſne (8).

(5) De l'Etat de la Relig. & Repub. livr. iii, towards the end.

(6) Thuanus, ubi ſupra.

(7) Tom. i, pag. 8, Dutch Edit.

(8) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers de la Couronne, pag. 19.

ROHAN (ANNE DE) the daughter of Renatus de Rohan and Catherine de Parthenai, heireſs of the houſe of Soubiſe, was no leſs illuſtrious for her piety and wit, than for her noble extraction. She was ſiſter to the duke of Rohan, the ſupport of the Proteſtants during the civil wars, in the reign of Lewis XIII. I have ſaid in another place (a), that ſhe bore the hardſhips of the ſiege of Rochelle with an heroical conſtancy; and that, for the ſpace of three months, ſhe lived upon horſe-fleſh and four ounces of bread every day. The Hiſtorian (b) who informs us of this particular, adds, that ſhe and her mother refuſed to be comprehended in the capitulation, and remained priſoners of war. He beſtows this encomium upon her, that ſhe was celebrated for her exemplary piety among thoſe of her religion, and for her learning which was uncommon in one of her ſex. She made very good verſes: the excellent Poem ſhe wrote upon the death of Henry IV [A] is a proof of it. What is ſaid of her ſkill in the Hebrew tongue is very

(a) In the article of Catherine de PARTHENAI.

(b) Hiſt. du Duc de Rohan, Paris 1666.

[A] The excellent Poem ſhe wrote upon the death of Henry IV.] D'Aubigné, who was ſparing of his praiſes, inſerted part of it at the end of his Hiſtory, and prefixed theſe words to it: Anne de Rohan, princeſs of Leon, and of all thoſe who write well at this time, will ſpeak better than I. She expreſſes herſelf thus:

Quoi? faut-il que Henri, ce redouté Monarque,
Ce dompteur des humains, ſoit dompté par la Parque?

Ha! muſt dread Henry too reſign his breath,
And, conqueror of men, ſubmit to death?

I would not have mentioned theſe two verſes, were it not that they afford matter for a criticiſm. Mr Pelliſſon having ſaid. (1) That it was one of Malherbe's maxims, that the adjectives ending with an e maſculine, ought never to be placed before, but after a ſubſtantive; whereas thoſe that have a feminine termination, may be placed before or after, as one thinks fit; that one may ſay for inſtance ce redoutable Monarque; or, ce monarque redoutable; and, on the contrary, that one may ſay ce monarque redoute, but not ce redouté monarque; I ſay, Mr Pelliſſon having ſaid this, goes on thus: I have not pitched upon this example without reaſon, and at random;

(1) Hiſt. de l'Acad. Françoiſe, pag. m. 178.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google very remarkable [B]. She died a maid at Paris the twentieth of September, 1646, in the sixty-second year of her age. Mrs Schurman wrote some letters to her, which may be seen in the collection of her works.

random; for I have often heard Mr de Gombauld say, that before this observation had been made, Malherbe and he walking one day together, and discoursing of some verses of Anne de Rohan, one of which was,

Quoy faut-il que Henri, ce redouté Monarque,

Malherbe told him several times, that he did not like the end of that verse, without being able to give any reason for it; which made him consider it very attentively, and having immediately found out the reason of it, he imparted it to Malherbe, who was as much pleased as if he had found a treasure, and afterwards made a general rule of it. Now here is an observation of Menage not very well grounded. Mr de Gombauld, says he (2), did also frequently discourse with me of that conversation he had with Malherbe, but not altogether in the same manner as Mr Pellisson relates it; for he always told me, that it was he who perceived, that redouté Monarque was wrong. However, that rule, whether it be Malherbe's or Gombauld's . . . . . is altogether false: He proves (3) it by several examples and shews that Malherbe himself did not keep to it, since he said in two places asseuré Secours. But this is not the thing I would be at. I maintain, that Menage understood Mr Pellisson's words, as if they signified that it was Malherbe, and not Gombauld, who found out the reason why the verse in question was faulty; for had he not understood them in that sense, he would not have said this rule, whether it be Malherbe's or Gombauld's. The plain meaning of which is, that this rule was found out by Malherbe, according to Mr Pellisson's account, and by Gombauld, if we rely on what Menage was told by Gombauld himself. But it is more plain still, that Mr Pellisson ascribes the discovery to the latter, and not at all to Malherbe: will any body wonder, that sometimes a Latin author should not be understood for want of application; since Mr Menage did not understand a French author, though he expressed himself very intelligibly?

(2) Observations sur les Poësies de Malherbe, pag. 302.

(3) Ibid.

[B] What is said of her skill in the Hebrew tongue, is very remarkable.] She read the Old Testament in that language; and instead of singing Psalms at church in French verse as others did, she meditated upon them in Hebrew. 'Hanc illustrissimam & sapientissimam 'Principem Hebraicis Literis haud leviter fuisse tinctam 'testis fuit αὐτόπτης Rev. Parens, dum Parisiis dege- 'ret; quotiescunque enim ipsam adiret, Vet. Testa- 'menti caput aliquod Hebraicè legentem inveniebat, '&, quod mirere, ne in Ecclesia quidem hocce stu- 'dium deseruit, cùm etiam illic, dùm Hymni Davi- 'dici decantarentur, ipsa interim Hebraico idiomate 'mente psalleret (4). - - - - My father, while he lived (4) Colomesius, in Gallia Orientali, pag. 265. 'at Paris was himself an eye-witness of the great skill, 'which that most illustrious and wise princess had in the 'Hebrew tongue; for as often as he waited upon her, 'he found her reading some chapter in the Hebrew Bible; 'but what will raise your wonder is, that even at 'church, she did not quit this study, for while other people 'were singing the Psalms of David there, she, in the 'mean time, sung them over in Hebrew to herself.' Mr Colomiés, who mentions this, alledges an authority for it, which is worth transcribing. 'Hujus in 'Hebraicis peritiam firmat Phil. Aquinas Epistola 'Præfat. in capitula Patrum, à se ex Hebræo in Gal- 'licum sermonem versa (5). - - Philip d'Aquin witnesses (5) Ibid. 'her great knowledge in the Hebrew tongue, in the Pre- 'fatory Epistle to* Pirke Avoth (capitula Patrum), which 'he translated from the Hebrew into French.''

ROY (JAMES LE) Baron of the holy empire, and Lord of St Lambert, descended from an ancient and noble family originally of France [A], got a great reputation by the works he published. He was born at Antwerp the twenty-eighth of October, 1633. As soon as his age permitted him to travel, Baron LE ROY (a), his father, sent him to the most famous universities of Europe, and at his return resigned to him the places he was possessed of at the court of Brussels. Our Baron did so punctually discharge the duties of those places, that the marquis de Caracene, governor of the Low-Countries, sent him into Spain to inform his Catholic majesty, Philip IV, of the state of his government. Having worthily performed his commission, he returned into the Netherlands, and could not agree with the marquis de Castel Rodrigo, governor of that country; wherefore he resolved to lay down his employments, and retired to his seat near Antwerp. Had it not been for this, he would have raised himself to the most considerable civil offices; but the commonwealth of learning would have lost by it; for he had not been at leisure to write several books that have been published [B]. See the remark [B].

(a) PHILIP LE ROI, Seigneur de Ravels Broughem, & de St. Lambert en Brabant. See the remark [A].

There

[A] He was descended of an antient and noble family, originally of France.] The ancestors of baron le Roy left France, to follow Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, and settled in the Low-Countries.

PHILIP LE ROY, knight-banneret, lord of Brouchem, &c. the father of him who is the subject of this article, bought of the lady Margaret Baudewyns the lordship of Chapelle St Lambert, the fifteenth of December, 1654 (1). He was made free baron of the holy empire by a patent of the emperor Leopold, dated from Luxemburg the thirtieth of May, 1671 (2). He was then counsellor to his Catholic Majesty in the supreme council of the finances of the Low-Countries and Burgundy.

(1) Topograph. Gallo-Brabantiæ, pag. 185.

(2) You find an abstract of it in the 70th page of the book of which I have given the title below, citation (10).

[B] He wrote some books that have been published.] The first book he undertook to write in his retirement, was the Notitia Marchionatus Sacri Romani Imperii (3), which was printed at Amsterdam in folio, in the year 1678. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (4). He published afterwards in the same city, in the year 1683, a piece intituled, Achates Tiberianus, sive gemma Cæsarea, antiquitate, argumento, arte, historia prorsus incomparabilis, D. Augusti apotheosin, Imp. Cæs. Tiberii, Augustæque Juliæ Domus seriem & iconas, gentesque bello captas repræsentans, notis historicis illustrata, in folio. See the Acta Eruditorum (5), and the Journal des Savans (6). He printed, in 1693, at Amsterdam, a book in folio with this title, Topographia Historica Gallo-Brabantiæ, qua Remanduæ oppida, municipia & dominia illustrantur, atque Monasteria, Nobiliumque Prætoria, Castellaque in æs incisa exhibentur. This book contains a very particular account of that part of the Low-Countries called the Walloon Brabant; and if we had such a description of all Europe, it would be extremely useful and instructive. I add, that he has commented upon the chronicle of Balduinus de Avennis, and that he is now (7) commenting upon that of the Monk Albericus, Trium-fontium, which has never been printed, and the publication whereof has been wished for a long time. He has lately published (8) a small book of thirteen pages, intituled, Prædictio Anthoniæ Bourignon de vastatione urbis Bruxellarum per ignem, wherein, after a short description of the misery that town suffered on the thirteenth of August, 1695, when the French bombarded it, he mentions what has been said concerning Antoinette Bourignon, in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, and these words of one of her letters. I do not see how I can stay at Brussels, tho' I had full liberty to do it; nor could I stay long in it, SINCE

(3) Antwerp is the capital of that marquisate, which is one of the 17 provinces of the Low-Countries.

(4) For September 1685, Art. V, p. m. 1004.

(5) Acta Eruditorum Lipsiæ, 1684, p. 235.

(6) Journal des Sçavans, March 19, 1685.

(7) In the year 1696.

(8) At Amsterdam 1696.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

There is something in that remark which concerns Mrs Bourignon, and at which her friends have been offended. I shall examine what one of them says in answer to my remark [C].

BRUSSELS IS TO BE DESTROYED BY FIRE, if I have had a right vision, as I told you at Masuriel's house (9). The spirit which revealed this burning to Mrs Bourignon, did not well fix the time; for she fancied, in the year 1666, that Brussels would be shortly burnt down, and yet it was not bombarded till twenty-nine years after.

(9) These words are taken from a letter written from Ghent to Mr de Cort, the 15th of January 1666. It is the 12th of the 3d part of a book, intituled, Tombeau de la fausse Theologie.

Since the first impression of this article, baron le Roy has published, Castella & Prætoria Nobilium Brabantiæ, Cœnobiaque celebriora ad vivum delineata ærique incisa . . . . . cum brevi eorundem descriptione. At Antwerp, 1696, in folio. And L'Erection de toutes les Terres, &c. The erection of all the seats, lordships, and families, of Brabant, proved by extracts of original patents (10). Such a book should be printed for each province of Europe, whereby one might know those, who boldly assume the title of marquis, or count.

(10) This book was printed at Leyden, for Peter vander Aa, in the year 1699, in folio.

[C] I shall examine what one of Mrs Bourignon's friends says in answer to my remark.] His answer is to be found in a letter concerning mystical authors, printed a year ago (11) with the book intituled Theologie réelle vulgairement dite la Theologie Germanique. The anonymous author, who has published this, quotes my words, and then adds (12). 'No, by your leave, 'laying aside all manner of equivocation, there was 'no time neither well nor ill fixed in the prediction, 'as you intimate: besides, it was not a verbal revelation, as you would make us understand, in order 'to make it susceptible of a falsity as to the time; 'but it was visual, and consequently of such a nature, as to fix no time in express words. Nor did 'Mrs Bourignon fancy, that Brussels would be burnt 'down in a set time, sooner or later; but nothing 'being determined upon that point, no time being 'fixed or excluded, this indetermination was the true 'reason why she did not think herself secure from that 'danger at any time, and had a provident care at all 'times.' He adds, That, in the same manner, the Lord and his Apostles having foretold in general his second coming, exhorted the Christians to be watchful at all times, lest they should be surprized; whereupon a profane man might have had a better pretence than our author, to say as he does, 'The spirit, which revealed that 'second coming to them, did not well fix the time; for 'they fancied, seventeen hundred years ago, that it should 'happen in their life-time, and yet no such thing has 'been seen hitherto.' St Peter tells us, that the profane men of his time argued then in that manner. Thus the anonymous author criticizes my remark: I will make it appear that he lies under a great illusion.

(11) At Amsterdam, for Henry Wetstein 1701, in 12mo. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Nov. 1700, pag. 555, & seq.

(12) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Mystiques, pag. 114.

I observed, that the spirit did not fix the time well; and this author owns that it fixed no time. What can I desire more? Is it not manifest, that whoever does not fix a time, does neither fix it right nor wrong; and that therefore one may say he did not fix it well? My assertion is therefore true; and it is certain, at least that Mrs Bourignon drew a false consequence from what had been revealed to her visually. She concluded from it, that Brussels would be shortly destroyed by fire; for she believed that the permission she had to stay in that town, would serve her but for a little time; I say, she came to think so, by reason of the visual Revelation we are told of. As she resolved to leave a town, which she thought was ready to be burnt, she would doubtless have advised all those, who had been willing to be directed by her, to do the same; she would therefore have given that advice to all the inhabitants of Brussels, if they had been her disciples. Now, how strangely had they been deluded, if they had followed her direction! A great many people, who could not live above ten, twelve, fifteen, or twenty years, had left their birth-place for fear of being destroyed by a fire that was to happen twenty-nine years after. They had been imposed upon by false prophecies; for a revelation, though true in it self, because it exhibits only some images, becomes fallacious and deceitful when applied to times or places that do not belong to it. If the revealing spirit does not deceive, the person who receives the revelation will nevertheless deceive by his false applications; and therefore Mrs Bourignon's apologist, without being aware of it, enables us to conclude, that she has been a false prophetess in this point. It were better to have no revelations at all, than to receive prophecies that are not understood, and the wrong explication of which moves one to make useless steps, and ill grounded precautions. If Mrs Bourignon had been quiet in the places which she thought would be entirely burnt down, she would have lived there the remaining part of her life, without seeing that prediction fulfilled; for she died fifteen years before Brussels was bombarded. She was therefore afraid without any reason, and she removed out of a panic fear. I would not have you to think, that I grant to her apologist, that the visual revelation he speaks of was evidently verified by the event (13). The bombarding of Brussels has no greater connexion with the vision of that woman, than with the dreams of other people. I think it will be granted me, that most people do sometimes see a town on fire in their dreams. When we dream that a house is set on fire, it is commonly that which belongs to us: if we dream that a town sinks in the water, or is devoured by flames, it is commonly a town that is best known to us, that wherein we were born, or where we make our abode. I therefore venture to say, and I think those who mind their dreams will not charge me with rashness for it, that several citizens of Brussels have seen that town on fire in a dream; and even that some of them dreamed that it was bombarded (14). Must such dreams be accounted prophetical? Visions of this kind in the head of devout people, are more suspicious than in the head of worldly people; for a devout person fancies, when he is awake, that the corruption he sees in a great town will draw fire from Heaven upon it. Now people do commonly see, when they are asleep, what they have thought of being awake (15). I omit that, according to Mrs Bourignon's prophecy, Brussels was to be destroyed by fire: it is plain, this denotes a total destruction, and therefore it is not the bombarding of the year 1695. That town was not destroyed by it; only several houses were ruined or damaged. It grew finer and more magnificent a few years after; and the inhabitants were so little concerned for the damage, occasioned by the bombs, that when they heard that the treaty of Riswick was carried on successfully, they freely owned they had rather be bombarded three or four times, than see the end of a war, which brought in money amongst them so plentifully.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Especially since the Gazettes did so frequently mention the bombarding of towns.

(15) See what is said above, in the remark [G], of the article of a LOTICHIUS (PETER).

The best thing alledged by the anonymous writer, is the prediction of the Apostles concerning the last coming of the Son of GOD. They preached it as being ready at hand (16), and yet seventeen hundred years have passed and that prophecy is not fulfilled. The solution of this difficulty may be seen in the commentaries upon the Scripture. I shall only say, that this was never looked upon as a sufficient reason to justify those, who, in the following ages, foretold things that did not come to pass. They have always been accounted false Prophets, or false interpreters of the Apocalypse. Why should I be the only man not allowed to make use of the same argument against those who pretended to foretel things to come? It is well known, that those who are engaged to vindicate the new Prophets, answer the objections, as this anonymous writer does, at the cost of the true Prophets mentioned in the Scripture. We have not forgot yet the Pastoral Letters of the author he speaks of some pages before, Who, says he (17), will have many chimerical prophets of all ages to be truly inspired, and expects still that his party will be restored in France by way of inspiration. It was in vain for him to alledge the Prophets of the Old Testament, in order to justifie the pretended Prophets of Dauphiné: wise and pious people following the dictates of reason, declared against them; and when the time fixed by him for the deliverance was expired, they maintained that his prophetical inspirations were false. They were not afraid that the prediction of the second coming of CHRIST, alledged by the anonymous writer, would be objected against them. I proceed in this matter

(16) For they exhorted those, to whom they spoke, to keep themselves ready for it.

(17) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Mystiques, pag. 108.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google matter as those gentlemen did, and as it has been the constant practice of the most grave Divines, whenever any fanatics arose, whose prophecies were confuted by the event.

I must answer another complaint of Mrs Bourignon's apologist. He says, that I seem to take a great delight in reflecting upon her, and very much enlarges upon it. He adds, that I frequently refer my readers to a libel of Mr de Seckendorf; whereupon he quotes a long passage of Mr Thomasius, professor at Hall, whereby it appears that Mr de Seckendorf was blinded by his passion when he writ against that gentlewoman. I answer in few words, 1. That none will say I had a mind to reflect upon her, but such as are prepossessed with an infatuating admiration: being charmed with the perfections they think they discover in a certain person, they can find no fault in him, all his actions appear holy to them, and they grow very angry with those who are more discerning, and undertake to shew the weak side of such a person. I have not in the least reflected upon Mrs Bourignon's zeal and chastity; I only made a plain and historical abridgment of her life, referring my readers to a memoir imparted to me by Mr Poiret, which our anonymous author takes to be advantageous to that gentlewoman. If I said something of her scolding humour, and of her great vigilance in the oeconomy of her estate, it is what truth required from me as an Historian. I have advanced nothing without a proof for it; but let the impartial readers judge of it. I answer in the second place, that among several quotations out of Antoinette's life and works, there are hardly above five or six out of Mr de Seckendorf. Why then does this anonymous writer intimate that I entirely depend upon the authority of that author? Lastly, I say, that I knew not then what Mr Thomasius observes concerning the proceedings of that illustrious German. Mr Thomasius is a man of merit, and I have had a long time a great esteem for him: I need not object any thing against his remarks, for he charges Mr de Seckendorf with curtailing some passages only in what concerns the opinions of Mrs Bourignon; but I have only quoted him for a matter of fact, and I have most times confirmed what I take from him by some other passages. I have no reason to think that he was blinded by passion in that respect. After all, if he was so guilty as this author will have it, would no body have taken notice of it? Would not Mr Poiret, whom he has confuted, have writ against him a second time to shew his unfairness?

I shall make no answer to several other observations of the anonymous author. His complaints are very general, and plainly shew that he is too touchy, and wants still to mortify his internal senses. The mortification of the external senses is not sufficient; one must chiefly overcome the irascible appetite. I beseech him to think seriously of it, and I refer him to the answers I have already made (18), or to this general observation, viz. That it would be a needless and insignificant thing to answer complaints grounded upon no manner of proof. If any one raises any particular objection against me, and examines some arguments advanced in this Dictionary fairly cited, I shall not deny him an answer; but as to general complaints, I shall only appeal to the equitable readers.

(18) In my Reflexions sur le Jugemens du public, touché de quelques endroits de son Dictionnaire, où l'auteur, pag. 312, 313.

RONSARD (PETER DE) a famous French Poet, of a noble family [A], was born in Vendomois the same year that Francis the first was made prisoner before Pavia. This circumstance of time occasioned some injudicious reflexions [B]. He was in [A] Of a noble family.] Lewis de Ronsard, his father, was knight of the order of St Michael, and High-steward to Francis I, who pitched upon him to attend Francis, Dauphin de Viennois, and Henry, duke of Orleans, his sons, into Spain, while they were there as hostages for the king their father (1). He married Joan de Chandrier, whose family was related to that of la Trimouille, &c. and consequently to that of Craon; from whence the kings of England are descended, by the match of the empress Maud (2): so that he (3) made it appear that Ronsard was related in the sixteenth or seventeenth degree to Elizabeth queen of England. It is said, that Lewis de Ronsard was descended from one Baudouin, a younger brother of a great family (4), upon the borders of Hungary and Bulgaria, who brought a company of gentlemen to king Philip de Valois (5). Nay, it is said that there is a lordship called the marquisate of Ronsard (6), in the place where the Danube is neareſt to Thrace (7); but I think this may be looked upon as one of the romantic stories which most noble houses tell of their first founders (8). They are very fond of deriving their original from the remotest countries, and from some younger brother of a noble extraction, a brave adventurer, whose fine exploits were very well rewarded by the prince in whose service he engaged. If such stories were only told by three or four families, one would not be so apt to laugh at them. As for the rest, the author quoted by me has only turned into prose what Ronsard said of his extraction in one of his elegies (9). Du Perron (10) told the same story, but instead of Bulgaria he said Moravia. The collection of the finest pieces of the French Poets, printed in 1692, contains (11) a life of Ronsard, wherein it is said he originally came from Hungary and Bulgaria. If it be not an absurdity, it is at least a falsification; for the tradition of that family assigns but one native country to their ancestors, upon the borders of Hungary and Bulgaria. They are the words of Claudius Binet: thus you see how writers run into mistakes, when they change the terms of the originals, whether it be in order to be shorter, or because those words are thought to be too old. The word borders should not have been left out here.

(1) Binet, Vie de Ronsard, in the 9th Tome of Ronsard's works, in 12mo, pag. 113. Note, That du Perron, in the funeral oration of Ronsard, in the same volume, p. 189, does not say, that Lewis de Ronsard was High-steward to Francis I, but to Henry II.

(2) Binet, ibid. pag. 112.

(3) That is, the Sieur du Fauz of Angers, in his Memoirs. There is, in my edition, le Sieur du Faur; but I find in la Croix du Maine that this author's name was Pascal Robin du Fauz.

(4) Binet, ibid.

(5) Ib. p. 113.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ib. p. 112.

(8) See, above, remark [C], of the article PINET.

(9) The 20th. It is inscribed to Belleau.

(10) Oraison funebre de Ronsard, pag. 188.

(11) In the first Tome, p. 239.

[B] Some injudicious reflexions.] 'Peter de Ronsard, 'son of Lewis de Ronsard, and Joan de Chandrier, 'was born in the castle de la Poissonnerie . . . . . 'upon a Saturday the eleventh of September, 1524; 'on which day king Francis was made prisoner 'before Pavia. It is a question whether France was 'more unfortunate by the king's imprisonment, 'or happy by such a birth, which was made re-'markable, like that of many other great men, by 'such a memorable event. Thus the birth of the 'great Alexander was signalized, and as it were 'lighted by the flames which consumed the temple 'of Diana at Ephesus (12).' What a fine compensation is this! Was not France well indemnified for the imprisonment of her king, a misfortune which had like to have occasioned the ruin of the kingdom, and which actually occasioned a long series of shameful and dismal losses to the nation; I say, was not France well indemnified, since a wit was born on that very day, who adorned her with thousands of verses by way of sonnets, madrigals, stanzas, hymns, odes, &c. this thought of Claudius Binet could not be tolerable but in a Poem of a panegyrist; and even there men of sense would censure it as an insipid hyperbole. Doubtless this was the reason why du Perron did not make use of it in his funeral oration on Peter Ronsard (13). What shall we say then, when we see it in prose in a piece of History, I mean, in the life of Ronsard? But what shall we say of Thuanus, that grave, that venerable magistrate, who very seriously set forth the same thought in a general History, which is a master-piece? 'Natus erat, (Petrus Ronsar-'dus) says he (14), eodem quo infeliciter à nostris ad 'Ticinum pugnatum est, anno, ut ipse in Elegia ad 'Remigium Bellaqueum scribit, quasi Deus jacturam 'nominis Gallici eo prælio factam & secutum ex illo 'veluti nostrarum rerum interitum tanti viri ortu com-'pensare voluerit. - - - - - He was born, as he himself 'takes notice in an an elegy to Remi Belleau, in the same 'year that our countrymen were beaten before Pavia; as 'if God had been willing to compensate the loss of honour 'which the French sustained in that battle, and the great 'disorder of our affairs that ensued, by the birth of so 'great a man.' Take notice that Thuanus does not say that Ronsard was born on the same day that the battle

(12) Binet, ibid. pag. 113.

(13) See, below, citation (18).

(14) Thuanus, lib. lxxxi, fub fin. pag. m. 43, ed. ann. 1583.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in danger of perishing on his birth-day; and the hazard he run was attended with an incident, which occasioned some witty conceits, that are not more solid than those reflexions [C]. He put himself at the head of some soldiers in Vendomois, in the year 1562, and made as great a slaughter of the Protestants as ever he could [D]; which was the reason battle of Pavia was fought: he only says, that Poet was born in the same year. But Claudius Binet, not finding that wonderful enough, affirms, that those two things happened the same day. He betrays himself, he discovers his lie; for he marks the eleventh day of September, 1524, as the birth day of his Poet; and every body knows that Francis I. was beaten before Pavia the twenty-fourth of February, 1525. However, Ronsard was born in the same year, according to the way of reckoning at that time; for the year did not then begin in France, the first day of January, but at Easter, and so the battle of Pavia was in the year 1524. It cannot be said that there is an error of the press in Binet's book; for when he tells us that Ronsard died the twenty-seventh of December, 1585, he says, that Poet was sixty-one years, three months, and sixteen days old (15), and therefore he believed that he was born the eleventh of September, 1524. Which gives me occasion to take notice of a mistake of Sammarthanus (16); but, I confess, there is some uncertainty in the matter, whereby he might be excused. It is only from a passage of Ronsard that we know he was born the same year that Francis I was taken; at least it is certain that du Perron alledged no other proof against those who were not of that opinion. As to the time of his birth, says he (17), 'There are several opinions 'about it. Some think he was born in the year 1522, 'and that consequently he died in his climacterical year, 'as it has been observed of many great men. Others 'stick to what he writes, that he was born the same 'year that the great king Francis was made a prisoner; as the birth of illustrious men is frequently remarkable by such notable events. We may further 'observe, that the taking of that king, before Pavia, 'by which Ronsard denotes the year of his birth, falls 'exactly upon the same day on which we celebrate 'the memory of his death, which is St Matthias's 'day (18).' This only proof of du Perron will appear weak, if we consider that Ronsard in one of his Poems mentions his age, which does not suit with a man born in 1524, or 1525. These are his words: they are rough and not very suitable to the subject, but he was answering satirical and railing adversaries, who accused him, among other things, of a voluptuous life.

Tu dis que je suis vieil, encore n'ay-je atteint
Trente & sept ans passez, & mon corps ne se plaint
D'ans ny de maladie, & en toutes les sortes
Mes nerfs sont bien tendus, & mes veines bien fortes;
Et si j'ay le teint palle & le cheveu grison,
Mes membres toutesfois ne sont hors de saison (19).

You say I'm old; though yet, as I declare,
My years not fully sev'n and thirty are:
Robust and firm my body still remains,
And nor of sickness, nor of age complains.
My sinews and my veins are strong and hail:
Then if my locks be gray, or visage pale,
It matters not, since I in ev'ry limb
Am sound and vigorous . . . . . .

The Poem, wherein he speaks thus, was composed some weeks after the death of the duke of Guise (20) and consequently in the spring of the year, 1563. A man, who was then but thirty-seven years old, must have been born in 1526, and at this rate Scævola Sammarthanus would not be to blame. It is somewhat strange, that our Poet did not well know when he was born.

[C] Which occasioned some witty conceits, that are not more solid than those reflexions.] 'His birth-day had 'like to have been the day of his burial; for as they 'were going from the castle de la Poissonnerie to the 'parochial church, to get him christened, the woman 'who carried him, going over a meadow, let him fall 'through inadvertency; but he fell gently upon the 'grass and the flowers of the meadow. Besides, a gentlewoman, who carried a vessel full of rose-water 'and also several sorts of herbs and flowers, as it is 'usual, going to take up the child, spilt upon his head 'part of that sweet-smelling water, which was a presage of the good smell which the flowers of his 'learned writings would spread all over the king-'dom (21).' This is what the Italians call Concetti. When Mr le Païs wrote the History of Ronsard's Muse, he omitted not to make some verses upon that thought. He was born, says he, of a knight of the order, on the same day that Francis the first was taken at the battle of Pavia; and it has been said to his glory, that France would have been inconsolable on account of such an unfortunate day, if that same day had not produced so great a man. His birth-day had like to have been that of his death. A gentlewoman, who carried him (22) from the castle de la Poissonnerie, where he was born, to the church of the parish, where he was to be christened, let him fall unawares; but by good luck he fell in a meadow, and upon flowers, and got no hurt by it, only he was wet all over with the rose-water, which they carried, as it is usual for the christning.

Ce ne fut point sans doute un effet du hazard,
Je croi qu'on peut sans badinage,
Dire que ce fut un presage
De la fortune de Ronsard;
Un presage certain qui fit alors comprendre,
Combien de bonne odeur Ronsard devoit répandre,
Un presage certain que les neuf doctes Sœurs,
Dont il devoit chanter la gloire,
Pour éterniser sa memoire
Luy feroient quelque jour des couronnes de fleurs (23).

[D] He put himself at the head of some soldiers . . . . against the Protestants.] I shall set down a passage of Beza. 'The worst of all was, that the mob broke 'not only the images, but also some monuments of 'the house of Vendome, that is now the head of 'the house of Bourbon, which was taken very 'heinously, and not without reason. When the Ro-'manists saw this, and that part of the nobility of 'the country were gone to the prince at Orleans, and 'others had thrown themselves into the town of 'Mans, they began to keep the Reformed under 'great constraint. Among others, Peter Ronsard, 'a gentleman, the most excellent French Poet of our 'time, who let his tongue to hire, not only to defile 'his Muse with all sorts of filthiness, but also to 'slander our religion, and those who professed it, 'having turned Priest, resolved to have a hand in 'those quarrels with his companions. In order to 'it, having got together some soldiers in a village 'called Evaille, which was his parish, made several 'excursions attended with plunder and murders (24).' Spondanus will have it, that the nobility of Vendomois pitched upon the priest Ronsard to be their head; but I had rather keep to Beza's narrative. However, I shall set down the words of that Annalist. They contain some other things that want to be rectified. Arma quoque sumens nobilitas, ducem sibi elegit Ronsardum, qui insolentiam profanorum non ferens, multos ex iis male mulctavit: quamquam curionatum Evalliæ tenebat, loci amœnitate aut commoditate captus. Neque enim is erat, qui libertatem suam, atque adeò licentiam poëticam sacerdotalis muneris necessitate tamquam compede ad gravitatem eâ functione dignam vellet adstringere: sed homo generosus, & à teneris annis inter nobiles pueros Caroli Ducis Aureliani Francisci I. filii in aulâ, & posteà militaribus studiis in Angliâ & Scotiâ innutritus, antequàm literis sub Io. Aurato operam daret, & divinum ingenium ad poëticam appelleret, inter pacatæ vitæ oblectamenta etiam armorum curam & amorem retinuerat (25). These words give us to understand, that Ronsard had a living only for his pleasure, and that he discharged the duties of the Priesthood perfunctorily. If Spondanus had known that this pretended curate

(15) Binet, ubi supra, pag. 156.

(16) Neque sexagesimum ætatis annum excessit (Ronsardus) articulari morbo sæviissime vexatus. Sammarthan. Elog. lib. i, pag. m. 80.

(17) Du Perron, Oraison funebre de Ronsard, pag. m. 190.

(18) I have set down the whole passage, to shew what I have said above, citation (13), that du Perron did not make use of the thought, concerning the compensation for the imprisonment of Francis I.

(19) Ronsard, Reponse à quelque Ministre, p. 86, of the 9th Tome of his works, in 12mo.

(20) See the Epistle prefixed to that poem.

(21) Claudius Binet, ubi supra, pag. 114.

(22) Binet does not say that the gentlewoman carried him; he distinguishes her from the woman who carried him.

(23) Le Païs, Titres de noblesse de la Muse Amourette, pag. 182, 183, of the 2d part of the new Works, Dutch Edit. 1687.

(24) Beza, Hist. Eccles. livr. vii, pag. 537, 538.

(25) Spondanus, Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 1562, num. 16, pag. m. 621, 622.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

reaſon why ſome ſatirical pieces were publiſhed at Orleans againſt him, wherein it was ſuppoſed that he was a prieſt. He defended himſelf in verſe, and denied that he was inveſted with ſuch a character [E]. What is certain, is, that he had ſome benefices in Commendam, curate had been in the ſame poſt at the court of Scotland, that he had in the houſe of the duke of Orleans, would he have made uſe of this diſtinction, viz. that Ronſard was bred up a page to that duke, and learned the art of war under the king of Scotland? Let us rectify this, and obſerve that this young man was made page to the Dauphin in the year 1536, three days before that prince died (26). Afterwards he entered into the ſervice of Charles duke of Orleans, the king's ſecond ſon, and continued there for ſome time, being very acceptable to his maſter . . . who, to give him an occaſion of ſeeing the world, made him page to James Stuart, king of Scotland, who was come to marry (27) the lady Magdalen, daughter to Francis I. The king of Scotland carried him into his kingdom, where he continued two years (28), and half a year in England; and then he returned into France, and went to the duke of Orleans, his maſter, who made him page of his ſtables, and ſent him upon buſineſs into Flanders and Zealand, with orders to go as far as Scotland, which he did. . . . . At his return from that journey, being only about fifteen or ſixteen years of age, after he had ſerved the duke of Orleans five years, till that prince died, and afterwards Henry, who was ſince king, in the year 1540, he went in the retinue of Lazarus de Baïf . . . . . who was ſent the king's ambaſſador to the Diet of Spire (29). It appears from this narrative, 1. That Ronſard did not learn the art of war in Scotland, otherwiſe than he had done in the ſervice of the duke of Orleans, and otherwiſe than the pages of princes learn it. 2. That Spondanus expreſſed himſelf ill, and knew not that our Poet was only thirteen or fourteen years of age when he was in Scotland, and that at his return into France he was made page to the Dauphin's brother. Perhaps it will be objected to me, that Binet's narrative being full of faults, ought not to be alledged againſt that Annaliſt; but notwithſtanding this objection, I believe Binet is not miſtaken as to the time that Ronſard was made page to the king of Scotland. However, he is groſſly miſtaken in his computation; for if Ronſard had been a domeſtic to the duke of Orleans five years, till that prince died, he would have ſerved him till the year 1545; and if he had been ſince in the ſervice of the Dauphin Henry, how could he have been ſince in Lazarus de Baïf's retinue, in the year 1540? But it is true, that Lazarus de Baïf being ſent, by the king, ambaſſador into Germany in the year 1540, took along with him our Ronſard, who had made an end of his ſervice as a page (30). However it be, Varillas has been deceived by Spondanus. 'New puiſhments 'were invented againſt the Calviniſts of Vendome, 'becauſe the moſt violent amongſt them had ſearched 'the ſepulchres of the anceſtors of the king of Navarre: and the famous Poet Ronſard, a gentleman 'of that country, who being weary of the court, and deſiring to be in better circumſtances than he was 'at home, had accepted the living of Evailles, took up 'arms again which he had born in Scotland and England. Afterwards he excuſed himſelf for it, ſaying, 'in a pleaſant manner, that not being able to defend 'his pariſhioners with St Peter's key, for which the 'Calviniſts had no reſpect, he took St Paul's ſword, 'and putting himſelf at the head of the neighbouring 'gentry, kept his church and his pariſh from being 'plundered (31). You ſee he falſly ſuppoſes that 'Ronſard bore arms in Scotland and England.'

[E] He defended himſelf in verſe, and denied that he was a Prieſt.] The Miniſter Chandieu, and Florent Chretien, were the authors of the pieces publiſhed againſt him at Orleans. The firſt appeared under the diſguiſe of A. Zamariel B. de Mont-Dieu, and the ſecond under that of Francis de la Baronnie (32). Father Garaſſe ſpeaks of them in the following manner. 'Thoſe two men gave him a ſevere reprimand, which 'is intituled, la Metamorphoſe de Ronſard en Preſtre, ou le Temple de Ronſard. They accuſed him, among 'other things, of having taught atheiſm.

Je t'ay veu diſcourir tout ainſi qu'Epicure
Qui attacheois au ciel un Dieu qui n'a la cure
De ce qu'on fait en bas, & en parlant ainſi
Tu monſtrois que de luy tu n'avois grand ſouoy, &c.
Like Epicurus, I have heard you try
To fix in Heav'n an idle deity,
Who takes no thought of what is done below:
By ſuch diſcourſe as this you plainly ſhow
How little you regard him, &c. - - -

'But Ronſard made a ſolid anſwer to their ſcurrilous 'and impertinent language, in a poem intituled, Des 'Miſeres du Temps, in which he proteſts, &c (33).' Garaſſe is miſtaken: the poem intituled, Des Miſeres du Temps, is not an anſwer to Zamariel and la Baronnie. The piece publiſhed againſt them by Ronſard in his vindication, came out with this title, Reponſe aux Injures & Calomnies de je ne ſçai quels predicantereaux & Miniſtreaux de Geneve. The reaſon which induced the Proteſtants to make verſes againſt that Poet, is imperfectly related by Binet and Varillas. One of them ſays, that they abuſed him, to revenge themſelves for the poems he had writ againſt them; the other affirms, that they cenſured him by reaſon of his warlike exploits. Thoſe two reaſons ſhould have been put together; for it is certain they fell upon him, becauſe he had made uſe of his pen and ſword againſt them with great fury. Here follow Binet's words. This 'gave Ronſard occaſion to oppoſe that new opi- 'nion, and to arm the Muſes in the defence of France, 'publiſhing his remonſtrances, which were thought 'ſo proper to confute the enemies of the Catholic 'religion, that the king, and the queen, his mother, 'gratified him for it; as did alſo Pope Pius V, who 'wrote to him a letter of thanks: which was the 'reaſon why thoſe of the new religion fell upon 'him, and publiſhed a very ſatirical and biting poem 'againſt him, which they called le Temple de Ron- 'ſard, wherein they painted his life as it were in 'tapeſtry. They alſo made ſome anſwers to his 'remonſtrances, with this title, La Metamorphoſe de 'Ronſard, the authors of which were one A. Zamariel 'and B. de Mont-Dieu, both miniſters. He ſuffi- 'ciently points at the latter in theſe verſes of his 'anſwer to him, comparing him to Siſyphus, Qui remonte & repouſſe aux enfers un rocher,

Dont tu as pris ton nom (34).

- - - - Whoſe work in hell
Is ſtill a-doing, but is never done,
While he rolls back a huge unwieldy ſtone,
From which your name is borrowed - - -

Binet divides one author into two; A. Zamariel B. de Mont-Dieu is but one man. I proceed to Varillas's words. This (35) occaſioned the terrible ſatire which Florent Chretien, at that time a violent Calviniſt, and preceptor to the prince of Navarre, wrote under the name of the Miniſter de la Baronnie againſt the ſame Ronſard; and the anſwer of the latter, wherein he ſhewed that indignation would enable him to make finer verſes than nature, tho' he had a wonderful genius to Poetry (36). He is in the wrong to ſay, that Florent Chretien wrote under the name of a Miniſter, and to believe that none but he publiſhed ſatires againſt Ronſard. We have ſeen that he ſays after Beza and Spondanus, that this Poet was a curate; but their miſtake will appear by the following verſes.

Or ſus mon frere en Chriſt, tu dis que je ſuis Preſtre:
J'atteſte l'eternal que je le voudrois eſtre,
Et avoir tout le chef & le dos empeſché
Deſſous la peſanteur d'une bonne Eveſché:
Lors j'auroy la couronne à bon droit ſur la teſte,
Qu'un raſoir blanchiroit le jour d'une grand' feſte,
Ouverte, large, longue, allant juſques au front,
En forme d'un Croiſſant qui tout ſe courbe en rond (37).

You tell me that I am a prieſt. By heav'n
I only wiſh the name were juſtly giv'n,

And

(26) Binet, ubi ſupra, pag. 115.

(27) He married her at Paris, the firſt of January 1537.

(28) Du Perron, Oraiſon funebre de Ronſard, pag. 193, ſays, that he was two years and a half in Scotland.

(29) Taken from Claudius Binet, pag. 115, & ſeq.

(30) See the verſes of Antony de Baïf, in Mr Menage's Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 196.

(31) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. i, p. 171, Dutch Edit. ad ann. 1562.

(32) See Garaſſe's Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 126, & 1022, & la Croix du Maine, pag. 88.

(33) Garaſſe, ibid. pag. 126, 127.

(34) Binet, ubi ſupra, pag. 138, 139. See alſo the funeral oration by du Perron, pag. 193, where no other reaſon is to be found but that alledged by Binet.

(35) That is, Ronſard's taking up arms againſt the Proteſtants.

(36) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, liv. 12, pag. 171, 172.

(37) Ronſard, Reſponſe à quelque Miniſtre, p. 80.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Commendam, and among others the priory of St Cosmus near Tours. He died there the twenty-seventh of December, 1585 and had but an indifferent burial; but twenty four years after a noble monument was erected there to his honour [F]. He was cruelly tormented with the Gout, and, it is said, he brought this misfortune upon him by his debaucheries [G]. His works are full of love-verses, wherein we find that he had three chief mistresses

And that my shoulders were condemn'd to bear
The load of a fat bishopric. I'd wear
With pleasure then the crown upon my head,
Which shou'd on all great holidays be made
Smooth with the razor's edge. Long, open, wide
It shou'd be, and my forehead reach beside,
In figure like a crescent bending round. - - -

Does not Ronsard plainly deny, in these verses, that he was a Priest? And if he had been one, would he have been so bold as to deny it? Something may be said, in order to excuse the Ministers, who gave him that title. He had been ordained, and performed Ecclesiastical functions in the choir in sacerdotal habits: he himself informs us of it.

Mais quand je suis aux lieux où il faut faire voir
D'un cœur devotieux l'office & le devoir,
Lors je suis de l'Eglise une colonne ferme
D'un surpelis ondé les espaules je m'arme,
D'une haumusse le bras, d'une chape le dos:
Et non comme tu dis faite de croix & d'os:
C'est pour un Capelan, la mienne est honorée
De grandes boucles d'or & de frange dorée (38):
- - - - - - - - - -
Je ne perds un moment des prieres divines:
Dés la poincte du jour je m'en vais à matines,
J'ay mon breviaire au poing, je chante quelquefois,
Mais c'est bien rarement, car j'ay mauvaise vois,
Le devoir du service en rien je n'abandonne,
Je suis à prime, à Sexte, & à Tierce, & à Nonne,
J'oy dire la grand'Messe, & avecques l'encent
(Qui par l'Eglise espars comme parfum se sent,) J'honore mon Prelat des autres l'outrepasse,
Qui a pris d'Agenor son surnom & sa race.
Apres le tour finy je viens pour me r'asseoir (39).

(38) Ibid. pag. 94.

(39) Ibid. pag. 95.

But when I am in places which demand
Duties of strict devotion at my hand,
Then like a pillar of the church I wear
A wavy surplice, and an amesse bear
Upon my arm: my back a cope has on,
But not, as you say, made of cross and bone:
'Tis for a Chaplain, if you must be told,
That mine has buckles and a fringe of gold.
- - - - - - - - -
At service-hours I never fail to pray,
But trudge to mattins by the break of day.
Sometimes I sing in chorus; but, egad,
That's very seldom, for my voice is bad.
In short, when any thing is to be done,
I am always there, at Prime, Terce, Sexte and None.
High mass I hear, and with frankincense sweet,
Perfuming all the temple round, I greet
My noble Prelate far above the rest.
He from Agenor, as it is confess'd,
His race and surname takes. That rite perform'd,
I sit me down again - - - -

(40) Menage, Anti-Baillet, ch. cxlv.

(41) Baillet, in his list of disguised authors.

(42) Colomiés, Biblioth. choisie, pag. m. 202.

(43) In the article JODELLE, remark [D].

This was the reason why the Protestants believed that he was a curate. Note, That Menage fancies that a minister, whose name was de Mont-Dieu, wrote against Ronsard (40); but he is mistaken; it is only a disguise under which the minister Chandieu appeared when he published that piece. Mr Baillet (41) thinks that Florent Chretien assumed that false name. Colomiés has no reason to say that la Croix du Maine knew not in his Bibliotheque, page 88. that Florent Chrétien wrote against Ronsard, under the name of Francis de la Baronnie (42). I have mentioned in another place (43), the answer made by Ronsard, when he was charged with an act of Paganism.

[F] A noble monument was erected there to his honour.] Joachim de la Chetardie, counsellor clerk in the parliament of Paris, being Prior-commendatory of St Cosmus, twenty years after Ronsard's death, could not endure that the tomb of that illustrious Poet should remain without distinction or inscription (44). Wherefore, when he got the monastery repaired, he caused a marble tomb to be erected, and adorned it with an epitaph (45), and a statue of Ronsard made by an excellent sculptor. Cum magni Ronsardi cineres populari loculo, muto & illiterato jacere videret, melior æquiorque illis qui ejus opimis exuviis ditati sunt, tandiu manes esse neglectos non tulit, ac Ronsardum illum. . . . . . Chetardius marmoris alta strue, statua ad viventis similitudinem veriſſime expressa à Phidia Lutetiano donavit, brevi nota & elogio (46). These Latin words reflect upon Ronsard's relations, as if they had taken no care to preserve his memory; but it is certain that Gallandius caused a pompous funeral to be made for him in Boncourt-college, of which he was principal. Testamento condito quo hæredem scripsit Johannem Gallandium juventutis Parisiensis optimum moderatorem, cujus hospitio cum Lutetiæ esset, familiarissime utebatur, qui dignam tanti viri memoriæ gratiam rependens ei exequiis perhonorificis postea in schola Becodiana sua parentavit (47). Here follows a description of that funeral. 'Mr Gal-
'land, whose affection for him was not buried in the 'same grave, doing what France was bound to do,
'caused great preparations to be made in Boncourt-
'chapel, where his funeral was celebrated in a so'lemn manner upon Monday, the 24th of February
'1586. The service, set to Music, and attended with 'all sorts of instruments, was sung by the choicest
'singers, the king's Musicians being ordered to be
'there; for the king lamented the loss of so great a 'man, who was an ornament to his kingdom. I 'should be too long, should I make a particular de'scription of the funeral orations, encomiums and
'verses, that were made upon that occasion, and con'secrated to his memory, and of the lords, who, to'gether with that generous prince Charles de Valois,
'attended by the duke of Joyeuse, and the most re-
'verend cardinal his brother, to whom Ronsard was 'related, honoured that funeral pomp with their pre'sence; at which the most considerable members of 'the parliament of Paris, followed by the greatest
'wits of France, were pleased to assist. In the after'noon Mr du Perron pronounced his funeral oration
'with great eloquence; and there was such a vast
'concourse of hearers, that cardinal de Bourbon, and 'several other princes and lords, were obliged to go
'away, being not able to get in (48).'

(44) See how Pasquier expresses his indignation, Recherch. liv. vii, ch. xi, p. 648, when he saw such a mean tomb.

(45) You could find it in Bertius, ubi infra, pag. 567.

(46) Rodolphus Betereius, Commentar. de Rebus in Gallia gestis, lib. xxvi, pag. 566, ad ann. 1609.

(47) Thuanus, Histor. lib. lxxxiii, sub fin. pag. m. 43, col. 1.

(48) Binet, ubi supra, pag. 159, 160.

[G] It is said he brought this misfortune upon himself by his debaucheries.] He was a handsome person, strong and vigorous; and besides, having a great deal of wit, and a great inclination for pleasures, one may easily judge he improved the opportunities of sporting with the fair sex, and that those opportunities seldom failed him. He ruined his strong constitution by his loose life, as Thuanus observes: Verum homo ut ingenio sic forma & corporis robore insignis cum vita soluta licentiose nimis genio indulgeret, valetudinem firmissimam debilitavit, acerbissimis arthritidis doloribus extrema ætate conflictatus (49). He was very deaf; and the author of his life owns, that this infirmity came upon him, among other reasons, because, being in Germany, he was forced to drink such wines as are to be found there, most of which are sophisticated (50). This is a mistake; for there are excellent wines in Germany; and if Ronsard had drank them moderately, they had done him no harm. The authors of the pieces published against him at Orleans, represent him as a great debauchee.

(49) Thuanus, ubi supra.

(50) Binet, ubi supra, pag. 118.

Tu m'accuses, Cafard, d'avoir eu la verolle;
Un chaste Predicant de fait & de parole
Ne devroit jamais dire un propos si vilain:
Mais que sort-il du sac? cela dont il est plein (51).

(51) Ronsard, ubi supra, pag. 86.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google mistresses (a). The last was only an amusement to him, and a poetical subject [H].

(a) See the remark [H].

Besides, it is to be observed that he often made love-verses at the request of some lords of the court; so that they contained a description of their passion, and not of his own. The remembrance of it made him uneasy; for he remembred at the same time that he got nothing by those verses [I], and that the reward due to him had been bestowed upon others. He was not so unfortunate as to the Poems he inscribed to Charles IX; for he was well paid for them [K]. He prosecuted Joachim du Bellay, to recover some odes which

. . . . . .

Tu te plaints d'autre part que ma vie est lascive,
En delices, en jeux, en vices excessive:
Tu mens meschantement, si tu m'avois suivy
Deux mois, tu sçaurois bien en quel estat je vy (52).

(52) Ibid. pag. 93.

You say, Cassard, that I was pox'd. For shame!
A modest preacher should not dare to name
So vile a thing: it does not suit his part.
But from the great abundance of the heart
The mouth per force will speak - - - -
. . . . . .
You likewise in another place pretend
That I my life in wanton pleasures spend,
In games, and vices of the blackest hue:
Which is an arrant falsity. Had you
But follow'd me two months, you would have seen
How different from this my life has been.

[H] The last mistress was only . . . . . a poetical subject (53).] Let us see first of all what we are told of his two first mistresses. ‘ (54) Ronsard falling in ‘ love with a handsome woman of Blois, whose name ‘ was Cassandra, on the 21st of April, in a journey he ‘ made to Blois, where the court was, being then ‘ twenty years of age (55), resolved to sing his belov- ‘ ed object, as well on account of her beauty, as by ‘ reason of her name. He was smitten as soon as he ‘ saw her, as if it had been by an instinct divinely ‘ inspired, which he seems to intimate by this motto, ‘ ΩΣ ΙΔΟΝ ΩΣ ΕΜΑΝΗΝ (56).’ The verses he made upon that mistress were thought too obscure; wherefore he resolved to describe in a more easy stile his passion for Mary, who was a handsome maid of Anjou. He often denotes her by the name of Pin de Bourgeuil, because it was the place where she lived, and where he saw her first, happening to be there with his friend Baif. He loved her very much after he had courted Cassandra ten years, whom he left out of jealousy (57). Here follows the History of his third love. ‘ He ended his ‘ works with his sonnets upon Helena, whose virtues, ‘ beauty, and great accomplishments, were the last ‘ and most worthy subject of his Muse: the last, be- ‘ cause he never had the happiness to see her until he ‘ was an old man; and the most worthy, because this ‘ lady was, by her quality, virtue, and reputation, above ‘ those whom he loved in his younger years. He ‘ was more familiar with them, than with the last, ‘ whom he honoured and praised, rather than courted. ‘ Witness the title he gave to his praises, imitating ‘ Petrarch in that respect, who being one day praised ‘ in the Queen-mother's presence, on account of his ‘ chaste and modest Poetry, her majesty advised him ‘ (Ronsard) to write in the same stile, as being more ‘ suitable to his age, and the gravity of his learning. ‘ Thus Ronsard having, as he thought, an oppor- ‘ tunity of consecrating his Muse to a person of great ‘ merit, took the queen's advice for a permission, or ‘ rather a command, to address himself to one of her ‘ maids of honour, of a very antient and noble family ‘ of Saintonge; and he continued to praise her almost ‘ to the end of his life: and because her wit did fre- ‘ quently afford him matter to exercise his Muse, he ‘ consecrated a fountain to her in Vendomois, which ‘ goes by her name to this very day (58).’

(53) See what has been said of Malherbe, in the remark [B], of his article.

(54) Binet, ubi supra, pag. 129.

(55) It was therefore in the year 1544: nevertheless Binet had just before said, that Ronsard had published the Epithalamium on the marriage of Mr de Vendome, and Madam Joan d'Albert, queen of Navarre, and afterwards writ other poems before he fell in love with Cassandra: this marriage was in the year 1548. In the Life of Ronsard, in the Recueil des plus belles pieces des Poëtes Françoise, printed in the year 1692, it is asserted that he fell in love with Cassandra at Blois, when he was there with the duke of Anjou. There was no duke of Anjou at that time.

(56) They are Theocritus's words, which Virgil renders thus in his 8th eclogue, ut vidi ut perii.

(57) Binet, ibid. pag. 133.

(58) Ibid. pag. 142, 143.

The collection of the finest pieces of the French Poets, both ancient and modern, printed at Paris in the year 1692, contains the life of Ronsard, wherein I have found a fault, which wants to be rectified. *He sung the praises of Helena de Sugeres, a maid of honour to the queen, and desired Cardinal du Perron to write a preface, in order to prefix it to these gallant Poems; in which he intreated him to tell the world, that he loved that maid in an honest way. The cardinal answered him, that instead of a preface, he should put the picture * of Helena de Sugeres to his book* (59). Du Perron being but a young man when Ronsard died, it is not likely that this great Poet would have desired him to write a preface for him. The truth is, that he desired no such thing of any body: it was the lady, who made such a request to cardinal du Perron. If you read the Perroniana at the word Gournay, you will find these words in it (60). This is what I told Mrs de Surgeres one day, who desired me, at Monsieur de Retz's, to put an epistle to Ronsard's works, whereby it might appear, that he had not an unchaste love for her. I told her, instead of such an epistle, it is but putting your picture to it.

* Because she was ugly.

(59) Recueil des plus belles pieces, Tom. i. pag. 241, 242, Dutch Edit.

(60) See the remark [B], in the article GOURNAY.

[I] He was uneasy when he remembred that he had got nothing by those verses.] I shall set down a passage of Binet to prove this. ‘ (61) He often told me, that ‘ he had made amorous verses and masquerades by or- ‘ der of some great men, meaning, that he had often ‘ strained his Muse without any satisfaction; others ‘ having got the reward he deserved: which was the ‘ reason why he prefixed these verses of Virgil to these ‘ pieces, sic vos non vobis, &c. It is well known for ‘ whom he wrote the amours of Callirea, a very hand- ‘ some lady of the court, of the noble family of Atry ‘ (62), firnamed Aquaviva, as he sufficiently intimates ‘ by the sonnet, which begins thus, La belle eau vive. ‘ It is also known for whom he made the verses con- ‘ cerning Astrea (63), who was likewise a very hand- ‘ some lady of the court, whose name is very much ‘ embellished by the meer alteration of a vowel.’ It appears from these words, that Ronsard was not so disinterested as an honest man ought to be. It had been a glorious thing for him, if he had shewed himself less mercenary: it is a fault that prevails among Poets, and I wonder that Binet should have been so ingenuous as to acquaint the public with the complaints that Ronsard made to him in private, for not being rewarded. However it be, this shews that a man may write very passionate verses, without being in love with the person who is the subject of those verses. I think this may be more easily done by a man who has a mistress (64).

(61) Binet, ubi supra, pag. 141, 142.

(62) I have spoken of that lady above, at the end of the text of the article JACCETIUS.

(63) She was a lady of the house d'Estrée.

[K] He was well paid for the Poems he inscribed to Charles IX.] That prince, ‘ besides his yearly pen- ‘ sion, made him some presents. It is true, he said ‘ sometimes in jest, that he was afraid of losing his ‘ Ronsard, and that too much wealth would make ‘ him idle, adding, that a good Poet ought not to be ‘ fattened no more than a good horse, but only kept ‘ in good case. Nevertheless he was always very li- ‘ beral to him, and would have continued so, if he ‘ had lived; for he was not ignorant that Poets have ‘ a kind of sympathy with the grandeur of kings, ‘ and are apt to take fire, being sensibly affected when ‘ their labours and merit are not sufficiently rewarded, ‘ as he complains of it in several places (65).’ The latter part of this passage confirms what has been said above (66), concerning Ronsard's mercenary humour, and therefore I have not left it out, as I would have done, had it not been for that reason. Note, That Brantome mentions (§ a) this policy of Charles IX, as may be seen in the article of DAURAT (67). It is the most effectual way of keeping the Poets busy: if they were too rich, they would be apt to despise their trade. Charles IX was therefore in the right to deal with the Poets, as if they had made Agur's prayer to him, Give us neither poverty nor riches, feed us with food convenient for us (68). The temper he observed, is perhaps the greatest blessing that can be wished for the commonwealth of learning; for some authors would not have published several good books, if they had lived in plenty: others would have been more accurate in their compositures, had they not been so poor. The great poverty of some authors has occasioned a multitude of bad books, which the public are

(64) It is but fancying that the lady for whom he makes verses, is his beloved object.

(65) Binet, Vie de Ronsard, pag. 143.

(66) In the preceding remark.

(67) Citation (21).

(68) Prov. xxx, 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which had been cunningly ſtolen from him [L]; but afterwards they agreed, and were friends again. He would have had better ſucceſs in his amorous verſes, had he not ſo carefully imitated the ancient Poets: the too frequent uſe of their fables made him harſh and obſcure [M]. Nay, he ſometimes took the liberty, as they did, to uſe ſome obſcene expreſſions [N], and in general was guilty of ſeveral profanations, and inſerted too many Pagan notions in his Poems, which nevertheleſs were paid with ſacred things are peſtered with. A moderate income would have enabled them to poliſh their works; but the preſſing neceſſity of a man, incumbered with a great family, and perſecuted by a creditor, whom he puts off until he be paid for his copy, and gratified for his epiſtle dedicatory, obliges him to write ſo haſtily, that he has no time to lick his young cubs into the beſt ſhape before he ſhews them to the world. It is to be obſerved, that there are ſome ſuch works which it is better to have, than to be wholly deprived of them. For inſtance, it was better to have du Ryer's tranſlations of the authors tranſlated by him than none at all: and therefore, if we ſuppoſe that du Ryer would have lived an idle life, if he had been rich, it was better for the public, that he had no more than was neceſſary to maintain him. See what Eraſmus ſaid concerning Sigiſmund GELENIUS (69). When a writer deſigns to raiſe his fortune, he endeavours to write well; but he has no ſooner obtained his end, than he grows remiſs. This is what may be obſerved in preachers: they are thought to preach better before they are biſhops, than after they have attained to that dignity (70). Which puts me in mind of an ingenious repartee. A great prince of our time, deſigning to beſiege a town, was told, that it would be defended by a mareſchal of France, and did not alter his reſolution upon that account, ſaying, that a governor, who is not yet mareſchal of France, is more to be feared, than one who is ſo already.

(69) Above, citation (10), in his article.

(70) See the remark [C], in the article ZEUXIS.

[(§ α) What Brantome ſays there, is taken from theſe words of Papirius Maſſo, in his life of Charles IX, reprinted at the end of the additions to the Memoirs of Caſtelnau. 'Poetas generoſis equis ſimiles 'eſſe dicens, quos nutrire non laginari oporteat. - - - 'Saying that Poets are like generous horſes whom it is 'proper to feed, but not to pamper. REM. CRIT.]

[L] He proſecuted . . . . . to recover ſome odes which had been cunningly ſtolen from him.] This is a remarkable ſuit, and I do not doubt, that Ronſard proſecuted it as warmly, as others would do to recover an eſtate left them by their fathers. The Hiſtorian ſpeaks of it with great caution, being tender of the plaintiff's and defendant's reputation. The latter acted the moſt odious part before the Judges, and the other was laughed at by them. I ſhall ſet down the whole narrative of Binet. 'When the amours of 'Caſſandra, and the four books of odes, which Ron'ſard promiſed in imitation of Pindar and Horace, 'were much talked of; it being a common thing 'for wits to be jealous one of another, du Bellai, 'who had alſo ſung his Oliva in an amorous ſtrain, 'went about to compoſe ſome odes like thoſe of Ron'ſard, which he got into his hands without his know'ledge. He made ſome, which, together with ſe'veral ſonnets, he publiſhed, to prevent Ronſard, un'der the title of a collection of Poems. The latter 'conceived a reaſonable jealouſy againſt du Bellay, 'ſo far as to ſue him in order to recover his papers. 'They were adjudged to him; and then the quarrel 'was over. Ronſard defired du Bellay to go on with 'his odes, by which means they became greater friends 'than ever, being of opinion that ſuch an ambition 'ſhews a generous ſoul; and that if men, jealous of 'glory, grow quickly angry, they are alſo eaſily re'conciled (71).'

(71) Binet, ubi ſupra, pag. 129, 130.

[M] The too frequent uſe of their fables made him harſh and obſcure.] The obſcurity of his works was complained of at that very time, which was the reaſon why ſome of his friends commented upon them. The amours of Caſſandra were commented upon by Muretus: The firſt book of his love for Mary was commented upon by Remi Belleau, and the ſecond by Nicolas Richelet: his ſonnets upon Helena, the five books of his odes, and his hymns, were commented upon by the ſame Richelet; as were all the pieces of the ninth part of his works, by Claudius Garnier. Beſides ſeveral pieces of the firſt part, Peter de Marcaſſus commented upon the Franciade, which makes the third, the Bocage Royal which makes the fourth, the Eclogues, Maſquerades, and Cartels, which make the fifth, the Elegies which make the ſixth, and the Poems which make the eighth (72). John Beſly, the king's advocate at Fontenai le Comte, commented upon the hymns (73). Poor Ronſard is put to a non-plus in the Parnaſſe Reformé, on account of the impenetrable obſcurity of his works, without the help of a good commentary. His Je ne ſuis point ma guerriere Caſſandre, &c. is particularly alledged againſt him. Do you really believe, ſay they, (74) that your Caſſandra, for whom you made that ſonnet, had ſuch a good opinion of it? Can it be imagined that ſhe knew the brother that you have found for her? Do you think that the Dolope Soudart, the Myrmidon, the Corebe inſensé, and the Gregeois Penelée, were names very intelligible to her; and was it a ſmall matter for a woman to be put to the trouble of unfolding all the fables relating to the ſiege of Troy?

(72) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, num. 1335.

(73) Colomeſ. Obſervat. ſacræ, pag. 54.

(74) Parnaſſe, Reformé, pag. 91, 92, Dutch Edit.

Ronſard's obſcurity and harſhneſs would be more excuſable, had he been the firſt who improved the French Poetry; but he ſaw it full of charms, and near its perfection in Marot's writings, which might have been a great help to him. I ſhall ſet down Mr de la Bruyere's opinion. 'One would think from MA'ROT's turn and ſtile, that he writ after RON'SARD: there is hardly any difference between him 'and us, but in ſome words. RONSARD, and the 'authors cotemporary with him, did the French ſtile 'more harm than good; they kept it from arriving to 'perfection, and were like to hinder it from ever at'taining to it. It is ſurprizing that MAROT's 'works, which are ſo eaſy and natural, did not make 'Ronſard, who was full of a poetical ſpirit, a greater 'Poet than Ronſard and Marot (75).' But how could they produce ſuch an effect in a man whoſe taſte was ſo depraved, that he looked upon them as a heap of dirt with ſome grains of gold in it? He had conſtantly in his hands, as we are told by the author of his life (76), ſome French Poet . . . . . eſpecially . . . . . John le Maire de Belges, the Romance of the Roſe, and Marot's works, which he called, as Virgil did thoſe of Ennius, a dunghil, out of which, as it were, by an induſtrious waſhing, he gathered grains of gold. That waſhing would not have appeared very induſtrious to Mr de la Bruyere; he would have ſaid that Ronſard took the earth, and threw off the gold.

(75) La Bruyere, Caracteres, in the chapter intituled, des Ouvrages de l'Eſprit, pag. m. 82.

(76) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, pag. m. 121.

[N] Some obſcene expreſſions.] I ſhall only give one inſtance of it alledged by Mr Menage in a place, wherein he finds fault with him for making uſe of obſcure fables. No fables, ſays he (77), ought to be made uſe of, but ſuch as are known to every body. Ronſard, who made uſe of ſome that are only known to the learned, and only to be found in the ſcholiaſts, ſuch as that which he mentions in theſe words of the twenty-firſt ode of the ſecond book out of the ſcholiaſt upon Nicander,

(77) Menage, Obſervat. ſur Malherbe, pag. 531.

Ny les fleurons que diffama
Venus, alors que ſa main blanche
Au milieu du Lis renferma
D'un grand Aſne le roide manche, was accounted a pedant, inſtead of a learned man. Here follows a note of Nicolas Richelet upon thoſe four verſes of Ronſard. 'This we find in Nicander's Alexi'pharmaca. One can hardly apprehend how it can 'be underſtood of the lilly, which the ſame Nicander 'calls in another place Venus's delight. And indeed 'our author ſeems to doubt of it, ſpeaking a ſecond 'time of the lilly in that ſame ode; for it were need'leſs to ſpeak twice of the ſame flower. Nicander 'ſays that this flower, whatever it be, undertook one 'day to contend for beauty with Venus, who out of 'ſpite, and to revenge herſelf, ſhut up the yard of 'an aſs in its leaves.

- - - - Τότ' ἀπέσυγεν, ἄρρα
Οὔνεκ' ἐριδμαίνεσκε χροῒς ὕπερ, ἐν δὲ νυθρίοις
Ἄγγα-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google things [O]. People are very much divided in their opinions about his works, as may be seen in Mr Baillet (b). See also Sorel's remarks upon the Berger Extravagant (c), wherein you will find many curious and solid Criticisms upon that Poet. I must not forget what has been observed, that he did not well succeed in correcting his own works [P]; he (b) Baillet, Jugemens sur les Poëtes, num. 1335.

(c) Upon the 13th book, pag. 647, &c.

Ἀργαλέην μεσάτοισιν ὀνειδίην ἐπέλασσε
Δεινὴν βρωμιέντ' ἐναλδήσασα κορύνην (78).

(78) Richelet, upon the second book of Ronsard's odes, pag. m. 306.

That commentator does not complain of the obscenity of the text.

[O] Which nevertheless were paid with sacred things.] Consult Sorel, who says that Ronsard's odes, 'written to any one's praise, are an imitation of Pindar, 'and that the rest, which are indifferent, are most of 'them taken out of Anacreon; so that there is scarce 'any thing to be found in them, but that perhaps 'to-morrow we shall be nothing but dust, that we 'ought to enjoy our selves whilst we may do it, and 'drink and indulge the love of women; which seem 'to be the maxims of a man, who does not believe the 'immortality of the soul. His hymns contain very 'few precepts of virtue: some are only a meer repe-'tition of what is to be seen in Homer and other 'Poets, as his hymns upon Calais and Zethes, and 'Castor and Pollux; which is very improper, for 'what signifies it to sing the praises of those chime-'rical heroes? His hymn concerning Hercules com-'pared with CHRIST, both as to his birth and la-'bours, cannot excite any devotion; for those remote 'and far-fetched applications are fitter to make one 'laugh, than to produce in us a repentance of our 'sins (79).' He gives the substance of that hymn, and then he adds, 'I had rather lay aside entirely the 'fables of the Heathens, than pretend to mend them 'by applying them in such a manner to holy mysteries. 'It is a dangerous thing to suffer such subjects to be 'handled by the Poets. If you examine the matter 'narrowly, you will find that the mysteries of our 'religion are profaned by such a method; for the re-'lations are only superficial. What a shameful thing 'is it to refer Jupiter's adultery to the incarnation of 'the Eternal Word? At this rate it must be said, that 'the Holy Virgin is represented by Alcmena, and 'then the angel Gabriel, who declared the concep-'tion, and the Holy Ghost that wrought it, must be 'represented by Mercury. Wretched Poet! if you 'design to explain in such a manner what we are told 'of Hercules, mind what you do; for there are such 'abominable thoughts concealed under it, that my 'pen drops from my hands when I think of them. 'Perhaps you will say, that you have not meddled 'with them: but will not every reader, if he has ne-'ver so little subtilty in him, be desirous to know all 'the relations contained in your fable? Besides, is 'not the comparison between Hercules and CHRIST 'execrable in every part of it (80).' I must not forget that he says something to excuse that Poet. 'I 'have also seen some moral reflexions upon the Ro-'mance of the Rose, wherein the most leud things 'contained in that Romance were explained, with re-'lation to our creation and redemption, and eternal 'life. There are some execrable fancies in that book; 'however I believe the author was a well-meaning 'man, and acted therein according to the simplicity 'of the time he lived in. And I make no doubt that 'Ronsard had a very good intention in his Christian 'Hercules, but his performance did not answer his 'hopes. As for his other hymns, for instance, con-'cerning eternity, justice, the devils, and others of the 'like nature, he brings in several deities, which he 'should have left to the Greeks (81).' When he criticises the hymns about the four seasons of the year, which are the master-piece of that Poet, if we may depend upon his funeral oration (82), and Pasquier (83), he observes a thousand faults in them, and even a gross contradiction. Tho' fictions wholly depend upon a writer's fancy, the same Poet ought not to have two different opinions in one and the same work; and yet in a following hymn, which must needs have a dependance upon the first, since the four hymns are coupled together, Ronsard says, that nature perceiving that, tho' she did stroke the belly of Time, her husband, and put a leg over his, tickling his flesh, he was no longer fit for amorous embraces, fell in love with the sun, with whom she lay, and got by him the four seasons. Thus we have here another birth (84). Had he not just reason to condemn him for such gross inventions? Nor does he forgive him for telling his dear Helena, that she must not forget upon Ash-wednesday to come and take some ashes from his heart, which the fire of love has burnt (85). Was he not very much in the right to condemn many other prophanations of our Poets, and the rewards bestowed upon them. The worst of all, says he (86), 'is, that some beneficed 'men of this age have writ in such a stile more freely 'than others; as if they had been allowed to play 'with holy things, because they had the administra-'tion of them. They were looked upon as men, 'who took more care of their bellies than of their 'flocks, and because they spoke in a prophane man-'ner, lay-people were so bold as to do the same, 'which did great prejudice to religion. I know but 'too many still, who are not yet invested with Eccle-'siastical offices, but desire to be promoted to them, 'tho' their only talent consists in writing impious and 'leud things. They are court-flies, buzzing in the 'palaces of princes, and continually importuning them, 'because it is thought here that a benefice is the fittest 'reward that can be bestowed upon a Poet. What 'an abominable custom, to give Ecclesiastical prefer-'ments to men, who would not be rewarded, had 'they not been pimps to their masters, as it appears 'from their amorous verses, made in order to indulge 'the disorderly passions of princes and kings. It is 'true that St Gelais was a bishop, that Des Portes was 'an abbot, and that Ronsard had some benefices (87), 'and that he desired the king to add a crosier to his 'lyre, as if a bishopric had been a proper reward for 'his Poems, though it ought to be conferred on none 'but those who are holy in their words and actions. 'However I will not blame all those men upon that 'account; for I do piously believe, that they wrote 'those loose Poems in their youth, and that they have 'since repented of them, and made themselves worthy 'of the posts they held.'

(79) Sorel, Remarks on the 13th book of the Berger extravagant, pag. 648.

(80) Ib. p. 650.

(81) Ib. p. 652.

(82) Those who have seen his hymns about the four seasons, (and I think there are few in this assembly but have had that curiosity) will doubtless confirm my opinion of them, and acknowledge that it is almost impossible to peruse them, without being charmed with them, and confessing that there is a soul and a genius in them, which affects and transports both the readers and hearers. Du Perron, Oraison funebre de Ronsard, pag. 198, 199.

(83) Pasquier, Recherches, book viii, ch. xi, p. m. 646.

(84) Sorel, ubi supra, pag. 653, 654. He had been mentioning another fiction of Ronsard, about the birth of the four seasons.

(85) Idem, Remarks upon the 14th book, pag. 733.

(86) Ibid. pag. 738, 739, 740.

(87) He was prior of Croixval, and St Cosme.

These last words agree, as to Ronsard, with what Mr Baillet says of him. 'I shall do a good office to 'Ronsard's memory, by informing the public, that in 'the last years of his life, he condemned the unchaste 'and loose Poems he had made. Nay, he began then 'to reform his Muse, resolving to write only Chri-'stian Poems the remaining part of his days. Not 'contented to secure his conscience for the time to 'come, he was desirous to expiate his past sins, by 'suppressing several pieces he had written in his youth, 'and leaving out all the passages he did not approve 'in those that were not wholly bad. But it may be 'said, that he did it more like a father, who cannot 'divest himself of his tenderness for his children, than 'like an uncorrupt judge (88).' Against this, Mr Menage (89) alledges these words of Binet: Perfisling in the resolution of loving and serving one of the maids of honour to the queen, he praised her almost to the last moment of his life (90). Thuanus observes, that Ronsard made some verses even when he was a dying, and that they were pious and tolerable verses (91). I have read in Brantome, that Chatellard, a French gentleman, who was beheaded in Scotland for loving the queen, and, which is more, making an attempt upon the honour of that princess, had no other viaticum, or preparation for death, than the reading of a Poem of Ronsard; which plainly shews, that he took it to be a very pious piece. Being brought to the scaffold, he took Ronsard's hymns into his hands, and for his eternal comfort, read out the hymn concerning death, which is a very fine one, and fit to make one less afraid of dying, having no other godly book, nor any minister or confessor (92).

(88) Baillet, Jugemens sur les Poëtes, num. 1335.

(89) Anti-Baillet, ch. xxxv.

(90) Claudius Binet, ubi supra, pag. 143.

(91) Etiam dum animam ageret aliquot pia scriptis non pœnitenda facta, ac postea cum operis ejus operam editi sunt. Thuanus, lib. lxxxiii, pag. fin.

(92) Brantome, Memoires des Dames illustres, pag. m. 175.

[P] He did not well succeed in correcting his works.] In order to make a very instructive commentary upon these words, I shall set down a long note of Mr Menage (93). 'It often falls out that the second thoughts 'of the Poets are not so good as the first, as Binet 'very judiciously observes, speaking of Ronsard's 'verses (94). Some, says he, are of opinion, that se-'veral passages which he has mended in his works, are 'not so agreeable as they were at first; for it happens 'sometimes, especially in Poetry, that the first fury is

(93) Menagiana, Observations sur Malherbe, pag. 383, 384.

(94) In Ronsard's Life, pag. m. 163.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he left out the beſt things. This is a great fault, and ſome other writers have not been free from it. I muſt alſo take notice, that the common-place of the jeſts upon Poets for being badly lodged, was uſed againſt Ronſard [Q].

' more natural, and that the file too much uſed, inſtead of ' clearing and poliſhing, only wears out, and ſpoils the tem- ' per. Paſquier, in his Recherches (95), has made the ' ſame obſervation. A great Poet, ſays he, ſpeaking of ' Ronſard, but a very bad judge of his own books; for ' about two or three years before his death, being weak- ' ned with old age, afflicted with the Gout, and ' troubled with melancholy, and continual ſickneſs, that ' poetical vein, which before kept him good company, hav- ' ing almoſt forſaken him, he cauſed all his Poems to be ' printed in one great volume, whereof he changed the ' general order, cut out of his book many beautiful in- ' ventions, and changed ſome verſes entirely, and in ſome ' he put in other words, which were not ſo ſmart as ' the firſt; having, by this means, totally deſtroyed, in ' many places, the beauty of his Poems, not conſidering ' that tho' he was the father, and by conſequence, looked on ' himſelf to have an abſolute authority over his own com- ' poſitions; yet he ſhould have reflected, that old and me- ' lancholy age was an unfit judge of the flights of a vigo- ' rous youth. But nothing proves this truth ſo well, ' as the example of Taſſo, who changed from better ' to worſe, his Poem of Hieruſalem.' It is a long time ſince Taſſo was reproached with this. I have by me a book called, Il Duello dell' ignoranza, e della ſcienza, which was printed at Milan in 1607; and I find there, That this great Poet was blamed for leaving out ſeveral beautiful paſſages nella Gieruſalemme conquiſtata, and putting in their place things ridiculous. The author obſerves ſome of theſe paſſages, after which he ſpeaks thus, ' a' quali tutti gratiſſimi, ' e giocondiſſimi auvenimenti ſuſtituiſce il Taſſo coſe ' tali, che ſe con ſemplice intelligenza debbono pren- ' derſi, ſono ſi frivole, che niente più, e ſe ci è den- ' tro qualche miſtero, egli ci è involto con tante am- ' bagi, ch' à ſottrarnelo non baſterebbe l'iſteſſo Edip- ' po (96). - - - To all which moſt agreeable and pleaſant ' paſſages, Taſſo has ſubſtituted ſuch things, as if literal- ' ly underſtood, are ſo trifling, as not any thing can be ' more; but if they contain any myſtery, it is ſo perplexed ' and wrapped up in obſcurity, that Oedipus himſelf would ' be at a loſs to gueſs the meaning.' The author who furniſhes me with this paſſage, is called Don Conſtantino de' Notari Nolano della Congregatione Caſſinenſe. I have made ſeveral obſervations in another place (97) upon the faults one may fall into by corrections.

(95) Lib. vii, ch. vii, pag. m. 623.

(96) Duello dell' ignoranza & della ſcienza, lib. iv, cap. iii, p. 183.

(97) See, above, remark [F], of the article LINACER.

[Q] The common place of the jeſts upon Poets for being badly lodged, was uſed againſt Ronſard.] His condition in this reſpect, was worſe than to lodge in a garret, ſince it is ſaid, that he was poſted like a lanthorn on a high tower, or like centinels who watch all night, leſt any houſe ſhould be on fire. It is added, that there is ſtill a monument of that ſad lodging, ſince the tower in which he was lodged is ſtill called by his name. This is certainly what he did not expect; none deſires to become immortal by ſuch means, and any one would be very unwilling to have this thought of Horace applyed to him.

Exegi monimentum ære perennius,
Regalique ſitu Pyramidum altius (98).

(98) Horace, Ode XXX, lib. iii.

- - - - I have raiſed a monument
More ſtrong than braſs, and of a vaſt extent;
Higher than Egypt's ſtateliеſt pyramid,
That coſtly monument of kingly pride.

CREECH.

The witneſs whom I am to produce, ſpeaks in the following manner. ' Ronſard, they ſay, not daring ' to attack Rabelais, whilſt alive, in writing, though ' they often quarrelled at Meudon in the houſe of ' the princes of the houſe of Lorrain, writ only an ' epitaph againſt him, in which he abuſed him very ' much, becauſe Rabelais looked on him only as a ' poor miſerable Poet, inſomuch that he thought him- ' ſelf very happy to lodge in a watch-tower, which is ' at this time called Ronſard's tower, at Meudon; ' from whence he went to the caſtle to make his court ' where he often met Mr Francis Rabelais, who did ' not ſpare him; for after all, though he was not ſo ' good a Poet as he; yet he was born a Poet as well ' as a Phyſician *; incomparably more knowing than ' that prince of the Poets of his time, and underſtood ' railing much better (99).' The book from which theſe words are taken, was printed at Paris, in 1697. The author has not put his name to it: but in an Epiſtle Dedicatory he has made it plain enough who he was (100). He had practiſed Phyſic fifty years, and yet was poor; his ill fortune had made him ſatirical, and he employed his time only in criticiſing. This appears by his Supplement to the Hiſtory of Phyſic, in his Anti-Menagiana, and in the little book he publiſhed under the falſe name of Pepinacourt, with the title of Reflexions, Penſées, & Bons-mots anecdotes. He died at Paris the eighteenth of May, 1698.

* Ex utroque Apollo.

(99) A judgment; and new obſervations on Rabelais's works, pag. 52, 53.

(100) He was called John Bernier, and was a native of Blois.

ROQUETAILLADE (§ a) (JOHN DE LA) in Latin de Rupeſciſſa, a Franciſcan friar, in the convent of Aurillac (a), of the dioceſe of St Flour, made himſelf famous in the XIVth century; as well for the liberty he took of exclaiming againſt the vices of the clergy, and the oppreſſion of the people, and diſperſing menacing predictions [A], as for his long impriſonment, which was the puniſhment of his boldneſs

(a) See the remark [A], at the end; and citation (26).

[(§ a) Rabelais, l. 1. ch. 6. mentions one Roquetaillade, who, I know not by what tradition was brought into the world from the heel of his mother. What does he mean by that? REM. CRIT.]

[A] Of exclaiming againſt the vices of the clergy . . . and diſperſing menacing predictions.] I am of opinion, that to comment upon theſe words, I can do nothing more to the purpoſe than to ſet down a long paſſage out of Froiſſard. ' There was in the city of Avignon ' a friar minor of great learning, and great judgment, ' who was called fryar John de Roquetaillade, whom ' the Pope cauſed to be kept priſoner in the caſtle of ' Baignoux, for predicting wonderful things that were ' to happen; and eſpecially to fall upon the prelates ' and preſidents of the holy church, for their great ' luxury and pride; and alſo upon the kingdom of ' France, and all the great men of Chriſtendom, for ' their great oppreſſions of the common people. And ' the ſaid fryar John would prove what he ſaid out of ' the Apocalypſe, and the ancient books of the holy ' prophets, which were diſcovered and opened to him, ' by the grace of the Holy Ghoſt; ſo that he ſaid ' many things which it was difficult to believe. Some ' of them came to paſs at the time fore-told by him, ' which he did not predict as a Prophet, but out of ' the Scriptures, and by the grace of the Holy Ghoſt, ' who had given him underſtanding to declare and ex- ' plain all the ancient prophecies, to proclaim to all ' Chriſtians the year and the time they were to come ' to paſs. And he wrote on this ſubject ſeveral books, ' ſupported by great knowledge and learning, one of ' which was written in 1346, which contained many ' wonderful and incredible things; ſome of which ' have already happened (1). . . . . In my youth, ' Pope Innocent then reigning at Avignon, kept this ' fryar in priſon. This fryar, (as he ſaid,) and as I ' have often heard ſay, (in ſeveral places not public ' but private) had put forth, and continued to put ' forth, many predictions of great and remarkable ' events that were to happen in due time, and are ſince ' come to paſs in the kingdom of France; as the ' taking of king John priſoner; and he often ſaid, ' and ſhewed by ſtrong reaſons, that the church was to ' ſuffer much, becauſe of the luxury of thoſe who had ' the government of it. And then when I ſaw him ' in priſon, I was told in the Pope's palace at Avig- ' non,

(1) Froiſſard, vol. i. ch. cexi, cited by Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtery of Iniquity, pag. 449.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

neſs [B]. Some people ſay that the event juſtified his predictions; but others aſſure us, ‘ non, of an example he had given to the cardinal of ‘ Oltia, alias of Arras, and to the cardinal of Auxerre, ‘ who had been to ſee him, and reaſon with him about ‘ his words (2).’ This example is the Apologue, or fable, which you may ſee here below (3). ‘ Why do ‘ not you read, continued he (4), the Life of St Sylveſter, ‘ &c. how the Emperor Conſtantine gave him the ‘ tythes of the church, and upon what Conditions. ‘ He did not ride about with two or three hundred ‘ horſes, but kept himſelf cloſe in Rome, and lived ‘ ſoberly with thoſe of the church, &c.’ This fryar declared to them, that the change which he predicted and denoted by the Apologue, would quickly come to paſs: Inſomuch, adds the Hiſtorian, that very often the cardinals were aſtoniſhed at it, and would willingly have put him to death, if they could have found, as they could not, any juſt cauſe to have coloured the action: ſo they let him live as long as he could, but durſt not let him out of priſon: for fear he ſhould lead the people into an error, by his profound predictions, drawn from his own interpretations of the Scripture. Nevertheleſs, many things, (as ſome ſay, who have better obſerved his predictions than I have) which he foretold and wrote in priſon, and which he proved by the Apocalypſe, came to paſs: the true proofs with which he armed himſelf, ſaved him often from being burnt; and beſides, there were ſome cardinals who had pity on him, and were not ſo hard upon him as they might have been.

(2) Froiſſard, vol. iii, chap. xxiv, cited by the ſame, pag. 450.

(3) In the remark [D].

(4) Froiſſard, ubi ſupra.

We will make two obſervations upon the diſtinction mentioned by Froiſſard. He ſays, that this fryar did not predict what was to come as a Prophet, but only as a perſon who had received from the Holy Ghoſt the underſtanding of the prophecies. This is only a diſpute about words: however it ſeems to me, that the privilege of this fryar equalled, or even ſurpaſſed that of the Prophets; for the Prophets did not always know what God couched under the ſignificative images of what was to come to paſs, and by conſequence, a perſon to whom God reveals the true ſenſe of thoſe prophetical ſigns, receives a more particular favour. And therefore neither ſuch a man, nor his favourers, ought, under pretence of modeſty, to make any difficulty to call this favour the gift of prophecy. If a man ſhould pretend to expound the Revelation of St John, only by the aſſiſtance of what may be gathered from a ſerious examination of the Scriptures, it were another matter; but when he perſuades himſelf that he underſtands the Apocalypſe only by the help of the Holy Ghoſt; when I ſay, he ſpeaks thus to his readers; I can ſay, that God in the way opened my eyes in ſuch a manner, that it has given me more conſolation than I can expreſs; for after having conſulted the eternal truth a hundred and a hundred times with a profound humility, and a great attention, at laſt it was anſwered me (5); And declares himſelf in reality, to be a perſon raiſed by God to diſcover future events: is not this to call ones ſelf effectually a Prophet, or more than a Prophet? This is my firſt obſervation: the next is this; that all authors do not agree, that John de la Roquetaillade did not pretend to the ſpirit of prophecy. Read the following words of an author who has writ the life of Innocent VI. ‘ Circa idem tem- ‘ pus (that is in 1356) inſurrexit quidam frater ordi- ‘ nis Minorum de conventu Aureliaci dioceſis ſancti ‘ Flori, dicens ſe habere SPIRITUM PROPHETIÆ, ‘ qui de futuris dicebat & in ſcriptis redigebat multa, ‘ vocatus Frater Johannes de Rupeſciſſa, qui quia po- ‘ tius vaticinator quam PROPHETA merito erat cenſen- ‘ dus, ad dictum Innocentium fuit adductus, &c (6). ‘ - - - - About the ſame time there aroſe a certain friar ‘ of the order of St Francis, and convent of Aurillac in ‘ the dioceſe of St Flour, pretending to the SPIRIT of ‘ PROPHECY, who ſpoke of things to come, and com- ‘ mitted many things to writing, called Fryar John de ‘ Roquetaillade, who, becauſe he was rather to be deem- ‘ ed a foreteller than a true PROPHET, was brought be- ‘ fore the foreſaid Innocent, &c.’ It is certain that this friar declared very freely in his writings, that he did not ſpeak as a Prophet. See what I ſhall quote below (7), out of a Journaliſt.

(5) Jurieu, Preface to the Accompliſſement des Prophéties, fol. ***.

(6) Autor primæ vitæ Innocentii VI, vulgatæ à Baluzio, f. 332, Tom. i, Vitarum Paparum Avenionenſium.

(7) In the remark [F].

[B] His long impriſonment, which was the puniſhment of his boldneſs.] Froiſſard tells us, that the Pope kept this friar in priſon in the caſtle of Bagnols. Another writer aſſures us, that about 1356, this pretended Prophet was ſent to Pope Innocent VI, who impriſoned him, and never after gave him his liberty. ‘ Ad ‘ dictum Innocentium Papam fuit adductus per quem ‘ fuit carceribus mancipatus, in quibus permanſit per ‘ totum tempus ipſius (8). - - - - He was brought to the ‘ ſaid Pope Innocent, by whom he was impriſoned, and ‘ ſo remained during the reſt of his life.’ But this was not his firſt impriſonment; for in 1345, he was impriſoned in the convent of Figeac by order of Friar William Farmena, miniſter of the Franciſcans of the province of Aquitain. This is to be ſeen in the beginning of the Revelations of this Prophet. Where it is alſo to be ſeen that he reduced them into writing, at the requeſt of cardinal William Curti. It will be worth while to give you his very words. ‘ Ego frater Johannes de Rupeſciſſa ordinis fratrum ‘ Minorum Provinciæ Aquitaniæ, provinciæ Ruthe- ‘ nenſis, & conventus Aurelhiaci, ad mandatum ve- ‘ ſtrum deſcripſi ſeriem notabilium eventuum futuro- ‘ rum mihi in carceribus apertum, prout meliùs & ‘ veriùs potero recordari. Modus revelandi, fuit iſte. ‘ Cum anno Domini milleſimo trecenteſimo quadrage- ‘ ſimo quinto multis diebus fierem vinctus ferro in ‘ carcere luti in conventu Figiaci ſtupens & mirans ‘ quare cum tanta crudelitate miſſus eſſem per fratrem ‘ Guillermum Farmena tunc miniſtrum Aquitaniæ in ‘ carcerem, &c (9). - - - I Friar John de Roquetaillade, ‘ a friar minor of the province of Aquitain, in the pro- ‘ vince of Rouergue, and convent of Aurillac, by your ‘ order, have put in writing a ſeries of remarkable future ‘ events, according to the moſt exact, and beſt of my ‘ memory. The manner of Revelation was thus. When ‘ in the year 1345, I had for many days bewailed my ‘ fate, being bound in irons in the priſon of the convent ‘ of Figeac, aſtoniſhed, and wondring why I ſhould with ‘ ſuch cruelty be ſent thither by Friar William Farmena ‘ then miniſter in Aquitain, &c.’ It ſeems that we may conclude from theſe words, that he was not honoured with the gift of Revelation till he was a priſoner; which may excite our curioſity to know for what reaſon he was put in irons. Some ſay, it was becauſe of his Hereſies; but the writers that were nearer his time, ſay, he was only impriſoned becauſe he foretold the near approach of Antichriſt, and advanced ſeveral things that diſpleaſed the Popes and Princes; for he maintained, that their ambition, pride, and avarice, were the cauſe of the evils he foretold. ‘ Quod autem ‘ ſunt nonnulli recentiores qui ob hæreſim in vincula ‘ conjectum dixerunt, non ita antiquiores qui nonniſi ‘ ob prophetias de Anti-chriſto proxime venturo cap- ‘ tum volunt (10). - - - But that there are ſome Moderns ‘ who have aſſerted, that he was caſt in priſon for ‘ Hereſy; yet more antient writers, will have it ‘ that he was apprehended for his prophecies of the near ‘ approach of Antichriſt.’ Alciatus places him among thoſe who have ſuffered for uſing a certain method of maintaining religion. They give out prophecies, and it is the principal means by which they endeavour to fright thoſe perſons, whom by other means they cannot induce to ſerve God: ‘ Sunt & qui vaticinia ‘ ſe ſcire profiteantur, hocque potiſſimum modo, quos ‘ verbis ad cultum & pietatem inducere neſciunt, ter- ‘ rere conantur, quod merito Hercule in malam rem ‘ Johanni de Rupeſciſſa Symmiſtæ veſtro vertit. Cum ‘ enim ſe à Deo admonitum univerſalis Judicii affir- ‘ maret, cumque mundi finem adeſſe conclamaret, quia ‘ dictis ejus res non reſponderunt, Avinione ab Urbano ‘ quinto captus in cuſtodia manſit (11). - - - - - Some ‘ there are who pretend to the gift of prophecy, and by this ‘ means chiefly endeavour to fright into religion and piety, ‘ thoſe whom they cannot otherwiſe perſuade; which did, ‘ deſervedly indeed, prove cauſe of great affliction to John ‘ de Roquetaillade, your colleague in the miniſtry. For af- ‘ firming that he was warned by God of the approach ‘ of the general judgment, and that the end of the world ‘ was at hand, and the event not happening accordingly, ‘ he was apprehended, and detained in priſon by Pope ‘ Urban V at Avignon.’ This friar having propheſied that the end of the world was at hand, was impriſoned by Urban V; becauſe the event did not anſwer that formidable prediction. Alciatus has committed a miſtake in Chronology: It was Innocent V, the predeceſſor of Urban V, who impriſoned Roquetaillade.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Joh. de Rupeſciſſa, init. Revelationum apud Baluzium, Not. ad Vitas Paparum Avenion. pag. 342.

(10) Spondanus, ad ann. 1356, num. 20, pag. 540.

(11) Andreas Alciatus, Epiſt. contra vitam Monachicam, p. 65, 66.

[C] Some

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google us, that the quite contrary to what he foretold, came to pass [C]. He did not properly give himself out for a prophet, but for one who had obtained of GOD the knowledge of the secrets of the Apocalypse, and other prophecies of the Scripture. See in the remark [A], the passage out of Froissard. Great notice was taken of the Apologue, which he made use of to shew, that the same princes, who had enriched the church of Rome, would bring her back again to her ancient poverty [D]. He composed several books [E], of which only a part hath been printed; you will find two of them in the appendix of the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum [F]. We are told (b) that he was a great Divine, and a good Philosopher. I know not whether he died in prison

(b) Trithemius, de Script. Eccles.

[C] Some say that the event justified his predictions; but others assure us, that the quite contrary came to pass.] We have observed already, that Froissard does testify that several things foretold by this friar, came to pass. The author of the life of Innocent VI does not deny it; but he adds, that in several other things the predictions of this Friar proved false, from whence he reasonably infers, that he was not a Prophet. 'Licet in dictis & 'scriptis suis reperta fuerint multa quæ processu tem- 'poris contigerunt, propter quæ plures sibi fidem da- 'bant, tamen etiam multa defuerunt; & sic appare- 'bat quia non erat verè Propheta, quia in illis, si 'talis fuisset, nullus fuisset defectus (12). - - - - Though 'many things which he spoke and wrote, in process of 'time came accordingly to pass, which caused many to give 'credit to him: yet many others did not: so that it was 'manifest he was not a true Prophet; otherwise there 'had been nothing deficient.' I do not much wonder that it was believed he had foretold some truths; for, first, those who exclaim against public disorders, and affirm that God will speedily revenge the oppressed people, and chastise the pride, avarice, and luxury of the great ones, are favourably heard by the multitude, who interpret every thing to the honour of the Prophet, it suiting well with their genius; nay, they force themselves to believe what is foretold, and gloss on it according to what they earnestly desire. In the second place, the world has been always so subject to great calamities, to wars civil and foreign, to pestilence, famine, &c. that at any time, whoever shall foretel fatal events, and dreadful chastisements of the Divine wrath, may be sure to hit upon truth. But to silence at once all the favourers of this friar, we need only make one observation, which is, that the principal points of his prophecy proved false. He foretold the total desolation of the clergy; the coming of an Angel, who in quality of the vicar of Jesus Christ, would reform all things, and convert all the Infidels; a peace that should continue upon earth about a thousand years (13). He said that all those things would quickly come to pass, which has proved doubly false; for nothing like it came to pass either in the age in which he lived, nor in the succeeding ages to this hour (14). I shall set down what we find in a pretty good chronicle. 'Johannes de Rupescissa Minorum ordinis in- 'signis Theologus tempestate hac præter ea, quæ in 'sententiarum libros accurate doctèque scripserat, in 'carcerem trusus multa de futuris tanquam Propheta 'scribere præsumpsit, videlicet de duobus Antichristis, '& de ecclesiæ conciliatione & de conversione om- 'nium gentium ad fidem Christi; & alia multa, quæ 'in januis adesse affirmabat. Et hæc à domino Jesu 'Christo sibi revelata fuisse contestabatur, quæ non 'modo non evenere, sed oppositum in omnibus fuisse 'constat. Hujusmodi autem pronosticatores multi ab 'initio decepti fuere. Quibus fatius fuisset silere, 'quam talia temere loqui (15). - - - - John de Roque- 'taillade a friar minor, and notable Divine at this 'time, besides what he wrote on the book of the Sentences 'with great accuracy and learning, being cast in prison, 'presumed to write as a Prophet many things that were 'to come; namely of two Antichrists, of the union of the 'church, and the conversion of all nations to the faith 'of Christ; and many other things which he said were 'ready to happen. And these things he said had been re- 'vealed to him by Jesus Christ, which not only failed in 'the event, but the direct contrary in every point hap- 'pened: many such foretellers have been deceived from 'the beginning. For whom it had been better to be si- 'lent, than rashly to utter such things.'

(12) Autor primæ vitæ Innocentii VI, ubi supra.

(13) Spondanus, ubi supra.

(14) I write this April 1701.

(15) Jacobus Philippus Bergomas, ad ann. 1375.

[D] The Apologue which he made use of to shew that the same princes, who had enriched the church of Rome, would bring her back again to her antient poverty.] He spoke it when the Cardinal of Arras, and Cardinal d'Auxerre went to see him in prison, to censure him. Mr du Plessis Mornai draws from hence a proof of the oppositions that were made to Antichrist: let us see how he abridges the long recital of Froissard: 'The sum is, that the church was to be like a beau- 'tiful bird, which should be hatched without feathers, 'and not being able to fly, should be in danger of 'starving; that other birds had pity on her, and co- 'vered her with their feathers; kings and princes 'enriched her with lands, and honoured her above 'measure: upon this she grew proud, and seeing 'herself grown up, she thought that she had no more 'need of them, but began to pick at them with her 'beak, and scratched them with her claws, and to quar- 'rel with emperors and princes: that the birds there- 'upon, resolved to retake their feathers, and so 'princes would reassume their gifts and demesnes, and 'compel her to cry mercy: the emperor, and other 'Christian princes would strip her of all, if she grew 'proud again (16).' Mr du Plessis adds, That this Apologue of the bird has manifestly it's foundation in the Apocalypse, cap. xvii, where it is said *; That kings shall give their power and authority to the beast, or whore; but afterwards they shall hate her, and shall make her desolate, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. Wolfius has inserted in his first tome all these passages of Froissard, and has added a figure of the bird of the Apologue (17). It is to be observed, that Roquetaillade declared that this impoverishment of the church was near at hand; but he was deceived. See Coëffeteau in his answer to the book of Mr du Plessis (18). The same thing is still prophesied about the end of the XVIIth century.

(16) Du Plessis Mornai, Mystery of Iniquity, pag. 450.

* Rev. xvii. 13, 16.

(17) Joh. Wolfius, Lectionum Memorabilium & Reconditarum, Centenar. XIV, p. m. 623, & seq. Tom. i.

(18) Coëffeteau, Response au Mystere d'Iniquite, pag. 1076.

(19) Baluzius, Not. ad Vitas Paparum Avenion. p. 1434.

(20) Ibid. pag. 942.

(21) The Oxford catalogue takes notice of the Basil edition 1597.

[E] He composed several books.] Besides his prophecies, there is a book of his de Consideratione quintæ essentiæ; another, de familiatu Philosophiæ; another called Vade Mecum in Tribulatione; and a commentary, super prophetiam Cyrilli eremitæ Presbyteri. Baluzius (19) speaks of this last book, as if it were a manuscript in the king's library; and says the others are to be found in manuscript in Mr Colbert's library (20). Observe that the book de Consideratione quintæ essentiæ rerum omnium, was printed at Basil in 1561 (21). It is said so in the abridgment of Gesner (22), and it is affirmed there by a mistake of an hundred years, that this author lived about the year 1240. I have quoted, in another place (23) Naudæus, who has made mention of this book of Joannes de Rupescissa. There goes about, under the name of this apocalyptical friar, a book de Confectione veri lapidis Philosophorum, printed at Basil in 1561.

(22) Epit. Bibl. Gesneri, pag. m. 492.

(23) In the remark [E], of the article ALBERTUS MAGNUS.

(24) From pag. 331, to pag. 363.

(25) Bibl. Univers. Tom. xix, pag. 348.

(26) The Latin, pag. 402, Append. Fascic. has it Cusidus Rutenensis or Causidici Aurelhaci. This last word signifies of Aurillac, and not of Orleans. Causidicus signifies some employ equivalent to the Don Procurator among the Benedictins, or Carthusians; but I do not know how the Mendicant Friars call him. I think it is not advocate.

[F] You will find two of them in the appendix of the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum.] This is a book that was printed at London in 1690. The author of the Bibliotheque Universelle spoke much of it in his nineteenth volume (24). Here is what he says of our Roquetaillade: '(25) They have inserted here two works of this friar; one of which 'is called, A Copy of the prophecy of brother John de 'la Roquetaillade, of the order of the Friars Minors, of 'the province of Guienne, Warden of Rhodes, and Advo- 'cate of Orleans (26), prisoner at Avignon, the eighth 'year of the Pontificate of Clement VI, in the prison called 'Soldan, in the month of November, in the year of our 'Lord MCCCXLIX. . . . . (27) The other work of 'this friar is his Vade Mecum in tribulatione. In this 'book which he calls Libunculus, he declares, that 'he is not a Prophet, as those who have received 'revelations immediately from God, and who say, 'when they denounce them, Thus saith the Lord; 'but that God had given him the talent of seeing by 'the Scripture things to come (28). He points at some

(27) Bibl. Univers. Tom. xix, pag. 349.

(28) The second continuator of William de Nangis, apud Dacher. Spicil. Tom. xi, pag. 822, says that this Friar being asked about future things by the Archbishop of Toulouse, ann. 1356, answered, Ego sicut unus vilis & abhominabilis peccator ea quæ dico, non dico de capite meo, nec sum propheta, sed tantum per intelligentias Prophetarum. - - - - I, as a vile and abominable sinner, speak not of my own head what I say, nor am I a Prophet, but only by understanding the Prophets. He answered several things, whereof most did not come to pass. See Mr Brown's prologue in the appendix of the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

priſon or not; but I believe that thoſe who ſay he was burnt, are miſtaken [G]. James Fodera ſays he was buried at Villefranche, in the dioceſe of Lyons, in a convent of his own order (c). Raynaldus, who endeavoured to take advantage of a prophecy of this friar, has been ſolidly refuted by Baluzius [H].

(c) Jacob Fodera, in Hiſt. Provinciæ Sancti Bonaventuræ, pag. 318, 322, apud Baluzium, Not. ad Vitas Paparum Avenionenſium, pag. 943.

'ſome of his books, wherein he ſays, he had exactly 'determined ſome events, and it appears that he com- 'poſed this in MCCCLVI. Afterwards he propoſes 'twenty explications of the Apocalyſe, which he calls 'Intentiones. In the firſt, he foretels that the Pope 'ſhall one day ſubdue all the world, which ſhall look 'upon him as their paſtor: a prediction which is very 'contrary to that of our Proteſtant interpreters of the 'Apocalypſe, who are not more happy in their predi- 'ctions than Friar John de la Roquetaillade; and 'ſome of them, perhaps, are more blameable, in that 'they would engage princes to make war without 'end, that their conjectures may take effect. Our 'friar, at leaſt, non erat intentionis faciendi guerras, '---- had no intention to make war, and would uſe 'only ſpiritual arms; whereas ſome of our Roque- 'taillades of theſe days would oblige by force erro- 'neous conſciences to make profeſſion of their opinions, 'without believing them.'

[G] I believe thoſe that ſay he was burnt are miſtaken.] 'Some ſay that at laſt he was burnt (29).' Theſe are the words of Mr du Pleſſis, who puts in the margin, 'Petrus Premonſtratenſis in Chronico quod in- 'ſcribitur Biblia pauperum. ---- Petrus Premonſtra- 'tenſis, in his Chronicle, which is called the Bible of 'the Poor.' Baluzius rejects this, and ſays (30), he knows not from whence Cæſar Noſtradamus (31) had it, That this friar was burnt publickly at Avignon, in 1362, by the Pope's order. What Froiſſard has writ is a ſolid refutation of this lie, tho' we had not the teſtimony of thoſe who ſay (32) that Rupeſciſſa was buried at Villefranche in a convent, where he had made his profeſſion of the rule of St Francis.

(29) Du Pleſſis, ubi ſupra.

(30) Baluzius, ubi ſupra, pag. 942.

(31) Cæſar Noſtradamus, in Hiſtoria Provinciæ, pag. 411.

(32) Jacobus Fodera, apud Baluzium, ibid.

[H] Raynaldus, who endeavoured to take advantage of a prophecy of this friar, has been ſolidly refuted by Baluſius.] He applied it to the election of Urban VI. 'Odoricus Raynaldus, an. 1379, n. 12, refert inſigne, 'ut ille vocat, vaticinium viri religioſi Joannis è 'Rupeſciſſa inventum inter monumenta Avenionenſia, 'ex quo multum adjuvari putat cauſam Urbani (33). 'Odoricus Raynaldus, an. 1379, n. 12, mentions a re- 'markable prophecy, as he calls it, of the Friar John 'de Rupeſciſſa, found, amongſt other writings, at Avignon, 'whereby he thinks the cauſe of Urban was much pro- 'moted.' The prophecy is (34), that the ſee of Rome ſhall be vacant eighteen months, and that in the time of the conclave there ſhall be ſo great a battle between the people, and the tyrants of Italy, and ſo great an effuſion of blood, that it will be thought the end of the world is come. Now by the juſt judgment of God, an Anti-Pope ſhall be choſen, according to the ſuggeſtions of an impoſtor, who ſhall have two tongues, ad ſuggeſtionem unius bilinguis falſarii. This impoſtor, according to Raynaldus, was no other than the cardinal of Amiens. But Mr Baluzius ſhews us two things (35); the firſt, that the prophecy does not relate to the time when Urban VI was choſen Pope; the ſecond is, that if it concerned that time, it would be more contrary to Urban VI than to the pretended Anti-Pope Clement VII. He ſhews by the commentary of Roquetaillade upon the prophecy of Cyril, that the vacancy of the Papal chair, during a year and a half, has relation to the time that Anti-Chriſt ſhall appear. Now here is the character of that time. The king of France, and the king of England, ſhall then fight againſt the infidels in the eaſt. This does in no manner agree with the time of the ſchiſm of Urban VI and Clement VII. Obſerve that this friar acknowledges that the Anti-Pope ſhall be elected to the diſhonour of JESUS CHRIST, and of the true Pontif (36), and that Anti-Chriſt ſhall ſupport the cauſe of the Anti-Pope. Illud ſcandalum erit majus quia Antichriſtus partem Antipapæ ſuſtinebit (37). From this it is manifeſt, that he did not hold the Pope to be Anti-Chriſt.

(33) Baluz. ibid. p. 1160, 1161.

(34) See Baluz. ibid.

(35) Ibid. pag. 1459.

(36) In contemptum Chriſti & veri Pontificis. Job. de Rupeſciſſa, apud Baluz. pag. 1161.

(37) Idem, apud eundem, pag. 1459.

RORARIUS (HIERÔME), Nuncio of Clement VII at the court of Ferdinand king of Hungary (a), has compoſed a book which is worth the reading. He undertakes to ſhow, not only that brute beaſts have reaſon, but that they make better uſe of it than man. The occaſion which moved him to write that book is curious, and very ſingular. He happened to be in a company, where a learned man affirmed that Charles V did not equal the Otho's, nor Frederic Barbaroſſa. There needed no more to make Rorarius conclude that beaſts are more reaſonable than men, and he ſet himſelf immediately about the compoſing a treatiſe upon this ſubject [A]. It was at the time that

(a) Rorarius, quod animalia bruta ratione utantur melius homine, lib. i, pag. 57, Edit. Amſtelod. 1654.

[A] He ſet himſelf immediately about the compoſing a treatiſe of this ſubject.] There are two Epiſtles Dedicatory in the beginning of this book; one to the biſhop of Arras, dated March 1, 1547; the other to Cardinal Chriſtopher Madrucio, biſhop of Trent. This piece remained almoſt a hundred years in the dark receſſes of libraries. At laſt Naudæus had it printed in France, and dedicated it to Meſſieurs du Puy. His Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Paris, April 9, 1645. That book was reprinted in Holland more than once (1). I do not know for what reaſon it is placed among the books of Phyſic, in Lindenius Renovatus. I am ſure I ſhall be accuſed of producing ſometimes proofs without neceſſity; but the readers would be in the wrong to ſay ſo, as to what I have advanced, touching the motive of Rorarius's writing that book. If I did not quote his own words, I ſhould give occaſion to think, that I had framed the idea of a chimerical writer to divert my reader: for what can be imagined more comical and extravagant. than a man who takes pen in hand to place mankind below beaſts, for no other reaſon, but becauſe a learned man takes it ill that Charles V ſhould aſpire to the univerſal monarchy, without having the qualities of Otho the Great, or of Frederic Barbaroſſa? It is therefore very neceſſary that I ſhould prove what I have ſaid above. 'Eram, illuſtriſſime 'Princeps, (they are Rorarius's words) paucis ante 'diebus, ubi de Cæſare ſermo habebatur; & fuit do- 'ctiſſimus alioqui vir, qui diceret, neſcire quo odore 'olens Chriſtianum orbem ditionis ſuæ facere nitere- 'tur. Haberet in ſe ſaltem quo cum Othonibus, aut 'Federico Ænobarbo conferri poſſet. Movit (fateor) 'mihi ſtomachum, dignum immortalitate Principem 'illis poſtponi: qui licet inſignes fuerint, ſi tamen 'in unum omnes congerantur, hujus magnitudini non 'ſufficiant. Itaque in mentem mihi venit animalia 'bruta ſæpe ratione uti meliùs homine, idque duobus 'libellis oſtendi (2). --- I was, moſt illuſtrious prince, 'a few days ago, in a company, where they were talk- 'ing of the emperor; amongſt whom there was a perſon, 'otherwiſe of great learning, who ſaid, he knew not 'upon what ground he ſhould attempt to bring the Chri- 'ſtian world under his own dominion. That he ought to 'have in himſelf at leaſt what might qualify him 'to be compared to the Otho's, or to Federic Ænobarbus. 'I muſt confeſs it moved my indignation, that a prince, 'worthy of immortal fame, ſhould be poſtponed to them, 'who, tho' perſons of eminence, if both their qualities 'were united in one, would come ſhort of his greatneſs. 'Wherefore it came into my mind, that the brutes did 'often uſe their reaſon better than man.' He did not content himſelf with one ſingle declaration: He had already obſerved this in another Epiſtle Dedicatory. 'Scripſeram

(1) I make uſe of the Amſterdam edition of 1654, in 12mo.

(2) Rorarius, Epiſt. Dedicat. ad Madrutium Cardinalem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that Charles V made war againſt the league of Smalcalde. This book is not ill wrote, and it contains a great many ſingular facts concerning the ingenuity of beaſts, and the malice of man. Thoſe which concern the capacity of beaſts, put under great difficulties both the followers of Mr Des Cartes and thoſe of Ariſtotle [B]. The firſt deny that beaſts have any ſoul; the latter maintain that they are endowed with ſenſe, with memory, and with paſſions, but not at all with reaſon. It is pity that the opinion of Des Cartes ſhould be ſo hard to maintain, and ſo improbable; for it is otherwiſe very advantageous to religion [C], and this is the only reaſon which hinders ſome people from quitting

'Scripſeram libellos duos, in quibus oſtenderam animalia bruta ſæpè ratione uti meliùs homine; idque feceram, ut quorundam impudentiam, anne potiùs dementiam retunderem; qui maximi omnium Imperatorum Caroli Quinti ſplendorem intueri non valent (3). - - - I had written two ſmall pieces, in which I had ſhewn that beaſts oftentimes reaſon better than man; which I did to repreſs the impudence, or rather madneſs of ſome, who were not able to fix their eyes upon the glory of Charles V, the greateſt of all emperors.' Read the reſt of this epiſtle, you will find there a man very partial to Charles V, and a great flatterer. There were, and ſtill are, many more like him in the world.

(3) Idem, Epiſt. Dedicat. ad Episcopum Atrebatenſem.

[B] Thoſe facts which concern the capacity of beaſts, put under great difficulties both the followers of Des Cartes, and . . . . of Ariſtotle.] This needs no proof, with reſpect to the Carteſians; there is no body but knows that it is difficult to explain, how mere machines can do what animals do. Let us only prove, that the Peripatetics will find it very hard to give good reaſon for what they aſſert. Every Peripatetic, when he hears it affirmed, that beaſts are only automata, or machines, preſently objects, that a dog that hath been beaten for falling ſoul upon a diſh of meat, touches it no more when he ſees his maſter threatning him with a ſtick. But to ſhew that this phænomenon cannot be explained by him that propoſes it; it is enough to ſay, that if the action of this dog is attended with knowledge, the dog muſt neceſſarily reaſon: he muſt compare the time preſent with that which is paſt, and from thence draw a concluſion: he muſt needs remember both the blows that were given him, and why he has received them: he muſt needs know, that if he ſhould fall ſoul upon the diſh of meat, which affects his ſenſes, he ſhould do the ſame action for which he was beaten; and conclude, that to avoid a new beating, he muſt abſtain from that meat. Is not this true reaſoning? Can you explain this act by the ſimple ſuppoſition of a ſoul that has ſenſe, without reflecting upon it's acts; without remembrance; without comparing two ideas; without drawing any concluſion? Examine well the examples which are collected (4), and which are objected to the Carteſians; you will find they prove too much, for they prove that beaſts compare the end with the means, and that on ſome occaſions they prefer what is honeſt before what is profitable: in ſhort, that they are guided by the rules of equity and gratitude. Rorarius ſays there have been horſes that have refuſed to leap their mothers; or if having done it unwittingly, being deceived by the artifice of their groom, after knowing what they had done, have thrown themſelves down a precipice. 'Teſtantur literarum monumenta, fuiſſe gregis cuſtodem, qui equum ut matrem iniret, nunquam inducere potuerit; & quoniam ambo eximia ſpecie erant, fraude tamen illuſiſſe, velatis oculis, ne matrem videret: detracto poſtmodum operimento, & agnito cum matre concubitu, petiiſſe prærupta, & ſe patratri ſceleris reum peſſundediſſe. Maris hæc virtus; alibi fœminæ: ſiquidem in Reatino agro equa lacerato priùs auriga, qui flagitii auctor fuerat, eundem exitum habuit (5). - - - - We find it upon record, that there was an herdſman, who could never make one of his horſes to cover his dam; and as both were very beautiful in their kind, yet he was obliged to veil his eyes, that he might not ſee her, whereby he deceived him; and having after removed the cover, whereby the horſe perceived what he had done, he went in ſearch of a precipice, and conſcious of the crime he had committed, threw himſelf headlong. This was the virtue of a male, the like has been ſeen of a female; for in the territory of Reaty, a mare, after ſhe had torn to pieces the charioteer, who was the cauſe of the crime, ſhe made the like exit.' What he ſays, and what other authors relate; how eagerly ſome dogs have laboured to aſſiſt their maſter, and to revenge his death, &c. are things abſolutely inexplicable according to the hypotheſis of the Ariſtoteliens; ſo that all their diſpute againſt the diſciples of Des Cartes, is labour in vain. There is no need of any thing, but of the dextrous management which Pereira made uſe of. You grant, ſaid he, to his adverſaries (6), that animals do many things which much reſembles what the rational ſoul does, and yet that their ſoul is not rational. Why then did you forbid me to maintain that they do ſeveral things, which much reſemble what a ſenſitive ſoul does, tho' their ſoul be not ſenſitive? I do not wonder in the leaſt, that neither Des Cartes, nor any of his diſciples ever made uſe of a paſſage in the Code of Juſtinian, where it is ſaid that beaſts are incapable of doing any injury, becauſe they want ſenſe (7); it is clear that the word ſenſus in that law is taken for deſign and underſtanding.

(4) See in Lipſius, Epiſt. L, Centur. I, Miſcellan. ſeveral ſurprizing actions of elephants. This letter is a commentary by way of examples, upon the words of Pliny, which I will quote in the remark [D]. See concerning horſes, the ſame Lipſius, Cent. III, ad Belgas, Epiſt. LVI, and concerning dogs, Cent. I, ad Belg. Epiſt. XLV.

(5) Rorarius, lib. ii, pag. 72.

(6) See the article PEREIRA, citation (55).

(7) Nec enim poteſt animal injuria feciſſe quod ſenſu caret. - - - Nor can a ſoul that hath no ſenſe be capable of any crime. See Grotius, Flor. Sparſ. ad Jus Juſtinianeum, pag. 124, Edit. Amſtel. 1643, in 12*mo.*

[C] The opinion of Mr Des Cartes . . . . is very advantageous to the true religion.] What induces the Carteſians to ſay that beaſts are automata, is, that according to them, all matter is incapable of thinking. They do not content themſelves to ſay, that only ſpiritual ſubſtances are capable of reaſonings, and to join a long train of conſequences, but they maintain that every thought, whether you call it reflexion, meditation, inferring from principles, or whether it be called ſenſation, imagination, inſtinct, is of ſuch a nature, that the moſt ſubtile and perfect matter is incapable of it, and that it is only to be found in incorporeal ſubſtances. By this principle there is no man but may be convinced of the immortality of his own ſoul: every one knows that he thinks, and conſequently, if he reaſons after the Carteſian manner, he muſt own that what in him is the ſubject of his thoughts is diſtinct from his body: from whence it follows, that in this reſpect he is immortal; for the mortality of creatures conſiſts only in this, that they are compoſed of ſeveral parts of matter, which are ſeparated one from another. This is a great advantage to religion; but it will be almoſt impoſſible to preſerve it by Philoſophical reaſons, if it be granted that beaſts have a material ſoul which periſhes with the body; a ſoul, I ſay, whoſe ſenſations and deſires are the cauſe of the actions which we ſee them do. See the remark [F]. The Theological advantages of Des Cartes's opinion concerning beaſts being mere automata, do not ſtop there. They diffuſe themſelves over many important principles, which cannot be ſufficiently maintained, if beaſts are allowed to have a ſenſitive ſoul. If St Auguſtin maintained theſe principles, tho' he granted this ſort of ſoul in beaſts; and if he did not find himſelf much perplexed about the connexion of theſe two things, he was more fortunate than wiſe. From the principles which he has carefully examined, and ſolidly eſtabliſhed, it manifeſtly follows, that beaſts have no ſoul, as Ambroſius Victor (8) ſhews in his ſixth volume of Chriſtian Philoſophy (9). The author, who furniſhes me with theſe words, ſuppoſeth, That this holy doctor knowing too well how to diſtinguiſh the ſoul from the body, to think that there were corporeal ſouls, admitted a ſpiritual ſoul in beaſts (10). Now here is a ſpecimen he gives us of the principles of St Auguſtin, which are incompatible with his ſoul of beaſts: Some of thoſe principles of St Auguſtin are, that a creature which hath not ſinned, can never ſuffer any evil; now, according to him, pain is the greateſt of evils, and beaſts ſuffer pain. That the more noble thing cannot have for it's end the leſs noble; but, according to him, the ſoul of beaſts is ſpiritual, and more noble than the body, and yet they have no other end than the body. That what is ſpiritual is immortal, and the ſoul of beaſts, tho' ſpiritual, is ſubject to death. There are many other ſuch like principles in the works of St Auguſtin, from whence it may be concluded that beaſts have no

(7) Nec enim poteſt animal injuria feciſſe quod ſenſu caret. - - - Nor can a ſoul that hath no ſenſe be capable of any crime. See Grotius, Flor. Sparſ. ad Jus Juſtinianeum, pag. 124, Edit. Amſtel. 1643, in 12*mo.*

(8) This is a falſe name aſſumed by a Father of the Oratory.

(9) Mallebranche, Eclairciſſemens ſur le vi livre de la Recherche de la Verité, p. 380, 381.

(10) It is certain, that St Auguſtin, whatever F. Mallebranche may ſay, believed the ſouls of beaſts to be ſenſitive and corporeal. Vita brutorum, ſays he, cap. iv, of the knowledge of true life, eſt ſpiritus vitalis conſtans de aëre & ſanguine animalis, ſed ſenſibilis, memoriam habens, intellectu carens, cum carne, moriens, in aëre evaneſcens. - - - The ſoul of beaſts is a vital ſpirit, conſiſting of air and the blood of the animal, but ſenſible, having memory, without underſtanding, dying with the body, vaniſhing into air. See alſo chap. xxiii, de Spiritu & Anima.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google quitting it. It is not liable to the moſt dangerous conſequences of the common opinion. It is a long time ſince it has been maintained that the ſouls of beaſts are rational [D]. The no ſuch ſpiritual ſoul as he admits in them (11). I am not fully perſuaded that St Auguſtin believed that the ſoul of beaſts is an incoporeal ſubſtance, but be that as it will, the ſecond principle which is given us here for an example, is incompatible with the opinion of this great doctor; for that which knows, is more noble than that which does not know: but St Auguſtin allowed ſenſe at leaſt to the ſoul of beaſts; therefore he believed it more noble than the body; therefore he maintained on the one ſide, that the more noble thing cannot have for it's end the leſs noble; and on the other ſide, that the ſoul of beaſts, being more noble than their body, had no other end than their body. This, you will ſay, is of ſmall importance to religion. But you are miſtaken, ſome will anſwer; for all the proofs of original ſin, drawn from ſickneſſes and death, which children are ſubject to, fall to the ground, if you ſuppoſe that beaſts have ſenſation, they are ſubject to pain and death, and yet they never ſinned. And therefore you argue wrong, when you ſay, little children ſuffer, and die, therefore they are guilty; for you ſuppoſe a falſe principle, which is contradicted by the condition of beaſts, viz. That a creature, which never ſinned, can never ſuffer. This is nevertheleſs a moſt evident principle, which flows neceſſarily from the ideas we have of the juſtice and goodneſs of GOD. It is agreeable to immutable order, that order from which we clearly apprehend that GOD never departs. The ſouls of beaſts confound this order, and overthrow thoſe diſtinct ideas: it muſt therefore be granted, that the automata of Des Cartes very much favour the principles by which we judge of the infinite Being, and by which we maintain Orthodoxy. Read what follows.

(11) Mallebranche, ibid. in the margin.

(12) Viz. the diſpute againſt Des Cartes, concerning the ſouls of beaſts.

'Religion was drawn into the cauſe (12), the Anti-'Carteſians hoping thereby to ruin the machines of 'Des Cartes; but it is impoſſible to expreſs the advan-'tage, which accrued from thence to his diſciples. 'For they believe that they have demonſtrated, That 'by allowing beaſts to have a ſoul capable of know-'ledge, all the natural proofs of the immortality of 'the ſoul are deſtroyed. They have ſhewed, That 'their opinion had not more obſtinate enemies than 'the impious, and the Epicureans; and that a greater 'ſpite cannot be done to thoſe bad Philoſophers, than 'by depriving them of all the falſe reaſons, which 'they borrow from the ſouls of beaſts, to draw this 'concluſion, that there is only more or leſs difference 'between them and us. It is certain, That there are 'none who affect more than thoſe people, to make 'beaſts come near men in perfection. Thus the ſecta-'tors of Des Cartes, have by this means intereſſed 'religion in their cauſe: but they are not contented 'with this reaſon. They went as far as the nature 'of GOD, to find out invincible arguments againſt the 'knowledge of beaſts; and it may be ſaid, they have 'found very good ones. The author of the Recherche 'de la Verité [Search after Truth] has given us the plan 'of it in ſome places of his works. Father Poiſſon of the 'Oratory has profoundly treated the argument, which is 'grounded upon this principle of St Auguſtin, That 'GOD being juſt, miſery is a neceſſary proof of ſin; 'from whence it follows, That beaſts not having ſin-'ned are not ſubject to miſery: but they would be 'ſubjected to it, if they were endowed with ſenſe; 'therefore they have none (13).' You will find after theſe words the extract of a book (14), which ſhews, That if beaſts have a knowing ſoul, it follows, 1. That GOD does not love himſelf; 2. That he is not conſtant; 3. That he is cruel and unjuſt (15). He would not love himſelf; for he would have created ſouls capable of knowledge and love, without obliging them to know and love him. He would have created them to be in a ſtate of ſin, and by conſequence he would have diſcharged them from the law of order, which is the ſupreme and indiſpenſible law. The ſtate of ſin is to fix upon creatures, as the ultimate end: this is what the ſouls of beaſts do, according to the common opinion. According to the ſame opinion theſe ſouls are annihilated, when beaſts die: where is then the conſtancy of GOD? He creates ſouls, and ſoon annihilates them. He does not deal ſo with matter: he never deſtroys it. He therefore preſerves the leſs perfect ſubſtances, and deſtroys the more perfect. Is this the part of a wiſe agent? The ſouls of beaſts never ſinned, and yet they are ſubject to pain and miſery, and rendred obnoxious to all the irregular deſires of creatures, which have ſinned. How do we treat beaſts? We make them tear one another in pieces for our diverſion; we kill them for our nouriſhment, and ranſack their bowels during their lives, to ſatisfy our curioſity; and all this we do by virtue of the dominion that GOD has given us over them. What a diſorder is it, that an innocent creature ſhould be ſubject to the caprices of a criminal one? There is no Caſuiſt that believes that there is any ſin in baiting of bulls, &c. or in making uſe of innumerable deceits and violences, by hunting or fiſhing, to deſtroy animals, or in killing of flies, as Domitian did. Is it not cruelty and injuſtice to ſubject an innocent ſoul to ſo many miſeries? The opinion of Des Cartes frees us from all theſe difficulties. I will give a liſt of ſome pieces, which have been publiſhed in favour of this opinion.

(13) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, March 1684, pag. 26, 27.

(14) Intituled, La Bête tranſformée en machine. The author's name is Darmanſon.

(15) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, March 1684, pag. 28.

A preface of Mr Schuyl: it is at the beginning of the Latin tranſlation of Des Cartes's treatiſe de Homine. A treatiſe of Antony le Grand (16), De carentia ſenſus & cognitionis in brutis. A letter of Mr de Cordemoi, to a learned Jeſuit, printed in 1668 (17). A treatiſe of the ſouls of beaſts, printed in the year 1676, at Lyons, writ by Dilly, a Prieſt of Ambrun. Philoſophical Dialogues by Mr Rohault. The Notes of Father Poiſſon, upon the method of Des Cartes. The Brutum Carteſianum of Arnoldus Geulinex. This is a poſthumous work, which was publiſhed in 1688, by Mr Langenhert, a good Carteſian, but not in what concerns the ſouls of beaſts (18); tho' he has put in a Geometrical form the reaſons which prove that beaſts have no ſenſe. Several diſciples of Des Cartes do the ſame, deſerting him as to his doctrine of Automata. Mr Craanen, Profeſſor of Philoſophy, and afterwards of Phyſic at Leyden, has been a great ſtickler for this Philoſopher, even to ſuffer for him; and, what perhaps is more wonderful, he would not forſake his doctrine about the Glandula Pinealis: but he laughed at thoſe, who hold that beaſts have no ſenſe. Mr Regis, one of the moſt famous Carteſians in theſe times, went not ſo far: he was contented to ſay, That whatever inclination he might have to give to beaſts a ſoul diſtinct from the body, he had rather ſuſpend his judgment in that reſpect (19). The book of Father Pardies, concerning the knowledge of beaſts, may be reckoned among thoſe that have been publiſhed to maintain Des Cartes's opinion; for the reaſons of the Carteſians are propoſed in it, with their utmoſt ſtrength, and very weakly refuted. I believe nevertheleſs that he was not negligent in the ſecond part of his work, and that he did all that was poſſible to maintain the antient opinion: but having alſo done all that he could do to repreſent faithfully, and in their beſt colours, the reaſons of the new; he has made ſome ſuſpect, that he had no real deſign to confute Des Cartes. Here is the judgment of one of his order: There is nothing more apt to deceive than the expoſitions made by Father Pardies, in his book called, De la connoiſſance des beſtes, - - - - (of the knowledge of brutes) wherein giving the Carteſian arguments all the force they can have on that point, he goes almoſt ſo far as to convince his readers, not only that there is no need of a ſoul to walk, drink, eat, complain, but alſo to ſpeak, and to ſpeak as long as a preacher in a ſermon of an hour, or a lawyer in a long plea. This book has made the author, to paſs among the Peripatetics, for a prevaricator, who at the bottom was a Carteſian, notwithſtanding the pains he has taken in the ſecond part of his book, to refute Carteſianiſm, and to defend the antient Philoſophy, as to the ſouls of beaſts (20).

(16) See concerning this author the book de Scriptis Adagiis, of Deckherrus, p. 321, 387, Edit. 1686. In one of the letters of Mr Arnauld to Father Mallebranche, we find that le Grand is a Franciſcan Friar.

(17) This letter was anonymous; but Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. II, p. 344, ſays that Mr Cordemoi is the author of it.

(18) See the Journal of Liſle, Nov. 1688, pag. 624.

(19) Pierre Sylvain Regis, Syſtême de Philoſophie, Tom. V, Part. II, pag. 126, edit. of Lyons 1691, in 12mo.

(20) Suite du Voyage du Monde de Des Cartes, pag. 91, 92, edit. of Amſterdam 1696.

[D] It is a long time ſince it has been maintained, that the ſouls of beaſts are rational.] All that I had to ſay upon this, might have been put in the remarks of the article PEREIRA; but I had a mind to avoid prolixity in that place. We may reckon Strato and Æneſidemus among thoſe, who have maintained that the ſouls of beaſts are rational; for they taught that ſenſe could not ſubſiſt without underſtanding. '(21) 'Idem eſſe αἰσθησιν, καὶ διανοιαν *, ſenſum & 'cogitationem, opinio fuit tum Stratonis Phyſici, qui 'Theophraſti auditor † fuit; tum Æneſidemi, qui

(21) Voſſius, de origine & progreſſu Idololatriæ, Lib. III, cap. 9, pag. 939.

* See Scaliger, Exercit. 307, num. 5.

† Laertius, in vita Theophraſti, lib. V, num. 36.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The Philoſophers of the ſchools are very much miſtaken, if, by rejecting that, they perſuade

‘ in Pyrrhonia introductionem conſcripſit. De utro-
‘ que teſtis nobis Sextus Empiricus adverſus Mathe-
‡ Cap. de homine, five, pag. 201, Edit. Aurelian. ‘ maticos ‡. - - - That ſenſation and thinking are the ‘ ſame, was the opinion of Strato the Natural Philoſo- ‘ pher, who was a diſciple of Theophraſtus; and alſo of ‘ Æneſidemus, who wrote an introduction to the Pyrrho-
‘ nia. Which Sextus Empiricus teſtifieth of them both
‘ in his book againſt the Mathematicians.’ Voſſius without doubt would have here cited Plutarch, if he had called to mind this paſſage. Καίτοι Στράτωνός γε τῦ Φυσικῦ λόγῳ ἐστὶν, ἀποδεικνύων ὡς οὐδ' αἰσθάνεσθαι τοπαράπαν ἄνευ τῦ νοεῖν ὑπάρχει. Stratonis etiam Phyſici exſtat oratio, qua ſine intelligentia ſentiri omnino nihil poſſe demonſtrat (22). It is ſaid that Parmenides, Empedocles, Democritus, and Anaxagoras, taught that all beaſts are endowed with underſtanding. ‘ Ab hac opinione qua beſtiæ ſenſus cre-
(22) Plutarch. de ſolertia Animalium, p. 961, A. ‘ duntur expertes, ad alteram venio: ſecundum quam, †† Pyrrhoniarum Hypotypoſ. lib. ii, cap. v. ‘ ut Sextus Empiricus †† ait, οὐδὲν ἐστὶν ζῷον ἄλογον, ἀλλὰ καὶ νῦ, καὶ ἐπιστήμης δεκτικὰ ἐσι πάντα: nullum eſt animal rationis expers; ſed omnia ſunt intelligentiæ, & ſcientiæ capacia. Hanc
‡‡ Pag. 93, Edit. Plantin. ‘ ſententiam Parmenidi, Empedocli, & Democrito,
‡‡ Cont. 24. ‘ tribuit Stobæus in Eclogis Phyſicis ‡‡. Anaxagoras
‘ quoque interdum in hanc opinionem inclinavit;
‘ teſte Ariſtotele lib. i. de anima cap. ii ‡‡: ubi agnoſcit quidem, non uno loco dicere, mentem eſſe
‘ ejus cauſſam, quod rectè, & pulchrè ſe habet: ſed
‘ addit, alibi tradere, τὸν νῦν εἶναι τὸν αὐτὸν τῇ ψυχῇ· ἐν ἅπασι γὰρ ὑπάρχειν αὐτὸν τοῖς ζώοις καὶ μεγάλοις καὶ μικροῖς, καὶ τιμίοις, καὶ ἀτιμοτέροις. Idem eſſe mentem, & animam: mentem
‘ enim omnibus ineſſe animalibus, tam parvis, quam
(23) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. m. 940. ‘ magnis; tam vilioribus, quam honeſtioribus (23). - - -
‘ From this opinion, that beaſts are void of ſenſe, I come
‘ to the other; according to which, as Sextus Empiricus
‘ affirms; there is no animal without reaſon, but all
‘ are capable both of underſtanding and ſcience. This ‘ opinion is, by Stobæus in his phyſical eclogues attributed
‘ to Parmenides, Empedocles, and Democritus. Anaxa-
‘ goras alſo ſome time was inclined to this opinion; wit-
‘ neſs Ariſtotle de Anima cap. ii. where he owns in ‘ more places than one, that the mind is the cauſe of ‘ what is right and beautiful; but adds, that he elſe-
‘ where teacheth, that the mind and ſoul are the ſame:
‘ for that there is in all animals a mind, whether they
‘ be ſmall or great, deſpicable or more noble.’ I paſs by that opinion which was ſo common amongſt the Antients, viz. that living bodies contain a ſoul, which is part of the ſoul of the world. I grant that the natural conſequence of this opinion is, That the ſouls of beaſts are of the ſame nature as the ſouls of men; but this does not prove that beaſts are actually rational: for it might be maintained that the portions of the ſoul of the world, that are united to certain bodies, loſe the faculty of reaſoning. And ſince the ſticklers for the doctrine of the ſoul of the world, never taught that the ſouls of plants were rational; they muſt needs have believed that their doctrine did not engage them to maintain, That beaſts were endowed with reaſon. Let us therefore paſs by this opinion, tho' Virgil alledged it as the fitteſt means to explain all that he had ſaid of the qualities of bees.

His quidam ſignis, atque hæc exempla ſecuti,
Eſſe apibus partem divinæ mentis, & hauſtus
Æthereos dixêre: Deum namque ire per omnes
Terraſque, tractuſque maris, cœlumque profundum:
Hinc pecudes, armenta, viros, genus omne ferarum,
Quemque ſibi tenues naſcentem arceſſere vitas.
Scilicet huc reddi deinde, ac reſoluta referri
Omnia: nec morti eſſe locum; ſed viva volare
(24) Virgil. Georg. lib. iv, ver. 219. Sideris in numerum, atque alto ſuccedere cœlo (24).

Induc'd by ſuch examples, ſome have taught
That bees have portions of Etherial thought:
Endu'd with particles of heavenly fires:
For GOD the whole created maſs inſpires;
Thro' heav'n and earth, and ocean's depth he throws
His influence round, and kindles as he goes.
Hence flocks, and herds, and men, and beaſts, and fowls,
With breath are quicken'd and attract their ſouls,
Hence take the forms his preſcience did ordain,
And into him at length reſolve again.
No room is left for death they mount the ſky,
And to their own congenial Planets fly.

DRYDEN.

It is better to ſpeak of Philo, who wrote a book, wherein he maintained that beaſts are rational: Περὶ τῦ λόγον ἔχειν τὰ ἄλογα ζῶα, de eo quod bruta animalia ratione ſint prædita (25). I have elſewhere (26) ſpoken of the opinion of Galen; but ſee here a more formal proof of it. ‘ An animantia quæ dicun-
(25) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. ii, cap. xviii, pag. m. 59. ‘ tur bruta, prorſus expertia ſint rationis, nondum ſa-
‘ tis liquet. Fortaſſis enim, tametſi non habeant eam
‘ Rationem, quæ juxta vocem intelligitur, nobiſcum
(26) In the article PEREIRA, citation (38). ‘ communem, quam vocant enuntiativam; certe eam,
‘ quæ ſecundum Animam accipitur, quam Rationem
‘ appellant affectuum capacem, habent nobiſcum com-
‘ munem, licet alia magis, alia minus (27). - - - Whe-
(27) Galenus, in Exhortat. ad Art. lib. ſtud. init. apud Ant. le Grand de carentia ſenſus, p. 10. ‘ ther the animals, called brutes, are altogether void of ‘ reaſon, does not yet ſufficiently appear. For though they ‘ have not perhaps in common with us that reaſon which
‘ is called diſcurſive; yet ſurely they have in common
‘ with us that reaſon which is underſtood to belong to a
‘ ſoul, and is capable of paſſions, though ſome in a greater,
‘ ſome in a leſſer degree.’ Tho' Lactantius declares in ſome places, That GOD has not granted beaſts a rational faculty (28); yet he maintains in his treatiſe de ira Dei, that excepting religion beaſts imitate men in every thing, and participate of the privileges of the human ſpecies. The difference is only in more or leſs. ‘ Solus (homo) ſapientia inſtructus eſt ut reli-
(28) Cæteris animantibus quoniam rationalem iſtam vitam non attribuit. Lactant. de opificio Dei, cap. ii, p. m. 574. ‘ gionem ſolus intelligat, & hæc eſt hominis atque
‘ mutorum vel præcipua, vel ſola diſtantia; nam cæ-
‘ tera quæ videntur hominis eſſe propria, etſi non ſint
‘ talia in mutis, tamen ſimilia videri poſſunt. . . . . .
‘ Quid tam proprium homini quam ratio, & providen-
‘ tia futuri? Atqui ſunt animalia, quæ latibulis ſuis
‘ diverſos, & plures exitus pandant; ut ſi quod peri-
‘ culum inciderit, fuga pateat obſeſſis; quod non face-
‘ rent, niſi ineſſet illis intelligentia, & cogitatio. Alia
‘ provident in futurum (29). - - - Man only is endowed
(29) Idem, de ira Dei, cap. vii, pag. 529. ‘ with wiſdom ſo as to underſtand religion, and this is the ‘ principal if not the only difference betwixt him and ‘ dumb animals; for other things that ſeem peculiar to ‘ him, though they are not the ſame in them, yet they ap- ‘ pear to be alike. . . . . What is there more peculiar
‘ to man than reaſon, and foreſight? Yet there are ani- ‘ mals which make ſeveral different ways of retiring
‘ from their dens; that when in danger they may eſcape;
‘ which without underſtanding and forethought they could
‘ not do. Others make proviſion for the future.’ We are not for all this to believe that he maintained that the ſouls of beaſts are ſpiritual and immortal; for at that time the connexion between thought and ſpirituality, was not clearly ſeen. Doth not Arnobius manifeſtly affirm, That human ſouls, of their own nature are mortal, and that they ſhall totally periſh in Hell by the activity of the torments, and could not continue always in Heaven, were it not by the grace of GOD? Does not he aſſert that a ſimple and immortal nature is incapable of pain? He felt ſome; therefore he did not believe that his ſoul was a ſpiritual, immaterial, and immortal Being. ‘ Homo prudentiæ non pravæ,
‘ ſays he (30), ſpeaking of Plato, & examinis judiciique
(30) Arnobius, adverſus Gentes, lib. ii, pag. m. 52. ‘ perpenſi, rem inenodabilem ſuſcipit, ut cum animas
‘ dicat immortales, perpetuas, & corporali ſoliditate
‘ privatas, puniri eas dicat tamen, & doloris afficiat
‘ ſenſu. Quis autem hominum non videt, quod ſit
‘ immortale, quod ſimplex, nullum poſſe dolorem ad-
‘ mittere? quod autem ſentiat dolorem immortalitatem
‘ habere non poſſe: Nec tamen ejus auctoritas plurimum à veritate declinat. . . . . Non eſt abſonè ſuſpi‘ catus jaci eas in flumina torrentia flammarum globis,
‘ & cœnoſis voraginibus tetra. Jaciuntur enim, & ad
‘ nihilum redactæ, interitionis perpetuæ fruſtratione
‘ vaneſcunt. Sunt enim mediæ qualitatis, ſicut Chriſto
‘ auctore compertum eſt, & interire quæ poſſint Deum
‘ ſi ignoraverint vitæ, & ab exitio liberari, ſi ad ejus
‘ ſe minas atque indulgentias applicarint. - - - A man
‘ of no deſpicable wiſdom, and a penetrating judgment,
‘ undertakes what is not to be explained, when he aſſerts
‘ that ſouls are immortal, perpetual, and incorporeal, and ‘ yet

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

perſuade themſelves, that they ſhall avoid the ill conſequences of the opinion that gives beaſts

' yet may be puniſhed and ſuffer pain. Who knows not ' that an immortal uncompounded Being is not capable of ' pain? And that what is ſubject to pain cannot be im- ' mortal? Nor does what he ſays much differ from truth. ' .... He has imagined, not unreaſonably, that they ' are caſt into torrents of fire, with horrible devouring ' gulphs, and there are annihilated by a perpetual de- ' ſtruction. For they are of ſuch a nature, as Chriſt has ' manifeſted, that they may periſh, if ignorant of GOD, ' and be delivered from deſtruction, by a right uſe of his ' threats and promiſes.' He confutes the Platonics, who ſaid, That the ſoul of man has a celeſtial origin, that it is immortal, and incorporeal; he refutes them, I ſay, by this argument amongſt others, That there is but little or no difference between our ſouls and thoſe of beaſts. ' Nihil eſt quod nos fallat, nihil quod no-' bis polliceatur ſpes caſſas, id quod nobis à quibuſ-' dam dicitur viris, immoderata ſui opinione ſublatis, ' animas immortales eſſe, Deo, rerum ac principi gra-' du proximas dignitatis, genitore illo ac patre pro-' latas, divinas, ſapientes, doctas, neque ulla corporis

(31) Ib. p. 53. ' attrectatione contiguas (31). - - - There is no reaſon ' we ſhould deceive, or flatter ourſelves with vain hopes, ' becauſe of what is told us by ſome men, puffed up with ' an immoderate opinion of themſelves; that our ſouls ' are immortal, next in dignity to GOD, and the higheſt ' order of Beings, proceeding from, and begotten of him, ' divine, wiſe, learned, not partaking of corporeal im- ' perfection.' ' Vultis tumore depoſito cogitationibus ' tacitis pervidere animantia nos eſſe, aut conſimilia ' cæteris, aut non plurima differitate diſtantia? Quid ' eſt enim, quod nos ab eorum indicet ſimilitudine diſ-' crepare? vel quæ in nobis eminentia tanta eſt, ut

(32) Ib. p. 54. ' animantium numero dedignemur adſcribi (32). - - - ' Will ye, laying aſide your pride, conſider that we are ' animals, either altogether alike, or not much differing? ' For what is there to demonſtrate the difference? or ' what ſuch excellency is in us, that we ſhould diſdain to ' be accounted of their number?' He examines the pre-eminence of man above brutes, and he pretends to ſhew that it is inconſiderable: he particularly affirms that men do not ſurpaſs brutes in reaſon. ' Sed ' rationales nos ſumus, & intelligentia vincimus ge-' nus omne mutorum. Crederem iſtud veriſſimè dici, ' ſi cum ratione & conſilio cuncti homines viverent, ' ſervarent officiorum tenorem, abſtinerent ab illicitis ' ſeſe, negotia turpia non adirent, neque quiſquam pra-' vitate conſilii, atque ignorantiæ cæcitate contraria ' ſibimet atque inimica depoſceret. Vellem tamen ' ſcire quænam ſit hæc ratio, per quam ſumus potiores ' animalium generibus cunctis: quia nobis domicilia ' fecimus, quibus poſſimus hyemalia frigora, & æſtatis ' flagrantias evitare? Quid? animantia cætera hujus

(33) Ib. p. 55. ' rei providentiam non habent (33)? - - - But we are ' rational creatures, and ſurpaſs in underſtanding the ' whole kind of mute animals. I would believe this to ' be true, if all men lived according to reaſon and conſi- ' deration, performed all duties, abſtained from unlaw- ' ful and ſhameful things, and by wicked and blind igno- ' rance did not purſue what tends to their deſtruction. I ' would gladly know what this ſame reaſon is, whereby ' we excel all the other kinds of animals: is it in build- ' ing houſes to ſhelter us from the ſummer's heat and win- ' ter's cold? Why? do not the other animals act in like ' manner?' We may therefore reckon Arnobius among thoſe, who hold that the ſouls of beaſts are rational. It is from him, without doubt, That Lactantius learned to put no other difference between them and man, but religion. There have been Philoſophers who denied this to be a privilege of man; for they ſaid that beaſts have a religion. Xenocrates the Carthaginian did not deny their having the knowledge of GOD, Democritus muſt needs have been of his opinion, if he reaſoned conſequentially: this is at leaſt the pretenſion of Clemens Alexandrinus. Καθόλε γ' ἓν τὴν περὶ τῦ Θείυ ἔννοιαν Ξενοκράτης ὁ Καρχηδόνι@ ἐκ ἀπελπίζει, καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀλόγοις ζώοις· Δημόκριτ@ δὲ, κἂν μὴ θέλῃ, ὁμολογήσει διὰ τὴν ἀκολυθίαν τῶν δογμάτων· τὰ γὰρ αὐτὰ πεποίηκεν εἴδωλα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις προσπίπτοντα, καὶ τοῖς ἀλόγοις ζώοις ἀπὸ τῆς θείας ὐσίας. Ut ſummatim quidem dicam, Xenocrates Carthaginienſis non ſpem omnium abjicit, quinetiam in rationis expertibus animantibus ſit Dei notitia. Democritus autem, etſi nolit, confitebitur per dogmatum conſequentiam: fecit enim eaſdem imagines in homines incurrentes, & in animantes rationis expertes, ex divina eſſentia (34). - - - (34) Clemens Alexand. Strom. lib. v, p. 599, C. To ſpeak in few words, Xenocrates the Carthaginian is not without hope that animals deſtitute of reaſon have alſo knowledge of GOD. But Democritus, though he will not, muſt grant it, in conſequence of his doctrine: for he holds that the ſame images that are in men, and alſo in irrational animals, are produced by the divine eſſence. Pliny places religion among the moral virtues of elephants. ' Maximum eſt Elephas, ſays he (35), proxi-' mumque humanis ſenſibus: quippe intellectus illis (35) Plin. lib. viii, cap. i, init. ' ſermonis patrii, & imperiorum obedientia, officio-' rumque, quæ didicere, memoria: amoris, & gloriæ ' voluptas: imo vero, (quæ etiam in homine rara) ' probitas, prudentia, æquitas, religio quoque ſiderum, ' Soliſque ac Lunæ veneratio. Auctores ſunt, in Mau-' ritaniæ ſaltibus ad quendam amnem, cui nomen eſt ' Amilo, mitеſcente Luna nova, greges eorum deſcen-' dere: ibique ſe purificantes ſolenniter aqua circum-' ſpergi, atque ita ſalutato ſidere in ſilvas reverti, vi-' tulorum fatigatos præ ſe ferentes. Alienæ quoque ' religionis intellectu, creduntur maria tranſituri non ' ante naves conſcendere, quam invitati rectoris jure-' jurando de reditu. Vilique ſunt feſſi ægritudine, ' (quando & illas moles infeſtant morbi) herbas ſupini ' in cœlum jacientes, veluti tellure precibus allegata. ' - - - The elephants are the greateſt of animals, and ' come neareſt to human ſenſe: for they underſtand the ' language of their country, obey commands, remember the ' offices done them, have the pleaſure of love and glory; ' yea alſo (which are rare even in men) probity, pru- ' dence, equity, religious regard of the ſtars, the worſhip ' of the ſun and moon. It is reported, that in the foreſts of ' Mauritania they go down in troops to a certain river ' called Amilo, in the decreaſe of the moon, where they are ' purified by ſprinkling water in a ſolemn manner, and ' after adoration of the luminary, return unto the woods ' carrying their tired young ones. And being to croſs the ' ſeas, they will not go aboard, as is ſaid, till they have the ' maſter's oath to bring them back. And they have been ' ſeen, when worn out with ſickneſs, (which theſe bulky ' animals are alſo ſubject to) lying on their backs, and ' throwing herbs into the air, as if thereby to atone the ' heavens.' Dion relates part of theſe things (36). (36) Dion, lib. xxxvii, p. 120. Could one believe that the diſciples of Plato, who looked upon brutes to be probably immortal, with reſpect to the ſoul, as Paganinus Gaudentius obſerves, ſhould take reaſon from them? ' Quod ſi dicas apud ' Platonicos ſolas animas rationales eſſe immortales, ' reſpondebit Alcinous non eſſe id prorſus exploratum. ' Nam poſtquam dixit animas rationales ſecundum ' Platonem eſſe immortales, mox ſubjungit *: Utrum * Cap. xxv. ' verò & irrationales, ambiguum eſſe videtur: & ' quamvis ipſe ſentiat eſſe probabile eas eſſe mortales, (37) Paganinus Gaudentius, de tranſmigratione Pythag. p. 78. ' indicat tamen id inter Platonicos non fuiſſe certum ' (37). - - - But if you ſay that only rational ſouls are ' by the Platoniſts thought to be immortal, Alcinous will ' anſwer, that neither is that altogether certain. For (38) Eccleſ. chap. iii. ' after he hath ſaid, that according to Plato rational ' ſouls are immortal, he adds immediately: but whether ' alſo the irrational are ſo, is doubtful. And though (39) See chap. ix, x, of a work in italick, Traité ' he thinks it himſelf probable that they are mortal, yet de Religion contre les Athées, les Deiſtes, & les nouveaux Pyrrhoniens, printed at Paris 1677. ' he ſays that this was not thought certain among the ' Platoniſts.' I ſay nothing of Solomon, who ſeems to ſay expreſsly (38), That the ſouls of beaſts and thoſe of men, are of the ſame nature; for we ought not to take his words literally, we ought to give them a better ſenſe (39): but we may be allowed to believe that ſeveral Rabbins did hold that beaſts have a rational ſoul.

Thoughts of ſome Rabbins upon the ſoul of beaſts.

The famous Maimonides believed without doubt, that they reaſon; for he gives them a kind of free-will. Mr Arnauld had reaſon to object againſt him, that from thence it would follow, that they might be rewarded or puniſhed after death. If I relate ſomewhat at length what precedes this reflexion of Mr Arnauld, it is becauſe of certain facts which ſhew us the opinion of ſome Jews about animals. This great Rabbi explains five opinions touching providence, which are all, as he believes, as antient as the Prophets (40). The fourth of theſe opinions extended the providence of God to every thing, and did not deny the free-will of men (41). Maimonides objects ſeveral inconveniences againſt

(40) Arnauld's Reflexions upon the Syſtem of Malebranche, [illegible] p. 241. He cites cap. xv. of the firſt part of More Nevochim, Dicit, &c. propoſitorum of Maimonides.

(41) Ib. p. 245.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google beasts a sensitive soul [E]. These gentlemen want neither distinctions, nor exceptions, nor against the followers of this opinion. They said that it was a work of the wisdom of God, that there were men who, tho' they had never sinned, were born with many defects, and that it was better to be so than not be at all. We do not understand, says this Jewish Doctor, what goodness there could be in that, - - - sed nos istam bonitatem non intelligimus (42). 'When they were asked 'what justice there was in the death of beasts, what 'sin they had committed, and why GOD would, 'since his providence extended to all, have an inno- 'cent rat pulled in pieces by a cat? They answered, 'GOD had ordered it so; but that he would recom- 'pense that rat in another world. It was very ri- 'diculous to think that there should be a heaven for 'beasts. But this Rabbi himself gives some occa- 'sion to this idle fancy, when he ascribed a will to 'irrational animals as well as to men: Omnia pariter 'animantia irrationalia moventur voluntate sua; for if 'they have a will it would be hard to give a reason 'why they should not be capable of good or evil, re- 'wards and punishments (43).'

(42) Arnauld, ibid. pag. 246.

(43) Ibid.

The Socinians do not go so far as Maimonides; they do not ascribe to beasts a will properly so called, nor a free-will; they do not allow them to be capable of virtue and vice, or of puishments and rewards, properly speaking. They say, nevertheless, that reason, liberty, and virtue, are found in them imperfectly and analogically; and that in some manner they are worthy of reward or punishment. If you will not believe me, read the following passage: 'Quia homo 'inter animantia solus ratione propriè dicta præditus 'est, in illum etiam solum tum voluntas, tum vir- 'tus & vitium, tum denique præmium & pœna cadit. 'In bruta tamen animalia cadit aliquid singulis istorum 'analogum, in ea præsertim, quæ sunt perfectiora, '& disciplinæ alicujus capaciora. Est enim in illis 'primum aliqua facultas rationi respondens, quam non- 'nulli rationem inferiorem vocant, qua non de rebus 'modo jucundis, ac utllibus quodammodo ratiocinan- 'tur, & de ratione illorum adipiscendorum disputant; 'sed etiam viam sibi à Deo præscriptam, seu re- 'ctam quandam vivendi rationem naturæ suæ con- 'sentaneam, quæ honestati analoga est, agnoscunt. In- 'de sequitur facultas altera, voluntati quodam modo 'respondens, in qua nonnihil est libertatis. Hinc ali- 'quid etiam virtuti & vitio simile, seu rectè & pravè 'factum: quorum illud est, cum bruta naturæ suæ 'ductum sequuntur, hoc cum à naturali via exorbitant. 'Unde tandem etiam aliquid præmio aut pœnæ, & 'huic quidem maxime simile. Unde bestias etiam à 'Deo punitas (44), aut pœnas certas lege illis consti- 'tutas, cernimus: qua de re legatur Socinus in Anti- 'Puccio. Quemadmodum ergo rationem humanam κατ' ἐξοχήν, & propriè hoc nomine appellamus, & 'brutis eam adimimus (dicimus enim irrationalia seu 'ratione carentia) ita & cætera omnia. Rursus quem- 'admodum impropriè & per analogiam rationem bru- 'tis tribuimus, ita & cætera omnia (45). - - - - - 'Of all animals man only is endowed with reason, pro- 'perly so called, so he only hath a will, and is capable of 'virtue and vice, rewards and punishments. Yet some- 'thing bearing a resemblance to each of these, may also 'be found in brutes, especially such as are more perfect, 'and more capable of discipline. For there is in them 'a certain faculty that answers to reason, called by some 'an inferior degree of reason, whereby they not only consider 'in a manner what is pleasant and profitable, and 'search for the means of attaining them; but they 'likewise acknowledge a certain manner of living suita- 'ble to their nature prescribed to them by GOD, which 'has some affinity to virtue. This must suppose another 'faculty, something like the will, in which there is some 'liberty. Hence also there is something in them resem- 'bling virtue and vice, or doing good or evil, when 'they act according to their nature, or otherwise. And 'hence they become capable of rewards and punishment, 'but especially of this last. Hence we see that beasts also 'are punished by GOD, and have certain penalties pre- 'scribed by law; concerning which, consult Socinus in 'his Anti-Puccius. Wherefore as we give the appella- 'tion of reason, by way of eminence and property, to that 'which is in man, and deny it to beasts, (which we 'call irrational, or void of reason) so we do with re- 'spect to all other things.' I know not whether Gulielmus Parisiensis, one of the greatest genius's of his age, could avoid going a little farther than this opinion; for it is said, he taught that the souls of beasts are spiritual; and it is not certain that ever he retracted this opinion (46). See the citation (48) of this page.

(44) See, below, citation (60), what I quote from Franzius. You will find there, where God orders that beasts should be punished.

(45) Joan. Crellius, Ethicæ Christianæ, lib. ii, cap. i, pag. m. 65, 66.

To come to the Moderns, I shall observe that Valla (47) and Antony Cittadinus (48) acknowledged reason in beasts. Stephen Pasquier has writ a fine letter upon this opinion. This letter is the first of the tenth book. Montagne declared for this opinion, and has taken such care to defend it, that he seems to have designed that apology for Raimundus Sebunus should partly serve for the brutes. Charron has followed him in this, as well as in several other things. A Physician of Rochelle (49) having writ against Charron, was confuted in his turn by one of the best pens that has writ in French on Philosophical matters; I mean Mr de la Chambre, Physician to Mr Seguier, Chancellor of France. The Physician of Rochelle replied (50); his antagonist did the same, and intituled his book, Traité de la Connoissance des Animaux, où tout ce qui a été dit pour & contre le raisonnement des bêtes est examiné. - - - - A treatise on the knowledge of brutes, wherein all that has been said for and against the reasoning of beasts is considered. I observe, by the by, that Isaac Vossius is of opinion, that, in respect of language, the condition of beasts is much better than ours, because they communicate more readily, and probably more happily, their thoughts than we (51). A German censures him for that (52). We shall see the opinion of Sennertus in the remarks [D] and [E] of his article: I will there name some modern authors, who have believed that the soul of beasts is spiritual.

(46) In the little dissertations in the beginning of Tom. ii, of his works, in the edition of 1676, it is inquired whether he ever recanted the opinion, which he was accused to have maintained concerning the spirituality of the soul of brutes, where it is compared with the opinion of Des Cartes, and other Philosophers, who have particularly treated on this question. Journal des Sçavans, January 16, 1677, pag. m. 28.

(47) Valla, Dial. cap. ix, apud Vossium, de orig. & progr. Idol. lib. iii, cap. xli, pag. 940.

(48) In lib. i, Post. Analyt. cap. iii, apud eundem ibid.

[E] The ill consequences of the opinion that gives beasts a sensitive soul.] There is nothing more diverting, than to see with what authority the schoolmen take upon them to set bounds to the knowledge of beasts. They will have it, that they know only particular and material objects, and that they only love what is profitable and agreeable; that they cannot reflect upon their sensations and their desires, nor infer one thing from another. One would think that they have searched more exactly into the faculties and acts of the souls of beasts, than the most expert Anatomists into the entrails of dogs. Their temerity is so great, that tho' they had found out the truth by chance, they would yet have rendered themselves unworthy of praise, and even of excuse. But let us give them quarter; let us grant them all that they suppose: What do they hope for from it? Do they fancy, that by this means they shall obtain from any body that can reason, that it ought to be granted, that the soul of man is not of the same species with that of beasts? This is a chimerical pretension. It is evident to any one that can judge of things, that every being that has sense, knows that it has it: and it would not be more absurd to maintain, that the soul of man knows actually an object without knowing that it knows it; than it is absurd to say, that the soul of a dog sees a bird, without perceiving that she sees it. This shews that all the acts of the sensitive faculty are, of their own nature, and by their own essence, reflexive upon themselves. Father Maignan, who, notwithstanding all his knowledge, has remained in the errors and rubbish of the schools, as to the souls of beasts, owns nevertheless that in order to perceive any thing, one ought to know the perception one has of it. 'Id 'quod vocamus sentire, says he, non est sine cogni- 'tione ejus rei quæ dicitur sensibilis: cum autem 'nihil externum sit per se sensibile; sed tantum per 'suam actionem; adeoque actio ejus sit primario sen- 'sibilis: & cum insuper nos non dicamur alicujus 'agentis actionem sentire, si ea dum in nobis fit, 'omnino lateat nos; consequenter id quod vocamus 'sentire, non est sine cognitione actionis, quæ fit in 'nobis sentientibus; imo quia sentire nihil aliud ex 'parte sentientis dicit, præter eam cognitionem; con- 'sequens est ipsum sentire, quatenus se tenet ex parte 'sentientis, consistere in eo quod est agnoscere se 'pati; quod coincidit cum eo quod est agnoscere 'actionem in se receptam, seu passionem suam (53). '- - - - That which we call sensation, says he, is not 'without the knowledge of that thing which is called 'sensible; but as nothing external is sensible but only by it's 'action, which therefore is chiefly sensible, and since 'moreover

(49) Chanet, in his Reflexions upon Charron.

(50) His reply is intituled, De l'instinct & de la connoissance des Animaux, Rochelle 1646, in 8vo.

(51) Isaacus Vossius, de Poëmatum cantu & viribus rythmi, pag. 65.

(52) Joh. Cyprianus, in Historiæ Animalium Continuatione, pag. 20.

(53) Emanuel Maignan, Philosophia naturæ, cap. xxiv, num. 2, pag. m. 527. See also Casimirus of Toulouse, Atomi Peripateticæ, Tom. iv, pag. 70, where he sets down in few words, the definition of Father Maignan, and this of Casserius, Sensus est objecti in organo formaliter suscepti dignotio. - - - Sense is the knowledge of an object formally received into the organ; and approves them.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google nor assurance to decide, that the acts of this soul do not exceed certain bounds, which they prescribe to them: but all this idle and unintelligible discourse signifies nothing towards

'moreover we cannot be said to feel the action of any agent, if, while it is performed in us, it is altogether unknown to us; by consequence what we call sensation, is not without the knowledge of the action done in us when we feel: yea, because sensation, with respect to that which hath it, besides that knowledge, implies nothing more; it follows, that sensation itself, considered as in the sentient being, consists in it's perceiving what it feels, which is the same as to know that an action is received in itself, or it's own passion.' It must then be said, that the memory of beasts, is an act that makes them remember what is past, and which tells them that they remember it. How then can it be said, that they have not the power of reflecting upon their thoughts, nor of drawing consequences? But once more let us not dispute upon that; let us give these Philosophers leave to build their suppositions very ill; let us only make use of what they teach. They say, that the soul of beasts perceives all the objects of the five external senses; that among those objects it judges that some are suitable to it, and others hurtful; and that, in consequence of this judgment, it desires those that are suitable, and abhors the others; and that in order to enjoy the object it desires, it transports it's organs to the place where that object is, and that in order to fly from the object which it hates, it withdraws it's organs from the place where the object is. I conclude from all this, that if it doth not produce acts so noble as those of our soul, it is not it's fault, or because it is of a nature less perfect than the soul of man; it is only because the organs it animates do not resemble our's. I ask of these gentlemen, if they would allow that one should say, that the soul of a man is of another species at the age of thirty-five years, than at the age of one month; or, that the soul of a mad-man, of an ideot, or of an old man, become childish through age, is not substantially as perfect as the soul of a man of excellent parts. They would, without doubt reject this opinion as a gross error, and with good reason; for it is certain, that the same soul which in children is only sensitive, meditates and reasons solidly in a grown man, and that the same soul which makes it's reason and wit to be admired in a perfect man, would only dote in an old man, talk idly in a natural, and exert sensation in a child. We should be guilty of a gross error, did we believe, that the soul of man is only capable of thoughts which are known to us. There are infinite sensations, passions, and ideas, of which this soul is very capable, tho' it be never affected with them during this life. If it were united to organs different from our's, it would think otherwise than it does at present, and it's modifications might be far more noble than those we now experience. If there were substances, which in organized bodies had a train of sensations, and other thoughts far more sublime than our's, could it be said that they are of a more perfect nature than our soul? No, without doubt; for if our soul was removed into those bodies, it would have the same train of sensations, and other thoughts far more sublime than ours. This may be easily applied to the soul of beasts. It will be granted us that it has a sensation of bodies; that it discerns them; that it desires some, and abhors others. This is enough: it is therefore a substance that thinks; it is therefore capable of thought in general; it can therefore entertain all sorts of thoughts; it can therefore reason; it can therefore know what is honest; the universals; the axioms of Metaphysics; the rules of morality, &c. For as wax can receive the impression of one seal, it manifestly follows, that it may receive the figure of any seal; it must likewise be granted, that since a soul is capable of one thought, it is capable of any thought. It would be absurd to reason thus; This piece of wax has only received the impression of three or four seals; therefore it cannot receive the impression of a thousand. This piece of pewter has never been a plate; therefore it can never be made one, and it is of another nature than the pewter plate I see there. They reason no better, who say, The soul of a dog has never had any thing but sensations, &c. therefore it is not capable of the ideas of morality, or Metaphysical notions. From whence comes it that a piece of wax bears the impression of a prince, and that another does not? It is because the seal has been applied to the one and not to the other. This piece of pewter that never was a plate, will be one, if you cast it into the mould of a plate. Cast in like manner the soul of this beast into the mould of universal ideas, and of the notions of arts and sciences, I mean, unite it to a well chosen human body; it will become the soul of a man of parts, and be no more that of a beast.

You may see therefore that is impossible for the School-Philosophers to prove, that the souls of men, and those of beasts, are of a different nature, let them say, and repeat it a thousand and a thousand times, That man's soul does reason, and know universals and virtue, and that of beasts knows nothing of all this. We answer them, These differences are only accidental, and are no marks of a specific difference. Aristotle and Cicero, at the age of one year, never had more sublime thoughts than those of a dog; and if they had lived in the state of infancy thirty or forty years, the thoughts of their souls had never been any thing but sensations and little passions for play and eating: it is therefore by accident, that they have surpassed beasts; it is because their organs on which their thoughts depended have acquired such and such modifications, to which the organs of beasts arrive not. The soul of a dog in the organs of Aristotle or Cicero, would not have failed to acquire all the knowledge of those two great men.

This consequence is very false; viz. such a soul does not reason, does not know universals, therefore it is of a different nature from that of a great Philosopher: for if this consequence were good, it would follow that the soul of little children is different from that of men. What then do you dream of, you Peripatetic Philosophers, when you pretend that if the souls of beasts do not reason, they are essentially less perfect than souls that reason? You ought first to have proved that the want of reasoning in beasts, proceeds from a real and intrinsic imperfection of the soul, and not from the organic dispositions on which it depends; but this is what you can never be able to prove: for it is clear, that a subject which is capable of the thoughts which you allow in the soul of beasts, is capable of reasoning, and of any other thought; from whence it results, that if it doth not actually reason, it is because of certain accidental and external obstacles, I mean, because the Creator of all things has fixed every soul to a certain train of thoughts, by making it depend on the motions of certain bodies. This is the reason why sucking-children, naturals, and mad-men do not reason.

One cannot, without horror, think of the consequences of this doctrine, The soul of men and the soul of beasts do not differ substantially, they are of the same species, the one acquires more knowledge than the other, but these are only accidental advantages, and depending on an arbitrary institution. This doctrine necessarily and inevitably flows from what the schools teach about the knowledge of beasts. It follows from thence, that if their souls are material and mortal, the souls of men are so likewise; and that if the soul of man is a substance spiritual and immortal, the soul of beasts is so too. Horrible consequences! turn which way you will. For if to avoid the immortality of the soul of beasts, you suppose that the soul of man dies with the body, you overthrow the doctrine of another life, and sap the foundations of religion. If to preserve to our souls the privilege of immortality, we extend it to those of beasts, into what an abyss do we fall? What shall we do with so many immortal souls? Will there be for them also an Heaven and a Hell? Will they go from one body to another? Will they be annihilated as the beasts die? Will God create continually an infinite number of spirits, to plunge them again so soon into nothing? How many insects are there which only live a few days? Let us not imagine that it is sufficient to create souls for the beasts which we do know; those that we do not know are far the greater number. The microscopes discover them to us by thousands in a single drop of liquor. Many more would be discovered if we had more perfect microscopes. And let no man say that insects are only machines; for one might better explain by this hypothesis the actions of dogs, than the actions of pismires and bees. There is, perhaps, more wit and reason in the invisible creatures,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google wards the eſtabliſhing a ſpecific difference between the ſouls of men and thoſe of beaſts [F]; and it is not likely, that they can ever invent a better explication, than that

(54) See the words of Pliny, cited in the article MENAGE, citation (1).

tures, than in the large (54). We are now going to take a view of the vain efforts of the ſchools, to eſtabliſh a ſpecific difference between the ſouls of men and beaſts.

[F] A ſpecific difference between the ſouls of men and thoſe of beaſts.] They ſay, that the ſoul of beaſts is a material form, but that the ſoul of man is a ſpirit which God creates immediately. But how do they prove that? I ſuppoſe they only argue upon the principles of natural reaſon, without having recourſe to ſcripture or the doctrines of religion; and I aſk of them one good proof to ſhew that the ſouls of beaſts are corporeal, and that ours is not? They will alledge the beauty and extent of human knowledge; and the ſmallneſs, groſſneſs, and obſcurity of the knowledge of beaſts; and they will conclude, that a corporeal principle is capable of producing the knowledge of beaſts, but not the reflexions, the reaſonings, the univerſal ideas, the ideas of honour and honeſty, which are found in the ſoul of man; and that by conſequence this ſoul ought to be of an order ſuperior to matter, and ought to be a ſpirit. I will not ſay now that they aſſert raſhly, that the ſoul of beaſts does not argue, and that it has no idea of what is honeſt. Let us lay aſide this objection, and only ſay, that it is a thouſand times more difficult to ſee a tree, than to know the act by which we ſee it; ſo that if a material principle is capable of knowing an infinite number of outward things, it will be far more capable of knowing it's own thoughts, and of comparing them together, and multiplying them; therefore the reflexions, and concluſions, and abſtractions of man, require not a principle nobler than matter. A very learned Peripatetic is of our ſide; let us hear him ſpeak; his confeſſion will be more perſuaſive than my objections. 'If you once admit, ſays he, that all 'that is moſt wonderful in the actions of beaſts, 'may be done by means of a material ſoul; will you 'not ſoon grant what follows, and ſay, that all that 'paſſes in man may be alſo done by a material ſoul? '... If you once grant that beaſts, without any ſpiri-'tual ſoul, are capable of thinking, of acting for an end, 'of foreſeeing things to come, of remembring what 'is paſt, of acquiring experience by the particular re-'flexion they make upon it; why will you not grant 'that men are capable of exerciſing their functions 'without any ſpiritual ſoul? After all, the operations 'of men are no other than thoſe which you aſcribe 'to beaſts: if there be any difference, it is only as to 'more or leſs; and ſo all that you can ſay will only 'be, that the ſouls of men are more perfect than 'thoſe of beaſts, becauſe men remember better than 'they, think with more reflexion, and foreſee things 'with more certainty; but in fine you cannot ſay, but 'that their ſouls are ſtill material. You will ſay 'perhaps, That in men there are ſome operations 'that cannot ſuit with beaſts, nor proceed from any 'other principle than a ſpiritual ſoul: and thoſe ope-'rations are univerſal knowledge; that ratiocination, 'whereby we infer one thing from another; and the 'ideas we have of infinity, and of things ſpiritual 'which do not fall under the ſenſes: but thoſe who 'deny that there is any knowledge in beaſts, do not 'deny for all that, that thoſe thoughts and reaſon-'ings are in us, ſince we ourſelves are conſcious of 'them: ſo that they have always the ſame right 'which you have to prove the exiſtence of the ra-'tional ſoul. But beſides, they add, that all thoſe 'operations which you look upon to be ſo extraor-'dinary, differ only in degrees from the operations 'which you attribute to beaſts. And certainly, it 'ſeems that to act with a deſign, to improve by ex-'perience, to foreſee things to come, (which you grant 'to beaſts) ought to proceed no leſs from a ſpiritual 'principle than what is found in man. For after all, 'what is an univerſal knowledge, but a knowledge 'which ſuits with many things that are like, as the 'picture of a man would ſuit with all the faces that 'ſhould reſemble it? What is reaſoning, but a 'knowledge produced by another knowledge, as we 'ſee that a motion is produced by another motion? 'Certainly, if it be once granted, That thought, in-'tention, and reflexion, may proceed from a body ani-'mated with a material form; it will be very diffi-'cult to prove, That the reaſonings and ideas of man 'cannot proceed from a body animated likewiſe with 'a material form (55).'

(55) Pardies, of the knowledge of beaſts, num. 49, pag. 100, & ſeq.

I deſire all my readers to take notice of the unlucky condition the ſchool-men are in, as to the doctrine of the ſenſitive ſoul. They alledge againſt Des Cartes the moſt ſurpriſing actions of beaſts; they chuſe them on purpoſe, the better to confound him; but afterwards they find that they are gone too far, and have ſupplied their adverſary with weapons to deſtroy the ſpecific difference which they endeavour to prove between our ſouls and thoſe of beaſts. They could wiſh that one ſhould forget all the examples of cunning, precaution, docility, and knowledge of things to come, which they have ſet forth with ſo much pomp, in order to ſhew that beaſts are not meer machines; they could wiſh that one ſhould mind only the groſs actions of an ox whoſe ſole buſineſs is feeding: but it is too late to require ſuch a thing; thoſe very examples are made uſe of to confound them, and to prove againſt them, That if a material ſoul is capable of all thoſe things, it will be able to do whatever is performed by the ſoul of man. Only a greater degree of refinement will be wanting to the ſouls of beaſts. Muſt we not ſuppoſe, That the ſoul of a dog or of an ape is not of ſo coarſe a nature as that of an ox? In one word, if nothing but a ſpiritual ſoul can produce the actions of a dull witted clown; I will maintain againſt you, That nothing but a ſpiritual ſoul can produce the actions of an ape; and if you ſay that a corporeal principle is able to produce whatever is performed by apes; I will maintain againſt you, that a material principle may be the cauſe of whatever is performed by ſtupid men, and that provided matter be ſubtilized, and diſintangled from all groſs particles, phlegms, &c. it may be the cauſe of whatever the moſt underſtanding man can do.

A QUESTION concerning the liberty of the ſouls of beaſts.

Some authors inſinuate, That ſince the ſoul of man is endowed with free-will, and that of beaſts is deprived of it, there muſt needs be a ſpecific difference between them, and one muſt be ſpiritual and the other material. The Jeſuit Theophilus Raynaud, publiſhed in 1630, a little book intituled Calviniſmus Beſtiarum Reigio (56). His chief deſign was to prove that the doctrine of the Dominicans reduces men to the condition of beaſts, by depriving them of free-will (57). 'Præcipuè ex eo capite pronunciavit Catholicus, cen-'ſendum eſſe, Calviniſmum eſſe religionem beſtiarum, 'quòd juxta placita Calvinianæ, homo redigatur in or-'dinem beſtiarum, & hominis gradu ac dignitate ex-'cidat. Ad quod ſolidè probandum, duæ propoſitio-'nes vitæ illi ſunt ſtabiliendæ. Una eſt, hominem in 'ratione hominis, conſtitui per libertatem. Altera 'eſt, libertatem everti per Calviniſmum (58). - - - 'That Calviniſm was to be accounted the religion of 'beaſts, hath been affirmed by the Jeſuit, becauſe, ac-'cording to their principles, man was degraded into the 'rank of beaſts, and deprived of the degree and dignity 'of man. In order to the proof of which, two propo-'ſitions were by him to be eſtabliſhed. One is, that to 'man, conſidered as ſuch, liberty of acting is eſſential. 'The other, that by Calviniſm, liberty is deſtroyed.' He ſuppoſes that the liberty of indifference is the character, whereby men are diſtinguiſhed from beaſts; for as to the liberty, which conſiſts only in being free from conſtraint, or in ſpontaneity, no ſchool-men can ſay that beaſts are deprived of it. I will make it appear that it is moſt falſe, that a ſoul endowed with free-will is of another kind than a ſoul that is not endowed with it. The ſouls of children and mad-men are deſtitute of free-will, and yet they are of the ſame ſpecies with the ſouls that are moſt free. To which may be added, that thoſe who maintain the liberty of indifference, ſay, that it will ceaſe after this life, and yet they acknowledge that a human ſoul is the ſame ſubſtance upon earth as in heaven or in hell. It is therefore manifeſt, That the liberty of indifference is not an eſſential attribute of creatures, but a gift, or an accidental favour beſtowed upon them by the Creator: and conſequently the ſouls that are not gratified with it, are not of a different ſpecies from thoſe that receive it. This argument is therefore very wrong: the

(56) See Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. i, pag. 224.

(57) He diſputes, it is true, againſt Calvin, but it is in order to conclude againſt the Dominicans, (whom he pretends to be like Calvin as to that doctrine,) what he concludes againſt Calvin.

(58) Calviniſmus, Beſtiarum Religio, Diatriba ii, pag. m. 25.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that which they have already given. The author, who has beſt confuted the opinion of Des Cartes concerning the ſouls of beaſts, would have done us a ſingular favour, if he could have cleared the common opinion from the great difficulties that attend it [G].

Mr Leibniz

the ſouls of beaſts are deprived of free-will, but the ſouls of men are not deprived of it; therefore the ſouls of beaſts are material, and the ſouls of men are ſpiritual. I will go farther, and ſay that thoſe, who admit of a ſenſitive ſoul, have no good reaſon to aſſert, That beaſts are not free creatures. Do not they ſay, that they do a thouſand things with great pleaſure, being directed by the judgment they make of the uſefulneſs of objects, whereby they are prompted to unite themſelves to thoſe objects? If liberty conſiſts only in being free from conſtraint, and in a ſpontaneity preceded by the diſcerning of the objects, is it not an abſurd thing to deny the liberty of beaſts? Has not a hungry dog the power of abſtaining from a piece of meat, when he is afraid of being beaten if he does not abſtain from it? Is not this to have the power of acting or not acting? Doubtleſs his abſtinence proceeds from his comparing his hunger with the blows of a ſtick, which he judges to be more intolerable than hunger. If you obſerve all the human actions that are aſcribed to a liberty of indifference, you will find that a man does never ſuſpend them, or never chuſes one of the two contraries, but becauſe having compared the reaſons pro and con, he ſees more inducements to ſuſpend his action than to act, or has more motives for one action than for another. Let us further hear the Jeſuit, who wrote againſt the Carteſians. 'It 'is no eaſy thing thus to ſeparate reaſoning from 'thought; and I think it may be eaſily proved, that 'when a ſubſtance is capable of thinking, it is alſo 'capable of reaſoning; that it is endowed with will 'and liberty; and, in a word, that it can act like 'men. The ancient Philoſophers, and even the Fa'thers of the Church, have proved that we have a 'free-will by this general argument; that whatever is 'capable of knowledge, can know good and evil, 'that is, what is good or bad for it; and conſequent'ly, that, by conſidering thoſe two objects, it can 'compare them together, can deliberate, and deter'mine to chuſe the one and reject the other, in which 'the uſe of our liberty conſiſts. And this is ſo true, 'that the definition of liberty taken in general, which 'we uſe ſtill to this day, is this, Facultas agendi cum 'ratione, the faculty of acting with knowledge, which 'is the ſignification of theſe words, cum ratione (59).'

One of the ſtrongeſt arguments alledged for the liberty of man, is taken from the puniſhment of malefactors. All ſocieties are agreed to puniſh them exemplarily, and even to extend, in ſome caſes, the puniſhment to their dead bodies: they are deprived of burial, and expoſed to the public view upon wheels and gibbets. If man did not act freely, if he was determined by a fatal and unavoidable neceſſity to have a certain train of thoughts, robberies and murders ſhould not be puniſhed, and no advantage could be expected from the puniſhment of criminals; for thoſe who ſhould ſee the dead body of a malefactor upon a wheel, would not be leſs ſubject than before to that prevailing power, which makes them act and does not allow them the uſe of their liberty. This argument for a free-will is not ſo ſtrong, as it ſeems to be; for though men are perſuaded that machines have no feeling, they will nevertheleſs give them a hundred blows with a hammer, when they are out of order, if they think that they may be ſet right by flatting a wheel, or another piece of iron. They would therefore cauſe a pick-pocket to be whipped, though they knew that he has no free-will, if experience had taught them that the whipping of people keeps them from committing certain actions. However, if this argument for a free-will has any force, it will manifeſtly ſhew, that beaſts are not deprived of liberty (60). Men puniſh them every day, and mend their faults by that means. Ochinus, in the beginning of his labyrinths, examines all the reaſons, which make us believe that we act freely; and ſays among other things againſt that which is taken from the puniſhments inflicted upon malefactors, that if the judges were ſure that the hanging of a horſe, which had killed a man, and the leaving him a long time upon the gallows in the high-way, would hinder other horſes from doing miſchief, they would uſe that puniſhment, whenever a horſe maims or kills any body by kicking or biting (61). It is likely he did not know that in ſome countries they make uſe of ſuch fights, to keep beaſts in awe. Rorarius was an eye-witneſs of it; he ſaw two wolves hanging upon a gibbet in the duchy of Juliers, and he obſerves, that it made a greater impreſſion upon the other wolves, than the mark of a red hot iron, the loſs of one's ears, &c. does upon thieves. He ſays alſo that it is uſual in Africa to nail lions to a croſs, in order to terrify others, and that the people find ſome benefit by it. 'Solent in Africa crucifigere leo'nes, ſi qui deprehendantur urbes obſidere, quod in 'ſenectâ faciunt: quoniam ad perſequendas feras vires 'non ſuppetunt; cujus pœnæ metu, licet urgeat fa'mes, deſinunt: & nos ab Agrippina Colonia Duram 'verſus equitantes, in illa vaſta ſylva, vidimus duos 'caligatos lupos, non ſecus quam duos latrones furcæ 'ſuſpenſos: quo ſimilis pœnæ formidine à maleficio 'reliqui deterreantur. At inter homines quotidie re'periuntur, quibus ob admiſſa furta tergus virgis cæ'ſum, abſciſſæ auriculæ, ſignatæ genæ, truncata altera 'manus, erutus oculus, nec adhuc à furtis ſe continere 'poſſunt, donec laqueus vitæ finis extiterit (62). - - - 'It is uſual in Africa to crucify lions, when they come 'into towns, as they do when grown old; becauſe they 'are not able to hunt down the beaſts: for fear of which 'puniſhment, tho' pinched with hunger, they keep away: 'and when we were journeying from Cologn to Duren, 'through that great foreſt, we ſaw two wolves truſſed 'like two robbers hanging on a gibbet, that others might 'be deterred by fear of the like puniſhment. But amongſt 'men are daily to be ſeen ſuch as for their crimes have 'been whipped, had their ears cut off, been burnt in the 'cheek, had a hand cut off, an eye pulled out, and yet 'could not abſtain from wickedneſs, till an end was put 'to their life on a gibbet.'

[G] If he could have cleared the common opinion, &c.] The book intituled, Le Voyage du Monde de Des Cartes (63), has been very much eſteemed, and not without good reaſon. It contains very great difficulties objected to the Carteſians in an agreeable and lively manner, and very well urged. Thoſe which concern the machinal ſouls of beaſts, are, I think, the beſt that can be propoſed. The author ingenuouſly confeſſes, that the Peripatetics ſhewed at firſt but very little ſkill in attacking that great paradox of Des Cartes, and that the Carteſians took an advantage of it. He makes uſe with great dexterity, of the ill conſequences that may be drawn from that paradox; for he ſhews that the arguments of the Carteſians tend to make us believe, that other men are meer machines. This is perhaps the weakeſt ſide of that Carteſian opinion, and it confirms a very judicious thought that one may have about the nature of human knowledge. It ſeems that GOD, who beſtows it, acts like the common father of all ſects, that is to ſay, that he is not willing that any of them ſhould entirely triumph over the others, and ſink them without recovery. A ſect, tho' defeated, and put to the rout, will always recover, if it ceaſes to ſtand upon the defenſive, in order to act offenſively by way of diverſion and retortion. The combat of ſects is always like that of the Trojans and Greeks the night that Troy was taken (64): they overcame one another by turns, as they happened to change their way of fighting. A Carteſian has no ſooner overturned, ruined, and deſtroyed, the opinion of the ſchoolmen about the ſouls of beaſts, but he finds that he may be beaten with his own weapons, and that his adverſary may ſhew him that he proves too much, and that if he will argue conſequentially, he muſt give over ſome opinions; which he cannot do without making himſelf ridiculous, and admitting manifeſt abſurdities: for is there any man that dares affirm that he is the only perſon that thinks, and that all other men are meer machines? Would not he be looked upon as more extravagant than Bedlamites, or thoſe that are removed from all human ſociety? This conſequence of that Carteſian doctrine is a ſad mortification: it is like the peacock's feet, whoſe uglineſs gives a check to the vanity which the beauty of his feathers had inſpired him with. However, it muſt be confeſſed that the whole advantage of Father Daniel againſt

(59) Pardies, ubi ſupra, num. 52, pag. 104, 105. Note, that at pag. 113, he alledges for an inſtance a dog, who had learned to ſing his part with his maſter. He adds, Vide Horarium oratione peculiari de ratione brutor. He ſhould have ſaid, Rorarius, quod animalia bruta utantur ratione melius homine. - - - That the brute animals uſe reaſon better than man. Lib. i, pag. 2.

(60) Obſerve this queſtion which Franzius propoſed to himſelf, Hiſt. Animal. Sacra, Part i, cap. ii, pag. m. 16. Quæri autem poſſet an non ponenda ſit rationalis anima in brutis . . . cum Geneſ. ix, ver. 5. Deus ipſe vindicare velit ſanguinem hominis in brutis ſi quando effuderunt ſanguinem humanum. - - - But it might be aſked, is there not a rational ſoul in beaſts . . . Since God himſelf will revenge the blood of a man upon beaſts that ſhed the blood of man. He alſo quotes Exodus xii. 28; and Leviticus xx. 15, 16. where God orders that brutes ſhould be puniſhed.

(61) I have not now by me that book of Ochinus; I quote what I remember he ſays; and perhaps I do not exactly tranſlate his words; but I am ſure that I ſet down his meaning.

(62) Rorarius, ubi ſupra, cap. ii, pag. 109.

(63) Father Daniel, a Jeſuit, is accounted the author of that work.

(64) Nec fali pugnas dant ſingulæ Teucri: Quandam etiam victis redit in præcordia virtus, Victoreſque cadunt Danai. Virgil. Æneid. lib. ii, ver. 367.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mr Leibniz, one of the greateſt wits of Europe, being ſenſible of theſe difficulties, has given us ſome inſights, which deſerve to be improved [H]. I ſhall mention part of what againſt Des Cartes's opinion conſiſts in the objections that he raiſed, and not at all in the anſwers that he made to the objections of the Carteſians. He does not deny that their queſtions are very puzzling; but he maintains that, in their turn, they are not leſs perplexed by the queſtions that are put to them, and that good reprisals may be made upon them (65). You muſt not expect to find in his book the ſolution of the Phyſical, Moral, and Theological difficulties, that are propoſed to the Peripatetics about the ſouls of beaſts; he is contented to anſwer, that if there are ſome things in their opinion that cannot be comprehended, there are others likewiſe in Des Cartes's hypotheſis. The definition of the ſoul of a beaſt, a ſubſtance capable of ſenſation, that is, of ſeeing, hearing, &c. is as clear as the Carteſian definition of a ſpirit, a thinking and reaſoning ſubſtance (66). They are Father Daniel's words, which he proves afterwards as well as can be. A little before he had ſaid (67) that the ſoul of a beaſt is neither matter nor a ſpirit, but a middle being between both, which is not capable of reaſoning or thought, but only of perception and ſenſation. If he ſays nothing that is more ſatisfactory, it is not for want of ability, but the nature of the ſubject does not permit it.

(65) Suite du Voiage du Monde de Des Cartes, pag. 75.

(66) Ib. p. 84.

(67) Ibid. pag. 82, 83.

He muſt give me leave to ſay, that his hypotheſis cannot be maintained, and that no difficulty can be reſolved by it. Theſe two words, matter, ſpirit, ſeem at firſt ſight to admit of a medium; but if the thing be narrowly looked into, it appears that they may be reduced to a contradictory oppoſition. It is but aſking whether a ſubſtance, that is neither a body nor a ſpirit, is extended or not. If it be extended, it will be difficult to diſtinguiſh it from matter; and if it be not extended, I deſire to know why it ſhould be diſtinguiſhed from a ſpirit: for the notion of a ſubſtance, that has no extenſion, ſuits with the notion of a ſpirit, and we cannot apprehend that this notion can be divided into two different kinds, ſince the ſpecific attribute aſſigned to the one, will never appear inconſiſtent with the other. If God can add thought (68) to one unextended Being, he may likewiſe add it to another Being that is unextended, there being nothing but extenſion that ſeems to us to make matter uncapable of thinking; at leaſt we clearly conceive, that an unextended ſubſtance which hath ſenſation, is alſo capable of reaſoning; and conſequently, if the ſoul of a beaſt is an unextended ſubſtance capable of ſenſation, it is alſo capable of reaſoning; it is therefore of the ſame ſpecies with the ſoul of man, and conſequently is not a middle ſubſtance between matter and ſpirit. Here is a queſtion put by Father Daniel. Will the Carteſians deny the poſſibility of this ſort of Beings, capable only of ſenſation? What is become of the reſpect which their maſter endeavoured to inſpire into them for the almighty power of GOD, who, he ſays, can order it ſo, that a triangle ſhall not have three angles, and that two and two ſhall not make four; and yet cannot produce a Being, that has only ſenſations (69)? This queſtion might puzzle a man, who ſhould have made a vow never to depart from any of Des Cartes's opinions; but it does not appear that any Carteſian will be ſuch a ſlave to him, and it is certain that Des Cartes would never have ſeriouſly affirmed, that God can make two feet of wax ſuſceptible of three or four figures, and uncapable of all others. Whatever opinion Des Cartes may have had about this, his followers will never think they are wanting in the reſpect they owe to God, if they ſay, that a Being only capable of ſenſation, is not more poſſible than a piece (70) of wax only ſuſceptible of a ſquare figure. As for what concerns a being, that ſhould have only ſenſation, they will think it very poſſible; as it is poſſible that a certain piece of matter ſhould be always round, if God would for ever hinder the tranſpoſition of its particles. Father Daniel will give me leave to obſerve, that he did not perceive that it is not the ſame thing to ſay, firſt, a Being only capable of ſenſation, and then, a Being that has only ſenſations. The poſſibility of the firſt is unconceivable; and the poſſibility of the ſecond is manifeſt. But as a piece of wax, in which God ſhould always hinder the tranſpoſition of the particles, would be of the ſame ſpecies with a piece of wax, the change of whoſe extremities would continually produce a new figure; it may likewiſe be ſaid that a ſubſtance, which God ſhould always confine within the bounds of ſenſations, would be of the ſame ſpecies with a ſubſtance that ſhould arrive to reaſoning.

(68) I take this word in the ſenſe of the Carteſians, that is, for a generic modification, which includes ſenſations, reflexions, reaſonings, &c. as ſo many different ſpecies.

(69) Suite du Voiage du Monde, pag. 84.

(70) By a piece here, is meant a collection of different particles. This I obſerve to prevent the difficulty of an Atomiſt, who believes, that the figure of an atome is eſſentially immutable.

It remains for me to ſhew the inſufficiency of Father Daniel's hypotheſis. I. We want a ſyſtem, which maintains that the ſouls of beaſts are mortal: but this cannot be proved by ſuppoſing a middle being between a body and a ſpirit: for ſuch a being is not extended: it is therefore indiviſible; nothing but annihilation can deſtroy it: diſeaſes, fire, and ſword, cannot hurt it; and therefore it is in that reſpect of the ſame nature and condition with ſpirits, and human ſouls. II. We want a ſyſtem whereby it may appear that there is a ſpecific difference between the ſouls of men and thoſe of beaſts: but this middle Being does not afford it; for if the ſoul of a beaſt, being neither a body nor a ſpirit, has nevertheleſs ſenſations, the ſoul of man will be able to reaſon, tho' it be neither body nor ſpirit, but a middle being between both. It is a more difficult thing for a being deſtitute of ſenſe to arrive to the perception of a tree, than for a ſenſitive being to acquire the faculty of reaſoning. III. We want a ſyſtem, that gives an account of the ſurpriſing ſkill of bees, dogs, apes, elephants; and you talk of ſuch ſouls in beaſts, as have only ſenſations, without thinking (71) and reaſoning. If you conſider it well, you will be ſenſible that ſuch a ſoul is not ſufficient to explain the phænomena. Father Daniel confeſſes it in another place of his book, where he ſeems to allow the Peripatetics no other advantage but that of poſſeſſion: for having mentioned the difficulties that are to be found in the opinion of the Carteſians concerning the beaſts, he adds (72): It cannot be denied that the Peripatetics have alſo ſeveral difficulties to reſolve; but tho' they were much more conſiderable than they really are, as long as the Carteſians have nothing to ſay that is more ſatisfactory, or more intelligible, we ought to keep to this, and argue upon this head, as a great miniſter of ſtate did twenty-five years ago, upon the whole body of Philoſophy. He was adviſed not to let his ſon learn the antient Philoſophy, becauſe, they told him, there was nothing in it but trifling and fooleries. I have been told alſo ſaid he, that there are many fooliſh and chimerical things in the new, and therefore, continued he, ſince I am to chuſe the antient or the new fooleries, I think the antient ought to be preferred before the new. Perhaps Nihuſius argued in the ſame manner (73).

(71) I uſe here the word thinking for a kind of perception, and not in the general notion of Des Cartes.

(72) Suite du Voiage du Monde de Des Cartes, pag. 105, 106.

(73) See the remark [H], of his article.

[H] Mr Leibniz - - - has given us ſome inſights which deſerve to be improved.] He approves (74) the opinion of ſome Moderns, who think that animals are organized in the ſeed; and beſides he believes (75) that matter alone cannot conſtitute a true unity, and that therefore every animal is united to a form, which is a ſimple, indiviſible, and only one being. Moreover he ſuppoſes (76) that this form never leaves it's ſubject; from whence it reſults, that, properly ſpeaking, there is neither death nor generation in nature. He excepts (77) the ſoul of man from all this; he lays it aſide, &c. This hypotheſis (78) frees us from part of the difficulties. There is no longer any need to anſwer the perplexing objections raiſed againſt the ſchoolmen. The ſoul of beaſts, ſay their adverſaries, is a ſubſtance diſtinct from the body; it muſt therefore be produced by creation, and deſtroyed by annihilation: heat muſt therefore have the power to create ſouls (79), and to annihilate them (80), than which nothing can be more abſurd. The anſwers of the Ariſtotelians to this objection do not deſerve to be mentioned, or to be brought out from the obſcurity of the ſchools where they are taught to young ſcholars: and are proper only to ſhew us, that the objection is by them unanſwerable. They do not come off better, when they are urged to ſhew the reaſonableneſs of a continual production of almoſt an infinite number of ſubſtances, which are totally deſtroyed a few days after, tho' they are far more noble, and more excellent than matter, which never loſes it's exiſtence. Mr Leibniz's hypotheſis removes all thoſe difficulties, for it induces us to belive, 1. That God in the beginning of the world created the forms of all bodies, and

(74) See Mr Leibniz's Memoir, inſerted in the Journal des Sçavans, of the 27th of June 1695, pag. 449, Dutch Edit.

(75) Journal des Sçavans, June 27, 1695, pag. 446.

(76) Ibid. pag. 447.

(77) Ibid. pag. 448, 450.

(78) Bernier, in his relation of the Pagans of Indoſtan, pag. m. 200, ſpeaks of an opinion of the Philoſophers of that country much like this.

(79) They hatch chickens by putting the eggs in an oven heated by degrees. Such a thing is practiſed in Egypt.

(80) Many ſorts of animals may be deſtroyed; if they are put in an oven a little too hot.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

what he says upon this subject, were it only to propose my doubts. But to return to Rorarius, and consequently all the souls of beasts. 2. That those souls have subsisted ever since, being inseparably united to the first organized bodies in which God placed them. This exempts us from the necessity of recurring to the metempsychosis or transmigration of souls, which otherwise we must have done. I shall down part of Mr Leibniz's discourse, that my readers may see whether I have taken his sense right. '(81) 'Here the transformations of Swammardam, Malpighius, and Leeuwenhoeck, some of the most excellent observators of our time, came to my assistance, 'and made me more easily believe, that animals, or 'any other organized beings, do not begin to exist 'when we think they do, and that their seeming generation is only an unfolding, and a kind of augmentation. I have also observed that the author of 'the Recherche de la verité, --- Search after truth, 'Mr Regis, Mr Hartsoeker, and some other able 'men have not been far from this opinion. But the 'greatest question remains still, viz. what becomes of 'those souls, or forms, after the death of the animal, 'or the destruction of the organized substance. This 'is the most perplexing thing; because it does not 'seem reasonable that souls should remain useless in a 'chaos of confused matter. This made me think at 'last that the only reasonable opinion I could embrace, was that of the preservation not only of the 'soul, but also the animal itself, and it's organized 'machine, tho' the destruction of the gross particles 'had reduced it to a smallness, which is no less imperceptible to our senses than it had before it was 'born. And indeed no body can exactly fix the 'true time of death, which may pass a long time for 'a meer suspension of visible actions, and at the bottom is never any thing else in meer animals: as it 'appears from the resuscitations of flies drowned, and 'then buried under pulverized chalk, and several such 'like instances, which shew that there would be 'many other resuscitations, and traced up higher, if 'men were able to put the machine again in order. '..... It is therefore natural that the animal having 'been always alive, and organized, (as some persons of 'great penetration begin to acknowledge) should always continue so. And since there is no first birth, 'nor generation of the animal altogether new, it 'follows that there will be no final extinction, nor 'total death taken in a strict metaphysical sense; 'and that consequently instead of the transmigration 'of souls, there is only a transformation of the same 'animal, according as it's organs are differently folded, 'and more or less displayed.'

(81) Journal des Sçavans, June 27, pag. 449.

I shall observe occasionally that some are of opinion that the primitive subject, to which our soul is united, goes out of our body together with it, when we come to die. Mr Poiret is not far from that opinion, and believes that Moses, upon the day of transfiguration, appeared with the true body that attended his soul at his departure from this life; that is, as he explains it, when that blessed soul left the case or cover, which wrapped up the subtile body to which it was united. He gives the carcase the appellation of case or rust, with respect to the true subject, that is united to the soul. These are his words: 'Cùm Deus fit constans 'in suis operibus, maxime in præcipuis, & quoad 'fundamentaliora, condideritque mentes quasdam, humanas nempe, corporibus annexas; probabile non 'est, id opus vel per aliquod tempus ex toto interrumpi atque destrui: & ex historiis sacris habemus, 'Mosen, cujus cadaver omnino cecidit, cum Elia apparuisse Apostolis Christum in transfiguratione radiantem spectantibus: id quod sine corpore, cui mens 'fuerit juncta, fieri non poterat. Nonnulli ad corpus 'ex aëre assumptum recurrunt: at quidni id ex ipso 'Mosis corpore (& sic de cæteris) esset, portio nempe 'materiæ illius internæ spiritualioris, subtilioris & 'purioris, quæ deposito cadavere, seu tegmine vel 'cortice aut scabie vel rubigine quadam, exhalaret, & 'menti adhuc unita, ejus regimine, secundum Dei 'placitum, dirigeretur (82) ---- Seeing God is constant in all his works, especially the principal, and 'hath created certain minds, namely that of men, joined 'to bodies; it is not probable that work is altogether 'interrupted or destroyed, tho' but for a time: and we 'learn from sacred writ, that Moses, whose body died, 'with Elias, appeared unto the Apostles, beholding the 'glorious transfiguration of Christ: which could not have 'been without a body to which the mind was joined. 'Some have recourse to an assumed aërial vehicle: but 'why might it not be from the body of Moses itself, (and 'so of others) namely, a portion of that internal, more 'spiritual, subtile, and purer matter, which, the gross 'carcase being put off as a cover, bark, crust, or certain 'rust, exhaled, and being yet united to the mind, was 'thereby directed according to the divine pleasure.' He has published some objections, that were sent him from Sedan. It was objected to him, among other things (83), that the example of Moses proves nothing; because that great Prophet could not have been seen by the Apostles, unless a great deal of matter had been added to that, which went out of his dead body with his soul. Now if it had been necessary to give him above one half of a new body, one may very well say that the matter, with which he appeared on that day, was all new. Mr Poiret answered (84) that the subtile matter, which goes out of the body with the soul, is indeed too fine to strike upon our grosser senses; but that we may see it, when God assists us in an extraordinary manner. He was told that some schoolmen admit of a quintessence, which ties a human soul to the organs formed out of the four elements, and serves it as a vehicle, when it leaves the body. They say also that this vehicle is the subject of the torments, which the reprobate endure after the resurrection. 'Observo opinionem viri docti non multum discrepare 'à quorundam Scholasticorum placitis, qui præter 'quatuor elementa nescio quam quintam essentiam venire in compositionem humani corporis opinantur, 'quæ sit veluti medium quoddam vinculum, quo incorporeus & immortalis animus cum terreno ac 'mortali corpore copuletur: aliter enim si res esset, 'nulla videretur esse proportio & convenientia inter 'corpus & animam rationalem: & illam quidem quintam essentiam naturæ cœlestis esse volunt, eamque 'ferre animum quando per mortem è corpore migrare 'cogitur, & in ea pœnas apud inferos luere sceleribus 'suis promeritas (85). --- I observe that the opinion of 'the learned man does not much differ from the principles of some schoolmen, who think that besides the 'four elements, there is a fifth substance (quintessence) in 'the composition of the human body, which is a sort of 'medium whereby the incorporeal and immortal mind is 'united to the earthly and mortal body: for were it 'otherwise, there would appear to be no proportion 'and agreement betwixt the body and rational soul: 'and they will have that fifth substance to be of a celestial nature, and that it accompanies the mind when it 'is obliged to part from the body, and therein suffers the 'punishment deserved for it's crimes.' Mr Poiret answered (86), that he had nothing to do with the schoolmens notions. See the margin (87).

(83) Idem, Responf. ad primas Object. p. 696.

(84) Ibid. pag. 697.

(85) Ibid. pag. 696.

(86) Ibid. pag. 697.

(87) The enemies Plato &, who wrote De Sophia vulgò refutata, printed in 1600, &c. that Ockam, Maironi, Antonius Miranculanus, Garbius, and Lucas, would have the soul of man to be made up of two substances, alia immaterial: quæ à Deo creatur, alia material: quæ ex traduce propagatur, &c. --- One immaterial, which is created by God. another material, which is propagated by generation, &c.

There are some things in Mr Leibniz's hypothesis, that are liable to some difficulties tho' they shew the great extent of his genius. He will have it, for instance, that the soul of a dog acts independently upon outward bodies; that it stands upon it's own bottom, by a perfect spontaneity with respect to itself, and yet with a perfect conformity to outward things. ..... That it's internal perceptions arise from it's original constitution, that is to say, representative (capable of expressing beings out of itself, with respect to it's organs) which was bestowed upon it from the time of it's creation, and makes it's individual character (88). From whence it results, that it would feel hunger and thirst, at such and such an hour, tho' there were not any one body in the universe, and tho' nothing should exist but God and that soul. He has explained (89) his thought by the example of two pendulums that should perfectly agree: that is, he supposes, that according to the particular laws, which put the soul upon action, it must feel hunger at such an hour; and that according to the particular laws, which direct the motion of matter, the body which is united to that soul must be modified at that same hour, as it is modified when the soul is hungry. I will forbear preferring this system to that of occasional causes, till the learned author has perfected it. I cannot apprehend the connexion of internal and sponta-

(88) Journal des Sçavans, Jan. 31, 1695. pag. 457.

(89) Le tout Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, February 1695. pag. 274, &c.

neous

Rorarius, I do not believe I am miſtaken when I think he was born at Pordenone in Italy [I]. I wiſh I had read the plea, which he compoſed for Rats (b). It was printed in the country of the Griſons in the year 1548. There is ſomething like it in the works of Preſident Chaſſaneus (c). I ſhall here give the remainder (d) of the collection, whereof you have ſeen the principal part in the article of Pereira.

(b) Oratio pro Muribus adverſus Nicolai Boſtii edictum, Auguſtæ Rheticæ, apud Phil. Ulhard. Draudius, Biblioth. pag. 1093.

(c) See Thuanus, lib. xvi, pag. 126.

(d) See the remark [D].

I am informed from ſeveral hands that many perſons, who love an hiſtorical account of opinions, have approved the collections, which I publiſhed in the remarks of this article. And I have alſo heard that it would be acceptable if I publiſhed ſome others, if any new ones ſhould come into my hands. This makes me take the liberty to add here ſome ſupplements [K], though I am not ignorant that many readers will not much care neous actions, which would have this effect, that the ſoul of a dog would feel pain immediately after having felt joy, tho' it were alone in the univerſe. I underſtand why a dog paſſes immediately from pleaſure to pain, when being very hungry, and eating a piece of bread, he is ſuddenly ſtruck with a cudgel; but I cannot apprehend that his ſoul ſhould be ſo framed, that at the very moment he is beaten, he ſhould feel pain, tho' he were not beaten, and tho' he ſhould continue to eat bread without any trouble or hindrance. Nor do I ſee how the ſpontaneity of that ſoul ſhould be conſiſtent with the ſenſe of pain, and in general with all unpleaſing perceptions. Beſides, the reaſon why this learned man does not like the Cartefian ſyſtem, ſeems to me to be a falſe ſuppoſition; for it cannot be ſaid that the ſyſtem of occaſional cauſes brings in God acting by a miracle (90), Deum ex machina, in the mutual dependency of the body and ſoul: for ſince God does only intervene according to general laws, he cannot be ſaid to act in an extraordinary manner. Does the internal and active virtue communicated to the forms of bodies, according to Mr Leibniz, know the train of actions which it is to produce? By no means; for we know by experience that we are ignorant whether we ſhall have ſuch and ſuch perceptions in an hour's time. It were therefore neceſſary that the forms ſhould be directed by ſome external principle in the production of their acts. But this would be Deus ex machina, as well as in the ſyſtem of occaſional cauſes (91). In fine, as he ſuppoſes with great reaſon, that all ſouls are ſimple and indiviſible, it cannot be apprehended how they can be compared with a pendulum, that is, how by their original conſtitution they can diverſify their operations, by uſing the ſpontaneous activity, beſtowed upon them by their Creator. It may clearly be conceived that a ſimple being will always act in an uniform manner, if no external cauſe hinders it. If it was compoſed of ſeveral pieces as a machine, it would act different ways, becauſe the peculiar activity of each piece might change every moment the progreſs of others: but how will you find in a ſimple ſubſtance the cauſe of a change of operation?

(90) Ibid.

(91) See the objections made againſt Mr Leibniz, by Mr S. F. (it is Mr Foucher) in the Journal des Sçavans, of the 12th of September 1695. pag. 639. & ſeq.

[I] I think he was born at Pordenone in Italy.] Here is the reaſon I have for it. He ſays that Sacillum is near the place of his birth. 'Proximum eſt patriæ 'meæ Sacillum oppidum (in quo doctiſſimus Franciſcus 'Amaltheus publico ſtipendio humaniores litteras pro'fitetur, cujus ſub ductu pueritiæ meæ rudimentum de'poſui) amœnum flumine. - - - - Near unto my country 'is the town of Sacillum, (in which the moſt learned 'Francis Amaltheus was public profeſſor of the Belles 'Lettres, under whom I firſt ſtudied) beautified by an 'adjoining river.' This parentheſis is not needleſs here; for we learn from it where our Rorarius began his ſtudies, and that the three brothers, who made the name of Amaltheus ſo famous (92), were not the only perſons of that name, that were learned. It is certain that Sacillum is not far (93) from Portus Naonis, or Pordenone, as the Italians call it, or Portenau, as the Germans name it (94). The Epiſtle Dedicatory of Rorarius's book to the biſhop of Arras, is dated from Portus Naonis; and there was a Phyſician of the ſame town, whoſe name was NICOLAS RORARIUS. He is the author of a book printed at Venice, in 1566, and 1572, intituled, Contradictiones, dubia & paradoxa in libros Hippocratis, Celſi, Galeni, Aëtii, Æginetæ, Avicennæ cum eorundem conciliationibus. We find the following words concerning this writer in Lindenius Renovatus. Nicolaus Rorarius Utinenſis Medicus, vixit circa A. C. 1563. Renatus Moreau de V. S. in Pleurit. The meaning of which is not that he was a native of Udine, but only that he practiſed Phyſic there. And therefore Konig has committed a fault, when he ſays, Rorarius (Nicol.) de Portunnone, Utinenſis, collegit conciliationes contradictionum in ſcriptis Medicorum anno 1566. The omiſſion of the word Medicus after Utinenſis deceives us, for it makes us believe that this Phyſician was born at Udine, and that de Portunnone was the firname of his family. Doni dedicated one of the chapters of his Ramo della Zucca (95) al S. Gregorio Rorario de Pordonone.

(92) Hieronymus, Joannes Baptiſta, & Cornelius Amalthei. Their Latin poems have been printed at Amſterdam in 1689, with a preface of Mr Grævius.

(93) See Leander Albertus, in Deſcriptione Italiæ, pag. m. 750.

(94) See Baudrand, at the word Portus Naonis.

(95) It is the Chiachiera ultima, fol. m. 64, verſo.

[K] Makes me take the liberty to add here ſome ſupplements.] I ſhall begin with naming the authors, who believe that beaſts have rational ſouls. I do not think that any body has carried this thing farther than the Philoſopher Celſus for deſigning to confute the Chriſtians, who ſay that all things were made for the uſe of man, he endeavours to ſhew that beaſts are not leſs excellent than man, and that they even ſurpaſs them. He aſcribes (96) to them a form of government, the obſervation of juſtice, and alſo of charity (97). He pretends that ants converſe one with another. When they meet one another, ſays he, they converſe together; hence it is that they never loſe their way. They are therefore endowed with reaſon in all its degrees; they have naturally the notions of ſome univerſal truths; they have the uſe of ſpeech; they have the knowledge of accidental things, and know how to expreſs them (98). He affirms that there are ſome beaſts '(99) which 'know the ſecrets of Magic (100); ſo that men can'not boaſt of it as of a privilege peculiar to them. 'He ſpeaks of it in this manner. If a man is proud 'of his knowledge of the ſecrets of Magic, ſerpents and 'eagles know more of it than he. For they have ſeveral 'antidotes againſt poiſons and diſeaſes, and they know the 'virtue of certain ſtones, for the cure of their young ones; 'which men value ſo much, that when they find any of 'them, they think they have found a treaſure. . . . . . '(101) Afterwards deſigning to ſhew at large, that 'men, under pretence of knowing the Deity, ought 'not to pretend upon that account that they are above 'all mortal beings, ſince there are ſome irrational 'animals, that have a clear and diſtinct idea of 'it; whilſt the moſt ſubtile men, whether they be 'Grecians or Barbarians, have every where ſo many 'diſputes about it; he adds: if any one pretends to 'raiſe man above other animals, becauſe he is capable 'of knowing the Deity, and receiving the idea and 'impreſſion of it; let him know, that there are ſeveral 'among them, that may boaſt of the ſame advantage: 'and not without good grounds. For can any thing be 'more divine than to foreſee and to foretel things to come? 'Now other animals, eſpecially birds, are in that re'ſpect the teachers of men; and the art of our diviners 'conſiſts only in underſtanding what thoſe animals teach 'them. Birds therefore, and other animals qualified 'for divination, to whom GOD diſcovers things to 'come, give us the knowledge of them by ſigns and 'ſymbols: which ſhews that they have naturally a 'greater and more intimate intercourſe with the Deity 'than we have; that they exceed us in knowledge, 'and that they are dearer to GOD than we. The 'moſt knowing men ſay alſo, that thoſe animals converſe 'together in a more holy and noble manner than we do, 'and that as for themſelves, they underſtand their 'language; which they make to appear from this, that 'after they have told us that the birds ſay they will go 'to ſuch a place, and do there ſuch a thing; they ſhew 'us thoſe birds going thither, and actually doing what 'they ſaid they would do. As for the elephants, there is 'no creature that ſhews a more religious reſpect for '(102) oaths, or a more inviolable fidelity to GOD: 'which doubtleſs proceeds from no other cauſe than their 'knowledge of him.' I do not here recite what Origen anſwers to all theſe things: it is ſufficient if I give notice that he refutes them in the work he compoſed againſt Celſus.

AUTHORS who believed that the ſoul of beaſts is endowed with reaſon.

(96) To bees and ants.

(97) See Origen againſt Celſus, lib. iv, pag. m. 180.

(98) Ibid. pag. 181, 182.

(99) Ibid. pag. 182.

(100) He means natural Magic.

(101) Ibid. pag. 183, 184.

(102) See, above, citation (35).

Salmaſius

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google care for them, and will look upon them as meer excreſcencies. They ſhall not have any occaſion

Salmaſius muſt be reckoned among the Moderns, who believed that brutes are endowed with reaſon. He ſays that the examples, which may be alledged for it, are ſo many that one might fill up a book with them (103). Oſiander diſapproves this opinion. See his notes upon Grotius's book de Jure Belli & Pacis, in the chapter wherein he rejects the definition of the law of nature, adopted by Juſtinian in the firſt book of the Inſtitute (104). This definition lays down that men and beaſts have the knowledge of the law of nature. Moſt of thoſe, who approve it, go upon this hypotheſis, that beaſts are not deprived of the uſe of reaſon; but moſt of thoſe, who reject that notion of the law of nature, go upon the contrary hypotheſis. Oſiander is one of them (105), and he commends Grotius for not approving Juſtinian's definition, wherein, ſays he, he was guided by Laurentius Valla, Franciſcus Conanus, Dominicus Sotus, and many others. We ſhall ſee below (106) an opinion of Grotius, which Oſiander has condemned, concerning the principle of certain actions of beaſts, that ſeem to proceed from reaſon. John Antony Cappella, a Neapolitan Phyſician, publiſhed in 1641 Opuſculum paradoxicum quod ratio participetur à brutis (107), I have not read the book; and therefore I cannot ſay which way the author goes about to prove it. I am better acquainted with Dr Willis's opinion. He pretends that the ſoul of brutes is compoſed of organs, and that it has the ſame figure and extent with the body it informs; only it is not ſo thick, and its parts are ſo fine that they cannot be ſeen, and would eaſily be diſſipated, if the body of the animal did not keep them together. 'Iſta particularum ſubtilium congeries, ſive anima, quæ ſeſe latiùs explicans, & particulas ſuas aliis craſſioribus inſinuans, & intertexens corpus fabricat, juxta figuram & dimenſionem iſtius corporis exactè conformatur, ipſi coextenditur, & tanquam capſulæ, aut vaginæ ad amuſſim adaptatur, totum ac ſingulas partes ejus actuat, vivificat, ac inſpirat; porro invicem, ipſamet anima, ex ſe ſtatim diſſolvi, tenueſque in auras evaneſcere apta, à corpore continenti, in ſubſiſtentia ſua & actu conſervatur. Ità quidem Anima, tenuiſſima licet, corporea, corporis quaſi ſpectrum, ſive larva umbratilis videtur: Porrò hæc ſimul cum corpore ex materia ritè diſpoſita emergens, hypoſtaſin, ſive ſubſiſtentiam ſuam, non minùs quàm corpus, juxta Ideam, ſive Typum ipſimet ex naturæ lege præſtitutum accipit; quamvis autem corpori intimè uniatur, ejuſque velut ſubtegmen exiſtat, attamen texturâ ſubtiliſſimâ, & quaſi filo admodum prætenui conſtans, ſenſibus noſtris percipi nequit, at ſolummodo ab effectis & operationibus ſuis dignoſcitur (108). - - - - - That collection of ſubtile particles, or the ſoul, which, expanding itſelf, and inſinuating and intermixing its particles with others more groſs, frames the body, is exactly conformed to the figure and dimenſions of that body, is co-extended with it, and exactly fitted to it as a caſe or ſheath, giving activity, life, and ſpirit, to the whole and every part of it; moreover the ſoul it ſelf, being apt in a little time to be diſſolved and to vaniſh into the air, is by the body containing it, kept in its ſubſiſtence and office. And ſo indeed the ſoul, tho' moſt ſubtile, yet ſeems to be corporeal, and, as it were, the apparition of the body, or a ſhadowy ghoſt: moreover the ſoul ariſing from matter duly diſpoſed receives its hypoſtaſis, or ſubſiſtence, no leſs that the body according to the idea or type allotted it by nature; but though it be intimately united to the body, being thereto as it were what the woof is to cloth, yet being of a texture ſo ſubtile, and of a moſt fine thread, it cannot be preceived by our ſenſes, but is only known by its effects and operations.' He aſcribes to this ſoul a kind of reaſon which he does even give an analyſis of (109). He ſays that there is ſuch a ſoul in man, and alſo a ſpiritual one, and pretends to explain by thoſe two ſouls the conflict which we are conſcious of within our ſelves, and which other Philoſophers explain by the ſuperior and inferior faculties of one ſimple and ſingle ſpiritual ſubſtance, which they call the rational ſoul (110). But, by his leave, this way of explaining the conflict between reaſon and the ſenſitive ſoul is not ſatisfactory; for every body is conſcious to himſelf, that the principle which deſires ſenſual pleaſures, is numerically the ſame with the principle that oppoſes ſuch deſires, and which overcomes it ſometimes, but is moſt times overcome by it. If we had two kinds of ſouls really diſtinct one from another, we ſhould not obſerve this unity of principle. If he ſhould anſwer that one of them produces its ſentiments and paſſions in the other; I then would reply, that it follows from thence, that there are two ſubſtances in each man, which have the ſame deſires. But no man did ever perceive two ſuch diſtinct principles. Beſides, if a material ſoul could communicate a ſenſual deſire to the ſpiritual ſoul of man, the body would do it likewiſe; and conſequently beings are multiplied without neceſſity, by aſcribing to each man a body, and two ſouls, one of which is ſenſitive, and the other rational. But to proceed, Dr Willis obſerves that Sir Kenelme Digby was of the opinion of Pereira and Des Cartes, concerning the ſouls of brutes 'Pereira . . . . . beſtias omni cognitione, ſeu 'perceptione carere affirmavit; quem in nupero hoc 'ſeculo κατ' ἀνδρα ſequuti ſunt Viri Clariſſimi, 'Carteſius, Digbeius, cum aliis, qui brutorum animas, 'quantum fieri poſſit, ab humana diſcriminare præ 'ſe ferentes, eas non modò corporeas, & diviſibiles, 'ſed etiam mere paſſivas aſſeruerunt (111). - - - - - Pereira . . . . . affirmed that beaſts, were without, any ſenſe or perception; who in this latter age hath been followed by the moſt famous men Des Cartes, Digby, and others, that endeavouring as much as poſſible to diſtinguiſh the ſouls of beaſts from that of man, have aſſerted that they are not only corporeal, and diviſible, but alſo merely paſſive.' Afterwards he ſhews what difference there is between Des Cartes's opinion, and that of Sir Kenelme Digby, and he ſays that the latter does not deprive beaſts of either ſenſe or memory. It is not true therefore that his opinion was the ſame with that of Pereira, and Des Cartes: why then did the doctor ſay it was? 'Digbeius . . . . . 'inſuper adjecit, effluvia quædam tenuiſſima è corpore 'ſenſibili delibata, non modò ſenſoria exteriora 'afficere, verùm & interiores receſſus ſubingredientia, 'ſeſe ſpiritibus immiſcere, eoſque in varias fluctuationes agendo, & ſenſus & motus locales diverſimodos producere; porrò ex his atomis extrinſecis ita partes 'nervoſas, ac cerebrum ipſum ſubeuntibus, haud 'tantùm actiones extemporaneas procedere; verùm ex 'iiſdem in corpore ſentiente relictis, ac intra cerebri lo-'culos reconditis, prioreſque configurationes retinenti-'bus, rerum anteactarum ideas in memoriâ reſiduas 'conſtitui (112) - - - - Digby . . . . added, that certain moſt ſubtile effluvia from the bodies perceived by ſenſe, did not only affect the outward organs, but entring more inwardly, mixing with the animal ſpirits, and exciting various motions in them, produce both ſenſation, and local motion; moreover from theſe outward atoms ſo entring into the nervous parts, and into the brain it ſelf, not only proceed the ſudden actions; but from the ſame remaining in the receſſes of the brain, and retaining their former figures, the ideas of things paſt reſiding in the memory, are framed.' Let us conclude, that Sir Kenelme Digby is none of thoſe who maintain that beaſts are meer machines. Mr Locke has declared himſelf to be againſt thoſe who will not allow reaſon to brutes. The following words will ſhew you wherein he places the difference between men and beaſts. 'This I think I may be poſitive in, 'that the power of abſtracting is not at all in them, 'and that the having of general ideas is that which puts 'a perfect diſtinction betwixt man and brutes; and is 'an excellency, which the faculties of brutes do by 'no means attain to. For it is evident, we obſerve 'no footſteps in them of making uſe of general ſigns, 'for univerſal ideas: from which we have reaſon to 'imagine, that they have not the faculty of abſtracting, 'or making general ideas, ſince they have no uſe of 'words or any other general ſigns (113). And there-'fore I think we may ſuppoſe, that it is in this that 'the ſpecies of brutes are diſcriminated from men: 'and it is that proper difference wherein they are 'wholly ſeparated, and which at laſt widens to ſo vaſt 'a diſtance. For if they have any ideas at all, and 'are not bare machines, (as ſome would have them) 'we cannot deny them to have ſome reaſon. It 'ſeems as evident to me that they do, ſome of them, 'in certain inſtances, reaſon, as that they have ſenſe; 'but

(103) See Oſiander, Annot. in Libr. Grotii de Jure Belli & Pacis, pag. 213.

(104) Jus naturale eſt quod natura omnia animalia docuit. Nam jus iſtud non humani generis proprium eſt, ſed omnium animalium, quæ in cœlo, quæ in terra, quæ, in mari naſcuntur . . . Videmus enim cætera quoque animalia illius juris peritia cenſeri. Inſtitut. lib. i, tit. II.

(105) Oſiander, ubi ſupra, pag. 206, & ſeq.

(106) Citation (119).

(107) Nicolo Toppi, Biblioth. Napolet. p. 124.

(108) Thomas Willis, de Anima Brutorum, Part i, cap. ii, pag. m. 14, 15.

(109) Ibid. cap. vii, pag. 91, 92.

(110) Ibid. cap. viii,

(111) Ibid. cap. i, pag. 5, 6.

(112) Ib. p. 7.

(113) Locke, An Eſſay concerning Human Underſtanding, book ii, chap. xi, §. v, xi. It is an excellent work, which deſerved to be tranſlated into French, as well as it has been done by Mr Coſte.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

occaſion to ſay ſo of the obſervations I deſign to make upon Mr Leibniz's reflexions

' but it is only on particular ideas, juſt as they re' ceive them from their ſenſes, they are the beſt of ' them tied up within thoſe narrow bounds, and have ' not, as I think, the faculty to enlarge them by any ' kind of abſtraction (114).'

(114) Ibid. pag. 371.

AUTHORS who have aſcribed the actions of brutes to an external principle.

There is in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (115), an abſtract of a book intituled, Eſſais nouveaux de Morale, which was printed at Paris in 1686. The author, who denies, on the one ſide, that beaſts are endowed with the faculty of reaſoning, confeſſes, on the other ſide, that their actions are directed by an external reaſon, and that the reaſon and wiſdom, which governs them, is a reaſon and wiſdom more excellent and ſure than that of men (116) . . . . The reaſon, ſays he (117), which operates in beaſts, is not in them . . . . . it is, as St Thomas ſays after all the antient Fathers, the ſovereign and eternal reaſon of the ſupreme architect, who preſerves his works, and directs them to the ends for which he created them, with the ſecret ſprings he has put in them, which are variouſly determined according to occurrences, to produce a thouſand ſorts of different motions, according to their ſeveral wants. Add to this the following words of Mr Bernard: ' The Philo-
' ſophers, who are moſt inclined to believe that beaſts
' are meer machines, muſt ingenuouſly confeſs that
' they perform ſeveral actions, the mechaniſm of ' which it is impoſſible to explain. It would be much ' better to ſay in general, that GOD, who was wil' ling that their machines ſhould ſubſiſt for ſome time,
' has, through his infinite wiſdom, diſpoſed their parts
' agreeably to ſuch an intention. I think I have ' read ſomewhere this poſition, Deus eſt anima bru-
' torum: this expreſſion is ſomewhat harſh; but it
' is ſuſceptible of a reaſonable ſenſe (118).' Grotius ſays that ſome actions of beaſts, wherein they give over their private intereſt in favour of others, proceed from an external intelligence. ' Cæterarum ani-
' mantium quædam utilitatum ſuarum ſtudium, partim
' fœtuum ſuorum partim aliorum ſibi congenerum
' reſpectu, aliquatenus temperant: quod in illis qui-
' dem procedere credimus ex principio aliquo intelli-
' gente extrinſeco, quia circa actus alios, iſtis neuti-
' quam difficiliores, par intelligentia in illis non
' apparet (119) - - - - - Some of the other animals,
' do in ſome meaſure abſtain from what is profitable to
' themſelves, in regard partly of their own young, and
' partly of thoſe of others of the ſame ſpecies: which we ' believe to proceed from ſome outward intelligent principle,
' becauſe about other actions not more difficult, the like
' underſtanding does not appear.' Gaſpar Zieglerus, in his note upon this paſſage, complains of Grotius for not explaining more clearly his thoughts about the nature of that external principle: if it be the divine providence, ſays he, Grotius lies open to the ſevere ſtrokes of Dr Juan Huarte (120), who ſhews that a Philoſopher ought not to explain phænomena by the immediate operation of GOD. He quotes two writers, who have aſcribed all the ſkill of brutes to a natural inſtinct, and he approves their opinion (121). Oſiander did very much enlarge in confuting Grotius, and he ſays among other things, that this external principle muſt be either GOD himſelf, or an angel, or the univerſal form of Averroës, and that none of thoſe three ſuppoſitions can be admitted (122). My mentioning Averroës, puts me in mind that he admitted an external principle of human knowledge common to all particular underſtandings, and which influences alſo beaſts and ſtones; but ſince he acknowledged that this influence is fruitleſs with reſpect to beaſts and inſenſible creatures; becauſe it falls upon a matter ill diſpoſed, it cannot be inferred that he aſcribed more perfection to beaſts than the ſchoolmen do. ' Averroës lib. 3. de anima cap. 5. unum
' facit omnium hominum intellectum, re ab animæ
' ſubſtantia ſeparatum, ſed ſingulis conjunctum per
' inſidentes phantaſiæ imagines; etiam equo, & aſino,
' lapidi, & metallo, aſſiſtentem, ſed citra fructum,
' quia materies ſit inepta (123) - - - - - Averroës in
' his third book concerning the ſoul, ſays, that the under-
' ſtanding of all men is the ſame, really diſtinguiſhed from
' the ſubſtance of the ſoul, but united to every particular
' man by the images reſiding in the phantaſy: it is alſo
' aſſiſtant to horſes, aſſes, ſtones, and metals, but with-
' out effect, becauſe of the incapacity of the ſubjects.'

(115) For the month of October 1686, pag. 1196, & ſeq.

(116) Nouveaux Eſſais de Morale, pag. 30.

(117) Ibid. pag. 32.

(118) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, October 1700, pag. 419, 420.

(119) Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis, Proleg. num. 7.

(120) In the 7th chapter of his Examen de Ingenios para las Sciencias [Trial of Wits].

(121) Nos omnem brutorum induſtriam ad inſtinctum referimus naturæ, cum Sperlingio noſtro, lib. i, Inſtit. Phyſ. cap. vi, qu. iii, & cum ſecuto Joh. Frid. Hornio, de ſubject. jur. nat. cap. vi. Ziegler, in Prolegomena Grotii, pag. 5.

(122) Oſiander, ubi ſupra, pag. 48, & ſeq.

(123) Voſſius, de origine & progreſſu Idol. lib. iii, cap. xlii, pag. m. 952.

Mr de Vigneul Marville tells us (124), that there was a certain Philoſopher who in order to explain in Mr Rohault's conferences, how beaſts, being meer machines, acted nevertheleſs, as if they had a ſoul, made uſe of the hypotheſis of the Comte de Gabalis, and by way of accommodation, made it ſerve his purpoſe; that is, he ſuppoſed that certain elementary ſpirits make it their buſineſs to put in motion all the machines of beaſts, according to the rules of mechanics. He gave ſo ingenious a turn to his diſcourſe, that Mr Pequet told him, that if his agreeable ſyſtem was not true, it was however bene trovato (well contrived) (125). I make no doubt that ſome people will be pleaſed with it: but if I was to diſpute about it, I could eaſily ſhew that it is inſufficient to explain the phænomena, and that in ſome reſpects it is more intricate than that of Des Cartes. The difficulty, which makes the Carteſians moſt uneaſy, does not conſiſt in ſaying that beaſts do readily move a thouſand different ways, but in ſaying that they expreſs love, hatred, joy, jealouſy, fear, grief, &c. The ſyſtem of thoſe elementary ſpirits is of no uſe to explain this, ſince it is pretended that they put in motion the ſprings of beaſts, only to procure to themſelves an agreeable amuſement. They would not be therefore ſuch fools as to undergo hunger, cold, or pain. It were therefore neceſſary to ſuppoſe, that none of thoſe paſſions is to be found in beaſts, and then all the difficulties return again; or elſe it muſt be ſaid, that thoſe ſpirits are condemned to direct the machines of brutes, in order to expiate their ſins, by ſuffering all the paſſions which the Peripatetics aſcribe to beaſts: which is againſt the ſuppoſition of the Gabaliſt Philoſopher. I omit ſeveral other difficulties as great as theſe which may be raiſed againſt that ſyſtem falſly ſaid to be bene trovato.

(124) Mélanges d'Hiſtoire & de Litterature, Tom. I, pag. 100, & ſeq. Rouën 1700.

(125) Ibid. pag 106.

You will find in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (126), that Mr Vallade, author of a Philoſophical diſcourſe concerning the creation and ordering of the world, has explained the moſt ſurpriſing actions of brutes by mechanical laws. The ſame Nouvelles (127) inform us, that Mr de la Bruyere was cenſured for aſſerting that beaſts are nothing but matter. There is in the fine book of Don Francis Lami (128), about the knowledge of ones ſelf, an explanation (129) wherein the author ſhews that there is no ſolid reaſon to aſcribe either knowledge or immortality to the ſouls of beaſts; whereas it cannot be reaſonably denied that human ſouls have both the one and the other. That explanation is worth reading, eſpecially, becauſe it contains a ſolution of the moſt perplexing difficulty of the Carteſian ſyſtem; for Don Lami ſhews that any body may be convinced by very ſtrong arguments, that other men are not meer machines: and yet the Anti-Carteſians draw ſuch an inference, from this poſition, viz. that brutes are made up of organs ſo well contrived, that they may do without knowledge whatever they do. If GOD, ſay they, was able to form ſuch a machine, he might alſo make others that would perform all the actions of man, and conſequently we could not be ſure that any other man thinks beſides us. Father Gilbert, Regius profeſſor in the univerſity of Touloufe, is one of thoſe who have publiſhed ſome books againſt the opinion of the Carteſians about the ſouls of beaſts (130). Note, that this opinion has been aſſerted in a courſe of Philoſophy taught (131) at Paris, in the college of the four Nations, and afterwards printed in the ſame city in the year 1695 with this title, Inſtitutio Philoſophica ad faciliorem veterum ac recentiorum Philoſophorum lectionem comparata. It contains four volumes in 12mo. What concerns the ſenſitive ſoul is to be ſeen in the third volume from page 271, to page 292. I do not queſtion that Dr Bayle, a Phyſician and profeſſor of the Liberal Arts at Touloufe, has embraced Des Cartes's opinion upon this head in his Phyſicks, which he has lately publiſhed in three volumes in quarto (132).

AUTHORS who have maintained that beaſts are mere machines, or confuted that opinion.

(126) For the month of October 1700, pag. 419.

(127) April 1701, p. 433, & ſeq.

(128) A Benedictin of the congregation of St Maur.

(129) Tom. V, pag. 526, & ſeq. Paris 1698.

(130) See the Journal des Sçavans, January 16, 1690, pag. 49, Dutch Edit.

(131) By Mr Pourchot.

(132) See the abſtract of the firſt in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, February 1701, pag. 209, & ſeq. Which gives a great character of that work.

I could make a long ſupplement to what I have ſaid (133), concerning Mr Poiret's opinion; but I had rather ſuppreſs it, and only point out a writer (134), who made a very learned collection relating to the doctrine of the Platoniſts, about the ætherial matter, which attends ſouls at their entrance into bodies, and at their going out of them.

(133) Above, remark [H].

(134) Renatus Vallinus, ad Librum III Boëtii de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ, p. 62, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

flexions [L], which have been publiſhed in the journal of Mr Baſnage; for thoſe obſervations, are [L] Of the obſervations which I deſign to make upon Mr Leibniz's reflexions.] I declare firſt of all, that I am very glad I have propoſed ſome ſmall difficulties againſt the ſyſtem of that great Philoſopher, ſince they have occaſioned ſome anſwers, whereby that ſubject has been made clearer to me, and which have given me a more diſtinct notion of what is moſt to be admired in it. I look now upon that new ſyſtem as an important conqueſt, which enlarges the bounds of Philoſophy. We had only two hypotheſes, that of the ſchools, and that of the Carteſians: the one was a way of influence of the body upon the ſoul, and of the ſoul upon the body; the other was a way of aſſiſtance, or occaſional cauſality. But here is a new acquiſition, a new hypotheſis, which may be called, as Father Lami ſtiles it, a way of pre-eſtabliſhed harmony (135). We are beholden for it to Mr Leibniz, and it is impoſſible to conceive any thing, that gives us a nobler idea of the power and wiſdom of the author of all things. This, together with the advantage of ſetting aſide all notions of a miraculous conduct, would engage me to prefer this new ſyſtem to that of the Carteſians, if I could conceive ſome poſſibility in the way of pre-eſtabliſhed harmony. I deſire the reader to take notice, that though I confeſs that this way removes all notions of a miraculous conduct, yet I do not retract what I have ſaid formerly, that the ſyſtem of occaſional cauſes does not bring in God acting miraculouſly (136). I am as much perſuaded as ever I was, that an action cannot be ſaid to be miraculous, unleſs God produces it as an exception to the general laws; and that every thing, of which he is immediately the author, according to thoſe laws, is diſtinct from a miracle properly ſo called. But being willing to cut off from this diſpute as many things as I can poſſibly, I conſent it ſhould be ſaid that the ſureſt way of removing all the notions that include a miracle, is to ſuppoſe that created ſubſtances are actively the immediate cauſes of the effects of nature. I will therefore lay aſide what I might reply to that part of Mr Leibniz's anſwer. I will alſo omit all the objections which are not more contrary to his opinion, than to that of ſome other Philoſophers. I will not therefore propoſe the difficulties that may be raiſed againſt this ſuppoſition, that a creature can receive from God the power of moving itſelf. They are ſtrong, and almoſt unanſwerable (137); but Mr Leibniz's ſyſtem does not lie more open to them than that of the Ariſtotelians: nay, I do not know whether the Carteſians would preſume to ſay, that God cannot communicate to our ſouls a power of acting. If they ſay ſo, how can they own that Adam ſinned? And if they dare not ſay ſo, they weaken the arguments, whereby they endeavour to prove, that matter is not capable of any ſort of activity. Nor do I believe that it is more difficult for Mr Leibniz than for the Carteſians, or other Philoſophers, to free himſelf from the objection of a fatal mechaniſm, which deſtroys human liberty. Wherefore waving this, I ſhall only ſpeak of what is peculiar to the ſyſtem of the pre-eſtabliſhed harmony.

I. My firſt obſervation ſhall be, that it raiſes the power and wiſdom of the Divine art above whatever can be conceived. Fancy to your ſelf a ſhip, which, without having any ſenſe, or knowledge, and without being directed by any created or uncreated being, has the power of moving itſelf ſo ſeaſonably as to have always the wind favourable, to avoid currents, and rocks, to caſt anchor where it ought to be done, and to retire into a harbour preciſely when it is neceſſary: ſuppoſe ſuch a ſhip ſails in that manner for ſeveral years ſucceſſively, being always turned and ſituated as it ought to be, according to the ſeveral changes of the air, and the different ſituation of ſeas and lands; you will acknowledge that God, notwithſtanding his infinite power, cannot communicate ſuch a faculty to a ſhip; nay, you will ſay that the nature of a ſhip is not capable of receiving it from God. And yet what Mr Leibniz ſuppoſes about the machine of a human body is more admirable and more ſurprizing than all this. Let us apply his ſyſtem concerning the union of the ſoul with the body to the perſon of Julius Cæſar.

II. We muſt ſay according to this ſyſtem that the body of Julius Cæſar did ſo exerciſe its moving faculty, that from its birth to its death, it went through continual changes, which did moſt exactly anſwer the perpetual changes of a certain ſoul which it did not know, and which made no impreſſion upon it. We muſt ſay that the rule, according to which that faculty of Cæſar's body performed ſuch actions, was ſuch that he would have gone to the ſenate upon ſuch a day, and at ſuch an hour; that he would have ſpoke there ſuch and ſuch words, &c. tho' God had been willing to annihilate his ſoul the next day after it was created. We muſt ſay, that this moving faculty did change and modify itſelf exactly according to the volubility of the thoughts of that ambitious man; and that it was affected preciſely in a certain manner, rather than in another, becauſe the ſoul of Cæſar paſſed from a certain thought to another. Can a blind power modify itſelf ſo exactly by virtue of an impreſſion, communicated thirty or forty years before, and which was never renewed ſince, and which is left to itſelf, without ever knowing what it is to do? Is not this much more incomprehenſible than the navigation I ſpoke of in the foregoing paragraph?

III. The difficulty will be greater ſtill, if it be conſidered that the human machine contains an almoſt infinite number of organs, and that it is continually expoſed to the ſhock of the bodies that ſurround it (138), and which by an innumerable variety of ſhakings, produce in it a thouſand ſorts of modifications. How is it poſſible to conceive that this pre-eſtabliſhed harmony ſhould never be diſordered, but go on ſtill during the longeſt life of a man, notwithſtanding the infinite varieties of the reciprocal action of ſo many organs upon one another, which are ſurrounded on all ſides with infinite corpuſcles, ſometimes hot and ſometimes cold, ſometimes dry and ſometimes moiſt, and always acting and pricking the nerves a thouſand different ways. Suppoſe that the multiplicity of organs, and of external agents, be a neceſſary inſtrument of the almoſt infinite variety of changes in a human body; will that variety have the exactneſs here required? Will it never diſturb the correſpondence of thoſe changes with the changes of the ſoul? This ſeems to be altogether impoſſible.

IV. It is in vain to have recourſe to the power of God, in order to maintain that brutes are meer machines; it is in vain to ſay that God was able to make machines ſo artfully contrived that the voice of a man, the reflected light of an object, &c. will ſtrike them exactly where it is neceſſary, that they may move in a certain manner. This ſuppoſition is rejected by every body, except ſome Carteſians; and no Carteſian would admit of it, if it were to be extended to man, that is, if any one ſhould aſſert, that God was able to form ſuch bodies as would machinally do whatever we ſee other men do. By denying this, we do not pretend to limit the power and knowledge of God; we only mean that the nature of things does not permit, that the faculties, imparted to a creature ſhould not be neceſſarily confined within certain bounds. The actions of creatures muſt be neceſſarily proportioned to their eſſential ſtate, and performed according to the character that belongs to each machine; for according to the axiom of the Philoſophers (139), whatever is received, is proportioned to the capacity of the ſubject that receives it. We may therefore reject Mr Leibniz's hypotheſis as being impoſſible, ſince it is liable to greater difficulties than that of the Carteſians which makes beaſts to be meer machines. It puts a perpetual harmony between two beings, which do not act one upon another; but if ſervants were meer machines, and ſhould punctually obey their maſters command, it could not be ſaid, that they do it without a real action of their maſters upon them: for their maſters would ſpeak ſome words, and make ſome ſigns, that would really ſhake and move the organs of the ſervants.

V. Now let us conſider the ſoul of Julius Cæſar, and we ſhall find the thing more impoſſible ſtill. That ſoul was in the world without being expoſed to the influence of any ſpirit. The power it received from God, was the only principle of the actions it produced at every moment: And if thoſe actions were different one from another, it was not becauſe ſome of them were produced by the united influence of ſome ſprings, which did not contribute to the production of others, for

(135) Dom Francis Lami, Traitté II, de la Connoiſſance de ſoi-même, p. 226, Edit. 1699.

(136) See the Memoir which Mr Leibniz has cauſed to be inſerted in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, July 1698, p. 334.

(137) See Mr Sturmius, in the firſt tome of his Phyſica electiva ſive hypothetica (whereof an extract is to be found in the Journal of Leipſic 1697, pag. 474, & ſeq.) and in the Memoir which he hath inſerted in the Journal of Leipſic 1699, pag. 208, & ſeq. to anſwer a Memoir of Mr Leibniz, inſerted in the ſame Journal 1698, pag. 427, & ſeq.

(138) Obſerve, that according to Mr Leibniz, what is active in every ſubſtance, ought to be reduced to a true unity. Since therefore the body of every man is compoſed of ſeveral ſubſtances, each of them ought to have a principle of action really diſtinct from the principle of each of the others. He will have the action of every principle to be ſpontaneous. Now this muſt needs vary their effects, in reſpect, and confound them. For the impreſſion of the neighbouring bodies muſt needs put ſome conſtraint upon the natural ſpontaneity of every one of them.

(139) Quidquid recipitur, ad modum recipientis recipitur.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

are a natural and neceſſary conſequence of a paſſage in the firſt edition of this article. I hope for the ſoul of man is ſimple, indiviſible, and immaterial. Mr Leibniz owns it: and if he did not acknowledge it, but if, on the contrary, he ſhould ſuppoſe with moſt Philoſophers, and ſome of the moſt excellent Metaphyſicians of our age (140), that a compound of ſeveral material parts placed and diſpoſed in a certain manner, is capable of thinking; his hypotheſis would appear to me, for that very thing, abſolutely impoſſible, and I could refute it ſeveral other ways, which I need not mention, ſince he acknowledges the immateriality of our ſoul, and builds upon it. Let us return to the ſoul of Julius Cæſar, and call it an immaterial Automaton (141), and compare it with an atom of Epicurus; I mean an atom ſurrounded with a vacuum on all ſides, and which would never meet any other atom. This is a very juſt compariſon; for this atom on the one hand, has a natural power of moving itſelf, and exerts it without any aſſiſtance, and without being retarded or hindred by any thing; and on the other hand, the ſoul of Cæſar is a ſpirit, which has received the faculty of producing thoughts, and exerts it without the influence of any other ſpirit, or of any body. It is neither aſſiſted nor thwarted by any thing whatſoever. If you conſult the common notions, and the ideas of order, you will find that this atom can never ſtop, and that having been in motion in the foregoing moment, it will continue in it at this very moment, and in all the moments that ſhall follow, and that it will always move in the ſame manner. This is the conſequence of an axiom approved by Mr Leibniz: Since a thing does always remain in the ſame ſtate wherein it happens to be, unleſs it receives ſome alteration from ſome other thing (142); .... We conclude, ſays he (143), not only that a body which is at reſt, will always be at reſt; but alſo that a body in motion, will always keep that motion or change, that is, the ſame ſwiftneſs, and the ſame direction, if nothing happens that hinders it. Every one clearly ſees that this atom, whether it moves by an innate power, as Democritus and Epicurus would have it, or by a power received from the Creator, will always move in the ſame line equally, and after an uniform manner, without ever turning, or going back. Epicurus was laughed at, when he invented the motion of declination (144); it was a needleſs ſuppoſition which he wanted to get out of the labyrinth of a fatal neceſſity, and he could give no reaſon for this new part of his ſyſtem. It was inconſiſtent with the cleareſt notions of our minds; for it is evident that an atom, which deſcribes a ſtrait line for the ſpace of two days, cannot turn away at the beginning of the third, unleſs it meets with ſome obſtacle, or has a mind, all of a ſudden, to go out of its road, or contains ſome ſpring which begins to play at that very moment. The firſt of theſe reaſons cannot be admitted in a vacuum. The ſecond is impoſſible, ſince an atom has not the faculty of thinking. And the third is likewiſe impoſſible in a corpuſcle that is a perfect unity. I muſt make ſome uſe of all this.

VI. Cæſar's ſoul is a being to which unity belongs in a ſtrict ſenſe. The faculty of producing thoughts is a property of it's nature (145), which it has received from God, both as to poſſeſſion and exerciſe. If the firſt thought it produces is a ſenſe of pleaſure, there is no reaſon why the ſecond ſhould not be likewiſe a ſenſe of pleaſure; for when the total cauſe of an effect remains the ſame, the effect cannot be altered. Now this ſoul at the ſecond moment of it's exiſtence, does not receive a new faculty of thinking; it only preſerves the faculty it had at the firſt moment, and it is as independent from the concourſe of any other cauſe at the ſecond moment as it was at the firſt; it muſt therefore produce again at the ſecond moment the ſame thought it had produced juſt before. If it be objected that it ought to be in a ſtate of change, and that it would not be in ſuch a ſtate, in the caſe that I have ſuppoſed; I anſwer that it's change will be like the change of the atom: for an atom, which continually moves in the ſame line, acquires a new ſituation at every moment; but it is like the preceding ſituation. A ſoul may therefore continue in its ſtate of change, if it does but produce a new thought like the preceeding. But ſuppoſe it be not confined within ſuch narrow bounds; it muſt be granted at leaſt, that its going from one thought to another implies ſome reaſon of affinity. If I ſuppoſe that in a certain inſtant the ſoul of Cæſar ſees a tree with leaves and bloſſoms, I can conceive (146) that it does immediately deſire to ſee one that has only leaves, and then one that has only bloſſoms, and that it will thus ſucceſſively produce ſeveral images ariſing from one another; but one cannot apprehend the poſſibility of the odd changes of thoughts, that have no affinity with, and are even contrary to, one another, and which are ſo common in mens ſouls. One cannot apprehend how God could place in the ſoul of Julius Cæſar the principle of what I am going to ſay. He was without doubt pricked with a pin more than once, when he was ſucking; and therefore, according to Mr Leibniz's hypotheſis, which I am here conſidering, his ſoul muſt have produced in itſelf, a ſenſe of pain immediately after the pleaſant ſenſations of the ſweetneſs of the milk, which it had enjoyed for the ſpace of two or three minutes. By what ſprings was it determined to interrupt its pleaſures, and to give itſelf all of a ſudden a ſenſe of pain, without receiving any intimation of preparing itſelf to change, and without any new alteration in its ſubſtance? If you run over the life of that Roman emperor, every page will afford you matter for a ſtronger objection than this is.

VII. The thing would be leſs incomprehenſible, if it were ſuppoſed that the ſoul of man is not one ſpirit, but rather a multitude of ſpirits, each of which has its functions, that begin and end preciſely as the changes made in a human body require. By virtue of this ſuppoſition it ſhould be ſaid, that ſomething analogous to a great number of wheels and ſprings, or of matters that ferment, diſpoſed according to the changes of our machine, awakens or lulls aſleep for a certain time, the action of each of thoſe ſpirits; but then the ſoul of man would be no longer a ſingle ſubſtance, but an Ens per aggregationem, a collection and heap of ſubſtances juſt like all material beings. We are here in queſt of a ſingle being, which produces in itſelf ſometimes joy, ſometimes pain, &c. and not of many beings, one of which produces hope, another deſpair, &c.

In theſe obſervations I have only cleared and unfolded thoſe, which Mr Leibniz has done me the honour to examine; and now I ſhall make ſome reflexions upon his anſwers.

VIII. He ſays (147), that the law of the change which happens in the ſubſtance of the animal, tranſports him from pleaſure to pain, at the very moment that a ſolution of continuity is made in his body; becauſe the law of the indiviſible ſubſtance of that animal, is to repreſent what is done in his body, as we experience it, and even to repreſent in ſome manner, and with reſpect to that body, whatever is done in the world. Theſe words are a very good explication of the grounds of this ſyſtem: they are, as it were, the unfolding and key of it; but at the ſame time they are the very things at which all the objections of thoſe, who take this ſyſtem to be impoſſible, are levelled. The law Mr Leibniz ſpeaks of, ſuppoſes a decree of God, and ſhews wherein this ſyſtem agrees with that of occaſional cauſes. Thoſe two ſyſtems agree in this point, that there are ſome laws, according to which the ſoul of man is to repreſent what is done in the body of man, as we experience it. But they diſagree as to the manner of executing thoſe laws: the Carteſians ſay, that God executes them: Mr Leibniz will have it, that the ſoul itſelf does it; which appears to me impoſſible, becauſe the ſoul has not the neceſſary inſtruments for ſuch an execution. Now however infinite the power and knowledge of God be, he cannot perform with a machine deprived of a certain piece, what requires the concourſe of ſuch a piece. He muſt ſupply that defect; but then this effect would be produced by him and not by the machine. I ſhall ſhew that the ſoul has not the inſtruments requiſite for the execution of the Divine law we ſpeak of, and in order to it I ſhall make uſe of a compariſon.

Fancy to your ſelf an animal created by God, and deſigned to ſing continually. He will always ſing, that is moſt certain, but if God deſigns him a certain tablature, he muſt neceſſarily either put it before his eyes, or imprint it upon his memory, or diſpoſe his muſcles in ſuch a manner, that according to the laws of mechaniſm, one certain note will always come after another, (140) Mr Locke for inſtance.

(141) Mr Leibniz uſes this expreſſion, ubi ſupra, pag. 338. The ſoul, ſays he, is a moſt exact immaterial automaton.

(142) Memoir inſerted in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, July 1698, pag. 331.

(143) Mr Leibniz, ibid. declares that he acknowledges the truth of this axiom: nay, ſays he, I maintain that it is favourable to me, and indeed it is one of the things I build upon.

(144) See, above, the article EPICURUS, remark [U].

(145) This I ſay, according to Mr Leibniz's ſyſtem.

(146) I ſpeak thus by way of conceſſion; that is to ſay, I will not take an advantage of the reaſons which hinder us from conceiving that a created ſpirit can of himſelf frame any ideas.

(147) Leibniz, ubi ſupra, pag. 332.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hope they will prove an occaſion of clearing up a ſubject, which is not leſs difficult than important.

another, agreeable to the order of the tablature. Without this one cannot apprehend that this animal can ever follow the whole ſet of the notes appointed by GOD. Let us apply this to man's ſoul. Mr Leibniz will have it, that it has received not only the power of producing thoughts continually, but alſo the faculty of following always a certain ſet of thoughts, which anſwers the continual changes that happen in the machine of the body. This ſet of thoughts is like the tablature preſcribed to the ſinging animal abovementioned. Can the ſoul change its perceptions or modifications at every moment, according to ſuch a ſet of thoughts, without knowing the ſeries of the notes, and actually thinking upon them? But experience teaches us, that it knows nothing of it. Were it not at leaſt neceſſary, that, in default of ſuch a knowledge, there ſhould be in the ſoul a ſet of particular inſtruments, each of which would be a neceſſary cauſe of ſuch or ſuch a thought? Muſt they not be ſo placed and diſpoſed as to operate preciſely one after another, according to the correſpondence pre-eſtabliſhed betwixt the changes of the body and the thoughts of the ſoul? but it is moſt certain, that an immaterial, ſimple, and indiviſible ſubſtance, cannot be made up of ſuch an innumerable multitude of particular inſtruments placed one before another, according to the order of the tablature in queſtion. It is not therefore poſſible that a human ſoul ſhould execute that law.

(148) Ubi ſupra, pag. 337.

Mr Leibniz (148) ſuppoſes that the ſoul does not diſtinctly know its future perceptions, but that it perceives them confuſedly, and that there are in each ſubſtance tracts of whatever hath happened, and ſhall happen to it (149): but that an infinite multitude of perceptions hinders us from diſtinguiſhing them. . . . . The preſent ſtate of each ſubſtance, is a natural conſequence of its preceding ſtate. . . . . (150) The ſoul, though never ſo ſimple, has always a ſentiment compoſed of ſeveral perceptions at one time; which anſwers our end as well as if it was compoſed of pieces, like a machine. For each foregoing perception has an influence upon thoſe that follow, agreeably to a law of order, which is in perceptions as well as in motions. . . . . (151) The perceptions that are together in one and the ſame ſoul at the ſame time, including an infinite multitude of little undiſtinguiſhable ſentiments that are to be unfolded, we need not wonder at the infinite variety of what is to reſult from it in time. This is only a conſequence of the repreſentative nature of the ſoul, which is to expreſs what happens, and what will happen in its body, and in ſome manner in all other bodies, by the connexion and correſpondence of all the parts of the world. I have but little to ſay in anſwer to this: I ſhall only obſerve, that this ſuppoſition when ſufficiently cleared, is the right way of ſolving all the difficulties. Mr Leibniz, through the penetration of his great genius, has very well conceived the whole extent and ſtrength of the objection, and what remedy ought to be applied to the main inconveniency. I do not queſtion but that he will ſmooth the rough part of his ſyſtem, and teach us ſome excellent things about the nature of ſpirits. No body can travel more uſefully and more ſafely than he in the intellectual world. I hope that his curious explanations will remove all the impoſſibilities, which I have found hitherto in his ſyſtem, and that he will ſolidly reſolve my difficulties, and even thoſe of Father Lami (152); and theſe hopes made me ſay before, without deſigning to paſs a compliment upon that learned man, that his ſyſtem ought to be looked upon as an important conqueſt (153).

(149) This is what cannot be conceived in an indiviſible, ſimple, and immaterial ſubſtance.

(150) Ibid. pag. 339, 340.

(151) Ibid. p. 3, 340.

(152) They are in the 2d diſcourſe of Self-Knowledge, from pag. 225, to pag. 243, Paris Edit. 1699.

(153) Above, remark [L], at the beginning.

He will not be much embaraſſed by this, viz. that whereas according to the ſuppoſition of the Carteſians, there is but one general law for the union of all ſpirits with bodies, he will have it, That GOD gives a particular law to each ſpirit; from whence it ſeems to reſult, that the primitive conſtitution of each ſpirit is ſpecifically different from all others (154). Do not the Thomiſts ſay, That there are as many ſpecies as individuums in the angelical nature?

(154) There never were two men, who had the ſame thoughts, I will not ſay for one month together, but even for two minutes. The principle of thought, muſt therefore have a particular rule and nature in every man.

RORENCO (MARCO AURELIO) one of the joint lords of the valley of Lucerne and Grand Prior of St Roc at Turin, was a great perſecutor of the Vaudois in the XVIIth century [A]. He alſo wrote books againſt them [B], Narratione dell' introduttione delle Hereſie nelle Valli de Piemonte, printed at Turin in the year 1632, and Memorie Hiſtoriche dell' introduttione delle Hereſie, printed at the ſame place in the year 1649,

[A] Was a great perſecuter of the Vaudois in the XVIIth century.] Peter Gilles in his Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches of Piedmont; having ſpoken of the famine in the year 1628, adds; The adverſaries of the Reformed Churches in the Valleys, who were ever waiting for an occaſion to perſecute them, choſe that of the famine, hoping it would ſerve for a net to fiſh and draw unto them the poor famiſhed people, and herein thoſe who above others zealouſly exerted themſelves were the abovementioned Monk Bonaventure, and the Sieur Marcus Aurelius Rorenco, prior of Luſerne, ſon to one of the gentlemen of the valley, who having ſtudied the laws became a Prieſt, and going to Rome, was made Prior of Luſerne, and had the revenues of that Priory given him: but this (as was given out even by thoſe of his own party) was for having promiſed at Rome and elſewhere to uſe the utmoſt of his power and knowledge for promoting the Romiſh religion in the Vallies, and to aboliſh, or at leaſt reſtrain the Reformed, and he was not even yet returned from his Roman journey, when ſome Reformed of the Vallies were credibly informed that the Prior for the foreſaid purpoſe, determined to get new monaſteries built in the valley of Luſerne, in ſome other places, and in others to fix the abode of ſome Monks, and to do other matters of that kind, which not long after he endeavoured with all his power to perform. And firſt he cauſed Count John Baptiſt Rorenco, his father, reſiding at la Tour, to ſell his houſe and the adjoining buildings, in order to make a monaſtery for Monks called Franciſcans, Reformed Minimes. And on the 23d of June of the foreſaid year, 1628, he conducted them thither, together with Friar Bonaventure, with ſeveral other Monks, and Prieſts, and immediately after they ſent thither proviſions of whatever the Monks had occaſion for themſelves, and to bribe the conſciences of poor famiſhed people, and they began to give largely to the few Papiſts that had remained with them at la Tour, even to ſome who had no need, that the neighbouring Reformed might be enticed to preſent themſelves before them, and ſay, What will you give me and I will do as you deſire: but ſeeing none to come, they invited them to deal with them by their Papiſts; wherein appeared more diligent than any other, the lady Catherine, mother to the foreſaid Friar, who went from houſe to houſe, exhorting the poorer and weaker ſort to go and accept the great charity which the neighbouring Fathers had prepared (1).

(1) Peter Gilles, Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, pag. 473, 474.

Another writer of the Hiſtory of the Churches in the Vallies ſays, that the Grand-prior Rorenco is their great perſecutor, and a member of the council de extirpandis hæreticis, - - - for extirpating Heretics (2), . . . was looked upon at Rome as the moſt diligent, the moſt cunning, and moſt effectual inſtrument that could be employed in this age to baraſs theſe poor people of the Vallies, and the perſon moſt ſkillful to contrive deſigns and other methods of their ruin, as having grown old in that ſtudy (for he is now decrepit) (3).

(2) John Leger, Hiſtory of the Churches of the Vaudois, Part i, p. 155: he ſays Rorence is yet alive, and he dates the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his book, May 1, 1669.

(3) Ib. p. 173.

[B] He alſo wrote books againſt them.] Peter Gilles having ſaid (4) that in the year 1610 came out a book, intituled, Vittoria triomphale, compoſed by the Franciſcan Friar Samuel de Caſſini, which calumniated the Vaudois, adds, 'There is to be ſeen almoſt the 'ſame in a book intituled Breve narratione, of the 'preſent Prior of Luſerne, printed in the year 1632, 'and expreſsly compoſed to defame the religion and 'the manners of the Reformed of the Vallies, full of 'falſehoods and impudent calumnies thus prefaced, 'You do, you ſay, and there are ſtill ſome perſons alive, who remember that your fathers did ſuch and ſuch things.

(4) Hiſtory of the Churches of the Vaudois, p. 13.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1649, and dedicated to the duke of Savoy (a). He was born in the valley of Lucerne, and was the ſon of Count John Baptiſt Rorenco (b), and was ſtill living in the year 1668 (c).

(a) See John Leger, Hiſt. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, Part i, pag. 144, 173, where he ſays, that the Memoirs were printed in the year 1645. (b) See the remark [A]. (c) See the ſame remark.

'things. But finding afterwards that violent complaints were made of his ſlanders, and that he was 'in good earneſt challenged to prove what he had 'written, and eſpecially to produce the pretended living witneſſes of ſome former wickedneſſes; and not 'knowing where to have them: he publiſhed another 'book in the year 1634, intituled, An apologetic letter, wherein he declares, That it never was his intention to defame the Proteſtants of the Vallies, and that what he had written in his book, was only an account that ſome authors had given of certain vices, which in former times reigned in diverſe places. But that 'he might not again be cenſured, he carefully kept 'himſelf from naming the pretended authors, and the 'places, and times.' The churches of the Vallies ordered the Sieur Valerius Gros, Paſtor of the church of Villar to anſwer the firſt book of the Prior (5): this anſwer was never publiſhed; but as to that which was made to the ſecond book it was printed, and there may be found a general idea of it in the Hiſtorian which I cited (6). See the article GILLES (PETER).

(5) Hiſt. des Eglises Voudoiſes, pag. 539.

(6) Ibid. pag. 540, & ſeq.

ROSE (WILLIAM) preacher to Henry III, and biſhop of Senlis, the moſt enraged Leaguer that was in France. See the Notes upon the Catholicon d'Eſpagne (a); but add to them this circumſtance, that having refuſed to pull off his Epiſcopal habits, when the parliament of Paris condemned him to make an Amende Honorable; he made it in his Pontificalibus the fifth of September 1598 (b). Mr de Launoi is very much to blame (§ α) for having beſtowed ſo many encomiums upon that prelate (c), without cenſuring him in the leaſt. It is a ſcandalous thing.

(a) Notes upon the Catholicon d'Eſpagne, pag. 196, & ſeq. Edit. 1696. See alſo pag. 91.
(b) Thuanus, lib. cxx, pag. 827. (c) Launoius, in Hiſtoria Collegii Navarr. pag. 1019, & ſeq.

[(§ α) He is no leſs to be blamed with reſpect to Dr Francis le Picart, likewiſe one of his heroes, if it is true what is reported of that man, that one day, which was the 25th of November 1553, after having in his ſermon ſufficiently, according to his uſual cuſtom, vented his rage againſt the Lutherans, he proceeded at laſt to ſay, that the king ought for ſome time to counterfeit the Lutheran with them, to the end that, taking thence the occaſion publickly to hold their aſſemblies, they might all be put to the ſword, and the kingdom once for all cleared of them. See the Anatomy of the Maſs, &c. tranſlated from Italian, by Antony d'Adam, pag. 538, of the edition of John Martin, 1562. As for the reſt, who knows but ſome of thoſe who nineteen years after adviſed king Charles IX to the Paris Maſſacre, was preſent at that ſermon? REM. CRIT.]

ROSE (TOUSSAINT) Marquis de Coye, ſecretary to the king's cabinet, preſident in the Chamber of Accounts, and one of the forty members of the French Academy, had been ſecretary to Cardinal Mazarin. He died the ſixth of January 1701 in the eighty-ſixth of year of his age (a). His poſterity ſtill remains [A]. His place in the academy, which he left vacant by his deceaſe, and wherein he ſucceeded to Mr Conrart in the year 1675, was given to Mr de Saci the ſeventeenth of March 1701. We find in the Menagiana that he was deſcended of a good family of Provence, that he had been ſecretary to the cardinal de Rets, and that he had in his name written letters admirably fine (b).

(a) Mercure Galant, January 1701, pag. 104.

(b) Menagiana, p. 297, of the firſt Holland Edition.

[A] His poſterity ſtill remains.] LEWIS ROSE, his ſon, Lord of Coye, counſellor in the parliament of Mets, and ſecretary to the king's cabinet, died in the year 1688, and left behind one ſon and one daughter of his marriage with Magdalen de Bailleul (1). The daughter was married on the 28th of April 1699 to Antony Portail advocate-general in the parliament of Paris (2).

(1) The daughter of Mr de Bailleul, preſident à Mortier. She was a ſecond time married to the Marquis de Vatan.

(2) Taken from the Mercure Galant of Jan. 1701, pag. 105.

ROSEN (a) (REINHOLD) a gentleman of Livonia [A], ſerved under the Duke of Weimar, and afterward in the armies of France, and acquired the reputation of a good warrior [B]. He married in Alſatia, and there made a conſiderable ſettlement (b). He went to ſalute the king at the ſiege of Dole in year 1668. He was mounted on a horſe thirty-eight years old, which, 'he told the king, had ſaved his life at the 'battle

(a) The Latin Hiſtorians call him Roſa, and the French Roſe.

(b) Mercure Galant, for the month of February 1703, pag. 332.

[A] A gentleman of Livonia.] He was of a family, of which there have been knights of the order of Sword-bearers (1), and it is well known that Mr Roſen the marſhal of France had records brought from Livonia which proved that the nobility of his houſe was very antient. He had the honour to be related to the royal family of Sweden, and there has been a marſhal of Sweden of his houſe (2).

[B] He acquired the reputation of a good warrior.] His courage and conduct ſufficiently appeared by his being choſen by the duke of Weimar to the command of his cavalry (3), and named him by his will one of the directors of the army (4). It would be endleſs to deſcribe all the battles wherein he was, and wherein he gave proofs of his courage. I think it better to refer my readers to the hiſtories of thoſe times. He is there very often mentioned by the bare title of Colonel Roſe. Yet I muſt not omit to ſay that he was not always victorious: he was made priſoner at Marienda1 in 1645 (5), where the army under Marſhal de Turenne was defeated. He would have had the ſame fate at the loſs of the battle of Dutlingen (6), had he not fled very ſpeedily (7). Marſhal Turenne was not pleaſed with him in the fight of Mariendal (8); but he was much more diſpleaſed two years after when he believed him to be the chief promoter of the revolt the Swedes were contriving in his army, inſomuch that he put him under guard (9). He afterwards had an order from court to ſet him at liberty (10).

(1) Mercure Galant, February 1703, pag. 331.

(2) Ibid. p. 335.

(3) Cum ſub Bernardi Saxonis auſpiciis magiſtrum equitum egiſſet. Franckenſteinius, in Indice Hiſtoriæ Benjam. Prioli.

(4) Puffendorf, Rerum Suecic. lib. xi, pag. 374.

(5) Franckenſt. in Indice Hiſt. Prioli.

(6) The 14th of November, 1643.

(7) Appendix Hiſtor. Univerſ. Joh. Cluveri, pag. m. 759.

(8) See the Life of Marſhal Turenne, by the pretended du Buiſſon, lib. iii, pag. 195, Hague Edit. 1688.

(9) Ib. p. 221, 222. (10) Franck. in Indice Hiſt. Prioli.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'battle of Rocroy (c).' He died not long after and left a pension to his horse, with a meadow, and his liberty (d) [C]. Having no male issue, he resolved to promote one of his kinsmen, whom he had engaged to quit Livonia, he provided him a wife, and left him all his estate. This kinsman of his was created a marshal of France in the month of January 1703. He hath large possessions in Alsatia which are settled upon him in fee (e). He has a son who is a major-general, and a daughter who is married to the Marquis de Rottembourg (f).

(c) Ibid. p. 333.

(d) Ibid. p. 334.

(e) Ibid. p. 336.

(f) Ibid. pag. 334, 335.

Priolo observes that a brother of our Rosen was killed at the battle of Rhetel in the month of December 1650 (11). The French Mercury (12) mentions one colonel JOHN ROSE, cousin of colonel Reynold Rose. The Theatre de l'Europe, at pag. 899 of the fifth volume, mentions one VOLMAR ROSA, who was killed for having given a box on the ear (13).

(11) Priolus, de Rebus Gall. lib. v, num. xxxvi, pag. m. 225.

(12) In Tom. xxiii, pag. 696, 699, in the year 1640.

(13) Franckensteinius, ibid.

[C] He left a pension to his horse, with a meadow, and his liberty.] One who would lay hold upon all occasions to communicate his collections would here have a large field; for though he spoke not of all the beasts to which testimonies have been given of affection, and gratitude (14), but only of such as concern the horses, he might quote a very great number of examples. I know some such myself, besides what I have observed in the remark [M] of the article CALIGULA, and in the remark [O] of the Emperor ADRIAN; however I shall be short upon this matter, it is an easy matter to consult Philip Camerarius, who hath made very good collections on this subject in the first tome of his historical Meditations in the first chapter of book II. Some quotations relating to this may also be seen in the Peintures Morales of Father le Moine. He has not omitted Caligula, and has represented the folly in such affected terms that I cannot forbear reciting them. An emperor, says he (15), caused a palace of marble to be built for a horse: he appointed him the furniture and retinue of a prince, and not contented with this, he named him consul, he gave him a place in the senate, and made him to be registred in the Fasti among the Cato's and Pompeys. Had he survived him, he would undoubtedly have made a god of him by an apotheosis of a new form, and have constrained the twelve deities of the capital to receive him into their number. In Pliny (16) also may be seen some instances of honours done to horses.

(14) As to the honours done to Camels, see the remark [DD], of the article MAHOMET. You may also see in the Mercure Galant of July 1678, some honours done to beasts.

(15) Father le Moine, in his Peintures Morales. See Suetonius, in Caligula, cap. lv.

(16) Plin. lib. viii, cap. xlii. See also lib. x, cap. xliii, concerning the funeral of a raven.

All military gentlemen have not had the like sentiments of gratitude for their horses as our Rosen. A certain Neapolitan gentleman abandoned his horse, and was enjoined to maintain him. Father Pardies concerning this quotes Spondanus, and says that a great prince (17) of former times of great renown for his virtue, and for the zeal he had to do justice to every one, thought he gave a judgment worthy his grandeur, when he decreed in favour of an old horse, which, having been forsaken by his master, in his old age, to whom he had done very considerable services in the war, went, I know not by what instinct, or by what accident, and sounded a bell, which had been hung on purpose at the gate of the palace, that all those who thought themselves injured, might ring it in order to make their complaints, and demand justice (18). Sabba Castiglione, a gentleman of Milan, who died knight of Malta and commander of Faenza in the month of March 1554 (19), hath given a very long account of this in the CXXII chapter of his Ricordi necessarii dal principio della vita civile, fino a fine di quella, &c. See Camerarius in the chapter quoted above.

(17) It was Charles duke of Calabria, son to Robert king of Naples. See Annal. Spond. ad ann. 1328, num. 18, he quotes Summarc, lib. iii.

(18) Pardies, Epistle Dedicatory of a treatise concerning the knowledge of beasts.

(19) Ghilini, Tom. ii, p. 224.

I believe the judges, by whose award (20) the cat of Madam de Puis a famous player on the harp (21), lost a law-suit, would not have in such manner treated the horse of the Neapolitan gentleman. The last will and testament of this lady made a great noise: a process was raised to set it aside: Messieurs Maurice, Vautier, and de Ferriere, famous advocates, displayed their eloquence, the first in defending it, the two last in pleading against it. The pension which the deceased had left to her cat, and the visits she had appointed to be made to her every week, were the things which were most exclaimed against (22).

(20) Mercure Galant, Juin 1678, pag. 136, Dutch edition.

(21) Ibid. p. 132.

(22) Ibid.

ROSEO, or ROSEUS (MAMBRIN) an Italian author, lived in the XVIth century. He published in 1549 the Institution of a Christian Prince, wherein he neither followed those who describe government as it is commonly managed, nor those who give an idea of it according to the most perfect speculation. He chose a middle way between these extremes [A], which was to shew what the rules of common policy might allow. He continued the History of the world which John Tarcagnota had from Adam brought down to the year 1513: he continued it, I say, to the year 1558, and thence to the year 1571 (a). That work is written in Italian, and was by Don Barthelemi Denys de Fano carried down to the year 1582. Roseo was not alive when the edition which I use was published, which is that of Venice appresso i Giunti 1585 in 4. At the same time was reprinted the work of Tarcagnota, the second edition of which was in the year 1562 (b). It hath been said elsewhere (c) that Roseus translated into Italian a treatise of the military art which went for a work of William de Bellai. He also wrote an History of the kingdom of Naples. He shews himself extremely passionate in his continuation of Tarcagnota whenever he speaks of the Protestants, and it appears that he took the method of Historians who never examine the testimonies of each party, but only those of the party they favour. As to proper names, he is besides guilty of innumerable mistakes.

(a) That continuation was printed at Venice in the year 1573, in 4to.

(b) That which makes me speak in this manner, is, because the Epistle Dedicatory addressed to Cosmo di Medici duke of Florence, is dated at Naples the 1st of January 1562.

(c) In the Remark [G] of the article BELLAI (WILLIAM DU).

[A] He chose a middle way between these extremes.] This observation I have taken from Naudæus. 'Niphus, says he (1), & Machiavellus Principes suos effinxére, quales ut plurimùm esse deprehenduntur: 'Erasmus, Osorius, Foxius, Natta, Omphalius Wimphelingus, ut se moraliter gerere deberent: Mambrinus Roseus, Frachetta, & Lælius Marettus Senensis, cujus liber publici juris nondum factus est, ut illis Politicæ communis legibus agere conceditur. 'Bellarminus denique, Ribadeneira, & Scribanius, ut se ad Christianæ Religionis Præcepta componere deberent. - - - Niphus and Machiavel have represented their princes such as we commonly find them to be: Erasmus, Osorius, Fox, Natta, Omphalius Wimfelingus, such as they ought morally to be: Mambrinus Roseus, Frachetta, and Lælius Marettus of Sienna whose book is not yet published, such as the maxims of common policy will permit. Finally, Bellarmin, Ribadeneira, and Scribanius, such as they ought to be, by conforming to the precepts of Christianity.' From this may be learnt the various models which different writers have chosen for their instruction of sovereign princes. Observe that ever since the year 1549, the work of Mambrin Roseo hath been extant in French, bearing the title of Le Paragon de vertu pour l'Institution de tous Princes, Potentats, & Seigneurs Chrestiens, contenant en Sommaire les Histoires Hebraiques, Grequi, Latines, & Modernes faisans à propos. Pris de l'Italien de Membrin de la Rose, à Paris par Estienne Groulleau 1549 in 8vo (2). A Latin translation of the same work, pag. 339.

(1) Naudæus Bibliograph. Polit. pag. m. 47.

(2) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Bibl. Franç.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google work was publiſhed at Straſbourg in 1608. Upon which Mr Konig fancied that Mambrin Roſeo had compoſed that book in the year 1608 (3). But there- in he was very much miſtaken, he is very often guilty of ſuch faults.

(3) Konig, Bibioth. pag. 701.

ROSES, a town of Catalonia. It was only an abbey, when Charles V built there a town and a fortreſs, thirty-five fathoms from the ſea, in an open country (a). This town has the Mediterranean ſea on the ſouth, the plain of Lampurdan and a pond on the weſt, and the Pyrenees on the eaſt and north. It is fortified with five baſtions lined with free-ſtone. It remained faithful to the king of Spain, when all Catalonia revolted to France in the year 1640. Du Pleſſis-Pralin laid ſiege to it in 1645, and took it fifty-ſeven days after the opening of the trenches; for which he was made a marſhal of France. The Spaniards having almoſt recovered all Catalonia during the civil war of France, could not for all that re-take Roſes. They kept it blocked up nine months, and reduced the garriſon to an extreme famine; but they retired upon the approach of the French ſuccours. This happened in 1653. Roſes was reſtored to them by the Pyrenean treaty, in 1659. They loſt it in the year 1693 [A], and had it reſtored by the peace of Reſwick in the year 1697. The bay of Roſes is above four leagues in compaſs, and begins at the end of the Pyrenean mountains, at the caſtle of the Trinity, and ends near the little town of Empurias. It has no harbour, being only a ſhallow road which neither ſhips nor gallies can come to for want of water. But between the caſtle of the Trinity and the town, there is a ſmall hollow, where great ſhips may lie for ſome time upon a neceſſity. A league and a half beyond the caſtle, towards Rouſſillon and out of the bay, there is a borough called Capdequiers (b), which depends upon the government of Roſes, and has a pretty good harbour (c).

(a) Baudrand in Rhoda.

(b) It was formerly a ſtrong place. See concerning this the end of the remark [G] of the article REVEREND-DEBOUGY.

(c) Taken from a relation of the ſiege of Roſes publiſhed in 1693.

[A] They loſt it in the year 1693.] The Marſhal duke of Noailles beſieged it about the latter end of May, and obliged the governor, Don Pedro Robi, to capitulate the 9th of June. The caſtle of the Trinity, at the entrance of the bay of Roſes, and within cannon ſhot of the place, was taken four days after.

(a) Some call him des Roſiers.

ROSIER (a) (HUGH SUREAU DU) in Latin, Hugo Suræus Roſarius (b), was a famous miniſter of the church of Orleans, under the reign of Charles IX. He was born at Roſoy in Tierache, in the province of Picardy (c). He was impriſoned at Orleans, in the year 1566 (§ α), being ſuſpected of being the author of a book full of ſeditious maxims [A]. But becauſe they could not convict him of it he was ſet at liberty.

(b) Thuanus ſays Sorellus Roſerius, lib. xxxiv, pag. 687, and Sorellus Roſarius, lib. lii, pag. 1088.

(c) La Croix du Maine, pag. 173.

[(§ α) It might therefore probably have been at Orleans, and for the particular uſe of the Reformed Church there, that Hugh Sureau cauſed to be printed in 1565, for Abel Clemence, the Pſalms of Clement Marot and Beza, in four parts, compoſed by Goudimel, but to a more plain and eaſy Muſic, with a particular diſtinction in every Pſalm of what is to be ſung in the ſervice. There is alſo of his a Treatiſe concerning the marks of the true Church of GOD, in 8vo, printed at Heidelberg in 1574 *, and a Latin tranſlation of the Memoirs of M. du Bellai, printed in 8vo, with a fine letter on good paper, by John Marſhal, in the year 1575. I know not whether it is the ſame which the preceding year was publiſhed by Andrew Wechelius without the name of the tranſlator †. As for the reſt, the Memoirs of the ſtate of France, under the reign of Charles IX, tome 1, at fol. 277, ſay, that it was the reſtleſs ſpirit of the miniſter Hugh Sureau, which made him firſt be ſent from Orleans to .... and afterward to the little church he ſerved at the time he was taken up during the maſſacres of the year 1572. In fine, I fancy that his ſirname du Roſier might be nothing elſe but a nickname given him from the place of his nativity at Roſoi in Tierache. REM. CRIT.]

* Thuani Biblioth. Tom. i, pag. 175.

† Draud. Biblioth. Tom. i, p. 1105.

[A] He was ſuſpected to be the author of a book full of ſeditious maxims.] Beza gives the following account of that libel. 'At that time (1), ſays he, there 'came out a book printed privately at Lyons, with- 'out the name of the author or Printer, and inti- 'tuled, La Defenſe Civile & Militaire des Innocens, & 'de l'Egliſe de Chriſt, written without doubt by a 'wicked and ſeditious perſon. The ſaid book fal- 'ling into the hands of ſome good men, all means 'were uſed to know from whence it came, but it 'was in vain. Only there was a ſtrong ſuſpicion, 'that Charles de Moulin, a famous Civilian, an ad- 'vocate of the parliament of Paris, who was then at 'Lyons, and had ſided with the Proteſtants from the 'time of king Henry, was the author of it; having 'always before, and after, appeared a very fantaſtical 'man. But however he denied it even with great 'oaths, right or wrong (2).' Lyons was then in the hands of the Proteſtants: Soubiſe who commanded in it, deſired the miniſters to examine that book, and they gave their judgment about it in the following words. 'We, miniſters of the word of GOD, in 'the Reformed Church of Lyons, after having in- 'voked the name of GOD, and ſeen a certain book 'lately printed, and intituled, La Defenſe Civile & 'Militaire des Hommes & de l'Egliſe de Chriſt, do 'certify and declare, That it is full of falſe and 'wicked doctrine, being in ſome points the ſame 'with that of the Anabaptiſts, inducing men to ſe- 'dition and rebellion, and to diſobey kings and 'princes againſt the expreſs command and ordinance 'of GOD: and ſo much the more, becauſe the author 'of it makes an ill uſe of many paſſages and ex- 'amples of the Holy Scripture, which he wrongfully 'applies to his purpoſe, againſt their true ſenſe and 'meaning, as we are ready to make appear and de- 'monſtrate by the word of GOD: for which reaſon 'we deſire and requeſt that the ſaid book be wholly 'ſuppreſſed, that men may not be infected with ſuch 'a ſeditious and peſtilential doctrine (3).' Purſuant to this cenſure, Soubiſe ordered, That all thoſe who had this book, ſhould bring it to him within twenty-four hours, and that all thoſe who ſhould ſell it, or hand it about, ſhould be hanged, without any formal trial (4); and he had it burnt by the common hangman in the four principal places of the town, the 12th of June 1563 (5). Thus things went as to this book, ſays Beza (6): 'And ſeveral years after, du Ro- 'ſier, a miniſter of Orleans, who was not then at 'Lyons but at Orleans, and knew no more what was 'done at Lyons than what paſſed in the Indies, was 'accuſed of being the author of it. And accordingly 'he was arreſted, and ſent priſoner to Paris with 'great noiſe, as if the Proteſtants approved that do- 'ctrine. But GOD would have it that the truth 'ſhould quickly come out, though du Roſier had 'powerful enemies, particularly Birague, who ſome 'years after was undeſervedly made governor of 'Lyons.'

(1) That is in the year 1563.

(2) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. book xi, pag. 244.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid. p. 245.

(5) Id. ib. p. 246.

(6) Id. ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google liberty. He and another minister disputed in the same year with two Doctors of Divinity, of the Faculty of Paris [B], in the house of the Duke of Nevers, at the request

'Lyons.' Thuanus mentions in a few words, the proceedings against this book; but he observes that it was falsely ascribed to the Civilian Charles du Moulin (7). Deckherrus has misrepresented the title of that book. 'Eodem, (superiori seculo) says he (8), 'non expresso Authoris nomine vulgatus libellus de 'potestate principis Lugduni combustus, &c. - - - At the 'same time a libel was published concerning the power 'of the prince, without the author's name, which was 'burnt at Lyons, &c.' One of those who published some animadversions upon Deckherrus, expressed himself in a doubtful manner upon occasion of those words; which he should not have done: he was uncertain whether that book was different from that which was printed at Paris in the year 1589, with this title, Traité de la puissance des Rois contre le Roy de Navarre. Had he known that du Moulin had been dead (9) long before the right of the king of Navarre came to be spoken of, he would have said expresly, that those two books were very different one from another: here is a non liquet, which is not much to his honour. An vero iste tractatus idem sit de quo Cl. Deckherrus, pag. 338. loquitur tanquam Lugduni combusto, & falso adscripto Carolo Molinæo J. C. sed quem alii tribuunt Hugoni Sorello Roserio, non mihi liquet (10).

I must take notice of some faults of Davila. He says, that in the year 1566, a minister, born at Orleans, preached a seditious sermon, after he had published a book wherein he maintained, that the French ought to obey the king no longer, and that they might lawfully kill him, since he was an idolatrous prince. 'Nè erano meno ardite le penne de gli Ugo- 'notti di quello, che si fossero l'armi, perche in questo 'medesimo tempo un Ministro, nativo di Orliens, 'andava seditiosamente predicando contro alla podestà 'del Rè, & havea anco stampato un libro, nel quale 'sosteneva, che il popolo Francese non era più in obli- 'go d'obbedire al Rè, per esser egli diventato idola- 'tra, & per questa ragione contendeva ancora, che si 'potesse lecitamente ammazzare; dalla quale empia, 'e diabolica semente è poi successivament derivata in 'altri tempi, & in altre persone, quella pestifera 'dottrina, che con horribile perversione d'ogni legge 'divina, & humana ha insegnato a gli huomini ad in- 'sanguinarsi le mani sotto pretesto di pietà, e di re- 'ligione, nelle viscere de i Rè legitimi, constituiti so- 'pra gli huomini per rappresentanti di Dio (11). - - - 'The Huguenots were no less bold with their pens than their 'swords; for at the same time a minister, who was 'born at Orleans, preached seditiously against the king's 'authority; and had also printed a book in which he main- 'tained, that the people of France were no longer obliged 'to be obedient to the king, because he was turned ido- 'later; and for this reason affirmed, that it was law- 'ful to kill him; from which impious and diabolical 'seed afterwards sprang up in other times, and in other 'persons, that pernicious doctrine, which, with such hor- 'rible perversion of all laws human and divine, in- 'structed men, under the pretence of piety and religion, 'to imbrue their hands in the blood of their lawful 'kings, by God's ordinance appointed over them as his 'deputies.' It is plain he means the minister du Rosier, who was imprisoned that year, under pretence of a seditious libel. But, 1. That minister was not a native of Orleans. 2. He did not preach against the king's power; for if his sermons had been seditious, it had been no difficult thing to convict him of rebellion. Birague, his enemy, who caused him to be imprisoned, as being the author of a libel, would not have been cast for want of proofs: had he had none, as to the book, the sermons would have afforded him some, which had been sufficient to convict him. And therefore since that minister was set at liberty, it is manifest his sermons were not such as Davila represents them to be. 3. I cannot believe that the book, which was burnt at Lyons, taught that the killing of kings was a lawful thing: had it contained such an execrable doctrine, the ministers who censured it, would have thundered more terribly against it than they did. I confess that la Croix du Maine, a Protestant author, says, That du Rosier wrote some French books, amongst others that, wherein he endeavours to shew that it is lawful to kill a king or a queen, who will not embrace the pretended reformed religion, and side with the Protestant party (12). But I am perswaded he said this without having read the libel, that was burnt by Soubise's order; and if I am not mistaken, he goes only upon the credit of the authors quoted by him. See, says he, the French history of our time of the last edition enlarged by John le Frere de Laval, and also Belleforest, in the second volume of his great Annals of France, fol. 1689. 1653, &c (13). Varillas, who certainly would not have extenuated the heinousness of that libel, speaks of it as of a book levelled at the monarchical authority. But there is a vast difference between this and teaching, that kings may be lawfully murdered. It is necessary I should set down the whole passage of that Historian. 'Soubise, before 'his departure (14), caused a seditious book, lately 'come out, to be burnt by the hang-man. The Cal- 'vinists ascribed it to the famous Civilian Charles du 'Moulin; which they did probably out of spite against 'him, because he was the only Frenchman, who ad- 'hered to the Lutheran sect, and refused to join with 'with them. For du Moulin's style and character 'did not appear in that book. It was, properly 'speaking, a satire against all Christian monarchies, 'which he pretended to overthrow by several passages 'of the Holy Scripture curtailed or wrested to another 'sense. The Catholic writers say that it was written 'by a Calvinist minister; that it was not their first at- 'tempt of that kind against the authority of kings; 'and that three years before, in 1560, they held a 'synod at Chalons upon the Saone, wherein they de- 'clared, that the equality of conditions was the most 'certain privilege of the Gospel-liberty purchased by 'the blood of JESUS CHRIST. But that synod is not 'to be found in the collection * of the twenty-six 'first synods held in France by the pretended Re- 'formed. There is nothing to be seen about it any 'where, except in the writings of their adversaries; 'besides, it is not likely that their ministers should 'have at first taken upon themselves, without consult- 'ing Calvin, to lay down, as the foundation of their 'religion, a paradox so well confuted in Aristotle's 'Ethics, and so dangerous, that it tended to the de- 'struction not only of Calvinism, which they endea- 'voured to establish, but also of all civil societies, of 'what nature soever they might be (15).' This passage does not contain many things that the Protestants can complain of; on the contrary they may praise the equity of that author, who justifies them very well. But his marginal note has been a snare to some learned men. Their fault, tho' very excusable, is of great moment. I call it an excusable fault; because a French reader will be apt to take that note in the same sense that was put upon it in the Acta Eruditorum, unless he uses great attention. Any one that reads that marginal note of Varillas, will presently think that he saw among the manuscripts of Lomenie the acts of the synod, which the Protestants have not inserted in the collection of their twenty-six first synods. The learned authors of the Acta Eruditorum understood it so. This sense does a great deal of wrong to the Reformed: for were it true, that there is in the collection of their synods, among the manuscripts of Lomenie, a synod held in 1560, which declared for equality of conditions; one would be apt to believe that they made a decision about it in the year 1560, which afterwards they thought fit to suppress with all the acts of that assembly. It is therefore expedient that every body should know that the word it in the marginal note refers to the word collection, and not to the word synod. Varillas means, that he has seen among the collections of Lomenie, the collection of the twenty-six first synods held by the French Protestants, and that he has not found in it the synod of the year 1560, which determined, as it is pretended, that all conditions were equal. The authors of the Acta Eruditorum make him say the quite contrary. Ex Manuscriptis Lomenianis decretum Synodi à Reformatis Catalauni (16) habitæ allegat, quo contra regiam potestatem statuerint, æqualitatem conditionis humanæ inter potissima privilegia libertatis Evangelicæ esse, quam Christus suo sanguine veris Christianis promeruerit (17).

[B] He and another minister disputed . . . . with two Doctors of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris.] The duke of

(7) Quem nonnulli, sed falso, Carolo Molinæo J. C. alii Hugoni Sorello Roserio tribuebant. Thuan. lib. xxxiv, pag. 687. ad an. 1563.

(8) Deckher. de scriptis adespotis, pag. 338.

(9) He died in the year 1566.

(10) Petrus Bælius, epistola ad Almeloveenium de scriptis adespotis ad calcem tractatus Deckherri, pag. 371. Edit. 1686.

(11) Davila, delle Guerre Civili di Francia, lib. iv, pag. m. 160. ad ann. 1566.

(12) La Croix du Maine, Bibliotheque Françoise, pag. 173.

(13) He might have quoted Miles Pigueire, History of France, p. 457. edition of 1582.

(14) That is from Lyons.

* I have seen it among those of Lomenie.

(15) Varillas, Histoire de l'Heresie, book xxvi, pag. 10, 11, ad ann. 1563, Dutch Edit.

(16) It should be Cabillonì: for Catalaunum is Chalons upon Marne; but according to Varillas the synod in question was held at Chalons upon Saone, a town called in Latin Cabillonum.

(17) Acta Eruditor. Lipf. 1691, pag. 31.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

requeſt of the Duke of Montpenſier, who was in hopes that this diſpute would bring back the Ducheſs of Bouillon, his daughter, to the Romiſh church; but he was diſappointed in his expectation. Du Roſier redeemed his life, in the time of the maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day, by abjuring his religion; and being immediately made uſe of to exhort the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé, &c. to embrace the Romiſh communion, and having had all the ſucceſs that the court of France could wiſh for, he was thought a very fit perſon to be a converter (d). He was therefore employed as ſuch in ſeveral places of Paris, and the court was ſo well pleaſed with the progreſs he made, that he was ſent with the Jeſuit Maldonat to Metz, where there was a plentiful harveſt. He harangued, and exclaimed againſt the ſchiſm; but he was not perſuaded of the truth of what he ſaid [C]: for ſome miniſters having found an opportunity to ſpeak to him in private, and to make him ſenſible of the heinouſneſs of his fault, he ſeemed to be well diſpoſed to amend it; and accordingly he left Maldonat, and retired to Heidelberg, where he profeſſed himſelf a Proteſtant again. He could never recover the eſteem he had been in among the Reformed; and he would have been not only very much deſpiſed, but alſo reduced to great neceſſity, had he not found a place of corrector of Montpenſier believed that the ducheſs of Bouillon would renounce Calviniſm, provided ſhe would hear Dr Vigor. Nay, he conſented that the miniſter Spina ſhould be preſent when ſhe heard the doctor ſpeak. In order to pleaſe him, the duke of Bouillon and admiral Coligni agreed upon a conference, which was to be held in his houſe the firſt of July, 1566. Spina, and Barbaſte, miniſter of the queen of Navarre, came thither on the appointed day. They were aſked, whether they intended to pray according to the cuſtom of the reformed churches, before they ſhould begin the conference: they anſwered that they were reſolved upon it, and becauſe they perſiſted in their reſolution to begin with a prayer pronounced aloud, the whole project was broke; and they went away, having rejected all the expedients that were propoſed, to prevail upon them not to make any prayer. Dr Ruzé told them, that if they intended to pray, he would go out of the room and make water during the prayer. He propoſed to them to make only a mental prayer, or to go and pray in a neighbouring houſe. All theſe propoſals were rejected, and ſo there was no conference (18). People did not fail to ſay that they had declined the diſpute: the admiral maintained the contrary before the king and queen, and that they would be ready at all times to meet the doctors, and to defend the confeſſion of the churches by the Scripture. Whereupon the duke of Nevers begged of their majeſties that the conference might be renewed. The conditions were agreed upon: Dr Vigor, and Dr de Sainctes on the one ſide, and the miniſters Spina and Sureau on the other, began the diſpute in his houſe the ninth of July, 1566, and continued it for ſeveral days. Some Hiſtorians affirm that Hugh Sorel (19) was then taken out of priſon: Mezerai (20) and Varillas ſay ſo: theſe are the words of the latter. 'The 'duke of Montpenſier was of opinion, that the beſt 'way to bring back again the ducheſs of Bouillon his 'daughter to the communion of the Catholic church, 'was a public conference of two doctors with two 'miniſters; and it began at Paris in Nevers houſe. 'The doctors were Simon Vigor, afterwards archbiſhop of Narbonne, and Claudius de Sainctes, afterwards biſhop of Evreux. The two miniſters appointed for that diſpute were John de l'Eſpine, 'whom I have already mentioned, and Charles Barbaſte, who had been a Carmelite: but Barbaſte being not in a condition to come to the conference, 'the Calviniſts took from thence occaſion to deſire 'that Hugh Sorel des Roſiers ſhould be put in his 'place. Des Roſiers was a miniſter, who had been 'impriſoned for writing a libel concerning the autho'rity of magiſtrates, wherein he pretended that it 'was a lawful thing, to deſtroy, in any manner, a 'prince of a contrary religion. He deſerved at leaſt 'to be condemned to a perpetual impriſonment for 'ſuch a crime; but he obtained his pardon by the ſol'licitations of thoſe of his party, and by the credit 'of the duke of Montpenſier. It was thought expe'dient that the ducheſs of Bouillon ſhould have no 'occaſion to complain, under pretence that ſhe could 'not have the two miniſters, whom ſhe took to be 'the beſt diſputants *; and the diſputation was ma'naged without any heat, out of reſpect to the illu'ſtrious perſons that were preſent at it. But notwith'ſtanding this moderation, the Catholics and the Cal'viniſts both gave out that they had the advantage. 'Nor did the event clear the truth of the matter; 'for if on the one ſide, &c (21).' It ſeems from the printed account of the Miniſters, that du Roſier had been ſet at liberty, before there was talk of making him one of the diſputants. For when they heard that Vigor was ſick, and that Sainctes was gone from Paris, they were afraid that the conferences being interrupted would remain ſo too long; and therefore they deſired to go home, and repreſented that they happened to be at Paris only accidentally; that Spina was come thither in order to go farther and take a turn into Anjou; and that the other, who was miniſter of the church of Orleans, was but lately come out of priſon, to which he was committed in the preceding June, upon a falſe accuſation of the enemies of the church of GOD, who charged him with being the author of a pernicious and wicked book, written againſt the obedience that is due to kings and princes; and that therefore it was a great inconveniency for him to make a long ſtay in a town to which he was come againſt his will (22). Claudius de Sainctes got that diſpute printed (23).

(d) This may be ſeen at large in Thuanus, lib. lii, pag. 1088.

(21) Varillas, Hiſtory of Herefy, book xxvii, pag. 88.

(22) Actes de la conference, pag. 323.

(23) In the year 1568, according to all the Bibliographers that I have conſulted. There is no likelihood that it is the firſt edition: the relation of the miniſters had appeared two years before.

[C] He harangued and exclaimed againſt the ſchiſm, but he was not perſuaded of the truth of what he ſaid.] Beza, in his hiſtory of the Reformed churches of France, gives an account of it in the following words. The Marſhal de Rets, governor of the country called Meſſin, 'tried another way, and ſent for du Roſier, 'a miniſter who had changed his religion, and who 'was attended by a Spaniſh Jeſuit, whoſe name 'was Maldonat: this Jeſuit was accounted the moſt 'learned and moſt ſubtile man of his order. As for 'du Roſier, he had done at Paris all that he could 'do to pervert others, ſo far as to print his abjura'tion, and other books full of falſities, and which 'ſhewed an ill conſcience; whereas before, he had 'the reputation of a learned man, as he really was, 'and had been choſen to diſpute at Paris with 'Dr Vigor and Dr des Saintes. This man's chang'ing his religion, proved a great ſcandal to many 'people: he endeavoured afterwards to mend the 'buſineſs as well as he could; but ſince that time he 'never had a ſound judgment, nor an upright con'ſcience, and at laſt he died of the plague at Francfort, 'with his wife and all his children. But to return 'to our Hiſtory, thoſe two men being come to 'Metz, and moſt of the Proteſtants being com'pelled to repair to the biſhop's palace upon a Sun'day, du Roſier made a long ſpeech to them about 'the ſucceſſion of biſhops, which he ſaid was the mark 'of the true church (24).' Beza adds (25), that du Roſier being partly convinced of his fault in his own conſcience, and alſo adviſed by good people to take pity on himſelf, deſired ſome help to get out of the mire; which was granted him, and that poor wretch was conducted to the church of Heidelberg, where he, in ſome manner, acknowledged his faults, and publiſhed a ſmall treatiſe contrary to thoſe he printed at Paris. Now, let us ſee what a ſlandering miniſter, who changed his religion, ſays of it. 'They (26) were very much afraid that du 'Roſier would too much inſiſt upon that point (27): 'and therefore ſome perſons of Sedan went to him at 'a place called Chemery, and made him believe (for 'he was a timorous, inconſtant, and credulous man) 'that

(24) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. book xvi, pag. 475.

(25) Id. ibid.

(26) That is the miniſters of Sedan.

(27) That which concerned the vocation of the miniſters.

(18) Taken from the preface of the Actes de la Conférence tenue à Paris és mois de Juillet & Août 1566 entre deux Docteurs de Sorbonne & deux Miniſtres. I make uſe of the Antwerp edition 1566, in 8*vo.*

(19) It ſhould be Sureau. Thuanus's Sorellus, has deceived the Hiſtorians.

(20) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, in folio, Tom. iii, pag. 145.

* An account of it hath been printed.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google rector in Andrew Wechel's Printing-house at Francfort (e). He died of the plague in that town with his whole family [D]. When he took his journey to Metz he was desired to go to Sedan, to convert the same Duchess of Bouillon, who had occasioned his conference with two Catholic doctors; but he could not prevail upon that lady (f). I shall speak of his books [E].

He is said to have been a man of a wrangling humour, and fond of particular opinions, and to have sowed seeds of discord in the church of Orleans [F], by keeping correspondence with some fanatics; that it was to be feared that the French churches would have been sadly divided, if the peace had been of any continuance, and if the massacre had not prevented a schism.

(e) See the remark [D].

(f) See Thuanus, ubi supra.

'that if he returned to Paris with Maldonat, he would 'certainly, after they had conquered him, be put to 'death, and that the duke of Bouillon had been 'informed of it; which was false. Moreover, they 'told him that Maldonat had given him a hint 'of it, saying that he had still something of a Here- 'tic; and they prevailed so far upon him at Metz, 'that he left that Jesuit without taking his leave of 'him, and retired into Germany. In order to which 'they supplied him with money for his journey, and 'afterwards they made several gatherings to be sent 'to him, which amounted to above 250 livres (28).' I remember, says he, elsewhere (29), 'that it was the 'first crime they charged du Rosier with, when he 'seemed to have a mind to separate from them, and 'to return into the pale of the Christian and Catho- 'lic church. But when they saw that this and some 'other common faults, as his being a mumper, 'a liar, and a man of no resolution, were not suf- 'ficient to run him down; some of them went about 'to cast a blemish upon his wife's chastity, giving 'out that she had prostituted herself to some ca- 'nons of Orleans: a thing not to be credited for the 'reasons, which I had rather leave to the considera- 'tion of those, who have seen and known her, than 'publish them in print.'

(28) Matthieu de Launoy, Declaration & Refutation des fausses suppositions, fol. 139.

(29) Defense de Matthieu de Launoy contre les fausses accusations, fol. 37.

[D] He died of the plague.] We have already seen it in a passage of Beza, and Philip Lonicerus says it likewise. 'Ex improviso fiquidem anno superiori, in 'ipsa Vindemia, peste Rempublicam nostram tunc 'infestante, ex hac vita, non sine magno doctorum 'virorum, quibus ille notus erat, tuoque cum primis 'dolore, ex hac misera vita, unà cum uxore sua, 'in cœlestem illam avocatus est (30). - - - The year be- 'fore, he (together with his wife) in vintage-time, 'when the plague raged in our country, was suddenly 'removed, to the grief of learned men, and your's espe- 'cially, from this life, into a better in Heaven.' Thus he speaks to John Fichard, syndic of the city of Francfort, in an Epistle Dedicatory prefixed to a posthumous piece of our Sureau, viz. the Latin translation of a book of John Corras (31). If Lonicerus had dated that epistle, we might know in what year du Rosier died. The year of my edition, which is 1588, is of no use to me. It is certain that this minister did not die the year before: he was already dead when Beza published his history of the Reformed churches of France in 1580. Here follows another passage of Lonicerus, wherein du Rosier is very much praised. 'Quæ sit humanarum rerum fragilitas, Fi- 'charde clarissime, superiore anno præmatura sua mor- 'te, etiam noster ille Hugo Suræus, non sine doctis- 'simorum virorum suspiriis, testatus est. Qui cum 'laudatissimæ Andreæ Wecheli, viri optimi & huma- 'nissimi, Typographiæ strenuam navaret operam, 'talem suæ industriæ, quam exacta, non solum Latinæ '& Græcæ, verùm etiam Hebraicæ atque Chaldaicæ 'linguæ notitia ornabat, laudem consequutus est, ut 'omnibus bonis & doctis viris esset gratissimus (32). 'The uncertainty of human affairs, illustrious Fichard, 'appeared also last year in the too early death of our 'Hugh Sureau, so much lamented by learned men. Who, 'when he was employed in the Printing-house of Andrew 'Wechel, a most excellent and obliging person, gave such 'proofs of his learning and ability, as acquired him the 'esteem of all good and learned men.'

(30) Phil. Lonicerus, Epist. Dedicat.

(31) The Arrêt of the parliament of Toulouse, against the pretended Martin Guerre; which arrêt, Corras, who reported the cause, adorned with a large commentary.

(32) This is the beginning of the Epistle Dedicatory.

I find in the epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheque (33), that this Latin translation of Corras's book was printed at Francfort in 1579, apud Andream Wechelum. If it be the first edition, it must be said that du Rosier died in the autumn of the year 1578. The author of the notes upon the Confession de Sanci (34), places his death in year 1575 (§ β).

(33) Pag. m. 425.

(34) Pag. 470, 471. Edit. 1699.

[(§ β) The Memoirs of the State of France under the reign of Charles IX, tom. 2. fol. 74. verso, of the second edition, say at the year 1572. Hugh Sureau, who had escaped from the city of Metz the 19th of December, died about three years after, at Frankfort, where he had resumed the employment of a Corrector to a Printing-house. REM. CRIT.]

[E] I shall speak of his books.] He published several of them in French, if we may believe la Croix du Maine (35), who mentions but two of them, viz. that which concerns the killing of kings, and a treatise concerning his confession of faith, with an abjuration of his Huguenotism, &c. printed at Paris in 1573. We have seen above, that he wrote one concerning his return to the Reformed church. He had published some controversial books at Orleans, before the Paris massacre, as it appears from the answers of Gentianus Hervetus mentioned by la Croix du Maine (36). I have elsewhere said (37), that he translated into Latin the memoirs of Mrs Bellai. If Konig had said that Hugo Suræus translated into Latin an arrêt of the parliament of Toulouse, he would not be liable to censure; but he made use of this expression, Edidit arrestum Parlamenti Tholosani in casu admirabili matrimoniali An. 1588 (38). Which contains two faults. 1. It does not appear from it whether Sureau is the translator or the author, or meerly the publisher of that arrêt. 2. Sureau could not put out such a piece in the year 1588, for he was not then living. There is a vast number of such faults in the Bibliographers.

(35) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoise, pag. 173.

(36) Response à Hugues Sureau dit des Rosiers, Maistre d'Escole à Orleans. L'Anti-Hugues, ou response à Hugues Sureau des Rosiers, imprimé par Chesneau, Jan 1566. Id. 1582. Here is an Anti not mentioned by Mr Baillet.

[F] Who had sowed seeds of discord in the church of Orleans.] The author of the memoirs intituled, de Statu Religionis & Reipublicæ in regno Galliæ, which are ascribed to John de Serres, gives the following account of this minister. 'Vir non ineruditus, '(Rozarius) sed fœdissimo lapsu ostendens quid 'sit infirmitas humana, & quàm periculosum etiam 'sit, pacato tempore, dum nullo hoste urgemur, 'indulgere insanientis nostræ rationis commentis, ut 'certam exploratamque veritatem sempiternis prin- 'cipiorum firmamentis cœlo & terra firmiorem, 'in dubium pro arbitratu nostro revocemus: quo 'curiosæ licentiæ morbo Rozarius laborabat, cor- 'rupto quodam more & ambitiosiore de Ecclesiæ suc- 'cessione, disciplina, & de aliis etiam religionis capiti- 'bus superciliosè disputans, seque suis collegis hac in 're excellentiorem importuno quodam studio existi- 'mans. Non obscurarum enim turbarum semina in 'Ecclesia Aureliana inseminarat, dum sese cum novo- 'rum commentorum architectis, phanaticis ingeniis 'familiarius conjungeret: unde, nisi periculosæ tran- 'quillitatis incommoda, novo hoc remedii genere 'Deus præcidisset, magnæ & periculosæ turbæ in Ec- 'clesiis Gallicis erant haud dubiè exundaturæ (39). '- - - - A man not unlearned, (du Rosier) but by his dis- 'graceful fall shewing the prevalence of human infir- 'mity, and how dangerous it is, even in peaceable times, 'to follow the fictions of our wild imagination, and to 'call in doubt at pleasure the certain and established 'truth, which too curious and unrestrained licence, was 'the disease du Rosier laboured under, after a corrupt 'and ambitious manner supercilliously challenging the 'succession and discipline of the church, and other points of 'religion, and on account of this his unseasonable dili- 'gence, preferring himself to the rest of his colleagues. 'For he sowed the seeds of schisms and divisions in the 'churches of Orange, associating himself with professors 'of innovations, and fanatical persons: from whence 'grat and pernicious confusions had undoubtedly ensued in 'the churches of France, unless by this new kind of remedy, 'God had prevented the consequences of a dangerous tran- 'quillity.' Another writer of that time has these words: 'One du Rosier, a minister, a man of a 'ready wit, but restless and inconstant, being made a 'prisoner about a day's journey from Paris, as he was 'running away, began to waver, and soon after 'changed his religion (40).'

(37) In the article BELLAI (WILLIAM DU) remark [D].

(38) Konig, Biblioth. pag. 536.

(39) De Serres, Recueil des choses plus remarquables, &c. an. 1572, fol. m. 4.

ROTAN

ROTAN (JOHN BAPTIST) minister of Rochelle, was very much esteemed for his parts and learning; but he was suspected of having betrayed his party [A], by countenancing Henry IV underhand in his design of turning Papist. It is said that he promised to suffer himself to be worsted in a dispute with du Perron, in the presence of that prince, in the year 1593, but the remorse of his conscience, or his vanity, obliged him to pretend to be sick, that he might avoid entring the lists [B]. It is further said, that he continued to be a prevaricator all the rest of his life, and that he and de Serres designed to go about a deceitful project [C] in a national synod; but they died before that synod was held. Rotan had taught Divinity at Rochelle (a), and published a controversial book against the Jesuit Coton, and another against Arminius. He died in 1621.

(a) Cum Rupellam rediisset (Andreas Rivetus) publice profitentem audivit Joannem Baptistam Rotanum Italum, doctiss. & eloquentissimum Doctorem, qui scholam Theologicam aperuerat. Meursius Athen. Batav. p. 316.

[A] He was suspected of having betrayed his party.] D'Aubigné says (1), that the minister Rotan, a Piedmontese (2), a profound Divine and a subtile Philosopher, had a mind to be a courtier, and thought that the third party, which was formed some time after the death of Henry III, would open a breach, through which he might come into business. He joined with Morlas, who had the same design, and then both of them concerted with du Perron how they might engage the king to turn Catholic. They were kindly treated by the directors of the Finances, which occasioned the coming of others into their faction. Rotan and Morlas disputed about several points against du Perron in the king's presence, and designedly yielded to him, who was a man of prodigious learning; so that ever since the siege of Rouen he insinuated himself into the king's favour by his easy and charming eloquence. . . . . Whereupon, each of them giving an opportunity to his friend, they began to propose the change of religion. Note, that Rotan began to relish a court-life, when he was there to solicit the payment of some money, which he had lent, or rather caused to be lent by others, at Geneva, for the troops raised by Sanci (3). This shews that he did not confine himself to the functions of his profession, but meddled with political affairs: and therefore it is less to be wondred at, that as soon as he was acquainted with the court, he resolved to raise himself, by preferring his worldly interests to those of his religion. He was deputed to Mante, with several others, to represent to the king the grievances of the Protestants; but he got himself chosen to dispute against du Perron (4). He had promised to act the part of a cunning prevaricator, and being ready to do it, it happened that vanity or fear made him so waver, that he chose rather to pretend to be sick; and Beraud, a minister of Montauban, took his place. The dispute was very sharp on both sides about the sufficiency or insufficiency of the Scripture, and the words of St Paul in his Epistle to Timothy; and the conference was broken by the prohibition of the Clergy.

(1) D'Aubigné, Hist. Universelle, Tom. iii, book iii, chap. xxiv, p. m. 405, ad ann. 1593.

(2) Others say he was a Grison. See below the passage quoted out of Cayet, citation (6).

(3) D'Aubigné, ubi supra.

(4) Ib. ibid. book iv, chap. xi, pag. 505.

[B] He pretended to be sick, that he might avoid entring the lists.] We have just now seen that d'Aubigné says so: to which I shall add a passage of the History of the edict of Nantes, from which it appears that Rotan's conduct was approved in a national synod. 'Rotan, a famous minister, was suspected of having 'consented to those artifices, whether he was really 'prevailed upon in hopes of some favours, or only 'pretended to approve them, in order to get himself 'deputed; because it was an honourable commission. 'So that the conference began, and du Perron appeared 'in it as a man sure of obtaining a compleat victory 'by his adversary's collusion. The dispute ran upon 'the sufficiency of the Scripture, and the explication 'of the sixteenth verse of the third chapter of the 'second Epistle of St Paul to Timothy. But Rotan, 'either out of honour or conscience, not daring to be 'so base as it was said he had promised to be, pre-'tended to be sick, and so got out of the lurch. 'Beraud, a minister of Montauban, took his place; 'but the conference did not last long, when they 'saw that they had nothing more to expect from 'their collusion with Rotan. The clergy found out 'a way to break it, without seeming to decline it; 'and the ministers on their part offered to renew it, 'whenever they should be desired to do it. But 'because notwithstanding those offers, the clergy 'boasted of having worsted the ministers; Beraud and 'Rotan got their procedings approved by the national 'synod, that was held at Montauban the year 'following. Rotan was sheltered under Beraud's 'protection, and this approbation put an end to the 'suspicion that was entertained of him, as if he had 'been a prevaricator (5).' It doth not clearly appear from this account, nor from that of d'Aubigné, whether Rotan pretended to be sick after some conferences, or before any conference; and therefore I shall set down the words of another Historian, that the readers may have a more distinct knowledge of the matter. 'Among those deputies,' says he (6), 'there 'were several ministers, and among others one Rotan 'a Grison by nation, who being still at Rochelle, 'boasted that he would overcome all the Catholic 'doctors in a disputation, and he believed it; and to 'shew that he was in earnest, he had a great many 'books carried from Rochelle to Mante: wherein he 'was very much assisted by the Sieur du Plessis gover-'nor of Saumur . . . . . On the appointed day, 'the said Sieur du Perron, and the minister Rotan, 'after some preambles, wherein they protested that 'they acted only out of zeal for truth, began the 'disputes of the sufficiency of the word of GOD (7). That Historian gives the substance of the objections and answers, like a partial man against the Protestants, and then concludes thus, Rotan was then a little confounded, and began to praise the said Sieur du Perron, and then the assembly was dismissed for that day. Rotan appeared no more at the conference: Berault a minister of Montauban took his place, who the six following days was carried by the said Sieur du Perron, per omnes locos Dialecticæ, about the word σοφισαι, to make wise. History, Poetry, Mathematics, Philosophy, Physics, Morals, Metaphysics, Scholia's, and Commentaries, were brought in right or wrong by Berault: but he could never make it out that that Greek word signifies or includes sufficiency. And indeed after he had praised the said Sieur du Perron, he intimated that he was not come prepared for disputing. Thus ended this conference, and the ministers of the pretended Reformed religion returned into their respective provinces (8).

(5) Histoire de l'Edit. de Nantes, Tom. i, book iii, pag. 112, ad ann. 1593.

(6) Peter Victor Cayet, Chronologie Novenaire, Part ii, fol. 269, verso.

(7) Id. ibid. fol. 270, verso.

(8) Idem, fol. 271, verso.

[C] He and de Serres designed to go about a deceitful project.] I have only read this in d'Aubigné: he shews how the court made use of address to pervert the ministers, and then he says: the effect of it appeared particularly in the ministers Rotan, Serres, Cabiers, Morlas, and de Vaux. The whole mystery of those practices, and particulary of those of Mante, was laid open by the latter, who confessed his prevarication to several eminent persons with horrid cries (9). D'Aubigné was one of these persons. After he had, says he (10), deposited his confession in my bosom, with great sighs, he put into my hands three bonds; one of 2500 crowns, and the other two something lesser, which I restored to his heirs. In the Confession Catholique de Sanci he brings in Cahier relating all these things and affirming what he (d'Aubigné) durst not affirm (11), concerning the circumstances of de Vaux's death. 'Being in this 'perplexity,' they are Sanci's words (12) 'I per-'ceived M. Cahier walking in the court. I went to 'him and asked him what was become of the mini-'ster de Vaux. Sir, said he, that wretch having 'promised many fine things to the bishop of Evreux, 'and received some money from him in order to 'perform his promises, wanted courage to do it, and 'went from hence into his country, crying and 'bawling out that GOD's cause had been betrayed 'by him and five of his friends, whom he pointed 'at without naming them. He added, that GOD 'would be merciful to him, and that he was going 'home to give up his soul into his hands, as soon 'as he should come to Millaud. However, he 'offered to write letters to the bishop of Evreux, by 'a trusty friend, whereby the bishop would discover 'to him the prevarication of the conference of Mantes, 'and the other preparations of Rohan (13) and de 'Serres, who, you know, did early promise their 'perfidious assistance. The Huguenots were such 'fools as to refuse his offer, saying that Christ's 'kingdom ought not to be established by craft (14). 'I asked Cahier what cover Rohan (15) and Serres 'could now make use of to justify themselves? These 'two

(9) D'Aubigné, Tom. iii, book iv, chap. i, pag. 623.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 626.

(11) See it in the original, I do not recite it.

(12) Confession Catholique de Sanci, in the last chapter of book ii, pag. 547, Edit. 1699.

(13) It should be Rotan.

(14) Confession, ibid. pag. 548.

(15) Read Rotan.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

controverſial book concerning the Euchariſt [D], and another (b) to confute the reaſons, which Cayet had alledged for his converſion. There is ſome reaſon to believe that he had been miniſter of the church of Geneva [E]. He had been admitted Doctor of Divinity at Heidelberg, in the year 1573. Zanchius, who performed the ceremony, ſays that Rotan had left his country fifteen years before for his religion, and that he bore joyfully the loſs of a conſiderable eſtate (c). Maimbourg deſerves to be criticized [F].

(b) Printed at Rochelle in 1596, it contains 215 pages, in 8vo.

(c) Exilium, quod propter Domini Jeſu Chriſti cauſam, annos jam totos quindecim, cum non parva ſuorum hominum coronarum non tenuium jactura conjunctum, æquiſſimo ſemper animo tulit, imo magnæ gloriæ loco habuit. Zanchius Epiſt. lib. ii. pag. 603.

' two, anſwered he, need no cover; for they are ' covered with earth. I will tell you how. As ſoon ' as they heard of de Vaux's confeſſion, they encou- ' raged one another by letters, and got themſelves ' elected for the national ſynod of Montpellier, being ' reſolved to venture all, and to try whether they ' could get ſomething by the confederates before they ' ſhould make their retreat. But it fell out un- ' luckily that they died at the opening of the ſy- ' nod.' The author of the notes upon the Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci, obſerves, (16) that this is the national ſynod which was held at Montpellier, in May 1598. Againſt which Reboul wrote in 1600 the ſatire intituled, Actes du Synode Univerſel de la Sainte Reformation - - - - Acts of the general ſynod of the holy reformation.

(16) Notes on the Confeſſion de Sanci, pag. 560.

[D] He had ..... publiſhed a controverſial, book concerning the Euchariſt.] It was printed at Rochelle, and intitled Traité Orthodoxe de l'Euchariſte (§ a). Dr Julius Cæſar Bulenger refuted it in a book printed at Paris, for Frederic Morel, in 1598, in 8vo. He refers the reader to it in the preface of his Catholic Anſwer to du Pleſſis Mornai's book upon the Euchariſt.

[(§ a) That treatiſe, to which, by the by, Rotan had not put his name, came out at the lateſt in the year 1596. Since we have in the ſame year printed by Gilles Robinot, an anſwer to it by Cayet, intituled, Le vray Orthodoxe de la foi Catholique du Sainct Sacrement de l'Autel, Pour reſponſe au Traité prétendu Orthodoxe anonyme. REM. CRIT.

[E] There is ſome reaſon to believe that he had been miniſter of the church of Geneva (§ b).] For we find in Melchior Adam that he was one of the three miniſters (17), who went from Geneva to Bern in the year 1588, to aſſiſt at a ſynod, which was convened on account of the diſputes raiſed by Samuel Huberus and Claudius Auberi (18). I have ſpoke in another place (19) of this Samuel Huberus, and now I ſhall ſay, that this Claudius Auberi was profeſſor of Philoſophy at Lauſanne, and that going out of his ſphere, and taking upon him to dogmatize in Theology, he taught, viva voce, and in writing, that the righteouſneſs of man before the tribunal of GOD, is an inherent quality. The ſynod condemned that opinion, and obliged Auberi and his adherents to acknowledge that they embraced the doctrine contained in the confeſſion of faith of the churches of Swiſſerland and the churches of France, viz. that we are juſtified before the throne of GOD by faith as by an inſtrument, wherewith we take hold of JESUS CHRIST our righteouſneſs. Claudius Alberius Triuncurianus cum ſuis, receptæ doctrinæ & in confeſſione tam Gallicana quam Helvetica comprehenſæ, de noſtra ad tribunal Dei juſtificatione per fidem tamquam inſtrumentum, quo Chriſtus, juſtitia noſtra apprehendatur, profeſſus ſit ſe penitus aſſentiri (20). I ſhall occaſionally obſerve, that he only ſubmitted in words to the deciſions of that ſynod. I have a book, publiſhed in the year 1591, by one Antony Leſcaille, wherein I find that Dr Gryneus ſpoke thus in an aſſembly held at Baſil in the month of December 1590, upon the ſubject of the differences of this Antony with Conſtant and Couët, miniſters of the French church: ' That ' there was one Aubery, who had heretofore writ a ' book, which had been afterwards condemned at ' Bern, who had ſubſcribed to ſome poſitions, which ' afterwards he did not keep to. That going through ' Baſil, and returning to it as he came from Francfort, ' he had taught his errors at Baſil in ſeveral houſes ' and to divers perſons, but none was ſo bold as to ' maintain them, except Leſcaille, to whom the ſaid ' Aubery had left a piece of his own writing. And ' therefore he ſhall give notice of it to the magiſtrates ' of Bern, that the ſaid Aubery may be puniſhed (21).' This Leſcaille was an illiterate layman, who took upon him to dogmatize, and put into the hands of his miniſters a piece concerning good works (22). Beza ſpoke to him thus in the month of Auguſt, 1591: ' Mind what I ſay, you have not written that ' piece: Aubery is the author of it, though he hath ' denied it at Bern againſt his conſcience. Leſcaille ' anſwered, it is a piece of my own compoſing, and ' Mr Aubery never ſaw it ſuch as it is: I do not ' deny that I have learned of him, and of others, ' ſome things that are in it. Beza ſaid, it is an ill ' piece. Leſcaille anſwered, I do not pretend that ' it is all good: if any one ſhews me by the word ' of GOD that there is any thing wrong in it, I will ' believe it. Beza went on and ſaid, Aubery has ' written an ill book, and you praiſe it. Leſcaille ' anſwered, I like very well what I underſtand in ' Mr Aubery's book; but I will neither approve nor ' condemned what I do not underſtand (23)'.

(17) The two others were Beza and la Faye.

(18) Melch. Adam. in vita Stuckii, pag. 771, Vitar. Theol. German. Obſerve that he places this in the year 1578; but in Beza's Life, pag. 229, where he relates the ſame thing, he puts 1588. See concerning this, the text of the article BEZA.

(19) In the remark [E] of the article HUNNIUS.

(20) Melch. Adam. in vitis Theolog. Germ. pag. 771.

(21) La doctrine ancienne du premier, deuxieme, troiſiéme & dernier Jugement, ... par A. L. PDDGGH. pag. 50, 51.

(22) Ib. p. 27.

(23) Ibid. pag. 92, 93.

[(§ β) The Citadin of Geneva pag. 42, makes mention of the name of John Baptiſt Rotan an Italian, as being written in letters of gold, amongſt the miniſters that were moſt renowned for their underſtanding in Divinity, in the regiſter of the academy of Geneva. REM CRIT.]

[F] Maimbourg deſerves to be criticized.] Theſe are his words. ' What have they not ſaid to diſhonour ' the memory of Sponde (Spondanus) lieutenant-general ' at Rochelle, Salette counſellor to the king of Na- ' varre, Morlas counſellor of ſtate, and ſuper-intendant ' of the magazines of France, du Fay, Clairville, ' Rohan, and a hundred others of their moſt famous ' miniſters, who having been very honeſt men, whilſt ' they lived amongſt them, and the moſt conſiderable ' perſons of their conſiſtory, are become all of a ' ſudden by a very ſtrange change profligate wretches, ' and the worſt of men, for having abjured Calviniſm ' (24).' He ſuppoſes in this paſſage, 1. That du Fay was a miniſter. 2. That there was a miniſter called Rohan (25). 3. That thoſe two pretended miniſters made an abjuration of the reformed religion. Which is all falſe. They were looked upon as falſe brethren; but it does not appear that Rotan and du Fay died real and profeſſed Papiſts. See the notes upon the Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci, pag. 357. and 358. of the edition of 1699.

(24) Maimbourg, preface of the Hiſtory of the League.

(25) He was deceived by an error of the preſs, which crept into the Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci.

ROTTERDAM, is one of the moſt conſiderable cities in Holland. It ſtands upon the Maeſe, very convenient for trade. There is no doubt that it took its name from its ſituation at the mouth of the Rotte (a). It is not known at what time it began to be built, but it is well known that about the year 1270. It was erected into a city; for it was ſurrounded with ramparts, and endowed with privileges (b). Nothing has made it more famous than its being the place, where the Great Eraſmus was born [A]: a glory, to which it has not been inſenſible; for the inhabitants of their city took

(a) It is the name of a River.

(b) Boxhornius, Theatr. Holland. pag. m. 281.

[A] Nothing has made it more famous than its being the place where the Great Eraſmus was born.] If Homer had been as much eſteemed in his life time, as he was after his death, many cities would have aſpired in vain to the glory of having produced him; for the city, which had really that advantage, would have given undeniable proofs of it, before the length of time could have afforded any other town matter to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

took care to honour the memory of that great man [B], from whom it received so great a lustre to contend about it. This is the reason why there are no disputes about the place where Erasmus was born: the great reputation he acquired during his life has prevented such disputes. The city of Rotterdam was early sensible of the glory, that accrued to it from being the birth place of Erasmus. Whilst things were fresh in mens memory, they took care to prevent their being deprived of it, and to make the thing unquestionable. There was a necessity for them to think early of it, for such a birth as that of Erasmus might in time have been covered with a thick darkness, since his mother, a woman of a mean extraction, went to Rotterdam with a design to conceal the birth of her child. As for his conception, the city of Tergow lays a just claim to it, and looks upon it as no small advantage. What would it be if that conception was not stained by a double original sin, or rather by an actual sin besides the original? A Burgo-master (1) of this town undertook to prove that Erasmus was born in it, and only bred at Rotterdam. But it is to no purpose for him to maintain such a thing; the contrary appears from the registers of the convent of Stein, and every body believes that Erasmus was born at Rotterdam and not at Tergow. We find these words in a letter of the Burgo-masters and counsellors of Tergow, inserted in Guicciardin's description of the Low-Countries translated from the Italian (2). 'Orientundus etiam hac urbe magnus ille Desiderius Erasmus, Goudæ enim conceptus & utero gestatus, ROTERODAMI (quo cum ad pariendum vicina esset mater se certa de causa contulerat) IN LUCEM EDITUS EST. - - - - - - - The great Erasmus was originally of this town, for his mother having conceived and gone with child of him at Tergow, HE WAS BORN AT ROTTERDAM, to which place his mother had, for certain reasons, gone when she was near the time of her delivery.' They shew in the library of Tergow a head of Erasmus, which may be looked upon as a public monument of their not believing that he was born there; for the inscription, that is about that head, imports that he was conceived at Tergow and born at Rotterdam. Mr Almeloveen has renewed the dispute of those two towns by a curious incident (3): he pretends that Erasmus is rather a citizen of Tergow than of Rotterdam, because according to the laws, a place where a child happens to be born by chance, is not accounted his country. If a woman being upon a journey is brought to bed in a town, if she does not design to settle there, and makes her abode in another place, her child is not accounted a citizen of that town, and the place where his parents are settled is looked upon as his country. At this rate Erasmus should rather be called Goudanus than Roterodamus; for his father and mother lived at Tergow: and if his mother did not lie-in at Tergow but at Rotterdam, it was a meer accidental thing. She absconded to save her honour, and went to a neighbouring town only for some days to lie-in privately (4).

I shall observe, by the by, that some French authors, grounded upon an antiquated right, I mean the ancient Geography, and the old division of Gaul mentioned in Julius Cæsar's Commentaries, would ascribe the honour of Erasmus's birth to their nation. Robert Cenalis (5) bishop of Avranches said positively that France is Erasmus's native country, and that it is very much obliged to him, utpote homini in Gallia nato. Erasmus favoured this pretension; for he said sometimes that Gaul was his native country (6), and looked upon the learning of Budæus, a French man, as a thing very glorious to his own country. Some Germans were jealous of this concession, and humbly begged of Erasmus not to suffer that the French should engross him to themselves. Ne patiar ut Gallia sibi me asserat, sed ingenue fatear Bataviam esse Germaniæ partem, videlicet ne tanta gloria fraudetur (7). His answer, which is full of affection to the sciences, and very modest, is to this effect, that he was born upon the borders of Gaul and Germany, but somewhat nearer the former than the latter. An Batavus sim non mihi satis constat. Hollandum esse me negare non possum, ea in parte natum ut si Cosmographorum picturis credimus magis vergat ad Galliam quàm ad Germaniam, quamquam extra controversiam est tota eam regionem in confinio Galliæ Germaniæque esse. Hence it is, that in another letter (8), he neither says that he is a French-man, nor denies it; looking upon it as a problematical thing. Gallum esse me nec asseverо, nec inficior, sic natus ut Gallus ne an Germanus sim anceps haberi possit.

[B] . . . . The inhabitants of that city took care to honour the memory of that great man.] The city of Rotterdam ordered, 1. That the house wherein Erasmus was born, should be adorned with an inscription, whereby all the inhabitants, and all foreigners, might be informed of such a glorious prerogative. 2. That the college, wherein Latin, Greek, and Rhetoric are taught, should be called Erasmus's college, and consecrated to him by an inscription upon the frontispiece. 3. That a wooden statue should be erected to him in the year 1549. Another statue of stone was put in its place in the year 1557. The Spaniards having overthrown it in 1572, the inhabitans set it up again (9), as soon as they were freed from their tyranny; and at last a brasen one (10), was erected in the 1622, which is admired by good judges. It stands in the great place of the city, near a canal, upon a pedestal, adorned with inscriptions, and surrounded with iron rails. Thus those several statues were made by degrees of a more valuable matter; wherein Erasmus was dealt with as the deities of Ancient Rome: for not only the offerings of private persons were at first none of the most considerable,

Nunc te marmoreum pro tempore fecimus: at tu
Si fœtura gregem suppleverit aureus esto (11);

But if the falling lambs increase my fold,
Thy marble statue shall be turn'd to gold;

but also those of whole towns and nations were made in the beginning with mean and common things,

Fictilibus crevere diis hæc aurea templa (12).

To earthen gods they golden temples rais'd.

Travellers commonly speak of the statue of Erasmus, when they publish an account of what they have seen in the United Provinces. Mr Joli, a canon of Paris, having mentioned that statue, and the house wherein Erasmus was born (13), adds, that the great reputation of that man makes those two things, which are little of themselves, the most considerable of the town; tho' they cannot be said to be little and inconsiderable, since Sebastian Munster tell us in his Cosmography (14), that Philip, king of Spain, son to the emperor Charles V, being come to Rotterdam, in the month of Semptember, of the year 1,545 (15), that statue was erected upon the account of his arrival, and that some verses made in his honour, were put into the hands of Erasmus, to be presented to him (16); which being done, the king, Mary queen of Hungary, and all the princes, who accompanied them, out of love for the memory of so great a man, went, and visited with respect, the house and the chamber where he was born. Mr Monconis (17) says not so much of it, being contented to observe the posture of the statue, and to set down the inscriptions of the little house; he says, That Erasmus invented the use of turf (18), and sails to serve for all winds, as those of barks and yachts: which does not seem to me to be more true, than what he had said before, that the Schelde and the Rhine being united, pass by the city of Rotterdam, and encompassing part of it, run also into the city by two large canals. But Mr Bullart (19) confirms the passage, which I have quoted out of Mr Joli; for he says, that Philip II made a solemn entry into the town of Rotterdam, as being the sovereign prince of the Low-Countries, the Senate caused the statue of Erasmus to be placed, as their greatest ornament, over-against the house where he was born, dressed in his Ecclesiastical habit, holding a pen in his right hand, and presenting to the prince with the left a paper, with these words in it.

(1) He was a Physician called Reynerus Sneyus, (See the Journal des Sçavans 1690, pag. 540.) He put out several books, and had very good employments. He had been Erasmus's friend. Vel. Andreas Desselius Bibliotheque Belgica, pag. 175. says, that he has read in the record of the monastery of Stein, where Erasmus lived several years, what Sneyus said.

(2) Pag. m. 294, edid. Arnhem. 1616.

(3) In his Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ, pag. 40, & seq. Edit. Amstel. 1694.

(4) See the letter of a Civilian called Mr Cofterus, written to Mr Almeloveen, upon this subject, and inserted in the Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ.

A DISPUTE between Germany and France, about Erasmus.

(5) Histor. Galliæ, lib. i, fol. 30, 39, 40.

(6) Et pristinam illam laudem nostræ asseras Galliæ. Nihil enim vetat eumdem ditione Germanum esse, & veterum Cosmographorum descriptione Gallum. Erasmus, Ep. VII. lib. xi.

(7) Idem. Epist. XLIII, lib. xiii.

(8) Epist. XVIII, lib. vi.

(9) Verheiden says in his Elogies, that the Spanish soldiers, who were in garrison at Rotterdam, did not commit these outrages, till after they were exasperated by the invectives which a Friar of their nation preached against Erasmus; and that the magistrates did not erect the same statue again, but had another made.

(10) Quenstedt, de Patr. illustrium. viror. pag. 121, is mistaken, when he says it is of marble.

(11) Virgil. Eclog. VII, ver. 35.

(12) Propert. lib. iv, Eleg. I, ver. 5.

(13) Voiage de Munster, p. 145.

(14) Lib. ii, cap. iv.

(15) It is a fault; it should be 1549.

(16) Fuit, says Munster, imago Erasmi ad vivum expressa, adventi (Philippo) opposita, quæ exerto brachio gratulatorium carmen Principi offerebat.

(17) Voyage, Part ii, pag. 129, 130. All those faults of Monconis are found in a book printed in 1692, intituled Theatro Belgico. See the place that relates to Rotterdam.

(18) Æneas Silvius mentions the turf in a book which he published in 1458. See Martinus Schoockius de Turffis, pag. 3.

(19) Acad. des Sciences, vol. ii, pag. 162.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a luſtre [C]. Rotterdam is the ſeat of the admiralty of the Maeſe.

Sereniſſimo Hiſpaniarum Principi D. Philippo à Burgundia Deſiderius Eraſmus Rotterodamus.

Rotterodamus ego non inficiabor Eraſmus
Ne videar cives deſeruiſſe meos.
Ipſorum inſtinctu, Princeps clariſſime, ſalvum
Ingreſſum precor ad limina noſtra tuum,
Atque hunc quo poſſum ſtudio, commendo popellum
Maxime præſidiis Cæſare nate tuis.
Te Dominum agnoſcunt omnes, te Principe gaudent,
Nec quiquam toto charius orbe tenent.

To the moſt ſerene prince D. Philip of Burgundy, Deſiderius Eraſmus of Rotterdam.

Eraſmus I, of Rotterdam, am call'd:
My country's welfare ſtill employs my care.
Great ſon of Cæſar, in the people's name
I bid thee welcome to the Belgic land,
Which flies to thee for ſhelter and defence.
Thee all acknowledge as their lawful prince,
And pay a joyful homage to thy pow'r.

Obſerve that Mr Joli might have quoted, upon this occaſion, a more authentic author than Sebaſtian Munſter; for he might have quoted the Spaniſh relation of the journey of Don Philip prince of Spain, written by Juan Chriſtoval Caluete de Eſtrella. You may alſo obſerve, that, in the year 1672, the mob having made an inſurrection in moſt towns of the province of Holland, Rotterdam was, for ſome days, at the diſcretion of the rabble, and during that anarchy, the ſtatue of Eraſmus was removed from it's place, as a thing that favoured of Popery. The mob carried it into a public houſe, and took into conſideration whether it ſhould not be melted down. The magiſtrates of Baſil did no ſooner hear of it, but they ordered ſome Merchants of their town to deſire their correſpondent in Rotterdam, to buy that ſtatue at a certain price. The correſpondent went upon a bargain, and might have had it, had it not been for a ſmall difference in the price. He gave an account of his commiſſion, and received a new order to give the magiſtrates of Rotterdam the full of what they demanded; but in that interval of time, they had changed their mind, and reſolved neither to ſell nor to melt down that ſtatue, but to ſet it up again in the ſame place; which they did ſome time after. The Merchant, who had a commiſſion to buy it for the magiſtrates of Baſil, gave me this account within theſe two days (20).

[C] . . . From whom it received ſo great a luſtre.] Moſt of thoſe who write concerning Eraſmus's life, take notice of the glory he has procured to his native country. Du Verdier Vau-Privas (21), and Bullart (22), begin with an encomium upon that youth of Rotterdam. The words of Rhenanus upon this occaſion, are too fine not to be inſerted in this place. 'Natus eſt, 'ſays he, ſpeaking to the emperor Charles V (23), ab avi 'tui Friderici III. Aug. primis Imperii annis ad 'quintum Calend. Novembris, Roterodami in Hol- 'landia tua inferioris Germaniæ Provincia, quam olim 'Batavi poſſederunt, nunc magis notam ſtudioſis om- 'nibus ob unius indigenæ Eraſmi incunabula, quàm 'veterum incolarum memoria quamlibet bellico robore 'præſtantium. Hoc alumno Roterodamum oppidum ſe 'ſemper jactabit, & doctis erit commendatum. - - - He 'was born about the beginning of the reign of your glo- 'rious anceſtor Frederic III, upon the 26th of October, 'at Rotterdam in Holland, your province of Lower Ger- 'many, which was of old poſſeſſed by the Batavi; but 'is now better known to the learned world, for being 'the birth-place of Eraſmus, who drew there his firſt 'breath, than by the renown for warlike proweſs of it's 'antient inhabitants. Upon which account the city of 'Rotterdam will ever glory, and be eſteemed by the 'learned.' I might quote many authors, who, in order to heighten the glory of Rotterdam, join theſe two things together; the one, that Eraſmus was born in it, and the other, that they have erected a ſtatue to him.

(20) I write this the 28th of July, 1699.

(21) Prolegom. Tom. III, pag. 2389.

(22) Acad. des Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 159.

(23) Epiſt. præfixa Operibus Eraſmi. See alſo Queniſtedt p. 111, of his Dialogus de patriis illuſtrium doctrina & ſcriptis virorum.

ROVENIUS (PHILIP) a titular archbiſhop of Philippe, and apoſtolical vicar in the United Provinces, was born at Deventer (a). He publiſhed ſeveral books, and one amongſt others, de Republica Chriſtiana, printed in the year 1648. I ſhall quote a paſſage out of it, to ſhew the ſtrange jargon of ſome devout women, which he does ſeverely condemn [A].

(a) Valerius Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 778.

[A] The ſtrange jargon of ſome devout women, which he does ſeverely condemn.] You may ſee in the following paſſage, what he ſays of ſome nuns, who affected ſome particular exerciſes of devotion and ſpirituality (1). 'Non raro etiam ſuperbiam aliquam conjunctam ha- 'bent, ut ambulent in magnis, & mirabilibus ſuper 'ſe, ut vileſcant illis ordinaria pietatis exercitia ap- 'probata ab Eccleſia, vel à Patribus commendata: 'nihil crepent niſi uniones cum Deo, cum uniantur 'proprio (ſi non pejori) ſpiritui: jactent tranſubſtan- 'tiationes myſticas, cordis concentrationes: poten- 'tiarum, imo omnis ſui eſſe, annihilationem, connu- 'bium eſſentiæ creatæ & Divinitatis: ſpirituale Sacra- 'mentum inſeparabilitatis, ſomnium omnium affe- 'ctionum, abſorptionem & liquefactionem in amplexu 'ſponſi, triplicem animæ hierarchiam, orationem in 'quiete paſſiva, ebrietatem ſpiritualem, cordis ſilen- 'tium, meditationes negativas, uniones ſupereſſentia- 'les, puteum & gurgitem annihilationis, amorem Dei- 'ficum, transformantem, unientem, ſtringentem, am- 'plexantem, ſuavitatem cor auferentem, ſugentem 'ſponſi ubera, ruminantem collum, abſorbentem en- 'thuſiaſmum, inſenſibilitatem & oblivionem omnium 'inducentem abyſſalem cum Deo identificationem, 'conſricationem Deificam, incendentem & conſumen- 'tem cor: elevationem ad ſuavitatem cœleſtem, ex 'infernali languore, introverſionem ſuper cœleſtem, 'caliginem & umbram Dei, allocutiones internas, 'elevationes incognitas, extentiones & applicationes 'amoroſas, animæ ſuſpenſiones, deliquium, ſuſpiria, 'mortem ſenſuum & omnium affectuum, ecſtaſim con- 'tinuam, juſtitium ratiocinii, cordis contactum & pa- 'tefactionem, liquefactionem, influxum, inflamma- 'tionem, aſſultus qui ferri nequeant, penetrationes 'ad intima, vulnerationes, conſtrictiones, alligationes 'inſeparabiles, aſpectus penetrantes & oblectantes, 'voces tremulas, murmura columbina, guſtus ſuavi- 'ſimos, odores gratiſſimos, auditus melodiæ cœleſtis, hy- 'permyſticas Dei & animæ perichoreſes, impudentiam, 'ſpiritualem, aſpirationes Myſanthropicas, ignem ſine 'carbone, flammam ſine corpore, holocauſtum meri- 'dianum in viſcerali & medullari penetrabilitate, conta- 'ctum mirabilem & ſuaviſſimum, obſcuræ noctis gaudia '& caliginem. Hæc & ſimilia ſeſquipedalia verba in 'nova pietatis ſchola inter ſponte electos Magiſtros, & 'diſcipulas curioſas, adeo frequenter tenero proferuntur 'palato, ut intimis in viſceribus ſentiantur (2). - - - - They often alſo take a ſort of pride, in pretending to the 'performance of things great and wonderful, beyond their 'ability, ſo as to deſpiſe the uſual exerciſes of piety ap- 'proved by the church, or recommended by the Fathers: 'they talk of nothing leſs than their union with God, 'which is only with their own ſpirit, if not with a 'worſe. They boaſt of myſtical tranſubſtantiations, concen- 'trations of heart, annihilation of powers, yea, of all 'their being, marriage of the created eſſence with the 'Deity, the ſpiritual ſacrament of inſeparability, the 'dream of all the affections, abſorption, and diſſolution in 'the embrace of the ſpouſe, a triple hierarchy of the 'ſoul, prayer in paſſive quietude, ſpiritual intoxications, 'ſilence of heart, the negative meditations, ſupereſſen- 'tial unions, the pit and gulph of annihilation, deifying 'love, transforming, uniting, preſſing, embracing, a ſweet- 'neſs raviſhing the ſoul, ſucking the breaſts of the ſpouſe, 'a ruminating neck, an abſorbent enthuſiaſm, inſenſibility 'and oblivion of all things inducing an abyſſal identi- 'fication

(1) Philip. Rovenius, de Republ. Chriſtiana, lib. I, cap. xliii. pag. 278.

(2) Dr Stillingfleet hath gathered out of the myſtical authors ſome ſuch phraſes. See his Treatiſe of the Fanaticiſm of the Romiſh church, pag. m. 240, 307, & ſeq. See alſo the Eleventh remark in [K] of the article BRACHMANS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'fication with God, deific confrication, inflaming and 'conſuming the heart; an elevation to a celeſtial ſweet-'neſs from an infernal languiſhing, ſuperceleſtial introver-'ſion, darkneſs and ſhade of God, inward allocutions, 'unknown elevations, amorous extenſions and applica-'tions, ſuſpenſions of the ſoul, ſwooning, groans, death 'of all the ſenſes and affections, perpetual extaſy, ceſſa-'tion of reaſoning, contact and opening of heart, lique-'faction, influx, inflammation, inſupportable aſſaults, 'thorough penetrations, woundings, up-bindings, inſepa-'rable alligations, penetrating and delighting looks, 'warbling ſounds, dove-like murmurs, ſweeteſt taſtes, 'moſt pleaſant odours, heavenly melodious ſounds, ſupermyſti-'cal walks of God and the ſoul, ſpiritual impudence, 'myſanthropical aſpirations, fire without coal, flame 'without a body, meridian holocauſt in a viſceral, and 'medullar penetrability; admirable and moſt delightful 'contact, joys and darkneſs of obſcure night. Theſe and 'the like enormous words, and this unintelligible jargon, 'is frequently repeated in the new ſchool of piety by their 'own choſen maſters and inquiſitive ſhe-diſciples with 'faint and trembling voice.'

RUA (PETER), a learned Spaniard, who taught Philology at Soria, the place of his birth [A], lived in the XVIth century. He publiſhed three very learned and curious letters (a) againſt Antony de Guevara, wherein he confuted a vaſt number of falſities publiſhed by that author, and the ridiculous ſhift that he made uſe of. This you may ſee in a paſſage of Andreas Schottus which I quote [B]. Moreri has committed a very great blunder [C].

(a) Intituled, Cartas del Bachiller Rua. Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſpan. Tom. ii, p. 187.

[A] At Soria, the place of his birth.] One would think, at firſt ſight, that Andreas Schottus, and Don Nicolas Antonio do not agree. The one ſays, 'Petrus 'Rhua Numantinus primum Abulæ, poſt Numantiæ 'in patria annos plurimos ad extremam uſque ætatem 'bonas litteras docuit (1). - - - - Peter Rua of Numan-'tia taught the Belles Lettres firſt at Abula, and 'after at Numantia, in his country, many years, to an 'extream old age.' And the other, 'Petrus Rua, So-'rienſis, Abulæ primum, mox in patria urbe juven-'tutem humanioribus imbuit literis ad extremam uſque 'ætatem (2). - - - Peter Rua, of Soria, firſt at Abula, 'and ſoon after in the town where he was born, inſtru-'cted the youth in human learning to an extream old age. But at the bottom they ſay the ſame thing. Soria, which was built near the ruins of Numantia, is called Numantia by ſome, and, amongſt others, by Andreas Schottus.

(1) Andr. Schottus, Biblioth. Hiſpan. p. 567.

(2) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Scriptor. Hiſpan. Tom. ii, pag. 187.

[B] This may be ſeen in a paſſage of Andreas Schottus.] Here it is. 'In quo egregie verſatum fuiſſe 'teſtantur epiſt. 3. Hiſpanicè ſcriptæ eruditionis plenæ, '& Humanitatis ſatis copioſæ: quibus Ant. Guevarræ '(qui tum ſolus doctrinæ, & eloquentiæ arcem tenere 'videbatur) errores, mendaciaque in hiſtoriis antiquo-'rum, veteribuſque monumentis lapidum, & num-'morum explicandis, egregie refellit. Valde ut mirer 'Gallos, Guevarræ epiſtolas converſas Aureo titulo de-'coraſſe, manibuſque ita tenere ſolitos, ut pro oracu-'lis circumferant, quæ tot mendaciis, quot verſibus 'ſcatere dicantur. RUA itaque de tot millibus multa 'indicavit, facemque prætulit, ne quis poſthac credulus 'in errorem induceretur. Epiſt. 1. numiſmatum in-'ſcriptiones, & confinxiſſe, & ridicule explicaſſe, in 'Chronologia & magiſtratuum dignitate turpiter hal-'lucinatum. Epiſt. 2. erraſſe in hiſtoria Rom. tem-'porum ratione, locorumque nominibus, ſolenne illud 'ſuum ſervando, audacter ut omnia pronunciet, quaſi 'poſteris imponere volens, aut credens omnes ei te-'mere aſſenſuros audito illo Pythagoreorum αὐτὸς ἔφα, 'cornicum oculos confixit, citans indentidem, & pro-'digioſa nomina propria hiſtoricorum, cudenſque 'arbitratu ſuo, ad hanc diem inaudita. De numiſ-'matis inepta & ridicula leges; ut & de legibus Rom. '& legum auctorib. de lege Julia Poppæa, Cornelia, 'Falcidia, aliiſque: de medicina & empirica. Ter-'tia epiſtola ut mole ſua ita rerum pondere ceteris 'major eſt. Cum enim Guevarra omnem antiquitati 'fidem derogare niteretur, epiſtola quadam, quo ficta 'mendacia tegeret, velaret, vel tueretur; cum à ſacris 'litteris diſceſſeris, omnia incerta fabuliſque plena 'affirmat. Refellit virum diſertè RUA ex Athena-'goræ apologia pro Chriſtianis, & hoc eſſe omnem 'artium tractationem, fidemque ut ſocietatis humanæ, 'ita & ſcientiarum vinculum è medio tollere (3). - - - (3) Andr. Schottus, ubi ſupra.

'That he was very ſkillful therein appears from three 'letters he wrote in Spaniſh, full of learning: wherein 'he excellently confutes the errors and falſhoods of Anto-'nius Guevara, (who then ſeemed to be the only maſter 'of learning and eloquence) with reſpect to antient hiſto-'ries, and inſcriptions of ſtones and coins. And I cannot 'but think it ſtrange, that the French ſhould have 'adorned the tranſlation of Guevara's epiſtles, with 'a golden title, and carry them about as oracles, in 'which there are as many errors as lines. Wherefore RUA 'of ſo many thouſands has mentioned ſeveral, that hence-'forth none may by their credulity be led into error. 'He has ſhewed, that in his firſt epiſtle he hath both 'feigned, and ridiculouſly explained inſcriptions of coins, 'and is ſhamefully miſtaken in the chronology and promo-'tion of magiſtrates. In his ſecond epiſtle he hath erred 'in Roman hiſtory, with reſpect to times, and names of 'places, obſerving his uſual cuſtom, of boldly aſſerting, as 'if deſirous to impoſe on poſterity, or thinking all would 'believe him upon his word, often quoting, and feigning 'at pleaſure, ſtrange names of Hiſtorians unheard of to 'this day. You ſhall find things fooliſh and ridiculous 'concerning coins, as alſo concerning Roman laws, and 'their authors, of the Julian, Poppæan, Cornelian, 'Falcidian, and others. His third epiſtle is greater both 'in bulk and the importance of it's ſubject: For Guevara, 'endeavouring to aboliſh the credit and authority of an-'tiquity, in a certain epiſtle, in order to cover, conceal, 'or maintain, his forged lies, affirms, that, except the 'Scriptures, all is uncertain, and full of fables. RUA 'does fully confute him out of Athenagoras's apology for 'the Chriſtians, ſhewing that this would deſtroy all be-'lief of the foundation of human ſociety and ſcience.' This is a curious ſupplement to the article Guevara.

[C] Moreri has committed a very great blunder.] He ſays, Peter Rua wrote a treatiſe De Lege Julia, Poppæa, Cornelia, Falcidia, &c. de Medicina & Empyrica; and he quotes Father Schottus's book for it. What a horrid blunder is this! Does not that Father clearly ſay, not that Rua wrote a treatiſe upon thoſe ſubjects, but that the deſign of his ſecond letter was to ſhew the falſities of Guevara upon ſeveral other matters, and particularly upon theſe? Beſides, the Lex Julia, and the Lex Poppæa, are not two laws, but one and the ſame law. Father Schottus ſhews that plainly enough; he puts no comma between Julia and Poppæa.

RUARUS (MARTIN) a Socinian miniſter, was born at Krempen (a) in Germany. He was infected with the Socinian Hereſies by Erneſtus Sonerus, profeſſor at Altdorf, who taught them privately. He grew ſo fond of them, that he choſe rather to loſe his patrimonial eſtate than to renounce that ſect. He was eſteemed both at home and abroad for his judgment, learning, and good life (b). He was made rector of the college of Racovia, and then miniſter of the Socinians at Dantzic, both in the town, and in the borough of Straſſin, and he died in that office, in the year 1657 (c), being ſeventy years old (d). He was already poſſeſſed of it in the year 1635, as it appears from the

(a) A town in the country of Holſtein. (b) Ob eruditionis, judiciique præſtantiam, morumque integritatem, in magno & apud iſtos & alios eruditos fuit pretio. Mollerus Iſagoge ad Hiſt. Cherſonefi Cimbricæ, Part. iii, pag. 106.
(c) Id. ibid. (d) Sandius in Biblioth. Antitrinit. pag. 114.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the travels of James (§ α) Ogier [A]. He wrote some pieces, which have been printed [B]. The famous Calixtus left no stone unturned to convert him, during the conference of Thorn in the year 1646, but he could not prevail with him (e).

(e) Nulli ut popularem hunc suum in viam revocaret, pepercit operæ, sed pertinaciam ejus superare non potuit. Mollerus, ubi supra, pag. 107.

[(§ α) It should be Charles Ogier, as Mr Bayle here calls him in the marginal citation (1); and the remark [Q] of the article ULEFELD. Here is the whole title of those travels: Caroli Ogerii Ephemerides, sive Iter Danicum, Suecicum, Polonicum, cum esset in comitatu Illustriss. Claudii Memmii, Comitis Avauxii, ad Septentrionis Reges extraordinarii Legati. Lutetiæ Parisiorum, apud Petrum Le Petit 1636, in 8vo. He hath been called Ogier the Dane, because of his voyage to Denmark. His brother, the Prior Ogier, was called Francis. REM CRIT.]

[A] From the travels of James Ogier.] That author was at Dantzic in 1635, in the retinue of count d'Avaux, ambassador of his most Christian majesty. He says, that being in a Bookseller's shop, one Ruardus, (he should have said Ruarus) came to him, with whom he discoursed in Latin for two hours, and then in French. 'Aggressus me est quidam N. Ruardus, 'quocum per duas horas collocutus sum Latinè, ac deinde Gallice, qui me ad ædes suas adeundas invitabit. Didici postea ab aliquo, eum esse Arianorum Pastorem: sunt quippe Gedani hujusmodi homines, qui clam congregantur, inscio vel dissimulante Senatu (1). - - - - I was accosted by one N. Ruardus, with whom I discoursed in Latin about two hours, and then in French, who gave me an invitation to his house. I understood afterwards from a certain person, that he was the minister of the Arians; for at Dantzic there are such persons, who meet privately, either without the knowledge, or by the connivance, of the senate.'

(1) Carol. Ogerius, in itinere Polonico, p. 418, 419.

[B] He writ some pieces.] He writ some notes upon the Catechism of the Socinian churches of Poland, which were printed in the edition of that Catechism published in 1665. They are also to be found in the edition of 1680. He made some other notes upon the same work; which have not been published (2). There are two centuries of his letters: the first was printed at Amsterdam for DAVID RUARUS, the author's son, in 1677, with a preface of JOACHIM RUARUS, David's brother. The second was published in 1681, for the same David, who added a preface to it. Those letters are very curious (3). Some took him to be the author of the German translation of the New Testament, made at Racovia, and published in the year 1630 (4); but it is a mistake. 'Quos 'falli mihi constat, tum ex Sandio * illam Johann. 'Crellio & Joach. Stegmanno Seniori vindicante, tum 'ex indicio Filii, quem noster reliquit, cognominis, 'Amstelodami viventis, à quo, adornatam eam credi 'à Christoph. Ostorodo ac συνέργοις aliquot, revisam 'autem esse à tota Societate, & in hac parente suo, 'ac præfationem tandem à Crellio adjectam, A. 1684 'sum edoctus (5). - - - Whom I know to be mistaken, both from Sandius's ascribing it to John Crellius, and Joach. Stegmannus, senior, as also by the declaration of his son of the same name living at Amsterdam, of whom I understood that it was believed to have been prepared by Christopher Ostorodus, and others assisting him, but revised by all the society, and amongst them his father, and that at last a preface was added by Crellius, in the year 1684.'

(2) Taken from Sandius in Biblioth. Antitrinit. pag. 114.

(3) Erudite & lectu dignissimæ, Mollerus, Itinerar. ad Hist. Cherson. Cimbricæ, Part. iii, p. 107. See Morhof, Polyhist. cap. xxxv, pag. 300.

(4) See Matth. Zimmermanni Dissert. inaug. de acceptilatione, pag. 27, 31, apud Mollerum, ibid.

(5) Mollerus, ibid.

* In Biblioth. Antitrin. pag. 94, 116, 133.

RUBENUS (LEONARD) a native of Essen (a) in Germany, entred into the order of St Benedict at Cologn the eleventh of July 1596 (b). He had for several years resided in Livonia, Lithuania, and Transylvania, for promoting the interests of the Romish religion. He was in Transylvania in the year 1588, and he there published theses concerning idolatry, and dedicated them to prince Sigismund Battori. He proposed them at a public disputation, but no one would undertake to impugn them. He was desired in several places to print a second edition, and that was the cause he took that subject again into consideration, and treated on it more at large (c), from whence proceeded a book of 327 pages which he printed at Cologn in the year 1597. He relates a thing which shews that Livonia was still infected with Heathenish idolatry [A]. Mr Konig knew nothing of this author, save that he undertook to write a book de falsis Prophetis in the year 1600 (d).

(a) A small town three miles from the Rhine and from Duisburg.

(b) See the Epistle Dedicatory of his treatise de Idololatria.

(c) See his Advertisement to the reader.

(d) You may see in the Catalogue of Oxford, a book of Leonardus Rubenus, de falsis Prophetis & Lapis reprobis, printed at Paderborn in 8vo, in the year 1606.

[A] He relates a thing which shews that Livonia was still infected with heathenish idolatry.] Having received an order from his superiors to go to Dorpat, which is almost the outmost town of Livonia, in his way he passed through the sacred woods of the Esthonians. He saw there a pine-tree of an extraordinary height and bigness, the branches whereof were full of divers pieces of old cloth, and its roots covered with many bundles of straw and hay. He asked a man of the neighbourhood what was the meaning of it, he answered that the inhabitants adored that tree, and that the women after a safe delivery brought thither these bundles of hay; that they had also a custom to offer at a certain time a tun of beer, and to throw a tun of it into the lake of Mariemburg, when it thundred, and that they thought the thunder was the Son of GOD, and that he was appeased by the effusion of that liquor. He desired they would bring him a good hatchet, for that which he had in his chariot was not sharp; and when they asked him what he designed to do with it, I will shew you, said he, the weakness of what you worship. The Esthonians replied, that they could not do what he desired without the utmost danger, and cried to him to take care of going under the tree, and if he did, both he and his chariot would be taken up into the air. However he made his horses go under it; and taking his hatchet, in a devout manner, he cut the figure of a cross on the pine, and left that figure made by a man, whom they honoured with the appellation of the great temple of GOD, should increase their superstition, he cut a gibbet on the same tree, and, in derision, said, behold your GOD (1).

(1) Taken from Rubenus, lib. i, de Idololatria, cap. xxiii, p. 66.

RUCELLAI (JOHN), a noble Florentine and good Poet, lived in the XVIth century. I have elsewhere said (a) that he composed in the year 1524 at Rome a Poem intituled le Api, to which I now add that he was at that time governor of the castle St Angelo, and that PALLA RUCELLAI, his brother, caused that Poem to be printed at Florence in the year 1539 in 8vo, and dedicated it to Giovani Giorgio Trissino, author of the Italia liberata da Goti, which was printed at Rome in the year 1547. John Ruccellai composed also a tragedy intituled Oreste. Leo Allazzi makes mention of it in page 605 of his Drammaturgia (b).

(a) In the remark [E] of the article ORICELLARIUS, at the end.

(b) Taken from the Biblioteca Aprosiana, pag. 458, 459.

RUFFI

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

RUFFI (ANTONY DE) counſellor in the ſeneſchal's court of Marſeilles, where he was born, diſcharged the duties of his office with great integrity, and a ſingular tenderneſs of conſcience. Beſides, he applyed himſelf to Hiſtorical inquiries with a wonderful diligence and patience, as it appears from his Hiſtory of Marſeilles, printed in 1642, and re-printed with large additions in the year 1696, in two volumes, in folio (a). He was but thirty-five years of age, when it came out the firſt time. An office of counſellor of ſtate was beſtowed upon him in 1654, as a teſtimony of the eſteem they had for his learning and merit. I ſhall alledge an inſtance of the tenderneſs of his conſcience [A], which will give me occaſion to debate a queſtion concerning the ignorance, that excuſeth from ſin, and to examine the anſwers that may be made to the compariſons taken from Judges

(a) See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, June 1697.

[A] The tenderneſs of his conſcience.] This appears 'from the reſtitution he made to a perſon, whoſe 'cauſe he had reported. He was afraid he had not 'beſtowed a ſufficient time upon the examination of 'that cauſe, and that he had contributed to the loſs 'of it by his careleſſneſs; and he was ſo far from 'ſeeking any excuſes or reaſons, which ſelf-love never 'fails to ſuggeſt in ſuch caſes, that he ſeverely con'demned himſelf, and made uſe of a prieſt of the 'Oratory to reſtore the ſum which that perſon had 'loſt. Perhaps it may be ſaid that the niceneſs of 'the Judge proved more favourable to the perſon con'cerned, than a more ſevere and ſtrict examination of 'his right and defences would have been. Moreover 'this great probity was authentically acknowledged 'by the parliament of Provence, in an arrêt given 'in the year 1655, at the ſuit of the king's attorney'general.' This is what we find in the elogy of Mr de Ruffi (1) immediately after theſe words: Whenever he ſat upon the bench, his mind was taken up with the deſcription of that court of juſtice mentioned by the royal prophet in one of his Pſalms: GOD is preſent in the aſſembly of the gods; being in the middle of them, he judges them; ſtetit in ſynagoga Deorum, in medio autem Deos dijudicat: being poſſeſſed with the ſentiments, that ſuch a thought can inſpire, he weighed every thing in the balance of the ſanctuary: the ſentiments inſpired by fleſh and blood, the dangerous ſeductions of friendſhip, and the power of intereſt never made him ſwerve from the path of juſtice; he omitted nothing to be informed of the truth: his firmneſs in protecting innocency, and puniſhing wickedneſs was as great as his penetration; and he never gave his opinion, nor pronounced a ſentence, without ſeriouſly conſidering whether he could maintain it before the tribunal of that impartial majeſty, who is at the laſt day to judge the righteouſneſs of men.

(1) It is prefixed to the ſecond edition of the Hiſtory of Marſeilles.

OBSERVATIONS concerning ignorance that will excuſe.

It was not a needleſs thing for me to obſerve that theſe words are to be found immediately before thoſe, wherein it is ſaid, that he reſtored a certain ſum to a perſon who had loſt his cauſe. This will give me occaſion to make an important reflexion. The author of the elogy means without doubt, that Mr de Ruffi had examined the cauſe with his uſual exactneſs; but that his too great tenderneſs made him fear that he had been a little careleſs. This author, I ſay, does certainly give us to underſtand that the ſcruples of that Judge were grounded upon the informations he had received ſince the cauſe had been judged. In a word, the thing ought to be underſtood in this manner. The Judge who reported his cauſe uſed therein all his knowledge, all diligence and integrity; but after it had been decided, he found out, I do not know how, that the party who had been caſt, had a better right than he thought. He therefore came to think that if he had more carefully examined all the writings, he would have made a more favourable report, and thereupon he condemned himſelf, and believed himſelf obliged to make a reſtitution. This ſhews that he had a very tender and ſcrupulous conſcience; which could not be ſaid of him, ſhould we ſuppoſe that he was ſenſible of an affected careleſſneſs, and of ſome lazineſs and impatience. For in ſuch a caſe a man, who reports a cauſe, is certainly guilty; his ignorance cannot excuſe him: and though he feels ſome remorſe, it is not a proof of a tender conſcience; for a man may have a hard conſcience and yet be ſenſibly affected with ſuch inward remorſes. But I ſuppoſe by virtue of the expreſſions made uſe of by the elogiſt, that Mr de Ruffi could not blame himſelf for any ſuch thing. He ſincerely intended to make a very fair report; he neglected nothing that he thought neceſſary, and he knew that in many other cauſes the ſame application had been ſufficient. The only thing therefore that he blamed himſelf for, was his believing that he had done all that a good reporter ought to do, having found out at laſt that he might have reported the caſe better than he had done. Since he was uneaſy in his mind upon ſuch an account, he would have been uneaſy, though he had known that it was hardly poſſible, humanly ſpeaking, to do better, and that his ignorance was invincible. What I am going to ſay will ſhew you the reaſon, why I make theſe obſervations upon Mr de Ruffi's conduct.

Some pieces have been printed in Holland within theſe ten years (2) about the rights of an erroneous conſcience. The authors who have maintained that ignorance can be no excuſe, have inſtanced upon ſome holy men, who have been extremely afflicted for what they have done with a good intent, thinking to ſerve GOD, and who believed they ſtood in need of GOD's mercy, &c. Such examples, generally ſpeaking, prove nothing: for a man of a tender conſcience, and full of love for virtue, will grieve even for a fault that is purely material, I mean committed with an invincible ignorance. If a Phyſician ſhould come to know by Revelation, that the remedy he had preſcribed to a ſick perſon, had been the occaſion of his death, tho' according to all the rules of his art, he ought to have preſcribed it; he would heartily grieve for it, if he was a conſcientious and charitable man. He would make amends for it to the beſt of his power, by relieving the family of the deceaſed, reduced to great poverty by his death. And yet he would be very innocent before GOD; for I ſuppoſe that his ignorance was invincible, and ſuch as it ought to be, to excuſe a man according to the moſt rigid Divines (3). The ſame muſt be ſaid of a Judge who has occaſioned the loſs of a cauſe, when no human knowledge was able to diſcover the truth. He would certainly grieve, if he ſhould know that the party condemned was in the right; and would make up the damage if he was a man truly conſcientious and of a ſtrict virtue. The author of the encomium upon Mr de Ruffi, has given us an inſtance of it. Such a grief therefore and ſuch reparations ought not to be alledged, in order to prove, That an unaffected ignorance cannot excuſe a man. The more pious we are, the more we ſhall grieve for the material faults we have committed out of ignorance. The conſcience becomes then more ſevere than God himſelf, whether it be out of humility or precaution. A thouſand inſtances might be alledged to ſhew that an innocent man will grieve, make up a damage, reſtore, &c. If a good man hears that his horſe has lamed ſome body, is he not concerned for it? Does he not pay ſometimes the Surgeon, who takes care of the poor wretch? And if he be a man of a ſcrupulous conſcience, is he not afraid that GOD will call him to an account for his careleſsneſs, and for keeping ſuch a horſe? And yet all judicious Caſuiſts will acknowledge the innocency of that good man, if they know that his horſe has done ſuch a miſchief without any fault of his. If an Orator ſhould be at a ſtand, and by ſuch an involuntary misfortune ſhould prejudice his neighbour, would he not be exceedingly vexed at it? If he ſhould beg of GOD that he would forgive him, and if he went about to make up the damage, could we conclude from it that he has committed a ſin; and can we call that a moral fault, which is only a phyſical imperfection, as independent upon our reaſon and liberty, as the weakneſs of the eyes ſuddenly dazzled by too great a light? I ſuppoſe the Orator has neglected nothing that he thought neceſſary to make him remember his ſpeech. But let us keep to the ignorance of honeſt Judges.

(2) I write this in September, 1697.

(3) We have ſeen above in the remark [A] of the article RIMINI, that they acknowledge, properly ſpeaking, no invincible ignorance in religious matters; but they are not ſo rigid in relation to matters of fact, and human diſciplines.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Judges, whoſe ſentences are unjuſt contrary to their intention [B], or from Phyſicians, whoſe

The firſt preſident of the parliament of Paris, made a ſpeech at the opening of that court in 1693, wherein he repreſented, That though the Judges think they have done their beſt to have a full knowledge of a cauſe, yet ſometimes they commit an injuſtice, when they fancy they pronounce a very juſt ſentence, which has been ſeen in the late Mr de Langlade's caſe; for the Judges, notwithſtanding their great capacity, and the care they took to clear the matter, condemned an innocent man; for which they endeavoured to make amends by their arrêt (4). From whence it appears, That thoſe Judges, tho' honeſt and careful of their duty, were concerned for their miſtake, and made amends for it. If they had died, before they came to know that they were miſtaken, being conſcious to themſelves of having done their beſt to find out the truth, could they have feared any thing from the divine juſtice? Can it be ſaid that they were obliged to overcome ſuch obſtacles as were invincible with reſpect to them? See the author of the Commentaire Philoſophique (5), who has ſo fully proved, that in ſome caſes an innocent man may be condemned, and a guilty one acquitted without any ſin, that the learned miniſter of Utrecht who writ againſt him (6), left this doctrine untouched.

(4) Mercure Galant, for the month of November 1693, pag. 315.

(5) In the Supplement, p. 33, & ſeq. and pag. 62, & ſeq. to pag 81. See alſo, Montagne's Eſſays, lib. iii, cap. xiii, pag. m. 518.

(6) See Mr Saurin's book, intituled Reflexions ſur les droits de la Conſcience, printed at Utrecht, 1697.

[B] I ſhall examine the anſwers . . . . . to the compariſons taken from Judges whoſe ſentences are unjuſt contrary to their intention.] How can it be ſaid, will ſome object to me, that ignorant Judges deſerve to be excuſed, ſince they occaſion ſo many diſorders? Do not you know that they are puniſhed? For if application be made to the ſovereign, or to a ſuperior court, their judgments are reverſed, they are cenſured, and ſometimes alſo degraded. It is the uſual courſe of human juſtice. Now if princes puniſh in ſuch a manner thoſe that are ignorant of their laws, how can it be ſaid that GOD will not puniſh thoſe that are ignorant of his word? This compariſon is not therefore advantageous to thoſe who preach up Toleration. To this I muſt anſwer three things.

I. Should a Judge, through a groſs ignorance, take the wrong way in a cauſe, that may be eaſily determined, he would doubtleſs deſerve to be degraded, not as being an ill man, if he had followed the dictates of his conſcience (7) with an intent to be juſt to the parties concerned, but as being unqualified for ſuch an employment; and if thoſe, who degrade him, knew the uprightneſs of his heart, they would declare that he is a good, conſcientious, and juſt man, and in an authentic manner own that he only wanted learning. Juſt as if an ambaſſador ſhould diſmiſs his ſecretary, whoſe hand is not very legible, though he knows his faithfulneſs and capacity. This would be no blot upon his honeſty, no reflexion upon his wit; he is only diſmiſſed becauſe the ambaſſador wants a man, who writes a good hand. Let us compare two Judges one with another, the one is very learned, the other is a man of indifferent parts; and both are equally honeſt. If one of them be for the affirmative, and the other for the negative, according to the dictates of their conſcience, having uſed all the induſtry and application they are capable of in order to know the truth; and if the ſuffrage of the more learned is juſt, and the ſuffrage of the other unjuſt, I maintain that the one does not exceed the other in uprightneſs. I grant that he is a more knowing judge, and better qualified for his employment, becauſe the qualities of a good Judge take in knowledge and integrity; but he is not a man of greater probity, nor more zealous for juſtice.

(7) Suppoſing ſuch a Judge can be ſaid to have a very upright conſcience. See below citation (10).

II. As to that uſual courſe we are told of in puniſhing ignorant Judges; I do not know whether there are any inſtances of it. There is nothing more common than to ſee the judgment of an inferior court reverſed by a ſuperior court. But the inferior Judges are neither turned out nor cenſured, unleſs it does plainly appear that they have been guilty of bribery, partiality, or at leaſt of a very great ignorance. And if it be ſuppoſed that they have determined a cauſe according to their knowledge, though it be never ſo ſmall, their ſuperiors are contented to rectify their judgment. I ſhould be glad if any one would alledge an inſtance of a Judge, degraded for want of learning, though at the ſame time he was looked upon as a conſcientious and incorruptible man, very much intent upon ſtudy, and very careful to examine a cauſe. I am perſuaded that the puniſhment of Judges is always grounded upon this ſuppoſition, that they have been bribed, or have acted out of paſſion, or are guilty of a wilful ignorance. But here is a very pregnant inſtance to confirm the opinion laid down in the Commentaire Philoſophique. 'Though we pretend to be 'innocent, it does not follow that the Judges are un'juſt, for it is not a thing inconſiſtent with courts of 'judicature, made up of men, who may be deceived, 'and deceive others, that an innocent perſon ſhould be 'condemned, and a guilty one acquitted by a juſt 'Judge. It often falls out, that in civil and crimi'nal cauſes, the Judges are divided in their opinions 'when the caſe is doubtful: and as all of them muſt 'be directed by the law, it may be that all of them 'are juſt, whether they acquit or condemn, notwith'ſtanding that contrariety of opinions, giving their 'judgment according to the dictates of their conſci'ence. * When king Henry II, your predeceſſor, 'was informed, that Peliſſon, preſident in the parlia'ment of Chambery, which at that time did belong 'to France, had been deprived of his office by an 'arrêt of the parliament of Dijon, at the ſuit of Ta'boüet the king's attorney, and that the cauſe being 'afterwards brought to the parliament of Paris, by vir'tue of letters of reviſion, he had been acquitted, and 'the ſaid attorney condemned; he juſtified all the 'Judges, notwithſtanding their contrary opinions, 'ſaying, that ſome had given their judgment accord'ing to conſcience, and others according to the merit 'of the cauſe (8).'

* Reſponſe du Roy Henry II, ſur deux jugemens contraires.

(8) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique au Roi Henri IV pour les Jeſuites, pag. m. 182.

III. We muſt not ſwerve from the true ſtate of the queſtion. The author of the Commentaire Philoſophique, compares together thoſe who are miſtaken in a lawſuit, and thoſe who are miſtaken in controverſies about religion; but he ſuppoſes that neither of them can be excuſed, unleſs they have heartily and ſincerely uſed their utmoſt endeavours to find out the truth. When he ſays that in ſome caſes the Judges condemn an innocent perſon, and acquit a criminal, without any guilt; he alſo goes upon this ſuppoſition, that they do whatever they can, and whatever the laws preſcribe to them in order to come to the true knowledge of the matter of fact, and that they have been led into an error meerly by the intricacy of the cauſe, acting all along according to the dictates of their conſcience, and the rules of judicial proceeding. If there are any inſtance where ſuch Judges have been degraded by their ſuperiors, though they were thought to be equally learned and honeſt, and if ſuch a degradation ſeems to be lawful to wiſe men, there is ſome reaſon to draw from thence ſome conſequences, in order to prove that GOD will puniſh ignorant men notwithſtanding their ſincerity. But if the thing is quite otherwiſe among men, what will become of thoſe conſequences? I think one may be allowed to draw quite contrary inferences from it, and this in particular; ſince kings do not puniſh thoſe who, notwithſtanding all their application and honeſty, cannot avoid being miſtaken in their judgment about a very intricate cauſe; much more will GOD, who is equity and goodneſs itſelf, bear with thoſe who are not able to unfold the true ſenſe of a paſſage of the ſcripture which is very obſcure.

I muſt further obſerve two things: one is, That a Judge of a very groſs ignorance, can hardly be accounted a good man; for this ſuppoſes that he has neglected to inſtruct himſelf, and that his lazineſs is inexcuſable (9), or that he has given up himſelf to pleaſures. A man who behaves himſelf thus in the exerciſe of ſuch an office, cannot have a right conſcience (10), and if ſuch a man is degraded, it cannot be ſaid that he has been puniſhed for his ſincere and involuntary ignorance. The ſecond thing I have to ſay is, That I advance all theſe obſervations only as doubts and probabilities, which may be examined, without pretending to eſpouſe the cauſe, or to aſſert the doctrine of the Commentaire Philoſophique. And to ſhew my readers that I am far from extenuating the faults of a Judge, which proceed only from ignorance, I ſhall ſet down a thundering judgment againſt them. 'The 'firſt preſident de Lamoignon would have thought 'himſelf deficient in the moſt eſſential part of his office,

(9) Obſerve that if he ſtudied hard, and yet found that he did not improve, it would denote ſtupidity. He would then deſerve to be blamed for pretending to be a Judge: he has not examined himſelf, and undertakes a thing that is beyond his reach, and ſo-fits in it one after he has experienced the inſufficiency of his ſtudies.

(10) See, above, citation [B].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

whoſe remedies prove mortal, notwithſtanding their honeſty and learning [C]. Our Ruffi lived eighty-two years. It does not appear from the elogy which I cite (b) in what year he was born, nor in what year he died: ſuch an omiſſion cannot be juſtified [D]. LEWIS ANTONY DE RUFFI, his ſon, had a hand in the additions to the ſecond edition of the Hiſtory of Marſeilles.

(b) See his Elogy prefixed to the Hiſtory of Marſeilles, in the edition of 1696. written by his nephew Peter Antony de Paſcal, a Monk in the abbey of Toronet.

'fice, if he had not taken care to have as much 'knowledge as uprightneſs. And therefore he uſed 'to ſay, that there is no great difference between a 'wicked Judge and an ignorant one. The firſt knows 'at leaſt his duty, and is ſenſible of his injuſtice; but 'the other does neither know the good nor the miſ-'chief he does: the one is conſcious of his faults, 'and is more inexcuſable; but the other ſins without 'any remorſe, and is more incorrigible. But they 'are equally guilty, with reſpect to thoſe whom they 'condemn through error or malice. A man does 'not leſs feel his wound, whether he be wounded by 'a madman or a blind one; and it matters little whe-'ther one be undone by a man who deceives him, or 'by a man who is deceived (11).'

(11) Flechier, oraiſon funebre de Mr le premier Preſident de Lamoignon, p. 435. of the volume of his funeral Orations, Dutch Edit.

[C] . . . . . or from Phyſicians, whoſe remedies prove mortal, notwithſtanding their honeſty and learning.] I ſhall not dwell long upon this. Should a Phyſician, will ſome ſay, come to think that Arſenic is a good remedy, and give it to his patients, and ſo ſend them apace into another world, he would be juſtly puniſhed in this life, and in that which is to come, though he ſhould plead an involuntary ignorance. This is the image of an Hereſiarch. I anſwer that it is impoſſible, morally ſpeaking, that there ſhould be ſuch a Phyſician; and therefore ſuch an example ought not to be alledged. No man can believe that Arſenic is a good remedy, unleſs we ſuppoſe him like thoſe, who fancy that they are kings, or that they are made of butter, and therefore muſt not come near the fire. Such people are carefully watches, or ſhut up by their relations. No body conſults them in a fit of ſickneſs, or about a law-ſuit to follow their advices. If it be ſuppoſed that a Chymiſt may ſincerely believe, that he knows how to prepare Arſenic ſo as to make a good remedy of it; one may form a very good judgment concerning his ignorance. Either he has experienced the virtue of that remedy, or he has not experienced it. If he has made no ſuch experiment, we muſt ſay, either that he does not believe what he ſays, or that he is mad. If he has made the experiment, and yet perſiſts in the ſame opinion; one may certainly affirm that he is a wicked or a mad-man. An honeſt and ſincere ignorance ſuppoſes that a man has made it his buſineſs to examine a thing with an earneſt deſire of knowing the truth of it, and without being acted by avarice, pride, or any deſign of cheating. Hereſiarchs cannot be reaſonably compared with that imaginary Phyſician, who kills ſo many people, unleſs they have ſeen the eternal damnation of their firſt followers. If ſuch a ſight did not convert them, they muſt needs either be mad, or ſpeak againſt their conſcience; and in both caſes they ought to be delivered to the ſecular power; in the firſt caſe to be ſhut up in a mad-houſe, and in the ſecond, to ſuffer the puniſhment which thoſe deſerve, who blaſpheme againſt GOD whom they know. No body deſires that ſuch people ſhould be tolerated.

As to the puniſhment that a Phyſician ſhould deſerve before GOD, if he ſhould give Arſenic to his patients, the thing may eaſily be thus determined. If he was a mad-man, he would be judged as a mad-man: if he was not mad, he would be judged according as his ignorance has been voluntary or involuntary. Now by a voluntary ignorance we muſt underſtand ſuch an ignorance as proceeds from lazineſs, or from ſome other fault, which may be mended.

[D] Such an omiſſion cannot be juſtified.] Paul Jovius, Scœvola Sammarthanus, and ſeveral other elogiſts have often committed the ſame fault. Were they afraid that a date would ſpoil the harmony of a period? Or had they a mind to be ſhort? How vain would ſuch excuſes be! if they went upon ſuch ridiculous reaſons, why did not they put in the margin what they are cenſured for having omitted? I am ſure that upon ſome occaſions they have been ſilent, becauſe they did not know in what year their hero was born or died. The author of Mr Ruffi's encomium cannot be excuſed upon ſuch an ignorance. But will ſome ſay in his vindication, does he not ſay that the Hiſtory of Marſeilles was printed when the author was but thirty-five years of age? Does he not ſay that the author lived eighty-two years? Is it not an eaſy thing to infer from thence, that he was born in the year 1607, and that he died in 1689. I anſwer in the negative, becauſe he does not tell us that the Hiſtory of Marſeilles was printed in 1642, and that date is neither to be ſeen in the Epiſtle Dedicatory, nor in the Preface, nor in the king's Licence, nor in any other part of the Prolegomena; and therefore we want another book to know the year in which that author was born or died. It is therefore a fault; for a reader ſhould not be ſo much as obliged to turn to ſome other pages of the ſame book upon ſuch an occaſion. Much leſs ought an author to impoſe upon us the neceſſity of conſulting another book.

RUFINUS, a favourite of the emperor Theodoſius, 'was a Gaul, born in the 'province of Aquitain (a), of mean extraction, but of a lofty mind, he was a ſupple, 'inſinuating, and polite man, well qualified to divert a prince, and even to ſerve him. 'He came to the court of Conſtantinople, where he got friends and patrons: he made 'himſelf known to Theodoſius, and had the good fortune to pleaſe him. He ſo well 'improved the beginning of his fortune, that he was in ſhort time promoted to con-'ſiderable employments. The emperor made him high ſteward of his palace †; admitted 'him into all his councils, honoured him with his friendſhip and confidence, and at laſt 'raiſed him to the conſulſhip with his own ſon Arcadius. This man maintained his poſt as 'he had acquired it, rather by his addreſs than by his virtue. His ambition increaſed with 'his fortune: he endeavoured to enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of thoſe, whom he oppreſſed 'by his calumnies ‡. Whoever had an extraordinary merit, and was in a condition 'to contend with him in his ſtation, could not fail to be his enemy. Nevertheleſs 'being afraid of loſing the prince's affection, unleſs he preſerved [illegible] eſteem, he appeared 'modeſt and diſintereſted. He covered his ill counſels with the pretence of juſtice, or of 'policy, and knew ſo well how to ſet off his good qualities, and conceal the ill ones, 'that the emperor, as knowing and jealous of his authority as he was, was often deceived 'and governed by him, without perceiving it. The principal lords of the court could not 'ſee the elevation of this favourite, without being offended at it (§). . . . . They 'conſpired againſt him, and reſolved to undo him (b)': but their enterpriſe ended only in their own ruin, and confirmed him in his power [A]. He was baptized with great

(a) Born at Elúſa, according to Claudian. It was then the metropolis of the country now called Armagnac in Gaſcony properly ſo called.

† Zozim. lib. iv. Ambr. Ep. 53.

‡ Claudian. lib. i, contra Ruff.

(§) Zoz.

(b) Flechier Hiſtoire de Theodoſe, book iv, pag 433, Paris Edit. 1680, in 12*mo.*

[A] But their enterpriſe ended only in their own ruin, and confirmed him in his power.] They, who conſpired againſt him, were (1) Timaſus and Promotus, who had lately commanded the army, and done important ſervices.

(1) Flechier, Hiſt. de Theodoſe, livr. iv, p. 434, ad ann. 391.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google great pomp in the year 394 [B]. The ſpite he conceived to ſee Stilico above him after the death of Theodoſius, put him upon treacherous deſigns, whereby he undid himſelf. He took advantage of his maſter's weakneſs; he embroiled the empire and emperors, by his ſecret practices with the Huns, the Goths, and the Alans, and endeavoured to make himſelf ſovereign, or at leaſt independent upon his maſters, and his enemies (c). He was killed in the year 395 (d). See Moreri. His death put an end to Claudian's doubts about providence; they vaniſhed away as ſoon as he heard of the fall of that inſolent and unjuſt favourite. I ſhall make ſome reflexions upon his words [C]; which will give me occaſion

(c) Flechier, ibid. pag. 500.

(d) But according to Mr Flechier, ibid pag. 437. this ſhould be in the year 397.

vices. . . . . Tatian, who had governed all the Eaſt in the abſence of Theodoſius . . . . and Proculus, Tatian's ſon, governor of Conſtantinople, a young, bold, and daring man. Rufinus being informed of all their deſigns, prepoſſeſſed the emperor in his own behalf, and repreſented to him, (2) That the favours he daily received from his majeſty, made him odious to the whole court; that though he was never ſo careful to prevent the murmurs of thoſe, who envied him, new factions and cabals were daily formed againſt him; that he muſt infallibly ſink, unleſs he were ſupported by the ſame hand, that raiſed him; that he was ſenſible of his want of merit, and gloried only in the kindneſs his majeſty had for him, and in expreſſing his acknowledgment for it all the days of his life. Having thus engaged the emperor to protect him, he made it his buſineſs not only to avoid being ſurpriſed, but alſo to deſtroy his enemies. . . . . Being in the council with Promotus, he had ſeveral conteſts with him. † The emperor went out, and then their diſpute began again: both of them maintained their opinions, and inſenſibly grew hot upon it. Rufinus ſpoke ſome offenſive words; whereupon Promotus fell into a paſſion, and gave him a box on the ear. . . . . The emperor, to whom Rufinus immediately complained, was extremely angry at it. He openly declared, that he was weary of ſuffering ſuch diviſions and intrigues, and the authors of them; that he would teach them to live peaceably, and to conſider thoſe whom he had an affection for; and that if they continued to be jealous of Rufinus, he would raiſe him ſo far above them, that they ſhould be forced to reſpect, and perhaps to obey, him. That prince, who knew how to ſpeak with authority, and to make himſelf feared, when there was a neceſſity for it, ſpoke thoſe words ſo warmly, that from that time no body durſt murmur. He turned Promotus out of the court, and almoſt at the ſame time he made Rufinus Præfect of the Prætorium. The new dignity of this favourite, and the emperor's protection, on which he entirely relied, enabled him to revenge himſelf more eaſily of his enemies. Promotus did not live long after his diſgrace, for having received orders to go and join the army, and to march towards the Baſtarnæ, who were plundering Thrace, he was killed in an ambuſh, by a party of thoſe Barbarians: ſeveral people accuſed Rufinus of that treachery. Proculus's death ‡ was not leſs diſmal. That miniſter had him accuſed of ſeveral crimes, bribed the commiſſioners appointed to try him, obliged them under-hand to condemn him to death, and contrived the matter ſo that the pardon, which the emperor ſent him, came after the execution. He croſſed Tatian ‡ in ſome domeſtic concerns, and Timaſus would not have been more fortunate than the reſt, had he not endeavoured to gain the affection of that favourite, and made himſelf an accomplice of his crimes.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 435, ad ann. 392.

† Zoz. lib. iv.

‡ Zoz. lib. iv.

‡ Ambr. ep. 53.

[B] He was baptized with great pomp in the year 394.] Mr Flechier has given us a noble deſcription of it, after a preamble, which is a maſter-piece, and therefore I ſhall ſet down his words ſomewhat at large. 'Rufinus, who governed the empire with an abſolute 'power in the abſence of Theodoſius . . . . had for a 'long time concealed his vanity and ambition under 'the appearance of an a[illegible] modeſty: and whether 'he had a mind that the emperor who loved him, 'ſhould have a good opinion of him, or whether he 'was willing to give leſs umbrage to the courtiers, 'who envied his fortune, he grew every day more 'powerful, without ſeeming to be more proud. He 'was deſirous to get wealth by private means; and 'though he loved pomp and ſtateline ſs, his avarice 'gave a check to his pride. But when he ſaw that 'he could rely upon his maſter's affection, being 'loaded with the wealth he had received from him, 'or had himſelf unjuſtly acquired, he gave a full 'ſcope to his inclinations, and grew inſolent, as ſoon 'as he believed he might be ſo with impunity. He 'procured himſelf a great many creatures, appeared 'abroad with a more magnificent equipage than be'came a private man, and built more ſtately houſes 'than the very palaces of the emperors. He had 'taken a particular care to build near the ſuburb of 'Chalcedon, called the ſuburb of the Oak *, a houſe * Sozom. lib. 'of pleaſure ſo vaſt, that one would have taken it for viii, cap. xvi. 'a town, and ſo full of ornaments and precious goods, 'that one could hardly believe that a private man had 'been able to bear ſuch exceſſive charges. On the 'one ſide was erected a large church in honour of the 'apoſtles St Peter and St Paul; and on the other, at 'a ſmall diſtance, a monaſtery was to be ſeen in per'ſpective upon a riſing ground, which was to ſupply 'the want of clergymen in that church. When 'thoſe buildings were finiſhed, Rufinus reſolved to be 'baptized, and at the ſame time to celebrate the de'dication of that new church with all imaginable 'pomp (3). . . . . Adding a great deal of oſtentation (3) Flechier, 'and vain-glory to a little religion, he  called to- ibid. pag. 438. 'gether the biſhops of the ſeveral parts of the eaſtern  Theodoret. 'empire, eſpecially thoſe, who were poſſeſſed of the lib. i, cap. xvii, 'firſt ſees. Nay, he intreated by repeated letters, Socrat. lib. v, 'the moſt famous anchorets of Egypt to leave their cap. v. Pallad. 'ſolitude, in order to aſſiſt at this pompous cere- in Lauſiac. cap. 'mony. The great ſtation he was in, in the empire, iv. 'whereof he had the chief direction under the prince 'Arcadius, engaged a great many biſhops to ſet out 'upon the firſt invitation, and to bring along with 'them the moſt holy men of their provinces. The 'aſſembly was very numerous. There were in it 'three patriarchs, Nectarius of Conſtantinople, Theo'philus of Alexandria, and Flavian of Antioch, Gre'gory biſhop of Nyſſa, Amphilocus of Iconium, Paul 'of Heraclea, Dioſcorus of Helenopolis, and ſeveral 'other famous Prelates arrived there before the reſt. 'The chief perſons of the nobility and clergy, and an 'innumerable multitude of people reſorted thither, 'ſome to honour the feaſt, others to make their court 'to that favourite, and many to ſatisfy their curioſi'ty. This ceremony was performed in the month of 'September. The church was hung with rich tape'ſtry; the altar glittered with gold and precious 'ſtones. The conſecration was made with all the or'der and magnificence poſſible. The ſervice being 'over, they proceeded to Rufinus's baptiſm with the 'ſame pomp. The Patriarch Nectarius adminiſtred it 'to him, and the famous Evagrius of Pontus, who 'had been ſent for from Egypt with the anchoret 'Ammonius, received at the coming out of the font 'that regenerated man, who did not long preſerve †† Pallad. in 'his innocency. Thus ended that ſolemnity, which Lauſiac. 'would have been one of the moſt holy and moſt 'magnificent of the eaſtern church, had it not been 'attended with a prophane luxury, and had not that 'miniſter endeavoured to get again from the people 'by his injuſtice, the immenſe ſums which he ſeemed 'to have ſpent for GOD upon that occaſion (4).'

(4) Flechier, ubi ſupra, pag. 438.

[C] I ſhall make ſome reflexions upon Claudian's doubts (5).] He ſays that the beautiful order, which appears in the world, moved him to believe that it is directed by the moſt wiſe laws of an infinite GOD; but that the diſorder, which prevails among men, the proſperity of the wicked, and the miſery of good men, induced him to believe, as Epicurus did, that all things had been made by chance, and that the gods did not concern themſelves with the government of the world. At laſt, ſays he, the puniſhment of Rufinus has removed my doubts; I acquit the gods; I do no more complain that the wicked have got ſo much power; they are only raiſed to fall from a higher place. This will be better repreſented in his own words.

(5) Concerning Divine Providence.

Sæpe

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

occaſion to inquire whether all thoſe, who have maintained the Orthodox opinion concerning providence, have well obſerved the rules of diſputation.

Gabriel

Sæpe mihi dubiam traxit ſententia mentem,
Curarent Superi terras, an nullus ineſſet
Rector, & incerto fluerent mortalia caſu.
Nam cum diſpoſiti quæſiſſem fœdera mundi,
Præſcriptoſque maris fines, annique meatus,
Et lucis, noctiſque vices: tunc omnia rebar
Conſilio firmata Dei, qui lege moveri
Sidera, qui fruges diverſo tempore naſci,
Qui variam Phœben alieno juſſerit igne
Compleri, Solemque ſuo: porrexerit undis
Littora; tellurem medio libraverit axe.
Sed cum res hominum tanta caligine volvi
Adſpicerem, lætoſque diu florere nocentes,
Vexarique pios: rurſus labefacta cadebat
Relligio, cauſſæque viam non ſponte ſequebar
Alterius, vacuo quæ currere ſemina motu
Affirmat, magnumque novas per inane figuras
Fortuna, non arte, regi: quæ Numina ſenſu
Ambiguo vel nulla putat, vel neſcia noſtri.
Abſtulit hunc tandem Rufini pœna tumultum,
Abſolvitque Deos. Jam non ad culmina rerum
Injuſtos creviſſe queror, tolluntur in altum,
Ut lapſu graviore ruant (6).

(6) Claudian. in Rufin. lib. i, init.

Oft has my mind with anxious doubts been toſt,
Whether the care of Heav'n extends to earth,
Or mortal things depend on chance alone.
For, when the fair creation I ſurvey'd
In beauteous order rang'd; the ſea confin'd
Within its bounds, and its proud waves reſtrain'd;
The year revolving in its conſtant courſe:
And the viciſſitude of day and night;
I clearly ſaw the hand of Providence,
And own'd the mighty ruler of the world;
That GOD, whoſe all-informing hand directs
The rapid motion of the whirling ſpheres;
Who rules the ſeaſons of the varied year;
Who fills the moon's bright orb with borrow'd light,
And bids the ſun with native luſtre ſhine:
Who on the ocean's brink extends the ſhores,
And on its axis ballances the earth.
But, when the gloomy ſcene of man I view'd,
The bad triumphant, and the good oppreſs'd;
Religion in a moment loſt its hold;
My heart inclin'd to that Philoſophy,
Which tells us, that diſcordant ſeeds of things,
Hurl'd thro' the vaſt abyſs of emptineſs,
Produced, by chance, not art, this fair variety;
Which wou'd perſuade, there are no gods in heav'n,
Or gods regardleſs of the human race.
At length, Rufinus puniſhment has clear'd
My anxious doubtings, and abſolv'd the gods.
No longer I complain, that proſp'rous vice
Is rais'd on high: the wicked are exalted,
Only to fall with greater ruin down.

I have promiſed in the article of Marſhal d'Ancre (7), to mention in this place Balzac's reflexions upon a thought of Malherbe like that of Claudian: I do now perform my promiſe. ‘ (8) It is true they ſpoke ‘ thus, before they had been better inſtructed by the ‘ Chriſtian Religion. The gods were charged with ‘ all the crimes of men. The divine providence was ‘ every day indicted by ſome body, who complained ‘ that the things of this world did not go, as he ‘ could have wiſhed. THAT FORTUNATE ‘ TYRANT BEARS WITNESS AGAINST ‘ GOD. This is an old ſaying alledged by your ‘ Cicero; and there is nothing ſo obvious in the Hea‘ then Poets, as the crimes of their gods, and of ‘ fate, Crimen Deorum, Fatorum crimen, &c. Cynthia ‘ is ſick, and if ſhe dies of her ſickneſs, ſays a Poet ‘ who was in love with her, the death of ſuch a beau‘ tiful woman will be the crime of the god of Phyſic.

(7) See the article CONCINI, remark [F].

(8) Balzac Socrate Chrétien, pag. m. 237.

Tam formoſa tuum Mortua crimen erit.

‘ Nay ſince the empire of Conſtantine, and under the ‘ children of Theodoſius, there are ſome inſtances of ‘ thoſe poetical blaſphemies, and of that prophane ‘ liberty. If Rufinus had not been puniſhed for his ‘ crimes, the gods would have been indicted, as Ru‘ finus's abettors and accomplices:

Abſtulit hunc tandem Rufini pœna timorem (9),
Abſolvitque Deos.

(9) It ſhould be tumultum. Mr Menage, Obſervat. ſur Malherbe, pag. 431, took no notice of this Quid pro quo of Balzac, whoſe very words he alledges.

‘ One of our Poets ſaid ſomething like it, but in a ‘ very excellent manner, and his copy exceeds all his ‘ originals. I take it to be a maſter-piece: it is in ‘ that Ode, which may be ſet above the fineſt and moſt ‘ elaborate Odes of the Ancients. The god of the ‘ Seine ſpeaks to a favourite, who was going over the ‘ Pont-neuf.' I ſhall not tranſcribe the verſes of Malherbe which Balzac quotes; you will find the concluſion of them in the article of CONCINI remark [F]. I add the following words of Menage (10) to thoſe of Balzac: For the reſt, this thought, Et le ciel accuſé de ſupporter tes crimes, eſt reſolu de ſe juſtifier, (and Heaven being accuſed of favouring thy crimes, is reſolved to vindicate itſelf) is not originally Claudian's: ſeveral other authors, who lived long before him have ſaid the ſame thing. Cicero in the third book de Natura Deorum: Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere ſolebat, Harpalum, qui temporibus illis prædo felix habebatur, contra Deos teſtimonium dicere, quòd in illa fortuna tam diu viveret. And in another place of the ſame book: Improborum igitur proſperitates, ſecundæque res redarguunt, ut Diogenes dicebat, vim omnem Deorum ac poteſtatem. Martial:

(10) Menage, Obſervations ſur Malherbe, pag. 432.

Nullos eſſe Deos, inane cœlum
Affirmat Selius; probatque, quòd ſe
Factum, dum negat hæc, videt beatum.

There are no gods, Rufin aſſerts,
But empty Heavens, and this he proves
From his own happineſs who ſays it.

Seneca ſays in that ſenſe, Deorum crimen, Sylla tam felix; and an ancient comic Poet,

Θεῶν δ' ὄνειδος, τὰς κακὰς εὐδαιμονεῖν.

The wicked's happineſs is GOD's reproach.

Barthius (11) has collected a great many ſuch ſayings, and has not omitted thoſe that are to be found in the Scripture (12). One may bring under this head all the paſſages of the antients, wherein fortune is reviled, as a blind, inconſtant, rambling, unjuſt Being, that favours unworthy perſons (13). I ſhall only ſet down one of thoſe paſſages out of Pliny (14): ‘ Invenit inter has utraſque ſententias medium ſibi ipſa ‘ mortalitas numen, quo minus etiam plana de Deo ‘ conjectatio eſſet. Toto quippe mundo, & locis omnibus, omnibuſque horis omnium vocibus Fortuna ‘ ſola invocatur: una nominatur, una accuſatur, una ‘ agitur rea, una cogitatur, ſola laudatur, ſola arguitur, & cum convitiis colitur (15): volubilis, à pleriſque vero & cæca [illegible] exiſtimata, vaga, inconſtans, incerta, varia, indignorumque fautrix. Huic ‘ omnia expenſa, huic omnia feruntur accepta: & in ‘ tota ratione mortalium, ſola utramque paginam facit. Adeoque obnoxiæ ſumus ſortis, ut Sors ipſa ‘ pro Deo ſit, qua Deus probatur incertus. - - - - Betwixt both theſe opinions concerning a Divinity, mortals have invented a medium, that the exiſtence of GOD might ſtill become more uncertain. For all the world over, and in all places, and times, fortune only is invocated: only talked of, only accuſed, only condemned, only thought on, only praiſed, only blamed, and with reproaches worſhipped: inconſtant, and by moſt part even thought to be blind, wavering, wandering, uncertain,

(11) Barthius, ad Claudian, in Rufin. lib. i, init. pag. m. 1078, & ſeq.

(12) Apud Regem Prophetam Pſal. lxxiii, & xciii. Hiobum cap. xxiii. Habacuc cap. i. Malachum cap. iii. Barthius, ibid. pag. 1082.

(13) See the article PAYS, remark [H].

(14) Plin. lib. ii, cap. vii, pag. m. 145.

(15) See concerning this an obſervation againſt Coſtar, citation (51) of the article HERCULES.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Gabriel Naudæus affirms a thing which is moſt falſe, namely, that Rufinus has been praiſed

'certain, various, and favouring the unworthy. To
'her is attributed whatever is given and received:
'and in all the thoughts of mortals ſhe alone is all in
'all. And ſo obnoxious we are to the power of chance,
'that fortune herſelf is in place of a god, whereby the
'exiſtence of GOD is proved uncertain.' It may be ſaid that in all ages and among all nations, without excepting the age we live in, and Chriſtianity, the proſperity of wicked men has occaſioned many murmurs againſt GOD, and raiſed many doubts about Providence. On the other ſide, that objection has been anſwered at all times and in all countries: ſeeing then it hath been perpetually renewed, notwithſtanding all anſwers to it, we muſt conclude that it has ſomething very ſpecious, and I do not know what proportion to our mind, which eaſily admits it, and cannot throw it off (16). So that what is ſaid of the palm-tree may be applied to it, curvata reſurgo. Anſwers may bend me a little, but I am ſoon reſtored. We need not examine its ſolidity; for we ought to be perſuaded that it is a falſe and inſignificant objection; but perhaps it will not be improper to examine whether Claudian made a good anſwer to it.

(16) It is like nature, Naturam expellas furca, tamen uſque recurret. Horatius, Epiſt. X, lib. i, ver. 24.

SOME conſiderations upon the method of anſwering the difficulties about providence. Laws of diſputation.

Some may tell him; you have not taken the right way; the only anſwer you ſhould have made to your difficulty, was to conſider the vaſt and immenſe idea of the moſt perfect Being, and to draw this conſequence from it: he is the author and governor of all things; and therefore nothing comes to paſs but what is directed in a moſt wiſe, juſt, and admirable manner. This is certainly the true way of removing all doubts: ſilence reaſon; let it acquieſce to authority (17): GOD ſaid ſo, αὐτὸς ἔφα, GOD has done it, GOD has permitted it; it is therefore true, juſt, wiſely done, and wiſely permitted. If you enter into the diſcuſſion of each particular argument, you will never ſee an end of the matter, and after a thouſand diſputes, you will be obliged to have recourſe to authority, and to the immenſe idea of the moſt perfect Being. But ſince we muſt come to that at laſt, let us keep immoveably and ſtedfaſtly to it, laying our finger on our mouth and ſilencing our imperfect knowledge. Being fully perſuaded that the beſt uſe of reaſon as to thoſe things is not to reaſon at all. Let us inforce more ſtrongly the motives of this method. When a man engages in a diſputation, we expect he will ſhew his adverſary that he is in the wrong; but he muſt not pretend that his adverſary will acquieſce in his firſt and ſecond anſwers. The rules of diſputation require that each party may be allowed to reply, as often as he can anſwer an argument by another argument, and till the matter be brought to the firſt principles. If I can ſhew a man that his aſſertion is contrary to the common notions, and that mine is a natural and neceſſary conſequence of thoſe notions; I am not obliged to hear him any longer, but to ſilence him with this axiom, adverſus negantem principia non eſt diſputandum. But if I give only a probable ſolution of his objections, and he is able to bring in new difficulties as probable, or near as probable, as my ſolution, I cannot require of him that he ſhould acquieſce in my anſwers: I muſt look out for a new ſolution of his new difficulties; and if I can find none that is evident, or that will not admit of a ſpecious anſwer, I ought to give over the diſpute without pretending to have got the victory; otherwiſe I ſhould imitate the converters in France. About the year 1680, theſe gentlemen offered to enter upon a conference on religion with their erring brethren: they promiſed to hear their doubts, and to clear them, and to inſtruct them in a very cordial manner: but after they had anſwered two or three times, they could no longer bear to be contradicted, they would have their explanations ſubmitted to, otherwiſe they declared that their adverſaries were obſtinate. It had been better to ſay ſo at firſt: it is a ridiculous thing to enter into a diſcuſſion, if we will not ſuffer an adverſary to make a hundred and a hundred replies, if he can do it; and if he is able to alledge againſt the tenth reply, an argument as probable as the objection which he propoſed againſt the main aſſertion. Such is the true ſtate of diſputations. Your adverſary attacks your aſſertion, you anſwer him; but it often falls out that your anſwer lies more open to difficulties than the aſſertion itſelf. You ought therefore to refute his reply: your new anſwer contains I know not what, that raiſes new difficulties more plauſible than the firſt; therefore they muſt be examined, and ſo in infinitum, unleſs you bring on your ſide common notions (18), to nonplus your antagoniſt. Such are the laws of the combate; if you have no mind to obſerve them, it is better for you not to enter the liſts, being contented to ſay, this ought to be believed without reaſoning: GOD ſaid ſo; that is enough.

(17) I was ſilent and opened not my mouth becauſe thou didſt it. Pſal. xxxix, 9.

(18) By common notions I underſtand in general all the principles, which the two contending parties are agreed upon.

This would be an unjuſt proceeding, if the ſtate of the queſtion was this, Has God ſpoke? But it cannot be ſaid to be unjuſt, when we diſpute with men, who acknowledge the exiſtence of a moſt perfect Being, and raiſe doubts in their minds becauſe good men are unhappy, and wicked men live in proſperity. The only anſwer, that ought to be made to thoſe doubting men, is this. You are perſuaded of the exiſtence of a moſt perfect Being; you ought therefore to believe that it governs all things in a moſt perfect manner: for if you do not draw this conſequence from the principle which you admit, you are ignorant of the firſt rules of common ſenſe, and you might as well argue thus; the ſun cannot produce darkneſs, therefore it has produced it. That it may the better appear that we ought to keep to that ſhort anſwer, and to that general principle of the exiſtence of GOD, I will ſhew the inconveniencies, which ariſe from a particular diſcuſſion of each argument. In the firſt place, it is certain that in ſuch a caſe you are obliged to anſwer all the replies of an adverſary, till you can bring an argument againſt him, to which no reaſonable reply can be made: ſuch are the laws of diſputation, as I have already obſerved. In the ſecond place, it is certain that your particular arguments will be anſwered in infinitum, and that the anſwers will be at leaſt no leſs plauſible, as it will appear from this ſpecimen. Suppoſe our Poet had acquainted another man with the reaſon, that removed all his doubts: he would have told him, ſince Rufinus has been puniſhed, there is a providence, whereby all things are wiſely and juſtly governed. The proſperity of that wicked man did not prove that providence was aſleep, but, on the contrary, that it was preparing by degrees a ſevere puniſhment for him; he was raiſed that he might be the better cruſhed to pieces by falling from a high place: 'tolluntur in altum, ut
'lapſu graviore ruant. - - - they are lifted up on high,
'that their fall may be the greater.' Claudian might have been anſwered, if you have nothing elſe to ſay, the difficulty remains ſtill; though your ſolution be never ſo ancient (19), it is not the better for it; whilſt you reſolve a great difficulty, you lie open to one that is ſtill greater: your particle UT ſtrikes one with horror. It cannot be heard without trembling. You aſcribe to the moſt perfect Being, who is conſequently infinitely good, a motive and a final cauſe, which are ſo far from having any goodneſs in them, that they are the moſt malicious and tyrannical character that can be conceived. It is juſt as if one of our emperors deſigning to inflict a capital puniſhment upon ſome of his domeſtics, ſhould make them governors of provinces, and ſuffer them to exerciſe all ſorts of extortions, and to ſuck the ſubſtance of the people; it is, I ſay, as if he permitted thoſe things in order to puniſh them more ſeverely. If you had been ſo bold as to ſay of Theodoſius what you ſay of GOD, that he raiſed Rufinus to the higheſt dignities to cruſh him the better, and to ſhew his ſubjects his ſovereign power of raiſing and depreſſing men, he would have had you hanged, as a ſatirical and inſolent Poet. Claudian would doubtleſs be ſenſible of the heinouſneſs of his UT and of his final cauſe, and would deſire that this word ſhould not be taken in a ſtrict and criminal ſenſe. He would ſay that providence had not loaded wicked Rufinus with good things, in order to do him more miſchief, but in hopes that that favourite would make a good uſe of them. He would add, that, according to the laws of nature, the fall of bodies is ſo much the greater, as they fall from a higher place, and that therefore Rufinus's elevation could not but aggravate his puniſhment, when the ill uſe he continually made of [illegible] evenly favours called for it. But Claudian would be anſwered that this does not remove the difficulty; hopes are not to be found in the divine nature; God moſt certainly knows whatever ſhall come to paſs; he knew moſt certainly that Rufinus would make an ill uſe of his favours; and therefore it had been better to (19) Juvenal, Sat. X, ver. 104, ſaid before, ſpeaking of Seianus.

Nam qui nimis optabat honores,
Et nimias poſcebat opes, neceſſa paratur
Excelſæ turris ſublata, unde ruina
Tutior eſſet
Caſus, & ingens
Se præceps in mane ruiſſet.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

praiſed by three or four celebrated Hiſtorians [D].

prevent him (20), than to bear his crimes for many years, in order to inflict upon him a puniſhment, which cannot atone up the miſchief he has done, the oppreſſion of ſo many innocent perſons, the death of ſo many people, and the ruin of ſo many families. It is but a poor ſatisfaction for a province deſolated by a governor, only to have him puniſhed; it continues in the miſerable condition it was in before, and ſometimes the guilty man is the better for it (21). I do not carry farther the replies, which our Poet could make; doubtleſs he could make a great many, but thoſe of his adverſary would be no leſs numerous, and would always be like thoſe we have juſt now ſeen, that is, they would be more proportioned to the notions of our mind, and to the ideas by which we judge of the perfection of a government than thoſe of Claudian. I ſuppoſe that after a long diſputation his adverſary would tell him: I believe as well as you, that whatever has happened in the caſe of Rufinus is juſt, wiſe, and perfect in reſpect to GOD; but I do not believe it by virtue of your arguments, they are apter to raiſe doubts, than to enlighten the mind. You may uſe them however to thoſe whom they may ſatisfy, but do not mention them to thoſe who carry arguments as far as they can go. The idea of the moſt perfect Being ought to be ſufficient to them, and it is ſufficient when they make good uſe of their reaſon. I know ſome men, who have read ſeveral times Boëtius, de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ, and find a great difference between the objections and the anſwers of that author. Boëtius was both a great Philoſopher, and a very good man. Groaning under the weight of his misfortune, and overwhelmed with grief, he ſuppoſes that Philoſophy comes to comfort him. He raiſes ſeveral objections about providence: Philoſophy anſwers them as well as ſhe can, but whereas the difficulties of Boëtius are fitted to the meaneſt capacity, the ſolutions can hardly be underſtood without the greateſt attention, and the quickeſt apprehenſion. Philoſophy miſtruſts herſelf, and requires moſt times that ſhe may be allowed to wind about, and to trace up things higher; and though what ſhe ſays be never ſo ſolid, it happens ſometimes that we do not underſtand it; and if ſhe convinces us, ſhe does it moſt times without enlightening the mind. Such is the opinion of ſome perſons who have read Boëtius. They have acquainted me that a moſt ſubtile Profeſſor of the XVIIth century, has more dextrouſly defended the honour of Philoſophy than he; for after introducing a Heathen who propoſes innumerable doubts about providence, he gives him no other expedient, but the aſſiſtance of the divine grace (22).

Before I make an end of this remark, I muſt take notice of the injuſtice of ſome perſons, who fancy that thoſe who reject the reaſons alledged for a doctrine, reject the doctrine itſelf. There is a very great difference between thoſe two things; and they are eaſily diſtinguiſhed by equitable and underſtanding men, who ſuffer patiently and without any ill ſuſpicion, thoſe, who cannot abide that weak and wrong arguments ſhould be made uſe of to maintain a truth. This however may be liable to ſome abuſes; for, (to give an inſtance of it) the Sceptics under pretence of confuting only the arguments of the Dogmatiſts for the exiſtence of GOD, did actually undermine the doctrine itſelf. At firſt, they declared (23), that they followed the common opinion, without addicting themſelves to any particular ſect; that they acknowledged the exiſtence of the gods, honoured them, and aſcribed a providence to them; but that they could not abide that the Dogmatiſts ſhould be ſo raſh as to reaſon about it: afterwards they propoſed their objections, which, by overthrowing providence, tended to overthrow the exiſtence of GOD. See Sextus Empiricus (24), who inſtead of grounding his doubts, as Claudian did, upon the proſperity of wicked men, grounds them upon adverſity, and the many evils that prevail in the world. He alledges an argument, which has been better expreſſed than confuted by Lactantius. See, above, the article PAULICIANS, remark [E], citation 16, and the following words of a Jeſuit who has obſerved that Arnobius confeſſes this argument is unanſwerable. Poſſet denique cum Sexto Empirico Lib. 1. (it ſhould be 3.) Pyrrhonicarum hypothypoſeon cap. 1. fieri tale argumentum, quòd ſi Deus ſit, cum ſit bonus infinitè, & perfectiſſimus, nulla in mundo eſſet malitia aut imperfectio: nam contrarium unum infinitum, deſtruit totaliter aliud. Cui argumento reſpondurus Arnobius lib. 2. num. 49. poſt multam exaggerationem difficultatis, inſolubilem exiſtimare videtur. Alexander autem quem refert & latè rejicit Simplic. 2. cœli, in fine, concedit Deum non poſſe mala excludere, alioqui ea omnino fuiſſe prohibiturum. Et verò hoc ipſum argumentum multos Philoſophos vexaſſe, teſtatur Lactantius libro de ira Dei cap. 13. Sed rectè reſpondet Scot. &c (25).

[D] Naudæus affirms . . . that Rufinus has been praiſed by three or four celebrated Hiſtorians.] 'Claudian 'does very much inveigh againſt Rufinus . . . . and 'yet Zozimus, Zonaras, Eutropius, and Paulus Oroſius praiſe him exceedingly (26).' They are Naudé's words; let us examine theſe four authors aſcending, we ſhall ſoon ſee that he is miſtaken. Oroſius (27) ſpeaks ill of Rufinus, and Eutropius ſays nothing neither good nor evil of him: for his Hiſtory ends with the death of Jovian, who lived before the empire of Theodoſius. I find nothing in Zonaras that relates to our Rufinus. The Rufinus mentioned by that Annaliſt (28), was conſul of Rome, when Pyrrhus made war againſt the Romans: as for Zozimus, he is ſo far from praiſing Rufinus exceſſively, that he repreſents him as a wicked man. I could cite ſeveral paſſages of his Hiſtory which prove it clearly, but this will be ſufficient. Ῥηΐνῳ μὲν ἕν, ἰδίᾳ τε πολλοῖς κακῶν ἀποφοήτων γενόμενῳ αἰτίῳ, καὶ τῇ πολιτείᾳ λυμηράμενῳ ἅπασῃ, δίκην ἐξέτισε τῶν πεπονημένων ἀξίαν. At Rufinus quidem, qui compluribus intolerabilium malorum auctor privatim exſtiterat, & univerſæ reipublicæ detrimentum adtulerat, dignas admiſſis facinoribus diris pœnas luit (29). One can hardly conceive how ſuch a man as Gabriel Naudæus, who had a vaſt reading, and a great memory, could commit ſo many miſtakes in ſo few lines.

(20) Cur omnium crudeliſſimus tamdiu Cinna regnavit? At dedit pœnas. Prohiberi melius fuit, impedireque ne tot ſummos viros interficeret, quam aliquando pœnas dare. Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. iii, cap. xxxii.

(21) Exul ab octava Marius bibit & fruitur Diis Iratis: at tu victrix provincia ploras. Juvenal. Stat. I, ver. 49.

(22) Unde Philoſophus noſter ethnicus tot difficultatibus oppreſſus, niſi afflatu divino animetur ad cognitionem Dei unius ac diſtincti ab univerſo nunquam aſſurget. Claudius Berigardus in priores Libros Phyſ. Ariſtot. Circulo xx, in fine.

(23) Sext. Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. lib. iii, cap. i.

(24) Sext. Empiric. ibid.

(25) Theoph. Raynaudus, Theolog. Naturali, Diſtinct. V, num. 166. p. m. 532, 533.

(26) Naudé Dialogue de Maſcurat, pag. 630.

(27) See chap. xxxvii of book vii.

(28) Zonaras, Ann. lib. viii, pag. 377, 379. Paris Edit. 1686.

(29) Zozimus, lib. v, pag. 297. Edit. Oxon. 1679.

RUGGERI (a) (COSMO), a Florentine, introduced himſelf into the court of France as a great Aſtrologer, when Catherine de Medicis favoured that ſort of people. He was a man of parts, and had the reputation of being learned: beſides he was very bold even to impudence, he thruſt himſelf among perſons of quality, and was a great intriguer (b). Catherine de Medicis beſtowed upon him the abbey of St Mahé, in the Lower Bretagne. He calculated the nativities of all the lords of the court, and did it in ſuch a manner as he thought moſt proper to get money from them (c). At laſt, he was accounted a Diviner and a Magician, and in the year 1574, he found himſelf involved in the affair of la Mole and Coconas [A], who, among other crimes, were charged with practiſing ſorcery againſt the life of Charles IX. He is called Coſmo the Italian in that trial (d), and he was condemned to the gallies; but the queen-mother ſet him at liberty ſome time after (e). He perſuaded la Mole and ſome others, that he could make wax-images, ſome of which would procure the love of women, and others make any one they pleaſed die in a lingring condition (f). He began in 1604, to ſet up for (a) Balzac, Socrate Chrétien, p. m. 253. calls him Coſmus Roger.

(b) Garaſſe, Doctrine curieuſe, p. 155.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Mercure François, Tom. iv, pag. 46. ad ann. 1615.

(e) See the remark [A].

(f) Mercure François, Tom. iv, pag. 47.

[A] He found himſelf involved in the affair of la Mole and Coconas.] They were two favourites of the Duke of Alençon, brother to Charles IX, who had put their maſter upon wicked deſigns, or had been inſtrumental in the execution of them. I am apt to believe that they were falſly accuſed of ſome crimes; but

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google for a writer of Almanacks, and continued to do ſo every year: they were intermixed with ſentences taken from Latin authors (g). He lived a long life, and ſurvived all the Italian courtiers of Catherine de Medicis (b). He died at Paris in the year 1615, and becauſe he had openly and inſolently declared that he died an Atheiſt [B], his body was thrown upon a lay-ſtall. He had been accuſed in the year 1598, of having made uſe of witchcraft againſt the life of Henry IV [C]: he was thereupon examined by Thuanus

(g) Ibid.

(b) Garaſſe, ubi ſupra.

but they deſerved to ſuffer death for the things that were truly laid to their charge. I will quote Mezerai firſt; and then le Laboureur. They found in la Mole's houſe an image of wax, which one Coſmo Rugier, a Florentine, and a great cheat, had made for him, to enchant a gentlewoman with whom he was in love. The queen-mother was willing that people ſhould believe it had been made againſt the king; which he denied all along: nevertheleſs he was beheaded with Coconas. It is ſaid that two princeſſes, who were in love with them, ſtole away their heads, and embalmed them in order to keep them: one of their accomplices was broke upon the wheel, and Rugier was ſent to the gallies. The queen-mother, who gave much credit to diviners and ſorcerers, had him ſet at liberty ſome time after to make uſe of him (1). Le Laboureur tells us, that the queen would have had Coſmo hanged, and he does not ſay that it was ſhe who ſet that galley-ſlave at liberty: I call him ſo, though I know he never rowed. 'Tourtai was condemned to be hanged, and 'to be put firſt of all to the rack . . . . . Being 'aſked whether one Coſmo, an Italian, knew any 'thing of the matter, he anſwered, that there is an 'Italian, a black man, with an ugly face, who plays 'upon the inſtruments, wears ſometimes round, and ſome-'times taffety, breeches, and always black cloaths, and is 'a very luſty man, and very much converſant with la 'Nocle; but he does not know whether he knows any 'thing of that enterprize (2).' Theſe words are explained by le Laboureur in the following manner (3). 'That 'Italian is Coſmo Rogieri, of whom I have already 'ſpoken (4), and whom the queen herſelf had placed 'with the duke, her ſon, under pretence of teaching 'him the Italian tongue, but in truth to be a ſpy 'upon him; being informed, or afraid, that a party 'was forming to ſet him upon the throne after the 'death of Charles IX, preferably to the king of 'Poland, his brother, whoſe return into France, 'they deſigned to prevent. He confeſſed afterwards to 'ſome body, that after he had given ſome advice to 'the queen, he found out that the faction would be 'ſo ſtrong, by reaſon of the hatred which the Paris-'Maſſacre had occaſioned, and becauſe that prince 'was ſuſpected of cruelty, beſides, that thereby the 'queen and the houſe of Guiſe would have again the 'government in their hands, that he reſolved to 'follow his maſter's fortune, not doubting that this 'faction would ſucceed in their attempt, being ſup-'ported by great men, and by the ſecretaries of ſtate, 'and ſeveral members of the parliament. He was 'ſtill more confirmed in that opinion, when having 'diſcovered to the duke the ſecret converſations he 'had with the queen, the duke truſted him with all 'his deſigns, and made uſe of him to amuſe his 'mother with ſome inconſiderable things that he 'reported to her, whereby he had an occaſion to 'diſcourſe with her, and dive into her thoughts. 'Thus he was deeply engaged in that deſign; but 'the queen having diſcovered the whole matter, 'cauſed him to be impriſoned, as well as the reſt, 'and brought to his tryal; but to little purpoſe, for 'he endured the torture with great reſolution upon 'more than fourſcore heads, and even upon many 'which he himſelf had diſcovered, without confeſſing 'any thing relating either to the conſpiracy or to the 'enchanted medals, for he was accuſed of having 'made a medal of king Charles, to bring him to 'his death, and two more for the Duke of Alençon 'and la Molle his favourite, who had them tied to 'their hats in order to keep up an inviolable friend-'ſhip betwixt them. But they proved very fatal to 'la Molle, who, upon this vain aſſurance, ſet up for 'a mighty man; and he was ſo far from being ſup-'ported by any friends in his misfortune that his 'own maſter, and good friend, gave evidence againſt 'him. He did not think that our flowers de-luce, 'which are ſaid to have been ſent from Heaven, 'have a ſupernatural virtue againſt charms. If it be 'true that Coſmo gave away many charms, he kept 'a good one for himſelf againſt hanging. Catherine 'de Medicis would have had him hanged; but he 'would not: ſhe had only the ſatisfaction to ſee him 'chained, and his journey to Marſeilles was the only 'toil and fatigue that he went through. He got 'ſome friends there, who prevailed with the captain 'of his galley to take him into his houſe; which 'was never ſo much frequented upon his account, 'as it was then by reaſon of that illuſtrious galley-'ſlave. He turned it into a ſchool of Mathematics 'and Judicial Aſtrology, having a keeper, who looked 'rather like a man given him out of honour, than 'in order to obſerve him and prevent his eſcape.' Thuanus ſays, that la Mole had an image of wax pricked in the heart, and that Ruggeri being proſecuted as a Magician, was ſet at liberty by the queen-mother. I ſhall ſet down Thuanus's words and la Mole's anſwers in the remark [E].

(1) Mezerai, Abregé Choronol. Tom. v, p. 180, ad ann. 1574.

(2) Le Laboureur, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 408.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Viz. in page 401, where are theſe words: There are ſcarcely any ſuch criminals who will not endure all kinds of torture, if their life depend on their confeſſion. Which will appear by Coſmo Rogieri, of whom we ſhall ſpeak afterwards; who was known to be one of the principal in the ſecret, and had violated his fidelity to the queen, who had placed him with the duke her ſon for a ſpy.

[B] He had openly and inſolently declared that he died an Atheiſt.] Theſe are the words of the Mercure François. Old age, the Gout and the Stone, having reduced him to a dying condition, his friends adviſed him to think of GOD, and ſent for the curate of the pariſh; but he would not ſee him: they brought him ſome Capuchins; but he laughed at them. When he was told that he ſhould duly prepare himſelf to obtain GOD's mercy, and be afraid of the laſt judgment, he anſwered: O ye fools! there are no Devils but the enemies that torment us in this world, nor any God beſides kings and princes who can raiſe us and do us good (5). If you prefer the paraphraſe of a Jeſuit to the plainneſs of this account, read the following words (6). 'The 'Gout and the Gravel . . . . . like two officers of 'death, having ſeized on him, waſted and conſumed 'him; but they left him a ſound and a clear judg-'ment to repent of his ſins if he would have 'taken warning. Four days before he died, the 'curate of St Medard viſited him, being in bed, and 'endeavoured to make him ſenſible of his duty; 'but he would not hear him. Some honeſt Capuchins 'were ſent for to try whether they could work upon 'him: they came to ſee him at the requeſt of ſome 'of his friends, and laid before him the ſeverity of 'GOD's judgments, and the power and malice of 'Satan in this laſt ſtage of a man's life, telling him 'that he ſhould think of his ſalvation. But he 'anſwered them with the tone of a mad and deſ-'perate man, you fools, get out of my chamber; 'I would have you know that there are no other 'Devils but our enemies, who do us miſchief in this 'world, nor any God beſides kings and princes who 'do us good: I have lived in this belief and I will 'die in it. They omitted neither fair words, nor 'threatnings to bring him into the right way; but it 'was to no purpoſe: From that time he went on 'uttering moſt horrid blaſphemies, as Lucilio (Vanini) 'had done upon the wood-pile; till at laſt he 'ended his wretched life as Judas did, Infelicem 'ſpiritum non emiſit, ſed amiſit. The noiſe of his 'deſpair was immediately ſpread all over Paris; he 'was curſed by the people, and his body was thrown 'upon a lay-ſtall, as being unworthy of Chriſtian 'burial (7).'

(5) Mercure François, Tom. iv, pag. 46.

(6) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 156, 157.

(7) Spitelius in Scrutinio Atheiſmi, pag. 130. It is the wrong place to mention the Atheiſts that were burnt alive.

[C] He had been accuſed of having made uſe of witchcraft againſt the life of Henry IV.] That prince being at Nantes in the year 1598, was told that Coſmo Ruggeri was guilty of that crime. There was a report that this man, being then an eccleſiaſtic, had a private cloſet in the caſtle of Nantes, wherein he ſhut up himſelf every day, under pretence of painting, but in truth to prick with a needle a wax image like the king. He gave ſome hopes that by this means the king would pine away with a lingring diſeaſe. Coſmus Rugerius tunc ſacris addictus ad regem delatus fuerat, quaſi ipſius vitæ deteſtandis magicæ artibus perniciem molitus eſſet. Nam in arce Namnetenſi ſpecie pingendi cellam peculiarem habuiſſe, in qua ceream imaginem, quæ regis

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Thuanus, and dismissed without punishment. The account I shall give (i) of this attempt will shew us the impudence of that wicked man, and the favour he was in with the ladies. Many reflexions might be made upon his addicting himself to Astrology and Magic, though he believed neither a GOD nor a Devil [D]; for it is a general opinion among Christians,

(i) In the remark [D].

regis speciem referebat, diris epodis excantatam cottidie acu figebat, eaque re fore spem fecerat, ut rex mox mortifero langore sensim absumeretur (8). The king ordered Thuanus, and another Judge to enquire into that affair. Cosmo being juridically interrogated, answered first of all the objection that was made to him, grounded upon his having been put to the torture for such a thing in the year 1574. He maintained that he had been then falsly accused, and that his innocence had been acknowledged by his Judges; that his being suspected of Magic, was only grounded upon his skill in Astrology; because people thought that he could not foretel so many things without the assistance of the Devil, though he had only foretold them by an exact knowledge of nativities (9). He added that the great affection he had conceived for the king long ago was sufficient to clear him from the crime charged upon him. He said that after the Paris-massacre, the court of France took into consideration what they should do with the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, and that Catherine de Medicis asked him whether he had calculated their nativities; and that he answered her he had done it, and knew by that means they would occasion no disturbances in the kingdom. He added that his answer prevented the ill designs that were formed against them; that he had acquainted la Noue with it, and desired him to give them notice of it, that for the time to come they might behave themselves so as to confirm what he had told Catherine meerly out of affection for them; since such things could not be certainly discovered by Astrology (10). He concluded with saying that he hoped his majesty, remembring so good a service, would have more regard to it than to the malicious and false accusations of his informers. Thuanus gave an account of all these things to the king: that prince, after walking a while, acknowledged that la Noue had told him so at that time, and he ordered that Ruggeri should be set at liberty, and that all informations against him should be superseded. The ladies had already obtained the pardon of that wretched man, who quickly appeared at court very familiar with them. Intermissa ulterior in Cosmum inquisitio & ipse libertati restitutus fuit, & in arctam familiaritatem cum gynæceo venit, cujus favore à Rege, cum hæc diceret, jam gratia in arcano facta fuerat (11). Thuanus, mentions a thing, which ought not to be omitted. Ruggeri, was so impudent as to say that it was not he, but a Gardener of the same name, who had been accused and punished in la Mole's time, and he imposed upon them in such a manner that he had a pension of Historiographer bestowed upon him. Homo impudentissimus ac perditissimus postea ausus est palam dicere quæ ad annum LXXIII. de Cosmo Rugerio commemorantur, ad se minime pertinere, sed Thuanum olitoris cujusdam cognominis tunc postulati errore allucinatum esse; eoque væsaniæ venit, ut emendicato stipendio in aula obtinuerit, ut scribendæ historiæ munus sibi demandaretur (12). Admire that man's impudence. The answers he made to the two commissioners appointed to examine him at Nantes, signed with his own hand, were still extant, wherein he acknowledged that he was the same Cosmo Ruggeri, who had been falsly accused, when la Mole was tried; but he maintained that he had been honourably acquitted by the Judges; by this his impudence plainly appears, for the records of his process testify that he was condemned to the gallies. Iis (confessionibus) eundem se esse minime diffitetur, sed per calumniam accusatum, & postea honorifice, sicuti jam dixi, dimissum; in quo rursus insigniter mentitus est, nam ex archivis Curiæ itidem constat, eum post quæstionem ad triremeis damnatum esse, sed aulicorum in hoc hominum genus prono favore pœnam remissam fuisse, & cum duceretur, vinculis exemptum in aula statim comparuisse (13). I must further add, that the commissioners having told him at Nantes, that Judicial Astrology being a thing impious and unworthy of a Christian, he was very much to blame for applying himself to it, especially considering that he was a priest; he excused himself as well as he could, and even spoke of that science in a contemptible manner, and swore that he had never calculated any nativity since he was a priest (14).

(8) Thuan. de vita sua, lib. vi, ad ann. 1598. pag. 1234, col. i. C.

(9) Ob id autem plerisque suspectum fuisse, quod astrologiæ peritus certiorem ac sibi cum paucis cognitam natalium horarum confidendarum scientiam calleret, cujus ope ac ductu cum multa multis prædixisset, in eam venisse opinionem, quasi occulta cum malis spiritibus familiaritate hæc didicisset. Id. ibid.

(10) Id autem non tam ex arte, quam adfectu erga ipsos bene animato fecisse, quippe cum res ejusmodi esset, ut per astrologicæ artis rationem præstari non posset. Id. ibid. col. ii, A.

(11) Id. ibid. B.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Id. ibid. C.

[D] His addicting himself to Astrology and Magic, though he believed neither a GOD nor a Devil.] Mark well the confession he made, when he was dying. There are no other Devils, said he (15), but the enemies who torment us in this world, nor any God besides kings and princes, who can raise us and do us good. He added, according to Garasse (16), I have lived in this belief, and in this belief I will die. If this addition was made by that Jesuit, I think it may be justified by the laws of paraphrase; for it is almost an indubitable thing, that an old man, who dies an Atheist has been an Atheist a long time. People do not grow irreligious upon their death-bead, nor even in their old-age; on the contrary the greatest part of the wits, libertines, and unbelievers, &c. renounce their impiety in their sicknesses (17), and die making orthodox declarations (18). It is therefore very likely that our Ruggeri had been for a long time such as he died. To what purpose then did he cast nativities, and make wax images, which he distributed as so many causes of love and sickness? Such things can scarcely be reconciled: all those, who mention his death, make the following reflexion upon it. He had formerly made people believe . . . . . that he knew how to make images, &c. and YET that Atheist did not believe that there was any Devil (19). The wisest men were then (20) of opinion, that he had no knowledge of Necromancy, and INDEED THE ISSUE of his life made it plainly appear (21). It is certain that since he did not believe the existence of any spirit distinct from human souls, he must needs have looked upon what is said on Magic as fabulous; and consequently his pretending to make images, which had the power to kill, or to inspire love, proceeded only from a greedy desire of getting money. He knew himself, the vanity of his promises, and that the pricking of images with a needle was ineffectual. It is not so certain that he knew the vanity of Astrology: A man of sense and learning does clearly perceive that a piece of wax in the shape of a man or of a woman which is pricked in the heart, cannot produce in any distant person the desire of marrying a certain man, or any other kind of passion. He evidently knows that a piece of wax, which represents Henry IV, whether it be put near the fire at Nantes, or pricked in several places in the same town, cannot bring an hectic and mortal fever upon that king at Paris. And therefore any man of judgment, sense, or learning, who is persuaded that those wax images have such a power, must needs know that those effects are produced by an invisible spirit, which works immediately and physically upon certain persons, whilst those images are in such circumstances. Ruggeri did not believe that there was any such spirit, and therefore he knew that those images had no such virtue. But it does not so evidently appear, that the celestial bodies are not capable of producing many effects upon earth. It is well known that some persons, who were accounted Atheists, seemed to be persuaded of the influence of the stars, even with respect to the free actions of men, and what we call fortune, or contingent events. And therefore it is not certain that Ruggeri was sensible of the vanity of Judicial Astrology. However I believe it may safely be said, considering the turn of his mind (22), that he gave nativities about as impostors use to do, without giving any credit to them, and to trick people out of their money.

Perhaps it will be objected to me, that it is as difficult to believe that a certain planet, situated in a certain manner in the figure of one's nativity, is the physical cause of the kind reception a prince gives to a man of fifty years of age, who waits upon him at a certain hour, as to believe that a wax image pricked in the heart can produce an act of love in a man a hundred leagues off. To which I answer, that this effect of the planet appears to many people as chimerical as the effect of the image, and I am one of them; but I repeat it again,

(14) Ipse se quibus potuit verbis etiam elevata ea, excusavit, & inter alia adjecit ac religiose affirmavit, se postquam sacris addictus esset, quod diu postea fuit, nunquam natalem cujusquam horas conscisse. Id. ib. D & E.

(15) Mercure François, ubi supra, pag. 46.

(16) Garasse, ubi supra, pag. 157.

(17) See the article BION the Borysthenite, remark [E].

(18) That is orthodox with respect to the providence of God, and Heaven, and Hell.

(19) Mercure François, ubi supra, pag. 47. See also the Continuator of Thuanus, lib. viii, pag. 537.

(20) That is, when la Mole was beheaded.

(21) Garasse, ubi supra, p. 155.

(22) We have seen above, citation (10), that he assured that the king of Navarre's and the prince of Condé's nativity promised that they would cause no disturbance, and yet that he did not learn this from Astrology.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Chriſtians, that if there are Devils, there is a GOD, and that thoſe who do not believe the

it is an eaſier thing to be deceived with reſpect to the power of the planets, than that of thoſe wax figures. Not one learned man can be alledged, who believed that thoſe figures inſpire love, and occaſion death a hundred leagues off by their own power, and without the interpoſition of any ſpirit; but ſome men of learning may be alledged, who believed that without the help of good or bad angels, the planets of man's nativity are the cauſe of his moſt accidental adventures. It is eaſily conceived that a piece of wax pricked at Nantes, heated and modified at one's pleaſure, cannot be the phyſical cauſe of any thing at Rome; but it is known by experience that the virtue of the ſun produces a thouſand things upon earth phyſically and as a true cauſe: which is the reaſon why people are led into an error, thinking that the operations of the planets do likewiſe reach the earth; which being once admitted will carry a man a great way by degrees, and at laſt they are looked upon as the cauſe of every thing.

THAT if judicial Aſtrology diſcovered futurity, it would be a kind of black Magic.

I muſt obſerve, by the by, that this illuſion ſhould be more ſeverely checked than it is; for were it true, for inſtance, that by means of nativities one may know beforehand the happineſs or misfortunes of others, the circumſtances of their marriages and death, &c. were it true, for inſtance, that Gauricus diſcovered, by an Aſtrological operation, that king Henry II would be killed in a duel, Aſtrology ſhould be accounted one of the magical arts, and of thoſe ways of knowing things to come, that are grounded on a covenant with the Devil. The pains Aſtrologers are at in calculating a nativity, and conſulting the rules they have laid down upon the diſtinction of the ſigns, the properties of the houſes, the different aſpects of the planets, &c. I ſay, their pains in that reſpect would be like that of Magicians, who draw circles, make many poſtures in them, utter certain words, &c (23). On both ſides what a man does would be only a ſign by inſtitution, upon making whereof a bad angel would act in a certain manner. Any one, who conſiders the thing impartially, will plainly ſee that magical ceremonies, a circle, a bow, a wand ſucceſſively pointed to the four cardinal points of the horizon, certain words uttered, and others written upon a piece of paper, &c. can no more cure a man dangerouſly ſick, than a figure of the nativity can diſcover whether a man will meet with a happy match, whether he will get the love of ſome princes, whether he will be baniſhed, whether he will be a rich man in land or money, and whether he will die at ſea, or at the ſiege of a town. Which ſhews that an Aſtrologer ſhould be liable to a greater puniſhment, according as he tells more certainly the truth of things to come; for the certainty of his predictions would be a ſign that he carefully performs the ceremonies, upon performing of which the Devils are engaged by their firſt covenant to reveal things to come. This further proves that Judicial Aſtrology cannot be a way of foretelling future events different from a ſieve, a looking-glaſs, ſmoak, and an hundred other abominations (24). From whence I conclude that the indulgence of the Eccleſiaſtical and Secular courts to Aſtrologers is very criminal. There are very good Civil and Canonical laws againſt that ſort of men. They have been carefully collected by a profeſſor of Padua, in a book publiſhed at Venice, in the year 1662 (25); but they are not put in execution. Did not John Baptiſt Morinus, Regius profeſſor at Paris, quietly enjoy his penſions and offices till he died, tho' every body knew he calculated nativities, and boaſted publickly that he had a wonderful ſkill in it (26)? Had he ventured to maintain, that relics ſhould not be worſhipped, he would have been degraded the very next day; he would have been ſhamefully expelled; and if any conſiderable perſon durſt have protected him, all the clergy would have been in an uproar, and nothing could have pacified them but the depoſing of ſuch an impious man. What Partiality to errors! he was ſuffered to practiſe all his lifetime, without being puniſhed for it, an art which muſt needs be magical, if things to come may be known by it. Obſerve, I pray, that it is a difficult thing to apprehend how they can be known by the help of the Devil; for tho' the knowledge of angels be ſuppoſed never ſo great, it does not ſeem to include the concatenation of all the objects that muſt be known to foretel certainly that ſuch and ſuch things will come to paſs; and it would be an abſurd thing to ſay that God reveals them to the evil ſpirits, whenever they have a mind to execute the covenant which they have contracted with man. The abbot Furetiere does very clearly propoſe this objection (27); but he forgets the main difficulty: he does not ſay that man's free-will would be a mere chimera, if angels could foretel a man's thoughts ten years hence; if they could, I ſay, foretel them by the knowledge of the connection that is between natural cauſes and their effects.

(23) See in the 12th letter of Cyrano de Bergerac a long deſcription of magical ceremonies.

(24) See an alphabetical catalogue of them in the 35th chapter of a book printed at at Paris, and afterwards in Holland in 1692, intitled, Remarques ou reflexions critiques, morales, & hiſtoriques, ſur les plus belles & les plus agreables penſées des Anciens & des Moderns. I believe the author took all this out of Martin Delrio's book.

(25) Don Joſeph Maria Maravigia Clerk Regular, in his Pieudomantia veterum & recentiorum expoſita, five de fide divinationibus adhibenda.

(26) See the article of this MORINUS.

(27) See Furetiriana, page 190, & ſeq. Edit. of Bruſſels.

Nothing could be more abſurd than to aſk, Whether it be poſſible that Ruggeri, who denied the exiſtence of GOD, and of good and bad angels, ſhould have believed that his wax images had ſome virtue in them; but it were no abſurd thing to put this queſtion to all Atheiſts. It is commonly believed that all thoſe, who deny the exiſtence of GOD, do likewiſe deny, by a neceſſary conſequence, the exiſtence of all ſpirits, and the immortality of the ſoul. I do not wonder that this ſhould be a common opinion, for I think there is no example of the ſeparation of thoſe two blaſphemies (28), I mean that there never was any Atheiſt, who believed the exiſtence of Devils and the immortality of the ſoul; or that there never was a man perſuaded of the truth of Magic, but believed the exiſtence of GOD. Some Chriſtians, who are orthodox in all other points, cannot believe that bad angels concern themſelves with any thing, and reject, without any exception, what is commonly ſaid of Magic and Sorcery. If they were contented to ſay that the exiſtence and operation of bad angels can only be proved from the Scripture, I ſhould not ſo much wonder at their opinion; for it is certain that reaſon affords great arguments againſt the empire of the Devil, which are grounded on our notions of God's wiſdom and goodneſs: but it is a great piece of temerity, to ſay no worſe, in thoſe who deny that the Devil has any power, to pretend to reconcile their opinion with the Scripture. However it be, the following conſequence is falſe and unjuſt, You do not believe that there are any devils, and therefore you do not believe that there is a GOD. As for this other conſequence, You do not believe that there is a GOD, and therefore you do not believe that there are any good or bad angels, it ſeems to be very certain; for, as I have already ſaid, no example can be alledged to diſprove it. Here is another conſequence, which ſeems to be certain, there are Devils, therefore there is a God. People are ſo fully perſuaded of the neceſſity of ſuch a conſequence, that they peremptorily affirm that thoſe, who deny the exiſtence of Devils, deprive the orthodox of an undeniable proof of GOD's exiſtence. I confeſs that hitherto I have not ſeen any body but ſeemed to me fully perſuaded, that the exiſtence of the Devil, is a neceſſary and irreſragable proof of the exiſtence of GOD; and you will ſee no man, who doubts ever ſo little of this laſt truth, (29), but abſolutely denies that there are angels. However, I confeſs I have not a ſufficient penetration to ſee that ſtrict connection, which every body perceives between theſe two aſſertions, There are devils; therefore there is a GOD. Laying aſide the Scripture, to go upon Metaphyſical principles, may one not ſay that GOD has created no other ſpirits but the ſoul of man? If it be aſked why ſo powerful a Being has not produced other beings, it may be anſwered, that he was not pleaſed to do it; he has produced all things with a perfect liberty; more of one kind, and fewer of another: his will, always directed by an infinite wiſdom, was the only rule that he went by. What can one ſay againſt ſuch a reaſon? Go to an Atheiſt, and aſk him, why he denies the exiſtence of Devils; he will give you a pitiful anſwer, and if you preſs him hard, he will be quickly ſilent. Will he ſay that the univerſe being infinite and eternal, the moſt perfect Being, which neceſſarily exiſts, contains nothing that exceeds man in underſtanding and knowledge? What! becauſe man has two eyes, a noſe, a mouth, a brain, nerves and veins, muſt all the knowledge and induſtry of nature fall to his ſhare? Muſt there be no will, no underſtanding, no paſſions, no art of applying bodies one to another any where elſe? If you could make it out that a free agent was pleaſed

WHETHER it can well be concluded from the exiſtence of Devils that there is a God.

(28) See hereafter what reſtriction is put to this in ſpeaking of the Eaſtern nations.

(29) That is, the exiſtence of God.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the exiſtence of GOD, do not believe that there are Devils. I ſhall ſay ſomething on that opinion. I muſt take notice of Father Garaſſe's miſtakes [E].

pleaſed to beſtow knowledge upon no other beings but ſuch as have a brain, you would put me to a ſtand; but you acknowledge no ſuch cauſe. According to your principles every thing exiſts and acts neceſſarily; and therefore you cannot tell me why an impalpable matter ſhould be leſs ingenious than that which we call fleſh and blood, a man, a beaſt, &c. and if you argue right, you ought to believe that ſince the infinite Being thinks in a man, it thinks every where elſe; and that if there are many living bodies upon earth, which love and hate one another, and ſome of which are oppreſſed by others; there are alſo in the air, or elſewhere, ſome compounded beings, that love man, and ſome that hate him, and are more knowing and powerful than man. Thoſe will be good angels, and theſe bad angels. In a word, ſince an Atheiſt cannot deny that there are wicked, envious, and revengeful beings (30), which are pleaſed with the miſfortunes of others, and by the application of bodies produce ſtrange changes in nature according to their paſſions, he will make himſelf ridiculous if he dares to deny that beſides thoſe wicked beings, which are the objects of his eyes, there are many others which he does not ſee, and which are ſtill more malicious and knowing than man. And therefore it may be ſaid, that if the univerſe was not the work of GOD, it would neceſſarily contain bad angels, as it contains wolves and men; but ſince it is the work of GOD, it is not at all neceſſary it ſhould contain ſuch and ſuch things, and conſequently the exiſtence of Devils is not ſo good a proof of the exiſtence of GOD, as it is commonly believed. It is more proper to corroborate Manicheiſm (31) than to maintain the orthodox faith. I propoſe this only as a problem to be examined.

(30) By thoſe Beings I mean mankind.

(31) Mr Becker inſiſts very much in charging Divines with introducing Manicheiſm, by the power which they aſcribe to the Devils. He is in the wrong to accuſe them of this, ſince they build upon Scripture. I here conſider things as a Philoſopher.

A CONSIDERATION upon the religion of the Eaſtern nations.

Thus it were poſſible, tho' ſuch a thing, in all appearance, never happened, that ſome men no leſs atheiſtical in ſome reſpects than Ruggeri was, ſhould nevertheleſs believe that ſome wax images, with the help of ſome ceremonies, might inſpire love, or occaſion, death a hundred leagues off. They would look upon thoſe ceremonies only as a ſign of agreement, whereby a Devil would be determined to produce ſome effects by the application of bodies, whoſe force would be known to him.

I deſire you to take notice that hitherto I have only conſidered the knowledge we have of the opinions of the antient Pagans and modern Europeans; for I confeſs, that what is ſaid of the religion of the Eaſtern nations, does not permit me to uſe the general expreſſion I made uſe of. We are told (32) that the Siameſe acknowledge no Deity, and yet they (33) believe the return and apparition of ſpirits; that they are afraid of the dead, and practiſe ſome ceremonies to pacify them. (34) Beſides they offer up prayers to the good genii almoſt upon all occaſions, and make imprecations againſt the bad ones. Such men are well qualified to be Magicians, without believing any Deity. The author of the relation I have quoted, adds, That (35) the Indians believe now as the antient Chineſe did, that there are good and bad ſouls every where, on which they have as it were beſtowed the almighty power of God. The meaning of which is, that they acknowledge no ſupreme Deity, but an infinite number of genii, ſome good, and others bad; and therefore they may be both Atheiſts and Magicians. The notions of the learned in that country, are more like thoſe of the Europeans; for if, on the one ſide, they are Atheiſts, they deny on the other the exiſtence of ſpirits, and the immortality of the ſoul. Several relations of China tell us, that the men of letters, who are the moſt conſiderable men in that country, look upon funeral ceremonies only as civil duties, without mixing any prayers with them; that they have at this day no ſenſe of religion, and do not believe either the exiſtence of GOD, or the immortality of the ſoul; and that tho' they pay an outward worſhip to Confucius in the temples conſecrated to him, they do not beg of him the learning which the lettered men of Tonquin deſire him to beſtow upon them (36). Their outward worſhip of Confucius is therefore a mere mummery with reſpect to them; they conform to it out of policy. Read the following paſſage, there you ſhall ſee that they deny not only a Supreme Intelligence, but alſo inferior beings endowed with intelligence. By little and little, the Litterati, that is thoſe who have taken ſome degree in literature, and are the only perſons that have a hand in the government, becoming wholly impious, and yet having made no alteration in the ſtile of their predeceſſors, have changed the ſoul of Heaven, and all other ſouls, into I know not what ætherial ſubſtances, deprived of knowledge, and for a ſovereign judge of our actions, have only ſet up a blind fate, which, in their opinion, does whatever a moſt powerful, wiſe and juſt Being might do (37).

(32) La Loubere, Relation de Siam, Tom. i, cap. xxii, num. 6, pag. m. 501.

(33) Id. ibid. cb. xx, num. 20, pag. 481.

(34) Id. ibid.

(35) Id. ib. chap. xxiii, num. 8, pag. 508.

(36) Id. ibid. chap. xx, num. 4, p. 467, 470.

[E] I muſt take notice of Father Garaſſe's miſtakes.] I. He ſays (38) that about fifteen days before Coſmo Ruggeri died, in the year 1615, a ſmall book came out at Paris with this title, Hiſtoire épouvantable de deux Magiciens eſtranglez par le Diable la ſemaine ſainčte (39). (A dreadful hiſtory of two Magicians ſtrangled by the Devil in the holy week). But we are told in the Mercure François (40), that Ruggeri's death occaſioned that ſmall book. There is no doubt that the author of that Mercure is more exact and credible than the author of the Doctrine Curieuſe; and therefore all the moral reflexions of the latter, grounded upon forerunning reports, fall to the ground. I muſt not forget theſe words of the Mercure (41): The firſt of thoſe two Magicians was Cæſar, that famous cheat, who tricked all the curious of his time of their money, to ſhew them Devils, or to put them in the way of finding treaſures, and then laughed at them. It was reported that he had been ſtrangled by his Devil, and yet he is ſtill alive, being a priſoner in the Baſtile. The ſecond was this abbot of St Mahé. II. Garaſſe goes on thus (42): It happened in the year MD LXXIV, that la Mole and Caconas (43) being condemned by a decree of parliament, as perſons convicted of witchcraft and enchantment, upon occaſion of Charles IXth's death, Coſmo Ruggeri was involved in their accuſations, as having lent them a helping hand by his nécromancy. La Mole and Coconas were executed during the life of Charles IX; and therefore it is not true that they were put to death upon occaſion of his death. It does not appear that their witchcraft was levelled at that prince's life, and it cannot be ſaid that they were convicted of it. Here follows an abſtract of la Mole's anſwers when he was put to the rack. Being told that he had ſome waxen images in his houſe with two holes in their head, he has anſwered no. Being aſked about the waxen image, which is ſaid to have been found in his houſe, he ſays, ah! my God, I deſire I may die, if I have made any waxen image for the king. Being aſked about the golden figures in his hat, he ſays he knows nothing of them. Being again faſtened to the buckles and rings, he ſays that he knows no more than what he has ſaid. The little treſtle has been brought in again, and being exhorted to ſpeak the truth, he ſays, Gentlemen, I know nothing elſe upon the damnation of my ſoul; before the living God I know nothing elſe. True eternal God, my God, I do not know whether the waxen image was made for the king or for the queen. Being aſked where the ſaid image is, and if Coſmo had brought it to him, he ſays, that the ſaid image was made for his miſtreſs, his countrywoman, whom he had a mind to marry, and that it will appear it is the figure of a woman, and that the ſaid Coſmo has the ſaid image, and that the ſaid figure has two thruſts in the heart, and that he will ſhew it to be ſo. Being interrogated about the king's ſickneſs, he ſays, put me to death if poor la Molle had ever any ſuch thoughts, and deſires that Coſmo ſhould be ſent for; who will ſay there is nothing elſe in it. Being aſked where the ſaid waxen image is, he ſays Coſmo has it, and that it was made for a woman, and he did not deſire Coſmo to do any thing elſe, and that the ſaid Coſmo pricked it in the heart. Being aſked why he pricked it in the heart, he ſays he does not know. Water has been brought to him, he deſires it ſhould be removed, and ſays he will ſpeak the truth. He has been brought to the fire, and exhorted to ſpeak the truth about that waxen image; he ſays, I deny my God, and may I be damned for ever, if it be for any thing elſe than what I have ſaid (44). Here follows likewiſe an extract of the confeſſions extorted from Coconas by the torture. Being aſked about the waxen image, he ſays he knows nothing of it, and that Coſmo, and la Molle are moſt intimate friends. Being aſked whether he knows of any pictures or characters made againſt the king, he ſays no; and that he was diſcourſing about it with a captain of this town, who told him they had broke all the rings of la Molle; and that he aſked the ſaid captain whether they had broke a ring as big as one's finger, and that if there

(37) Id. ibid. ch. xxiii, num. 14, pag. 514. Compare what is above citation (55) of the article MALHERBE.

(38) Garaſſe, Doctrine curieuſe, book ii, §. viii, p. 155.

(39) Id. ibid. pag. 154. See alſo Thuanus's Continuator, lib. viii, pag. 537.

(40) Tom. iv, pag. 47.

(41) Ibid.

(42) Garaſſe, ubi ſupra.

(43) It ſhould be Coconas.

(44) Le Labourer, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 411.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

there was any thing, it would be found there. He further says, he never heard any thing spoken of an attempt upon the king's life. Being asked whether he knew any thing about the waxen figure, he says no, and if any body knows any thing of it, it is Cosmo (45). Thuanus says, that la Molle protested, that this waxen image was only designed to inspire a woman with love. Tortus Mola & interrogatus de imaguncula cerea, quam magicis præstigiis ab ipso confictam, & acu in corde tactam constabat, quem in rei usum id faceret, & cujus opera ad id uteretur: respondit, ut puellam quandam in Provincia, quam efflictim deperiebat, hac arte ad mutuo se redamandum accenderet, id feciſſe; eaque in re usum opera Cosmi Rugerii Florentini, qui mox comprehensus & tanquam maleficus omnino rasus, Reginæ favore, quæ illius & hujusmodi hominum opera perfamiliariter utebatur, periculo exemptus est (46). III. Garasse is not exact in the following words. 'This man having been delivered 'from that danger by his mistress's favour, he suffered himself to be seduced with an unhappy fancy 'of being accounted a great Astrologer, and one who 'had a wonderful skill in that art, so that he promised waxen images to all the curious debauchees, 'to inspire love or hatred; and as those two passions are equally foolish, he had a greater practice in 'Paris than if he had promised pardons, and plenary 'indulgences (47).' This author, in order to prove that Cosmo was willing to be accounted a man of great skill in Judicial Astrology, says that he promised waxen images. These images have been at all times looked upon as effects or fooleries of Magic, and do not belong to Judicial Astrology: they are not reckoned among Talismans; and the manner how they are used plainly shews that their virtues, whether true or false, do not depend upon the constellations. We are told that they must be pricked with needles; they must be heated with a slow fire, &c. and great alterations will happen by that means in those who are the objects of such practices. This cannot be natural; the influences of the stars cannot produce such effects; it is black Magic; it is the Devil's work. The Pagans ascribed that practice to none but witches.

Devovet absentes, simulacraque cerea fingit,
Et miserum tenues in jecur urget acus (48).

In molten wax, tho' absent, kills by art,
And with her needle goars the tortur'd heart.

I observe that the Mercure François does not say, as Garasse does, that Cosmo promised waxen images, to inspire love or hatred (49). He promised waxen images, some to make women love those that courted them, and others to make such persons die in a lingering condition as one desired, by uttering their names and invoking certain Devils (50). We are told a pleasant story about Tamerlane's daughters: it is said that their father would have them learn Magic, and that with the help of some images they facilitated the conquest of the provinces he designed to subdue. Audivi ab aliquibus qui dictum Tamerlanum diu noverunt, quod habuit tres filias quas in arte magica fecit instrui, in qua mirabiliter profecerunt, quæ incantationes, & exorcizationes, & IMAGINES contra provincias quas sibi subjicere voluit facere consueverunt, quæ plerumque effectum sortitæ fuerant (51). IV. The following words contain a wrong argument: That wretched man .... went on with that infamous trade, till the year 1604, though he was an abbot, assisting the disorderly passions of all the loose courtiers: from that year 1604 he began to take another course. For he betook himself to write Almanacks, some under the name of Quelberus, others under the name of Vannerus, or the Weeping Pilgrim of Savoy (52). Garasse had just joined the making of waxen images and the study of Astrology, as two things one whereof is the proof of the other; and then all of a sudden he tells us, that as soon as Cosmo began to write Almanacks, he left off distributing those images to the loose courtiers: in which there is a contradiction and a wrong argument. Though a man writes Almanacks, he may be still a cheat with respect to those images. The Mercure François does not at all agree with Garasse about all the fictitious names prefixed to Rugeri's Almanacks. Compare the words of the Jesuit with these (53): From the year 1604 he wrote Almanacks every year, some under the name of Querberus, others under the name of Vannerus and the Weeping Pilgrim of Savoy, which he adorned with verses or sentences out of the best Latin Poets and Orators.

(45) Le Laboureur, ibid. pag. 412, 413.

(46) Thuan. Histor. lib. lviii, pag. lxiv. col. i, A. See d'Aubigné, who has only abridged Thuanus in this place as well as in many others, Histoire Universelle, Tom. ii, lib. ii. chap. vi, pag. m. 688.

(47) Garasse, ubi supra. p. 156.

(48) Ovid, speaking of Medea in Epist. Hypsip. ad Jason. See Frommannus de Fascinatione, lib. iii, Part. v, cap. vi, pag. m. 718. He cites also Horace, Sat. VIII, lib. i. & Cujas in Paratit. cod. de Malefic & Mathemat.

(49) However it is true that those images are sometimes designed to inspire hatred. See Servius on these words of Virgil, Eclog. VIII, ver. 80. Limus ut hic durescit, & hæc ut cera liquescit Uno eodemque igni.

(50) Mercure François, Tom. iv, pag. 47. See also the Continuation of Thuanus, book xxx, pag. 537.

(51) Theodoricus à Niem, de Schismate, lib. ii, pag. m. 114.

(52) Garasse, ubi supra, pag. 156.

(53) Merc. François, Tom. iv, pag. 46.

RUSSILIANUS (TIBERIUS) a most subtile and bold Philosopher, lived in the XVIth century. He was born in Calabria, and was one of the most celebrated disciples of Augustinus Niphus. He was so hasty and so passionate, that when he disputed with other students he would sometimes come to Blows, which made Niphus in a jest, which at that time might pass for wit, call him Turberius (a) instead of Tiberius (b). He had the ambition to imitate Joannes Picus, and perhaps even to surpass him; for he proposed, to be publickly disputed in several colleges of Italy, four hundred propositions taken from almost all sciences (c). The Inquisitors were enraged at it, as they had been on account of the like proceeding of Joannes Picus, and they thought it very strange that Russilianus who was so very young should have the impudence to maintain several doctrines which to them appeared to be impious [A]. They

(a) That is a turbulent person.

(b) August. Niphus de Viro aulico, cap. lix, pag. 316.

(c) See Naudæus in Judicio de Aug. Nipho, pag. 40.

[A] The Inquisitors .... thought it very strange .... that he had the impudence to maintain several opinions which to them appeared to be impious.] He maintained that JESUS CHRIST, with respect to the temperament of the body, and in the course of his life, was subject to the influences of the stars; that time and the Heavens never had any beginning; that the deluge of Noah was not the only one which had happened. He revived many of the doctrines of Joannes Picus which had been condemned. This is asserted by Gabriel Naudæus. 'Tam ardenter Pici Mirandulani vestigiis 'insistisse certum est, ut non secus ac ille, propositiones supra quadringentas, ex omni ferme scientiarum genere selectas, publicis in Italiæ Gymnasiis, 'disputandas proposuerit; sed invitis tamen ac frementibus, quemadmodum etiam Pico contigerat, sacris fidei quæsitoribus, qui patienter ferre non poterant, ab hoc tam præcocis ut sapientiæ, sic ætatis 'Philosopho, Christum quoad sui corporis temperiem, '& vitæ mortisque historiam legibus Astrorum subjici: 'Tempus, & Cœlum, durationis æternæ constitui; 'Inundationem illam universalem, quam nos Christiani semel dumtaxat accidisse contendimus, fannis, & 'dicacibus verbis excipi, quasi certis temporum inclinationibus reverti solitam: Cætera denique Placita 'quæ dudum à Pico in medium proposita, temeritatis, '& hæreticæ labis damnata fuerant, rursum in scenam, 'Academicarum concertationum palæstram, revocari '(1). - - - It is certain he so zealously followed the example of Picus Mirandula, that, in like manner as he had done, he proposed above four hundred Propositions, taken from all sciences, to be debated in all the public schools of Italy, to the great displeasure and vexation of the holy Fathers of the Inquisition, who could not bear that, by a Philosopher of so early an understanding and age, Christ, as to the temperament of his body, and history of his life and death, should be made subject to the dominion of the stars: that time, and the Heavens, should be said to be of eternal duration; that an universal Deluge, which, we Christians hold to have been but once, should be scoffed at, as a thing which had often happened: and finally that the other doctrines of Picus, long since condemned of temerity and heretical pravity should be again brought on the stage, for subjects of academical disputation.' Mr Heidegger accuses him of having maintained the opinion of one Henricus Mechlinius, disciple of Albertus Magnus, that the Deluge was caused by the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the sign Cancer towards the end, over against the sign Argo Navis. 'Et Mechlinius quidem 'in

(1) Naudæus, in Judicio de Nipho, pag. 40.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

They ſtirred up perſecutions againſt him which did not at all fright him, and he had the courage to publiſh againſt the Monks a very ſharp apology [B]. I have elſewhere (d) quoted an oration wherein he introduces Philoſophy repreſenting her grievances to Pope Leo X.

(d) In the remark [B] of the firſt NIPHUS.

' in Commentariis, quos edidit in magnas Albumaſaris conjunctiones, reſert, ſe inveniſſe ex aſtronomicis ſupputationibus, quod Noëticum Diluvium præceſſerit conjunctio quædam Aſtrorum, generalem Aquarum Illuvionem inducens, nimirum Jovis & Saturni in fine Cancri, è regione Argolicæ Navis per quam etiam Arca Noë ſignificatur. Verùm hanc Sententiam ſuperiori ſeculo à Tiberio Calabro defenſam reſutavit Hieronymus Armellinus Dominicanus, edito peculiari adverſus eum volumine, in quo eam tamquam hæreticam æſtuante ſtomacho damnavit (2). ' - - - Mechlinius in the Commentaries he publiſhed upon the great conjunctions of Albumaſar, ſays, that he had found by Aſtronomical calculations, that the flood of Noah was preceded by a certain conjunction of the ſtars which brought on an univerſal inundation of waters, namely the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the extremity of Cancer, oppoſite to the conſtellation of the ſhip Argo, whereby alſo was ſignified the ark of Noah. But this opinion maintained in the laſt age by Tiberius of Calabria, was confuted by the Dominican Jerom Armellinus, in a particular treatiſe he publiſhed againſt him, wherein he in great paſſion condemns it as heretical.'

(2) Heidegger Hiſt. Patriarch. Exercitat. xviii, pag. 538, Tom. i, he ſays the ſame in his Diſſertation de Signis cœleſtibus, pag. 679.

[B] He had the courage to publiſh a very ſharp apology againſt the Monks.] We will go on with the words of Gabriel Naudæus. ' Quamobrem ſeveriùs in illum, ' & diligentiùs inquirere cœperunt, ſed eo tamen ' luti dubiæ pugnæ exitu, ut Tyberius edito adverſus ' cucullatos Apologetico, talem enim libello ſuo titulum eſſe voluit, & opiniones ſuas liberiùs quàm anteà feciſſet propugnaſſe, & acriùs ejuſmodi cenſores ' ſuos, quàm rationi conſentaneum eſſet, pupugiſſe ' videretur (3). - - - Wherefore they began more ſeverely, and more carefully to inform againſt him, when on the other ſide he publiſhed an apology againſt the cowled Friars, for this was the title he gave his book, and more freely defended his own opinions than before he had done, and attacked his cenſurers with more poignancy than was conſiſtent with diſcretion.'

(3) Naudæus, in Judicio de Nipho, pag. 41.

RUTILIA, a Roman lady, ſiſter of that Publius Rutilius, who ſuffered with ſo great conſtancy the injuſtice of his baniſhment, and wife of Marcus Aurelius Cotta, had a ſon who was a man of great merit, whom ſhe loved tenderly, and whoſe death ſhe bore with great courage (a). Seneca has propoſed her for an example [A]. Cicero had a mind to do the ſame; but not being ſufficiently informed of the matter of fact, he had recourſe to Pomponius Atticus, who could not very well ſatisfy him [B]. The book wherein he deſigned to ſpeak of our Rutilia (b), being not extant, we know not whether he had all the information he wanted, and whether he did really ſpeak of her; but it is very likely he did. But what is moſt obſervable in this matter is, that we are told he deſired to be informed of ſome circumſtances he had already mentioned in his works (c). This would ſhew that the greateſt authors forget thoſe very things they have publiſhed.

(a) See remark [A] towards the end.

(b) In his book de Conſolatione.

(c) See the remark [B].

[A] Seneca has propoſed her for an example.] It is in the book he writ during his exile to comfort his good mother. He exhorts her to imitate our Rutilia among other ladies of reſolution. ' Rutilia, ſays he ' (1), Cottam filium ſecuta eſt in exilium, & uſque eo ' fuit indulgentia conſtricta, ut mallet exilium pati, ' quàm deſiderium: nec ante in patriam, quàm ' cum filio rediit. Eumdem jam reducem, & in ' Rep. florentem tam fortiter amiſit, quam ſecuta ' eſt: nec quiſquam lacrimas ejus poſt elatum filium ' notavit. In expulſo virtutem oſtendit, in amiſſo ' prudentiam, nam & nihil illam à pietate deterruit, ' & nihil in triſtitia ſupervacua ſtultaque detinuit. ' Cum his te numerari feminis volo, quarum vitam ' ſemper imitata es, &c. - - - Rutilia followed her ſon into baniſhment, and ſo great was her fondneſs that ſhe rather choſe to ſuffer exile than the want of him; nor did ſhe return to her country till ſuch time as her ſon came with her. She bore his death after his return and proſperity with the ſame courage that ſhe had ſhewed in following him; neither was ſhe obſerved to ſhed a tear at his burial. Thus ſhe gave proof of her courage in his baniſhment, and of her prudence at his death; for as in the one caſe ſhe could not be deterred from ſhewing her piety, ſo in the other nothing could make her indulge a fooliſh and unprofitable grief. With theſe women I would have you numbered, whoſe life you have always imitated, &c.' The reader will give me leave to ſet down a paſſage out of Father Senault's treatiſe de l'Uſage des Paſſions, - - - of the uſe of the paſſions, in that part of it wherein he explains the nature of deſire. ' Baniſhment is doubtleſs one of the ' moſt cruel puniſhments Judges have found for the ' chaſtiſement of guilty perſons: we are thereby ſeparated from whatever we love, and it ſeems to be ' a long death, attended with a little life to make us ' more miſerable: and yet there was a mother, who ' rather choſe to ſuffer the cruelty of that puniſhment ' than the violence of deſire, and was willing to follow her ſon in his baniſhment, that ſhe might not ' be obliged to lament his abſence, and wiſh for his ' return.' But how came Father Senault to know, that becauſe ſhe followed her ſon, ſhe was free from the trouble of wiſhing he might return to Rome? As for the reſt, Rutilia's ſon was called Caius Aurelius Cotta. He was a good Orator (2): he was baniſhed during the quarrels of Marius and Sylla, and returned to Rome when the party of the latter was uppermoſt. He was made Conſul in the year of Rome 678. It is probable he died two years after of a wound that opened again; which deprived him of the glory of the triumph that was decreed for him (3). He is not that Cotta, who is one of the interlocutors in Cicero's books de Natura Deorum, as Glandorpius will have it (4).

(1) Seneca de Conſolatione ad Helviam, cap. xvi, p. m. 787.

(2) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. i, cap. viii, & in Bruto cap. xxx. See Corradus in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 310. & ſeq.

(3) Conſult Sigonius in faſtis Conſul, ad ann. 678, 680.

[B] He had recourſe to Pomponius Atticus, who could not very well ſatisfy him.] He deſired to know whether Rutilia died before or after her ſon. ' Rutilia ' vivo ne C. Cotta filio ſuo mortua ſit, an mortuo? ' Pertinent ad eum librum quem de luctu minuendo ' ſcripſimus (5). - - - Whether Rutilia died before or after C. Cotta her ſon? Theſe things have a relation to the book I have writ on the motives for abating our grief.' In another letter he has theſe words: ' De ' Rutilia, quoniam videris dubitare ſcribes ad me ' cum ſcies, ſed quam primum (6). - - - Becauſe you ſeem to be in a doubt with reſpect to Rutilia, write to me when you are fully ſatisfied; but let it be as ſoon as poſſible.' Corradus's note is too curious not to be inſerted here: ' Mortuo mortua eſt . . . . quod mirum ' Ciceronem quæſiſſe quum in libris oratoriis jampridem ſcripſiſſet Cottam ipſum ſibi ſermonem illum retuliſſe: quin Atticus etiam dubitabat, quum ' tamen uterque & Cottam & Rutiliam vidiſſet (7). ' - - - She died after him . . . . and it is ſtrange that Cicero ſhould have aſked ſuch a queſtion, ſince long before that in his books of Rhetoric he had ſaid, that Cotta himſelf related that diſcourſe to him: but it ſeems that Atticus was likewiſe in a doubt about it, notwithſtanding that he, as well as Cicero, had ſeen both Cotta and Rutilia.'

(4) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 144.

(5) Cicero, Epiſt. XX, lib. xii, ad Atticum.

(6) Idem. Epiſt. XXII, ejuſd. libri.

(7) Corradus in Epiſt. XX, lib. xii, ad Atticum, pag. 328, edit. Græviana.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

RUYSBROECK (JOHN DE) in Latin Ruſbrochius, was ſo called from the village of Ruyſbroeck in Brabant between Bruſſels and Hall, where he was born. He was firſt curate and then rector of the church of St Gudula at Bruſſels, and afterwards founder and firſt prior of a convent of Canons regular of the order of St Auguſtin at Groendal, in the foreſt of Soignies, two leagues from Bruſſels; and laſtly reformer of the order in all the Low-Countries (a). He was a man of no learning, but very devout [A] and contemplative, and altogether internal; and went ſo far into the depths of myſtical Divinity that he paſſed for one of the greateſt maſters in that ſcience. He was called a ſecond Dionyſius Areopagita (b). He wrote ſeveral books in Dutch, the manuſcripts of which are kept in the monaſtery of Groendal, with the Latin verſion of ſome of them tranſlated by William Jordan, his contemporary, and of the ſame fraternity with the author (c). By reaſon of his ignorance it was thought that he was to be accounted one of thoſe who have written by inſpiration (d). There is a Latin tranſlation of all his works done by Laurence Surius, and thrice printed at Cologn, viz. in the year 1552, in the year 1609, and in the year 1692. His treatiſe of the ſpiritual marriage had already been printed in Latin at Paris in 1512. John de Schoonhove hath writ an apology for that treatiſe in anſwer to the critical diſſertation of John Gerſon. He is not the only perſon who has anſwered that diſſertation. Denis the Carthuſian likewiſe anſwered it (e). It is obſervable that our Ruyſbroeck wrote without any other aſſiſtance ſave that of a profound meditation. He retired into a remote corner of the foreſt, and there expected the inſpirations from above (f), and as he received them, he wrote them in his pocket-book. Theſe were the only materials of his works which he digeſted when he was returned to his monaſtery. There are ſome who have them in great eſteem; and even ſome Proteſtants commend them [B]. The character of this myſtical Divine, may be learnt from what hath been ſaid elſewhere, and from what will be ſeen below [C]. The ſubmiſſion of Ruyſbroeck to the Divine Will extended even to the torments of Hell

(a) Val. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 555.

(b) Dionyſ. Carthuſianus, Tract. ii, de Donis Spiritus Sancti, Artic. xiii.

(c) Val. Andreas, ubi ſupra, pag. 556, 557.

(d) See the remark [A].

(e) See Gothofr. Arnoldus, Hiſtoria Theolog. Myſticæ, p. 308.

(f) See the remark [A].

[A] He was a man of no learning, but very devout.] This is what we are told by the abbot Trithemius, 'Vir, ut ferunt, devotus, ſed parùm literatus (1). - - - 'A devout man, as they ſay, but of ſmall learning.' Dionyſius the Carthuſian obſerves that Ruyſbroeck though unlearned had notwithſtanding thoughts ſo ſublime, that they raviſhed to admiration, and even almoſt to an extaſy, the moſt excellent Profeſſors of Theology, who owned that they were above their underſtanding. This he aſcribes to the inſpirations of the Holy Spirit: Nonnè ritè mirabile cenſemus, quod Ruſbrochius, cum idiota eſſet, nihilominus meritò ſanctitatis & ſimplicitatis ſuæ, tam ſupernaturales divinitùs theorias ſortitus eſt, & in ſuo quoque vulgari idiomate tam ſubtiliſſimas veritates conſcripſit, ut excellentiſſimi Sacræ theologiæ profeſſores Spiritum præ admiratione vix habeant, ſeque ſententias ejus non poſſe intelligere ediſſerunt (2). Many other authors have had recourſe to the ſame cauſe; and have maintained that Ruyſbroeck had all his knowledge immediately from the Holy Spirit, and they obſerve that he himſelf thought ſo. 'Fundamentum & originem horum ejus ſcriptorum, 'Lector, qui illuminatis mentis oculis, ſanoque Spi-'rituali guſtu, ad diſcernendum bonum à malo gau-'det, facile purum & divinum cognoſcet. Quâ cauſâ '& Editores promiſcuè ferè Inſcriptionibus Librorum 'ejus ejuſmodi teſtimonia propoſuerunt. Hos nempè 'libros divinitate & illuminatione plenos, ac à DEO 'inſpiratos eſſe. Et in vitæ ejus Hiſtoria narratur. 'Cap. iix. p. 4. quod à Gerardo Magno interroga-'tus, ſic reſponderit: Certum ac firmum habeto, nul-'lum me unquam verbum ſcriptis meis inſeruiſſe, niſi ex 'inſtinctu Spiritus S. & in ſingulari quadam & dulciſ-'ſima præſentia ſuperſanctiſſimæ Trinitatis. Et ſequente 'Capite ix. commemoratur; quod plerumque ſolus in 'ſylvæ abdita ſe recipere conſueverit, atque ibi ſum-'mo ſilentio, quæ ex Dei Spiritu hauſiſſet, in ſcripta 'redegerit, hocque pacto omnia ſua opera conſcrip-'ſerit, atque ita minimè ex aliis congeſſerit. Quippe 'nulla literarum cultura ornatus, artem hanc neſci-'vit (3). - - - Whoſoever, reader, hath the eyes of 'his mind illuminated, and is of a ſound ſpiritual 'taſte, to diſcern good from evil, will plainly per-'ceive, that the foundation and origin of theſe writings, 'is holy and divine. Upon which account it is that the 'publiſhers of all his works in general have given them 'ſuch teſtimonies as this, viz. that theſe books are full 'of divine illumination, and inſpired by GOD. And 'it is reported in chap. viii. p. 4. that being aſked by 'Gerardus Magnus, he thus anſwered: Believe it moſt 'certain, that I have never put any word in my writ-'ings, but by the inſpiration of the Holy Spirit, and 'in a certain particular and moſt raviſhing preſence of 'the moſt Holy Trinity. And in the following ninth 'chapter it is ſaid; that he commonly uſed to retire alone 'into the moſt ſolitary places of the foreſt, and there, in 'profound ſilence, put in writing what he received from 'the Divine Spirit, and in this manner he compoſed all 'his works, and ſo did not collect them from others. For 'not being endowed with learning, he was a ſtranger to 'that art.' What I am going to cite from Valerius Andreas will explain and confirm all this. Vir divinæ contemplationi addictiſſimus, & ſanctitatis majoris quàm doctrinæ; cùm ea, quæ ſcripſit, divino ſpiritu edoctus videatur. Narrat enim Henricus à Pomerio, ejuſdem inſtituti ac loci Religioſus, Vitæque Scriptor, quod antiquam libros ſuos dictaret, habuerit pro conſuetudine, ut, dum divinæ illuſtrationis radio immadeſceret, ſolus ſe-cederet in abdita ſilvæ, ibique dictante Spiritu ſancto ea, quæ ſibi occurrebant, in tabula cerea ſcripto commendans, ſecum ſolebat, ad monaſterium rediens, apportare: ſicque interpolatis vicibus edidiſſe ſuos libros (4). Can any one after this be ſurprized that many have complained that the writings of Ruyſbroeck are very obſcure (5)? How can they be otherwiſe being compoſed by an unlearned man, and on the ſubject of myſtical Divinity, where almoſt nothing is underſtood, even when the moſt ſubtile and learned pens have treated it.

(1) Trithem. apud Geſner. Biblioth. folio 452, verſo.

(2) Dionyſ. Carthuſianus, Serm. I. de Confeſſ. non Pontif. apud Gothofredum Arnoldum, in Hiſtoria Theolog. Myſticæ, pag. 307, where he alſo ſays, & hinc Dionyſium illum nuncupavit alterum, ob excellentem ejus ſapientiam, cujus ſolum Spiritum S. habuit Doctorem. Tract. II de Donis Spirit. S. Art. 13.

(3) Gothofr. Arnoldus, ibid. pag. 310.

(4) Val. Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 555, 556.

(5) Arnol. Hiſt. Theol. Myſticæ, pag. 311.

[B] There are ſome who have them in great eſteem, and even ſome Proteſtants themſelves commend them.] Mr Arnold (6) points out ſeveral paſſages from Catholic authors who have admired Ruyſbroeck. He does not forget the Lutherans who praiſe him, and ſpeaks alſo of the Calviniſts who have judged favourably of him; but he ſhould not have put (7) Franciſcus Swertius in that number who is a ſtanch Popiſh author. In all likelihood the occaſion of his miſtake was his calling to mind that there was a book intituled Athenæ Batavæ, the author of which was a Calviniſt, and his not taking notice of the difference between that book and the Athenæ Belgicæ of Swertius. It is impoſſible for a man not to fall ſometimes into ſuch a miſtake, how careful ſoever he may be.

(6) Idem. ibid. pag. 307, & ſeq.

(7) Ibid. p. 309.

[C] The character of this myſtical Divine may be learned from what hath been ſaid elſewhere (8), and what will be ſeen below.] It is aſſerted in the work from whence we took the character of Taulerus, that Ruyſbroeck, his cotemporary, and in ſome manner his maſter, was almoſt of the ſame character, and ſometimes ſoars higher and is more methodical than he (9). Two pages after it is ſaid that Henry Harphius comes very near the character of Taulerus, 'and that before 'him, no perſon ever did, nor perhaps after him ever 'will penetrate ſo deep into the inward ſtates of a 'ſoul altogether reſigned to GOD; whereby we may 'ſee that Ruyſbroeck has been no ſmall aſſiſtance to 'him. His character is, to propoſe the gradual re-'ſurrection

(8) In the remark [E] in the article TAULER.

(9) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, prefixed with the Theologie Germanique, pag. 13. Amſterd. Edition 1700.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Hell [D]. He died the second day of December 1381, at the age of eighty-eight years. It is said that he wrought maricles, and an attempt was made to canonize him [E]. I shall take notice of the mistakes of Moreri, and of the author of the Essays of Literature [F]. I do not explain the subject of the dispute in which Gerson engaged ' surrection of the states of spiritual life in a purified ' and experienced soul. He shews how after various ' mortifications, purifications, and experiences of the ' soul, there are raised in it from one degree to ano- ' ther new states of divine life, first active, then pas- ' sive, in the inferior powers of the soul, after that ' in the superior (the memory, the understanding, and ' the will): afterward in its essential ground, and ' finally over its being and the operations of its ' powers, by being possessed by the Holy Trinity, ' which therein manifest their adorable operations. ' This is the most curious, most substantial, and most ' advanced system of the depth of mystical Divinity ' that hath ever yet appeared (10).' Mr Arnold (11) quotes some authors who observe that Henry Harphius hath borrowed of Ruysbroeck almost all the matter of the contemplation in his second and third books. Thus we may form an idea of the spirit of Ruysbroeck by considering the character of Harphius.

(10) Idem. p. 15.

(11) Arnold. Hist. Theol. Mystic. p. 308.

[D] The resignation of Ruysbroeck to the will of GOD extended even to the torments of Hell.] That is he found nothing was better than to be willing to suffer whatever GOD should be pleased to send, death, or life, and even the pains of Hell. In this manner he explained himself one day when some body attempted to inspire him with fear of infernal pains. In Historia illius cap viii. legitur " Quod Gerhardus cùm quan- " doque insolitam in Rusbrochio erga Deum fiduciam, " non ex temeritate, timorem foras mittente, concep- " tam perspexisset, quandoque divini judicii & inferni " metum ei incutere multis Scripturæ commemorandis " sententiis attentaverit." Sed quanto plus ei quandam ' injicere formidinem connitebatur, tanto vir plus ma- ' jori in Deum amore ferveſcebat; & tandem respon- ' dit: Magister Gerharde fixum & certum habe, me ex ' animo paratum esse ad perferenda omnia, quæ Dominus ' mihi accidere volet, sive mors sit, sive vita, sive etiam ' ipsi intolerabiles cruciatus inferorum. Neque enim quic- ' quam mihi vel jucundius, vel melius, vel salubriùs ju- ' dico, nec quicquam aliud vel peto, vel desidero, quam ' ut amantissimus Dominus Deus meus promtum me semper ' atque paratum inveniat, ad suæ arbitrium voluntatis. ' Hoc breviter totum viri hujus Principium detegit (12). " - - - When Gerhard perceiving Ruysbroeck professed " faith, love, and trust in GOD, would sometimes try " to excite in him the fear of the divine judgment and " of Hell, by quoting several passages of scripture to that " effect; the man was so far from being moved there- " by, that his love to GOD seemed to be more inflamed; " and at last he would answer:" ' Mr Gerhard assure ' your self, that from my heart I am willing to suffer ' whatever the Lord shall be pleased to lay on me, whe- ' ther it be death, or life, or even the intolerable pains ' of Hell. For I judge nothing more pleasant, or ' better, or more to my advantage, nor do I seek, or ' desire any thing else, than that my most beloved ' Lord GOD, may always find me willing and pre- ' pared to comply with the good pleasure of his will. ' This briefly discovers the principles of this man.' Mr Arnold, from whom I have taken what I have related, says that Ruysbroeck was not so much as other Mystics, occupied in squaring his actions according to the law from a principle of the servile fear of punishment, but all his endeavour and study was the exercise of a free evangelical virtue, manifesting itself by the filial spirit that operates in every true believer. Character Mystici hujus Doctoris (Rusbrochii) in multis ad Tauleri supra excerptum accedere videtur. Attamen judico, Rus- brochii propositionem longè puriorem & vivæ ac fiduciali fidei in nomen Jesu in nobis conformiorem esse. Dum minus ac omnes ferè alii antiquorum Mysticorum theologo- rum, timorem servilem & inde orientem propriam acti- vitatem ac legales, anxiasque exercitationes intendat, & è contrario ad liberam Evangelii virtutem & efficaciam Novi Fœderis tantummodo ducat, eo modo, quo hæc se per unctionem filialis Spiritus unicuique vere credenti re- velat (13).

(12) Idem. ibid. pag. 313.

(13) Idem. ibid. pag. 312.

We may observe, by the by, that there is no doctrine for which the Mystics are so much exclaimed against, as for that of consenting to their own eternal damnation. Mr Jurieu has not forgot it (14): but he is accused of having unfaithfully related the words of Francis de Sales. Consult Mr Arnold (15) who taxes him pretty briskly, for this and other faults, and especially for contradicting himself (16); but he hath not rightly understood that place of the 158th page: These words of Francis de Sales shew the weakness of the archbishop of Cambray's Theology. He thus translates them; hæc verba monstrant nobis amentiam Archiepiscopi Cameracen- sis: he should have rendred them, hæc verba mon- strant nobis locum debilem Theologiæ Archiepiscopi Came- racensis. There is a great difference between the folly of a man, and the weakness of his doctrines.

(14) In his Historical Treatise, concerning Mystical Divinity, printed at Rotterdam in the year 1699.

(15) Arnold, ubi supra, pag. 543, & seq.

(16) Idem. ibid. pag. 557, & seq.

[E] It was said that he wrought miracles; and endeavours were used to have had him canonized.] This is what you will find in these Latin words: ' Plura de ' Vita & Miraculis sancti hujus viri, post Henr. à Po- ' merio, Marcus Mastelinus, ejusdem loci Religiosus, ' in suo Necrologio Viridis Vallis lib. II. cap. i. & ' seqq. Descripsit & acta Vitæ ejusdem Thomas de Jesu, ' Carmelita Excalceatus, Gregorio XV. pro obtinenda ' illius beatificatione præsentata (17). - - - More of the ' life and miracles of this holy man we have from Mar- ' cus Mastellinus in his Necrologium Viridis Vallis, a ' Monk of the same monastery. Thomas de Jesu, a Car- ' melite, barefooted Friar, wrote also the acts of his life, ' which he presented to Pope Gregory XV, in order to ob- ' tain his canonization.'

(17) Valer. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 557.

[F] I shall take notice of the mistakes of Moreri, and of the author of the Essays on Literature.] I. He should not have said that the village Ruisbroeck is upon the Sambre in Brabant. It would be difficult to find upon the banks of the Sambre any village belonging to Brabant; but however that would not agree to the country of Ruysbroeck. It is situated upon the river of Senne between Brussels and Hall. Valerius Andreas and Father Labbe who were Mr Moreri's authors in this article observe this in expres terms. How then could he think that a place situated between these two cities stood upon the Sambre? II. When he says that Ruysbroeck, was first priest and curate of the church of St Gudula, he has not sufficiently considered these words of the original which he intended to translate. Fuit primo Ecclesiæ D. Gudilæ Vicarius & Presbyter (18). I am of opinion they signify that he was successively curate and rector of the church of St Gudula; for methinks it had been to no purpose to observe that he was Priest while he was curate of a parochial church. However it be, Mr Moreri has preposterously transposed the two titles of Ruysbroeck, he has put that of Priest before that of curate in spite of Valerius Andreas who was his author. III. No such thing is known as the monastery of Val-vert in the neighbourhood of Brussels: that of which Ruysbroeck was Prior is called Groendal. Valerias Andreas calls it in Latin Viridis-Vallis, but Mr Moreri ought not to have translated it into French: he should have given it the common name of that convent. IV. Mr du Pin had no reason to say that Ruysbroeck had been a Prior of the monastery of the canons regular of Wavre in the forest of Soignies (19); for Wavre is not in that forest, and it is a Priory of Benedictins: and after all Ruysbroeck was Prior of Groendal, not of Wavre. The French name of that forest is la Foret de Soigne, or de Soignies, and not de Sognien, as Moreri calls it. V. Dionysius the Carthusian is not one of those who turned into Latin the works of Ruysbroeck. VI. Ruysbroeck died in the eighty-eight year of his age, and not in the forty-eight (20). VII. Instead of quoting Mark Mastelin in Necro Viridis Vallis, he ought to have cited in Necrologio Viridis Vallis. VIII. He should have quoted book II, article xiii of Dionysius the Carthusian de Donis Spiritus Sancti, and not book I, article iii.

(18) Idem, ibid. pag. 555.

(19) Du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. xi, pag. m. 84.

(20) This mistake is in the Paris edition of 1699; but not in the former editions.

The anonymous author, who began in the month of July 1702 to publish at Paris Essays of Literature for the knowledge of books, has given us the article of Ruysbroeck in the essays for November of that year (21). It is almost nothing else but a paraphrase of Moreri; he is fallen into the first six faults which I have just now observed, and to these he has added other very gross

(21) Pag. 132, & seq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google engaged againſt the book of ſpiritual marriage: Mr du Pin may be conſulted, who acquaints us in few words with what is ſufficient to be known in that affair (g).

(g) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. xi, pag. 84, Holland Edition.

groſs ones. I. He ſays that the works of Ruyſbroeck printed at Cologn in the years 1552, and 1609, are in 4to. This is only true of the edition of 1609: the other is in folio. II. He is ignorant of the edition at Cologn 1692. III. He ſays that it is obſerved that Gerſon was ſo prejudiced againſt that author, that he could not bear even to bear his name mentioned. Mr du Pin on the contrary affirms, that Gerſon afterwards acknowledged that Ruyſbroeck might be excuſed (22). IV. This anonymous author will have it that there was one John Ruſbach, who hath been confounded with John Ruyſbroeck. He aſcribes to this John Ruſbach the following books, Tractatus de præcipuis virtutibus. Liber de fide & judicio. De quatuor tentationibus. De ſeptem cuſtodiis. De ſeptem gradibus amoris. De perfectione filiorum Dei. Regnum amantium Deum. De vera contemplatione. Epiſtolæ & cantiones. He ſays that Ruſbroch flouriſhed in the year 1390, as Trithemius hath obſerved, who hath alſo confounded him with John Ruſbach: notwithſtanding that he had but juſt before ſaid that Ruſbrochius died young, which was in the year 1381, aged forty-eight years, contrary to the opinion of Trithemius, who places his death no earlier than 1390 (23). He pretends that ſeveral authors have obſerved that a diſtinction was to be made between John Ruſbach, and John Ruyſbroeck. He adds, that he has beſides for his author Conrad Geſner, whoſe Hiſtorical Library is in great eſteem, and who for certain knew better the authors of his own country than any other Annaliſt. This is to make many miſtakes in a few words; for in the firſt place Geſner's Bibliotheque ſays nothing at all about John Ruſbach, and in the ſecond place Geſner was a Swiſs, and not John Ruyſbroeck's countryman, and our author ſays nothing of the country of his pretended John Ruſbach. Will he have him to be a Swiſs, and that this conſequence may be inferred from what he hath ſaid of Geſner? But in this caſe it muſt likewiſe be concluded that Ruyſbroeck was a Swiſs. In the third place, he confounds with Geſner thoſe who have abridged his Bibliotheque, and who have thereto added new articles: theſe are they which ſpeak not only of Johannes Ruſbachius, but alſo of Johannes Ruſberus, as of two authors different from Joannes Ruyſbroekius. They are groſsly miſtaken: they make three authors of one, as Father Labbe has very well conjectured (24). The books which they aſcribe to this John Ruſbachius, and which they ſay were printed at Cologn in 1552, apud hæredes Quenteli, are found in the edition of the works of John Ruyſbroeck, publiſhed at Cologn in the year 1552, by the ſame Printers. And as to the book which they attribute to John Ruſberus de ornatu ſpiritualium nuptiarum, libri III, it is undoubtedly the work of our Ruyſbroeck (25): even the author of the Eſſays is of this opinion (26).

(22) Du Pin, Bibliotheq. Tom. xi, pag. 84.

(23) It is in this year Trithemius ſays that Ruyſbroeck flouriſhed, not that he died in it.

(24) Labbe, de Scriptor. Eccleſ. Tom. I, p. 604.

(25) See Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 556.

(26) Eſſais de Literat, Nov. 1702, pag. 156.

The End of the Fourth VOLUME.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

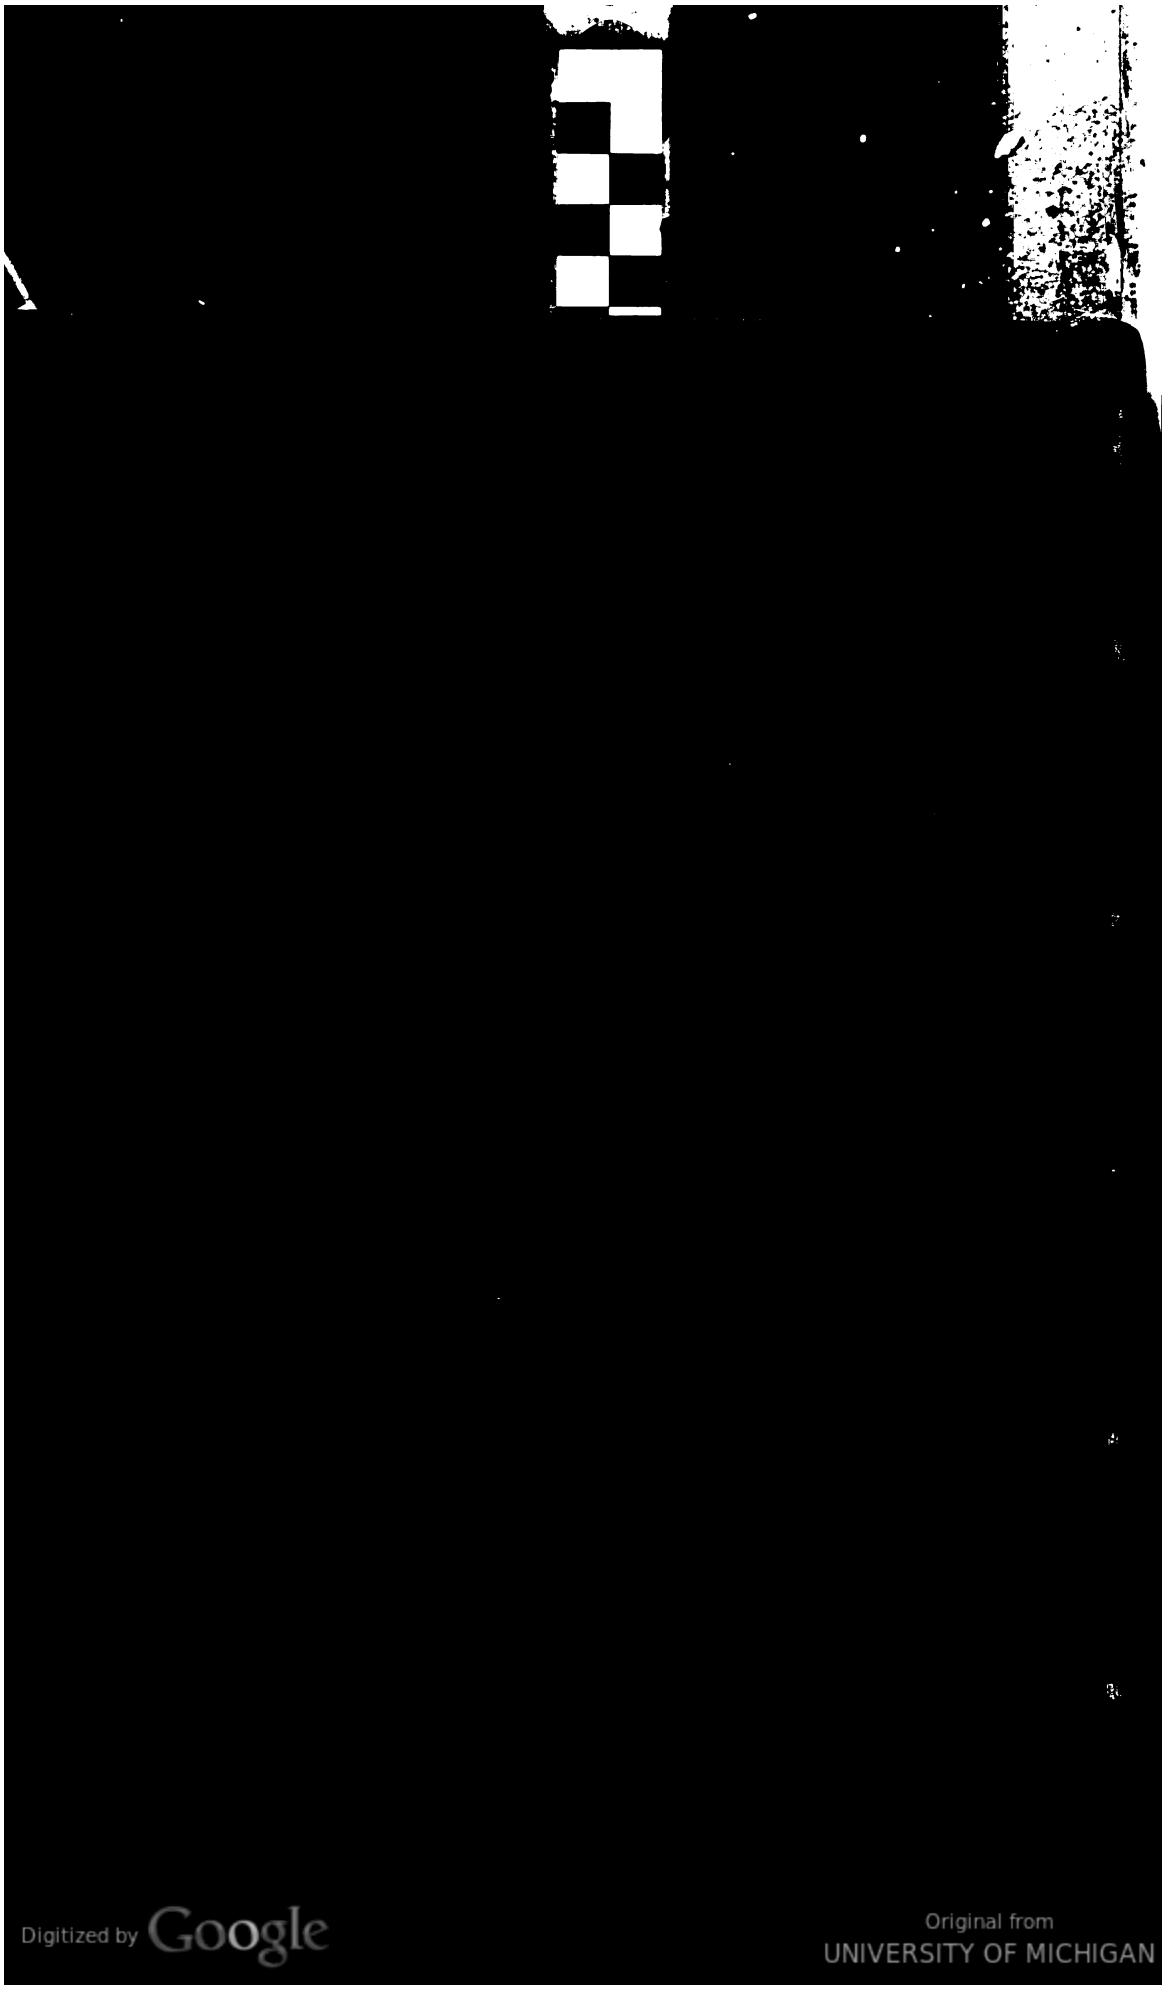
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google